She charm'd my soul—I wist na how;
And ay the stound, the deadly wound,
Came frae her een sae bonnie blue.
But spare to speak, and spare to speed;
She'll aiblins listen to my vow:
Should she refuse, I'll lay my dead
To her twa een sae bonnie blue.

[“The ‘blue eyed lass was Jean Jeffrey, one of the daughters of the minister of Lochmaben. The Poet, on a visit to King Bruce's borough, drank tea, and spent an evening at the manse. The honours of the table were performed by Miss Jeffrey, a rosy girl of seventeen, with winning manners and laughing blue eyes. Next morning the Poet wrote and sent her the song, greatly to her surprise and pleasure. She is now Mrs. Renwick, and lives in New York.

“The air to which the song is written was composed by Robert Riddel, of Glenriddell, and is a favourite in Dumfries-shire. It is, however, beyond the power of many good singers, and can only be given to perfection by a voice rich in tone, and high in its reach. It was the fortune of Burns to meet with many friends whose knowledge in musical composition aided him in his lyric verse. Clarke, Masterton, and Riddel were all men of scientific skill. He had, however, through the help of his mother and the dames of Kyle, mastered a great number of airs, and laid in a vast stock of old rhymes, such as starting-lines and choruses, which he wrought into his productions. His note-books are full of snatches—some devout, some merry, and some wild.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Banks of Nith.

Tune—Robie donna Gorach.

I.

THE Thames flows proudly to the sea,
Where royal cities stately stand;
But sweeter flows the Nith, to me,
Where Cummins ance had high command:

When shall I see that honour'd land,
That winding stream I love so dear !
Must wayward fortune's adverse hand
For ever, ever keep me here ?

II.

How lovely, Nith, thy fruitful vales,
Where spreading hawthorns gaily bloom !
How sweetly wind thy sloping dales,
Where lambkins wanton thro' the broom !
Tho' wandering, now, must be my doom,
Far from thy bonnie banks and braes,
May there my latest hours consume,
Among the friends of early days !*

◆

Tam Glen.

Tune—Tam Glen.

I.

My heart is a-breaking, dear Tittie !
Some counsel unto me come len',
To anger them a' is a pity,
But what will I do wi' Tam Glen ?

II.

I'm thinking, wi' sic a braw fallow,
In poortith I might mak a fen' ;
What care I in riches to wallow,
If I mauna marry Tam Glen ?

III.

There's Lowrie the laird o' Drumeller,
" Guid day to you, brute ! " he comes ben :
He brags and he blows o' his siller,
But when will he dance like Tam Glen ?

IV.

My minnie does constantly deave me,
And bids me beware o' young men ;
They flatter, she says, to deceive me,
But wha can think sae o' Tam Glen ?

V.

My daddie says, gin I'll forsake him,
He'll gie me guid hunder marks ten :
But, if it's ordain'd I maun take him,
O wha will I get but Tam Glen ?

VI.

Yestreen at the Valentine's dealing,
My heart to my mou' gried a sten ;
For thrice I drew ane without failing,
And thrice it was written—Tam Glen.

* ["The Poet imagined himself in a distant land ; and recalling the romantic hills and lovely valleys of Nithsdale, as he mused, composed this sweet song. The Comyns "once had high command" in the district : one of their strong places was at Castledykes, immediately below Dumfries : another was at Dalswinton, a spot of great beauty, now the residence of one more than worthy of being its proprietor—James Macalpine Leny, Esq. Part of Comyn's Castle was standing as late as the year 1794. The walls were twelve feet thick, composed of hewn free-stone, and cemented with mortar of such strength that the stones separated any where save at the joints. The castle had evidently been consumed by fire. Opposite Dalswinton stands The Isle, an old tower surrounded by gardens and orchards. Ellisland is farther up the Nith ; with Friars-Carse, and Blackwood, the property

VII.

The last Halloween I lay waukin
My droukit sark-sleeve, as ye ken ;
His likeness cam up the house staukin,
And the very grey breeks o' Tam Glen !

VIII.

Come counsel, dear Tittie ! don't tarry—
I'll gie you my bonnie black hen,
Gif ye will advise me to marry
The lad I lo'e dearly, Tam Glen.

[Tam Glen is the title of an old song and older Scottish air. Of the former nothing remains save a portion of the chorus ; and the latter is not likely to die, if one of the cleverest lyrics of the north can preserve it. This song no sooner made its appearance than it became a favourite : it was sung in the field and at the fire-side. Husbandman, as he met husbandman, slapped his thigh and exclaimed—

"The very grey breeks o' Tam Glen ! "]

◆

Frae the Friends and Land I Love.

Air—Carron Side.

I.

FRAE the friends and land I love,
Driv'n by fortune's felly spite,
Frae my best belov'd I rove,
Never mair to taste delight ;
Never mair maun hope to find
Ease frae toil, relief frae care :
When remembrance wracks the mind,
Pleasures but unveil despair.

II.

Brightest climes shall mirk appear,
Desert ilka blooming shore,
Till the fates, nae mair severe,
Friendship, love, and peace restore ;
Till Revenge, wi' laurel'd head,
Bring our banish'd hame again ;
And ilka loyal bonnie lad
Cross the seas and win his ain.

of William Copland, descended from John Copland who took David Bruce prisoner in the battle of Durham. The house of Blackwood stands on a bend of the stream ; behind is a lofty hill studded with fine clumps of natural wood, the relics of the old Caledonian forest ; before it the Nith winds along a rich extent of holmland ; while towards the north, in the middle of the high road from Glasgow, grows that magnificent oak called the " Three Brethren." Three straight, tall shafts spring up at an equal distance from each other, and it is believed that they unite in the ground below : they are of similar girth : the branches of each are perfectly alike ; and the peasantry say there is not a bough nor a leaf on one but the same will be found on the other. The three, at a distance, seem one vast tree, of a conical shape."—CUNNINGHAM.]

[Burns, in his notes on the Musical Museum, says of this song, "I added the last four lines by way of giving a turn to the theme of the poem—such as it is." Had the Poet been asked where he found the other twelve lines of the song, we know not what answer he would have made—for they are in none of our lyrical collections. In truth, they speak plainly of his own personal history:—the jacobitical conclusion was an after-thought.

The air of the song is called "Carron Side," and may be found in the eighth volume of Oswald's Collection. The composer has, however, availed himself of some passages from the well-known old air of "Todden' Hame." "A poet," says Burns, in allusion to his habit of amending the ancient strains, "should mend a song as the Highlander mended his pistol—he gave it a new stock, a new lock, and a new barrel."]

Sweet closes the Evening.

Tune—Craigie-burn-wood.

I.

SWEET closes the evening on Craigie-burn-wood,
And blithely awakens the morrow; [wood
But the pride of the spring in the Craigie-burn-
Can yield to me nothing but sorrow.

CHORUS.

Beyond thee, dearie, beyond thee, dearie,
And O! to be lying beyond thee;
O sweetly, soundly, weel may he sleep
That's laid in the bed beyond thee!

II.

I see the spreading leaves and flowers,
I hear the wild birds singing;
But pleasure they hae nane for me,
While care my heart is wringing.

III.

I canna tell, I maunna tell,
I darena for your anger;
But secret love will break my heart,
If I conceal it langer.

IV.

I see thee gracefu', straight, and tall,
I see thee sweet and bonnie;
But oh, what will my torments be,
If thou refuse thy Johnnie!

V.

To see thee in anither's arms,
In love to lie and languish,
'Twad be my dead, that will be seen,
My heart wad burst wi' anguish.

VI.

But, Jeanie, say thou wilt be mine,
Say, thou lo'es nane before me;
And a' my days o' life to come
I'll gratefully adore thee.

Beyond thee, dearie, beyond thee, dearie,
And O, to be lying beyond thee;
O sweetly, soundly, weel may he sleep
That's laid in the bed beyond thee!

[“ This song was composed in honour of the charms of Jean Lorimer, to whom, under the name of CHLORIS, the Poet has addressed several of his most enchanting songs, and who was then residing at Craigie-burn-wood, near Moffat; the poet wrote it to aid the eloquence of a Mr. Gillespie, who was paying his addresses to her. Neither the Poet's verse nor the lover's language prevailed: Jean married an officer, of the name of Whelpdale—lived with him a few months—quitted him, in consequence of great provocation, and then took up her residence in Dumfries, where she had many opportunities of seeing the Poet. The tune was picked up from a country-girl's singing, and is one of the finest of all the airs of Caledonia. Burns altered this song a little, and inserted it afterwards in the collection of George Thomson: he very properly left out the words of the chorus, adopted from an old ballad—not remarkable for its delicacy.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Come rede me, Dame.

I.

COME rede me, dame, come tell me, dame,
And nane can tell mair truly,
What colour maun the man be of,
To love a woman duly.

II.

The carlin clew baith up and down,
And leugh and answer'd ready,
I learn'd a sang in Annandale,
A dark man for my lady.

III.

But for a country quean like thee,
Young lass, I tell thee fairly,
That wi' the white I've made a shift,
And brown will do fu' rarely.

IV.

There's mickle love in raven locks,
The flaxen ne'er grows youden,
There's kiss and hause me in the brown,
And glory in the gowden.

Cock up your Beaver.

Tune—Cock up your beaver.

I.

WHEN first my brave Johnnie lad
Came to this town,
He had a blue bonnet
That wanted the crown;
But now he has gotten
A hat and a feather,—
Hey, brave Johnnie lad,
Cock up your beaver!

II.

Cock up your beaver,
And cock it fu' sprush,
We'll over the border
And gie them a brush;
There's somebody there—
We'll teach better behaviour—
Hey, brave Johnnie lad,
Cock up your beaver!

[“This is a much amended version of a song partly published by Herd: some of the old lines are not amiss:—

‘Cock up your beaver,
And cock it na wrang;
We'll a' to England
Ere it be lang.’

Burns seems to have glanced, in the second verse, at a sarcastic song directed by the English against the Scots at the accession of the House of Stuart. The man of the south, with all the insolence of wealth, thus questions his northern neighbour:—

‘Well met, Jockie, whither away,
Shall we two have a word or tway?
Thou wast so lousie the other day,
How the devil comes you so gay?

Ha! ha! ha! by sweet Saint Anne,
Jockie is grown a gentleman.

‘Thy belt that was made of a white leather thong,
Which thou and thy father wore so long,
Are turned to hangers of velvet strong,
With gold and pearl embroider'd among.

‘Thy bonnet of blue, which thou worest hither,
To keep thy skonce from wind and weather,
Is thrown away, the devil knows whither,
And turn'd to a beaver hat and feather.

Ha! ha! ha! by sweet St. Anne,
Jockie is turn'd a gentleman.’

“This is a picture of prejudice as well as of costume. The Scotch were not insensible of the advantage of visiting their neighbours besouth the Tweed. One humble pedestrian, on reaching Lancashire, saw several bodies hanging on gibbets: he paused, and exclaimed, ‘God be praised! I have reached a civilized land at last—here the law is in full operation.’—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

My Tocher's the Jewel.

Tune—My Tocher's the Jewel.

I.

O MEIKLE thinks my luvè o' my beauty,
And meikle thinks my luvè o' my kin;
But little thinks my luvè I ken brawlie
My tocher's the jewel has charms for him.
It's a' for the apple he'll nourish the tree;
It's a' for the hiney he'll cherish the bee;
My laddie's sae meikle in luvè wi' the siller
He canna hae luvè to spare for me.

II.

Your proffer o' luvè's an airt-penny,
My tocher's the bargain ye wad buy;
But an ye be crafty, I am cunning,
Sae ye wi' anither your fortune maun try.
Ye're like to the timmer o' yon rotten wood,
Ye're like to the bark o' yon rotten tree,
Ye'll slip frae me like a knotless thread,
And ye'll crack your credit wi' mae nor me.

[“Burns wrote these verses for the Museum to an air by Oswald: the Poet wished them to be sung to a tune called ‘Lord Elcho's favourite,’ of which he was an admirer. Readers, acquainted with the Lowlands of Scotland, may perhaps remember rustic rhymes something akin to the last four lines of this song:—

‘I'll set her up on yon crab-tree,
It's sour and dour, and so is she;—
I'll set her upon yon bane-dyke,
For she'll be rotten ere I be ripe.’

Burns had an intimate acquaintance with the quaint sayings, the curious remarks, the pithy saws, the moral adages, and the moralizing rhymes of Scotland. He introduces them often, and generally with great happiness.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Guidwife count the Lawin.

Tune—Guidwife count the Lawin.

I.

GANE is the day, and mirk's the night,
But we'll ne'er stray for fau't o' light,
For ale and brandy's stars and moon,
And blude-red wine's the rising sun.

Then guidwife count the lawin,
The lawin, the lawin,
Then guidwife count the lawin,
And bring a coggie mair!

II.

There's wealth and ease for gentlemen,
And semple-folk maun fecht and fen';
But here we're a' in ae accord,
For ilka man that's drunk 's a lord.

III.

My coggie is a haly pool,
That heals the wounds o' care and dool;
And pleasure is a wanton trout,
An' ye drink but deep ye'll find him out.

Then gudewife count the lawin,
The lawin, the lawin;
Then gudewife count the lawin,
And bring a coggie mair!

[Burns supplied the air as well as the words of this song to the Museum: he says in his notes, "The chorus of this is part of an old song, one stanza of which I recollect:—

'Every day my wife tells me
That ale and brandy will ruin me;
But if gude liquor be my dead,
This shall be written on my head—
O gudewife count the lawin,
The lawin, the lawin:
O gudewife count the lawin,
And bring a coggie mair.'"]

There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame.

Tune—There are few gude fellows when Willie's awa.

I.

By yon castle wa', at the close of the day,
I heard a man sing, tho' his head it was grey;
And as he was singing, the tears fast down came,
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame.

II.

The church is in ruins, the state is in jars;
Delusions, oppressions, and murderous wars;
We darena weel say't, tho' we ken wha's to blame—
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame!

III.

My seven braw sons for Jamie drew sword,
And now I greet round their green beds in the yard. [dame—
It brak the sweetheart of my faithfu' auld
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame.

IV.

Now life is a burthen that bows me down,
Sin' I tint my bairns, and he tint his crown;
But till my last moments my words are the same—
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame!

["The bard was in one of his jacobitical moods when he wrote this fine song; that he was frequently so his lyrics sufficiently prove. As time passed on, the French revolution, upsetting all established things, and vindicating in theory, if not in practice, the great principle of equality, set opinions welcome to human nature afloat, and a change came over the musings of Burns. In this he was countenanced by many high and low; the high-born Stanhope wrote himself "citizen" as well as the humble-born Joseph Ritson."—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Bonnie Lad that's far awa':

Tune—Owre the Hills and far awa'.

I.

O how can I be blythe and glad,
Or how can I gang brisk and braw,
When the bonnie lad that I lo'e best
Is o'er the hills and far awa?
When the bonnie lad that I lo'e best
Is o'er the hills and far awa?

II.

It's no the frosty winter wind,
It's no the driving drift and snaw;
But aye the tear comes in my e'e,
To think on him that's far awa.
But aye the tear comes in my e'e,
To think on him that's far awa.

III.

My father pat me frae his door,
My friends they hae disown'd me a',
But I hae ane will tak' my part,
The bonnie lad that's far awa.
But I hae ane will tak' my part,—
The bonnie lad that's far awa.

IV.

A pair o' gloves he bought for me,
And silken snoods* he gae me twa;
And I will wear them for his sake,
The bonnie lad that's far awa.
And I will wear them for his sake,—
The bonnie lad that's far awa.

V.

O weary winter soon will pass,
And spring will clead the birken-shaw;
And my young babie will be born,
And he'll be hame that's far awa.
And my young babie will be born,
And he'll be hame that's far awa.

["This little lamentation of a desolate damsel," says Jeffrey, "is tender and pretty." It was written, it is said, in allusion to the treatment of Jean Armour by her father, when he heard that she had not dismissed the Poet from her heart, but still kept up a correspondence. Herd's collection supplied him with strains which he has beautified greatly. The old song begins thus:—

'How can I be blythe or glad,
Or in my mind contented be,
When the bonny, bonny lad that I lo'ed best
Is banish'd from my company?
Though he is banish'd for my sake,
I his true love will still remain;
But O that I was, and I wish I was,
In the chamber where my true love is in.'"]

The air was unknown to our collections before the days of Burns: he is said to have caught it up from the singing of his mother.]

* Ribands for binding the hair.

I do confess thou art sae fair.

Tune—I do confess thou art sae fair.

I.

I DO confess thou art sae fair,
 I wad been o'er the lugs in luvè,
 Had I na found the slightest prayer
 That lips could speak thy heart could muve.
 I do confess thee sweet, but find
 Thou art sae thrifless o' thy sweets,
 Thy favours are the silly wind,
 That kisses ilka thing it meets.

II.

See yonder rose-bud, rich in dew,
 Amang its native briers sae coy ;
 How sune it tines its scent and hue
 When pu'd and worn a common toy !
 Sic fate, ere lang, shall thee betide,
 Tho' thou may gaily bloom awhile ;
 Yet sune thou shalt be thrown aside
 Like ony common weed and vile.

[Burns says, "This song is altered from a Poem by Sir Robert Aytoun, private secretary to Mary and Anne, queens of Scotland. The poem is to be found in James Watson's collection of Scottish poems, the earliest collection printed in Scotland.—I think that I have improved the simplicity of the sentiments by giving them a Scots dress." The following are the old words of this song :—

"I do confess thou'rt smooth and fair,
 And I might have gone near to love thee ;
 Had I not found the slightest prayer,
 That lips could speak, had power to move thee ;
 But I can let thee now alone
 As worthy to be lov'd by none.

"I do confess thou'rt sweet ; yet find
 These such an unthrift of thy sweets,
 Thy favours are but like the wind,
 That kisseth every thing it meets ;
 And since thou canst with more than one,
 Thou'rt worthy to be kissed by none.

"The morning rose, that untouch'd stands,
 Arm'd with her briars, how sweetly smells !
 But pluck'd and strain'd through ruder hands,
 Her sweet no longer with her dwells,
 But scent and beauty both are gone,
 And leaves fall from her, one by one.

"Such fate, ere long, will thee betide,
 When thou hast handled been awhile ;
 Like sun-flowers to be thrown aside,
 And I shall sigh while some will smile,
 To see thy love for more than one,
 Hath brought thee to be lov'd by none."

A monument to Aytoun, surmounted by a very handsome bust, stands in Westminster Abbey.]

Yon Wild Mossy Mountains.

Tune—Yon wild mossy Mountains.

I.

YON wild mossy mountains sae lofty and wide,
 That nurse in their bosom the youth o' the Clyde,
 Where the grouse lead their coveys thro' the heather to feed, [his reed.
 And the shepherd tents his flock as he pipes on Where the grouse lead their coveys thro' the
 the heather to feed, [on his reed.
 And the shepherd tents his flock as he pipes

II.

Not Gowrie's rich valleys, nor Forth's sunny shores,
 To me hae the charms o' yon wild, mossy moors ;
 For there, by a lanely, sequester'd clear stream,
 Resides a sweet lassie, my thought and my dream.
 For there, by a lanely, sequester'd clear stream,
 Resides a sweet lassie, my thought and my dream.

III.

Amang thae wild mountains shall still be my path, [strath ;
 Ilk stream foaming down its ain green, narrow
 For there, wi' my lassie, the day-lang I rove,
 While o'er us, unheeded, flee the swift hours o'
 love.
 For there, wi' my lassie, the day-lang I rove,
 While o'er us, unheeded, flee the swift hours
 o' love.

IV.

She is not the fairest, altho' she is fair ;
 O' nice education but sma' is her share ;
 Her parentage humble as humble can be ;
 But I lo'e the dear lassie because she lo'es me.
 Her parentage humble as humble can be,
 But I lo'e the dear lassie, because she lo'es me.

V.

To beauty what man but maun yield him a prize,
 In her armour of glances, and blushes, and sighs ? [darts.
 And when wit and refinement hae polish'd her
 They dazzle our een as they flee to our hearts.
 And when wit and refinement hae polish'd her darts,
 They dazzle our een, as they flee to our hearts.

VI.

But kindness, sweet kindness, in the fond sparkling e'e,
 Has lustre outshining the diamond to me ;
 And the heart-beating love, as I'm clasp'd in
 her arms,
 O, these are my lassie's all-conquering charms !
 And the heart-beating love, as I'm clasp'd in
 her arms,
 O, these are my lassie's all-conquering charms !

["This song," says Burns in his memoranda, "alludes to a part of my private history, which it is of no consequence to the world to know." The heroine is either "Nannie," who dwelt near the Lugar, or "Highland Mary"—most likely the former, for he always spoke out when he alluded to Mary Campbell. It is printed in the Musical Museum.]

It is na, Jean, thy bonnie face.

Tune—The Maid's complaint.

I.

It is na, Jean, thy bonnie face,
Nor shape, that I admire,
Altho' thy beauty and thy grace
Might weel awake desire.
Something, in ilka part o' thee,
To praise, to love, I find;
But, dear as is thy form to me,
Still dearer is thy mind.

II.

Nae mair ungen'rous wish I hae,
Nor stronger in my breast,
Than if I canna mak thee sae,
At least to see thee blest.
Content am I, if heaven shall give
But happiness to thee:
And, as wi' thee I'd wish to live,
For thee I'd bear to die.

[These verses were originally in English: Burns bestowed a Scottish dress upon them, and made them utter sentiments connected with his own affections. They were printed in the Museum: the air was composed by Oswald, and is one of his finest.]

☉ saw ye my Dearie.

Tune—Eppie Macnab.

I.

O SAW ye my dearie, my Eppie M'Nab?
O saw ye my dearie, my Eppie M'Nab?
She's down in the yard, she's kissin' the laird,
She winna come hame to her ain Jock Rab.
O come thy ways to me, my Eppie M'Nab!
O come thy ways to me, my Eppie M'Nab!
Whate'er thou hast done, be it late, be it soon,
Thou's welcome again to thy ain Jock Rab.

II.

What says she, my dearie, my Eppie M'Nab?
What says she, my dearie, my Eppie M'Nab?
She lcts thee to wit, that she has thee forgot,
And for ever disowns thee, her ain Jock Rab.

O had I ne'er seen thee, my Eppie M'Nab!
O had I ne'er seen thee, my Eppie M'Nab!
As light as the air, as fause as thou's fair,
Thou's broken the heart o' thy ain Jock Rab.

["The old song of Eppie Macnab," says Burns, "had more wit than decency." He took compassion on the air, and wrote these words for the Museum. There is something truly whimsical and original in the idea of many of our old songs. Eppie M'Nab is not an exception.

"O come now, my dearie,
My Eppie Macnab,—
I'm wae and I'm weary
For Eppie Macnab—
Gae dance on the win',
Gae loup down the linn,
For me thou'tt ne'er win—
Take ye that, Jock Rab.

"O had I ne'er seen thee,
My Eppie Macnab!
O had I ne'er seen thee,
My Eppie Macnab!—
Thou'rt light as the air,
And fauser than fair,
And will never see mair
O' thy ain Jock Rab."]

WHA is that at my Bower-door

Tune—Lass, an' I come near thee.

I.

WHA is that at my bower door?
O, wha is it but Findlay?
Then gae yere gate, ye'se nae be here!—
Indeed, maun I, quo' Findlay.
What mak ye sae like a thief?
O come and see, quo' Findlay;
Before the morn ye'll work mischief—
Indeed will I, quo' Findlay.

II.

Gif I rise and let you in?—
Let me in, quo' Findlay;
Ye'll keep me waukin wi' your din—
Indeed will I, quo' Findlay.
In my bower if ye should stay?
Let me stay, quo' Findlay;
I fear ye'll bide till break o'day—
Indeed will I, quo' Findlay.

III.

Here this night if ye remain;—
I'll remain, quo' Findlay.
I dread ye'll ken the gate again;—
Indeed will I, quo' Findlay.
What may pass within this bower,—
Let it pass, quo' Findlay;
Ye maun conceal till your last hour!—
Indeed will I, quo' Findlay.

[“The air to which this song is set had other words formerly—words which make the gravity of our forefathers a little questionable; some of the lines may be acceptable as a sample :—

‘Lass, an I come near thee,
Lass, an I come near thee,
I’ll gar a’ thy ribbons reel,
Lass, an I come near thee.’

The “Auld Man’s Address to the Widow,” printed in Ramsay’s Tea-table Miscellany, is said by Gilbert Burns to have suggested “Wha is that at my bower-door” to Robert :—

‘O who is at my chamber door?
Fair widow, are ye wauking?
Auld carle, your suit give o’er,
Your love lies a’ in taunking.
Gie me the lad that’s young and tight,
Sweet like an April meadow;
’Tis sic as he can bless the sight
And bosom of a widow.’

The old wooer is not disconcerted: he artfully lets her hear the chink of gold, and desires his guineas to speak; she suddenly relents, and declares that they express affection better than his tongue.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

What can a young Lassie do.

Tune—What can a young lassie do wi’ an auld man.

I.

WHAT can a young lassie, what shall a young lassie,

What can a young lassie do wi’ an auld man?
Bad luck on the pennie that tempted my minnie
To sell her poor Jenny for siller an’ lan’!
Bad luck on the pennie, &c.

* [In the “Pills to Purge Melancholy” the title of the air to this song stands thus :—

“What shall a young woman do with an old man?”

An old strain to the same air makes the heroine threaten her ancient wooer with honours of a nature which few men covet, should he obtain her for his wife. The heroine in the version of Burns proposes a plan of domestic annoyance, which cannot fail to send her husband’s grey hairs pretty quickly to the grave. Dr. Blacklock wrote a song to the same air, and at the same time with Burns: the best version of the old song is as follows :—

O Katy, dear Katy, I’ll tell thee what grieves me,
And for to advise me do all that ye can;
If ye could relieve me a present I’d give ye,
What can a young lassie do with an auld man?

I canna get sleeping for sighing and weeping,
What shall I do, Katy? O here take my fan;
My mind is sae crazy, I’m dull and uneasy,
I am sae perplex’d wi’ a crazy auld man.

My mither she teazes me morning and e’ning,
My auntie she vexes me a’ the day lang,
To marry the carle because o’ his siller—
But what can a lassie do wi’ an auld man?

II.

He’s always compleenin’ frae mornin’ to e’enin’,
He hosts and he hirples the weary day lang;
He’s doyl’t and he’s dozin’, his bluid it is frozen,
O, dreary’s the night wi’ a crazy auld man!
He’s doyl’t and he’s dozin’, &c.

III.

He hums and he hankers, he frets & he cankers,
I never can please him, do a’ that I can;
He’s peevisch and jealous o’ the young fellows:
O, dool on the day I met wi’ an auld man!
He’s peevisch and jealous, &c.

IV.

My auld auntie Katie upon me taks pity,
I’ll do my endeavour to follow her plan!
I’ll cross him, and wrack him, until I heartbreak him, [pan.
And then his auld brass will buy me a new
I’ll cross him, and wrack him, &c.*

The bonnie wee Thing.

Tune—Bonnie wee Thing.

I.

BONNIE wee thing, cannie wee thing,
Lovely wee thing, wert thou mine,
I wad wear thee in my bosom,
Lest my jewel I should tine.
Wishfully I look and languish
In that bonnie face o’ thine;
And my heart it stounds wi’ anguish,
Lest my wee thing be na mine.

II.

Wit, and grace, and love, and beauty,
In ae constellation shine;
To adore thee is my duty,
Goddess o’ this soul o’ mine!

His heart it is cauld, and eke dull and hollow,
The hale o’ his carcase is a’ skin and bane;
For him and his money I carena a penny—
What can a young lassie do wi’ an auld man?

My Titty, the gipsy, (wha wouldna misca’ her?)
On me takes nae pity, but join’s wi’ the clan,
And says, I may never get sic a guide offer—
But what can a lassie do wi’ an auld man?

Sweethearts I’ve got mony, but she hasna any,
Sae weel’s I can dive in the heart o’ her plan:
Because she’s neglected, my peace she has wrecked,
And plagues me to marry a doited auld man.

They keep me at home frae the dance and the market,
Because I am some years younger than ANN;
The twapie’s their dawtie, and they for to please her
Would sell a young lassie unto an auld man.

The rose in its splendour shall blaw in December,
The corbie and crow turn white as the swan,
The owl it shall sing like the linnet in spring,
Before that I marry that crazy auld man!

Miss Jane Allardyce, of Pittenween, was the heroine of this song, which she addresses to her comrade, Miss Katherine Gordon, of Wardass, in the year 1714.]

Bonnie wee thing, cannie wee thing,
 Lovely wee thing, wert thou mine,
 I wad wear thee in my bosom,
 Lest my jewel I should tine!

["Composed," says the Poet, "on my little idol, the charming lovely Davies." Burns paid this lovely little lady many pretty compliments, both in prose and verse. He enclosed this song and sent it to the lady in the following letter:—"When I meet with a person after my own heart, I positively feel what an orthodox Protestant would call a species of idolatry, which acts on my fancy like inspiration: and I can no more resist rhyming on the impulse than an Æolian harp can refuse its notes to the streaming air. A distich or two would be the consequence, though the object which hit my fancy were grey-bearded age: but where my theme is youth and beauty—a young lady, whose personal charms, wit, and sentiment, are equally striking and unaffected—by heavens! though I had lived three-score years a married man, and three-score years before I was a married man, my imagination would hallow the very idea."]

The tither Morn.

To a Highland Air.

I.

THE tither morn,
 When I forlorn,
 Aneath an aik sat moaning,
 I did na trow
 I'd see my Jo,
 Beside me, gain the gloaming.
 But he sae trig
 Lap o'er the rig,
 And dawt'ingly did cheer me,
 When I, what reck,
 Did least expect
 To see my lad sae near me.

II.

His bonnet he,
 A thought ajee,
 Cock'd sprush when first he clasp'd me;
 And I, I wat,
 Wi' fainness grat,
 While in his grips he press'd me.
 Deil tak' the war!
 I late and air
 Hae wish'd since Jock departed;
 But now as glad
 I'm wi' my lad
 As short syne broken-hearted.

III.

Fu' aft at e'en
 Wi' dancing keen,
 When a' were blythe and merry,
 I car'd na by,
 Sae sad was I
 In absence o' my dearie.
 But, praise be blest,
 My mind's at rest,
 I'm happy wi' my Johnny;
 At kirk and fair,
 I'se ay be there,
 And be as canty's ony.

["This tune," says Burns, "is originally from the Highlands: I have heard a Gaelic song to it, which I was told was very clever, but not by any means a lady's song." The air, as well as the song, appeared for the first time in the Musical Museum: the second strain of this Highland tune bears a close resemblance to the second part of the tune of "Saw ye Johnnie coming."]

Æ fond Kiss.

Tune—Rory Dall's Port.

I.

Æ fond kiss, and then we sever;
 Æ fareweel, and then, for ever!
 Deep in heart-wrung tears I'll pledge thee,
 Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee.
 Who shall say that fortune grieves him,
 While the star of hope she leaves him?
 Me, nae cheerfu' twinkle lights me;
 Dark despair around benights me.

II.

I'll ne'er blame my partial fancy,
 Naething could resist my Nancy;
 But to see her was to love her;
 Love but her, and love for ever.—
 Had we never lov'd sae kindly,
 Had we never lov'd sae blindly,
 Never met—or never parted,
 We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

III.

Fare thee weel, thou first and fairest!
 Fare thee weel, thou best and dearest!
 Thine be ilka joy and treasure,
 Peace, enjoyment, love, and pleasure!
 Æ fond kiss, and then we sever;
 Æ fareweel, alas! for ever!
 Deep in heart-wrung tears I'll pledge thee,
 Warring sighs and groans I'll wage thee!

["These exquisitely affecting stanzas," says Scott, "contain the essence of a thousand love tales." The last half of the second stanza furnished Lord Byron with a motto to the "Bride of Abydos" one of his most splendid Poems.

The song was inspired, it is believed, by the fair Clarinda, and is worthy of her wit, her talents, and her beauty. The stanzas have something of Thomson's feeling in them:—

“For ever, fortune, wilt thou prove,
An unrelenting foe to love;
And when we meet a mutual heart,
Step rudely in and bid us part;
Bid us sigh on from day to day,
And wish and wish the soul away;
Till youth and genial years are flown,
And all the life of love is gone?”

Lovely Davies.

Tune—Miss Muir.

I.

O HOW shall I, unskilfu', try
The poet's occupation,
The tunefu' powers, in happy hours,
That whispers inspiration?
Even they maun dare an effort mair
Than aught they ever gave us,
Or they rehearse, in equal verse,
The charms o' lovely Davies.

II.

Each eye it cheers, when she appears,
Like Phœbus in the morning,
When past the show'r, and every flower
The garden is adorning.
As the wretch looks o'er Siberia's shore,
When winter-bound the wave is;
Sae droops our heart when we maun part
Frae charming, lovely Davies.

III.

Her smile's a gift, frae 'boon the lift,
That maks us mair than princes;
A sceptred hand, a king's command,
Is in her darting glances:
The man in arms, 'gainst female charms,
Even he her willing slave is;
He hugs his chain, and owns the reign
Of conquering, lovely Davies.

* [Our Scottish ladies are never represented by the poets as unreasonably addicted to thrift: “a pund o' tow” is now a rare matter among the Scottish cottages; the rock has long since been banished from our fire-sides, and the wheel is about to follow. In another score of years a woman spinning will likely be a matter of wonder among the northern mountaineers. The idea of this song is old, and also the chorus. A few verses are here given as a sample:—

Come all ye jolly bachelors
That now would married be,
I pray you be advised,
And take this note frae me,
A single life is free frae strife,
And sorrow, grief, and woe,
Besides a wife to deave my life,
Wi' the weary pund o' tow.
The weary pund, &c.

IV.

My muse to dream of such a theme,
Her feeble pow'rs surrender;
The eagle's gaze alone surveys
The sun's meridian splendour:
I wad in vain essay the strain,
The deed too daring brave is;
I'll drap the lyre, and mute, admire
The charms o' lovely Davies.

[Most of Burns' heroines were handsome and witty. This song on “The charming lovely Davies” was written for the Museum.]

The weary Pund o' Tow.

Tune—The weary Pund o' Tow.

I.

I BOUGHT my wife a stane o' lint
As gude as e'er did grow;
And a' that she has made o' that
Is ae poor pund o' tow.

CHORUS.

The weary pund, the weary pund,
The weary pund o' tow;
I think my wife will end her life
Before she spin her tow.

II.

There sat a bottle in a bole,
Beyond the ingle low,
And ay she took the tither souk,
'To drouk the stowrie tow.

III.

Quoth I, for shame, ye dirty dame,
Gae spin your tap o' tow!
She took the rock, and wi' a knock
She brak it o'er my pow.

IV.

At last her feet—I sang to see't—
Gaed foremost o'er the knowe;
And or I wad anither jad,
I'll wallop in a tow.

The weary pund, the weary pund,
The weary pund o' tow!
I think my wife will end her life
Before she spin her tow.*

But if ye'll be advised,
And warning take by me,
First ye'll try your sweet-heart,
And see what she can dee.
See gin she can scratch and card,
And milk baith cow and ewe,
And rock the cradle wi' her foot,
And spin the pund o' tow.

The town and city damsels,
They gang sae neat and fine,
In drinking tea and brandy,
Is a' that they incline.
And for to powder, patch, and paint,
And walk about the knowe,
Is a' their wark,—they'll rather die
Than spin the pund o' tow.

I hae a Wife o' my ain.

Tune—Naebody.

I.

I HAE a wife o' my ain—
I'll partake wi' naebody ;
I'll tak cuckold frae nane,
I'll gie cuckold to naebody.
I hae a penny to spend,
There—thanks to naebody ;
I hae naething to lend—
I'll borrow frae naebody.

II.

I am naebody's lord—
I'll be slave to naebody ;
I hae a guid braid sword,
I'll tak dunts frae naebody ;
I'll be merry and free,
I'll be sad for naebody ;
If naebody care for me,
I'll care for naebody.

[This cheerful air was once encumbered with very idle verses ; yet they contained the germ of this lively song by Burns ; the following is an old verse :—

“ I hae a wife o' my awn,
I'll be hadden to naebody ;
I hae a pot and a pan,
I'll borrow frae naebody.”

“ The Poet was accustomed to say that the most happy period of his life was the first winter he spent at Ellisland, for the first time under a roof of his own, with his wife and children about him, and, in spite of occasional lapses into the melancholy which had haunted his youth, looking forward to a life of well-regulated, and not ill-rewarded, industry. It is known that he welcomed his wife to her roof-tree at Ellisland in the above song.”—LOCKHART.]

♫, for ane-and-twenty, Tam !

Tune—The Moudiewort.

CHORUS.

AN O, for and ane-and-twenty, Tam !
And hey, sweet ane-and-twenty, Tam !
I'll learn my kin a rattlin' sang,
An I saw ane-and-twenty, Tam.

* The tune to which this lively song was composed is old and good. The following are the words :—

I hae gotten a braw new gown,
And Jamie's gotten a waistcoat o't ;
I bade the tailor gie me room,
Case Geordie bevil the body o't.

I.

THEY snool me sair, and haud me down,
And gar me look like bluntie, Tam ;
But three short years will soon wheel roun'—
And then comes ane-and-twenty, Tam.

II.

A gleib o' lan', a claut o' gear,
Was left me by my auntie, Tam ;
At kith or kin I need na spier,
An I saw ane-and-twenty, Tam.

III.

They'll hae me wed a wealthy coof,
Tho' I mysel' hae plenty, Tam ;
But hear'st thou, laddie—there's my loof—
I'm thine at ane-and-twenty, Tam.

An O for ane-and-twenty, Tam !
An hey, sweet ane-and-twenty, Tam !
I'll learn my kin a rattlin' sang,
An I saw ane-and-twenty, Tam.*

[The Poet, in his memoranda on the Museum, says simply, “ This song is mine.” It was composed on a story common to all countries ; a young girl of rich expectations was pressed by her friends to “ make mickle mair,” and marry an old and wealthy wooer, in preference to one handsome and young, on whom she had placed her affections. The entreaties of her relations only hastened the catastrophe ; she gave her hand and fortune to worthy Tam, as soon as twenty-one made her mistress of both.]

♫, Kenmure's on and awa.

Tune—O Kenmure's on and awa, Willie.

I.

O KENMURE'S on and awa, Willie !
O Kenmure's on and awa !
And Kenmure's lord's the bravest lord
That ever Galloway saw.

II.

Success to Kenmure's band, Willie !
Success to Kenmure's band ;
There's no a heart that fears a Whig,
That rides by Kenmure's hand.

III.

Here's Kenmure's health in wine, Willie !
Here's Kenmure's health in wine ;
There ne'er was a coward o' Kenmure's blude,
Nor yet o' Gordon's line.

The moudiewort's a wylie beast,
A cunning wee beast the moudiewort ;
I biggit my house at the fit o' yon brae,
And he crap in at the gavil o't.]

IV.

O Kenmure's lads are men, Willie!
 O Kenmure's lads are men;
 Their hearts and swords are metal true—
 And that their faes shall ken.

V.

They'll live or die wi' fame, Willie!
 They'll live or die wi' fame;
 But soon wi' sounding victorie,
 May Kenmure's lord come hame!

VI.

Here's him that's far awa, Willie!
 Here's him that's far awa!
 And here's the flower that I lo'e best—
 The rose that's like the snaw!

[“It is difficult to determine whether to ascribe this song wholly to Burns, or to give to his pen only the second and third stanzas. That it is partly old I never heard doubted; and that it refers to the fortunes of the gallant Gordons of Kenmure, in the fatal “Fifteen,” is quite evident. The Viscount left Galloway with two hundred horsemen well armed; he joined the other lowland Jacobites—penetrated to Preston—repulsed, and at last yielded to, the attack of General Carpenter—and perished on the scaffold. He was a good as well as a brave man, and his fate was deeply lamented. The title has since been restored to the “Gordon's line.” Burns, as may be seen in his correspondence, was, once at least, an invited guest at Kenmure.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

My Collier Laddie.

Tune—The Collier Laddie.

I.

O WHARE live ye, my bonnie lass?
 An' tell me what they ca' ye?

* Burns says, “I do not know a blither old song than this.” When Burns sent this song to the Museum, he sent it as an old song,—some few words altered by himself: in proof of which we here give the original:—

I hae been east, I hae been west,
 And I've been at Kirkaldie;
 But the bonniest lass that e'er I saw
 Was following a collier laddie.

Wi' siller slippers on her feet,
 Her body neat and handsome,
 And sky blue ribbons on her head,
 Where gowd aboon was glancin.

Whaur are ye gaun, my bonnie lass?
 Come tell me how they ca' thee;
 My name it's Jane, the maid replied,
 I'm following my collier laddie.

O would ye fancy ane that's black,
 And you sae fair and gawdie?
 O fancy ane o' higher degree
 Than follow a collier laddie.

I'll gie you ha's, I'll gie you bowers,
 I'll gie you gowd rings gawdie,
 I'll gie you gowd laid up in store,
 To leave your collier laddie.

My name, she says, is Mistress Jean,
 And I follow the Collier Laddie.
 My name, she says, is Mistress Jean,
 And I follow the Collier Laddie.

II.

O see you not yon hills and dales,
 The sun shines on sae brawlie!
 They a' are mine, and they shall be thine,
 Gin ye leave your Collier Laddie.
 They a' are mine, and they shall be thine,
 Gin ye'll leave your Collier Laddie.

III.

And ye shall gang in gay attire,
 Weel buskit up sae gaudy;
 And ane to wait at every hand,
 Gin ye'll leave your Collier Laddie.
 And ane to wait at every hand,
 Gin ye'll leave your Collier Laddie.

IV.

Tho' ye had a' the sun shines on,
 And the earth conceals sae lowly;
 I wad turn my back on you and it a',
 And embrace my Collier Laddie.
 I wad turn my back on you and it a',
 And embrace my Collier Laddie.

V.

I can win my five pennies a day,
 And spen 't at night fu' brawlie;
 And mak my bed in the Collier's neuk,
 And lie down wi' my Collier Laddie.
 And mak my bed in the Collier's neuk,
 And lie down wi' my Collier Laddie.

VI.

Luve for luve is the bargain for me,
 Tho' the wee cot-house should haud me;
 And the warld before me to win my bread,
 And fair fa' my Collier Laddie.
 And the warld before me to win my bread,
 And fair fa' my Collier Laddie.*

I value not your ha's and bowers,
 Nor yet your gowd rings gawdie;
 Nor a' the gowd ye hae in store,—
 I'll keep my collier laddie.

I wantna ha's, I wantna bowers,
 I wantna gowd rings gawdie;
 I'll make my bed in's kitchen nook,
 And lie wi' my collier laddie.

Then he's gane to her father dear,
 To her father sae gawdie;
 Says,—will ye gie me your bonny lass
 That's following the collier laddie?

O would she marry a man that's black,
 And me sae braw and gawdie?
 I'd raise her up to a higher degree
 Than following a collier laddie.

Her father dear then vow'd and sware,
 Tho' he be black, he's bonny;
 She's mair delight in him, I fear,
 Than you, wi' a' your money.

When seven years were come and gane,
 And seven years sae gawdie,
 The gentleman came riding by,
 To see Jane's collier laddie.

Dithsdale's Welcome Home.

I.

THE noble Maxwells and the powers,
Are coming o'er the border,
And they'll gae big Terreagle's towers,
An' set them a' in order.
And they declare Terreagle's fair,
For their abode they chuse it ;
There's no a heart in a' the land
But's lighter at the news o't.

II.

Tho' stars in skies may disappear,
And angry tempests gather ;
The happy hour may soon be near
That brings us pleasant weather :
The weary night o' care and grief
May hae a joyfu' morrow ;
So dawning day has brought relief—
Fareweel our night o' sorrow !

[The Maxwells were once the most powerful family in all the south of Scotland. The family rose on the fall of the great house of Douglas : a feud with the Annandale Johnstons cost them three earls : the wars of Charles and his Parliament were very injurious—the rebellion of 1786 deprived them of the title—and the truly noble name is no longer numbered with our nobility. Terreagles-house stands at the foot of a fine range of green and lofty hills : it was built in the days of the Poet, and to this the song alludes. The music was by Robert Riddell, Esq., of Glenriddel.]

Lines on a merry Ploughman.

AS I was a wand'ring ae morning in spring,
I heard a merry ploughman sae sweetly to sing ;
And as he was singin' thae words he did say,
There's nae life like the Ploughman in the month o' sweet May.—

O hae ye money to lend, fair maid ?
Hae ye money sae gawdie ?
For gin I e'er come this road again,
I'll pay your collier laddie.

Where are your ha's?—where are your bowers
Where are your rings sae gawdie ?
Where's a' the gowd ye promis'd me,
To forsake my collier laddie ?

I wantna ha's, I wantna bowers,
I wantna rings sae gawdie ;
I wantna gowd and money to lend,
Still kept my collier laddie.

Now she is to her father gane,
To her father dear sae gawdie,
Says,—the thing ye promis'd me langsyne,
Gie't to my collier laddie.

Then he tauld down ten thousand crowns,
Ten thousand crowns sae gawdie,
Says, take ye that, my daughter Jane,
Enjoy your collier laddie.

The lav'rock in the morning she'll rise frae her nest,
And mount to the air wi' the dew on her breast ;*
And wi' the merry Ploughman she'll whistle and sing ;
And at night she'll return to her nest back again.

[This beautiful fragment was printed in Cromek's Reliques, from the original MS. in Burns' own writing. Gilbert Burns says, "the verses are not my brother's, but were sung by every ploughman and ploughman's mistress in Ayr-shire before he was born." They are, however, again reproduced in Hogg and Motherwell's Edition of the Works of the Poet, and we have not thought it right to exclude them from the present Edition.]

As I was a-wand'ring.

Tune—Rinn M'euclid mo Mhealladh.—A Gaelic Air.

I.

AS I was a-wand'ring ae midsummer e'enin',
The pipers and youngsters were makin' their game ;
Amang them I spied my faithless fause lover,
Which bled a' the wound o' my dolour again.
Weel, since he has left me, may pleasure gae
wi' him ;
I may be distress'd, but I winna complain ;
I'll flatter my fancy I may get anither,
My heart it shall never be broken for ane.

II.

I couldna get sleeping till dawin for greetin',
The tears trick'd down like the hail and the rain :
Had I na got greetin', my heart wad a broken,
For, oh ! luvè forsaken's a tormenting pain !

The heroine of this song was Jane Cochrane, daughter to the laird of Bohill, near Kelso ; and the hero of the piece was Mr. Presley, proprietor of a very extensive coal work in that neighbourhood. The song is very old. Another ballad called the "Collier's Bonny Lassie," may be found in Ramsay's Tea Table Miscellany.]

* [It is pleasing to mark those touches of sympathy which show the sons of genius to be of one kindred. In the following passage from the poem of his countryman, the same figure is illustrated with characteristic simplicity ; and never were the tender and the sublime of poetry more happily united, nor a more affectionate tribute paid to the memory of Burns :

— "Thou, simple bird,
Of all the vocal quire, dwell'st in a home
The humblest ; yet thy morning song ascends
Nearest to heaven ;—sweet emblem of his song, †
Who sung thee wakening by the daisy's side !"

Graime's Birds of Scotland, vol. ii. p. iv.]

† Burns.

III.

Although he has left me for greed o' the siller,
 I dinna envy him the gains he can win;
 I rather wad bear a' the lade o' my sorrow
 Than ever hae acted sae faithless to him.
 Weel, since he has left me, may pleasure gae
 wi' him,
 I may be distress'd, but I winna complain;
 I'll flatter my fancy I may get anither,
 My heart it shall never be broken for ane.

[The air to which these affecting words were written is good old Highland, and the title means, "My love did deceive me." It was found by Burns during his last northern tour, and found—as all Gaelic melodies are—accompanied by verse. The original was rendered into English by an Inverness-shire lady, and from her version he composed these stanzas. They were printed in the fourth volume of the Musical Museum.]

—◆—
Bess and her Spinning-Wheel.

Tune—The sweet Lass that lo'es me.

I.

O LEEZE me on my spinning-wheel,
 And leeze me on my rock and reel;
 Frae tap to tac that cleeds me bien,
 And haps me fiel and warm at e'en!
 I'll set me down and sing and spin,
 While laigh descends the simmer sun,
 Blest wi' content, and milk and meal—
 O leeze me on my spinning-wheel!

II.

On ilka hand the burnies trot,
 And meet below my theekit cot;
 The scented birk and hawthorn white,
 Across the pool their arms unite,
 Alike to screen the birdie's nest,
 And little fishes' caller rest:
 The sun blinks kindly in the biel',
 Where blithe I turn my spinning-wheel.

III.

On lofty aiks the cushats wail,
 And echo cons the doolfu' tale;
 The lintwhites in the hazel braes,
 Delighted, rival ither's lays:
 The craik amang the clover hay,
 The patrick whirrin o'er the ley,
 The swallow jinkin round my shiel,
 Amuse me at my spinning-wheel.

IV.

Wi' sma' to sell, and less to buy,
 Aboon distress, below envy,
 O wha wad leave this humble state,
 For a' the pride of a' the great?
 Amid their flaring, idle toys,
 Amid their cumbrous, dinsome joys,
 Can they the peace and pleasure feel
 Of Bessy at her spinning-wheel?

["The melody to which Burns composed those verses was written by Oswald. The theme is a favourite one with the Poet—virtue and thrift. The heroine rejoices in her rustic independence; her wheel and reel are her truest friends, and clothe her and fill her cottage with comforts. Nor is she insensible to rural loveliness; her house stands among trotting streams; and birds sing and cushats wail on the bushes and trees around her. Machinery has stopt the spinning-wheel, and taken the distaff from the bosoms of our lasses; on the rivulet side, now, no white-armed girls sing as they lave water on yarn of their own making—a shining and glossy grey,

'Which glanc'd in a' our lads' een.'
 as they walked kirk-ward."—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
 ♪ Lube will venture in.

Tune—The Posie.

I.

O LUVE will venture in
 Where it daurna weel be seen;
 O luvie will venture in
 Where wisdom aince has been;
 But I will down yon river rove,
 Amang the wood sae green --
 And a' to pu' a posie
 To my ain dear May.

II.

The primrose I will pu',
 The firstling of the year;
 And I will pu' the pink,
 The emblem o' my dear;
 For she's the pink o' womankind,
 And blooms without a peer—
 And a' to be a posie
 To my ain dear May.

III.

I'll pu' the budding rose,
 When Phoebus peeps in view,
 For it's like a baumy kiss
 O' her sweet, bonnie mou';
 The hyacinth's for constancy,
 Wi' its unchanging blue—
 And a' to be a posie
 To my ain dear May

IV.

The lily it is pure,
 And the lily it is fair,
 And in her lovely bosom
 I'll place the lily there;
 The daisy's for simplicity,
 And unaffected air—
 And a' to be a posie
 To my ain dear May.

V.

The hawthorn I will pu',
 Wi' its locks o' siller gray,
 Where, like an aged man,
 It stands at break of day.
 But the songster's nest within the bush
 I winna tak away—
 And a' to be a posie
 To my ain dear May.

VI.

The woodbine I will pu',
 When the ev'ning star is near,
 And the diamond draps o' dew
 Shall be her een sae clear;
 The violet's for modesty,
 Which weel she fa's to wear—
 And a' to be a posie
 To my ain dear May.

* [Similar sentiments to those of Burns inspired Meleager in his "Heliodora's Garland," thus translated by Professor Wilson :

"I'll twine white violets, with soft myrtles too,
 Narcissus twine, hyacinth of purple hue,
 Twine with sweet crocus, laughing lilies twine
 With roses, that to lovers hopeful shine;
 So that on Heliodora's perfumed head
 A wreath her beauteous ringlets may flower-spread."

"The feeling of the Greek lines," says Wilson, "is tender, and the expression perfect; but we cannot say more of the feeling than that it is a natural tenderness, inspired by the mingled breath of Heliodora and her garland. The tenderness is mixed, too, it may be said, with pride and homage. Meleager does the thing gracefully; we see his figure in an imposing posture, as he fixes the wreath on her head. But compare the courtier with the peasant—Meleager with Burns. By the banks of every stream in Coila hath bold bright Bobby walked, with his arm round some sweetheart's waist, and helped her to pull the primrose or the hawthorn,

'In many a secret place,
 Where rivulets danc'd their wayward round,
 And beauty, born of murmuring sound,
 Did pass into her face.'

"The Scot surpasses the Greek in poetry as well as passion—his tenderness is more heartfelt—his expression is even more exquisite; for the most consummate art, even when guided by genius, cannot refine and burnish, by repeated polishing, the best selected words, up to the breathing beauty that, warm from the fount of inspiration, sometimes colours the pure language of nature.

'Lady! we appeal to thee—while we place THE POSIE on thy bosom.

"In one of Mr. Merivale's notes—always so agreeable—allusion is made to Dr. Aikin's 'Essay on the application of Natural History to Poetry'—where he censures Pope for having in his Pastorals represented two flowers as blowing at the same time, when some months in reality intervene between the periods of their flowering;

'Here, the bright crocus and the violet grow;
 Here western winds on breathing roses blow.'

We have never seen the Doctor's Essay, but do not doubt the excellence of his prescription. 'Every flowery versifier,' he says, 'has materials at hand for a lover's bower; but a botanist alone could have culled and sorted the plants which compose the Bower of Eve.' Poo-poo-poo. Milton was no botanist. Poets of course observe all natural phenomena; when they wish to be accurate they generally are so; and ignorance is unpardonable on all occasions where they profess to write according to knowledge. But feeling often forgets facts. Meleager gathers flowers for his Heliodora that are all naturally in blossom together, and it is well; but Burns pu'd a posie for his own dear May, in despite of the Seasons and Dr. Aikin. He was as good a botanist as Milton—that is, no botanist at all—but he knew every month by its flower.

VII.

I'll tie the posie round,
 Wi' the silken band of love,
 And I'll place it in her breast,
 And I'll swear, by a' above,
 That to my latest draught o' life
 The band shall ne'er remove—
 And this will be a posie
 To my ain dear May.*

Countrie Lassie.

Tune—The Country Lass.

I.

In simmer, when the hay was mawn,
 And corn wav'd green in ilka field,
 While claver blooms white o'er the lea,
 And roses blaw in ilka bield;

Nevertheless, his own dear May, more magical than even the month of that name, to his eyes covered the earth at once with all the flowers of the year. As all the innocences were alive in her, so to his imagination were all their emblems in nature. The primrose—the firstling of the year—as he most tenderly calls it—the pink, which comes long after—the rose, which in Scotland at least is 'newly born in June'—the hawthorn, seldom 'siller grey' before July—and the violet earlier far than the lily—though Heaven forbid the lily should be wanting—all are pu'd by the ploughman for one Posie, that in its profusion and confusion of balm and bloom, shall faintly but faithfully image his own dear May. Enough that both she and they were innocent and beautiful in the breath of Heaven. Nor is that all. He mingles the hours of the day as well as the seasons of the year.

'I'll pu' the budding rose when Phœbus peeps in view'—

an image of the dewy dawn; but from morn to dewy eve is but a moment in 'love's young dream,' and, forgetful of the simplest and easiest chronology, he declares,

'The woodbine I will pu' when the evening star is near!'

We could expatiate for an hour on this Posie; but the hint we have dropped is sufficient to settle Dr. Aikin."

Another version of this beautiful lyric appeared above thirty years ago, set to music, and was afterwards printed in the Harp of Caledonia; it exhibits many variations, and was no doubt the poet's first draught. It is here subjoined:—

O luve will venture in whar it daurna well be seen;
 O luve will venture in whar wisdom ance has been;
 But I will down yon river rove, among the leaves sae green,
 And a' to pu' a posie for my ain dear Jean.

The primrose I will pu', the firstling o' the year,
 And I will pu' the pink, the emblem o' my dear,
 I'll join the scented birk to the breathing eglantine,
 And a' to be a posie to my ain dear Jean.

I'll pu' the budding rose, when Phœbus peeps in view,
 The morning's fragrance breathing like her sweet bonnie mou;
 The hyacinth, of constancy the symbol shall be seen,
 And a' to be a posie to my ain dear Jean.

I'll pu' the lily pure, that adorns the dewy vale,
 The richly blooming hawthorn, that scents the vernal gaie,
 The daisy for simplicity, and unaffected mien,
 And a' to be a posie to my ain dear Jean.

The woodbine I will pu' when the e'ning star is near,
 Gemm'd wi' diamond drops o' dew, like her twa e'en sae clear,
 The violet all modesty, the odour-breathing bean,
 And a' to be a posie to my ain dear Jean.

I'll tie the posie round with the silken band o' luve,
 And I'll place it in her bosom, and I'll pray the powers above
 That to our latest breath o' life the band may aye remain,
 And this will be a posie to my ain dear Jean.]

Blithe Bessie in the milking shiel,
Says—I'll be wed, come o't what will;
Ont spak a dame in wrinkled eild—
O' guid advisement comes nae ill.

II.

It's ye hae wooers mony ane,
And, lassie, ye're but young, ye ken;
Then wait a wee, and cannie wale,
A routhie but, a routhie ben:
There's Johnnie o' the Buskie-glen,
Fu' is his barn, fu' is his byre;
Tak this frae me, my bonnie hen,
It's plenty beets the luvver's fire.

III.

For Johnnie o' the Buskie-glen,
I dinna care a single flie;
He lo'es sae weel his craps and kye,
He has nae luvve to spare for me:
But blithe's the blink o' Robie's e'e,
And weel I wat he lo'es me dear:
Ae blink o' him I wad na gie
For Buskie-glen and a' his gear.

IV.

O thoughtless lassie, life's a faught;
The canniest gate, the strife is sair:
But ay fu' han't is fechtin best,
An hungry care's an unco care:
But some will spend, and some will spare,
An' wilfu' folk maun hae their will;
Syn'e as ye brew, my maiden fair,
Keep mind that ye maun drink the yill.

V.

O, gear will buy me rigs o' land,
And gear will buy me sheep and kye;
But the tender heart o' leesonna luvve,
The gowd and siller canna buy;
We may be poor—Robie and I,
Light is the burden luvve lays on;
Content and luvve bring peace and joy—
What mair hae queens upon a throne?

[“In the present song, a dame of wrinkled eild takes upon her the duty of monitress, and it cannot be said that she fails to make out a capital case in favour of a prudent match; she asserts, with the wooer in Allan Ramsay,—

“There's mickle true love in bands and bags,
And gowd an' siller's a sweet complexion.”

The Poet has made a liberal use of proverb lore; the fourth verse consists wholly of warning saws and antique sayings; the grey dame who uses them makes happiness of the household of Mammon. In former times, before money was plentiful, it is said that a wooer waded the Nith to the Isle beside Ellisland, and made an offer for the hand of a farmer's daughter: the young woman received his addresses with a sort of sarcastic coldness; her father approached, and rounded in her ear, ‘Look at him twice, Jenny; look at him twice—he's weel arrayed—he has twa tap-coats and a plaid on!’

—CUNNINGHAM.]

Fair Eliza.

A Gaelic Air.

I.

TURN again, thou fair Eliza,
Ae kind blink before we part,
Rue on thy despairing lover!
Canst thou break his faithfu' heart?
Turn again, thou fair Eliza;
If to love thy heart denies,
For pity hide the cruel sentence
Under friendship's kind disguise!

II.

Thee, dear maid, hae I offended?
The offence is loving thee:
Canst thou wreck his peace for ever
Wha for thine wad gladly die?
While the life beats in my bosom,
Thou shalt mix in ilka throe;
Turn again, thou lovely maiden,
Ae sweet smile on me bestow.

III.

Not the bee upon the blossom,
In the pride o' sunny noon;
Not the little sporting fairy,
All beneath the simmer moon;
Not the poet, in the moment
Fancy lightens in his e'e,
Kens the pleasure, feels the rapture,
That thy presence gies to me.

[“The original title of this song was ‘Fair Rabina:’ the heroine was a young lady to whom one of the Poet's friends was attached, and Burns wrote it in compliment to his passion. Johnson, the proprietor of the Museum, disliked the name, and, desiring to have one more suitable for singing, the Poet unwillingly changed it to Eliza. Burns thought very well of the composition, and said he had tasked his muse to the top of her performing. It is to be regretted that this change took place: it was something of a fraud, for it robbed the fair Rabina of an honour of which any one might be justly covetous, and bestowed it upon a shadowy dame of the fancy.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Ye Jacobites by Name.

Tune—Ye Jacobites by Name

I.

YE jacobites by name, give an ear, give an ear;
Ye jacobites by name, give an ear;
Ye jacobites by name,
Your fautes I will proclaim,
Your doctrines I maun blame—
You shall hear.

II.

What is right, and what is wrang, by the law,
by the law ?

What is right, and what is wrang, by the law ?

What is right, and what is wrang ?

A short sword, and a lang,
A weak arm, and a strang
For to draw.

III.

What makes heroic strife, fam'd afar, fam'd afar ?

What makes heroic strife, fam'd afar ?

What makes heroic strife ?

To whet th' assassin's knife,
Or hunt a parent's life
Wi' bluidie war.

IV.

Then let your schemes alone, in the state, in the state ;

Then let your schemes alone in the state ;

Then let your schemes alone,

Adore the rising sun,
And leave a man undone
To his fate.

[Burns founded this song on some old verses, in which it was intimated that the extinction of the House of Stuart was sought for by other weapons than the sword. It cannot be denied that, if the House of Hanover had the affection of the people and the law of the land on their side, the exiled princes had the best poetry. This may be accounted for: the romantic adventures, and daring exploits, and deep sufferings of Prince Charles enlisted sympathy on his side; and the minstrels, regarding his fate and that of his brave companions as furnishing matter for poetry only, sung with a pathos and a force which will likely be long remembered. It would seem by the last verse that Burns looked upon the cause as hopeless. The air is very popular.—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Banks of Doon.

FIRST VERSION.

I.

YE flowery banks o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fair ;
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae fu' o' care !

II

Thou'll break my heart, thou bonnie bird,
That sings upon the bough ;
Thou minds me o' the happy days
When my fause luv was true.

III.

Thou'll break my heart, thou bonnie bird,
That sings beside thy mate ;
For sae I sat, and sae I sang,
And wist na o' my fate.

IV.

Aft hae I rov'd by bonnie Doon,
To see the woodbine twine,
And ilka bird sang o' its love ;
And sae did I o' mine.

V.

Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose,
Frae off its thorny tree ;
And my fause luv staw the rose,
But left the thorn wi' me.

[Cromek, who had a fine taste in poetry and art, found this version among the letters of the Poet, and admitted it into the Reliques. Whenever the genius of Burns was a topic of conversation, he loved to descant on the exquisite simplicity and force of his sentiments and language, and generally instanced the last two verses of the first version of the "Banks of Doon" as a fine specimen of his natural powers.]

The Banks o' Doon.

SECOND VERSION.

Tune—Caledonian Hunt's Delight.

I.

YE banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair ;
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae weary, fu' o' care !
Thou'll break my heart, thou warbling bird,
That wantons thro' the flowering thorn :
Thou minds me o' departed joys,
Departed—never to return !

II.

Oft hae I rov'd by bonnie Doon,
To see the rose and woodbine twine ;
And ilka bird sang o' its luv,
And fondly sae did I o' mine.
Wi' lightsome heart I pu'd a rose,
Fu' sweet upon its thorny tree ;
And my fause luv stole my rose,
But, ah ! he left the thorn wi' me.

[The history of the air to which the "Banks o' Doon" was composed is curious. It happened that James Miller, a writer in Edinburgh, was in company with Stephen Clarke the musician: the conversation turned upon the beauty of the Scottish airs, when Miller declared he would like much to make one. Clarke, in a jocular way, told him that nothing was more easy—he had only to keep to the black keys of the harpsichord—preserve some kind of rhythm—and the result would be a true Scottish air. What the musician meant for a joke, Miller took seriously. To the harpsichord he went, and applied his fingers with such success to the black keys that he speedily produced his tune, which, on receiving two or three touches from Clarke, was given to the world—and with such applause that Burns re-modelled his “Banks and Braes o’ bonnie Doon,” and adapted it to the air—at the expense somewhat of its simplicity.

An Ayr-shire legend says that the heroine of this affecting song was Miss Kennedy of Dalgarrock, a young creature, beautiful and accomplished, who fell a victim to her love for M’Douall of Logan. All the earlier songs of Burns were founded in truth. (See an interesting letter to Gavin Hamilton, Esq., dated Edinburgh, March 9th, 1787, given exclusively in this Edition.)]

Sic a wife as Willie had.

Tune—The eight Men of Moidart.

I.

WILLIE Wastle dwalt on Tweed,
The spot they ca’d it Linkum-doddie,
Willie was a wabster guid,
Cou’d stown a clue wi’ onie bodie :
He had a wife was dour and din,
O Tinkler Maidgie was her mither ;
Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wad nae gie a button for her.

II.

She has an e’e—she has but ane,
The cat has twa the very colour ;
Five rusty teeth, forbye a stump,
A clapper-tongue wad deave a miller ;
A whiskin’ beard about her mou’,
Her nose and chin they threaten ither—
Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wad nae gie a button for her

III.

She’s bow hough’d, she’s hem shinn’d,
Ae limpin’ leg, a hand-breed shorter ;
She’s twisted right, she’s twisted left,
To balance fair in ilka quarter :
She has a hump upon her breast,
The twin o’ that upon her shouther—
Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wad nae gie a button for her.

IV.

Auld baudrans by the ingle sits,
An’ wi’ her loof her face a-washin’ ;
But Willie’s wife is nae sae trig,
She dights her grunzie wi’ a hushion ;
Her walle nieves like midden-creels,
Her face wad fyle the Logan-Water—
Sic a wife as Willie had,
I wad nae gie a button for her.

[“The hero of this song owes his name perhaps to that doughty personage who replied to the summons of Oliver Cromwell :—

‘I’m Willie o’ the Wastle,
I’ll keep in my castle ;
An’ a’ the dogs in your town
Shenna ding me down.’

“The heroine is said to have been a much humbler individual ; namely, the wife of a farmer who lived near Burns at Ellisland. She was a very singular woman : tea, she said, would be the ruin of the nation ; sugar was a sore evil ; wheaten bread was only fit for babes ; earthenware was a pickpocket ; wooden floors were but fit for threshing upon ; slated roofs, cold ; feathers, good enough for fowls ; in short, she abhorred change, and, whenever any thing new appeared, such as harrows with iron teeth—‘Aye, aye,’ she would exclaim, ‘ye’ll see the upshot !’

“Of all modern things she disliked china most ; she called it ‘burnt clay,’ and said it was only fit for ‘hauding the broo o’ stinking weeds,’ as she called tea. On one occasion, a southern dealer in cups and saucers asked so much for his ware that he exasperated a peasant, who said ‘I canna purchase, but I ken ane that will.’ ‘Gang there,’ said he, pointing to the house of Willie’s wife :—‘dinna be blate or burd-mouthed ; ask a gude penny—she has the siller.’ Away went the poor dealer, spread out his wares before her, and summed up all by asking a double price. A blow from her cummock was his instant reward, which not only fell on his person, but damaged his china—‘I’ll learn ye,’ quoth she, as she heard the saucers jingle, ‘to come with yere brazen English face, and yere bits o’ burnt clay to me !’ She was an unlovely dame—her daughters, however, were beautiful.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Lady Mary Ann.

Tune—Craigston’s growing.

I.

O, LADY Mary Ann
Looks o’er the castle wa’,
She saw three bonnie boys
Playing at the ba’ ;
The youngest he was
The flower amang them a’--
My bonnie laddie’s young,
But he’s growin’ yet.

II.

O father ! O father !
An ye think it fit,
We’ll send him a year
To the college yet :
We’ll sew a green ribbon
Round about his hat,
And that will let them ken
He’s to marry yet.

III.

Lady Mary Ann
 Was a flower i' the dew,
 Sweet was its smell,
 And bonnie was its hue;
 And the langer it blossom'd
 The sweeter it grew;
 For the lily in the bud
 Will be bonnier yet.

IV.

Young Charlie Cochrane
 Was the sprout of an aik;
 Bonnie and bloomin'
 And straught was its make:
 The sun took delight
 To shine for its sake,
 And it will be the brag
 O' the forest yet.

V.

The simmer is gane
 When the leaves they were green,
 And the days are awa
 That we hae seen;
 But far better days
 I trust will come again,
 For my bonnie laddie's young,
 But he's growin' yet.*

[“The third and fourth verses of this song are in the happiest manner of Burns. An old ballad, called “Craigton's growing,” was chanted to him in one of his Highland excursions: he caused the tune to be noted down, and, musing over the old rhyme, produced “Lady Mary Ann,” and sent both music and words to the Museum. During the short career of Burns, he did much for the lyrical glory of Scotland; wherever he went, his ear was open to the music of the district, and to the local songs of the land. He communicated many airs to Johnson, and on all occasions displayed a sympathy for music which showed how much he was under its influence. Music is cultivated, during the winter time, among the peasantry of Scotland, and psalmody is taught along with the native lyrics. All the youth, too, are instructed in dancing; few natives of the north can be found who are ignorant of music and dancing.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

◆

Fareweel to a' our Scottish Fame.

Tune—Such a Parcel of Rogues in a Nation.

I.

FAREWEEEL to a' our Scottish fame,
 Fareweel our ancient glory!
 Fareweel even to the Scottish name,
 Sae fam'd in martial story!
 Now Sark rins o'er the Solway sands,
 And Tweed rins to the ocean,
 To mark where England's province stands—
 Such a parcel of rogues in a nation!

II.

What force or guile could not subdue,
 Thro' many warlike ages,
 Is wrought now by a coward few,
 For hireling traitors' wages.
 The English steel we could disdain,
 Secure in valour's station;
 But English gold has been our bane—
 Such a parcel of rogues in a nation!

III.

O would, or I had seen the day
 That treason thus could sell us,
 My auld grey head had lien in clay,
 Wi' Bruce and loyal Wallace!
 But pith and power, till my last hour,
 I'll mak this declaration;
 We're bought and sold for English gold—
 Such a parcel of rogues in a nation.†

* We subjoin a traditional copy of the old ballad:—

MY BONNIE LADDIE'S LANG O' GROWING

The trees they are ivied, the leaves they are green,
 The days are a' awa that I hae seen,
 On the cauld winter nights I hae to lie my lane,
 For my bonnie laddie's lang o' growing.

O father dear, you have done me great wrong,
 You have wedded me to a boy that's too young,
 He is scarce twelve, and I'm but thirteen,
 And my bonnie laddie's lang o' growing.

O daughter dear, I have done you no wrong,
 I have wedded you to a noble lord's son,
 He'll be the lord, and ye'll wait on,
 And your bonnie laddie's daily growing.

O father dear, if you think it fit,
 We'll send him to the college a year or twa yet;
 We'll tie a green ribbon round about his hat,
 And that will be a token that he's married.

And O father dear, if this pleaseth you,
 I will cut my hair aboon my brow;
 Coat, vest, and breeches I will put on,
 And I to the college will go wi' him.

She's made him shirts o' the Holland sae fine,
 And wi' her ain hands she sewed the same;
 And aye the tears came trickling down,
 Saying, my bonnie laddie's lang o' growing.

In his twelfth year he was a married man,
 And in his thirteenth he had his auld son,
 And in his fourteenth his grave it was green,
 Sae that put an end to his growing.

† [“Burns,” says Cunningham, “has expressed sentiments in this song which were once popular in the north. The advantages of an union which deprived Scotland of all the visible symbols of power and independence, were not for forty years at least perceived by the people: they only saw the mansions of their nobles empty, grass growing in the Parliament close, and felt that the little wealth which belonged to the land was flowing off to the south. Those whom the Union allured to London were made to feel their dependent condition more keenly: they were received with suspicion and distrust by a proud and haughty people; they were treated as foreigners, rather than as men who visited their own capital. England, like the termagant dame in the Poet's verse, allowed her spouse to have “no will but by her high permission.” A rebellion, conducted by a weak and

The Carle of Kellyburn Braes.

Tune—Kellyburn Braes.

I.

THERE lived a carle in Kellyburn braes,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme;)
And he had a wife was the plague o' his days;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in prime.

II.

Ae day as the carle gaed up the lang glen,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
He met wi' the devil; says, "How do yow fen?"
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

III.

"I've got a bad wife, sir; that's a' my complaint;
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
For, saving your presence, to her ye're a saint;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime."

IV.

"It's neither your stot nor your staig I shall crave,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
But gie me your wife, man, for her I must have,
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime."

V.

"O! welcome, most kindly," the blythe carle said,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
"But if ye can match her, ye're waur than ye're ca'd, [prime.]"
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

VI.

The devil has got the auld wife on his back;
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
And, like a poor pedlar, he's carried his pack;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

VII.

He's carried her hame to his ain hallan-door;
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
Syne bade her gae in, for a b— and a w—,
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

wavering chief, which caused the scaffolds to reek with blood, and provoked England, made matters worse; nor was it till a handful of desperate men shook the throne of Britain in two triumphant battles, and advancing to Derby,

"With fear of change perplexed monarchs," that Scotchmen were allowed to have the benefit of an union which had been forced upon them. The Poet, who loved Scotland as his own heart's blood, in musing upon the profligate sellers and buyers of his country, indignantly sung—

"We're bought and sold for English gold—
Such a parcel of rogues in a nation!"

"Alas!" he exclaimed, "have I often said to myself, what are all the advantages which my country reaps from the Union that can counterbalance the annihilation of her independence, and even her very name? Nothing can reconcile me to the terms, 'English Ambassador,' 'English Court,' &c."

VIII.

Then straight he makes fifty, the pick o' his band,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
Turn out on her guard in the clap of a hand;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

IX.

The carlin gaed thro' them like ony wud bear,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
Whae'er she gat hands on cam near her nae mair;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

X.

A reekit wee devil looks over the wa';
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
"O, help, master, help! or she'll ruin us a',
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime."

XI.

The devil he swore by the edge o' his knife,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
He pitied the man that was ty'd to a wife;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

XII.

The devil he swore by the kirk and the bell,
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
He was not in wedlock, thank heav'n, but in hell;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

XIII.

Then Satan has travell'd again wi' his pack;
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
And to her auld husband he's carried her back;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime.

XIV.

"I hae been a devil the feck o' my life;
(Hey, and the rue grows bonnie wi' thyme,)
But ne'er was in hell, till I met wi' a wife;
And the thyme it is wither'd, and rue is in
prime."

[When Cromek desired Mrs. Burns to inform him respecting the songs which her husband had eked out or amended in the Museum, she ran her finger, he said, along the pages, saying

"Nor has Scoft written less strongly, when speaking of northern statesmen.—'When they united with the degradation of their country the prospect of obtaining personal wealth and private emoluments, we cannot acquit them of the charge of having sold their own honour and that of Scotland.'—'I have already mentioned,' he elsewhere says, 'the sum of twenty thousand pounds, which was apportioned to the commissioners who originally laid the basis of the treaty. I may add there was another sum of twenty thousand pounds employed to secure to the measures of the Court the party called the Squadrone Volante. The account of the mode in which this last sum was distributed has been published: and it may be doubted whether the descendants of the noble lords and honourable gentlemen who accepted this gratification would be more shocked at the general fact of their ancestors being corrupted, or scandalized at the paltry amount of the bribe. One noble lord accepted so low a sum as eleven guineas: and the bargain was the more hard, as he threw his religion into the bargain, and from Catholic turned Protestant, to make his vote a good one.'"]

“Robert gae this ane a brushing; and this ane gat a brushing also.” But when she came to the “Carle of Kellyburn Braes,” she exclaimed, “He gae this ane a terrible brushing.” The skeleton, so to speak, of the song is old: but, like a crab-stock, it has been compelled to bear a richer fruit than pertains to its original nature. The emendations and additions by Burns are numerous; the eleventh and twelfth verses are wholly his; entire lines, half-lines, and sometimes a line and a half from his pen.

Other versifiers have tried their hands on the subject, and the result is sundry additional verses wearing the hue and impressed with the character of the old strain. Satan carries the carlin to his “lowing heugh:”—

“He clinkit her down in his mickle arm chair,
(Hey! and the rue grows bonnie wi’ thyme,)
And thousands o’ devils cam round her to stare;
And the thyme it is wither’d, and rue is in prime.

But aye as they at the auld carlin play’d pou’t,
(Hey! and the rue grows bonnie wi’ thyme,)
She gie’d them a bang and she lent them a clout;
And the time it is wither’d, and rue is in prime.”

The stir which she makes excites something like a civil war in hell; and the devil, afraid of the stability of his empire, seizes the carlin, and, carrying her suddenly to upper air, finds her husband at the plough, cheering himself with a song:—

“And aye as the auld carle ranted and sang,
(Hey! and the rue grows bonnie wi’ thyme,)
In troth, my auld Spankie, ye’ll no keep her lang;
And the thyme it is wither’d, and rue is in prime.”

On observing Satan advancing, the poor man looked sad, and hoped he was not bringing her back: Clootie makes answer:—

“I tried her in spunks, and in cauldrons I tried her,
(Hey! and the rue grows bonnie wi’ thyme,)
The wale of my brimstane wadna hae fried her;
And the thyme it is wither’d, and rue is in prime.

I stapp’d her into the neuk o’ my den,
(Hey! and the rue grows bonnie wi’ thyme,)
But the very damned ran when the carlins gaed ben;
And the thyme it is wither’d, and rue is in prime.”]

Jockey’s ta’en the Parting Kiss.

Tune—Bonnie Lassie, tak a Man.

I.

JOCKEY’S ta’en the parting kiss,
O’er the mountains he is gane;
And with him is a’ my bliss,
Nought but griefs with me remain,
Spare my luv, ye winds that blaw,
Plashy sleets and beating rain!
Spare my luv, thou feathery snaw,
Drifting o’er the frozen plain!

* VAR.—I met a lass, a bonnie lass.

† VAR.—Bare her leg, and bright her een,

II.

When the shades of evening creep
O’er the day’s fair, gladsome e’e,
Sound and safely may he sleep,
Sweetly blithe his waukening be!
He will think on her he loves,
Fondly he’ll repeat her name;
For where’er he distant roves,
Jockey’s heart is still at hame.

This charming song was written by Burns for the Museum. It is adapted to an ancient air, which is preserved in Oswald’s Caledonian Pocket Companion. The old song is supposed to be now lost.

Coming through the Braes o’ Cupar.

I.

DONALD Brodie met a lass,*
Coming o’er the braes o’ Cupar;
Donald wi’ his Highland hand,†
Rifled ilka charm about her.‡

CHORUS.

Coming o’er the braes o’ Cupar,
Coming o’er the braes o’ Cupar,
Highland Donald met a lass,
And row’d his Highland plaid about her.

II.

Weel I wat she was a quean,
Wad made a bodie’s mouth to water;
Our Mess John, wi’ his auld grey pow, §
His haly lips wad licket at her.

III.

Off she started in a fright,
And through the braes as she could bicker;
But souple Donald quicker flew,
And in his arms he lock’d her sicker.

Coming through the braes o’ Cupar,
Coming through the braes o’ Cupar,
Highland Donald met a lass,
And row’d his Highland plaid about her.

Lady Onlie.

Tune—Ruffian’s Rant.

I.

A’ THE lads o’ Thornie-bank,
When they gae to the shore o’ Bucky,
They’ll step in an’ tak’ a pint
Wi’ Lady Onlie, honest Lucky!

Lady Onlie, honest Lucky,
Brews guid ale at shore o’ Bucky;
I wish her sale for her guid ale,
The best on a’ the shore o’ Bucky.

‡ VAR.—And handsome ilka bit about her.

§ VAR.—Wi’ his lyart pow.

II.

Her house sae bien, her curch sae clean,
 I wat she is a dainty chucky ;
 And cheerlie blinks the ingle-gleed
 Of Lady Onlie, honest Lucky !
 Lady Onlie, honest Lucky,
 Brews guid ale at shore o' Bucky ;
 I wish her sale for her guid ale,
 The best on a' the shore o' Bucky.

[Some portion of "Lady Onlie" is old. Burns, in the language of his wife, gave it "a brushing" for the Museum. Other verses have made their appearance since :—

" Her foaming ale, her mirthsome tale,
 A kiss at times, when things are lucky ;
 The mirk, mirk hours she lends them wings,
 Guid Lady Onlie, honest Lucky."

Her drink is strong, her lips are sweet,
 I taste them as I go to Buckie ;
 ' Sic things maun be, if we sell ale,' Quo' Lady Onlie, honest Lucky."

The last line save one is proverbial with those who frequent alehouses. The rustic muse loved to lay the scenes of her songs where

" Ale and wine are stars and moon !"

The wife of Whittlecockpen seems to have been full cousin to "Lady Onlie, honest Lucky :—" her merits are set forth in some very graphic verses :—

" There dwalt a wife in Whittlecockpen,
 And she brewed gude ale for gentlemen ;
 Ae night the dame her barn had set,
 When a stranger man cam rap to the jett ;
 The night dang down baith win' an' weet,
 The ale was strang, and the dame was sweet.]"

The Chevalier's Lament.

Tune—Captain O' Kean.

I.

THE small birds rejoice in the green leaves
 returning, [the vale ;
 The murmuring streamlet winds clear thro'
 The hawthorn trees blow, in the dew of the morning, [dale :
 And wild scattered cowslips bedeck the green
 But what can give pleasure, or what can seem fair, [by care ?
 While the lingering moments are number'd
 No flow'rs gaily springing, nor birds sweetly singing,
 Can soothe the sad bosom of joyless despair.

II.

The deed that I dared, could it merit his malice,
 A king, and a father, to place on his throne ?

* VAR.—The primroses blush.

His right are these hills, and his right are these valleys, [find none :
 Where the wild beasts find shelter, but I can
 But 'tis not my sufferings thus wretched,— forlorn, [mourn :
 My brave gallant friends! 'tis your ruin I
 Your deeds prov'd so loyal in hot-bloody trial—

Alas ! can I make you no sweeter return ?

["Yesterday," says Burns to Cleghorn, "as I was riding through a tract of melancholy, joyless moors, between Galloway and Ayr-shire, it being Sunday, I turned my thoughts to psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs ; and your favourite air, 'Captain O'Kean,' coming at length into my head, I tried these words to it. I am tolerably pleased with the verses ; but as I have only a sketch of the tune, I leave it with you to try if they suit the measure of the music." Cleghorn answered that the words delighted him, and fitted the tune exactly. "I wish," added he, "that you would send me a verse or two more ; and, if you have no objection, I would have it in the Jacobite style.—Suppose it should be sung after the fatal field of Culloden, by the unfortunate Charles." The Poet took his friend's advice, and infused a Jacobite spirit into the first verse as well as the second.]

War Song

Air—Oran an Doig ; or, The Song of Death.

Scene—A field of battle. Time of the day, evening. The wounded and dying of the victorious army are supposed to join in the following song :

I.

FAREWELL, thou fair day, thou green earth,
 and ye skies,
 Now gay with the broad setting sun ! [ties !
 Farewell loves and friendships, ye dear tender
 Our race of existence is run !

II.

Thou grim king of terrors, thou life's gloomy foe !
 Go, frighten the coward and slave ! [know,
 Go teach them to tremble, fell tyrant ! but
 No terrors hast thou to the brave !

III.

Thou strik'st the dull peasant,—he sinks in the dark,
 Nor saves e'en the wreck of a name ;—
 Thou strik'st the young hero—a glorious mark !
 He falls in the blaze of his fame !

IV.

In the field of proud honour—our swords in our hands,
 Our king and our country to save—
 While victory shines on life's last ebbing sands
 Oh ! who would not die with the brave !

[When Burns composed this noble lyric, he wrote, on the 17th of December, 1791, to Mrs. Dunlop:—"I have just finished the following song, which, to a lady, the descendant of Wallace—and many heroes of his truly illustrious line—and herself the mother of several soldiers, needs neither preface nor apology." The Poet, after transcribing the song, goes on to say that it was suggested to him on looking over Macdonald's collection of Highland airs, where he found an Isle of Sky tune, entitled "Oran an Doig, or the Song of Death," to the measure of which he adapted these heart-stirring verses.

Of this song, Currie says it is worthy of the Grecian muse—when Greece was most distinguished for genius and valour. Burns wished to print the lyric by itself, and give it to his country: unluckily some one advised him against it, and the Poet lived to be sorry that he yielded to his entreaty.]

Afton Water.

Tune—The Yellow-haired Laddie.

I.

Flow gently, sweet Afton! among thy green
braes,

Flow gently, I'll sing thee a song in thy praise;
My Mary's asleep by thy murmuring stream—
Flow gently, sweet Afton, disturb not her dream.

II.

Thou stock-dove, whose echo resounds thro'
the glen, [den;
Ye wild whistling blackbirds in yon thorny
Thou green-crested lapwing, thy screaming forbear—
I charge you disturb not my slumbering fair.

III.

How lofty, sweet Afton! thy neighbouring hills,
Far mark'd with the courses of clear winding rills;
There daily I wander as noon rises high,
My flocks and my Mary's sweet cot in my eye.

IV.

How pleasant thy banks and green valleys
below, [blow!
Where wild in the woodlands the primroses
There oft as mild ev'ning weeps over the lea,
The sweet-scented birk shades my Mary and me.

V.

Thy crystal stream, Afton, how lovely it glides!
And winds by the cot where my Mary resides!
How wanton thy waters her snowy feet lave,
As gathering sweet flow'rets she stems thy clear wave!

VI.

Flow gently, sweet Afton! among thy green
braes,
Flow gently, sweet river, the theme of my lays!
My Mary's asleep by thy murmuring stream—
Flow gently, sweet Afton! disturb not her
dream.

[“The copy of ‘Afton Water,’ was presented by the Poet to his kind and accomplished patroness, Mrs. Stewart. Burns calls it simply ‘Sweet Afton,’ and adds no explanation. None was needed; the song explains itself: the lady was aware of the ways of the muse, and smiled at the images of beauty with which she was associated as she slumbered on the banks of her native stream. Unlike some other ladies of whom the Poet sang, she looked upon his strains as a mark of respect, and felt them as a work of genius. Afton is a small stream in Ayr-shire, one of the tributaries of the Nith; Afton-lodge stands upon its bank, and is the residence of Miss Stewart and her sister. The scenes on the Afton are beautiful, and merit the painter's pencil as much as the poet's song. Mrs. Stewart was heiress of the estate.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Smiling Spring comes in Rejoicing.

Tune—Bonnie Bell.

I.

THE smiling spring comes in rejoicing,
And surly winter grimly flies;
Now crystal clear are the falling waters,
And bonnie blue are the sunny skies;
Fresh o'er the mountains breaks forth the morning,
The ev'ning gilds the ocean's swell;
All creatures joy in the sun's returning,
And I rejoice in my bonnie Bell.

II.

The flowery spring leads sunny summer,
And yellow autumn presses near,
Then in his turn comes gloomy winter,
Till smiling spring again appear.
Thus seasons dancing, life advancing,
Old Time and Nature their changes tell,
But never ranging, still unchanging,
I adore my bonnie Bell.

[“Bonnie Bell” was long a favourite with the maidens on the banks of the Nith: the air is lively, and the words very pleasing and picturesque.]

The Carles of Dysart.

Tune—Hey ca' thro'.

I.

Up wi' the carles o' Dysart
And the lads o' Buckhaven,
And the kimmers o' Largo,
And the lasses o' Leven.

Hey, ca' thro', ca' thro',
For we hae mickle ado;
Hey, ca' thro', ca' thro',
For we hae mickle ado.

II.

We hae tales to tell,
And we hae sangs to sing;
We hae pennies to spend,
And we hae pints to bring.

III.

We'll live a' our days,
And them that come behin',
Let them do the like,
And spend the gear they win.
Hey, ca' thro', ca' thro',
For we hae mickle ado;
Hey, ca' thro', ca' thro',
For we hae mickle ado.

[Burns communicated this Fisherman's Chant to the Musical Museum. The air is lively and old; the verses, too, have an air of antiquity. The Poet excelled in the manufacture of such simulated commodities. Other verses on the same subject are to be found in later collections:—

"We'll hae mirth and laughter,
We that live by water,
Leave them that come after
To spend the gear they gather.
Hey, ca' thro', ca' thro',
Damsels, dinna doubt it,
There's better fish i' the sea
Than ever yet came out o't."

The gallant Weaver.

Tune—The Weavers' March.

I.

WHERE Cart rins rovin' to the sea,
By mony a flow'r and spreading tree,
There lives a lad, the lad for me,
He is a gallant weaver.
Oh, I had woovers aught or nine,
They gied me rings and ribbons fine;
And I was fear'd my heart would tine,
And I gied it to the weaver.

II.

My daddie sign'd my tocher-band,
To gie the lad that has the land;
But to my heart I'll add my haud,
And gie it to the weaver.
While birds rejoice in leafy bowers;
While bees delight in op'ning flowers;
While corn grows green in simmer showers,
I'll love my gallant weaver.

[“Ladies may toss their heads at the humble choice of our heroine; but it was not quite so lowly as they may be pleased to suppose. In more primitive times—nay, within the memory of men—carpenters, masons, blacksmiths, or weavers, were considered superior in station to hnsbandmen; their scientific knowledge raised them in the estimation of the country above the humble tillers of the soil; and it was not till the late tremendous war doubled the consumption, and enriched farmers, that country tradesmen lost the ascendancy. The west country heroine, therefore, made no imprudent engagement: and when we reflect that the White Cart belongs to Renfrew-shire, and flows near the town of Paisley, celebrated for the labours of the loom, we shall feel that she turned her eyes to a district, populous in gallant weavers, and no doubt singled out one every way worthy of her love.

“The air is called the “Weaver's March,” and is reckoned very beautiful. It has already been stated that every trade had formerly a marching air. Weavers' songs, however, are not numerous; this is the more to be wondered at when we reflect that, perhaps, the lads of the loom are the best informed of all operative bodies. Their sedentary employment, engaging the hand and eye more than the mind, enables them to reflect; and reflection has made them, generally, republicans.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Deuk's Dang o'er my Daddie, &c.

Tune—The Deuk's dang o'er my Daddie.

I.

THE bairns gat out wi' an unco shout,
The deuk's dang o'er my daddie, O!
The fient ma care, quo' the feirie auld wife,
He was but a paidlin body, O!
He paidles out, an' he paidles in,
An' he paidles late an' early, O!
Thae seven lang years I hae lien by his side,
An' he is but a fusionless carlie, O!

II.

O, haud your tongue, my feirie auld wife,
O, haud your tongue now, Nansie, O!
I've seen the day, and sae hae ye,
Ye wadna been sae donsie, O!

I've seen the day ye butter'd my brose,
And cuddled me late and early, O ;
But downa do's come o'er me now,
And, oh ! I feel it sairly, O !

[An old song of the same name supplied Burns with the idea of this humorous ditty. He has introduced a line or two from the old words—the rest is all his own. It speaks with the free, homely tongue of the elder muse of Scotland. The tune is very old : Playford published it in 1657, in his Dancing Master, and called it "The Buff Coat."]

She's fair and fause.

Tune—She's fair and fause.

I.

SHE'S fair and fause that causes my smart,
I lo'ed her meikle and lang ;
She's broken her vow, she's broken my heart,
And I may e'en gae hang.
A coof cam in wi' routh o' gear,
And I hae tint my dearest dear ;
But woman is but world's gear,
Sae let the bonnie lassie gang.

II.

Whae'er ye be that woman love,
To this be never blind,
Nae ferlie 'tis tho' fickle she prove,
A woman has 't by kind.
O woman, lovely woman fair !
An angel form's fa'n to thy share,
'Twad been o'er meikle to gien thee mair—
I mean an angel mind.

[This has been pronounced one of the happiest of the songs of Burns—it is one of the most sarcastic ; the last verse is particularly bitter. No one has contended for the honour of being its heroine. The melody, which Burns picked up in the country, is almost as charming as the words which he adapted to it in the measure.]

The Deil's awa wi' th' Exciseman.

Tune—The Deil cam' fiddling through the Town.

I.

THE deil cam' fiddling thro' the town,
And danced awa wi' th' Exciseman,
And ilka wife cries—"Auld Mahoun,
I wish you luck o' the prize, man !"

The deil's awa, the deil's awa,
The deil's awa wi' th' Exciseman ;
He's danc'd awa, he's danc'd awa,
He's danc'd awa wi' th' Exciseman !

II.

We'll mak our maut, we'll brew our drink,
We'll dance, and sing, and rejoice, man ;
And mony braw thanks to the meikle black deil,
That danc'd awa wi' th' Exciseman.

III.

There's threesome reels, there's foursome rees,
There's hornpipes and strathspeys, man ;
But the ae best dance e'er cam to the land
Was—the deil's awa wi' the Exciseman.

The deil's awa, the deil's awa,
The deil's awa wi' th' Exciseman ;
He's danc'd awa, he's danc'd awa,
He's danc'd awa wi' the Exciseman.

[“Gaugers were, for a long period, so cordially disliked in Scotland, that to cheat them was almost considered a duty. Tradition relates that, at Annan, once, a large quantity of smuggled tea and brandy had just been carried into an inn when, to the consternation of all concerned, the gauger was seen approaching. Concealment was out of the question, for the importation was large, and lying on the floor. All this was observed by a shrewd idiot, well known by the name of Daft Davie Graham ; he snatched up a long whip, and walking leisurely to a 'midden-dub,' threw in the lash of the whip, watched it, and played it with all the anxiety of an angler.—“What are ye fishing for there, Davie ?” said the officer of the revenue.—“Fishing for deevils,” was the answer.—“Deevils !” said the other, “and what do you bait with ?”—“Gaugers,” replied David. The laugh of the bystanders at the sharp joke made the gauger turn his horse's head another road, and miss his expected prey.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Lovely Lass of Inverness.

Tune—The Lass of Inverness.

I.

THE lovely lass o' Inverness
Nae joy nor pleasure can she see ;
For e'en and morn she cries, alas !
And aye the saut tear blin's her e'e :
Drumossie moor—Drumossie day—
A waefu' day it was to me !
For there I lost my father dear,
My father dear, and brethren three.

II.

Their winding sheet the bluidy clay,
Their graves are growing green to see :
And by them lies the dearest lad
That ever blest a woman's e'e !
Now wae to thee, thou cruel lord,
A bluidy man I trow thou be ;
For mony a heart thou hast made sair
That ne'er did wrang to thine or thee.

[As the Poet passed slowly over the fatal moor of Culloden, the lament of the Lass of Inverness rose, it is said, on his fancy. He composed it to an air by Oswald; the words are deeply affecting, and the tune tender. Cromek remarks that "Burns's most successful imitation of the old style seems to be in 'The lovely Lass of Inverness.'" He took up the idea from the first half-verse, which is all that remains of the old words, and this prompted the feelings and the tone of the time he wished to commemorate. He scattered these samples to be picked up by inquisitive criticism, that he might listen to its remarks, and, perhaps, secretly enjoy the admiration which they excited.]

Another song, on the same subject, has found its way into our collections. The following is a verse:—

"As I came in by Inverness,
The simmer sun was sinking down;
And there I met a weel-faur'd lass,
And she was greeting through the town.
The grey-hair'd men were a' i' the streets,
And old dames crying—sad to see!
The flower o' the lads of Inverness
Lie bloodie on Culloden lea."

A red, red Rose.

Tune—Graham's Strathspey.

I.

O, MY luv'e's like a red, red rose,
That's newly sprung in June:
O, my luv'e's like the melodie
That's sweetly play'd in tune.

II.

As fair art thou, my bonnie lass,
So deep in luv'e am I:
And I will luv'e thee still, my dear,
'Till a' the seas gang dry.

* [The song which supplied Burns with such exquisite ideas was written by Lieutenant Hinchey, as a farewell to his sweetheart, when on the eve of parting. We subjoin a portion of it:—

"O fare thee well, my dearest dear,
And fare thee well a while;
But I am coming back again,
Tho' it were ten thousand mile.
Ten thousand miles and more, my dear,
Thro' Flanders, France, and Spain;
My heart will never be at ease
Till we twa meet again.
O stay thee still, my dearest dear!
O stay still till we see,
Gin that our friends will be content
That we twa married be.
Your friends and mine, my only love,
Look with an angry eye;
But ye shall be my dearest dear
Till a' the seas gang dry.

III.

'Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun:
I will luv'e thee still, my dear,
While the sands o' life shall run.

IV.

And fare thee weel, my only luv'e!
And fare thee weel a-while!
And I will come again, my luv'e,
Tho' it were ten thousand mile.*

Jeannie's Bosom.

Tune—Lous, what reck I by thee.

I.

LOUIS, what reck I by thee,
Or Geordie on his ocean?
Dyvor, beggar loons to me—
I reign in Jeannie's bosom.

II.

Let her crown my love her law,
' And in her breast enthroned me:
King and nations—swiath, awa!
Reif randies, I disown ye!

[Burns, in his Reliques, says, 'These words are mine.' "No bard of these, our later days, has surpassed in the art, that few can learn, of putting much sense into small space.—'Louis, what reck I by thee' is one of his happiest efforts: it is, perhaps, too peculiar in language to be fully felt by any, save Scotchmen: but to them it comes with a compact vigour of expression not usual in words fitted to music. The Jeannie of the song was afterwards Mrs. Burns: her name has no chance of passing from the earth, if impassioned verse can preserve it."—CUNNINGHAM.]

Till a' the seas gang dry, my dear,
And the rocks melt wi' the sun;
And ye shall be my dearest dear
When a' these works are done.

Behold the crow that is sae black
Shall change his colour white,
Before that I prove fause to thee—
The day shall turn to night.

The day shall turn to night, my love
And the world upside down;
And ye shall be my dearest dear
While shines the sun and moon.

But what, my love, if I fall sick,
When ye are frae me gone;
And nane to hear my sad, sad sighs,
Nor yet my heavy moan?

But I'll be like yon turtle dove,
That sits on yonder tree,
Lamenting for her lost marrow—
And sae will I for thee.*]

Had I the Wyte she bade me.

Tune—Had I the Wyte she bade me.

I.

HAD I the wyte, had I the wyte,
 Had I the wyte she bade me ;
 She watch'd me by the hie-gate side,
 And up the loan she shaw'd me ;
 And when I wadna venture in,
 A coward loon she ca'd me ;
 Had kirk and state been in the gate,
 I lighted when she bade me.

II.

Sae craftilie she took me ben,
 And bade me make nae clatter ;
 "For our ramgunshoch, glum guidman
 Is o'er ayont the water :"
 Whae'er shall say I wanted grace,
 When I did kiss and dawte her,
 Let him be planted in my place,
 Syne say I was a fautor.

III.

Could I for shame, could I for shame,
 Could I for shame refus'd her ?
 And wadna manhood been to blame
 Had I unkindly us'd her ?
 He claw'd her wi' the ripplin-kame,
 And blae and bluidy bruise'd her ;
 When sic a husband was frae hame
 What wife but wad excus'd her ?

IV.

I dighted aye her een sae blue,
 And bann'd the cruel randy ;
 And weel I wat her willing mou'
 Was e'en like sugar-candy.
 At gloamin-shot it was I trow,
 I lighted on the Monday ;
 But I cam thro' the Tysday's dew,
 To wanton Willie's brandy.

["The air to which Burns composed this song was called, 'Come kiss wi' me and clap wi' me :'
 and much of the story and some of the words he found in an old lyric which bore the name of 'Had I the wyte she bade me,' and out of which some readers may think he has not succeeded in excluding all that is objectionable.
 Those acquainted with the old unceremonious strain will wonder at the Poet's success."—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [This song was originally published in the Musical Museum. The first half of it also occurs, as it stands in the text, in Thomson's Collection, vol. vi. p. 50, where it is expressly stated to have been written by Burns. The text also agrees with a copy in the Poet's own hand, with which it has been collated. Gilbert Burns, in a letter to Cronick, dated February 1809, after the publication of the Reliques,

Coming through the Rye.

Tune—Coming through the Rye.

I.

COMING through the rye, poor body,
 Coming through the rye,
 She draiglet a' her petticoatie,
 Coming through the rye.
 Oh Jenny's a' wat, poor body,
 Jenny's seldom dry ;
 She draiglet a' her petticoatie,
 Coming through the rye.

II.

Gin a body meet a body—
 Coming through the rye,
 Gin a body kiss a body—
 Need a body cry ?

III.

Gin a body meet a body,
 Coming through the glen,
 Gin a body kiss a body—
 Need the world ken ?
 Oh Jenny's a' wat, poor body ;
 Jenny's seldom dry ;
 She draiglet a' her petticoatie,
 Coming through the rye.

[Burns took up the old strain, thrashed some of the loose chaff from about it, and sent it to the Musical Museum. The old "Coming through the rye" was once very popular in the northern glens ; there were many verses, and, as usual, many variations :—

"Gin a body meet a body
 Coming through the broom,
 Gin a body kiss a body—
 Need a body gloom ?
 Ilka body has a body,
 Fient a ane hae I,
 But twa 'r three lads they lo'e me weel,
 And what the waur am I ?"

The Winter it is past.*

I.

THE winter it is past, and the summer's come at last,
 And the little birds sing on ev'ry tree ;
 Now every thing is glad, while I am very sad, †
 Since my true love is parted from me. ‡

speaking of this Fragment, says it was not written by his brother, but well he recollected his mother singing it, when he was a little boy. Perhaps the additions and corrections were by the hand of Burns. At all events we think it better to insert it among the works of the Poet.—C.]

† VAR.—The hearts of these are glad, but mine is very sad,

‡ VAR.—For my lover has parted from me.

II.

The rose upon the brier, by the waters running clear,

May have charms for the linnet or the bee ;
Their little loves are blest, and their little hearts
But my true love is parted from me. [at rest,

III.

My love is like the sun, in the firmament does
For ever is constant and true ;* [run,
But his is like the moon, that wanders up and down,

And is every month changing a new.

IV.

All you that are in love, and cannot it remove,
I pity the pains you endure :
For experience makes me know that your hearts are full o' woe,
A woe that no mortal can cure.

[“ We are not sure upon what authority this song is ascribed to Burns. We are almost confident that we have seen copies of it anterior to his time ; indeed the first verse is the starting one of a common ballad, called “ The Curragh of Kildare.” Cromek found the first two verses of this song among Burns’ MSS., consequently he published them as the production of his muse, obviously unaware that they, as well as the two others which follow them, had been previously published in Johnson’s Musical Museum. In that work they are given without any initial or other mark which can lead us to ascribe them to Burns.”—MOTHERWELL.]

Young Jamie, Bride of a’ the Plain.

Tune—The Carlin o’ the Glen.

I.

YOUNG Jamie, pride of a’ the plain,
Sae gallant and sae gay a swain ;
Thro’ a’ our lasses he did rove,
And reign’d resistless king of love :
But now wi’ sighs and starting tears,
He strays among the woods and briers ;
Or in the glens and rocky caves,
His sad complaining dowie raves.

II.

I wha sae late did range and rove,
And chang’d with every moon my love,
I little thought the time was near
Repentance I should buy sae dear :
The slighted maids my torments see,
And laugh at a’ the pangs I dree ;
While she, my cruel, scornfu’ Fair,
Forbids me e’er to see her mair !

* VAR.—My love is like the Sun, that unwearied doth run
Thro’ the firmament, aye constant and true.

[“ Who the Jamie of this song was no one has told us, nor whether the strain is partly old or wholly new. No doubt it must be numbered among those hasty and quickly considered things which it was the pleasure of Burns to write and leave unclaimed, with the intention, perhaps, of giving the subject and air his more serious thoughts on some day of leisure, which never arrived. The air is plaintive, but the name has no affinity with the song.

“ The story is, however, an old one : a gay lover, who ranged at will among the beauties of the land, and seemed, like quicksilver, coy as well as bright, is at last ensnared by the charms of one who not only scorns him, but forbids him ever to think of her more. Jamie belike, when reflection arrives, may enact the knowing part of Duncan Gray, and gain her hand by seeming to disregard it. At all events, he seems one who will try no tragic conclusions, nor even speak of ‘ lowpin owre a linn.’ He resembles more the honest lad of Annandale, who declared he was sae vexed when Jenny Johnston of Howbottom refused his hand that he supped mair parridge than wad hae served three mowers, and kicked the muckle pot till it gaed owre ringing.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Out over the Forth.

Tune—Charlie Gordon’s Welcome Hume.

I.

OUT over the Forth I look to the north, [me ?
But what is the north and its Highlands to
The south nor the east gie ease to my breast,
The far foreign land, or the wild-rolling sea.

II.

But I look to the west, when I gae to rest,
That happy my dreams and my slumbers may be ;
For far in the west lives he I lo’e best,
The lad that is dear to my babie and me.

[“ The finest examples,” says Jeffrey, “ of this simple and unpretending tenderness, are to be found in those songs which are likely to transmit the name of Burns to all future generations. He found this delightful trait in the old Scottish ballads which he took for his model, and upon which he improved with a felicity and delicacy of imitation altogether unrivalled in the history of literature. Sometimes it is the brief and simple pathos of the genuine old ballad.” In one of his letters to Cunningham, dated 11th March, 1791, Burns quotes the last four lines, and inquires how his friend likes it. The air was altered by Clarke ; and the words suffered a change—a change that did not at all affect the sense. Of this exquisite ballad, the last verse only is given by Currie.—He knew not that the opening stanza existed.]

The Lass of Ecclefechan.

Tunc—Jacky Latin.*

I.

GAT ye me, O gat ye me,
 O gat ye me wi' naething?
 Rock and reel, and spinnin' wheel,
 A mickle quarter basin.
 Bye attour, my gutcher has
 A hich house and a laigh ane,
 A' for bye, my bonnie sel,^l
 The toss of Ecclefechan.

II.

O haud your tongue now, Luckie Laing,
 O haud your tongue and jauner;
 I held the gate till you I met,
 Syne I began to wander:
 I tint my whistle and my sang,
 I tint my peace and pleasure;
 But your green graff, now, Luckie Laing,
 Wad airt me to my treasure.

[During the Poet's first visit to Annandale, an old song, called "the Lass of Ecclefechan," was sung to him, with which he was so amused that he noted it down, and, at a leisure moment, rendered the language more delicate, and the sentiments less warm, and sent it to the Musical Museum. The name of this pleasant little town was said to be unsuitable for rhyme. One day, as Burns and his brother gauger, Lewars, were riding along Bonshaw-braes, the latter said, "Come, give us a song in which one of the lines will rhyme to Ecclefechan." The Poet mused a little, and, with a humorous story running in his head, composed, and chanted as he composed, a song hitherto confined to manuscript, called "The Trogger." The heroine of the ditty speaks:—

"As I came down by Annan side,
 Intending for the border,
 Among the scroggie banks and braes,
 Wha met me but a trogger."

The description which she gives of her experiences is very graphic, but too much in the free manner of the old rustic minstrels. In the last verse the Poet remembered the object of the song:—

"Then up we gat, and took the road,
 And in by Ecclefechan,
 Whar the brandy-stoup we gart it clink,
 And strong ale ream the quech in."]

* To those curious in snatches of our ancient Caledonian Muse, it may not be unacceptable to present them with the original words of the air to which Burns has attached the above words:

Bonnie Jockie, braw Jockie,
 Bonnie Jockie Latin,
 His skin was like the silk sae fino,
 And mine was like the satin.

The Cooper o' Cuddie.

Tunc—Bob at the Bowster.

I.

THE cooper o' Cuddie cam' here awa;
 He ca'd the girrs out owre us a'—
 And our gude-wife has gotten a ca'
 That anger'd the silly guid-man, O.

We'll hide the cooper behind the door,
 Behind the door, behind the door,
 We'll hide the cooper behind the door,
 And cover him under a mawn, O.

II.

He sought them out, he sought them in,
 Wi', deil hae her! and, deil hae him!
 But the body he was sae doited and blin',
 He wist na where he was gaun, O.

III.

They cooper'd at e'en, they cooper'd at morn,
 'Till our guid-man has gotten the scorn;
 On ilka brow she's planted a horn,
 And swears that there they shall stan', O.

We'll hide the cooper behind the door,
 Behind the door, behind the door;
 We'll hide the cooper behind the door,
 And cover him under a mawn, O.

["The delicacy of this song cannot be compared to its wit. Burns was in all respects the poet of the people; he relished the rough jokes, and natural humour, and lively stories of his fellow peasants; no man in wide Scotland had so many merry tales to tell, and so many joyous songs to sing. Nor can the merits of all his lyrics be appreciated by men born in the 'high places:' though his manly vigour, high-souled independence, and glorious verse have given him a hold on every true English heart, he wrote exclusively for the people of Scotland—he thought Scottish fame sufficient—nay, in devoting his talents so much to lyric composition, he seemed to court the applause of the humble rather than the high, and wrote for the 'common people,'—nature's best judges, as he truly calls them."—CUNNINGHAM.]

Bonnie Jockie, braw Jockie,
 Bonnie Jockie Latin,
 Because she wudna gie'm a kiss,
 His heart was at the breakin'.
 Bonnie Jockie, &c.
 Jockie Latin's gotten a wife,
 He kentna how to guide her;
 He put a saddle on her back,
 And bade the devil ride her.
 Bonnie Jockie, &c.

Ah, Chloris.

Tune—Major Graham.

AH, Chloris! since it may na be
That thou of love wilt hear;
If from the lover thou maun flee,
Yet let the friend be dear.

Altho' I love my Chloris mair
Than ever tongue could tell;
My passion I will ne'er declare,
I'll say, I wish thee well.

Tho' a' my daily care thou art,
And a' my nightly dream,
I'll hide the struggle in my heart,
And say it is esteem.

[This song appeared for the first time in Pickering's Aldine edition of the Poetical Works of Robert Burns, Vol. iii. p. 179. It is printed from the original MS. in the Poet's own handwriting. Chloris was Miss Jean Lorimer.]

For the Sake of Somebody.

Tune—For the Sake of Somebody.

I.

My heart is sair—I dare na tell—
My heart is sair for Somebody;
I could wake a winter night
For the sake o' Somebody.
Oh-hon! for Somebody!
Oh-hey! for Somebody!
I could range the world around,
For the sake o' Somebody!

II.

Ye Powers that smile on virtuous love,
O, sweetly smile on Somebody!
Frae ilka danger keep him free,
And send me safe my Somebody.
Oh-hon! for Somebody!
Oh-hey! for Somebody!
I wad do—what wad I not?
For the sake o' Somebody!

["For the sake of Somebody," by Allan Ramsay, suggested "Somebody" to Burns, who borrowed two or three lines of the first stanza. From whom Ramsay took the idea of his song is not known; some of it is older than his day:—

"For the sake of Somebody,
For the sake of Somebody;
I could wake a winter night
For the sake of Somebody.
I am gaun to seek a wife,
I am gaun to buy a plaidy;
I have coft three stane o' woo'—
"arlin, is thy daughter ready?"

How different the tone when Ramsay takes it up!

"Betty, lassie, say't thysel',
Though thy dame be ill to shoo,
First we'll buckle, then we'll tell,
Let her flyte, and syne come to:
What signifies a mither's gloom,
When love and kisses come in play?
Shou'd we wither in our bloom,
And in simmer mak' nae hay?"

The Cardin' o't.

Tune—Malt Fish and Dumplings.

I.

I COFT a stane o' haslock woo',
To make a coat to Johnny o't;
For Johnny is my only jo,
I lo'e him best of ony yet.

The cardin' o't, the spinnin' o't,
The warpin' o't, the winnin' o't;
When ilka ell cost me a groat,
The tailor staw the lynin' o't.

II.

For though his locks be lyart grey,
And tho' his brow be beld aboon;
Yet I hae seen him on a day
The pride of a' the parishen.

The cardin' o't, the spinnin' o't,
The warpin' o't, the winnin' o't;
When ilka ell cost me a groat,
The tailor staw the lynin' o't.

["The little of this song to which antiquity lays claim is so trifling that the whole may be said to be the work of Burns. The tenderness of Johnnie's wife can only be fully felt by those who know that hause-lock wool is the softest and finest of the fleece, and is shorn from the throats of sheep in the summer heat, to give them air and keep them cool.

"In former times, before well-made roads, and coaches, and caravans were common, a sheep-farmer rarely descended from his hills to the towns, while the commodities of the latter seldom found their way to his fire-side. It was the custom for two or three sagacious dames belonging to the 'corn-land,' to make an in-road upon the 'wool-land,' and barter tea, and lace, and similar light luxuries, with the shepherds' wives, for 'hause-lock woo',' and such like trimmings."—CUNNINGHAM.]

The Lass that made the Bed to me.

Tune—The Lass that made the Bed to me.

I.

WHEN Januar' wind was blawing cauld,
As to the north I took my way,
The mirksome night did me enfauld,
I knew na where to lodge till day.

II.

By my good luck a maid I met,
Just in the middle o' my care ;
And kindly she did me invite
To walk into a chamber fair.

III.

I bow'd fu' low, unto this maid,
And thank'd her for her courtesie ;
I bow'd fu' low unto this maid,
And bade her mak a bed for me.

IV.

She made the bed baith large and wide,
Wi' twa white hands she spread it down ;
She put the cup to her rosy lips, [soun'.]"
And drank, "Young man, now sleep ye

V.

She snatch'd the candle in her hand,
And frae my chamber went wi' speed ;
But I call'd her quickly back again
To lay some mair below my head.

VI.

A cod she laid below my head,
And served me wi' due respect ;
And, to salute her wi' a kiss,
I put my arms about her neck.

VII.

"Haud off your hands, young man," she says,
"And d'anna sae uncivil be :
Gif ye hae onie love for me,
O wrang na my virginitie !"

VIII.

Her hair was like the links o' gowd,
Her teeth were like the ivory ;
Her cheeks like lilies dipt in wine,
The lass that made the bed to me.

IX.

Her bosom was the driven snaw,
Twa drifted heaps sae fair to see ;
Her limbs the polish'd marble stane,
The lass that made the bed to me.

X.

I kiss'd her owre and owre again,
And aye she wist na what to say,
I laid her between me and the wa'—
The lassie thought na lang till day.

XI.

Upon the morrow when we rase,
I thank'd her for her courtesie ;
But aye she blush'd, and aye she sigh'd,
And said, "Alas ! ye've ruin'd me."

XII.

I clasp'd her waist, and kiss'd her syne,
While the tear stood twinkling in her e'e ;
I said, "My lassie, dinna cry,
For ye aye shall mak the bed to me."

XIII.

She took her mither's Holland sheets,
And made them a' in sarks to me :
Blythe and merry may she be,
The lass that made the bed to me.

XIV.

The bonnie lass made the bed to me,
The braw lass made the bed to me ;
I'll ne'er forget, till the day I die,
The lass that made the bed to me !

[In his notes to the Musical Museum Burns says :—"The bonnie lass that made the bed to me" was composed on an amour of Charles II., when skulking in the North, about Aberdeen, in the time of the usurpation. He formed une petite affaire with a daughter of the house of Port Letham, who was the lass that made the bed to him ! His success was recorded by a cavalier minstrel in words which were once popular both in Scotland and England :—

"There was a lass dwelt in the north,
A bonnie lass of high degree ;
A bonnie lass, and her name was Nell,
A blyther lass you ne'er did see.

CHORUS.

"O the bed to me, the bed to me,
The lass that made the bed to me ;
Blythe, and bonnie, and sweet was she,
The lass that made the bed to me."

"Burns took up the old song—which was sadly corrupted—and, exercising a poet's skill upon it, manufactured the present version : in the amended copy he makes the heroine a humble maiden, and changes the character of the composition."—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
Sae far awa.

Tune—Dalkeith Maiden Bridge.

I.

O, SAD and heavy should I part,
But for her sake sae far awa ;
Unknowing what my way may thwart,
My native land sae far awa.
Thou that of a' things Maker art,
That form'd this Fair sae far awa,
Gie body strength, then I'll ne'er start
At this my way sae far awa.

II.

How true is love to pure desert,
So love to her, sae far awa :
And nocht can heal my bosom's smart,
While, oh ! she is sae far awa.
Nane other love, nane other dart,
I feel but her's, sae far awa ;
But fairer never touch'd a heart
Than her's, the Fair sae far awa.

["This is another of the many songs which Burns wrote for the Musical Museum.

“It must be acknowledged that the Scotch give great occasion for songs of this nature—they wander the world over. Their native land is poor and sterile, and unable to maintain the half of the hardy and enterprising race to whom it gives birth. They are trained up to endurance and privation; they are well educated, for they can all read, write, and cypher; they are all intelligent, for a Scottish peasant knows more than the alehouse can tell him, and would think himself ignorant were he not to look far beyond the business by which he gains his bread. He has no poor-laws to hold out a miserable boon to his declining years; he, therefore, marches east, west, north, or south, as fortune or inclination determines, and relieves his own land while he benefits others.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

¶ I'll aye ca' in by yon Toun.

Tune—I'll gae nae mair to yon Toun.

I.

I'LL aye ca' in by yon town,
And by yon garden green, again;
I'll aye ca' in by yon town,
And see my bonnie Jean again.
There's name sall ken, there's name sall guess,
What brings me back the gate again;
But she my fairest faithfu' lass,
And stownlins we sall meet again.

II.

She'll wander by the aiken tree,
When trystin-time draws near again;
And when her lovely form I see,
O haith, she's doubly dear again!
I'll aye ca' in by yon town,
And by yon garden green again;
I'll aye ca' in by yon town.
And see my bonnie Jean again.

[An old song supplied Burns with the starting sentiment of this little delicious lyric:—

“I'll gang nae mair to yon town,
O never a' my life again;
I'll ne'er gae back to yon town,
To seek anither wife again.”

“Jean Armour was the heroine; the allusions to the trysting-tree, and the stolen interview, will be understood by all the daughters of Caledonia. There are few burn-banks, or romantic glens, or spreading woods in any lowland district, that are not hallowed in the memories of many by visions of past endearment—of golden hours—nay, minutes of rapture worthy of having been born for: no writer has entered so fully into these mysteries as Burns. Love has no charm unless it comes in a poetic shape; the lover who desires coal and candle may as well ask for his supper at once; he is regarded as a fellow of no soul, if he cannot dare flooded streams and haunted roads; and, should a thunder-storm meet him on his way, he will be wise not to turn or seek shelter, unless he wishes to be made the laughing-stock of half the lasses in the vale. It is recorded of a young girl on Nith-side, that, in alluding to her first interview with a lover, she tossed her tresses in scorn, saying, ‘Him! I tried him wi’ a lanely room and a lighted candle; and he hadna the sense to steek the door, and blaw it out!’”—CUNNINGHAM.]

¶ Wat ye wha's in yon Toun.

Tune—I'll aye ca' in by yon Toun.

I.

Now haply down yon gay green shaw
She wanders by yon spreading tree:
How blest ye flow'rs that round her blaw,
Ye catch the glances o' her e'e!

CHORUS.

O, WAT ye wha's in yon town,
Ye see the e'enin' sun upon?
The fairest dame's* in yon town,
That e'enin' sun is shining on.

II.

How blest ye birds that round her sing,
And welcome in the blooming year!
And doubly welcome be the spring,
The season to my Lucy † dear.

III.

The sun blinks blithe on yon town,
And on yon bonnie braes of Ayr; †
But my delight's in yon town,
And dearest bliss, is Lucy fair. §

IV.

Without my love, ¶ not a' the charms
O' Paradise could yield me joy;
But gie me Lucy  in my arms,
And welcome Lapland's dreary sky!

V.

My cave wad be a lover's bower,
Tho' raging winter rent the air;
And she a lovely little flower,
That I wad tent and shelter there.

VI.

O, sweet is she in yon town,
The sinkin' sun's gane down upon;
A fairer than 's in yon town
His setting beam ne'er shone upon.

VII.

If angry fate is sworn my foe,
And suffering I am doom'd to bear;
I careless quit aught else below,
But spare me—spare me, Lucy †† dear!

* V.A.R.—Maid's. † Jeannie.
‡ Among the broomy braes see green.

§ And dearest pleasure is my Jean.
¶ Fair.  Jeannie. †† Jeannie.

VIII.

For while life's dearest blood is warm,
 Ae thought frae her shall ne'er depart,
 And she—as fairest is her form!

She has the truest, kindest heart!

O, wat ye wha's in yeon town,
 Ye see the e'enin sun upon?

The fairest dame's* in yeon town
 That e'enin sun is shining on.

[The heroine of this fine song was originally his “bonnie Jean,” but Burns altered it afterwards in compliment to Miss Lucy Johnstone, the daughter of Wynne Johnstone of Hilton, Esq. Lucy was married to Mr. Richard Alexander Oswald, of Auchencruive; she was an accomplished and lovely woman, and died at Lisbon, early in life. The song is written in the character of her husband. “Did you ever, my dear Syme,” said the Poet, “meet with a man who owed more to the divine Giver of all good things than Mr. Oswald? A fine fortune; a pleasing exterior; self-evident amiable dispositions, and an ingenuous, upright mind—and that, too, informed much beyond the usual run of young fellows of his rank; and to all this, such a woman! But of her I shall say nothing at all, in despair of saying anything adequate. In my song I have endeavoured to do justice to what would be his feelings on seeing, in the scene I have drawn, the habitation of his Lucy. As I am a good deal pleased with my performance, I, in my first fervour, thought of sending it to Mrs. Oswald.” The original version, composed in honour of his “bonnie Jean,” is inserted in the fifth volume of “The Musical Museum,” but from certain and uncertain circumstances it was not published in the early editions of the Poet's works.]

◆
 The mirk Night o' December.

Tune—May, thy Morn.

I.

O MAY, thy morn was ne'er sae sweet
 As the mirk night o' December;
 For sparkling was the rosy wine,
 And private was the chamber:
 And dear was she, I dare na name,
 But I will aye remember.
 And dear was she I dare na name,
 But I will aye remember.

II.

And here's to them, that, like oursel,
 Can push about the jorum;
 And here's to them that wish us weel,
 May a' that's guid watch o'er them!
 And here's to them, we dare na tell,
 The dearest o' the quorum.
 And here's to them, we dare na tell,
 The dearest o' the quorum!

* VAR.—The dearest maid's.—MS.

[“The lady, whom the Poet desired rather to remember than name, is said, in our lyrical legends, to have been the fair Clarinda, of whose merits Burns has said and sung so much. It has also been ascribed to the charms of a Nithsdale dame, ‘who brewed guid ale for gentlemen,’ and loved to be admired by her customers.—The song was first published in Johnson's Museum: the air seems a variation of ‘Andrew and his cutty gun.’

“The ladies and wine have furnished themes for innumerable songs; and so long as the former are lovely, and the latter sparkles, they will continue to be sung. Both are united in ‘O May, thy morn:’ the Bard, as the wine-cup circulates, remembers a mirk night in December, and a fair one who had rendered it cheerful. He dates joy from that night, as a free heroine in Mackenzie's tale dates all things which befel her from the time she met with her misfortune!”—CUNNINGHAM.]

◆
 Lovely Polly Stewart.

Tune—Ye're welcome, Charlie Stuart.

I.

O LOVELY Polly Stewart!
 O charming Polly Stewart!
 There's ne'er a flower that blooms in May
 That's half sae fair as thou art.
 The flower it blaws, it fades and fa's,
 And art can ne'er renew it;
 But worth and truth eternal youth
 Will gi'e to Polly Stewart.

II.

May he whose arms shall fauld thy charms,
 Possess a leal and true heart;
 To him be given to ken the heaven
 He grasps in Polly Stewart.
 O lovely Polly Stewart!
 O charming Polly Stewart!
 There's ne'er a flower that blooms in May
 That's half so sweet as thou art.

[The lady who inspired this song was unconscious at the time, while she caused her table to be spread, and her wine poured out, that her name was to be preserved in undying verse.—The Poet had, in his thoughts, a Jacobite lyric, called “Ye're welcome, Charlie Stuart!”—

“Had I the power as I've the will,
 I'd make thee famous by my quill,
 Thy foes I'd scatter, quell, and kill,
 From Billingsgate to Duart.
 Thou't welcome, Charlie Stuart;
 Thou't welcome, Charlie Stuart;
 A shepherd's wand will grow a brand
 When thou comes—Charlie Stuart!”

The Highland Laddie.

Tune—If thou't play me fair Play.

I.

THE bonniest lad that e'er I saw,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie,
Wore a plaid, and was fu' braw,
Bonnie Highland laddie.
On his head a bonnet blue,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie.
His royal heart was firm and true,
Bonnie Highland laddie.

II.

Trumpets sound, and cannons roar,
Bonnie lassie, Lawland lassie;
And a' the hills wi' echoes roar,
Bonnie Lawland lassie.
Glory, honour, now invite,
Bonnie lassie, Lawland lassie,
For freedom and my king to fight,
Bonnie Lawland lassie.

III.

The sun a backward course shall take,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie;
Ere aught thy manly courage shake,
Bonnie Highland laddie.
Go! for yoursel procure renown,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie;
And for your lawful king, his crown,
Bonnie Highland laddie.

[The Poet took a long ditty called "The Highland Lad and Lawland Lassie," and compressed it into three stanzas. Another song, now almost forgotten, gives the name of the air:—

"If thou't play me fair play,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie,
Another year for thee I'll stay,
Bonnie Highland laddie;
For a' the lasses hereabouts,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie,
Marry name but Geordie's louts,
Bonnie Highland laddie."]

Anna, thy Charms.

Tune—Bonnie Mary.

ANNA, thy charms my bosom fire,
And 'press my soul with care;
But, ah! how bootless to admire,
When fated to despair!
Yet in thy presence, lovely fair,
To hope may be forgiv'n;
For sure 'twere impious to despair,
So much in sight of Heav'n.

[“Burns inserted this elegant little lyric in the third edition of his poems. It also appears in the last volume of the Musical Museum. The concluding sentiment is akin to that fine compliment in the ‘Shepherd’s Mournful Fate,’ by Hamilton of Bangour:—

‘For oh! that form, so heavenly fair,
Those languid eyes so sweetly smiling,
That artless blush, and modest air,
So fatally beguiling:
Thy every look, and every grace,
So charm whene'er I view thee,
Till death o'ertake me in the chace,
Still will my hopes pursue thee:
But when my tedious hours are pass'd,
Be this last blessing given—
Low at thy feet to breathe my last,
And die in sight of heaven.’

Burns had more nature and strength than Hamilton; but some of the lyrics of the latter are unequalled for elegance.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Cassillis' Banks.

Tune—Unknown.

I.

Now bank an' brae are clait'h'd in green,
An' scatter'd cowslips sweetly spring;
By Girvan's fairy-haunted stream
The birdies flit on wanton wing.
To Cassillis' banks when e'ning fa's,
There wi' my Mary let me see,
There catch her ilka glance of love,
The bonnie blink o' Mary's e'e!

II.

The chield wha boasts o' world's walth
Is aften laird o' meikle care;
But Mary she is a' mine ain—
Ah! fortune canna gie me mair!
Then let me range by Cassillis' banks,
Wi' her, the lassie dear to me,
And catch her ilka glance o' love,
The bonnie blink o' Mary's e'e!

[“The stream of Girvan, and the banks of Cassillis, flowed and flourished to the last in the heart and fancy of Burns: when he desired to compose a song for any tune which affected him, he recalled a favourite haunt of his youth, and a form dear to his heart; and, like the lyrist Cowley, gave dancing words to speaking strings. The charms of nature shared his heart with those of living beauty; one line is both a history and a landscape:—

‘Girvan's fairy-haunted stream.’

“The beauties of Cassillis' banks he had sung elsewhere.

“Other national songs give no more than the image of female loveliness: those of Scotland add the flowers on which the foot of beauty treads, the stream which murmurs at her side, the woods which wave around her, and the birds which welcome her with their songs."—CUNNINGHAM.]

To thee, lov'd Nith.

Tune—Unknown.

I.

To thee, lov'd Nith, thy gladsofte plains,
Where late wi' careless thought I rang'd,
Though prest wi' care and sunk in woe,
To thee I bring a heart unchang'd.

II.

I love thee, Nith, thy banks and braes,
Tho' mem'ry there my bosom tear;
For there he rov'd that brake my heart,
Yet to that heart, ah! still how dear!

Bannocks o' Barley.*

Tune—The Killogie.

I.

BANNOCKS o' bear meal,
Bannocks o' barley;
Here's to the Highlandman's
Bannocks o' barley.
Wha in a brulzie,
Will first cry a parley?
Never the lads wi'
The bannocks o' barley!

* Burns, when he composed this song, probably had in his view the old Scottish song called "Bannocks o' Barley Meal," said to have been written by the great John, duke of Argyll, which is as follows:—

My name is Argyll: you may think it strange
To live at the court, and never to change;
All falsehood and flatt'ry I do disdain;
In my secret thoughts no deceit shall remain;
In siege or in battle I ne'er was disgrac'd;
I always my king and my country have fac'd;
I'll do any thing for my country's weal,
I'd live upon bannocks o' barley meal.

Adieu to the courtiers of London town,
For to my ain country I will gang down;
At the sight of Kirkaldy ance again,
I'll cock up my bonnet, and march amain.
O the muckle de'il tak' a' your noise and strife,
I'm fully resolv'd for a country life,
Where a' the braw lasses, wha ken me weel,
Will feed me wi' bannocks o' barley meal.

I'll quickly lay down my sword and my gun,
And I'll put my plaid and my bonnet on,
Wi' my plaidin' stockings and leather-heel'd shoon;
They'll mak me appear a fine sprightly loon.
And when I am drest thus frae tap to tae,
Hame to my Maggie I think for to gae,
Wi' my claymore hinging down to my heel,
To whang at the bannocks o' barley meal.

II.

Bannocks o' bear meal,
Bannocks o' barley;
Here's to the Highlandman's
Bannocks o' barley!
Wha in his wae-days
Were loyal to Charlie?
Wha but the lads wi'
The bannocks o' barley?

The air to which these words were written gave the name to an old song, on which were at once impressed the free language and free manners of our ancestors.

"A lad and a lassie,
Lay in the Killogie."]

Her Balou.

Tune—The Highland Balou

I.

HEE balou! my sweet wee Donald,
Picture o' the great Clanronald;
Brawlie kens our wanton chief
Wha got my young Highland thief.

II.

Leeze me on thy bonnie craigie
An' thou live, thou'll steal a naigie:
Travel the country thro' and thro',
And bring hame a Carlisle cow.

III.

Thro' the Lawlands, o'er the border,
Weel, my babie, may thou furder:
Herry the louns o' the laigh countrie,
Syne to the Highlands hame to me.

I'll buy a fine present to bring to my dear,
A pair of fine garters for Maggie to wear,
And some pretty things else, I do declare,
When she gangs wi' me to Paisley fair.
And when we are married we'll keep a cow,
My Maggie sall milk her, and I will plow;
We'll live a' the winter on beef and lang-kail,
And whang at the bannocks o' barley meal.

If my Maggie should chance to bring me a son,
He'll fight for his king as his daddy has done;
I'll send him to Flanders some breeding to learn,
Syne hame into Scotland and keep a farm.
And thus we'll live and industrious be,
And wha'll be sae great as my Maggie and me?
We'll soon grow as fat as a Norway seal,
Wi' feeding on bannocks o' barley meal.

Adieu to you citizens every ane,
Wha jolt in your coaches to Drury-lane;
You bites of Bear-garden who fight for gains,
And ye fops who have got more wigs than brains;
You cullies and bullies, I'll bid you adieu,
For whoring and swearing I'll leave all to you;
Your woodcock and pheasant, your duck and your teal,
I'll leave them for bannocks o' barley meal.

I'll leave aff kissing a citizen's wife,
I'm fully resolv'd for a country life;
Kissing and toying I'll spend the lang day,
Wi' bonny young lasses on cocks of hay;
Where each clever lad gives his bonny lass
A kiss and a tumble upo' the green grass.
I'll awa to the Highlands as fast 's I can reel,
And whang at the bannocks o' barley meal.

[A Highland lady, it is said, sung a song in Gaelic, the air of which pleased Burns so much that he desired to know the meaning of the words: he smiled at the oral translation, and crooning the air over for a minute's space or so, chanted "Hee Balou," wrote it down, and sent it to the Museum.]

Concerning this song, Cromek says—"The time when the moss-troopers and cattle-drivers on the borders began their nightly depredations was the first Michaelmas moon. Cattle-stealing formerly was a mere foraging expedition; and it has been remarked that many of the best families in the north can trace their descent from the daring sons of the mountains. The produce (by way of dowry to a laird's daughter) of a Michaelmas moon is proverbial; and by the aid of Lochiel's lanthorn (the moon) these exploits were the most desirable things imaginable. In the 'Hee Balou' we see one of those heroes in the cradle."]

What is my Heart.

Tune—Wae is my Heart.

I.

WAE is my heart, and the tear's in my e'e;
Lang, lang, joy's been a stranger to me:
Forsaken and friendless, my burden I bear,
And the sweet voice o' pity ne'er sounds in my ear.

II.

Love, thou hast pleasures, and deep hae I lov'd:
Love, thou hast sorrows, and sair hae I prov'd;
But this bruised heart that now bleeds in my breast,
I can feel by its throbbings will soon be at rest.

III.

O, if I were, where happy I hae been,
Down by yon stream, and yon bonnie castle-
green;
For there he is wand'ring, and musing on me,
Wha wad soon dry the tear frae his Phillis's e'e.

[These verses were composed at the request of Clarke the musician, who felt—or imagined he felt—much pain of heart for a young lady of Nithsdale. The air is a simple one, and the song is in keeping.]

Here's his Health in Water.

Tune—The Job of Journeywork.

ALTHO' my back be at the wa',
And tho' he be the fautor;
Altho' my back be at the wa',
Yet, here's his health in water!

O! wae gae by his wanton sides,
Sae brawlie's he could flatter;
Till for his sake I'm slighted sair,
And dree the kintra clatter.
But tho' my back be at the wa',
And tho' he be the fautor;
But tho' my back be at the wa',
Yet, here's his health in water!

[The song was first published in the Musical Museum, and was written when the Poet was in Dumfries: the idea was taken from an old lyric, of which the o'erword was,

"Here's his health in water."]

My Peggy's Face.

Tune—My Peggy's Face.

I.

MY Peggy's face, my Peggy's form,
The frost of hermit age might warm;
My Peggy's worth, my Peggy's mind,
Might charm the first of human kind.
I love my Peggy's angel air,
Her face so truly, heav'nly fair,
Her native grace so void of art,
But I adore my Peggy's heart.

II.

The lily's hue, the rose's dye,
The kindling lustre of an eye;
Who but owns their magic sway!
Who but knows they all decay!
The tender thrill, the pitying tear,
The gen'rous purpose, nobly dear,
The gentle look, that rage disarms—
These are all immortal charms.

[The heroine of these sweet verses was Margaret Chalmers: the gentleness, the candour, and the accomplishments of that lady seem often to have occurred to the mind of Burns.]

Gloomy December.

Tune—Wandering Willie.

I.

ANCE mair I hail thee, thou gloomy December!
Ance mair I hail thee, wi' sorrow and care;
Sad was the parting thou makes me remember,
Parting wi' Nancy, oh! ne'er to meet mair.
Fond lovers' parting is sweet painful pleasure,
Hope beaming mild on the soft parting hour;
But the dire feeling, oh farewell for ever!
Is anguish unmingl'd, and agony pure.

II.

Wild as the winter now tearing the forest,
 'Till the last leaf o' the summer is flown,
 Such is the tempest has shaken my bosom,
 Since my last hope and last comfort is gone!
 Still as I hail thee, thou gloomy December,
 Still shall I hail thee wi' sorrow and care;
 For sad was the parting thou makes me remember,
 Parting wi' Nancy, oh! ne'er to meet mair.

[“Clarinda inspired these verses, and they are worthy of her merits, personal and mental. To his parting with that lady the Bard often recurred; in truth, he left Edinburgh with great reluctance; there he had pleased society, and there only could he hope for ‘pension, post, or place.’ When he quitted it he knew he was going to the stilts of the plough, and experience told him how little he could hope from niggardly economy and sharp bargaining. He was one of nature’s gentlemen, and unfit for the details of the market, the coupling of horses, and the keen and eager contest carried on between seller and buyer. An old peasant once said of him ‘that he was owre kind-hearted to be prosperous,’ and added, ‘he was one of them that carry their corn to a falling market, and sell their hens on a rainy day!’ To this impediment in the way to wealth, he repeatedly alludes in his letters—no man ever knew himself better—all fell out in his own history as he feared it would.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

My Lady's Gown, there's Gairs upon't.

Tune—Gregg's Pipes.

CHORUS.

My lady's gown, there's gairs upon't,
 And gowden flowers sae rare upon't;
 But Jenny's jimps and jirkinet,
 My lord thinks meikle mair upon't.

I.

My lord a-hunting he is gane,
 But hounds or hawks wi' him are nane;
 By Colin's cottage lies his game,
 If Colin's Jenny be at hame.

II.

My lady's white, my lady's red,
 And kith and kin o' Cassillis' blude;
 But her ten-pund lands o' tocher guid
 Were a' the charms his lordship lo'ded.

III.

Out o'er yon muir, out o'er yon moss,
 Where gor-cocks thro' the heather pass,
 There wons auld Colin's bonnie lass,
 A lily in a wilderness.

IV.

Sae sweetly move her genty limbs,
 Like music-notes o' lovers' hymns:
 The diamond dew in her een sae blue,
 Where laughing love sae wanton swims.

V.

My lady's dink, my lady's drest,
 The flower and fancy o' the west;
 But the lassie that a man lo'es best,
 O that's the lass to mak' him blest.

My lady's gown, there's gairs upon't,
 And gowden flowers sae rare upon't;
 But Jenny's jimps and jirkinet,
 My lord thinks meikle mair upon't.

[The idea of this song is believed to be old, and some of the words also; most of it, however, is the workmanship of Burns. The air to which it was written was the composition of James Gregg, a musician belonging to Ayr-shire, whose memory still lives in the west as an improver of the telescope, a mechanist, and a painter. He is still more pleasantly remembered by this tune, which is often called for when the dancers are on the floor—

“And all goes merry as a marriage bell.”]

Amang the Trees where Humming Bees.

Tune—*The King of France, he rode a Race.

I.

AMANG the trees, where humming bees
 At buds and flowers were hinging, O,
 Auld Caledon drew out her drone,
 And to her pipe was singing, O;
 'Twas pibroch, sang, strathspey, or reels,
 She dir'd them aff fu' clearly, O,
 When there cam a yell o' foreign squels,
 That dang her tapsalteerie, O.

II.

Their capon craws and queer ha ha's,
 They made our lugs grow eerie, O;
 The hungry bike did scrape and pike,
 'Till we were wae and weary, O;
 But a royal ghaist wha ance was cas'd
 A prisoner aughteen year awa,
 He fir'd a fiddler in the north
 That dang them tapsalteerie, O.

[“Ritson says, when he was in Italy he was much interested by the chants sung by friars or priests; they bore some resemblance to the elder

* The following is the commencement of this old song:—

The King o' France he rade a race,
 Out o'er the hills o' Seiry, O;
 His eldest son has followed him
 Upon a good grey meary, O!

Scottish melodies. This resemblance has been noticed by some of our northern authorities, who surmise that Caledonia supplied Italy with many of her most exquisite melodies. This seems as well-founded as the legend that David Rizzio brought the best Scottish airs from Italy—a story that offends our Welch musicians, who declare that David's surname was Rice, not Rizzio, and that the airs with which he charmed the Queen of Scotland were genuine Welch!

“It has been thought that Burns had all that in his mind when he wrote this song: it seems quite as likely that he alludes to the influx of Italian music by operas and oratorios; and that the fiddler of the north, who was animated by the spirit of the royal poet and musician, was honest Neil Gow, whose vigorous genius maintained the glory of our national music in spite of—

‘Their capon craws, and queer ha ha’s!’”

CUNNINGHAM.]

The gowden Locks of Anna.

Tune—Banks of Banna.

I.

YESTREEN I had a pint o’ wine,
A place where body saw na’;
Yestreen lay on this breast o’ mine
The gowden locks of Anna.
The hungry Jew in wilderness,
Rejoicing o’er his manna,
Was naething to my hinny bliss
Upon the lips of Anna.

II.

Ye monarchs tak’ the east and west,
Frae Indus to Savannah!
Gi’e me within my straining grasp
The melting form of Anna.
There I’ll despise imperial charms,
An empress or sultana,
While dying raptures in her arms
I give and take with Anna!

III.

Awa’, thou flaunting god o’ day!
Awa’, thou pale Diana!
Ilk star gae hide thy twinkling ray,
When I’m to meet my Anna.
Come, in thy raven plumage, night!
Sun, moon, and stars withdrawn a’;
And bring an angel pen to write
My transports wi’ my Anna!

POSTSCRIPT.

IV.

The Kirk and State may join, and tell
To do such things I maunna:

The Kirk and State may gae to h—ll,
And I’ll gae to my Anna.
She is the sunshine o’ my e’e,—
To live but* her I canna;
Had I on earth but wishes three,
The first should be my Anna.

[A Dumfries maiden, with a light foot and a merry eye, was the heroine of this clever song. Burns thought so well of it himself that he recommended it as one of his best to Thomson; but the latter, aware, perhaps, of the free character of her of the gowden locks, was unwilling to give her a place among lyrics dedicated to the charms of ladies of high degree and unblemished reputation, and therefore excluded it, though pressed to publish it by the Poet. Irritated, perhaps, at Thomson’s refusal, he wrote the additional Stanza, by way of Postscript, in defiance of his colder blooded critic. To those who are curious in such matters, it may be told that Anna’s locks were sunny rather than golden, and that she was a handmaid at an inn, and accounted beautiful by the customers when wine made them tolerant in matters of taste.]

☉ Wat ye what my Minnie did.

I.

O WAT ye what my minnie did,
My minnie did, my minnie did,
O wat ye what my minnie did,
On Tysday ’teen to me, jo?
She laid me in a saft bed,
A saft bed, a saft bed,
She laid me in a saft bed,
And bade gude’en to me, jo.

II.

An’ wat ye what the parson did,
The parson did, the parson did,
An’ wat ye what the parson did,
A’ for a penny fee, jo?
He loos’d on me a lang man,
A mickle man, a strang man,
He loos’d on me a lang man,
That might hae worried me, jo.

III.

An’ I was but a young thing,
A young thing, a young thing,
An’ I was but a young thing,
Wi’ nane to pity me, jo.
I wat the kirk was in the wyte,
In the wyte, in the wyte,
To pit a young thing in a fright,
An’ loose a man on me, jo.

* Without.

The Piper.

A FRAGMENT.

THERE came a piper out o' Fife,
I watna what they ca'd him ;
He play'd our cousin Kate a spring,
When fient a body bade him.
And ay the mair he hotch'd an' blew,
The mair that she forbade him.

Jenny M'Craw.

A FRAGMENT.

JENNY M'Craw, she has ta'en to the heather,
Say, was it the covenant carried her thither ;
Jenny M'Craw to the mountains is gane,
Their leagues and their covenants a' she has ta'en ;
My head and my heart, now quo' she, are at rest,
And as for the lave, let the deil do his best.

The last braw Bridal.

A FRAGMENT.

THE last braw bridal that I was at,
'Twas on a Hallowmass day,
And there was routh o' drink and fun,
And mickle mirth and play.
The bells they rang, and the carlins sang,
And the dames danced in the ha' ;
The bride went to bed wi' the silly bridegroom,
In the mid'st o' her kimmers a'.

Here's to thy Health, my bonnie Lass.Tune—Laggan Burn.

I.

HERE'S to thy health, my bonnie lass,
Guid night, and joy be wi' thee ;
I'll come nae mair to thy bower-door,
To tell thee that I lo'e thee.
O dinna think, my pretty pink,
But I can live without thee :
I vow and swear, I dinna care,
How lang ye look about ye.

II.

Thou'rt aye sae free informing me
Thou hast nae mind to marry ;
I'll be as free informing thee
Nae time hae I to tarry.
I ken thy friends try ilka means
Frae wedlock to delay thee ;
Depending on some higher chance—
But fortune may betray thee.

III.

I ken they scorn my low estate,
But that does never grieve me ;
But I'm as free as any he,
Sma' siller will relieve me.

I'll count my health my greatest wealth,
Sae long as I'll enjoy it :
I'll fear nae scant, I'll bode nae want,
As lang's I get employment.

IV.

But far off fowls hae feathers fair,
And aye until ye try them :
Tho' they seem fair, still have a care,
They may prove waur than I am.
But at twal at night, when the moon shines bright,
My dear, I'll come and see thee ;
For the man that lo'es his mistress weel
Nae travel makes him weary.

[This was a song of the Poet's youthful days ; he trimmed it up a little for the Museum, and adapted it to the beautiful Strathspey tune called "Laggan Burn." There is more of the man in his early verses, and more sentiment in his later ones.—In the manuscript of the music, there is the following note to Johnson in the hand-writing of Clarke :

"This song must have a verse more or a verse less. The music intended for it was so miserably bad that I rejected it ; but luckily there was a tune called 'Laggan Burn' on the opposite side, which will answer very well by adding a verse, or curtailing one. I know that Burns will rather do the former than the latter.—

[P.S. When I wrote the above, I did not observe that there was another verse on the opposite page.]

The Farewell.Tune—It was a' for our rightfu' King.

I.

It was a' for our rightfu' king,
We left fair Scotland's strand ;
It was a' for our rightfu' king
We e'er saw Irish land, my dear,
We e'er saw Irish land.

II.

Now a' is done that men can do,
And a' is done in vain ;
My love and native land farewell,
For I maun cross the main, my dear,
For I maun cross the main.

III.

He turned him right, and round about,
Upon the Irish shore ;
And gae his bridle-reins a shake,
With adieu for evermore, my dear,
With adieu for evermore.

IV.

The sodger frae the wars returns,
The sailor frae the main ;
But I hae parted frae my love,
Never to meet again, my dear,
Never to meet again.

v.

When day is gane, and night is come,
 And a' folk bound to sleep ;
 I think on him that's far awa',
 The lee-lang night, and weep, my dear,
 The lee-lang night, and weep.*

[Hogg, in his notes to the Jacobite Reliques, says this song was written by Captain Ogilvie, who was killed on the banks of the Rhine, in the year 1695. Sir Walter Scott, in the last edition of his works, refers to his beautiful song, "A weary lot is thine," in the third canto of Rokeby, and says—"The last verse is taken from the fragment of an old Scottish ballad, of which I only recollected two verses when the first edition of Rokeby was published. Mr. Thomas Sheridan kindly pointed out to me an entire copy of this beautiful song, which seems to express the fortunes of some follower of the Stuart family." The song, as copied by Scott, is nearly word for word with that of Burns in the fifth volume of the Musical Museum: it is, nevertheless, probable that the Poet rather beautified or amended some ancient strain which he had discovered than wrote it wholly from his own heart and fancy.—CUNNINGHAM.]

⊕ Steer her up.

Tune—O steer her up, and haud her gaun.

I.

O STEER her up and haud her gaun—
 Her mither's at the mill, jo ;
 An' gin she winna tak' a man,
 E'en let her tak' her will, jo :

* We here subjoin part of the old song which was the prototype of the above.

The cold winter it is past and gone,
 And now comes on the spring,
 And I am one the king's life-guards,
 And I must go fight for my king, my dear ;
 And I must go fight for my king.

Now since to the wars you must go,
 One thing I pray grant me,
 It's I will dress myself in man's attire,
 And I'll travel along with thee, my dear,
 And I'll travel along with thee.

I would not for ten thousand words
 That my love endanger'd were so ;
 The rattling of drums and shining of swords,
 Will cause great sorrow and wo, my dear,
 Will cause great sorrow and wo.

I will do more for my true love
 Than he will do for me ;
 I'll cut my hair and roll me bare,
 And mourn till the day I die, my dear,
 And mourn till the day I die.

So farewell mother and father dear,
 My kith and kin also,
 My sweet and bonny Mally Stewart,
 You're the cause of all my wo, my dear,
 You're the cause of all my wo.

First shore her wi' a kindly kiss,
 And ca' anither gill, jo,
 And gin she tak' the thing amiss,
 E'en let her flyte her fill, jo.

II.

O steer her up, and be na blate,
 An' gin she tak' it ill, jo,
 Then lea'e the lassie till her fate,
 And time nae langer spill, jo :
 Ne'er break your heart for ae rebute,
 But think upon it still, jo ;
 That gin the lassie winna do't,
 Ye'll fin' anither will, jo.

[Allan Ramsay found a wild old song of this name and measure, and, adopting the first four lines, penned a drinking ditty, which may be found in the Tea Table Miscellany. The second verse will be sample sufficient:—

" See that shining glass of claret,
 How invitingly it looks ;
 Take it aff, and let's hae mair o't—
 Pox on fighting, trade, and books :
 Let's have pleasure while we're able,
 Bring us in the mickle bowl ;
 Place't on the middle o' the table,
 And let wind and weather yowl."

Burns took the first four lines of the old strain, and eked them out in his own way.]

⊕ Aye my Wife she dang me.

Tune—My wife she dang me.†

I.

O AYE my wife she dang me,
 An' aft my wife did bang me,

She took the slippers off her feet,
 And the cockups off her hair ;
 And she has ta'en a long journey,
 For seven lang years and mair, my dear,
 For seven lang years and mair.

Sometimes she rade, sometimes she gaed,
 Sometimes sat down to mourn,
 And it was aye the o'ercome o' her tale,
 Shall I e'er see my bonnie laddie return, my dear,
 Shall I e'er see my bonny laddie return.

The trooper turn'd himself round about,
 All on the Irish shore ;
 He has gi'en the bridle reins a shake,
 Saying adieu for evermore, my dear,
 Saying adieu for evermore.

† When Burns wrote the above humorous lyric, he had probably in his recollection the old words to which the air was originally united.

I was twenty years a bachelor,
 And lived a single life ;
 But I never could contented be,
 Until I got a wife.
 But I hadna lang married been
 Till she began to bang me,
 And ne'er dang out my very een,
 And sware she would ga hang me.
 Ae day I at a wedding was,
 And dancing on the green ;

If ye gie a woman a' her will,
Gude faith, she'll soon o'er-gang ye.
On peace and rest my mind was bent,
And fool I was I married ;
But never honest man's intent
As cursedly miscarried.

II.

Some sairie comfort still at last,
When a' their days are done, man ;
My pains o' hell on earth are past,
I'm sure o' bliss aboon, man.
O aye my wife she dang me,
And aft my wife did bang me,
If ye gie a woman a' her will,
Gude faith, she'll soon o'er-gang ye.

Oh, wert thou in the cauld Blast.

Tune—The Lass o' Livingstone.*

I.

Oh, wert thou in the cauld blast
On yonder lea, on yonder lea,
My plaidie to the angry airt,
I'd shelter thee, I'd shelter thee :
Or did misfortune's bitter storms
Around thee blaw, around thee blaw,
Thy bield should be my bosom,
To share it a', to share it a'.

II.

Or were I in the wildest waste,
Sae bleak and bare, sae bleak and bare,†
The desert were a paradise,
If thou wert there, if thou wert there :
Or were I monarch o' the globe,
Wi' thee to reign, wi' thee to reign,
The brightest jewel in my crown
Wad be my queen, wad be my queen.

[The Poet composed this fine song in honour of Mrs. Riddel. Neither the song of Allan Ramsay to the same air, beginning with—

"Pain'd with her slighting Jamie's love,
Bell dropt a tear, Bell dropt a tear,"

nor the more ancient strain of the Lass o' Livingstone, afforded aid to the Poet. The following is a specimen of the latter :—

I laid my hands on a kent lass,
Said, hail ye dainty quean,
Up comes my wife in a crack,
And on the flure she dang me,
And for a lick o' the grey mare pock,
She sware that she would hang me.

But when I did get up again,
Then fast away ran I ;
My wife she chas'd me owre the plain
Wi' mony a hue and ery.

"The bonnie lass o' Livingstone,
Is fair to see, is fair to see :
With what a light look and a loup,
She came to me, she came to me.
She has a black and a rolling e'e,
An' a dimplit chin, an' a dimplit chin ;
An' no to taste her rosy lips
Wad be a sin, wad be a sin."‡

Oh wha is she that lo'es me.

Tune—Morag.

I.

O WHA is she that lo'es me,‡
And has my heart a-keeping ?
O sweet is she that lo'es me,
As dew's o' simmer weeping,
In tears the rose-buds steeping !

CHORUS.

O that's the lassie o' my heart,
My lassie ever dearer ;
O that's the queen of womankind,
And ne'er a ane to peer her.

II.

If thou shalt meet a lassie,
In grace and beauty charming,
That e'en thy chosen lassie,
Erewhile thy breast sae warming,
Had ne'er sic powers alarming ;
O that's, &c.

III.

If thou hadst heard her talking,
And thy attentions plighted,
That ilka body talking,
But her by thee is slighted,
And thou art all delighted ;
O that's, &c.

IV.

If thou hast met this fair one ;
When frae her thou hast parted,
If every other fair one,
But her, thou hast deserted,
And thou art broken-hearted ;
O that's the lassie o' my heart,
My lassie ever dearer ;
O that's the queen o' womankind,
And ne'er a ane to peer her.

But I soon tipped her the wink,
And said, nae mair ye'se bang me,
I'll drink nae mair o' your sour drink
For fear at last ye hang me.

* [VAR. The Robin came to the Wren's nest.—Poet's MS.

† — Of earth and air, of earth and air. ib.

‡ [VAR.—In a copy of this song in Burns's handwriting, the first line reads thus :—

O wad ye wha that lo'es me.
which agrees with the version in Thomson's collection.]

[Of the air of Morag, the Poet was passionately fond. This song was found among his papers; the exact period of its composition is not known, nor has the heroine been named.]

—◆—
Caledonia.

Tune—Caledonian Hunt's Delight

I.

THERE was once a day—but all Time then was young—
That brave Caledonia, the chief of her line,
From some of your northern deities sprung,
(Who knows not that brave Caledonia's divine?)
From Tweed to the Orcades was her domain,
To hunt, or to pasture, or do what she would:
Her heav'nly relations there fixed her reign,
And pledg'd her their godheads to warrant it good.

II.

A lambkin in peace, but a lion in war,
The pride of her kindred the heroine grew:
Her grandsire, old Odin, triumphantly swore,
"Whoe'er shall provoke thee th' encounter shall rue!"
With tillage or pasture at times she would sport
To feed her fair flocks by her green rustling corn;
But chiefly the woods were her fav'rite resort,
Her darling amusement the hounds and the horn.

III.

Long quiet she reign'd; till thitherward steers
A flight of bold eagles from Adria's strand: *
Repeated, successive, for many long years,
They darken'd the air, and they plunder'd the land:
Their pounces were murder, and terror their cry,
They'd conquer'd and ruin'd a world beside;
She took to her hills, and her arrows let fly—
The daring invaders they fled or they died.

IV.

The fell Harpy-raven took wing from the north,
The scourge of the seas, and the dread of the shore! †
The wild Scandinavian boar ‡ issu'd forth
To wanton in carnage, and wallow in gore;
O'er countries and kingdoms their fury prevail'd,
No arts could appease them, no arms could
But brave Caledonia in vain they assail'd, [repl.;
As Largs well can witness, and Loncartie tell. §

* The Romans.
† The Saxons.
‡ The Danes.

V.

The Cameleon-savage disturb'd her repose,
With tumult, disquiet, rebellion, and strife;
Provok'd beyond bearing, at last she arose,
And robb'd him at once of his hopes and his
The Anglian lion, the terror of France, [life: ||
Oft prowling, ensanguin'd the Tweed's silver flood:
But, taught by the bright Caledonian lance,
He learned to fear in his own native wood.

VI.

Thus bold, independent, unconquer'd, and free,
Her bright course of glory for ever shall run:
For brave Caledonia immortal must be;
I'll prove it from Euclid as clear as the sun:
Rectangle-triangle, the figure we'll choose,
The upright is Chance, and old Time is the base;
But brave Caledonia's the hypotenuse;
Then, ergo, she'll match them and match them always.

[“There is both knowledge of history and elegance of allegory in this singular song; but the most remarkable part is the conclusion, where the Poet proves, by mathematical demonstration, the immortality of Caledonia. It has been remarked of this, as well as others of his productions, that it bears the stamp of national love and of a manly understanding. Indeed, in the hastiest snatch he ever penned, some happy touch will be found denoting the hand of the master—some singular thought or felicitous line—easy to him and unattainable to others.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
O lay thy Loof in mine, Lass.

Tune—Cordwainer's March.

I.

O LAY thy loof in mine, lass,
In mine, lass, in mine, lass;
And swear on thy white hand, lass,
That thou wilt be my ain.
A slave to love's unbounded sway,
He aft has wrought me meikle wae;
But now he is my deadly fae,
Unless thou be my ain.

II.

There's monie a lass has broke my rest,
That for a blink I hae lo'ed best;
But thou art queen within my breast,
For ever to remain.

§ [Two famous battles, in which the Danes or Norwegians were defeated.—CURRIE.]
|| The Picts.

O lay thy loof in mine, lass,
In mine, lass, in mine, lass;
And swear on thy white hand, lass,
That thou wilt be my ain.

[This song was written by Burns for the "Museum;" the air is commonly played on King Crispin's day, when the shoemakers hold a sort of saturnalia, and, with pennons displayed, and trumpet and drum, march through our northern borough towns, attired like kings, princes of the blood, senators, ambassadors, and warriors. The spectacle is very imposing; the "princes of a day" behave with wonderful decorum; and, save that it is more orderly, it resembles closely a real coronation pageant.]

The Fête Champêtre.

Tune—Killiecrankie.

I.

O WHA will to Saint Stephen's house,
To do our errands there, man?
O wha will to Saint Stephen's house,
O th' merry lads of Ayr, man?
Or will we send a man-o'-law?
Or will we send a sodger?
Or him wha led o'er Scotland a'
The meikle Ursa-Major?

II.

Come, will ye court a noble lord,
Or buy a score o' lairds, man?
For worth and honour pawn their word,
Their vote shall be Glencaird's, man?
Ane gies them coin, ane gies them wine,
Anither gies them clatter;
Anbank, wha guess'd the ladies' taste,
He gies a Fête Champêtre.

III.

When Love and Beauty heard the news,
The gay green-woods amang, man;
Where gathering flowers and busking bowers,
They heard the blackbird's sang, man:
A vow, they seal'd it with a kiss,
Sir Politicks to fetter,
As their's alone, the patent-bliss,
To hold a Fête Champêtre.

IV.

Then mounted Mirth, on gleesome wing,
O'er hill and dale she flew, man;
Ilk wimpling burn, ilk crystal spring,
Ilk glen and shaw she knew, man:
She summon'd every social sprite,
That sports by wood or water,
On th' bonny banks of Ayr to meet,
And keep this Fête Champêtre.

[* Alluding to a superstition, which represents adders as forming annually from their slough certain little annular stones of streaked colouring, which are occasionally found

V.

Cauld Boreas, wi' his boisterous crew,
Were bound to stakes like kye, man:
And Cynthia's car, o' silver fu',
Clamb up the starry sky, man:
Reflected beams dwell in the streams,
Or down the current shatter;
The western breeze steals thro' the trees,
To view this Fête Champêtre.

VI.

How many a robe sac gaily floats!
What sparkling jewels glance, man!
To Harmony's enchanting notes,
As moves the mazy dance, man.
The echoing wood, the winding flood,
Like paradise did glitter,
When angels met, at Adam's yett,
To hold their Fête Champêtre.

VII.

When Politics came there, to mix
And make his ether-stane, man!
He circled round the magic ground,
But entrance found he nane, man: *
He blush'd for shame, he quat his name,
Forswore it, every letter,
Wi' humble prayer to join and share
This festive Fête Champêtre.

[* The occasion of this ballad was as follows:—when Mr. Cunninghame, of Enterkin, came to his estate, two mansion-houses on it, Enterkin and Annbank, were both in a ruinous state. Wishing to introduce himself with some éclat to the country, he got temporary erections made on the banks of Ayr, tastefully decorated with shrubs and flowers, for a supper and ball, to which most of the respectable families in the county were invited. It was a novelty in the county, and attracted much notice. A dissolution of Parliament was soon expected, and this festivity was thought to be an introduction to a canvass for representing the county.—Several other candidates were spoken of, particularly Sir John Whitefoord, then residing at Cloncaird, commonly pronounced Glencaird, and Mr. Boswell, the well-known biographer of Dr. Johnson. The political views of this festive assemblage, which are alluded to in the ballad, if they ever existed, were however laid aside, as Mr. C. did not canvass the county.]
—GILBERT BURNS.]

Here's a Health to them that's awa.

Tune—Here's a Health to them that's awa.

I.

HERE'S a health to them that's awa,
Here's a health to them that's awa;

and the real origin of which is supposed by antiquaries to be Druidical.—CHAMBERS.]

And wha winna wish guid luck to our cause,
 May never guid luck be their fa' !
 It's guid to be merry and wise,
 It's guid to be honest and true,
 It's guid to support Caledonia's cause,
 And bide by the buff and the blue.

II.

Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to Charlie * the chief of the clan,
 Altho' that his band be but sma'.
 May liberty meet wi' success !
 May prudence protect her frae evil !
 May tyrants and tyranny tane in the mist,
 And wander their way to the devil !

III.

Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that's awa ;
 Here's a health to Tammie † the Norland laddie,
 That lives at the lug o' the law !
 Here's freedom to him that wad read,
 Here's freedom to him that wad write ! [heard
 There's name ever fear'd that the truth should be
 But they wham the truth wad indite.

IV.

Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that's awa, [gowd,
 Here's Chieftain M'Leod, ‡ a chieftain worth
 Tho' bred amang mountains o' snaw !
 Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that's awa ;
 And wha winna wish guid luck to our cause,
 May never guid luck be their fa' ! §

[The buff and blue of Whiggery had triumphed over the white rose of Jacobitism in the heart of Burns when he composed this song. It is a sort of parody on a song in the Museum, and was found among his papers after his decease.

* Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that's awa,
 Here's a health to them that were here short syne,
 But canna be here the day.

* The Right Hon. Charles James Fox.

† Thomas, afterwards Lord, Erskine.

‡ M'Leod, chief of that clan.

§ [In the original MS. the termination of this song is as follows:—

"Here's friends on both sides of the Forth,
 And friends on both sides of the Tweed ;
 And wha wad betray old Albion's rights,
 May they never eat of her bread !"]

¶ [This is founded on an old ditty which the Poet altered and trimmed up for Johnson's "Musical Museum." Another version of it he subsequently furnished to Mr. Thomson, to the air of O bonnie Lass, will ye lie in a Barrack, which will be seen in his correspondence with that gentleman.]

¶ ["Previous to one of the public meetings of this body—a regular field-day, which was to terminate in a grand dinner—it was hinted to the Bard that something would be expected from him in the shape of a song or speech—some glowing tribute in honour of the patriotic cause that had linked them together, and eke in honour of the martial glory

It's guid to be merry and wise,
 It's good to be honest and true ;
 It's guid to be aff wi' the auld luvie
 Before ye be on wi' the new."

These two verses form part of a Jacobite song, with verbal alterations by Burns himself.]

Meg o' the Mill. ||

Tune—Jockie Hume's Lament.

O KEN ye what Meg o' the mill has gotten,
 An' ken ye what Meg o' the mill has gotten ?
 A braw new naig wi' the tail o' a rottan,
 And that's what Meg o' the mill has gotten.
 O ken ye what Meg o' the mill lo'es dearly,
 An' ken ye what Meg o' the mill lo'es dearly ?
 A dram o' guid strunt in a morning early,
 And that's what Meg o' the mill lo'es dearly.
 O ken ye how Meg o' the mill was married,
 And ken ye how Meg o' the mill was married ?
 The priest he was oxter'd, the clerk he was carried,
 And that's how Meg o' the mill was married.
 O ken ye how Meg o' the mill was bedded,
 An' ken ye how Meg o' the mill was bedded ?
 The groom gat sae fou, he fell twa-fauld
 beside it,
 And that's how Meg o' the mill was bedded.

The Dumfries Volunteers. ¶

Tune—Push about the Jorum.

I.

DOES haughty Gaul invasion threat ?
 Then let the louns beware, Sir ;
 There's wooden walls upon our seas,
 And volunteers on shore, Sir.
 The Nith shall rin to Corsincon,
 The Criffell sink in Solway,
 Ere we permit a foreign foe
 On British ground to rally !
 We'll ne'er permit a foreign foe
 On British ground to rally.

of old Scotland. The Poet said nothing, but, as silence gives consent, it was generally expected that he would share them on the occasion of the approaching festival with another lyric or energetic oration. The day at length arrived : dinner came and passed, and the usual loyal toasts were drunk with all the honours. Now came the Poet's turn ; every eye was fixed upon him, and, slowly lifting his glass, he stood up and looked around him with an arch indescribable expression of countenance. 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'may we never see the French, nor the French see us !' The toast fell like a 'wet blanket,' as Moore says, on the hopes of the volunteers. 'Is that a'?' they muttered one to another, dropping down to their seats (to use the words of my informant, who was present) 'like so many old wives at a field-preaching!' 'Is that the grand speech or fine poem that we were to have from him?—but we could hae expected nae better!' Not a few, however, 'raxed their jaws,' as the Ettrick Shepherd says, at the homely truth and humour of the Poet's sentiment, heightened by the first rueful aspect of the company ; and, long after, in his jovial moments, Burns used to delight in telling how he had cheated the volunteers of Dumfries."—CARRUTHERS.

II.

O let us not, like snarling curs,
 In wrangling be divided ;
 Till, slap ! come in an unco loun,
 And wi' a rung decide it.
 Be Britain still to Britain true,
 Amang oursel's united ;
 For never but by British hands
 Maun British wrangs be righted !
 For ne'er, &c.

III.

The kettle o' the kirk and state,
 Perhaps a clout may fail in't ;
 But deil a foreign tinkler loun
 Shall ever ca' a nail in't.
 Our fathers' bluid the kettle bought ;
 And wha wad dare to spoil it ?
 By heavens ! the sacrilegious dog
 Shall fuel be to boil it !
 By Heavens, &c.

IV.

The wretch that wad a tyrant own,
 And the wretch, his true-sworn brother,
 Wha would set the mob aboon the throne,
 May they be damn'd together !
 Wha will not sing, " God save the King,"
 Shall hang as high's the steeple ;
 But while we sing, " God save the King,"
 We'll ne'er forget the People.*
 But while we sing, &c.

[The above song was written in April, 1795. The Poet sent it to Mr. Jackson, editor of the Dumfries Journal, by whom it was first published. It also appears in the sixth volume of the "Museum," published nearly seven years after the Poet's death.]

The Winter of Life.

Tune—Gil Morice.

I.

BUT lately seen in gladsome green,
 The woods rejoic'd the day ;
 Thro' gentle showers the laughing flowers
 In double pride were gay :
 But now our joys are fled
 On winter blasts awa !
 Yet maiden May, in rich array,
 Again shall bring them a'.

II.

But my white pow, nae kindly thowe,
 Shall melt the snaws of age ;

My trunk of eild, but buss or bield,
 Sinks in Time's wintry rage.
 Oh ! age has weary days,
 And nights o' sleepless pain !
 Thou golden time o' youthfu' prime,
 Why com'st thou not again ?

[Though Burns gave much of his musing-time to the work of Thomson, in 1794 & 5 he did not neglect his earlier friend, Johnson, but contributed new as well as amended lyrics from time to time, and took a lively interest in the success of the work. "The Winter of Life," is one of those communications.

"Perhaps," says the Poet to the publisher of the 'Museum,' in 1788, "you may not find your account lucratively in this business; but you are a patriot for the music of your country; and I am certain posterity will look on themselves as highly indebted to your public spirit. Have you never a fair goddess that leads you a wild-goose-chase of amorous devotion? Let me know a few of her qualities, such as whether she be rather black, or fair; plump or thin; short or tall, &c.: and choose your air, and I shall task my muse to celebrate her." It is not known what reply Johnson made to the latter part of this epistle: he was a plain, blunt man, and cared little about the graces of song, or the melody of music, save in the way of his trade.]

To Mary.

Tune—Could aught of Song.

I.

COULD aught of song declare my pains,
 Could artful numbers move thee,
 The muse should tell, in labour'd strains,
 O Mary, how I love thee !
 They who but feign a wounded heart
 May teach the lyre to languish ;
 But what avails the pride of art,
 When wastes the soul with anguish ?

II.

Then let the sudden bursting sigh
 The heart-felt pang discover ;
 And in the keen, yet tender, eye,
 O read th' imploring lover.
 For well I know thy gentle mind
 Disdains art's gay disguising ;
 Beyond what fancy e'er refin'd,
 The voice of nature prizing.

* ["When the French threatened to invade this country in 1795, Burns enrolled himself among the gentlemen volunteers of Dumfries, and stood shoulder to shoulder with his friends Maxwell, Staig, and Syme. On going home he wrote 'The Dumfries Volunteers.' The song became popular at once, and was soon to be heard on hill and dale; for the peasantry of Scotland sing at the sheepfold and at the plough, and cheer themselves with verse in all ordinary pursuits of life. To extend its influence still farther, he had it printed with the music upon a separate sheet by Johnson, and thus it penetrated into the nobleman's drawing-room as well as into the farmer's spence.

"Some of the allusions are local, and require explanation. If Nith ran to Corsincon, it would run backward, and up hill too. The Criffel is a high green mountain on the Scottish side of the Solway, and is said, in the legends of the district, to be the materials which a witch had collected to choke up the sea, that the English army might walk over dry-shod."—CUNNINGHAM.]

[These tender verses seem to have been inspired as much by Hamilton's song of "Ah! the Shepherd's mournful Fate," as by the charms of Mary. The song is in the fifth volume of Johnson's Musical Museum, and was written for that work by Burns.]

The Highland Widow's Lament.

I.

OH! I am come to the low countrie
Och-on, och-on, och-rie!
Without a penny in my purse,
To buy a meal to me.

II.

It was na sae in the Highland hills,
Och-on, och-on, och-rie!
Nae woman in the country wide
Sae happy was as me.

III.

For then I had a score o' kye,
Och-on, och-on, och-rie!
Feeding on yon hills so high,
And giving milk to me.

IV.

And there I had three score o' yowes,
Och-on, och-on, och-rie!
Skipping on yon bonnie knowes,
And casting woo' to me.

V.

I was the happiest of a' the clan,
Sair, sair may I repine;
For Donald was the brawest man,
And Donald he was mine.

VI.

Till Charlie Steuart cam' at last,
Sae far to set us free;
My Donald's arm was wanted then
For Scotland and for me.

VII.

Their waeifu' fate what need I tell,
Right to the wrang did yield:
My Donald and his Country fell
Upon Culloden-field.

VIII.

Ochon, O, Donald, Oh!
Och-on, och-on, och-rie!
Nae woman in the world wide
Sae wretched now as me.*

Welcome to General Dumourier.

A Parady on Robin Adair.

I.

YOU'RE welcome to despots, Dumourier;
You're welcome to despots, Dumourier;
How does Dampiere, do?
Aye, and Bournonville, too?
Why did they not come along with you, Du-mourier?

II.

I will fight France with you, Dumourier;
I will fight France with you, Dumourier;
I will fight France with you,
I will take my chance with you;
By my soul I'll dance a dance with you, Du-mourier.

III.

Then let us fight about, Dumourier;
Then let us fight about, Dumourier;
Then let us fight about,
Till freedom's spark is out,
Then we'll be damn'd, no doubt, Dumourier.

[One day Burns happened to be in the King's Arms Inn, Dumfries, when he overheard a stranger vindicating the defection of General Dumourier from the ranks of the French army. The Poet presently began to croon words to the tune of Robin Adair, in a low tone of voice: on being asked what he was about, he said he was giving a welcome to General Dumourier, and repeated the above verses. They were inserted in Cromek's Reliques of Burns.]

* ["This song is said to be a homely version of a Highland lament for the ruin which followed the rebellion of the 'forty-five.' Burns heard it sung in one of his northern excursions, and begged a translation. It gives no exaggerated picture of the desolation wrought in the north by the Duke of Cumberland, whose atrocities made the prophecy of Peden be credited—'The day is at hand when a man may ride fifty miles in Scotland, and not see a reeking house, nor hear a crowing cock.' To subdue and root out rebellion was a duty; but 'Butcher Willie,' as the peasantry with great propriety called the duke in accomplishing this, was savage and remorseless. Smollett, who lived in those melancholy times, has given us a lasting picture of the sufferings of his country in his inimitable 'Tears of Scotland,' nor has Sir Walter Scott spared either sympathy for the sufferers, or reproaches on him who was so wantonly barbarous. The castles and homes of the rebels were given to the flames; their cattle driven away, and their wives and children were to be seen roaming, houseless and famishing, among the lonely glens and desolate moors of the north. The execution too of those taken in arms was, beyond all belief, barbarous; they were hung by the neck for five minutes, cut down before they were dead—their bosoms opened and their hearts torn out; several were observed by the bystanders to struggle with the executioner in performing the last part of this terrible tragedy. Human nature shudders at such proceedings; yet the public heart and eye of London must have been hardened that endured the exhibition of the ghastly heads of Lovat, Balmerino, and Kilmarnock, on Temple Bar, for forty years and more!"—CUNNINGHAM.]

Bonnie Peg-a-Ramsay.

Tune—Cauld is the E'enin' Blast.

I.

CAULD is the e'enin' blast
O' Boreas o'er the pool,
And dawin' it is dreary
When birks are bare at Yule.

II.

O cauld blaws the e'enin' blast
When bitter bites the frost,
And in the mirk and dreary drift
The hills and glens are lost.

III.

Ne'er sae murky blew the night
That drifted o'er the hill,
But bonnie Peg-a-Ramsay
Gat grist to her mill.

[This short song was written by Burns for the "Museum," it is adapted to an old Scottish air, called "Bonnie Peg-a-Ramsay," and is as renowned in the amatory songs of the north as

"French Joan or English Mall" are in the martial ballads of France and England. That she was beautiful, and condescending, the fragments of old song still bear evidence:—

"O bonnie Peg-a-Ramsay,
As a half-blin' man may see,
Has a sweet and sonsie look,
And a gleg and glenting e'e."]

There was a bonnie Lass.

AN UNFINISHED SKETCH.

I.

THERE was a bonnie lass,
And a bonnie, bonnie lass,
And she lo'ed her bonnie laddie dear;
Till war's loud alarms
Tore her laddie frae her arms,
Wi mony a sigh and a tear.

II.

Over sea, over shore,
Where the cannons loudly roar,
He still was a stranger to fear;
And nocht could him quail,
Or his bosom assail,
But the bonnie lass he lo'ed sae dear.

[Burns sometimes commenced a song, and, like Milton, "nothing pleased with what he had done," threw it aside, and addressed himself to some other subject or air, to which

"Words came skelpin' rank and file."

This is one of those unfinished snatches—yet not unworthy of preservation: Johnson, therefore, inserted it in the last volume of his "Museum." The words are adapted to the tune of a favourite slow march.]

O Mally's meek, Mally's sweet.

I.

AS I was walking up the street,
A barefit maid I chanc'd to meet;
But O the road was very hard
For that fair maiden's tender feet.

O MALLY'S meek, Mally's sweet,
Mally's modest and discreet,
Mally's rare, Mally's fair,
Mally's every way complete.

II.

It were mair meet, that those fine feet
Were weel lac'd up in silken shoon,
And 'twere more fit that she should sit
Within yon chariot gilt aboon.

III.

Her yellow hair, beyond compare,
Comes trinkling down her swan-white neck;
And her two eyes, like stars in skies,
Would keep a sinking ship frae wreck.

O Mally's meek, Mally's sweet,
Mally's modest and discreet,
Mally's rare, Mally's fair,
Mally's every way complete.

[The above was the last of all the communications of Burns to Johnson's Musical Museum. The Poet was one day walking along the High-street of Dumfries, when he met a young woman from the country, who, with her shoes and stockings packed carefully up, and her petticoats kilted,

"—— which did gently shaw
Her straight bare legs that whiter were than snaw," was proceeding towards the Galloway side of the Nith.

This sight, by no means so unusual then, as now, influenced the muse of Burns, and the result was this exquisite lyric.]

THE
SONGS, AND CORRESPONDENCE OF BURNS

WITH GEORGE THOMSON.

IN the autumn of 1792, Thomson planned his truly elegant and adventurous work, entitled: "A select Collection of original Scottish Airs, for the Voice: to which are added Introductory and Concluding Symphonies and Accompaniments for the Piano-forte and Violin, by Pleyel and Koseluck, with select and characteristic Verses by the most admired Scottish Poets;" and, as Burns was the only poet of that period worthy of the name, he was instantly applied to. He had contributed largely to the "Musical Museum" of Johnson, and was still composing for it: the work of Thomson presented something more worthy of his ambition, and he promised his aid with an enthusiasm and alacrity peculiar to himself. The songs were all to be published with the names of the authors; and, as the new lyrics were sure to be compared with those which they superseded, there was a twofold claim upon the Poet for his purest and happiest musings.

"The undertaking of Thomson," says Currie, "is one on which the public may be congratulated in various points of view; not merely as having collected the finest of the Scottish songs and airs of past times, but as having given occasion to a number of original songs of our Bard, which equal or surpass the former efforts of the pastoral muses of Scotland; and which, if we mistake not, may be safely compared with the lyric poetry of any age or country. The letters of Burns to Thomson include the songs he presented to him, some of which appeared in different stages of their progress; and these letters will be found to exhibit occasionally his notions of song-writing, and his opinions on various subjects of taste and criticism. These opinions, it will be observed, were called forth by the observations of his correspondent; and without the letters of the latter, those of Burns would have been often unintelligible."

"The reasons which influenced Currie in printing the letters of Thomson along with those of the Poet are equally strong now. The opinions of Burns, though generally given spontaneously, were now and then forced from him by the criticisms of his friend: the former always thought and felt as a poet—the latter as a musician; one was chiefly solicitous about the weight of the sense—the other about the beauty of the sound. The poetry which is written for music must, it is true, be measured in another way than that which is for perusal only. The emphatic notes of the music must find an echo in the emphatic words of the verse; and words soft and liquid are far fitter for ladies' lips than words rough and hissing. It is nevertheless certain that language at once emphatic and harmonious is not easily summoned into lyric verse; and it is quite as true that, in substituting a melodious for a harsher word, the sentiment is often crushed out by the experiment. A certain happiness of language as well as of thought is demanded by the lyric muse, and no one had this in greater perfection than Burns."—CUNNINGHAM.

George Thomson, Esq.

Respecting this distinguished friend and correspondent of Burns, the following interesting Auto-biographical notice appears in the "Land of Burns," and is addressed to Robert Chambers, Esq., one of the Editors of that splendid work.

TRUSTEES' OFFICE, EDINBURGH,

March 29th, 1838.

"DEAR SIR,

"To your request that I should furnish you with a few particulars respecting my personal history, I really know not well what to say, because my life has been too unimportant to merit much notice. It is in connection with National Music and Song, and my correspondence on that subject with Burns, chiefly, that I can have any reasonable hope of being occasionally spoken of. I shall therefore content myself with a brief sketch of what belongs to my personal history, and then proceed to the subject of Scottish Music and Burns.

"I was born at Limekilns, in Fife, about the year 1759, as I was informed, for I can scarce believe I am so old. My father taught a school there, and having been invited, in that capacity, to the town of Banff, he carried me thither in my very early years, instructed me in the elementary branches of knowledge, and sent me to learn the dead languages at what was called the grammar school. He had a hard struggle to maintain an increasing family, and, after trying some mercantile means of enlarging his income, without success, he moved with his family to Edinburgh, when I was about seventeen. In a short time I got into a Writer to the Signet's office as a Clerk, and remained in that capacity with him, and another W.S., till the year 1780, when, through the influence of Mr. John Home, Author of 'Douglas,' with one of the Members of the Honourable Board of Trustees, I was recommended to that Board, and became their Junior Clerk. Not long after, upon the death of their Principal Clerk, I succeeded to his situation, Mr. Robert Arbuthnot being then their Secretary; under whom, and afterwards under Sir William, his son and successor, I have served the Board for upwards of half a century; enjoying their fullest confidence, and the entire approbation of both Secretaries, whose gentlemanly manners and kind dispositions were such, (for I never saw a frown on their brows, nor heard an angry word escape from their lips) that I can say, with heart-felt gratitude to their memory, and to all my superiors, in this the 58th year of my Clerkship, that I never have felt the word servitude to mean any thing in the least mortifying or unpleasant, but quite the reverse.

"In my 25th year, I married Miss Miller, whose father was a Lieutenant in the 50th Regiment, and her mother the daughter of a most respectable gentleman in Berwick-shire, George Peter, Esq., of Chapel, and this was the wisest act of my life. She is happily still living, and has presented me with six daughters, and two sons, the elder of the two being now a Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers, and the other an Assistant-Commissary-General.

"From my boyhood I had a passion for the sister arts of music and painting, which I have ever since continued to cherish, in the society of the ablest professors of both arts. Having studied the violin, it was my custom, after the hours of business, to con over our Scottish melodies, and to devour the choruses of Handel's oratorios; in which, when performed at St. Cecilia's hall, I generally took a part, along with a few other gentlemen, Mr. Alexander Wight, one of the most eminent counsel at the bar, Mr. Gilbert Innes, of Stow, Mr. John Russel, W.S., Mr. John Hutton, &c.; it being then not uncommon for grave amateurs to assist at the St. Cecilia concerts, one of the most interesting and liberal musical institutions that ever existed in Scotland, or indeed in any country. I had so much delight in singing those matchless chorusses, and in practising the violin quartettes of Pleyel and Haydn that it was with joy I hailed the hour when, like the young amateur in the good old Scotch song, I could hie me hame to my Cremona, and enjoy Haydn's admirable fancies.

* I still was pleas'd where'er I went, and when I was alone,
I screw'd my pegs and pleas'd myself with John o' Badenyon.'

"At the St. Cecilia concerts I heard Scottish songs sung in a style of excellence far surpassing any idea which I previously had of their beauty, and that, too, from Italians, Signor Tenducci the one, and Signora Domenica Corri the other. Tenducci's 'I'll never leave thee,' and 'Braes of Ballenden;' and the Signora's 'Ewebughts, Marion,' and 'Waly, waly,' so delighted every hearer that in the most crowded room not a whisper was to be heard, so entirely did they rivet the attention and admiration of the audience. Tenducci's singing was full of passion, feeling, and taste; and, what we hear very rarely from singers, his articulation of the words was no less perfect than his expression of the music. It was in consequence of my hearing him and Signora Corri sing a number of our songs, so charmingly, that I conceived the idea of collecting all our best melodies and songs, and of obtaining accompaniments to them worthy of their merit.

"On examining with great attention the various collections on which I could by any means lay my hands, I found them all more or less exceptionable, a sad mixture of good and evil, the pure and the impure. The melodies in general were without any symphonies to introduce and conclude them; and the accompaniments (for the piano only) meagre and common-place:—while the verses united with the melodies were in a great many instances coarse and vulgar, the productions of a rude age, and such as could not be tolerated or sung in good society.

"Many copies of the same melody both in print and manuscript, differing more or less from each other, came under my view: and after a minute comparison of copies, and hearing them sung over and over by such of my fair friends as I knew to be most conversant with them, I chose that set or copy of each air which I found the most simple and beautiful.

"For obtaining accompaniments to the Airs, and also Symphonies to introduce and conclude each air—a most interesting appendage to the airs that had not before graced any of the collections, I turned my eyes first on Pleyel, whose compositions were remarkably popular and pleasing: and afterwards, when I had resolved to extend my work into a complete collection of all the Airs that were worthy of preservation, I divided them in different portions, and sent them from time to time to Haydn, to Beethoven, to Weber, Hummel, &c., the greatest musicians then flourishing in Europe. These Artists, to my inexpressible satisfaction, proceeded con amore with their respective portions of the work, and in the Symphonies, which are original and characteristic creations of their own, as well as in their judicious and delicate accompaniments for the Piano-forte, and for the Violin, Flute, and Violoncello, they exceeded my most sanguine expectations, and obtained the decided approval of the best judges. Their compositions have been pronounced by the Edinburgh Review to be wholly unrivalled for originality and beauty.

"The poetry became next the subject of my anxious consideration, and engaged me in a far more extensive Correspondence than I had ever anticipated, which occupied nearly the whole of my leisure for many years. For, although a small portion of the melodies had long been united with excellent songs, yet a much greater number stood matched with such unworthy associates as to render a divorce, and a new union, absolutely necessary.

"Fortunately for the melodies, I turned my eyes towards Robert Burns, who no sooner was informed of my plan and wishes, than, with all the frankness, generosity, and enthusiasm, which marked his character, he undertook to write whatever Songs I wanted for my work; but in answer to my promise of remuneration, he declared, in the most emphatic terms, that he would receive nothing of the kind! He proceeded with the utmost alacrity to execute what he had undertaken, and from the year 1792 till the time of his death, in 1796, I continued to receive his exquisitely beautiful compositions for the melodies I had sent him from time to time: and, in order that nothing should be wanting which might suit my work, he empowered me to make use of all the other songs that he had written for Johnson's Scots Musical Museum, &c. My work thus contains above One hundred and twenty of his inimitable songs; besides many of uncommon beauty that I obtained from Thomas Campbell, Professor Smyth, Sir Walter Scott, Joanna Baillie, and other admired Poets: together with the best songs of the olden time."

[The remainder of this communication, containing his defence against semi-anonymous slanderers, will be found at the close of the Correspondence.]

No. I.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, September, 1792.

SIR:

FOR some years past I have, with a friend or two, employed many leisure hours in selecting and collating the most favourite of our national melodies for publication. We have engaged Pleyel, the most agreeable composer living, to put accompaniments to these, and also to compose an instrumental prelude and conclusion to each air, the better to fit them for concerts, both public and private. To render this work perfect, we are desirous to have the poetry improved, wherever it seems unworthy of the music; and that it is so, in many instances, is allowed by every one conversant with our musical collections. The editors of these seem in general to have depended on the music proving an excuse for the verses; and hence, some charming melodies are united to mere nonsense and doggerel, while others are accommodated with rhymes so loose and indelicate as cannot be sung in decent company. To remove this reproach would be an easy task to the author of the "Cotter's Saturday Night;" and, for the honour of Caledonia, I would fain hope he may be induced to take up the pen. If so, we shall be enabled to present the public with a collection, infinitely more interesting than any that has yet appeared, and acceptable to all persons of taste, whether they wish for correct melodies, delicate accompaniments,—or characteristic verses.—We will esteem your poetical assistance a particular favour, besides paying any reasonable price you shall please to demand for it.—Profit is quite a secondary consideration with us, and we are resolved to spare neither pains nor expense on the publication. Tell me frankly, then, whether you will devote your leisure to writing twenty or twenty-five songs, suited to the particular melodies which I am prepared to send you. A few songs, exceptionable only in some of their verses, I will likewise submit to your consideration; leaving it to you either to mend these, or make new songs in their stead. It is superfluous to assure you that I have no intention to displace any of the sterling old songs; those only will be removed which appear quite silly, or absolutely indecent. Even these shall be all examined by Mr. Burns, and, if he is of opinion that any of them are deserving of the music, in such cases no divorce shall take place.

Relying on the letter accompanying this, to be forgiven for the liberty I have taken in addressing you, I am, with great esteem, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

G. THOMSON.

No. II.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Dumfries, 16th Sept. 1792.

SIR:

I HAVE just this moment got your letter. As the request you make to me will positively add to my enjoyments in complying with it, I shall enter into your undertaking with all the small portion of abilities I have, strained to their utmost exertion by the impulse of enthusiasm.—Only, don't hurry me: "Deil tak the hindmost" is by no means the cri de guerre of my muse. Will you, as I am inferior to none of you in enthusiastic attachment to the poetry and music of old Caledonia, and, since you request it, have cheerfully promised my mite of assistance—will you let me have a list of your airs with the first line of the printed verses you intend for them, that I may have an opportunity of suggesting any alteration that may occur to me? You know 'tis in the way of my trade; still leaving you, gentlemen, the undoubted right of publishers to approve or reject, at your pleasure, for your own publication.—Apropos! if you are for English verses, there is, on my part, an end of the matter. Whether in the simplicity of the ballad, or the pathos of the song, I can only hope to please myself in being allowed at least a sprinkling of our native tongue. English verses, particularly the works of Scotsmen, that have merit, are certainly very eligible. “Tweedside!”—“Ah! the poor shepherd’s mournful fate!”—“Ah! Chloris, could I now but sit,” &c. you cannot mend:—but such insipid stuff as “To Fanny fair could I impart,” &c., usually set to “The Mill, Mill, O!” is a disgrace to the collections in which it has already appeared, and would doubly disgrace a collection that will have the very superior merit of yours. But more of this in the farther prosecution of the business, if I am called on for my strictures and amendments—I say amendments; for I will not alter except where I myself, at least, think that I amend.

As to any remuneration, you may think my songs either above or below price; for they shall absolutely be the one or the other. In the honest enthusiasm with which I embark in your undertaking, to talk of money, wages, fee, hire, &c., would be downright prostitution* of soul! A proof of each of the songs that I compose or amend, I shall receive as a favour. In the rustic phrase of the season, “Gude speed the wark!” I am, Sir, your very humble servant,
R. BURNS.

P. S.—I have some particular reasons for wishing my interference to be known as little as possible.

[“At the time of the commencement of this correspondence, Scottish songs were but little regarded. Ramsay’s Miscellany was deformed by innumerable vulgarities: Herd’s collection, though curious, was chiefly interesting to the antiquary; and Johnson’s Museum, great as its merits were, both in verse and music, had not become popular. Thomson perceived this, and set about supplying the deficiency with considerable taste and skill. His chief ally was Burns. In music Pleyel ranks high, but no one can help feeling that his symphonies and accompaniments now and then encumber the music they were intended to adorn. The extreme simplicity of our northern airs is hurt by these embellishments, as a Doric temple would be injured by a Corinthian portico, or the Venus de Medici with bracelets of gold and diamonds on her arms, and drops at her ears.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

[* We have been informed that Burns marked his loathing of remuneration by the use of even a stronger term than this, which was substituted by the original Editor.—CHAMBERS.]

No. III.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 13th Oct. 1792.

DEAR SIR:

I RECEIVED, with much satisfaction, your pleasant and obliging letter, and I return my warmest acknowledgments for the enthusiasm with which you have entered into our undertaking. We have now no doubt of being able to produce a collection highly deserving of public attention in all respects.

I agree with you in thinking English verses, that have merit, very eligible, wherever new verses are necessary; because the English becomes, every year, more and more the language of Scotland; but if you mean that no English verses, except those by Scottish authors, ought to be admitted, I am half inclined to differ from you. I should consider it unpardonable to sacrifice one good song in the Scottish dialect, to make room for English verses; but, if we can select a few excellent ones suited to the unprovided or ill-provided airs, would it not be the very bigotry of literary patriotism to reject such, merely because the authors were born south of the Tweed? Our sweet air, “My Nannie, O,” which in the collections is joined to the poorest stuff that Allan Ramsay ever wrote, beginning, “While some for pleasure pawn their health,” answers so finely to Dr. Percy’s beautiful song, “O Nancy, wilt thou go with me,” that one would think he wrote it on purpose for the air. However, it is not at all our wish to confine you to English verses: you shall freely be allowed a sprinkling of your native tongue, as you elegantly express it; and moreover, we will patiently await your own time. One thing only I beg, which is, that however gay and sportive the muse may be, she may always be decent. Let her not write what beauty would blush to speak, nor wound that charming delicacy which forms the most precious dowry of our daughters. I do not conceive the song to be the most proper vehicle for witty and brilliant conceits: simplicity, I believe, should be its prominent feature; but, in some of our songs, the writers have confounded simplicity with coarseness and vulgarity; although between the one and the other, as Dr. Beattie well observes, there is as great a difference as between a plain suit of clothes and a bundle of rags. The humorous ballad, or pathetic complaint, is best suited to our artless melodies; and more interesting, indeed, in all songs, than the most pointed wit, dazzling descriptions, and flowery fancies.

With these trite observations, I send you eleven of the songs, for which it is my wish to substitute others of your writing. I shall soon transmit the rest, and, at the same time, a prospectus of the whole collection; and you may believe we will receive any hints that you are so kind as to give, for improving the work, with the greatest pleasure and thankfulness.—

I remain, dear Sir, &c.

G. THOMSON.

No. IV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

MY DEAR SIR:

LET me tell you that you are too fastidious in your ideas of songs and ballads. I own that your criticisms are just; the songs you specify in your list have, all but one, the faults you remark in them; but who shall mend the matter? Who shall rise up and say—Go to, I will make a better? For instance, on reading over the “The Lea-rig,” I immediately set about trying my hand on it, and, after all, I could make nothing more of it than the following, which, Heaven knows, is poor enough:—

My ain kind Dearie, O.

Tune—“The Lea-Rig.”

I.

When o'er the hill the eastern star
Tells bughtin-time is near, my jo;
And owsen frae the furrow'd field
Return sae dowf and weary, O;
Down by the burn, where scented birks*
Wi' dew are hanging clear, my jo;
I'll meet thee on the lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O!

II.

In mirkest glen, at midnight hour,
I'd rove, and ne'er be eerie, O;

If thro' that glen I gaed to thee,
My ain kind dearie, O!
Altho' the night were ne'er sae wild,†
And I were ne'er sae wearie, O,
I'd meet thee on thee lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O!

III.

The hunter lo'es the morning sun,
To rouse the mountain deer, my jo;
At noon the fisher seeks the glen,
Along the burn to steer, my jo;
Gie me the hour o' gloamin grey,
It maks my heart sae cheery, O,
To meet thee on the lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O! ‡

Your observation as to the aptitude of Dr Percy's ballad to the air, “Nannie, O,” is just. It is besides, perhaps, the most beautiful ballad in the English language. But let me remark to you, that in the sentiment and style of our Scottish airs there is a pastoral simplicity, a something that one may call the Doric style and dialect of vocal music, to which a dash of our native tongue and manners is particularly, nay peculiarly, apposite. For this reason, and, upon my honour, for this reason alone, I am of opinion (but, as I told you before, my opinion is yours, freely yours, to approve or reject, as you please) that my ballad of “Nannie, O!” might perhaps do for one set of verses to the tune. Now don't let it enter into your head that you are under any necessity of taking my verses. I have long ago made up my mind as to my own reputation in the business of authorship; and have nothing to be pleased or offended at, in your adoption or rejection of my verses. Though you should reject one half of what I give you, I shall be pleased with your

* [VAR.—For “scented birks,” in some copies, “birken buds.”]

† [“In the copy transmitted to Mr. Thomson, instead of wild, was inserted wet. But in one of the manuscripts, probably written afterwards, wet was changed into wild—evidently a great improvement. The lovers might meet on the lea-rig, ‘although the night were ne'er so wild,’ that is, although the summer-wind blew, the sky lowered, and the thunder murmured; such circumstances might render their meeting still more interesting. But if the night were actually wet, why should they meet on the lea-rig? On a wet night, the imagination cannot contemplate their situation there with any complacency. Tibullus, and after him Hammond, has conceived a happier situation for lovers on a wet night. Probably Burns had in his mind the verse of an old Scottish song, in which wet and weary are naturally enough conjoined:

‘When my ploughman comes hame at e'en,
He's often wet and weary:
Cast off the wet, put on the dry,
And gae to bed, my deary.’—CURRIE.]

‡ The original or old name of this song was the Ware-horse. [“Burns and Fergusson,” says Mr. Buchan, “have exerted their skill to make words worthy of so fine an air; but my great grandmother's way ran thus:

‘I hae been at the ware-horse,
Till I am wet and weary, O;
Cast off the wet, put on the dry,
Come to your bed, my deary, O.’

I'll row you up, I'll row you down,
And row till I be weary, O;
I'll row you on the lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O.

But how are ye sae bauld, sir,
And you my father's cotter, O;
As row me on the lea-rig,
And me his eldest dochter, O?

As row me up, and row me down,
And row till I be weary, O;
And row me on the lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O.

Then tho' the night be ne'er sae dark
And I be wet and weary, O!
I'll hap you in my petticoat,
My ain kind dearie, O.

Then row me up, and row me down,
And row till ye be weary, O;
And row me on the lea-rig,
My ain kind dearie, O.’

“To those unacquainted with the term or name of ware-horse, it may be necessary to add, by way of explanation, that along the rocky and steep coast of the east of Scotland the adjoining lands were manured with a kind of sea-weed, called ware, which was carried on the backs of dwarf horses in wooden creels or curroches, and led by the young women belonging to the farm.—The men's duty was to gather it from the sea, load the horses, and afterwards spread it on the land.”] adopting the other half, and shall continue to serve you with the same assiduity.

In the printed copy of my "Nannie, O," the name of the river is horribly prosaic. I will alter it:

"Behind yon hills where Lugar flows."

Girvan is the name of the river that suits the idea of the stanza best, but Lugar is the most agreeable modulation of syllables.

I will soon give you a great many more remarks on this business; but I have just now an opportunity of conveying you this scrawl, free of postage, an expense that it is ill able to pay: so, with my best compliments to honest Allan, Gude be wi' ye, &c. R. B.

Friday Night.

Saturday Morning.

As I find I have still an hour to spare this morning before my conveyance goes away, I will give you "Nannie, O!" at length. (vide p.347)

Your remarks on "Ewe-bughts, Marion," are just; still it has obtained a place among our more classical Scottish songs; and, what with many beauties in its composition, and more prejudices in its favour, you will not find it easy to supplant it.

In my very early years, when I was thinking of going to the West Indies, I took the following farewell of a dear girl. It is quite trifling, and has nothing of the merits of "Ewe-bughts;" but it will fill up this page. You must know that all my earlier love-songs were the breathings of ardent passion, and though it might have been easy in after-times to have given them a polish, yet that polish, to me, whose they were, and who perhaps alone cared for them, would have defaced the legend of my heart, which was so faithfully inscribed on them. Their uncouth simplicity was, as they say of wines, their race.

Will you go to the Indies, my Mary?

Tune—"Ewe-bughts."

TO MARY CAMPBELL.

I.

WILL ye go to the Indies, my Mary,*
And leave auld Scotia's shore?
Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary,
Across th' Atlantic's roar?

* [The first line of this song seems to have been taken from an old Irish one, beginning,—

"Will ye go to Dublin, my Molly?"]

† [This song Mr. Thomson has not adopted in his collection. It deserves, however, to be preserved.—CURRIE.]

‡ [There are many sets of this old song on which this one is framed, to be found both in print and on the breath of tradition. In Herd's Collection, vol. ii. p. 230, we have the following version:—

II.

O sweet grows the lime and the orange,
And the apple on the pine;
But a' the charms o' the Indies
Can never equal thine.

III.

I hae sworn by the Heavens to my Mary,
I hae sworn by the Heavens to be true;
And sae may the Heavens forget me,
When I forget my vow!

IV.

O plight me your faith, my Mary,
And plight me your lily-white hand;
O plight me your faith, my Mary,
Before I leave Scotia's strand.

V.

We hae plighted our troth, my Mary,
In mutual affection to join;
And curst be the cause that shall part us!
The hour and the moment o' time! †

"Galla Water," and "Auld Rob Morris," I think, will most probably be the next subject of my musings. However, even on my verses, speak out your criticisms with equal frankness. My wish is, not to stand aloof, the uncomplaining bigot of opiniâtrêté, but cordially to join issue with you in the furtherance of the work.

No. V.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

November 8th, 1792.

If you mean, my dear Sir, that all the songs in your collection shall be poetry of the first merit, I am afraid you will find more difficulty in the undertaking than you are aware of. There is a peculiar rhythmus in many of our airs, and a necessity for adapting syllables to the emphasis, or what I would call the feature-notes of the tune, that cramp the poet, and lay him under almost insuperable difficulties. For instance, in the air, "My wife's a wanton wee thing," if a few lines smooth and pretty can be adapted to it, it is all you can expect. The following were made extempore to it; and though, on farther study, I might give you something more profound, yet it might not suit the light-horse gallop of the air so well as this random clink:—

My Wife's a winsome wee Thing. †

I.

SHE is a winsome wee thing,
She is a handsome wee thing,

"My wife's a wanton wee thing,
My wife's a wanton wee thing,
My wife's a wanton wee thing;
She'll never be guided by me.

She play'd the loon e'er she was married,
She play'd the loon e'er she was married,
She play'd the loon e'er she was married;
She'll do't again e'er she die."

The traditional copies celebrate the virtues and vices of a pigmy drunken wife.—M.]

She is a bonnie wee thing,
This sweet wee wife o' mine.

II.

I never saw a fairer,
I never lo'ed a dearer;
And neist my heart I'll wear her,
For fear my jewel tine.

III.

She is a winsome wee thing,
She is a handsome wee thing,
She is a bonnie wee thing,
This sweet wee wife o' mine.

IV.

The world's wrack we share o't,
The warstle and the care o't;
Wi' her I'll blythly bear it,
And think my lot divine.

I have just been looking over the "Collier's bonny Dochter;" and if the following rhapsody, which I composed the other day, on a charming Ayr-shire girl, Miss Lesley Baillie (afterwards Mrs. Cuming, of Logie), as she passed through this place to England, will suit your taste better than the "Collier Lassie,"—fall on and welcome:—

Bonnie Lesley.*

I.

O saw ye bonnie Lesley,
As she gaed o'er the border?
She's gane, like Alexander,
To spread her conquests farther.

II.

To see her is to love her,
And love but her for ever;
For Nature made her what she is,
And never made another!

III.

Thou art a queen, fair Lesley,
Thy subjects we, before thee:
Thou art divine, fair Lesley,
The hearts o' men adore thee.

* [The last word in the third line of this song gave Mr. Thomson some uneasiness. He wished some other word to take the rank and precedence of Alexander; but Burns, true to his post, would not yield to the dictation of the critic. He perhaps was right; and, at any rate, can claim for precedent the great Marquis of Montrose, who, in one of his songs, says:—

"As Alexander I will reign,
And I will reign alone;
My thoughts did evermore disdain
A rival on my throne."

The Poet, in a letter to Mrs. Dunlop, dated August, 1792, describes the influence which the beauty of Miss Lesley Baillie exercised over his imagination. "Know then," said he, "that the heart-struck awe, the distant humble approach, the delight we should have in gazing upon and listening to a messenger of Heaven, appearing in all the unspotted purity

IV.

The Deil he could na scaith thee,
Nor aught that wad belang thee;
He'd look into thy bonnie face,
And say, "I canna wrang thee."

V.

The powers aboon will tent thee;
Misfortune sha' na steer thee:
Thou'rt like thyselfsae lovely,
That ill they'll ne'er let near thee.

VI.

Return again, fair Lesley,
Return to Caledonie!
That we may brag we hae a lass
There's name again sae bonnie.

I have hitherto deferred the sublimer, more pathetic airs, until more leisure, as they will take, and deserve, a greater effort. However, they are all put into your hands, as clay into the hands of the potter, to make one vessel to honour, and another to dishonour.—Farewell, &c. R. B.

No. VI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Highland Mary.

Tune—Katherine Ogie.

I.

YE banks, and braes, and streams around
The castle o' Montgomery,
Green be your woods, and fair your flowers,
Your waters never drumlie!
There simmer first unfaulds her robes,
And there the langest tarry;
For there I took the last fareweel
O' my sweet Highland Mary.

II.

How sweetly bloom'd the gay green birk!
How rich the hawthorn's blossom!
As underneath their fragrant shade,
I clasp'd her to my bosom!

of his celestial home, among the coarse, polluted, far inferior sons of men, to deliver to them tidings that make their hearts swim in joy, and their imaginations soar in transport—such, so delighting and so pure, were the emotions of my soul on meeting the other day with Miss Lesley Baillie, your neighbour. Mr. Baillie, with his two daughters, accompanied by Mr. H. of G., passing through Dumfries a few days ago, on their way to England, did me the honour of calling on me; on which I took my horse (though God knows I could ill spare the time,) and accompanied them fourteen or fifteen miles, and dined and spent the day with them. 'Twas about nine, I think, when I left them; and riding home, I composed the following ballad." You must know that there is an old one beginning with:—

My bonnie Lizzie Baillie,
I'll rowe thee in my plaidie, &c.

So I parodied it as above. R. B.

The golden hours, on angel wings,
Flew o'er me and my dearie ;
For dear to me, as light and life,
Was my sweet Highland Mary !

III.

Wi' mony a vow, and lock'd embrace,
Our parting was fu' tender ;
And, pledging aft to meet again,
We tore oursel's asunder ;
But, oh ! fell Death's untimely frost,
That nipt my flower sae early !—

* [In the notes to "My Highland Lassie, O," and "To Mary in Heaven," as well as in the Life of Burns, not a little has been said of Highland Mary, of whose loveliness and too early death the Poet sung with so much beauty and pathos. The following interesting particulars have been communicated by John Kerr, Esq., writer in Glasgow:—

"The parents of Highland Mary lived in Greenock, and she crossed the firth of Clyde to visit some relations in Cowal, previous to her marriage. Her father was a mariner; had two sons, Archibald and Robert; and, besides Mary, a daughter, named Anne, who married James Anderson, a stone-mason. All these individuals are now dead: Mary was not long outlived by her father and brothers: her mother died in great poverty in the year 1828. The representatives of Highland Mary, therefore, now consist of Anderson's children—two sons and two daughters. Mary, it appears, was not hurried to the grave immediately after her return from Cowal: she lived several weeks with her father, and every week received a letter from her lover. The circumstance of a girl in her humble condition receiving a letter weekly excited the curiosity of the neighbours: the secret was carefully hunted out, and one of the gossips informed her father and mother that Mary was in the habit of receiving letters from a person named Burns, who was known to be a strange character, and 'a great scoffer at women.' Mary was questioned on the subject, and admitted the correspondence, laughing heartily at the description of her lover, whose scoffing, she said, she was ready to trust to. After this, Mary was allowed to receive her letters openly: one of them, it appears, contained the song of 'The Highland Lassie, O;' for her mother got it by heart from the Poet's correspondence, and, in her declining years, soothed her grand-children with strains which recorded the charms of her favourite daughter.

"It is to be regretted that none of these letters are now in existence. After Mary's death, her father disliked all allusions to her or her lover; and when Burns wrote a moving letter, requesting some memorial of her he loved so dearly, the stern old man neither answered it, nor allowed any one to speak about it in his presence. His grand-children can sing some scraps of the songs which he wrote in the praise of their aunt; and these, save the Bible presented to her by the Poet, are all that the relatives of Highland Mary have to bear testimony of the love that was between her and Burns.

"Before the 'last farewell,' commemorated in the song of 'Highland Mary,' was taken, the lovers plighted mutual faith, and, exchanging Bibles, stood, with a running stream between, and, lifting up its waters in their hands, vowed love while the woods of Montgomery grew and its waters ran. The spot where this took place is still pointed out. Mary's Bible was of the commonest kind, and consisted of one volume only—that of Burns was elegantly bound, and consisted of two volumes. In the first volume he had written,

—And ye shall not swear by my name falsely—I am the Lord. Levit. chap. xiv., v. 12.—In the second—Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oath. St. Matth. chap. v., v. 33' and on a blank leaf of both volumes, 'Robert Burns, Mossiel.' By the death of Mary, this Bible came into the possession of her mother, who, about twelve years ago, gave it to her only surviving daughter, Mrs. Anderson. The circumstance of its being in two volumes seemed, at one period, to threaten its dismemberment; for, upwards of five years since, Mrs. Anderson presented a volume to each of her two daughters; but on the approaching marriage of these two females sometime afterwards, her eldest son, William Anderson, a mason in Renton, prevailed upon each of his sisters to dispose of the volumes they had received to him; and thus both volumes, once more united, now remain in the custody of the senior

Now green's the sod, and cauld's the clay,
That wraps my Highland Mary !

IV.

Oh pale, pale now, those rosy lips,
I aft hae kiss'd sae fondly !
And clos'd for aye the sparkling glance
That dwelt on me sae kindly !
And mouldering now in silent dust
That heart that lo'ed me dearly—
But still within my bosom's core
Shall live my Highland Mary ! *

nephew of Highland Mary. The sacred verses we have quoted above remain in the bold, distinct hand-writing of the Poet; but his signature, on the opposite leaves, is almost wholly obliterated. In the first volume, a masonic emblem, drawn by Burns, below his signature, is in complete preservation. Mr. William Anderson is also possessed of a pretty large lock of his aunt, Highland Mary's, hair, a portion of which he presented to us, as a relic of the Bard's first love.

"We now come to another era in the history of this Bible. Mr. Archibald, schoolmaster, in Largs, an admirer of Burns, and a votary of the Scottish muse, waited, it is said, on old widow Campbell, some time before her death, for the purpose of purchasing the volumes. He learnt, however, that she was a pauper on the roll of the Kirk Session of Greenock, who, in consequence, were entitled to take possession of her little property as soon as death removed her from this world; but in the mean time, to secure a right to them, he is said to have bargained with her that he should become the possessor of the volumes when that event took place, at such a price as might be agreed upon between him and the Session. In February last, Mr. Archibald, having heard that the Bible had found its way into the custody of one of the elders, presented the following memorial to the Session:—

"Your Memorialist will not presume to dictate to your Reverend Body what you may or ought to do with the Bible. He takes leave, however, to say, that if you do not see fit to retain them as public property, estimable to the people of Greenock, in consequence of the historical circumstances connected with these volumes, having been within their locality, he, the Memorialist, will be proud to be one of those who will gladly come forward to offer you a handsome sum of money for behoof of the poor, for the possession of the Sacred Pledges of Burns' purest affection. He has no doubt that many will compete with him in the generous strife of obtaining the books, and that, if you see fit in this way to raise it, a considerable sum may be realized for the necessities of the poor."

"On this memorial the Session pronounced the following judgment upon it:—

"The Kirk Session of the Old Parish of Greenock, with their Heritors, being met—inter alia, the Kirk Treasurer laid before the meeting a letter from Mr. Joseph J. Archibald, teacher at Largs, containing an offer of £10 for the effects (including furniture, books, &c. &c.) left by widow Campbell, mother to Burns' Highland Mary, which effects became the property of the Kirk Session, in consequence of the said Widow Campbell being, for several years, a pauper on their roll. The Session agreed to resign their hypothec in said effects to and in favour of the said Mr. Joseph J. Archibald, for the aforesaid sum of £10, and authorize their clerk to intimate this to him.

"Notwithstanding the grave and formal tenor of this resolution, we suspect that the Bible is the unquestionable property of its present possessor, and, if the account we have received of his character and conduct approach the truth, he is well worthy of remaining their custodian in perpetuity."

[Mr. Joseph J. Archibald, alluded to in the preceding narrative, had the Bibles for a considerable time in his possession, and deposited them, along with a lock of Mary's hair, for some time in the hands of Mr. Crawford, Dalry, Ayr-shire, who still retains a small portion of the hair. Archibald was afterwards in the employment of Dr. Kirk, late of Greenock, now of Glasgow, where he fell ill, and his mother went from Dalry to nurse him. On his death, inquiry was made after the Bibles, but they were no where to be found. It is therefore impossible to say into whose possession these precious relics have found their way.]

14th November, 1792.

MY DEAR SIR :

I AGREE with you that the song, "Katherine Ogie," is very poor stuff, and unworthy, altogether unworthy, of so beautiful an air. I tried to mend it; but the awkward sound, Ogie, recurring so often in the rhyme, spoils every attempt at introducing sentiment into the piece. The foregoing song pleases myself; I think it is in my happiest manner: you will see at first glance that it suits the air. The subject of the song is one of the most interesting passages of my youthful days; and I own that I should be much flattered to see the verses set to an air which would ensure celebrity. Perhaps, after all, 'tis the still glowing prejudice of my heart that throws a borrowed lustre over the merits of the composition.

I have partly taken your idea of "Auld Rob Morris." I have adopted the first two verses, and am going on with the song on a new plan, which promises pretty well. I take up one or another, just as the bee of the moment buzzes in my bonnet-lug; and do you, sans ceremonie, make what use you choose of the productions.—Adieu, &c. R. B.

No. VII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, Nov. 1792.

DEAR SIR :

I WAS just going to write to you, that on meeting with your Nannie, I had fallen violently in love with her. I thank you, therefore, for sending the charming rustic to me, in the dress you wish her to appear before the public. She does you great credit, and will soon be admitted into the best company.

I regret that your song for the "Lea-rig" is so short; the air is easy, soon sung, and very pleasing: so that, if the singer stops at the end of two stanzas, it is a pleasure lost ere it is well possessed.*

Although a dash of our native tongue and manners is doubtless peculiarly congenial and appropriate to our melodies, yet I shall be able to present a considerable number of the very Flowers of English Song, well adapted to these melodies, which, in England at least, will be the means of recommending them to still greater attention than they have procured there. But, you will observe, my plan is, that every air shall in the first place have verses wholly by Scottish poets; and that those of English writers shall follow as additional songs, for the choice of the singer.

* ["The fashion of the day, however, is short songs. At present nothing can be tolerated in the way of a song above a couple of stanzas."]—MOTHERWELL.]

What you say of the "Ewe-bughts" is just; I admire it, and never meant to supplant it.—All I requested was, that you would try your hand on some of the inferior stanzas, which are apparently no part of the original song; but this I do not urge, because the song is of sufficient length, though those inferior stanzas be omitted, as they will be by the singer of taste. You must not think I expect all the songs to be of superlative merit: that were an unreasonable expectation. I am sensible that no poet can sit down doggedly to pen verses, and succeed well, at all times.

I am highly pleased with your humorous and amorous rhapsody on "Bonnie Lesley;" it is a thousand times better than the "Collier's Lassie." "The deil he cou'd na scaith thee," &c. is an eccentric and happy thought. Do you not think, however, that the names of such old heroes as Alexander sound rather queer, unless in pompous or mere burlesque verse? Instead of the line, "And never made anither," I would humbly suggest, "And ne'er made sic anither," and I would fain have you substitute some other line for "Return to Caledonie," in the last verse, because I think this alteration of the orthography, and of the sound of Caledonia, disfigures the word, and renders it Hudibrastic.

Of the other song—"My Wife's a Winsome wee Thing," I think the first eight lines very good: but I do not admire the other eight, because four of them are a bare repetition of the first verse. I have been trying to spin a stanza, but could make nothing better than the following: do you mend it, or, as Yorick did with the love-letter, whip it up in your own way:—

O leeze me on my wee thing,
My bonnie blithsome wee thing;
Sae lang 's I hae my wee thing,
I'll think my lot divine.

Tho' world's care we share o't,
And may see meikle mair o't,
Wi' her I'll blithely bear it,
And ne'er a word repine.

You perceive, my dear Sir, I avail myself of the liberty, which you condescend to allow me, by speaking freely what I think. Be assured, it is not my disposition to pick out the faults of any poem or picture I see: my first and chief object is to discover and be delighted with the beauties of the piece. If I sit down to examine critically, and at leisure, what, perhaps, you have written in haste, I may happen to observe careless lines, the re-perusal of which might lead you to improve them. The wren will often see what has been overlooked by the eagle.—I remain yours faithfully, &c. G. T.

P.S. Your verses upon "Highland Mary" are just come to hand; they breathe the genuine spirit of poetry, and, like the music, will last for ever. Such verses, united to such an air, with the delicate harmony of Pleyel super-added, might form a treat worthy of being presented to Apollo himself. I have heard the sad story of your Mary: you always seem inspired when you write of her.

No. VIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Dumfries, 1st Dec. 1792.

YOUR alterations of my "Nannie, O," are perfectly right. So are those of "My Wife's a winsome wee thing." Your alteration of the second stanza is a positive improvement. Now, my dear sir, with the freedom which characterizes our correspondence, I must not, cannot, alter "Bonnie Lesley." You are right, the word "Alexander" makes the line a little uncouth, but I think the thought is pretty. Of Alexander, beyond all other heroes, it may be said, in the sublime language of Scripture, that "he went forth conquering and to conquer."

"For nature made her what she is,
And never made anither." (Such a person as she is.)

This is, in my opinion, more poetical than "Ne'er made sic anither." However, it is immaterial: make it either way.* "Caledonie," I agree with you, is not so good a word as could be wished, though it is sanctioned in three or four instances by Allan Ramsay; but I cannot help it. In short, that species of stanza is the most difficult that I have ever tried.

The "Lea-rig" is as follows.—(Here the Poet repeats the first two stanzas, and adds an additional one. The whole of the song has been given in No. IV.)

I am interrupted. Yours, &c.

No. IX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Auld Rob Morris.

I.

THERE'S auld Rob Morris that wons in yon
glen, [men;
He's the king o' guid fellows and wale o' auld

* [The original reading of the second verse in "Bonnie Lesley," the reader will observe, is restored in the text. Thomson decided in favour of the prosaic line,

"And ne'er made sic anither;"
rejecting the more poetic one,

He has gowd in his coffers, he has owsen and kine,
And ae bonnie lassie, his darling and mine.

II.

She's fresh as the morning, the fairest in May;
She's sweet as the ev'ning among the new hay;
As blythe and as artless as lambs on the lea,
And dear to my heart as the light to my e'e.

III.

But oh! she's an heirsch,—auld Robin's a laird,
And my daddie has nought but a cot-house and yard;
A wooer like me maunna hope to come speed;
The wounds I must hide that will soon be my dead.

IV.

The day comes to me, but delight brings me nane;
The night comes to me, but my rest it is gane:
I wander my lane like a night-troubl'd ghaist,
And I sigh as my heart it wad burst in my breast.

V.

O had she but been of a lower degree, [me!
I then might hae hop'd she'd hae, smil'd upon
O, how past describing had then been my bliss,
As now my distraction no words can express!

[The first two lines are taken from an old
Ballad—the rest is wholly original.—CURRIE.
The old song is as follows:—

"There's auld Rob Morris that wons in yon glen,
He's the king o' guid fellows, and the wale o' auld men;
He has kye in his byres, and yowes on the brae;
And auld Rob Morris is the man ye maun hae.

Dear father, he's doited, a shame to be seen;
And what can he do wi' a lass o' nineteen!
He's outshinn'd and inshinn'd, and single-ed too,
And auld Rob Morris I never can lo'e.

But auld Rob Morris he is a guid laird,
And your daddy has nought but a cot-house and yard,
He's a heel, and a hale, and a proper auld man,
And his auld brass will buy you new pan.

But auld Rob Morris I never will hae,
His back is sae stiff, and his beard is grown grey;
I rather wad die than live with him a year,
Sae mair of Rob Morris I never will hear."

Duncan Gray.

I.

DUNCAN Gray cam' here to woo,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't,
On blythe yule night when we were fou,
Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

"And never made anither."

Burns often adopted emendations in which his better judgment did not concur, because they were pressed by his correspondent, to whose skill in the art of adapting words to music he looked with great confidence.]

Maggie coost her head fu' high,
 Look'd asklent and unco skeigh,
 Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

II.

Duncan fleech'd, and Duncan pray'd,
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't;
 Meg was deaf as Ailsa Craig,*
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.
 Duncan sigh'd baith out and in,
 Grat his een baith bleer't and blin',
 Spak' o' lowpin o'er a linn;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

III.

Time and chance are but a tide;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't;
 Slighted love is sair to bide;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.
 Shall I, like a fool, quothe he,
 For a haughty hizzie die?
 She may gae to—France for me!
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

IV.

How it comes let doctors tell;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't;
 Meg grew sick—as he grew heal;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.
 Something in her bosom wrings,
 For relief a sigh she brings;
 And O, her een, they spak sic things!
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

V.

Duncan was a lad o' grace;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't;
 Maggie's was a piteous case;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.
 Duncan could na be her death,
 Swelling pity smoor'd his wrath;
 Now they're crouse and canty baith;
 Ha, ha, the wooing o't.

4th December, 1792.

The foregoing I submit, my dear sir, to your better judgment. Acquit them, or condemn them, as seemeth good in your sight. Duncan Gray is that kind of light-horse gallop of an air which precludes sentiment. The ludicrous is its ruling feature.

[This song has nothing in common with the old wild song of "Duncan Gray," save the first line, and a part of the third. It is a great favourite, from its lively air and clever words: Wilkie made one of his best pictures out of these lines:—

* A well-known rock in the Firth of Clyde.

"Maggie coost her head fu' high,
 Look'd asklent and unco skeigh,
 Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh;
 Ha! ha! the wooing o't."]

No. X.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Song.

Tune—I had a Horse.

I.

O POORTITH cauld, and restless love,
 Ye wreck my peace between ye;
 Yet poortith a' I could forgive,
 An 'twere na' for my Jeannie.

O why should fate sic pleasure have,
 Life's dearest bands untwining?
 Or why sae sweet a flower as love
 Depend on fortune's shining?

II.

This world's wealth when I think on,
 Its pride, and a' the lave o't—
 Fie, fie on silly coward man,
 That he should be the slave o't!

III.

Her een sae bonnie blue betray
 How she repays my passion;
 But prudence is her o'erword aye,
 She talks of rank and fashion.

IV.

O wha can prudence think upon,
 And sic a lassie by him?
 O wha can prudence think upon,
 And sae in love as I am?

V.

How blest the humble cotter's fate! *
 He woos his simple dearie;
 The silly bogles, wealth and state,
 Can never make them eerie.

O why should fate sic pleasure have,
 Life's dearest bands untwining!
 Or why sae sweet a flower as love
 Depend on fortune's shining?

[The heroine of this exquisite song was Jean Lorimer of Kemmis-hall, in Kirkmahoe. It is plain that the Poet looked upon her with the same eyes that a painter looks upon a model: her beauty of face and elegance of form—

"Her dimpled chin and cherry mou'—"

* "The wild-wood Indian's fate," in the original MS.

her ready wit, and her natural gaiety—her taste in song, and her skill in the dance, all united in endearing her to one whose muse caught inspiration from the presence of youth and beauty.]

Galla Water.

I.

THERE'S braw, braw lads on Yarrow braes,
That wander thro' the blooming heather;
But Yarrow braes nor Ettrick shaws
Can match the lads o' Galla Water.

II.

But there is ane, a secret ane,
Aboon them a' I lo'e him better;
And I'll be his, and he'll be mine,
The bonnie lad o' Galla Water.

III.

Altho' his daddie was nae laird,
And tho' I hae nae meikle tocher;
Yet rich in kindest, truest love,
We'll tent our flocks by Galla Water.

IV.

It ne'er was wealth, it ne'er was wealth,
That coft contentment, peace, or pleasure;
The bands and bliss o' mutual love,
O that's the chiefest warld's treasure!

Jan. 1793.

Many returns of the season to you, my dear Sir. How comes on your publication? will these two foregoing be of any service to you? I should like to know what songs you print to each tune, besides the verses to which it is set. In short, I would wish to give you my opinion on all the poetry you publish. You know it is my trade, and a man in the way of his trade may suggest useful hints, that escape men of much superior parts and endowments in other things.

If you meet with my dear and much-valued Cunningham, greet him, in my name, with the compliments of the season.—Yours, &c.

[The Poet had in his thoughts an old song which he brushed up for the Museum when he composed these verses. The feeling of the old so fairly mastered him that in the third verse he has been careless in the matter of rhyme, and contented himself with something like equality of sound. The Galla rises in Mid-Lothian, unites with Heriot Water, and passing Galashiels, is lost in the Tweed, near Abbotsford. It has long flowed in the light of song and romance:

"Lothian lads are black wi' reek,
Teviot-dale is little better;
But let them a' say what they will,
The gree gangs ay down Galla Water."

We subjoin the old song of "Galla Water."

"Braw, braw lads of Galla Water,
O braw lads of Galla Water:
I'll kilt my coats up to my knee,
And follow my love thro' the water.
Sae fair her hair, sae brent her brow,
Sae bonnie blue her een, my deary,
Sae white her teeth, sae sweet her mou',
I aften kiss her till I'm weary.

O'er yon bank, and o'er yon brae,
O'er yon moss among the heather,
I'll kilt my coats aboon my knee,
And follow my love thro' the water.
Down among the broom, the broom,
Down among the broom, my deary;
The lassy lost her silken snood,
That gar'd her greet till she was weary.'"]

No. XI.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, Jan. 20, 1793.

You make me happy, my dear Sir, and thousands will be happy to see the charming songs you have sent me. Many merry returns of the season to you, and may you long continue, among the sons and daughters of Caledonia, to delight them and to honour yourself.

The last four songs with which you favoured me, viz. "Auld Rob Morris," "Duncan Gray," "Galla Water," and "Cauld Kail," are admirable. Duncan is indeed a lad of grace, and his humour will endear him to every body.

The distracted lover in "Auld Rob," and the happy shepherdess in "Galla Water," exhibit an excellent contrast: they speak from genuine feeling, and powerfully touch the heart.

The number of songs which I had originally in view was limited; but I now resolve to include every Scotch air and song worth singing; leaving none behind but mere gleanings; to which the publishers of omne-gatherum are welcome. I would rather be the editor of a collection from which nothing could be taken away, than of one to which nothing could be added. We intend presenting the subscribers with two beautiful stroke engravings; the one characteristic of the plaintive, and the other of the lively, songs; and I have Dr. Beattie's promise of an essay upon the subject of our national music, if his health will permit him to write it. As a number of our songs have doubtless been called forth by particular events, or by the charms of peerless damsels, there must be many curious anecdotes relating to them.

The late Mr. Tytler, of Woodhouselee, I believe, knew more of this than any body; for he joined to the pursuits of an antiquary a taste for poetry, besides being a man of the world, and possessing an enthusiasm for music beyond most of his contemporaries. He was quite pleased with this plan of mine, for I may say it has been solely managed by me, and we had several long conversations about it when it was in embryo. If I could simply mention the name of the heroine of each song, and the incident which occasioned the verses, it would be gratifying. Pray, will you send me any information of this sort, as well with regard to your own songs, as the old ones?

To all the favourite songs of the plaintive or pastoral kind, will be joined the delicate accompaniments, &c., of Pleyel. To those of the comic and humourous class, I think accompaniments scarcely necessary; they are chiefly fitted for the conviviality of the festive board, and a tuneful voice, with a proper delivery of the words, renders them perfect. Nevertheless, to these I propose adding bass accompaniments, because then they are fitted either for singing, or for instrumental performance, when there happens to be no singer. I mean to employ our right trusty friend Mr. Clarke, to set the bass to these, which he assures me he will do con amore, and with much greater attention than he ever bestowed on anything of the kind. But for this last class of airs I will not attempt to find more than one set of verses.

That eccentric bard, Peter Pindar, has started I know not how many difficulties about writing for the airs I sent to him, because of the peculiarity of their measure, and the trammels they impose on his flying Pegasus. I subjoin for your perusal the only one I have yet got from him, being for the fine air "Lord Gregory." The Scots verses, printed with that air, are taken from the middle of an old ballad, called "The Lass of Lochroyan," which I do not admire.* I have set down the air, therefore, as a creditor of yours. Many of the Jacobite songs are replete with wit and humour: might not the best of these be included in our volume of comic songs?

POSTSCRIPT.

FROM THE HON. A. ERSKINE.

MR. THOMSON has been so obliging as to give me a perusal of your songs. "Highland Mary" is most enchantingly pathetic, and "Duncan Gray" possesses native genuine humour: "Spak o' lowpin o'er a linn," is a line of itself that should make you immortal. I sometimes hear of you from our mutual friend Cunningham, who is a most excellent fellow, and possesses, above all men I know, the charm of a most obliging disposition. You kindly promised me, about a year ago, a collection of your unpublished productions, religious and amorous; I know from experience how irksome it is to copy. If you will get any trusty person in Dumfries to write them over fair, I will give Peter Hill whatever money he asks for his trouble, and I certainly shall not betray your confidence.

[* Mr. Thomson is not remarkable for the correctness of his taste in regard to old Scottish ballads. The 'Lass of Lochroyan' is, we think, an instance in point.—MOTHERWELL.]

I am your hearty admirer,

ANDREW ERSKINE.

No. XII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

26th January, 1793.

I APPROVE greatly, my dear Sir, of your plans. Dr. Beattie's essay will of itself be a treasure. On my part I mean to draw up an appendix to the Doctor's essay, containing my stock of anecdotes, &c., of our Scots songs. All the late Mr. Tytler's anecdotes I have by me, taken down in the course of my acquaintance with him, from his own mouth. I am such an enthusiast that, in the course of my several peregrinations through Scotland, I made a pilgrimage to the individual spot from which every song took its rise, "Lochaber" and the "Braes of Ballenden" excepted. So far as the locality either from the title of the air, or the tenor of the song, could be ascertained, I have paid my devotions at the particular shrine of every Scots muse.

I do not doubt but you might make a very valuable collection of Jacobite songs; but would it give no offence? In the mean time, do not you think that some of them, particularly "The Sow's Tail to Geordie," as an air, with other words, might be well worth a place in your collection of lively songs?

If it were possible to procure songs of merit, it would be proper to have one set of Scots words to every air, and that the set of words to which the notes ought to be set. There is a naïveté, a pastoral simplicity, in a slight intermixture of Scots words and phraseology, which is more in unison (at least to my taste, and, I will add, to every genuine Caledonian taste) with the simple pathos, or rustic sprightliness of our native music, than any English verses whatever.

The very name of Peter Pindar is an acquisition to your work. His "Gregory" is beautiful. I have tried to give you a set of stanzas in Scots, on the same subject, which are at your service. Not that I intend to enter the lists with Peter; that would be presumption indeed. My song, though much inferior in poetic merit, has, I think, more of the ballad simplicity in it.

It is one of the most beautiful compositions in the language.—CUNNINGHAM.

Lord Gregory.

I.

O MIRK, mirk is this midnight hour,
And loud the tempest's roar;
A waefu' wanderer seeks thy tow'r—
Lord Gregory, ope thy door!

II.

An exile frae her father's ha',
And a' for loving thee;
At least some pity on me shaw,
If love it may na be.

III.

Lord Gregory, mind'st thou not the grove,
By bonnie Irwin-side,
Where first I own'd that virgin-love
I lang, lang had denied?

IV.

How aften didst thou pledge and vow
Thou wad for aye be mine;
And my fond heart, itsel' sae true,
It ne'er mistrusted thine.

V.

Hard is thy heart, Lord Gregory,
And flinty is thy breast—
Thou dart of heaven that flashest by,
O wilt thou give me rest!

VI.

Ye mustering thunders from above,
Your willing victim see!
But spare, and pardon my fause love,
His wrangs to heaven and me!

My most respectful compliments to the honourable gentleman who favoured me with a Postscript in your last. He shall hear from me and receive his MSS. soon. R. B.

[The following are two of the stanzas of "Fair Annie of Lochroyan":—

"Sweet Annie built a bonnie ship,
And set her on the sea,
The sails were of the damask'd silk,
The masts of silver free:
The gladsome waters sung below,
The sweet winds sung above,
Make way for Annie of Lochroyan,
She comes to seek her love!

* ["Of all the productions of Burns, the pathetic and serious love-songs which he has left behind him, in the manner of the old ballads, are perhaps those which take the

A gentle wind came with a sweep,
And stretch'd her silken sail,
When up there came a reaver rude,
With many a shout and hail;
O! touch her not, my mariners a',
Such loveliness goes free;
Make way for Annie of Lochroyan,
She seeks Lord Gregorie!"

Wolcot complained, with many an oath, that Burns sought to rob him of the original merit of Lord Gregory. His song was, indeed, composed first, but the idea of both is borrowed from the old strain. The following is Wolcot's version:—

LORD GREGORY.

"Ah ope, Lord Gregory, thy door!
A midnight wanderer sighs,
Hard rush the rains, the tempests roar,
And lightnings cleave the skies.
Who comes with woe at this drear night—
A pilgrim of the gloom?
If she whose love did once delight,
My cot shall yield her room.
Alas! thou heard'st a pilgrim mourn
That once was priz'd by thee;
Think of the ring by yonder burn
Thou gav'st to love and me.

But should'st thou not poor Marian know,
I'll turn my feet and part;
And think the storms that round me blow
Far kinder than thy heart."]

No. XIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

20th March, 1793.

Mary Morison.

Fune—Bide ye yet.

I.

O MARY, at thy window be,
It is the wish'd, the trysted hour!
Those smiles and glances let me see
That make the miser's treasure poor:
How blithely wad I bide the stoure,
A weary slave frae sun to sun;
Could I the rich reward secure,
The lovely Mary Morison

II.

Yestreen, when to the trembling string,
The dance gaed thro' the lighted ha',
To thee my fancy took its wing,
I sat, but neither heard nor saw:

deepest and most lasting hold of the mind. Such are the lines to Mary Morison, those entitled 'Jessey,' and the song beginning 'O, my love is like a red, red rose.'"—HAZLITT.]

Tho' this was fair, and that was braw,
And yon the toast of a' the town,
I sigh'd, and said, among them a',
"Ye are na Mary Morison."

III.

O Mary, canst thou wreck his peace
Wha for thy sake wad gladly die?
Or canst thou break that heart of his
Whase only faut is loving thee?
If love for love thou wilt na gie,
At least be pity to me shown;
A thought ungentle canna be
The thought o' Mary Morison.

MY DEAR SIR :

The song prefixed is one of my juvenile works. I leave it in your hands. I do not think it very remarkable, either for its merits or demerits. It is impossible (at least I feel it so in my stunted powers) to be always original, entertaining, and witty.

What is become of the list, &c., of your songs? I shall be out of all temper with you by-and-by. I have always looked on myself as the prince of indolent correspondents, and valued myself accordingly; and I will not, cannot, bear rivalry from you, nor any body else.

R. B.

No. XIV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

March, 1793.Wandering Willie.

I.

HERE awa, there awa, wandering Willie,
Now tired with wandering, haud awa hame;
Come to my bosom, my ae only dearie, [same.
And tell me thou bring'st me my Willie the

II.

Loud blew the cauld winter winds at our parting;
It was na the blast brought the tear in my e'e:
Now welcome the simmer, and welcome my Willie,
The simmer to nature, my Willie to me.

III.

Ye hurricanes, rest in the cave o' your slumbers!
O how your wild horrors a lover alarms!
Awaken, ye breezes, row gently, ye billows,
And wait my dear laddie ance mair to my arms.

IV.

But if he's forgotten his faithfulest Nannie,
O still flow between us, thou wide roaring main;
May I never see it, may I never trow it,
But, dying, believe that my Willie's my ain!

I leave it to you, my dear Sir, to determine whether the above, or the old "Thro' the lang muir," be the best.

R. B.

[The idea of "Wandering Willie" is taken from an old song published by Herd, which commences in these words:—

"Here awa, there awa, here awa, Willie,
Here awa, there awa', here awa hame;
Long have I sought thee, dear have I bought thee,
Now I hae gotten my Willie again.

Through the lang muir I have followed my Willie,
Through the lang muir I have followed him hame,
Whatever betide us, nought shall divide us,
Love now rewards all my sorrow and pain."

Older words than these may still be heard "lilted" by a shepherd lad or lass on a pasture hill, or in some sequestered glen:—

"Gin that ye meet my love, kiss her and clap her,
An' gin ye meet my love, dinna think shame:
O gin ye meet my love, kiss her and daut her,
And show her the way to haud away hame."

The heroine of the "Wandering Willie" of Burns is said to have been the lovely and accomplished Mrs. Riddel.]

No. XV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Open the Door to me, Oh!

WITH ALTERATIONS.

I.

OH, open the door, some pity to show,
Oh, open the door to me, Oh!*
Tho' thou hast been false, I'll ever prove true,
Oh, open the door to me, Oh!

II.

Cauld is the blast upon my pale cheek,
But cauldier thy love for me, Oh!
The frost that freezes the life at my heart
Is nought to my pains frae thee, Oh!

III.

The wan moon is setting behind the white wave,
Aud time is setting with me, Oh!
False friends, false love, farewell! for mair
I'll ne'er trouble them, nor thee, Oh!

IV.

She has open'd the door, she has open'd it wide;
She sees his pale corse on the plain, Oh! [side,
My true love! she cried, and sank down by his
Never to rise again, Oh!

I do not know whether this song be really mended.

R. B.

* This second line was originally—"If love it may na be, Oh!"

No. XVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Young Jessie.

Tune—Bonnie Dundee.

I.

TRUE-hearted was he, the sad swain o' the Yarrow,
And fair are the maids on the banks o' the Ayr,
But by the sweet side o' the Nith's winding river,
Are lovers as faithful, and maidens as fair :
To equal young Jessie seek Scotland all over ;
To equal young Jessie you seek it in vain ;
Grace, beauty, and elegance, fetter her lover,
And maidenly modesty fixes the chain.

II.

O, fresh is the rose in the gay, dewy morning,
And sweet is the lily at evening close ;
But in the fair presence o' lovely young Jessie,
Unseen is the lily, unheeded the rose.
Love sits in her smile, a wizard ensnaring ;
Enthron'd in her een he delivers his law :
And still to her charms she alone is a stranger—
Her modest demeanour's the jewel of a'!

[Jesse Staig, the heroine of this song, was the daughter of Provost Staig of Dumfries, and married to Major Miller, the second son of the Laird of Dalswinton. She died in early life, and is still affectionately remembered in her native valley :—the memory of beauty and gentleness is long passing away.]

* [Thomson and Erskine, it seems, sat in judgment upon "Wandering Willie," and, in harmonizing it to the air, squeezed much of the poetic spirit out:—they re-produced it in these words :—

"Here awa, there awa, wandering Willie,
Here awa, there awa, haud awa hame ;
Come to my bosom, my ain only dearie,
Tell me thou bring'st me my Willie the same.

Winter winds blew loud and cauld at our parting,
Fears for my Willie brought tears in my e'e,
Welcome now simmer, and welcome my Willie,
As simmer to nature, so Willie to me.

Rest, ye wild storms, in the cave o' your slumbers,
How your dread howling a lover alarms !
Blow soft, * ye breezes ! roll gently, ye billows !
And wait my dear laddie ance mair to my arms.

* VAR.—Wauken. R. B.

No. XVII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 2nd April, 1793.

I WILL not recognise the title you give yourself, "the prince of indolent correspondents ;" but if the adjective were taken away, I think the title would then fit you exactly. It gives me pleasure to find you can furnish anecdotes with respect to most of the songs: these will be a literary curiosity.

I now send you my list of the songs, which I believe will be found nearly complete. I have put down the first lines of all the English songs which I propose giving in addition to the Scotch verses. If any others occur to you, better adapted to the character of the airs, pray mention them, when you favour me with your strictures upon every thing else relating to the work.

Pleyel has lately sent me a number of the songs, with his symphonies and accompaniments added to them. I wish you were here, that I might serve up some of them to you with your own verses, by way of dessert after dinner. There is so much delightful fancy in the symphonies, and such a delicate simplicity in the accompaniments—they are, indeed, beyond all praise.

I am very much pleased with the several last productions of your muse: your "Lord Gregory," in my estimation, is more interesting than Peter's, beautiful as his is. Your "Here awa, Willie," must undergo some alterations to suit the air. Mr. Erskine and I have been conning it over: he will suggest what is necessary to make them a fit match.* The gentleman I have mentioned, whose fine taste you are no stranger to, is so well pleased, both with the musical and poetical part of our work, that he has volunteered his assistance, and has already written four songs for it, which, by his own desire, I send for your perusal. G. T.

But oh, if he's faithless, and minds na his Nannie,
Flow still between us, thou dark-heaving † main !
May I never see it, may I never throw it,
While dying I think ‡ that my Willie's my ain."

Burns, with his usual judgment, adopted some of these alterations, and rejected others.

"Several of the alterations seem to be of little importance in themselves, and were adopted, it may be presumed, for the sake of suiting the words better to the music. The Homeric epithet for the sea, dark-heaving, suggested by Mr. Erskine, is in itself more beautiful, as well, perhaps, as more sublime, than wide-roaring, which he has retained; but as it is only applicable to a placid state of the sea, or at most to the swell left on its surface after the storm is over, it gives a picture of that element not so well adapted to the ideas of eternal separation which the fair mourner is supposed to impregnate. From the original song of 'Here awa, Willie,' Burns has borrowed nothing but the second line and part of the first. The superior excellence of this beautiful poem will, it is hoped, justify the different editions of it which we have given."—CURRIE.]

† VAR.—Wide-roaring.—MS.—R. B.

‡ VAR.—But dying believe.—MS.—R. B.

No. XVIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

The poor and honest Sodger.

Air—The Mill, Mill, O!

I.

WHEN wild war's deadly blast was blawn,
And gentle peace returning,
Wi' mony a sweet babe fatherless,
And mony a widow mourning ;*
I left the lines and tented field,
Where lang I'd been a lodger,
My humble knapsack a' my wealth,
A poor and honest sodger.

II.

A leal, light heart was in my breast,
My hand unstain'd wi' plunder,
And for fair Scotia, hame again,
I cheery on did wander.
I thought upon the banks o' Coil,
I thought upon my Nancy,
I thought upon † the witching smile
That caught my youthful fancy.

III.

At length I reach'd the bonny glen
Where early life I sported ;
I pass'd the mill, and trysting thorn,
Where Nancy aft I courted :
Wha spied I but my ain dear maid, ‡
Down by her mother's dwelling !
And turn'd me round to hide the flood
That in my een was swelling.

IV.

Wi' alter'd § voice, quoth I, Sweet lass,
Sweet as yon hawthorn's blossom,
O ! happy, happy may he be,
That 's dearest to thy bosom !
My purse is light, I've far to gang,
And fain wad be thy lodger ;
I've serv'd my king and country lang—
Take pity on a sodger.

V.

Sae wistfully she gaz'd on me,
And lovelier was || than ever ;
Quo' she, a sodger ance I lo'ed,
Forget him shall I never :

* "And eyes again with pleasure beam'd,
That had been beair'd with mourning."

† VAR.—And ay I min't.—MS.

‡ VAR.—Lass.—MS.

§ VAR.—Premit.—MS.

Our humble cot, and hamely fare,
Ye freely shall partake it,
That gallant badge—the dear cockade
Ye 're welcome for the sake o't.

VI.

She gaz'd—she reddin'd like a rose—
Syn'e pale like ony lily ; ¶
She sank within my arms, and cried
Art thou my ain dear Willie ?
By Him who made yon sun and sky—
By whom true love 's regarded,
I am the man ; and thus may still
True lovers be rewarded !

VII.

The wars are o'er, and I'm come hame,
And find thee still true-hearted ;
Tho' poor in gear, †† we're rich in love,
And mair we'se ne'er be parted.
Quo' she, my grandsire left me gowd, ††
A mailen plenish'd fairly ;
And come, my faithful sodger §§ lad,
Thou'rt welcome to it dearly !

VIII.

For gold the merchant ploughs the main,
The farmer ploughs the manor ;
But glory is the sodger's prize,
The sodger's wealth is honour :
The brave poor sodger ne'er despise,
Nor count him as a stranger ;
Remember he's his country's stay
In day and hour of danger.

[The air of this song and some of the words incline me to believe that Burns had "The mill, mill, O!" of Allan Ramsay in his mind, when he wrote it. But the verses of the elder bard are inferior to those of his great successor, and moreover the story they tell is far from delicate. The first four lines may be quoted without a blush:—

"Beneath a green shade, I fand a fair maid
Was sleeping sound and still, O ;
A' lowing wi' love, my fancy did rove
Around her wi' good will, O."

The four concluding lines belong to an older lyric:—

"O the mill, mill, O, and the kiln, kiln, O !
And the coggin o' the wheel, O ;
The sack and the sieve a' thae ye maun leave,
And round wi' a sodger reel, O."

"It is alleged by some," says Geddes, in his Saint's Recreation, written in 1760—and not without some colour of reason,—"that many of our good airs or tunes are made by good angels, ¶ VAR.—Look'd.—MS.

¶ VAR.—Syn'e swallow't like a lily.—MS.

 VAR.—And.

†† VAR.—Tho' wealth be sma'.—MS.

‡‡ VAR.—Gear.

§§ VAR.—Ain dear.—MS.

but the lines of our songs by devils." The words of the "Godly Geddes," were true of many of the old popular songs of Caledonia, and "The mill, mill, O!" among the number. The third and fourth lines of the first verse of the song of Burns, were altered thus by Thomson:—

"And eyes again with pleasure beam'd,
That had been bleared with mourning."

This change robbed the song of a natural and mournful image.

"The Poor and Honest Sodger" was sung in every vale, and on every lill; in every cot-house, village, and town: yet the man who wrote it was supposed by the mean and the spiteful to be no well-wisher to his country!—
CUNNINGHAM.]

Meg o' the Mill.

Air—Hey! bonnie lass, will you lie in a barrack?

I.

O KEN ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten?
An' ken ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten?
She has gotten a coof wi' a claut o' siller,
And broken the heart o' the barley Miller.

II.

The Miller was strappin, the Miller was ruddy;
A heart like a lord and a hue like a lady:
The laird was a widdieff, bleerit knurl;
She's left the guid-fellow and ta'en the churl.

III.

The Miller he hecht her a heart leal and loving;
The Laird did address her wi' matter mair moving,
A fine pacing horse wi' a clear chained bridle,
A whip by her side, and a bonnie side-saddle.

IV.

O wae on the siller, it is sae prevailing;
And wae on the love that is fix'd on a mailen!
A tocher's nae word in a true lover's parole,
But, gie me my love, and a fig for the warl'!

[Burns touched up the old song of "Meg o' the Mill" for Johnson's Museum. That version we have already given.

The license of a Scottish bridal—if we may believe the northern painters and poets—was very great: the revelry lasted three days and nights, according to Ramsay; and both David Allan and David Wilkie intimate that men and women's hearts over-flowed with joy:—

"Some were fu' o' love divine,
And others fu' o' brandy."]

No. XIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

7th April, 1793.

THANK you, my dear Sir, for your packet. You cannot imagine how much this business of composing for your publication has added to my enjoyments. What with my early attachment to ballads, your book, &c., ballad-making is now as completely my hobby-horse as ever fortification was Uncle Toby's; so I'll e'en canter it away till I come to the limit of my race (God grant that I may take the right side of the winning-post!), and then, cheerfully looking back on the honest folks with whom I have been happy, I shall say, or sing, "Sae merry as we a' hae been," and, raising my last looks to the whole human race, the last words of the voice of Coila shall be "Good night, and joy be wi' you a'!" So much for my last words: now for a few present remarks, as they have occurred at random on looking over your list.

The first lines of "The last time I came o'er the moor," and several other lines in it, are beautiful; but in my opinion—pardon me, revered shade of Ramsay! the song is unworthy of the divine air. I shall try to make or mend. "For ever, Fortune, wilt thou prove," is a charming song; but "Logan Burn and Logan Braes" are sweetly susceptible of rural imagery: I'll try that likewise, and, if I succeed, the other song may class among the English ones. I remember the two last lines of a verse in some of the old songs of "Logan Water" (for I know a good many different ones), which I think pretty:—

"Now my dear lad maun face his faes,
Far, far frae me and Logan braes."

"My Patie is a lover gay" is unequalled. "His mind is never muddy," is a muddy expression indeed.

"Then I'll resign and marry Pate,
And syne my cockernony!"

This is surely far unworthy of Ramsay, or your book. My song, "Rigs of Barley," to the same tune, does not altogether please me; but if I can mend it and thrash a few loose sentiments out of it, I will submit it to your consideration. "The Lass o' Patie's Mill" is one of Ramsay's best songs; but there is one loose sentiment in it, which my much-valued friend, Mr. Erskine, will take into his critical consideration. In Sir J. Sinclair's Statistical volumes are two claims; one, I think, from Aberdeen-shire, and the other from Ayr-shire, for the honour of this song. The following anecdote, which I had from the present Sir William Cunningham, of Robertland, who had it of the late John, Earl of Loudon, I can, on such authorities, believe:—

Allan Ramsay was residing at Loudon castle with the then Earl, father to Earl John; and one forenoon, riding, or walking out together, his Lordship and Allan passed a sweet, romantic spot on Irvine Water, still called "Patie's Mill," where a bonnie lass was "tedding hay, bare-headed, on the green." My Lord observed to Allan that it would be a fine theme for a song. Ramsay took the hint, and lingering behind, he composed the first sketch of it, which he produced at dinner.

"One day I heard Mary say," is a fine song; but, for consistency's sake, alter the name "Adonis." Were there ever such banns published as a purpose of marriage between Adonis and Mary? I agree with you that my song, "There's nought but care on every hand," is much superior to "Poortith cauld." The original song, "The Mill, Mill, O," though excellent, is, on account of delicacy, inadmissible; still I like the title, and think a Scottish song would suit the notes best; and let your chosen song, which is very pretty, follow, as an English set. "The banks of the Dee" is, you know, literally, "Langolee," to slow time. The song is well enough, but has some false imagery in it; for instance,

"And sweetly the nightingale sung from the tree."

In the first place, the nightingale sings in a low bush, but never from a tree; and in the second place, there never was a nightingale seen, or heard, on the banks of the Dee, or on the banks of any other river in Scotland. Exotic rural imagery is always comparatively flat. If I could hit on another stanza, equal to "The small birds rejoice," &c. I do myself honestly avow that I think it a superior song.* "John Anderson, my Jo," the song to this tune in Johnson's Museum is my composition, and I think it not my worst: if it suit you, take it and welcome. Your collection of sentimental and pathetic songs is, in my opinion, very complete; but not so your comic ones. Where are "Tullochgorum," "Lumps o' pud-din'," "Tibbie Fowler," and several others, which, in my humble judgment, are well worthy of preservation? There is also one sentimental song of mine in the Museum, which never was known out of the immediate neighbourhood, until I got it taken down from a country girl's singing. It is called "Craigieburn Wood;" and, in the opinion of Mr. Clarke, is one of the sweetest Scottish songs. He is quite an enthusiast about it; and I would take his taste in Scottish music against the taste of most connoisseurs.

You are quite right in inserting the last five in your list, though they are certainly Irish.

"Shepherds, I have lost my love!" is to me a heavenly air—what would you think of a set of Scottish verses to it? I have made one to it a good while ago, but in its original state it is not quite a lady's song. I inclose an altered, not amended, copy for you, if you choose to set the tune to it, and let the Irish verses follow.

Mr. Erskine's songs are all pretty, but his "Lone Vale" is divine.

Yours, &c., R. B.

Let me know just how you like these random hints.

[In this letter Burns calls himself the voice of Coila, in imitation of Ossian, who denominates himself the voice of Cona. He was an ardent admirer of the Celtic bard, and carried his poems frequently about with him. "Sae merry as we twa hae been," and "Good night, and joy be wi' you a'," are the names of two northern tunes. The lyric written to the tune of "Shepherds, I have lost my love," is elsewhere given under the name of "The gowden locks of Anna." Thomson, it appears, did not approve of the song, even in its amended state: it has, however, obtained the approbation of a divine of the kirk of Scotland, and laymen need no longer hesitate in singing it. It is highly characteristic of our Bard.]

No. XX.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, April, 1793.

I REJOICE to find, my dear Sir, that ballad-making continues to be your hobby-horse.—Great pity 'twould be were it otherwise. I hope you will amble it away for many a year, and "witch the world with your horsemanship."

I know there are a good many lively songs of merit that I have not put down in the list sent you; but I have them all in my eye.—"My Patie is a lover gay," though a little unequal, is a natural and very pleasing song, and I humbly think we ought not to displace or alter it, except the last stanza.

[Currie says, "the original letter from Mr. Thomson contains many observations on Scottish songs, and on the manner of adapting the words to the music, which, at his desire, are suppressed." To these observations Burns alludes in his answer, and intimates that he

* [It will be found in the course of this correspondence that the Bard produced a second stanza of "The Cavalier's Lament' (to which he here alludes) worthy of the first."—CURRIE.]

thinks his friend is a little too ready to sacrifice simplicity for the sake of something striking. No one can hope to compose a song to a tune unless he can either hum it, or whistle it, or sing it: the music commands the proper words, and a true poet will obey it, as Burns always did, save in one or two instances, where he evidently had not mastered the air. He tells us that he was in the habit of crooning the tune while in the act of composing it: nor will a song that echoes the music be obtained on easier terms.]

No. XXI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

April, 1793.

I HAVE yours, my dear Sir, this moment. I shall answer it, and your former letter, in my desultory way of saying whatever comes uppermost.

The business of many of our tunes, wanting at the beginning what fiddlers call a starting-note, is often a rub to us poor rhymers.

"There's braw, braw lads on Yarrow braes,
That wander thro' the blooming heather,"

you may alter to

"Braw, braw lads on Yarrow braes,
Ye wander," &c.

My song, "Here awa, there awa," as amended by Mr. Erskine, I entirely approve of, and return you.

Give me leave to criticise your taste in the only thing in which it is, in my opinion, reprehensible. You know I ought to know something of my own trade. Of pathos, sentiment, and point, you are a complete judge; but there is a quality more necessary than either in a song, and which is the very essence of a ballad; I mean simplicity: now, if I mistake not, this last feature you are a little apt to sacrifice to the foregoing.

Ramsay, as every other poet, has not been always equally happy in his pieces: still I cannot approve of taking such liberties with an author as Mr. W. proposes doing with "The last time I came o'er the moor." Let a poet, if he chooses, take up the idea of another, and work it into a piece of his own; but to mangle the works of the poor bard, whose tuneful tongue is now mute for ever, in the dark and narrow house,—by Heaven, 'twould be sacrilege! I

* ["The song to the tune of 'Bonnie Dundee' is that in No. XVI. The ballad to the 'Mill, Mill, O,' is that beginning,

'When wild war's deadly blasts are blawn.'"] grant that Mr. W.'s version is an improvement; but I know Mr. W. well, and esteem him much; let him mend the song as the Highlander mended his gun: he gave it a new stock, a new lock, and a new barrel.

CURRIE.]

I do not, by this, object to leaving out improper stanzas, where that can be done without spoiling the whole. One stanza in "The Lass o' Patie's Mill" must be left out: the song will be nothing worse for it. I am not sure if we can take the same liberty with "Corn Rigs are bonnie." Perhaps it might want the last stanza, and be the better for it. "Cauld Kail in Aberdeen" you must leave with me yet a while. I have vowed to have a song to that air, on the lady whom I attempted to celebrate in the verses, "Poortith cauld and restless love." At any rate, my other song, "Green grow the Rashes," will never suit. That song is current in Scotland under the old title, and to the merry old tune of that name; which, of course, would mar the progress of your song to celebrity. Your book will be the standard of Scots songs for the future: let this idea ever keep your judgment on the alarm.

I send a song on a celebrated toast in this country, to suit "Bonnie Dundee." I send you also a ballad to the "Mill, Mill, O."*

"The last time I came o'er the moor" I would fain attempt to make a Scots song for, and let Ramsay's be the English set. You shall hear from me soon. When you go to London on this business, can you come by Dumfries? I have still several MS. Scots airs by me, which I have picked up, mostly from the singing of country lasses. They please me vastly; but your learned lugs would perhaps be displeased with the very feature for which I like them. I call them simple; you would pronounce them silly. Do you know a fine air, called "Jackie Hume's Lament?" I have a song of considerable merit to that air. I'll enclose you both the song and tune, as I had them ready to send to Johnson's Museum.† I send you likewise, to me, a beautiful little air, which I had taken down from viva voce.‡—Adieu! R. B.

No. XXII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

April 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

I HAD scarcely put my last letter into the post office, when I took up the subject of "The last time I came o'er the moor," and ere I slept

† ["The song here mentioned is that given in No. XVIII., 'O ken ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten?' This song is surely Burns's own writing, though he does not generally praise his own songs so much.—NOTE BY MR. THOMSON.]

‡ [The air here mentioned is that for which he wrote the ballad of "Bonnie Jean." See No. XXVII.]

drew the outlines of the foregoing. How far I have succeeded, I leave on this, as on every other occasion, to you to decide. I own my vanity is flattered when you give my songs a place in your elegant and superb work; but to be of service to the work is my first wish. As I have often told you, I do not in a single instance wish you, out of compliment to me, to insert anything of mine. One hint let me give you—whatever Mr. Pleyel does, let him not alter one iota of the original Scottish airs; I mean in the song department; but let our national music preserve its native features. They are, I own, frequently wild and irreducible to the more modern rules; but on that very eccentricity, perhaps, depends a great part of their effect.

R. B.

No. XXIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 26th April, 1793.

I HEARTILY thank you, my dear Sir, for your last two letters, and the songs which accompanied them. I am always both instructed and entertained by your observations; and the frankness with which you speak out your mind is to me highly agreeable. It is very possible I may not have the true idea of simplicity in composition. I confess there are several songs, of Allan Ramsay's for example, that I think silly enough, which another person, more conversant than I have been with country people, would perhaps call simple and natural. But the lowest scenes of simple nature will not please generally, if copied precisely as they are. The poet, like the painter, must select what will form an agreeable as well as a natural picture. On this subject it were easy to enlarge; but at present suffice it to say that I consider simplicity, rightly understood, as a most essential quality in composition, and the ground-work of beauty in all the arts. I will gladly appropriate your most interesting new ballad, "When wild war's deadly blast," &c., to the "Mill, Mill, O," as well as the two other songs to their respective airs; but the third and fourth lines of the first verse must undergo some little alteration in order to suit the music. Pleyel does not alter a single note of the songs. That would be absurd indeed! With the airs which he introduces into the sonatas, I allow him to take such liberties as he pleases, but that has nothing to do with the songs.

P.S.—I wish you would do as you proposed with your "Rigs of Barley." If the loose

* [The lines were the third and fourth:—

"Wi' mony a sweet babe fatherless,
And mony a widow mourning."

"As our poet had maintained a long silence, and the first part of Thomson's Musical work was in the press, this gentleman ventured, by Mr. Erskine's advice, to substitute for them in that publication, sentiments are thrashed out of it, I will find an air for it; but as to this there is no hurry.

G. T.

[“It is quite plain, from this letter, that Thomson was at issue with his correspondent on the subject-matter of simplicity. Burns, like old Burton, was a plain man, calling “a spade a spade;” simplicity of expression was dear to his heart, and he considered it as essential in song. Thomson says, “I confess there are several songs, of Allan Ramsay's for example, that I think silly enough, which another person, more conversant than I have been with country people, would perhaps call simple and natural.” He desired to vindicate the diplomatic language of the polished city; but Burns felt that elegance and simplicity were “sisters twin,” and that words which failed to convey a clear meaning, or present a distinct image, were not for him.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XXIV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

June 1793.

WHEN I tell you, my dear Sir, that a friend of mine, in whom I am much interested, has fallen a sacrifice to these accursed times, you will easily allow that it might unhinge me for doing any good among ballads. My own loss, as to pecuniary matters, is trifling: but the total ruin of a much-loved friend is a loss indeed. Pardon my seeming inattention to your last commands.

I cannot alter the disputed lines in the “Mill, Mill, O.”* What you think a defect, I esteem as a positive beauty: so you see how doctors differ. I shall now, with as much alacrity as I can muster, go on with your commands.

You know Fraser, the hautboy-player in Edinburgh—he is here, instructing a band of music for a fencible corps quartered in this country. Among many of his airs that please me, there is one, well known as a reel, by the name of “The Quaker's Wife,” and which I remember a grand-aunt of mine used to sing, by the name of “Liggeram Cosh, my bonnie wee lass.” Mr. Fraser plays it slow, and with an expression that quite charms me. I became such an enthusiast about it that I made a song for it, which I here subjoin, and enclose Fraser's set of the tune. If they hit your fancy they are at your service; if not, return me the tune, and I will put it in Johnson's Museum. I think the song is not in my worst manner.

* And eyes again with pleasure beam'd, &c., which, though better suited to the music, are inferior to the original. This is the only alteration adopted by Thomson, which Burns did not approve, or at least assent to.”—CURRIE.]

Blythe hae I been.

Tune—Liggeram Cosh.

I.

BLYTHE hae I been on yon hill,
As the lambs before me ;
Careless ilka thought and free,
As the breeze flew o'er me.
Now nae langer sport and play,
Mirth or sang can please me ;
Lesley is sae fair and coy,
Care and anguish seize me.

II.

Heavy, heavy is the task,
Hopeless love declaring :
Trembling, I dow nocht but glow'r,
Sighing, dumb, despairing !
If she winna ease the thraws
In my bosom swelling ;
Underneath the grass-green sod,
Soon maun be my dwelling.

I should wish to hear how this pleases you.
R. B.

[Though Miss Lesley Baillie, the heroine of this song, passed before the eyes of the Poet like a vision which never returns, her loveliness seems to have been long remembered. In expressing the hopelessness of misplaced love, Burns has surpassed all other poets : this song, and that of Jessy, would go far to sustain the assertion ; but there are others of equal tenderness, which cannot be present to the minds of all readers. Of the old song, from which he has borrowed nothing but the air, little is known : it was sometimes sung in Nithsdale, and had a touch of the nursery about it.]

No. XXV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

June 25th, 1793.

HAVE you ever, my dear Sir, felt your bosom ready to burst with indignation on reading of those mighty villains who divide kingdom against kingdom, desolate provinces, and lay nations waste, out of the wantonness of ambition, or often from still more ignoble passions ? In a mood of this kind to-day, I recollected the air of "Logan Water," and it occurred to me that its querulous melody probably had its origin from the plaintive indignation of some swelling, suffering heart, fired at the tyrannic strides of some public destroyer ; and overwhelmed with private distress, the consequence of a country's ruin. If I have done any thing at all like justice to my feelings, the following song, composed in three-quarters of an hour's meditation in my elbow-chair, ought to have some merit :—

Logan Braes.

Tune—Logan Water.

I.

O LOGAN, sweetly didst thou glide
That day I was my Willie's bride !
And years sinsyne hae o'er us run,
Like Logan to the simmer sun.
But now thy flow'ry banks appear
Like drumlie winter, dark and drear,
While my dear lad maun face his faes,
Far, far frae me and Logan braes !

II.

Again the merry month o' May
Has made our hills and valleys gay ;
The birds rejoice in leafy bowers,
The bees hum round the breathing flowers :
Blythe morning lifts his rosy eye,
And evening's tears are tears of joy :
My soul, delightless, a' surveys,
While Willie's far frae Logan braes.

III.

Within yon milk-white hawthorn bush,
Amang her nestlings sits the thrush ;
Her faithfu' mate will share her toil,
Or wi' his song her cares beguile :
But I, wi' my sweet nurslings here,
Nae mate to help, nae mate to cheer,
Pass widow'd nights, and joyless days,
While Willie's far frae Logan braes.

IV.

O wae upon you, men o' state,
That brethren rouse to deadly hate !
As ye make mony a fond heart mourn,
Sae may it on your heads return !
How can your flinty hearts enjoy
The widow's tears, the orphan's cry ?*
But soon may peace bring happy days
And Willie hame to Logan braes !

[Burns in one of his letters says, " I remember the two last lines of a verse in some of the old songs of Logan water, which I think pretty :—

" Now my dear lad maun face his faes,
Far, far frae me and Logan braes."

These lines belong to the "Logan braes" of the late John Mayne : the song was printed in the Star newspaper of May 23, 1789, and soon became a favourite, as it well might :—

" By Logan streams that rin sae deep,
Fu' aft wi' glee I've herded sheep :
I've herded sheep, or gather'd slaes
Wi' my dear lad on Logan braes.
But wae's my heart thae days are gans,
And fu' o' grief I herd my lane ;
While my dear lad maun face his faes,
Far, far frae me and Logan braes.

* Originally—

" Ye mind na, 'mid your cruel joys,
The widow's tears, the orphan's cries."

Nae mair at Logan kirk will he
 Atween the preachings meet wi' me—
 Meet wi' me, or when it's mirk,
 Convoy me hame frae Logan kirk.
 I weel may sing thae days are gane,
 Frae kirk and fair, I come my lane;
 While my dear lad maun face his faes,
 Far, far frae me and Logan braes."

The old verses to the same air, on which the modern songs are founded, will be given in the Poet's notes on Scottish Song—they are curious.]

Do you know the following beautiful little fragment, in Witherspoon's collection of Scots songs?

Air—Hughie Graham.

"O GIN my love were yon red rose,
 That grows upon the castle wa';
 And I mysel' a drap o' dew,
 Into her bonnie breast to fa'!

"Oh, there beyond expression blest,
 I'd feast on beauty a' the night;
 Seal'd on her silk-soft faulds to rest,
 Till flew'd awa by Phœbus' light."

This thought is inexpressibly beautiful; and quite, so far as I know, original. It is too short for a song, else I would forswear you altogether, unless you gave it a place. I have often tried to eke a stanza to it, but in vain. After balancing myself for a musing five minutes, on the hind-legs of my elbow-chair, I produced the following.

The verses are far inferior to the foregoing, I frankly confess; but, if worthy of insertion at all, they might be first in place; as every poet, who knows any thing of his trade, will husband his best thoughts for a concluding stroke.

O were my love yon lilac fair,
 Wi' purple blossoms to the spring;
 And I, a bird to shelter there,
 When wearied on my little wing!

How I wad mourn, when it was torn
 By autumn wild, and winter rude!
 But I wad sing on wanton wing,
 When youthfu' May its bloom renew'd.

R. B.

[There are fragments of song of a nature so exquisitely fine that, like the purest marble, they cannot be cked out or repaired without showing where the hand of the restorer has been. Burns, though eminently skilful, has not succeeded in writing a verse worthy of the one preserved by Witherspoon: his lines are beautiful: but lilacs are not favorites with birds: the odour of their blossoms is unpleasing to the musicians of the air, and they seldom build in them, or seek them out as a shelter. Tradition has many additional verses, of which the following are pretty:—

"O were my love yon pickle leeks,
 That's growing in the garden green;
 And were I but the gard'ner lad—
 I wad lie near the leeks at e'en.
 O were my love yon fragrant gean,
 That hangs sae drap ripe on the tree;
 And I were but yon little bird—
 Far wi' that fragrant gean I'd flee.
 O gin my love were a turtle dove,
 Flying about frae tree to tree;
 And I myself a single blackbird,
 I'd fly and bear her company."]

No. XXVI.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Monday, 1st July, 1793.

I AM extremely sorry, my good Sir, that any thing should happen to unhinge you. The times are terribly out of tune, and when harmony will be restored, Heaven knows.

The first book of songs, just published, will be dispatched to you along with this. Let me be favoured with your opinion of it, frankly and freely.

I shall certainly give a place to the song you have written for the "Quaker's Wife;" it is quite enchanting. Pray will you return the list of songs, with such airs added to it as you think ought to be included. The business now rests entirely on myself, the gentlemen who originally agreed to join the speculation having requested to be off. No matter, a loser I cannot be. The superior excellence of the work will create a general demand for it, as soon as it is properly known. And, were the sale even slower than it promises to be, I should be somewhat compensated for my labour by the pleasure I shall receive from the music. I cannot express how much I am obliged to you for the exquisite new songs you are sending me; but thanks, my friend, are a poor return for what you have done: as I shall be benefited by the publication, you must suffer me to inclose a small mark of my gratitude,* and to repeat it afterwards, when I find it convenient. Do not return it, for, by Heaven! if you do, our correspondence is at an end: and, though this would be no loss to you, it would mar the publication, which, under your auspices, cannot fail to be respectable and interesting.

Wednesday Morning.

I thank you for your delicate additional verses to the old fragment, and for your excellent song to "Logan Water:" Thomson's truly elegant one will follow for the English singer. Your apostrophe to statesmen is admirable, but I am not sure if it is quite suitable to the supposed gentle character of the fair mourner who speaks it.

G. T.

* A bank-note for five pounds.

[One of the gentlemen whom Thomson alludes to as partners in his speculation was the Hon. Andrew Erskine: his health was declining, and, desiring to free his mind from all the solicitude of either verse or music, he requested, as his partner says, to "be off." He did not long survive the separation.]

No. XXVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

MY DEAR SIR:

July 2nd, 1793.

I HAVE just finished the following ballad, and, as I do think it in my best style, I send it you. Mr. Clarke, who wrote down the air from Mrs. Burns' wood-note wild, is very fond of it; and has given it a celebrity by teaching it to some young ladies of the first fashion here. If you do not like the air enough to give it a place in your collection, please return it. The song you may keep, as I remember it.

There was a Lass, and she was fair.

Tune—Bonnie Jean.

I.

THERE was a lass, and she was fair,
At kirk and market to be seen,
When a' the fairest maids were met,
The fairest maid was bonnie Jean.

II.

And aye she wrought her mammie's wark,
And aye she sang sae merrilie:
The blithest bird upon the bush
Had ne'er a lighter heart than she.

III.

But hawks will rob the tender joys
That bless the little lintwhite's nest:
And frost will blight the fairest flowers,
And love will break the soundest rest.

IV.

Young Robie was the bravest lad,
The flower and pride of a' the glen;
And he had owsen, sheep, and kye,
And wanton naigies nine or ten.

V.

He gaed wi' Jeanie to the tryste,
Herdanc'd wi' Jeanie on the down;
And, lang ere witless Jeanie wist,
Her heart was tint, her peace was stown.

VI.

As in the bosom o' the stream,
The moon-beam dwells at dewy e'en;
So trembling, pure, was tender love
Within the breast o' bonnie Jean.*

* [In the original MS. our Poet asks Mr Thomson if this stanza is not original?—CURRIE.]

VII.

And now she works her mammie's wark,
And aye she sighs wi' care and pain;
Yet wist na what her ail might be,
Or what wad mak her weel again.

VIII.

But did na Jeanie's heart loup light,
And did na joy blink in her e'e,
As Robie tauld a tale o' love
Ae e'enin' on the lily lea?

IX.

The sun was sinking in the west,
The birds sang sweet in ilka grove;
His cheek to hers he fondly prest,
And whisper'd thus his tale o' love:

X.

"O Jeanie fair, I lo'e thee dear;
O canst thou think to fancy me?
Or wilt thou leave thy mammie's cot,
And learn to tent the farms wi' me?"

XI.

"At barn or byre thou shalt na drudge,
Or naething else to trouble thee;
But stray among the heather-bells,
And tent the waving corn wi' me."

XII.

Now what could artless Jeanie do?
She had nae will to say him na:
At length she blush'd a sweet consent,
And love was aye between them twa.

I have some thoughts of inserting in your index, or in my notes, the names of the fair ones, the themes of my songs. I do not mean the name at full; but dashes or asterisms, so as ingenuity may find them out.

The heroine of the foregoing is Miss M., daughter to Mr. M., of D., one of your subscribers. I have not painted her in the rank which she holds in life, but in the dress and character of a cottager. R. B.

[Some of the finest of the songs of Burns were composed in honour of the charms of ladies of my native vale. Jean, the eldest daughter of John M'Murdo, Esq. of Drumlanrig, was the heroine of this exquisite song. The original, presented by the Poet to the family, lies before me: there are many variations, but they are of language rather than of sentiment. It wants the verse which Burns reckoned original:

"As in the bosom of the stream
The moonbeam dwells at dewy e'en;
So trembling pure was tender love
Within the breast o' bonnie Jean."

The first two lines of the eleventh verse stand thus in the manuscript, and perhaps it would be as well to restore them:—

"Thy handsome foot thou shalt na set
In barn or byre to trouble thee."

The homage paid to the graceful forms of the ladies of the M'Murdo family merits notice, were it but to justify the Poet from a charge, brought against him in Ayr-shire, that his beauties were not other men's beauties. The o'erword of an old song seems to have been in his fancy when composing this lyric:—

"Learn to turn the maud wi' me."

—it occurs oftener than once in the manuscript.
—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XXVIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

July, 1793.

I ASSURE you, my dear Sir, that you truly hurt me with your pecuniary parcel. It degrades me in my own eyes. However, to return it would savour of affectation; but, as to any more traffic of that debtor and creditor kind, I swear, by that HONOUR which crowns the upright statue of ROBERT BURNS'S INTEGRITY—on the least motion of it, I will indignantly spurn the by-past transaction, and from that moment commence entire stranger to you! BURNS'S character for generosity of sentiment and independence of mind will, I trust, long outlive any of his wants, which the cold unfeeling ore can supply: at least, I will take care that such a character he shall deserve.

Thank you for my copy of your publication. Never did my eyes behold, in any musical work, such elegance and correctness. Your preface, too, is admirably written: only your partiality to me has made you say too much: however, it will bind me down to double every effort in the future progress of the work. The following are a few remarks on the songs in the list you sent me. I never copy what I write to you, so I may be often tautological, or perhaps contradictory.

"The Flowers o' the Forest" is charming as a poem; and should be, and must be, set to the notes, but, though out of your rule, the three stanzas, beginning

"I hae seen the smiling o' fortune beguiling," are worthy of a place, were it but to immortalize the author of them, who is an old lady of my acquaintance, and at this moment living in Edinburgh. She is a Mrs. Cockburn; I forget of what place; but from Roxburgh-shire. What a charming apostrophe is

"O fickle fortune, why this cruel sporting,
Why, why torment us—poor sons of a day!"

The old ballad, "I wish I were where Helen lies," is silly, to contemptibility. My alteration of it, in Johnson's, is not much better. Mr. Pinkerton, in his, what he calls, ancient ballads (many of them notorious, though beautiful enough, forgeries), has the best set. It is full of his own interpolations,—but no matter.

In my next I will suggest to your consideration a few songs which may have escaped your hurried notice. In the mean time allow me to congratulate you now, as a brother of the quill. You have committed your character and fame; which will now be tried, for ages to come, by the illustrious jury of the SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF TASTE—all whom poesy can please, or music charm.

Being a bard of nature, I have some pretensions to second sight; and I am warranted by the spirit to foretel and affirm that your great-grand-child will hold up your volumes, and say, with honest pride, "This so much admired selection was the work of my ancestor!"

[Much has been said, and not a little written, concerning the refusal of Burns to receive a recompense in money for his labours; he had a right to do as he pleased, but certainly the labourer was worthy of his hire. Had he lived, he might have taken a lesson from Thomson in such matters.—"The publisher," says that gentleman in his preface, "has an exclusive right to all the songs written purposely for his collections, as well as to all the symphonies and accompaniments. And as he did not obtain these without expending a large sum of money, without laborious researches and unwearied exertions, and not until after a correspondence of twenty years with poets, musicians, antiquaries, both at home and abroad, he feels it due to himself distinctly to announce that if any person shall publish any of these songs, or any of the symphonies or accompaniments, he may depend upon being prosecuted for damages, in terms of the Act of Parliament." Nay, even from Burns himself he obtained a document which might have opened the Poet's eyes to the value of his own productions.—"I do hereby certify that all the songs of my writing, published and to be published by Mr. George Thomson of Edinburgh, are so published by my authority. And, moreover, that I never empowered any other person to publish any of the songs written by me for his work. And I authorize him to prosecute any person or persons who shall publish or vend any of those songs without his consent. (Signed) Robert Burns."

The old ballad of "I wish I were where Helen lies," for which the Poet expresses such contempt, is considered by many both beautiful and affecting. Currie seems to suppose that Burns was unacquainted with the genuine old strain, but the song which he altered for the Museum contains proof to the contrary: it is the ancient strain itself; anything but improved by the alterations. Tradition readily supplies many versions—all are beautiful:—

FAIR HELEN OF KIRKCONNELL.

"I wish I were where Helen lies—
Night and day on me she cries;
O that I were where Helen lies,
On fair Kirkconnell lea.

O Helen fair, beyond compare,
I'll make a garland of thy hair,
Shall bind my heart for evermair,
Until the day I die.

Curs'd be the heart that thought the thought,
And curs'd the hand that fir'd the shot,
When in my arms burd Helen dropt,
And died for sake o' me.

O think na but my heart was sair
When my love fell and spak nae mair;
I laid her down wi' meikle care
On fair Kirkconnell lea.

I laid her down, my sword did draw,
Stern was our strife in Kirtle-shaw—
I hew'd him down in pieces sma'
For her that died for me.

O that I were where Helen lies,
Night and day on me she cries,
Out of my bed she bids me rise,
'O come, my love, to me!'

O Helen fair! O Helen chaste!
Were I with thee I would be blest,
Where thou ly'st low, and tak'st thy rest
On fair Kirkconnell lea.

I wish I were where Helen lies,
Night and day on me she cries;
I'm sick of all beneath the skies,
Since my love died for me."

Fair Helen of Kirkconnell belongs to the romantic songs of Scotland; other poets have taken up the story of the lovers, but the strains of the elder bard still triumph.]

No. XXIX.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 1st August, 1793.

DEAR SIR:

I HAD the pleasure of receiving your last two letters, and am happy to find you are quite pleased with the appearance of the first book. When you come to hear the songs sung and accompanied, you will be charmed with them.

"The bonnie brucket Lassie" certainly deserves better verses, and I hope you will match her. "Cauld Kail in Aberdeen," "Let me in this ae night," and several of the livelier airs, wait the muse's leisure: these are peculiarly worthy of her choice gifts: besides, you'll notice that, in airs of this sort, the singer can always do greater justice to the poet than in the slower airs of "The bush aboon Traquair," "Lord Gregory," and the like; for, in the manner the latter are frequently sung, you must be contented with the sound without the sense. Indeed, both the airs and words are disguised by the very slow, languid, psalm-singing style in which they are too often performed: they lose animation and expression altogether, and instead of speaking to the mind, or touching the heart, they cloy upon the ear, and set us a yawning!

Your ballad, "There was a Lass, and she was fair," is simple and beautiful, and shall undoubtedly grace my collection. G. T.

XXX

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

MY DEAR THOMSON:

I HOLD the pen for our friend Clarke, who, at present, is studying the music of the spheres at my elbow. The "Georgium Sidus," he thinks, is rather out of tune; so, until he rectify that matter, he cannot stoop to terrestrial affairs.

He sends you six of the Rondeau subjects, and, if more are wanted, he says you shall have them.

Confound your long stairs!

S. CLARKE.

[The writer of this odd note was Stephen Clarke, teacher and composer of music; who superintended the publication of the Musical Museum, and through Burns was introduced to several good families in Dumfries-shire.]

No. XXXI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

YOUR objection, my dear Sir, to the passages in my song of "Logan Water," is right in one instance; but it is difficult to mend it; if I can I will. The other passage you object to does not appear in the same light to me.

I have tried my hand on "Robin Adair," and, you will probably think, with little success; but it is such a cursed, cramp, out-of-the-way measure, that I despair of doing any thing better to it.

Phyllis the Fair.

Tune—Robin Adair.

I.

WHILE larks with little wing
Fann'd the pure air,
Tasting the breathing spring,
Forth I did fare :
Gay the sun's golden eye
Peep'd o'er the mountains high ;
Such thy morn ! did I cry,
Phyllis the fair.

II.

In each bird's careless song,
Glad did I share ;
While yon wild flowers among,
Chance led me there :
Sweet to the opening day,
Rosebuds bent the dewy spray ;
Such thy bloom ! did I say,
Phyllis the fair.

III.

Down in a shady walk
Doves cooing were ;
I mark'd the cruel hawk
Caught in a snare :
So kind may fortune be,
Such make his destiny !
He who would injure thee,
Phyllis the fair.

So much for Namby-pamby. I may, after all, try my hand on it in Scots verse. There I always find myself most at home.

I have just put the last hand to the song I meant for "Cauld Kail in Aberdeen." If it suits you to insert it, I shall be pleased, as the heroine is a favourite of mine : if not, I shall also be pleased ; because I wish, and will be glad, to see you act decidedly on the business. 'Tis a tribute as a man of taste, and as an editor, which you owe yourself. R. B.

[Phyllis M'Curdo is the heroine of this song : Burns wrote it at the request of Stephen Clarke the musician, who believed himself in love with his "charming pupil."]

No. XXXII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

August, 1793.

MY GOOD SIR,

I CONSIDER it one of the most agreeable circumstances attending this publication of mine that it has procured me so many of your much valued epistles. Pray make my acknowledgments to St. Stephen for the tunes : tell him I admit the justness of his complaint on my staircase conveyed in his laconic postscript to your jeu d'esprit ; which I perused more than once, without discovering exactly whether your discussion was music, astronomy, or politics : though a sagacious friend, acquainted with the convivial habits of the poet and the musician, offered me a bet, of two to one, you were just drowning care together ; that an empty bowl was the only thing that would deeply affect you, and the only matter you could then study how to remedy !

I shall be glad to see you give "Robin Adair" a Scottish dress. Peter is furnishing him with an English suit for a change, and you are well matched together. Robin's air is excellent, though he certainly has an out-of-the-way measure as ever poor Parnassian wight was plagued with.—I wish you would invoke the muse for a single elegant stanza to be substituted for the concluding objectionable verses of "Down the Burn, Davie," so that this most exquisite song may no longer be excluded from good company.

Mr. Allan has made an inimitable drawing from your "John Anderson, my Jo," which I am to have engraved as a frontispiece to the humorous class of songs ; you will be quite charmed with it, I promise you. The old couple are seated by the fire-side. Mrs. Anderson, in great good-humour, is clapping John's shoulders, while he smiles and looks at her with such glee as to shew that he fully recollects the pleasant days and nights when they were "first acquent." The drawing would do honour to the pencil of Teniers. G. T.

["The 'Mrs. Anderson' on whom this praise is bestowed is what the old ballad calls

'A carlin—a rig-widdie earlin,' and seems fitter for a wife to him of Linkum-doddie than to be spouse to cantie and douce John. She has the look of an ogress : her nose resembles a ram-horn, and the fingers which she is about to apply to her husband's lyartlocks are as hard as lobster-claws."—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XXXIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

THAT crinkum-crankum tune "Robin Adair" has run so in my head, and I succeeded so ill in my last attempt, that I have ventured, in this morning's walk, one essay more. You, my dear Sir, will remember an unfortunate part of our worthy friend Cunningham's story, which happened about three years ago. That struck my fancy, and I endeavoured to do the idea justice, as follows:—

Had I a Cave.

Tune—Robin Adair.

I.

HAD I a cave on some wild, distant shore,
Where the winds howl to the waves' dashing
There would I weep my woes, [roar;
There seek my lost repose,
Till grief my eyes should close,
Ne'er to wake more.

II.

Fairest of womankind, canst thou declare
All thy fond plighted vows—fleeing as air!
To thy new lover hie,
Laugh o'er thy perjury,
Then in thy bosom try
What peace is there!

By the way, I have met with a musical Highlander, in Breadalbane's Fencibles, which are quartered here, who assures me that he well remembers his mother's singing Gaelic songs to both "Robin Adair" and "Gramachree." They certainly have more of the Scotch than the Irish taste in them.

This man comes from the vicinity of Inverness; so it could not be any intercourse with Ireland that could bring them;—except, what I shrewdly suspect to be the case, the wandering minstrels, harpers, and pipers, used to go frequently errant through the wilds both of Scotland and Ireland, and so some favourite airs might be common to both. A case in point—They have lately, in Ireland, published an Irish air, as they say, called "Caun du delish." The fact is, in a publication of Corri's a great while ago, you will find the same air, called a Highland one, with a Gaelic song set to it. Its name there, I think, is "Oran Gaoil," and a fine air it is. Do ask honest Allan, or the Rev. Gaelic parson,* about these matters.

R. B.

No. XXXIV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

"Let me in this ae night" I will re-consider. I am glad that you are pleased with my song, "Had I a cave," &c., as I liked it myself.

I walked out yesterday evening, with a volume of the Museum in my hand; when, turning up "Allan Water," "What numbers shall the muse repeat," &c., as the words appeared to me rather unworthy of so fine an air, and recollecting that it is on your list, I sat and raved under the shade of an old thorn, 'till I wrote one to suit the measure. I may be wrong; but I think it not in my worst style. You must know, that in Ramsay's "Tea Table," where the modern song first appeared, the ancient name of the tune, Allan says, is "Allan Water;" or, "My love Annie's very bonnie." This last has certainly been a line of the original song; so I took up the idea, and, as you will see, have introduced the line in its place, which, I presume, it formerly occupied; though I likewise give you a choosing line, if it should not hit the cut of your fancy:—

By Allan Stream.

Tune—"Allan Water."

I.

By Allan stream I chanc'd to reve
While Phœbus sank beyond Benledi; †
The winds were whispering through the grove,
The yellow corn was waving ready:
I listen'd to a lover's sang,
And thought on youthfu' pleasures many;
And aye the wild wood echoes rang—
O dearly do I love thee, Annie! ‡

II.

O, happy be the woodbine bower,
Nae nightly bogle make it eerie;
Nor ever sorrow stain the hour,
The place and time I met my dearie!
Her head upon my throbbing breast,
She, sinking, said "I'm thine for ever!"
While mony a kiss the seal imprest,
The sacred vow,—we ne'er should sever.

III.

The haunt o' spring's the primrose brac,
The simmer joys the flocks to follow;
How cheery, thro' her shortening day,
Is autumn, in her weeds o' yellow!
But can they melt the glowing heart,
Or chain the soul in speechless pleasure,
Or thro' each nerve the rapture dart,
Like meeting her, our bosom's treasure?

Bravo! say I: it is a good song. Should you think so too, (not else,) you can set the music to it, and let the other follow as English verses.

Autumn is my propitious season. I make more verses in it than all the year else.

God bless you! R. B.

* The Gaelic parson referred to was, we are informed, the Rev. Joseph Robertson Macgregor.

† A mountain west of Strath-Allan, 3,009 feet high.—R.B.

‡ Or, "O my love Annie's very bonnie."—R.B.

[The fancy of Burns took a flight northwards in conceiving this song. Allan Water gives its name to the strath. The Poet might have found all that he wanted in his immediate neighbourhood: Criffel or Queensberry rise loftily enough, and Annan Water is sufficiently pure for all the purposes of song: moreover, the old lyric from which he took the idea belongs to the district:—

“ O Annan Water’s wide and deep,
And my love Annie’s wondrous bonnie
Shall I be laith to weet my feet
For her whom I love best of onie?
Gar saddle me my bonnie black,
Gar saddle soon and make him ready,
For I will down the Gatehope-slack
And a’ to see my bonnie lady.”

Another ancient strain has a similarity of thought and language—the lover seems to be a cautious person:

“ O Annan Water’s wading deep,
Yet I am loth to weet my feet;
But if ye’ll consent to marry me,
I’ll hire a horse to carry thee.”

The Annan is a beautiful river with alternate pool and stream, and liable, like all mountain waters, to sudden floods. Burns was often on its banks; amongst its woods he sought for smugglers, or wooed the muses, as circumstances required.—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
No. XXXV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

Is “ Whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad,” one of your airs? I admire it much; and yesterday I set the following verses to it. Urbani, whom I have met with here, begged them of me, as he admires the air much; but, as I understand that he looks with rather an evil eye on your work, I did not choose to comply. However, if the song does not suit your taste, I may possibly send it him. The set of the air which I had in my eye is in Johnson’s Museum.

Ⓞ Whistle, and I’ll come to you.

I.

O WHISTLE, and I’ll come to thee, my lad,
O whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad:
Tho’ father and mither and a’ should gae mad,
O whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad.

* [This song is founded on some old lines to the same air, which the Poet has wrought into the first verse. There are several variations in Burns’s own hand.

“ O whistle, and I’ll come to thee, my jo,
O whistle, and I’ll come to thee, my jo,
Tho’ father and mother and a’ should say no,
O whistle, and I’ll come to thee, my jo.”

From one of the variations it appears that the name of the heroine was Jeanie:—

But warily tent, when you come to court me,
And come na unless the back-yett be a-gee;
Syne up the back-stile, and let naeboddy see,
And come as ye were na comin’ to me,
And come as ye were na comin’ to me.

II.

At Kirk, or at market, whene’er ye meet me,
Gang by me as tho’ that ye car’d na a flie;
But steal me a blink o’ your bonnie black e’e,
Yet look as ye were na lookin’ at me,
Yet look as ye were na lookin’ at me.

III.

Aye vow and protest that ye care na for me,
And whyles ye may lightly my beauty a wee;
But court na anither, tho’ jokin’ ye be,
For fear that she wyle your fancy frae me,
For fear that she wyle your fancy frae me.
O whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad,
O whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad:
Tho’ father and mither and a’ should gae mad,
O whistle, and I’ll come to you, my lad.*

Another favourite air of mine is, “ The muckin’ o’ Geordie’s byre.” When sung slow, with expression, I have wished that it had had better poetry: that, I have endeavoured to supply, as follows:—

Adown winding Nith.

I.

ADOWN winding Nith I did wander,
To mark the sweet flowers as they spring;
Adown winding Nith I did wander,
Of Phillis to muse and to sing.

Awa wi’ your belles and your beauties,
They never wi’ her can compare:
Whaever has met wi’ my Phillis!
Has met wi’ the queen o’ the fair.

II.

The daisy amus’d my fond fancy,
So artless, so simple, so wild;
Thou emblem, said I, o’ my Phillis,
For she is simplicity’s child.

III.

The rose-bud’s the blush o’ my charmer,
Her sweet balmy lip when ’tis prest:
How fair and how pure is the lily,
But fairer and purer her breast!

IV.

Yon knot of gay flowers in the arbour,
They ne’er wi’ my Phillis can vie:
Her breath is the breath o’ the woodbine,
Its dew-drop o’ diamond, her eye.

“ Though father and mother and a’ should gae mad,
Thy Jeanie will venture wi’ thee, my lad.”

[See Letter LXXIX.]

Who the lady was no one has told us: Jeanies abounded in the district: some of them were eminently beautiful; yet none, save one, was likely to countenance a lover who made his appearance under the cloud of night and courted concealment.]

V.

Her voice is the song of the morning,
That wakes thro' the green-spreading grove,
When Phœbus peeps over the mountains,
On music, and pleasure, and love.

VI.

But beauty how frail and how fleeting,
The bloom of a fine summer's day!
While worth in the mind o' my Phillis
Will flourish without a decay.

Awa wi' your belles and your beauties,
They never wi' her can compare:
Whaever has met wi' my Phillis
Has met wi' the queen o' the fair.*

Mr. Clarke begs you to give Miss Phillis a corner in your book, as she is a particular flame of his. She is a Miss P. M., sister to "Bonnie Jean." They are both pupils of his. You shall hear from me, the very first grist I get from my rhyming-mill.

R. B.

No. XXXVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793.

THAT tune, "Cauld Kail," is such a favourite of yours that I once more roved out yesterday for a gloamin'-shot at the muses; † when the muse that presides o'er the shores of Nith, or rather my old inspiring dearest nymph, Coila, whispered me the following. I have two reasons for thinking that it was my early, sweet simple inspirer that was by my elbow, "smooth gliding without step," and pouring the song on my glowing fancy. In the first place, since I left Coila's native haunts, not a fragment of a poet has arisen to cheer her solitary musings, by catching inspiration from her; so I more than suspect that she has followed me hither, or at least makes me occasional visits: secondly, the last stanza of this song I send you is the very words that Coila taught me many years ago, and which I set to an old Scots reel in Johnson's Museum.

* [This song is not indebted to old verses for either its sentiments or its character. The young lady who inspired it was Miss Phillis M'Murdo, afterwards Mrs. Norman Lockhart, of Carnwath. "This song," says Currie, "though certainly beautiful, would appear to more advantage without the chorus, as is indeed the case with several other songs of our author." The chorus seems no incumbrance in this instance; it maintains the leading sentiment, and, in singing, enables the other voices to take a share, and give additional emphasis to the praise bestowed on this Nithsdale beauty. The former editors of Burns seem to have disliked choruses greatly; they are

Come, let me take Thee.

Air—Cauld Kail.

I.

COME, let me take thee to my breast,
And pledge we ne'er shall sunder;
And I shall spurn as vilest dust
The world's wealth and grandeur:
And do I hear my Jeanie own
That equal transports move her?
I ask for dearest life alone
That I may live to love her.

II.

Thus in my arms, wi' a' thy charms,
I clasp my countless treasure;
I'll seek nae mair o' heaven to share,
Than sic a moment's pleasure:
And by thy een, sae bonnie blue,
I swear I'm thine for ever!
And on thy lips I seal my vow,
And break it shall I never!

If you think the above will suit your idea of your favourite air, I shall be highly pleased. "The last time I came o'er the moor" I cannot meddle with, as to mending it; and the musical world have been so long accustomed to Ramsay's words that a different song, though positively superior, would not be so well received. I am not fond of choruses to songs, so I have not made one for the foregoing. R.B.

[The legends of the Vale of Nith say that the heroine of "Come let me take thee to my breast," was Jean Lorimer. Burns was so much under the influence of beauty that he is never supposed to sing without some living fair one in his mind; and, as the "Lass of Craigieburn" was far from coy, popular belief has seated her beside the Poet, and inspired him with her blue eyes and rosy lips. Be this as it may, it is quite evident that nothing is borrowed from the old words of the air to which the song is adapted.]

No. XXXVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

August, 1793

Dainty Dabie.

I.

Now rosy May comes in wi' flowers,
To deck her gay, green-spreading bowers, sometimes omitted, though the song cannot be sung without them. It is true that the chorus seldom carries on the story; but then that is not its object; it enables the company to take a share in the entertainment, and no one need be told with what effect two or three well-tuned voices take up the o'erword at the end of each verse.—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

† [Gloaming—twilight. A beautiful poetic word which ought to be adopted in England. A gloaming-shot, a twilight interview.—CURRIE.]

The word gloaming is now adopted by the best writers in the English language, as a peculiarly sweet and poetical synonyme.]

And now comes in my happy hours,
To wander wi' my Davie.

Meet me on the warlock knowe,
Dainty Davie, dainty Davie,
There I'll spend the day wi' you,
My ain dear dainty Davie.

II.

The crystal waters round us fa',
The merry birds are lovers a',
The scented breezes round us blow,
A wandering wi' my Davie.

III.

When purple morning starts the hare,
To steal upon her early fare,
Then thro' the dews I will repair,
To meet my faithfu' Davie.

IV.

When day, expiring in the west,
The curtain draws o' nature's rest,
I flee to his arms I lo'e best,
And that's my ain dear Davie.

Meet me on the warlock knowe,
Bonnie Davie, dainty Davie,
There I'll spend the day wi' you,
My ain dear dainty Davie.

So much for Davie. The chorus, you know, is to the low part of the tune.—See Clarke's set of it in the Museum.

N.B. In the Museum they have drawled out the tune to twelve lines of poetry, which is cursed nonsense. Four lines of song, and four of chorus, is the way. R. B.

[“The reader will find an earlier song to this air, under the title of “When Rosy May comes in wi' Flowers.” The Poet has added a very happy chorus, and made some alterations; they are curious—as showing the care with which he sometimes revised compositions from which he hoped for fame.—‘Dainty Davie’ is the name of an old merry song, from which Burns has borrowed nothing save the title and the measure. It relates the adventure of David Williamson, a preacher of the days of the Covenant: he was pursued by Dalzell's dragoons, and seeking refuge in the house of Cherrytrees, the devout lady put the man of God into a bed beside her daughter to hide him from the men of Belial: the return which the reverend gentleman made for this is set forth very graphically in the old verses. The young lady sings—

“Being pursued by a dragoon,
Within my bed he was laid down,
And weel I wat he was worth his room—
My douce, my dainty Davie.”

The lady of Cherrytrees is not the only example of strong faith in the fair sex. Sir

Robert Strange, the eminent engraver, fled in his youth from a field of battle, where he had fought in vain for his native princes, and, being hotly pursued, sought refuge in a gentleman's house, where a lady—beautiful and young—concealed him under her hooped petticoat. When the days of peace came and fortune smiled, the grateful rebel wooed his protectress and made her his wife: she was equally witty and lovely, and figured among the fashionables of London till the death of her husband.

“The Nithsdale lady went to no such extremities in her affection—her name had not transpired—the name of one who had courage to keep a tryste on the ‘Warlock knowe’ is worthy of remembrance.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XXXVIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 1st September, 1793.

MY DEAR SIR:

SINCE writing you last, I have received half a dozen songs, with which I am delighted beyond expression. The humour and fancy of “Whistle, and I'll come to you, my lad,” will render it nearly as great a favourite as “Duncan Gray.” “Come, let me take thee to my breast,”—“Adown winding Nith,” and “By Allan stream,” &c., are full of imagination and feeling, and sweetly suit the airs for which they are intended.—“Had I a cave on some wild distant shore” is a striking and affecting composition. Our friend, to whose story it refers, read it with a swelling heart, I assure you.—The union we are now forming, I think, can never be broken: these songs of yours will descend with the music to the latest posterity, and will be fondly cherished so long as genius, taste, and sensibility exist in our island.

While the muse seems so propitious, I think it right to inclose a list of all the favours I have to ask of her—no fewer than twenty and three! I have burdened the pleasant Peter with as many as it is probable he will attend to: most of the remaining airs would puzzle the English poet not a little; they are of that peculiar measure and rhythm that they must be familiar to him who writes for them. G. T.

[“Thomson at first spoke of twenty or five and twenty songs: at the time when he wrote this letter he had received seven and twenty, yet he requests three and twenty more because the muse was propitious, and the Poet enthusiastic! It will be seen that the list was not limited to this number. When Burns refused money, it was for the songs which he had undertaken to supply: there is no word of any recompense for the new batch of lyrics.”—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XXXIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Sept. 1793.

You may readily trust, my dear Sir, that any exertion in my power is heartily at your service. But one thing I must hint to you; the very name of Peter Pindar is of great service to your publication, so get a verse from him now and then: though I have no objection, as well as I can, to bear the burden of the business.

You know that my pretensions to musical taste are merely a few of nature's instincts, untaught and untutored by art. For this reason, many musical compositions, particularly where much of the merit lies in counterpoint, however they may transport and ravish the ears of you connoisseurs, affect my simple lug no otherwise than merely as melodious din. On the other hand, by way of amends, I am delighted with many little melodies which the learned musician despises as silly and insipid. I do not know whether the old air, "Hey, tuttie taitie," may rank among this number; but well I know that, with Fraser's hautyboy, it has often filled my eyes with tears. There is a tradition, which I have met with in many places of Scotland, that it was Robert Bruce's march at the battle of Bannock-burn. This thought, in my solitary wanderings, warmed me to a pitch of enthusiasm on the theme of liberty and independence, which I threw into a kind of Scottish ode, fitted to the air that one might suppose to be the gallant Royal Scot's address to his heroic followers on that eventful morning:—

Bruce's Address to his Army at Bannockburn.

Tune—Hey, tuttie taitie.

I.

SCOTS, wha hae wi' WALLACE bled,
Scots, wham BRUCE has often led;
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to Victorie!

II.

Now's the day, and now's the hour;
See the front o' battle lour;
See approach proud Edward's pow'r—
Chains and slaverie!

III.

Wha will be a traitor-knave?
Wha can fill a coward's grave?
Wha sae base as be a slave?
Let him turn and flee!

IV.

Wha for SCOTLAND's king and law,
FREEDOM'S sword will strongly draw;
Free-man stand, or Free-man fa'?
Let him follow me!

V.

By Oppression's woes and pains!
By your sons in servile chains!
We will drain our dearest veins,
But they shall be free!

VI.

Lay the proud usurpers low!
Tyrants fall in every foe!
LIBERTY in every blow!—
Let us do, or die!

So may God ever defend the cause of truth and liberty, as he did that day!—Amen.

P.S. I showed the air to Urbani, who was highly pleased with it, and begged me to make soft verses for it, but I had no idea of giving myself any trouble on the subject, till the accidental recollection of that glorious struggle for freedom, associated with the glowing ideas of some other struggles of the same nature, not quite so ancient, roused my rhyming mania. Clarke's set of the tune, with his bass, you will find in the Museum; though I am afraid that the air is not what will entitle it to a place in your elegant selection. R. B.

[It is related, by Syme of Ryedale, that Burns composed this noble song under the influence of a storm of rain and lightning among the wilds of Glenken, in Galloway. When "the rain and the whirlwind came abroad," the Poet regarded them not: he neither drew his hat over his brow, nor urged his pony onward, but seemed lost in thought. The fruit of this silence was the "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled;" an extraordinary song produced in an extraordinary manner.

Something of the spirit of this far-famed song is visible in memoranda, made by Burns on visiting the field of battle in August, 1787.—"Come on to Bannockburn. Shewn the old house where James III. finished so tragically his unfortunate life. The field of Bannockburn: the hole in the stone where glorious Bruce set his standard. Here no Scot can pass uninterested. I fancy to myself that I see my gallant, heroic countrymen, coming o'er the hill and down upon the plunderers of their country—the murderers of their fathers: noble revenge and just hate glowing in every vein, striding more and more eagerly as they approach the oppressive, insulting, blood-thirsty foe! I see them meet in gloriously-triumphant congratulation on the victorious field, exulting in their heroic royal leader, and rescued liberty and independence!"

No. XL.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Sept. 1793.

I DARE say, my dear Sir, that you will begin to think my correspondence is persecution. No matter, I can't help it; a ballad is my hobby-horse, which, though otherwise a simple sort of harmless idiotical beast enough, has yet this blessed headstrong property, that, when once it has fairly made off with a hapless wight, it gets so enamoured with the tinkle-gingle, tinkle-gingle of its own bells, that it is sure to run poor pilgarlick, the bedlam jockey, quite beyond any useful point or post in the common race of man.

The following song I have composed for "Oran-gaioil," the Highland air that, you tell me in your last, you have resolved to give a place to in your book. I have this moment finished the song, so you have it glowing from the mint. If it suit you, well!—If not, 'tis also well!

R. B.

Behold the Hour.

Tune—Oran-gaioil

I.

BEHOLD the hour, the boat arrive,
Thou goest, thou darling of my heart!
Sever'd from thee can I survive?
But fate has will'd, and we must part.
I'll often greet this surging swell,
Yon distant isle will often hail:
"E'en here I took the last farewell;
There, latest mark'd her vanish'd sail."

II.

Along the solitary shore,
While flitting sea-fowl round me cry,
Across the rolling, dashing roar,
I'll westward turn my wistful eye:
Happy, thou Indian grove, I'll say,
Where now my Nancy's path may be!
While thro' thy sweets she loves to stray,
O, tell me, does she muse on me?

[The inspirer of this song is said to have been Clarinda: she meditated, it seems, a voyage to a certain Western isle, and the Poet has imagined the last farewell taken, and the parting looks interchanged. Some of his most impassioned lyrics were composed in honour of this accomplished lady.]

* [In the third volume of Thomson's Collection we find the following remarks:—"The Poet originally intended this noble strain for the air of Hey Tutti Taitie; but on a suggestion from the editor, who then thought Lewie Gordon a better

No. XLI.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 5th Sept. 1793.

I BELIEVE it is generally allowed that the greatest modesty is the sure attendant of the greatest merit. While you are sending me verses that even Shakspeare might be proud to own, you speak of them as if they were ordinary productions! Your heroic ode is, to me, the noblest composition of the kind in the Scottish language. I happened to dine yesterday with a party of your friends, to whom I read it. They were all charmed with it, entreated me to find out a suitable air for it, and reprobated the idea of giving it a tune so totally devoid of interest or grandeur as Hey, tuttie taitie. Assuredly your partiality for this tune must arise from the ideas associated in your mind by the tradition concerning it; for I never heard any person, and I have conversed again and again with the greatest enthusiasts for Scottish airs—I say, I never heard any one speak of it as worthy of notice

I have been running over the whole hundred airs of which I lately sent you the list, and I think Lewie Gordon is most happily adapted to your ode; at least with a very slight variation of the fourth line, which I shall presently submit to you. There is in Lewie Gordon more of the grand than the plaintive, particularly when it is sung with a degree of spirit which your words would oblige the singer to give it. I would have no scruple about substituting your ode in the room of "Lewie Gordon," which has neither the interest, the grandeur, nor the poetry that characterize your verses. Now the variation I have to suggest upon the last line of each verse—the only line too short for the air—is as follows:—

Verse 1st, Or to glorious victorie.2nd, Chains—chains and slaverie.3rd, Let him, let him turn and flee.4th, Let him bravely follow me.5th, But they shall, they shall be free.6th, Let us, let us do or die!

If you connect each line with its own verse, I do not think you will find that either the sentiment or the expression loses any of its energy. The only line which I dislike in the whole of the song is, "Welcome to your gory bed." Would not another word be preferable to "welcome?" In your next I will expect to be informed whether you agree to what I have proposed. The little alterations I submit with the greatest deference.*

tune for the words, they were united together, and published in the preceding volume. The editor, however, having since examined the air Hey Tutti Taitie with more particular attention, frankly owns that he has changed his opinion; and that

The beauty of the verses you have made for "Oran-gaol" will ensure celebrity to the air.

G. T.

[The simple energy of this noble war-ode is weakened greatly by lengthening the fourth line of each verse to suit the air of Lewie Gordon. These changes are now generally rejected both by reader and singer. A more finished version of the Ode appears in p. 476.]

No. XLII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

September, 1793.

I HAVE received your list, my dear Sir, and here go my observations on it.*

"Down the burn, Davie." I have this moment tried an alteration, leaving out the last half of the third stanza, and the first half of the last stanza, thus:—

As down the burn they took their way,
And thro' the flowery dale;
His cheek to hers he aft did lay,
And love was aye the tale.
With "Mary, when shall we return,
Sic pleasure to renew?"
Quoth Mary, "Love, I like the burn,
And aye shall follow you."†

"Through the wood, laddie"—I am decidedly of opinion that both in this, and "There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame," the second or high part of the tune being a repetition of the first part an octave higher, is only for instrumental music, and would be much better omitted in singing.

"Cowden-knowes." Remember, in your index, that the song in pure English to this tune, beginning—

"When summer comes, the swains on Tweed," is the production of Crawford. Robert was his Christian name.

"Laddie, lie near me," must lie by me for some time. I do not know the air; and, until I am complete master of a tune, in my own singing (such as it is), I can never compose for it. My way is: I consider the poetic sentiment correspondent to my idea of the musical expression; then choose my theme; begin one stanza—when that is composed, which is generally the most difficult part of the business, I walk out, sit down now and then, look out for objects in nature round me that are in unison or harmony with the cogitations of my fancy, and workings of my bosom; humming every now and then the air, with the verses I have framed. When I feel my muse beginning to jade, I retire to the solitary fire-side of my study, and there commit my effusions to paper; swinging at intervals on the hind-legs of my elbow-chair, by way of calling forth my own critical strictures, as my pen goes on. Seriously, this, at home, is almost invariably my way.

What cursed egotism!

"Gil Morris" I am for leaving out. It is a plaguy length; the air itself is never sung, and its place can be well supplied by one or two songs for fine airs that are not in your list. For instance, "Craigie-burn wood," and "Roy's Wife." The first, beside its intrinsic merit, has novelty; and the last has high merit as well as great celebrity. I have the original words of a song for the last air, in the hand-writing of the lady who composed it: and they are superior to any edition of the song which the public has yet seen. †

"Highland laddie." The old set will please a mere Scotch ear best; and the new an Italianized one. There is a third, and, what Oswald calls, the old "Highland laddie," which pleases me more than either of them. It is sometimes called "Jinglan Johnnie;" it being the air of an old humorous tawdry song of that name. You will find it in the Museum, "I hae been at Crookieden," &c. I would advise you, in this musical quandary, to offer up your prayers to the muses for inspiring direction; and, in the mean time, waiting for this direction, bestow a libation to Bacchus; and there is no doubt but you will hit on a judicious choice. Probatum est.

"Auld Sir Simon," I must beg you to leave out, and put in its place, "The Quaker's Wife."

"Blythe hae I been o'er the hill," is one of the finest songs I ever made in my life; and, besides, is composed on a young lady, positively the most beautiful, lovely woman in the world. As I purpose giving you the names and designations of all my heroines, to appear in some future edition of your work, perhaps half a century hence, you must certainly include "The bonniest lass in a' the world" in your collection.

"Dainty Davie," I have heard sung, nineteen thousand, nine hundred and ninety-nine times, and always with the chorus to the low part of the tune; and nothing has surprised me he thinks it much better adapted for giving energy to the poetry than the air of Lewie Gordon. He therefore sent it to Haydn, who has entered into the spirit of it with a felicity peculiar to himself; his inimitable symphonies and accompaniments render it completely martial and highly characteristic of the heroic verses. It is worthy of remark that this appears to be the oldest Scottish air concerning which anything like evidence is to be found.]

* Mr. Thomson's list of songs for his publication. In his remarks, the Bard proceeds in order, and goes through the whole; but on many of them he merely signifies his approbation. All his remarks of any importance are presented to the reader.—CURRIE.

† This alteration Thomson has adopted, instead of the last stanza of the original song, which is objectionable in point of delicacy.—CURRIE.

‡ This song, so much admired by our bard, appears in No. LXVI.

so much as your opinion on this subject. If it will not suit, as I proposed, we will lay two of the stanzas together, and then make the chorus follow.

"Fee him, father."—I inclose you Fraser's set of this tune when he plays it slow; in fact, he makes it the language of despair. I shall here give you two stanzas in that style, merely to try if it will be any improvement. Were it possible, in singing, to give it half the pathos which Fraser gives it in playing, it would make an admirably pathetic song. I do not give these verses for any merit they have. I composed them at the time in which "Patie Allan's Mither died, that was, about the back o' midnight;" and by the lee-side of a bowl of punch, which had overset every mortal in company, except the hautbois and the muse.

Thou hast left me ever.

Tune—Fee him, Father.

I.

THOU hast left me ever, Jamie!
 Thou hast left me ever;
 Thou hast left me ever, Jamie!
 Thou hast left me ever.
 Aften hast thou vow'd that death
 Only should us sever;
 Now thou'st left thy lass for aye—
 I maun see thee never, Jamie,
 I'll see thee never!

II.

Thou hast me forsaken, Jamie!
 Thou hast me forsaken;
 Thou hast me forsaken, Jamie!
 Thou hast me forsaken.
 Thou canst love anither jo,
 While my heart is breaking:
 Soon my weary een I'll close—
 Never mair to waken, Jamie,
 Ne'er mair to waken!

[The Poet left these exquisite verses unfinished: it was his intention to have added another stanza, but he either forgot or failed to find the muse in a suitable mood. Though a fragment, the song, when sung with proper feeling, never fails to make a deep impression. "The Scotch," says Currie, "employ the abbreviation 'I'll' or 'I shall,' as well as 'I will,' and it is for 'I shall' it is used in this song. In Annandale, as in the northern counties of England, for 'I shall' they use 'I se.'"]

"Jockey and Jenny" I would discard, and in its place would put "There's nae luck about the house," which has a very pleasant air; and which is positively the finest love-ballad in that style in the Scottish, or perhaps in any other, language. "When she came ben she bobbet," as an air, is more beautiful than either, and in the andante way would unite with a charming sentimental ballad.

"Saw ye my Father?" is one of my greatest favorites. The evening before last I wandered out and began a tender song, in what I think is its native style. I must premise that the old way, and the way to give most effect, is to have no starting note, as the fiddlers call it, but to burst at once into the pathos. Every country girl sings—"Saw ye my Father?" &c.

My song is but just begun; and I should like, before I proceed, to know your opinion of it. I have sprinkled it with the Scottish dialect, but it may be easily turned into correct English.*

"Todlin hame." Urbani mentioned an idea of his, which has long been mine—that this air is highly susceptible of pathos: accordingly, you will soon hear him at your concert try it to a song of mine in the Museum—"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon." One song more and I have done—"Auld lang syne." The air is but mediocre; but the following song, the old song of the olden times, and which has never been in print, nor even in manuscript, until I took it down from an old man's singing, is enough to recommend any air:—

Auld lang syne.

I.

SHOULD auld acquaintance be forgot,
 And never brought to min' ?
 Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
 And days o' lang syne ?
 For auld lang syne, my dear,
 For auld lang syne,
 We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
 For auld lang syne!

II.

We twa hae run about the braes,
 And pu'd the gowans fine;
 But we've wandered mony a weary foot,
 Sin auld lang syne.

III.

We twa hae paid't i' the burn,
 Frae mornin' sun till dine:
 But seas between us braid hae roar'd,
 Sin auld lang syne.

IV.

And here's a hand, my trusty fiere,
 And gie's a hand o' thine;
 And we'll tak a right guid willie-waught,
 For auld lang syne!

* The song here alluded to appears entire in an English dress in No. XLV. beginning,
 "Where are the joys I hae met in the morning."

The Scottish version of the first four verses which the Poet submits to Thomson in this letter differs in a very slight degree.

V.

And surely ye'll be your pint-stoup,
And surely I'll be mine;
And we'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
For auld lang syne.

For auld lang syne, my dear,
For auld lang syne,
We'll tak a cup o' kindness yet,
For auld lang syne!

Now, I suppose, I have tired your patience fairly. You must, after all is over, have a number of ballads, properly so called. "Gil Morice," "Tranent Muir," "Macpherson's farewell," "Battle of Sherriff Muir," or, "We ran and they ran" (I know the author of this charming ballad, and his history), "Hardiknute," "Barbara Allan" (I can furnish a finer set of this tune than any that has yet appeared); and besides do you know that I really have the old tune to which "The Cherry and the Slae" was sung; and which is mentioned as a well known air in "Scotland's Complaint," a book published before poor Mary's days. It was then called "The banks o' Helicon;" an old poem which Pinkerton has brought to light. You will see all this in Tytler's history of Scottish music. The tune, to a learned ear, may have no great merit; but it is a great curiosity. I have a good many original things of this kind. R. B.

["Auld Lang Syne" is one of those lyrics which owes its conception to the olden muse, and all the beauty of its language and sentiment to the modern. Burns introduced it to Thomson as an effort of an old minstrel, and he wrote thus to Mrs. Dunlop:—"Light be the turf on the breast of the heaven-inspired poet who composed this glorious fragment!" In this sentiment millions will concur. As he professed to have taken it down from the lips of an old man—one of those old men whom true poets alone can meet with—we need not seek for the original in our collections. The "Auld Lang Syne" of Ramsay's Miscellany helps us to a line or so:—

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot,
Though they return wi' scars;
These are the noble hero's lot,
Obtained in glorious wars."

We subjoin the earliest copy of this song, printed before 1700, from which it will be seen that, notwithstanding the Poet's resolute disclaimer, the merits of his version are peculiarly his own:—

AULD LANGSYNE.

To its own proper tune.

SHOULD auld acquaintance be forgot
And never thought upon,
The flames of love extinguished,
And freely past and gone;
Is thy kind heart, now grown so cold,
In that loving breast of thine,
That thou can'st never once reflect
On auld langsyne?

Where are thy protestations—
Thy vows and oaths, my dear,
Thou made to me, and I to thee,
In register yet clear;
Is faith and truth so violate
To the immortal gods divine,
That thou can'st never once reflect
On auld langsyne?

Is't Cupid's fears, or frostie cares,
That makes thy sp'rits decay?
Or is't some object of more worth
That's stol'n thy heart away?
Or some desert makes thee neglect
Her once so much was thine,
That thou can'st never once reflect
On auld langsyne?

Is't worldly cares so desperate,
That makes thee to despair?
Is't that makes thee exasperate,
And makes thee to forbear?
If thou of that were free as I,
Thou surely should be mine,
And then, of new, we would renew
Kind auld langsyne.

But since that nothing can prevail,
And all hope now is vain,
From these rejected eyes of mine
Still showers of tears shall rain;
And though thou hast me now forgot,
Yet I'll continue thine,
Yea, though thou hast me now forgot,
And auld langsyne.

If e'er I have a house, my dear,
That's truly called mine,
And can afford but country cheer,
Or aught that's good therein;
Tho' thou were rebel to the king,
And beat with wind and rain,
Thou'rt sure thyself of welcome, love,
For auld langsyne.]

No. XLIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

September, 1793.

I AM happy, my dear Sir, that my ode pleases you so much. Your idea, "honour's bed," is, though a beautiful, a hackneyed idea; so, if you please, we will let the line stand as it is. I have altered the song as follows:—

Ode.

BRUCE'S ADDRESS TO HIS TROOPS AT BANNOCKBURN.*Tune—Lewis Gordon.

I.

SCOTS, wha hae wi' WALLACE † bled ;
 Scots, wham BRUCE has aften led ;
 Welcome to your gory bed,
 Or to glorious victorie !

* [“The field on which this memorable battle was fought is annually visited by English tourists, and they seldom leave it without carrying away something to remind them of the spot. Some even invaded the sanctity of the ‘Bore stone,’ in which the standard of Bruce was placed, and carried bits with them as specimens. Those who reflect rightly on the upshot of the contest feel that in the triumph of free-born men the great cause of liberty triumphed : no historian, save one with a contracted heart—nor enlightened statesman, can regard the struggles of Scotland with other feelings than those of sympathy. Few Scotsmen can pass the porphyry tomb of Edward the First in Westminster Abbey, without a certain mounting of the blood ; or look upon the ‘old black stone of Scone,’ without recollecting how it came there. These are not narrow-souled nationalities.

“The memorable Scotch stone is anything but black ; it is a rough-piled reddish-grey sandstone, such as may be found on the Solway-side at Arbigland ; it is six-and-twenty inches long, sixteen inches wide, and eleven inches thick, and is fixed in the bottom of the chair with cramps of iron. The stone is unquestionably Scottish : troughs, crosses, and other ancient matters, at present to be found in the north, seem from the same quarry.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The renowned Sir William Wallace, of Elderslie, whose ardent love of his native country, and the freedom of her sons, distinguished him above all other men of his own day, and who, by his talents and his valour, and his many patriotic virtues, won the confidence of the whole Scottish nation, was a younger branch of the very ancient family of Wallace of Craige and Elderslie, in the county of Ayr, which family is noted in history long before the time of the great Sir William, and had been honoured with rank and wealth, and had extensive possessions. Among the distinguished members of this ancient family, perhaps the most remarkable was Sir John Wallace of Craige, who defeated the English at the battle of Sark. The Wallaces of Craige, among other proofs of royal favour, had a coat of arms very nearly the same as the royal arms of Scotland, including the royal tressure, a mark of distinction granted in ancient times for signal services in the field of battle. The arms of this family (a lion within a double tressure, with two lions as supporters, and two eagles' heads crossed), were borne by them. Mottoes were not much in use in these early days ; and therefore we find the arms of Wallace of Craige without any motto attached, as the impression of a seal of that family now before us proves, which seal is attached to a deed written on parchment, dated in 1464, with a sight of which we have been favoured by its possessor, Mr. Wallace of Kelly ; both are in perfect preservation, and we have been permitted to attach an engraving of the seal to the fac-simile of Burns' celebrated ODE, in order to exhibit the arms of Sir William Wallace's family.

Sir William Wallace of Elderslie, the patriot so especially referred to in the universally popular Ode of SCOTS, WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLED ; but better known in the history of his country under the well-merited title of “The Guardian of Scotland,” left no male issue ; and consequently the branch of the family he sprang from, which was a younger branch, was merged in that of the parent stock. Besides the arms here described, the Wallace family have long used as a crest the broad-sword proper, with “Pro Libertate,” as motto. This device was conferred on the “Guardian of Scotland” by the monarch who wore that crown he so gallantly defended, as emblematic of his high deserts, indomitable cou-

II.

Now's the day, and now's the hour ;
 See the front o' battle lour ;
 See approach proud Edward's power—
 Edward ! chains and slaverie !

III.

Wha will be a traitor-knave ?
 Wha can fill a coward's grave ?
 Wha sae base as be a slave ?
 Traitor ! coward ! turn and flee !

rage, and extraordinary success in defence of his king and country.

Mr. Wallace, of Kelly, the male representative of the family, is entitled to bear the principal arms of the ancient family of Craige, surmounted by the proper crest and motto.

The immortal Sir William Wallace, one of the favourite heroes of our Bard, is still honourably represented by Mr. Wallace, through a long line of ancestors. In the family tree his descent is clearly traced as the heir male of Wallace of Craige, and of the younger branch from which sprang the Guardian of Scotland, who, it is well known, was treacherously betrayed by Sir John Monteith into the hands of Edw. I. of England, and afterwards most fully murdered in the Tower of London, in 1305.—Had Burns been spared to witness the course of public life that he who represents the Guardian of Scotland has chalked out and followed during three successive Parliaments—that is, ever since the passing of the Reform Bill, which for the first time opened the doors of the House of Commons to men of Mr. Wallace's liberal views on all questions, political and commercial—a course so truly congenial to the liberty-loving soul of the Poet, it would doubtless have induced him to address the honourable member for Greenock in terms of well-merited eulogium ; and thereby have lent his aid in transmitting to posterity the worth and usefulness of that public-spirited and indefatigable legislator.

The Wallace family have often had the honour of knighthood conferred on its chiefs, besides being able to boast of at least two baronetcies. Why these have not been continued to the heirs male we are at a loss to conjecture ; for surely honours bestowed for services rendered the state in times so long gone by should be perpetuated ; and we cannot but think that, in doing this, Mr. Wallace would be but receiving an act of justice to the memory of his patriotic progenitors, and to his own position in the country. Who else is there in all the length and breadth of the land, who would not be proud to boast of the lineage entitling him to bear the arms and claim the rank of Sir John Wallace, who defeated the English on the banks of the Sark ; and still more those of Scotland's hero and chosen guardian, the illustrious Sir William Wallace?—Vide Burns's noble poem, “The Vision,” p. 206.

Mr. Wallace's only surviving brother, Sir James Maxwell Wallace, commands (1840) that distinguished regiment, the 8th dragoon guards. He entered the army in 1805, and rose gradually from cornet to colonel in the following regiments, the 9th, 11th, 21st, and royal dragoons. He had the honour of knighthood, and order of Hanover conferred on him by William IV., and the order of Leopold, by the King of the Belgians, who was many years his commanding officer, as Colonel of the Princess Charlotte's Own, or 5th Dragoon Guards. He was promoted to the rank of colonel at the coronation of Queen Victoria, and attained the privilege of wearing the Mérite Order of Leopold, in consequence of the services he performed on the 16th, 17th, and 18th of June, 1815, during the memorable battles of Quatre Bras, Gemappe, and Waterloo. He married, first, in 1818, Miss E. Hodges, daughter of W. P. Hodges, Esq. of Euston Grey ; secondly, the widow of the late Sir Alexander Don, of Newton Don, M.P. for the county of Roxburgh, whose only son, Sir William Don, is the nearest lineal descendant of BURNS's friend and patron, James, Earl of Glencairn, to whom the Poet dedicated one of his best odes.—C.]

IV.

Wha for SCOTLAND's king and law,
FREEDOM's sword will strongly draw;
Free-man stand, or Free-man fa',
Sodger! hero! on wi' me!*

V.

By Oppression's woes and pains!
By your sons in servile chains!
We will drain our dearest veins,
But they shall, they shall be free!

VI.

Lay the proud usurpers low!
Tyrants fall in every foe!
LIBERTY's in every blow!
FORWARD! let us do, or die!!!

N.B.—I have borrowed the last stanza from the common stall edition of Wallace:—

“A false usurper sinks in every foe,
And liberty returns with every blow.”

A couplet worthy of Homer. Yesterday you had enough of my correspondence. The post goes, and my head aches miserably. One comfort—I suffer so much, just now, in this world, for last night's joviality, that I shall escape scot-free for it in the world to come. Amen!

R. B.

We are happy in being enabled to illustrate this unique STANDARD EDITION of the works of our great SCOTTISH BARD, by an exact FAC-SIMILE of the improved version of this immortal ODE, embellished with accurately engraved representations of the Family Seals of Sir William Wallace of Craigie, chief of the Wallaces in 1464, and of the elder branch of that illustrious family, together with the two-edged sword of the hero. The original ode in question is now where it ought to be, in the hands of Robert Wallace, Esq., of Kelly, M.P. for Greenock, who has kindly lent it to the Editor of this work for the purpose of having a Fac-Simile engraved, to present to the admirers of Burns throughout the world.

The original Ode is accompanied by the following letter of the Poet:—

TO CAPT. MILLER, DALSWINTON.

DEAR SIR:

THE following Ode is on a subject which I know you by no means regard with indifference.

“O Liberty,—

Thou mak'st the gloomy face of nature gay,
Giv'st beauty to the sun, and pleasure to the day!”

It does me so much good to meet with a man whose honest bosom glows with the generous enthusiasm, the heroic daring, of Liberty, that I could not forbear sending you a composition of my own on the subject, which I really think is in my best manner.

I have the honour to be,

Dear Sir,

Your very humble Servant,
ROBERT BURNS.

◆
No. XLIV.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

12th September, 1793.

A THOUSAND thanks to you, my dear Sir, for your observations on the list of my songs. I am happy to find your ideas so much in unison with my own, respecting the generality of the airs, as well as the verses. About some of them we differ, but there is no disputing about hobby-horses. I shall not fail to profit by the remarks you make; and to re-consider the whole with attention.

“Dainty Davie” must be sung, two stanzas together, and then the chorus; 'tis the proper way. I agree with you that there may be something of pathos, or tenderness at least, in the air of “Fee him, Father,” when performed with feeling: but a tender cast may be given almost to any lively air, if you sing it very slowly, expressively, and with serious words. I am, however, clearly and invariably for retaining the cheerful tunes joined to their own humorous verses, wherever the verses are passable. But the sweet song for “Fee him, Father,” which you began about the back of midnight, I will publish as an additional one. Mr. James Balfour, the king of good fellows, and the best singer of the lively Scottish ballads that ever existed, has charmed thousands of companies with “Fee him, Father,” and with “Todlin' hame” also, to the old words, which never should be disunited from either of these airs. Some Bacchanals I would wish to discard. “Fye, let's a' to the bridal,” for instance, is so coarse and vulgar that I think it fit only to be sung in a company of drunken colliers: and “Saw ye my Father” appears to me both indelicate and silly.

One word more with regard to your heroic ode. I think, with great deference to the poet, that a prudent general would avoid saying any thing to his soldiers which might tend to make death more frightful than it is. “Gory” presents a disagreeable image to the mind; and to tell them, “Welcome to your gory bed,” seems rather a discouraging address, notwithstanding the alternative which follows. I have shewn the song to three friends of excellent taste, and each of them objected to this line, which emboldens me to use the freedom of bringing it again under your notice. I would suggest,

“Now prepare for honour's bed,
Or for glorious victorie.”

G. T.

* Afterwards altered to CALEDONIAN! See No. XLV.

[Some of the opinions expressed in this letter are entitled to respect: others are so singular as to require notice. Neither "Fye, let us a' to the bridal," nor "Saw ye my Father," merit the hard words which Thomson applies to them: for the time in which they were written, they are neither vulgar nor indelicate. Both songs till a late period continued to be sung in the best companies in Scotland, nor has the noble descendant of a house—noble both by genius and birth—hesitated to claim the merit of writing—"Fye, let us a' to the bridal," for one of his ancestors. Something like the taste of Thomson came a few years back over a small coterie of ladies in the north: they laid the songs of Scotland before them, and, placing their fingers on all such parts as they reckoned indelicate, held a consultation upon the meaning, and, after many shakings of the head and whispermings in the ear, they smoothed down without remorse whatever seemed to rise higher than their fanciful level of purity. The concluding paragraph of Thomson's communication requires no comment: that he was wrong the world has likely by this time convinced him. Who can read his altered lines after

"Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victorie—"

without feeling that such emendations crush the original spirit out of the verse, and give nothing in return, save increase of sound?—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
No. XLV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

September, 1793.

"WHO shall decide when doctors disagree?"
My ode pleases me so much that I cannot alter it. Your proposed alterations would, in my

* See the annexed fac simile of this improved version.
† ["Mr. Thomson very properly adopted the song of 'Bannockburn,' as the Bard presented it to him. He attached it to the air of 'Lewie Gordon,' and perhaps among the existing airs he could not find a better; but the poetry is suited to a much higher strain of music, and may employ the genius of some Scotch Handel, if any such should in future arise. The reader will have observed that Burns adopted the alterations proposed by his friend and correspondent in former instances, with great readiness; perhaps indeed, on all indifferent occasions. In the present instance, however, he rejected them, though repeatedly urged, with determined resolution. With every respect for the judgment of Mr. Thomson and his friends, we may be satisfied that he did so. He who in preparing for an engagement attempts to withdraw his imagination from images of death will probably have but imperfect success; and is not fitted to stand in the ranks of battle, where the liberties of a kingdom are at issue. Of such men the conquerors at Bannockburn were not composed. Bruce's troops were inured to war, and familiar with all its sufferings and dangers. On the eve of that memorable day, their spirits were without doubt wound up to a pitch of enthusiasm suited to the occasion—a pitch of enthusiasm at which danger becomes attractive, and the most terrific fumes of death are no longer terrible. Such a strain of sentiment this heroic 'welcome' may be supposed well calculated to opinion, make it tame. I am exceedingly obliged to you for putting me on re-considering it; as I think I have much improved it. Instead of "soger! hero!" I will have it "Caledonian! on wi' me!"*

I have scrutinized it, over and over; and to the world, some way or other, it shall go as it is. At the same time it will not in the least hurt me should you leave it out altogether, and adhere to your first intention of adopting Logan's verses.†

I have finished my song to "Saw ye my Father;" and in English, as you will see. That there is a syllable too much for the expression of the air, it is true; but, allow me to say that the mere dividing of a dotted crotchet into a crotchet and a quaver is not a great matter: however, in that, I have no pretensions to cope in judgment with you. Of the poetry I speak with confidence; but the music is a business where I hint my ideas with the utmost diffidence.

The old verses have merit, though unequal, and are popular: my advice is to set the air to the old words, and let mine follow as English verses. Here they are—

Fair Jemmy.

Tune—Saw ye my Father?

I.

WHERE are the joys I have met in the morning,
That danc'd to the lark's early song?
Where is the peace that awaited my wand'ring,
At ev'ning the wild woods among?

II.

No more a-winding the course of yon river,
And marking sweet flow'rets so fair:
No more I trace the light footsteps of pleasure,
But sorrow and sad sighing care.

elevate—to raise their hearts high above fear, and to nerve their arms to the utmost pitch of mortal exertion. These observations might be illustrated and supported by reference to the martial poetry of all nations, from the spirit-stirring strains of Tyrtæus to the war-song of General Wolfe. Mr. Thomson's observation, that 'Welcome to your gory bed is a discouraging address,' seems not sufficiently considered. Perhaps, indeed, it may be admitted that the term gory is somewhat objectionable, not on account of its presenting a frightful, but a disagreeable, image to the mind. But a great Poet, uttering his conceptions on an interesting occasion, seeks always to present a picture that is vivid, and is uniformly disposed to sacrifice the delicacies of taste on the altar of the imagination. And it is the privilege of superior genius, by producing a new association, to elevate expressions that were originally low, and thus to triumph over the deficiencies of language. In how many instances might this be exemplified from the works of our immortal Shakspeare:—

"Who would fardels bear,
To groan and sweat under a weary life;—
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin?"

It were easy to enlarge, but to suggest such reflections is probably sufficient."—CURRIE.]

III.

Is it that summer's forsaken our valleys,
And grim, surly winter is near?
No, no! the bees' humming round the gay roses,
Proclaim it the pride of the year.

IV.

Fain would I hide, what I fear to discover,
Yet long, long too well have I known
All that has caused this wreck in my bosom,
Is Jenny, fair Jenny alone.

V.

Time cannot aid me, my griefs are immortal,
Nor hope dare a comfort bestow:
Come then, enamour'd and fond of my anguish,
Enjoyment I'll seek in my woe.

Adieu, my dear Sir! The post goes, so I shall defer some other remarks until more leisure.

R. B.

No. XLVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

September, 1793.

I HAVE been turning over some volumes of songs, to find verses whose measures would suit the airs for which you have allotted me to find English songs.

For "Muirland Willie," you have, in Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany, an excellent song, beginning, "Ah why those tears in Nelly's eyes?" As for "The Collier's dochter," take the following old Bacchanal:—

Deluded Swain, the Pleasure.

I.

Deluded swain, the pleasure
The fickle fair can give thee
Is but a fairy treasure—
Thy hopes will soon deceive thee.

II.

The billows on the ocean,
The breezes idly roaming,
The clouds' uncertain motion—
They are but types of woman.

III.

O! art thou not ashamed
To doat upon a feature?
If man thou would'st be named,
Despise the silly creature.

IV.

Go, find an honest fellow;
Good claret set before thee:
Hold on till thou art mellow,
And then to bed in glory.

The faulty line in "Logan-Water," I mend thus:—

"How can your flinty hearts enjoy
The widow's tears, the orphan's cry?"*

The song, otherwise, will pass. As to "M'Gregoira Rua-Ruth," you will see a song of mine to it, with a set of the air superior to yours in the Museum. Vol. ii. p. 81. The song begins:—

"Raving winds around her blowing."†

Your Irish airs are pretty, but they are downright Irish. If they were like the "Banks of Banna," for instance, though really Irish, yet in the Scottish taste, you might adopt them.
Since you are so fond of Irish music, what say you to twenty-five of them in an additional number? We could easily find this quantity of charming airs; I will take care that you shall not want songs; and I assure you that you would find it the most saleable of the whole.
If you do not approve of "Roy's wife," for the music's sake, we shall not insert it. "Deil tak the wars," is a charming song; so is "Saw ye my Peggy?" "There's nae luck about the house" well deserves a place. I cannot say that "O'er the hills and far awa," strikes me as equal to your selection. "This is no my ain house," is a great favourite air of mine; and, if you will send me your set of it, I will task my muse to her highest effort. What is your opinion of "I hae laid a herrin' in sawt?" I like it much. Your Jacobite airs are pretty:
and there are many others of the same kind, pretty; but you have not room for them. You cannot, I think, insert, "Fye, let's a' to the bridal" to any other words than its own.

What pleases me as simple and naïve disgusts
you as ludicrous and low. For this reason,
"Fye, gie me my coggie, sirs," "Fye, let's a'
to the bridal," with several others of that cast, are, to me, highly pleasing; while, "Saw ye my Father, or saw ye my Mother?" delights me with its descriptive simple pathos. Thus my song, "Ken ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten?" pleases myself so much that I cannot try my hand at another song to the air; so I shall not attempt it. I know you will laugh at all this; but, "Ilka man wears his belt his ain gait." R. B.

[Burns, in the song to the air of "The Collier's Daughter," seems to have had in mind the famous old northern chant:—

"Fye, gie me my coggie, sirs,
And fye, gie me my coggie;
I wadna gie my three-girred cog,
For a' the queans in Bogie."

The songs which the Poet enumerates in this letter, and the opinions which he expresses on

* See No. XXV. where it is given correctly.

† This Song will be found in page 37..

their merits, are such as might be looked for from one who felt humour and tenderness, pathos and simplicity, with all the force of true genius. The refinement which would exclude from society such songs as "Fie, gie me my coggie, Sirs," "Fye, let us a' to the bridal," "The Auld Gudeman," "Meg o' the Mill," and others of a similar stamp, is of a very questionable kind.]

No. XLVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

October, 1793.

YOUR last letter, my dear Thomson, was indeed laden with heavy news. Alas! poor Erskine!* The recollection that he was a coadjutor in your publication has, till now, scared me from writing to you, or turning my thoughts on composing for you.

I am pleased that you are reconciled to the air of the "Quaker's Wife;" though, by the bye, an old Highland gentleman and a deep antiquarian tells me it is a Gaelic air, and known by the name of "Leiger m' choss." The following verses, I hope, will please you, as an English song to the air:—

*My lovely Nancy.*Tune—The Quaker's Wife.

I.

THINE am I, my faithful fair,
Thine, my lovely Nancy;
Ev'ry pulse along my veins,
Ev'ry roving fancy.

II.

To thy bosom lay my heart,
There to throb and languish:
Tho' despair had wrung its core,
That would heal its anguish.

III.

Take away these rosy lips,
Rich with balmy treasure:
Turn away thine eyes of love,
Lest I die with pleasure.

IV.

What is life when wanting love?
Night without a morning:
Love's the cloudless summer sun,
Nature gay adorning.†

* The honourable A. Erskine, brother to Lord Kelly, whose melancholy death Mr. Thomson had communicated in an excellent letter which he has suppressed.—CURRIE.

† [We owe this song, it is said, to the charms of Clarinda. The words bear no resemblance to the old strains which accompany the air of "The Quaker's wife," to which it is adapted:—

"Merrily danced the Quaker's wife,
Merrily danced the Quaker;
Merrily danced the Quaker's wife,
Wi' a' her bairns about her."

Your objection to the English Song I proposed for "John Anderson, my jo," is certainly just. The following is by an old acquaintance of mine, and I think has merit. The song was never in print, which I think is so much in your favour. The more original good poetry your collection contains, it certainly has so much the more merit.

SONG.

BY GAVIN TURNBULL.

O CONDESCEND, dear charming maid,
My wretched state to view;
A tender swain to love betray'd,
And sad despair, by you.

While here, all melancholy,
My passion I deplore,
Yet, urg'd by stern resistless fate,
I love thee more and more.

I heard of love, and with disdain
The urchin's power denied:
I laugh'd at every lover's pain,
And mock'd them when they sigh'd.

But how my state is alter'd!
Those happy days are o'er;
For all thy unrelenting hate,
I love thee more and more.

O yield, illustrious beauty, yield!
No longer let me mourn;
And, tho' victorious in the field,
Thy captive do not scorn.

Let generous pity warm thee,
My wonted peace restore;
And, grateful, I shall bless thee still,
And love thee more and more.

The following address of Turnbull's to the Nightingale will suit as an English song to the air, "There was a lass, and she was fair." By the bye, Turnbull has a great many songs in MS., which I can command, if you like his manner. Possibly, as he is an old friend of mine, I may be prejudiced in his favour; but I like some of his pieces very much:—

THE NIGHTINGALE.

BY G. TURNBULL.

THOU sweetest minstrel of the grove
That ever tried the plaintive strain;
Awake thy tender tale of love,
And soothe a poor forsaken swain.

For, tho' the muses deign to aid,
And teach him smoothly to complain;
Yet Delia, charming, cruel maid,
Is deaf to her forsaken swain.

The lover of old English poetry will perceive a resemblance between the third verse of the song of Burns, and that truly exquisite one attributed to Shakspeare:—

"Take, oh! take those lips away,
That so sweetly were forsworn;
And those eyes, the break of day,
Lights that do mislead the morn;
But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, but sealed in vain."

All day, with Fashion's gaudy sons,
In sport she wanders o'er the plain;
Their tales approves, and still she shuns
The notes of her forsaken swain.

When evening shades obscure the sky,
And bring the solemn hours again,
Begin, sweet bird, thy melody,
And soothe a poor forsaken swain.

I shall just transcribe another of Turnbull's, which would go charmingly to 'Lewie Gordon':

LAURA.

BY G. TURNBULL.

LET me wander where I will,
By shady wood, or winding rill;
Where the sweetest May-born flowers
Paint the meadows, deck the bowers;
Where the linnet's early song
Echoes sweet the woods among:
Let me wander where I will,
Laura haunts my fancy still.

If at rosy dawn I choose
To indulge the smiling muse:
If I court some cool retreat,
To avoid the noontide heat;
If beneath the moon's pale ray,
Thro' unfrequented wilds I stray;
Let me wander where I will,
Laura haunts my fancy still.

When at night the drowsy god
Waves his sleep-compelling rod,
And to fancy's wakeful eyes
Bids celestial visions rise;
While with boundless joy I rove
Thro' the fairy land of love:
Let me wander where I will,
Laura haunts my fancy still.

The rest of your letter I shall answer at some other opportunity.*

[Gavin Turnbull was the Author of a volume entitled "Poetical Essays," published in Glasgow, in 1788.]

No. XLVIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

7th November, 1793.

MY GOOD SIR:

AFTER so long a silence it gave me peculiar pleasure to recognize your well-known hand, for I had begun to be apprehensive that all was not well with you. I am happy to find, however, that your silence did not proceed from that cause, and that you have got among the ballads once more.

I have to thank you for your English song to "Leiger m' choss," which I think extremely good, although the colouring is warm. Your friend Mr. Turnbull's songs have doubtless considerable merit; and, as you have the command of his manuscripts, I hope you may find out some that will answer as English songs, to the airs yet unprovided. G. T.

[During almost the whole period that Burns lived in Dumfries, he was suffering from the twofold misery of misrepresentation and poverty. His farming speculations had drained his pockets of money, and the base and the malevolent were labouring to deprive him of bread. Well might he say as he did, that he had small heart to sing. Can the lark warble under the wing of the raven?—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XLIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

December, 1793.

TELL me how you like the following verses to the tune of "Jo Janet:"—

I.

HUSBAND, husband, cease your strife,
Nor longer idly rave, sir;
Tho' I am your wedded wife,
Yet I am not your slave, sir.
"One of two must still obey,
Nancy, Nancy;
Is it man, or woman, say,
My spouse, Nancy?"

II.

If 'tis still the lordly word,
Service and obedience;
I'll desert my sov'reign lord,
And so, good b'ye, allegiance!
"Sad will I be, so bereft,
Nancy, Nancy;
Yet I'll try to make a shift,
My spouse, Nancy."

* ["Like all men of true genius," says MOTHERWELL,
"Burns was the least susceptible of literary jealousy, and the first to acknowledge the claims of a co-rival to poetical distinction." In "Alexander Campbell's History of Scottish Poetry," there appears this brief notice of the work of one of whom Burns speaks in so flattering a manner:—

"No sooner had the Paisley press produced the poems of Mr. Ebenezer Picken, than the Poetical Essays of Gavin
Turnbull, in 1778, issued from the press of Mr. David Niven of Glasgow. The 'Poetical Essays' of Mr. Turnbull are such as do him the highest credit. I am hopeful he will go on; for, in truth, the specimens already before the public give, so far as I understand, uncommon satisfaction. It was the peculiar felicity of Burns, on his first entrance on the literary stage, to be patronized and supported, even to a degree rarely the lot of the most consummate talents. It became for a time the rage, to use a fashionable phrase, to talk of him, recite his pieces, and boast of having spent an evening in company with the Ayr-shire bard. No wonder then, if the contemporaries of Burns were neglected by those who are looked up to as the umpires of literary reputation.

But one consolation remained; the ingenious author escaped the most poignant mortification, usually attendant on talents unaccompanied by prudence, that is, the supercilious sneer, indicative of altered opinion, and its humiliating consequence, cold indifference. Did not Burns experience all this?"]

† VAR.—If the word is still obey,
Always love and fear you,
I will take myself away,
And never more come near you.

III.

My poor heart then break it must,
 My last hour I'm near it :
 When you lay me in the dust,
 Think, think, how you will bear it.
 " I will hope and trust in heaven,
 Nancy, Nancy ;
 Strength to bear it will be given,
 My spouse, Nancy."

IV.

Well, sir, from the silent dead,
 Still I'll try to daunt you ;
 Ever round your midnight bed
 Horrid sprites shall haunt you.
 " I'll wed another, like my dear
 Nancy, Nancy ;
 Then all hell will fly for fear,
 My spouse, Nancy."*

Wilt thou be my Dearie ?

Air—The Suter's Tochter.

I.

WILT thou be my dearie ?
 When sorrow wrings thy gentle heart,
 Wilt thou let me cheer thee ?
 By the treasure of my soul,
 That's the love I bear thee !
 I swear and vow that only thou
 Shall ever be my dearie.
 Only thou, I swear and vow,
 Shall ever be my dearie.

II.

Lassie, say thou lo'es me ;
 Or, if thou wilt na be my ain,
 Say na thou'lt refuse me :
 If it winna, canna be,
 Thou, for thine may choose me,
 Let me, lassie, quickly die,
 Trusting that thou lo'est me.
 Lassie, let me quickly die,
 Trusting that thou lo'es me.

* [In composing this song the Poet had in his eye the lyrics of the olden time : the more immediate object of his imitation was " My Jo Janet," in the collection of Allan Ramsay, beginning—

" Sweet Sir, for your courtesie,
 When ye come to the Bass, then
 For the love ye bear to me,
 Buy me a keeking-glass, then."
 " Keek into the draw well,
 Janet, Janet,
 And there ye'll see your bonnie sel,
 My Jo Janet."

Burns regretted that he had not sooner turned his thoughts upon lyrics of a conversational character.]

† A letter to Mr. Cunningham, to be found in the correspondence, under the date of Feb. 25th, 1794.

‡ ["The painter who pleased Burns and Thomson so much

[This song was said to have been composed in honour of the charms of Janet Miller, of Dalswinton, mother to the present Earl of Mar, and at that time one of the loveliest women in all the south of Scotland. The Poet thought so well of it that he gave a copy to Johnson as well as to Thomson.]

No. L.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 17th April, 1794.

MY DEAR SIR :

OWING to the distress of our friend for the loss of his child, at the time of his receiving your admirable but melancholy letter, I had not an opportunity till lately of perusing it. † How sorry I am to find Burns saying, " canst thou not minister to a mind diseased ?" while he is delighting others from one end of the island to the other. Like the hypochondriac who went to consult a physician upon his case—" Go," says the doctor, " and see the famous Carlini, who keeps all Paris in good humour." " Alas ! Sir," replied the patient, " I am that unhappy Carlini !"

Your plan for our meeting together pleases me greatly, and I trust that by some means or other it will soon take place ; but your Bacchanalian challenge almost frightens me, for I am a miserable weak drinker !

Allan is much gratified by your good opinion of his talents. He has just begun a sketch from your " Cotter's Saturday Night," and, if it pleases himself in the design, he will probably etch or engrave it. In subjects of the pastoral and humorous kind, he is perhaps unrivalled by any artist living. He fails a little in giving beauty and grace to his females, and his colouring is sombre ; otherwise, his paintings and drawings would be in greater request. ‡

I like the music of the " Suter's dochter," and will consider whether it shall be added to the last volume ; your verses to it are pretty ; but your humorous English song to suit " Jo Janet," is inimitable. What think you of the air, " Within a mile of Edinburgh ?" It has with his shepherds and shepherdesses was David Allan ; he studied in Rome and in London, but acquired little fame from his classic efforts compared to what he achieved by his delineations of the pastoral scenes and happy peasantry of his native country. With loveliness he could do little ; but give him an old cottage, with older plenshing, and still older inhabitants, and he could do all but work miracles. An ancient chair with a dog sleeping—or seeming to sleep—under it : an old woman twirling her distaff in the sun, with her cat and her chickens around her ; or an old man sitting ruminating at his own fire-side, with his Bible on his knees, inspired him at once ; and in subjects such as these he has never been surpassed. His illustrations of Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd will bear out these commendations ; his Glau and Symon, his Mause and Madge, are inimitable ; not so his Fatie and his Peggie ; his forte lay in representing humorous characters, and he failed when youth and loveliness came before him to be limned. His mantle, with a double portion of his power, has fallen on David Wilkie."—CUNNINGHAM.]

always struck me as a modern English imitation, but it is said to be Oswald's, and is so much liked that I believe I must include it. The verses are little better than namby-pamby. Do you consider it worth a stanza or two?

G. T.

No. LI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

May, 1794.

MY DEAR SIR:

I RETURN you the plates, with which I am highly pleased; I would humbly propose, instead of the younker knitting stockings, to put a stock and horn into his hands. A friend of mine, who is positively the ablest judge on the subject I have ever met with, and, though an unknown, is yet a superior, artist with the burin, is quite charmed with Allan's manner. I got him a peep of the Gentle Shepherd; and he pronounces Allan a most original artist of great excellence.

For my part, I look on Mr. Allan's choosing my favourite poem for his subject to be one of the highest compliments I have ever received.

I am quite vexed at Pleyel's being cooped up in France, as it will put an entire stop to our work. Now, and for six or seven months, I shall be quite in song, as you shall see by and by. I got an air, pretty enough, composed by Lady Elizabeth Heron, of Heron, which she calls "The banks of Cree." Cree is a beautiful romantic stream: and, as her Ladyship is a particular friend of mine, I have written the following song to it:—

Here is the Glen.

Tune—Banks of Cree.

I.

HERE is the glen, and here the bower,
All underneath the birchen shade;
The village-bell has told the hour—
O what can stay my lovely maid?

II.

'Tis not Maria's whispering call;
'Tis not the balmy-breathing gale,
Mixt with some warbler's dying fall,
The dewy star of eve to hail.

III.

It is Maria's voice I hear!
So calls the woodlark in the grove,
His little faithful mate to cheer,
At once 'tis music—and 'tis love.

* A portion of this letter has been left out, for reasons that will be easily imagined.

† [“ ‘It were to be wished,’ says Currie, ‘that instead of ‘ruffian feeling’ in the second verse, that the Bard had used a less rugged epithet—e. g. ruder.’ Burns seldom failed to clothe his thoughts in suitable language: the sentiment put on at once its lively of words, and he was loth to make alterations. The remark of Currie strikes, not at this expres-

IV.

And art thou come? and art thou true?
O welcome, dear to love and me!
And let us all our vows renew
Along the flow'ry banks of Cree.

[The Poet had a double task to perform for the family of Kerroughtree: he wrote lyrics in honour of the lady, and lampoons for the benefit of the laird. The first was a task according to his heart, and he performed it the readier that Lady Elizabeth Heron was fair and accomplished: of his success in the latter, the Heron Ballads have already informed the reader.]

No. LII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

July 1794.

Is there no news yet of Pleyel? Or is your work to be at a dead stop until the allies set our modern Orpheus at liberty from the savage thralldom of democratic discords? Alas the day! And woe is me! That auspicious period, pregnant with the happiness of millions—*

I have presented a copy of your songs to the daughter of a much-valued and much-honoured friend of mine, Mr. Graham of Fintray. I wrote, on the blank side of the title-page, the following address to the young lady:—

Here, where the Scottish muse immortal lives,
In sacred strains and tuneful numbers join'd,
Accept the gift; tho' humble he who gives,
Rich is the tribute of the grateful mind.

So may no ruffian feeling † in thy breast
Discordant jar thy bosom-chords among;
But peace attune thy gentle soul to rest,
Or love ecstastic wake his seraph song:

Or pity's notes, in luxury of tears,
As modest want the tale of woe reveals;
While conscious virtue all the strain endears,
And heaven-born piety her sanction seals.

No. LIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 10th August, 1794.

MY DEAR SIR:

I OWE you an apology for having so long delayed to acknowledge the favour of your last sion alone, but at the general language of the Poet's verse. We must take him as we find him; had he softened down his masculine energy, he would have robbed his poems of a great charm: the rose would be less lovely were its thorns removed, and how would the thistle look without its prickles? The cry of the eagle can never be tamed down into the song of the lark, nor the wild note of the blackbird sobered into that of the wren.—CUNNINGHAM.]

I fear it will be as you say, I shall have no more songs from Pleyel till France and we are friends; but, nevertheless, I am very desirous to be prepared with the poetry, and, as the season approaches in which your muse of Coila visits you, I trust I shall, as formerly, be frequently gratified with the result of your amorous and tender interviews!

G. T.

[Burns in the preceding letter, and Thomson in this, allude to the commencement of that terrible war which shook the thrones of Europe, and strewed hill and vale with slaughtered bodies. Democratic ferocity on one side, and kingly tyranny on the other, turned the Continent into a battle-field: the notes of Pleyel were unheard amid the trumpet-sound and the din of artillery: and some of the songs of Burns, expressing a manly—a true Scottish-love for freedom—were for a time unacceptable to the people of Britain.]

No. LIV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

30th August, 1794.

THE last evening, as I was straying out, and thinking of "O'er the hills and far away," I spun the following stanza for it; but whether my spinning will deserve to be laid up in store, like the precious thread of the silk-worm, or brushed to the devil like the vile manufacture of the spider, I leave, my dear Sir, to your usual candid criticism. I was pleased with several lines in it, at first; but I own that now it appears rather a flimsy business.

This is just a hasty sketch, until I see whether it be worth a critique. We have many sailor songs; but, as far as I at present recollect, they are mostly the effusions of the jovial sailor, not the wailings of the love-lorn mistress. I must here make one sweet exception—"Sweet Annie frae the Sea-beach came." Now for the song:—

On the Seas and far away.

Tune—O'er the Hills and far away.

I.

How can my poor heart be glad,
When absent from my sailor lad.
How can I the thought forego?
He's on the seas to meet the foe.
Let me wander, let me rove,
Still my heart is with my love:
Nightly dreams, and thoughts by day,
Are with him that's far away.

On the seas and far away,
On stormy seas and far away;

Nightly dreams, and thoughts by day
Are aye with him that's far away.

II.

When in summer noon I faint,
As weary flocks around me pant,
Haply in this scorching sun
My sailor's thund'ring at his gun:
Bullets, spare my only joy!
Bullets, spare my darling boy!
Fate do with me what you may—
Spare but him that's far away!

III.

At the starless midnight hour,
When winter rules with boundless power;
As the storms the forest tear,
And thunders rend the howling air,
Listening to the doubling roar,
Surging on the rocky shore,
All I can—I weep and pray,
For his weal that's far away.

IV.

Peace, thy olive wand extend,
And bid wild war his ravage end,
Man with brother man to meet,
And as a brother kindly greet:
Then may heaven with prosp'rous gales
Fill my sailor's welcome sails,
To my arms their charge convey—
My dear lad that's far away.

On the seas and far away,
On stormy seas and far away;
Nightly dreams, and thoughts by day,
Are aye with him that's far away.

I gave you leave to abuse this song, but do it in the spirit of Christian meekness. R. B.

No. LV.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 16th Sept., 1794.

MY DEAR SIR:

YOU have anticipated my opinion of "On the seas and far away;" I do not think it one of your very happy productions, though it certainly contains stanzas that are worthy of all acceptance.

The second stanza is the least to my liking, particularly "Bullets, spare my only joy." Confound the bullets! It might, perhaps, be objected to the third verse, "At the starless midnight hour," that it has too much grandeur of imagery, and that greater simplicity of thought would have better suited the character of a sailor's sweetheart. The tune, it must be remembered, is of the brisk, cheerful kind. Upon the whole, therefore, in my humble opinion, the song would be better adapted to the tune, if it consisted only of the first and last verses, with the choruses.

[The objections raised by Thomson to this song were disapproved of by Currie, and many exquisite judges of poetry. The verses proposed to be omitted are the most original and touching: the third, in particular, is a noble one, and in keeping with the excited feelings of a lady whose love is on the great deep, exposed to the accidents of battle and the extremities of the tempest.]

No. LVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Sept., 1794.

I SHALL withdraw my "On the seas and far away" altogether: it is unequal, and unworthy the work. Making a poem is like begetting a son: you cannot know whether you have a wise man or a fool, until you produce him to the world to try him.

For that reason I send you the offspring of my brain, abortions and all; and as such, pray look over them and forgive them, and burn them.* I am flattered at your adopting "Ca' the yowes to the knowes," as it was owing to me that it ever saw the light. About seven years ago, I was well acquainted with a worthy little fellow of a clergyman, a Mr. Clunie, who sung it charmingly; and, at my request, Mr. Clarke took it down from his singing. When I gave it to Johnson, I added some stanzas to the song, and mended others, but still it will not do for you. In a solitary stroll, which I took to-day, I tried my hand on a few pastoral lines, following up the idea of the chorus, which I would preserve. Here it is, with all its crudities and imperfections on its head.

Ca' the Yowes.

I.

CA' the yowes to the knowes,
Ca' them whare the heather grows,
Ca' them whare the burnie rowes—
My bonnie dearie!
Hark the mavis' evening sang
Sounding Clouden's woods amang!
Then a fauldin let us gang,
My bonnie dearie.

II.

We'll gae down by Clouden side,
Thro' the hazels spreading wide,
O'er the waves that sweetly glid
To the moon sae clearly.

* [This Virgilian order of the Poet should, I think, be disobeyed with the respect to the song in question, the second Stanza excepted.—NOTE BY THOMSON.]

† [The water, on the banks of which the scene of this lyric is laid, is a beautiful stream, and known by three names, Cairn, Dalgoner, and Clouden, or Cluden. Under the first name, it finds its way over wild uplands, among flocks of sheep and coveys of black grouse; under the second, it washes the walls of old castles, rural villages, and seems at one place to be lost among thick groves of hazel and holly;

III.

Yonder Clouden's silent towers,
Where at moonshine midnight hours,
O'er the dewy bending flowers,
Fairies dance sae cheery.

IV.

Ghaist nor bogle shalt thou fear;
Thou'rt to love and heaven sae dear,
Nocht of ill may come thee near,
My bonnie dearie.

V.

Fair and lovely as thou art,
Thou hast stown my very heart;
I can die—but canna part—
My bonnie dearie!
Ca' the yowes to the knowes,
Ca' them whare the heather grows,
Ca' them whare the burnie rowes—
My bonnie dearie! †

I shall give you my opinion of your other newly adopted songs, my first scribbling fit.

R. B.

No. LVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

September, 1794.

Do you know a blackguard Irish song, called "Onagh's Water-fall?" The air is charming, and I have often regretted the want of decent verses to it. It is too much, at least for my humble rustic muse, to expect that every effort of her's shall have merit: still I think that it is better to have mediocre verses to a favourite air than none at all. On this principle I have all along proceeded in the Scots Musical Museum; and, as that publication is at its last volume, I intend the following song, to the air above mentioned, for that work.

If it does not suit you as an editor, you may be pleased to have verses to it that you can sing before ladies.

She says she lo'es me best of a'.

Tune—Onagh's Water-fall.

I.

SAE flaxen were her ringlets, †
Her eyebrows of a darker hue,
Bewitchingly o'er-arching
Twa laughing een o' bonnie blue.

and, under the third name, it finds its way among romantic rocks, where it forms a succession of deep clear pools, connected by leaps or falls, the individual murmurings of which are any thing but unmusical; and, finally, it unites itself with the Nith in the shadow of the towers of Lincluden. Burns formed this song upon an older lyric, an amended version of which has been previously inserted.]

† [The lady with the flaxen tresses was Jean Lorimer, or Mrs. Whelpdale, as she loved to be called; her husband had, at this period, deserted her, and she was oftener to be found

Her smiling, sae wyling,
 Wad make a wretch forget his woe ;
 What pleasure, what treasure,
 Unto these rosy lips to grow !
 Such was my Chloris' bonnie face,
 When first her bonnie face I saw ;
 And aye my Chloris' dearest charm,
 She says she lo'es me best of a'.

II.

Like harmony her motion ;
 Her pretty ankle is a spy,
 Betraying fair proportion,
 Wad mak a saint forget the sky.
 Sae warming, sae charming,
 Her faultless form and gracefu' air ;
 Ilk feature—auld nature
 Declar'd that she could do nae mair .
 Her's are the willing chains o' love,
 By conquering beauty's sovereign law ;
 And aye my Chloris' dearest charm,
 She says she lo'es me best o' a'.

III.

Let others love the city,
 And gaudy show at sunny noon ;
 Gie me the lonely valley,
 The dewy eve, and rising moon ;
 Fair beaming, and streaming,
 Her silver light the boughs amang ;
 While falling, recalling,
 The amorous thrush concludes his sang :
 There, dearest Chloris, wilt thou rove
 By wimpling burn and leafy shaw,
 And hear my vows o' truth and love,
 And say thou lo'est me best of a' ?

Not to compare small things with great, my taste in music is like the mighty Frederick of Prussia's taste in painting: we are told that he frequently admired what the connoisseurs derided, and always, without any hypocrisy, confessed his admiration. I am sensible that my taste in music must be inelegant and vulgar, because people of undisputed and cultivated taste can find no merit in my favorite tunes. Still, because I am cheaply pleased, is that any reason why I should deny myself that pleasure? Many of our strathspeys, ancient and modern, give me most exquisite enjoyment, in Dumfries than at Kemmis-hall, the residence of her father. Of her beauty something has been already said: her figure, it may be added, was rather above than below the middle size, and proportioned like one of the truest productions of an ancient statuary. Her hair, which she wore flowing and abundant, fell almost in armfuls over her round neck and white shoulders; it was inclining to be waving rather than curling, and was darker than what the epithet flaxen seems to intimate. She danced and sung with much grace and sweetness; her eyes were large and lustrous, and laughed more than did her lips when she was pleased. This minuteness will be forgiven by those who reflect that to her charms we owe some of the finest lyrics in the language.]

* In the original follow here two stanzas of a song, begin-

where you and other judges would probably be showing disgust. For instance, I am just now making verses for "Rothemurche's Rant," an air which puts me in raptures; and, in fact, unless I be pleased with the tune, I never can make verses to it. Here I have Clarke on my side, who is a judge that I will pit against any of you. "Rothemurche," he says, is an air both original and beautiful; and, on his recommendation, I have taken the first part of the tune for a chorus, and the fourth, or last part, for the song. I am but two stanzas deep in the work, and possibly you may think, and justly, that the poetry is as little worth your attention as the music.*

I have begun anew, "Let me in this ae night." Do you think we ought to retain the old chorus? I think we must retain both the old chorus and the first stanza of the old song. I do not altogether like the third line of the first stanza, but cannot alter it to please myself. I am just three stanzas deep in it. Would you have the denouement to be successful or otherwise? Should she "let him in" or not?

Did you not once propose "The Sow's tail to Geordie" as an air for your work? I am quite delighted with it; but I acknowledge that is no mark of its real excellence. I once set about verses for it, which I meant to be in the alternate way of a lover and his mistress chanting together. I have not the pleasure of knowing Mrs Thomson's Christian name, and yours, I am afraid, is rather burlesque for sentiment, else I had meant to have made you and her the hero and heroine of the little piece.

How do you like the following epigram, which I wrote the other day, on a lovely young girl's recovery from a fever? Doctor Maxwell was the physician who seemingly saved her from the grave; and to him I address the following:—

To Dr. Maxwell, †

ON MISS JESSIE STAIG'S RECOVERY.

MAXWELL, if merit here you crave,
 That merit I deny;
 You save fair Jessie from the grave?—
 An angel could not die.‡

ning "Lassie wi' the lintwhite locks," which will be found at full length afterwards.—CURRIE.

† ["Of Dr. Maxwell, a word or two was said in the life of the Poet. He was a skilful physician, and an accomplished gentleman. He mingled in the stormy doings of the early days of the French revolution, and escaped with difficulty, it is alleged, from the far-reaching and fierce clutches of the Jacobin Club. Tired of revolutions and politics, he retired to his native place, and, by his manners and conversation, sustained the fame of the noble house of Maxwell, of which he was a descendant."—CUNNINGHAM.]

‡ [Miss Jessy Staig married Major Miller, and died young. She was the Jessy of the song,—
 "True-hearted was he, the sad swain of the Yarrow."]

God grant you patience with this stupid epistle!

R. B.

No. LVIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

I PERCEIVE the sprightly muse is now attendant upon her favourite poet, whose "wood notes wild" are become as enchanting as ever. "She says she lo'es me best of a'," is one of the pleasantest table songs I have seen, and henceforth shall be mine when the song is going round. I'll give Cunningham a copy; he can more powerfully proclaim its merit. I am far from undervaluing your taste for the strathspey music; on the contrary, I think it highly animating and agreeable, and that some of the strathspeys, when graced with such verses as yours, will make very pleasing songs, in the same way that rough Christians are tempered and softened by lovely woman, without whom, you know, they had been brutes.

I am clear for having the "Sow's tail," particularly as your proposed verses to it are so extremely promising. Geordie, as you observe, is a name only fit for burlesque composition. Mrs. Thomson's name (Katharine) is not at all poetical. Retain Jeanie, therefore, and make the other Jamie, or any other that sounds agreeably.

Your "Ca' the ewes" is a precious little morçeau. Indeed I am perfectly astonished and charmed with the endless variety of your fancy. Here let me ask you whether you never seriously turned your thoughts upon dramatic writing? That is a field worthy of your genius, in which it might shine forth in all its splendour. One or two successful pieces upon the London stage would make your fortune. The rage at present is for musical dramas: few or none of those which have appeared since the "Duenna" possess much poetical merit: there is little in the conduct of the fable, or in the dialogue, to interest the audience. They are chiefly vehicles for music and pageantry. I think you might produce a comic opera in three acts, which would live by the poetry, at the same time that it would be proper to take every assistance from her tuneful sister. Part of the songs, of course, would be to our favourite Scottish airs; the rest might be left to the London composer—Storace for Drury-lane, or Shield for Covent-garden; both of them very able and popular musicians. I believe that interest and manœuvring are often necessary to have a drama brought on: so it may be with the namby-pamby tribe of flowery scribblers; but, were you to address Mr. Sheridan himself by letter, and send him a dramatic piece, I am persuaded he would, for the honour of genius, give it a fair and candid trial. Excuse me for obtruding these hints upon your consideration.*

No. LIX.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 14th October, 1794.

THE last eight days have been devoted to the re-examination of the Scottish collections. I have read, and sung, and fiddled, and considered, till I am half blind and wholly stupid. The few airs I have added are inclosed.

Peter Pindar has at length sent me all the songs I expected from him, which are, in general, elegant and beautiful. Have you heard of a London collection of Scottish airs and songs, just published, by Mr. Ritson, an Englishman?† I shall send you a copy. His introductory essay on the subject is curious, and evinces great reading and research, but does not decide the question as to the origin of our melodies; though he shows clearly that Mr. Tytler, in his ingenious dissertation, has adduced no sort of proof of the hypothesis he wished to establish; and that his classification of the airs according to the æras when they were composed is mere fancy and conjecture. On John Pinkerton, Esq., he has no mercy; but consigns him to damnation! He snarls at my publication on the score of Pindar being engaged to write songs for it, uncandidly and unjustly leaving it to be inferred that the songs of Scottish writers had been sent a packing to make room for Peter's. Of you he speaks with some respect, but gives you a passing hit or two for daring to dress up a little some old foolish songs for the Museum. His sets of the Scottish airs are taken, he says,

* ["Our Bard had before received the same advice, and certainly took it so far into consideration as to have cast about for a subject."—CURRIE.]

† ["Of such a person, so skilful and so plodding—so dry and so doubting—so captious and sarcastic as Joseph Ritson, the Poet of Ayr had not heard, till his name was announced by Thomson. He was one of the most laborious of our later antiquaries; his birth in a northern English county made him familiar with the Scottish dialect and with old ballad lore; his education as a lawyer sharpened his faculties, and disciplined him for habits of research, while his love of all that was old, and strange, and uncouth in literature, amounted to a passion which, in the end, overpowered his reason. He had little or no poetic feeling; he was a Jacobite, too, and a bitter one; but, by a transition not uncommon, he became a

Jacobin, and, as Citizen Ritson, is yet remembered by those who had no sympathy for his researches in song. To the task of editorship he brought an acuteness which all publishers of other men's verses soon learned to dread; and along with this came a suspicion that, as Chatterton, Pinkerton, and others had imposed new verses as old on the world, there was nothing real and genuine to be had. He boldly charged Percy with the forgery of many of the 'Reliques of Old English Poetry,' an accusation which has since been triumphantly refuted; and he attacked the learned and laborious Warton with an acrimony new in English criticism. 'All his doings to rehearse' would take many pages; his dissertation upon Scottish song is searching and accurate, nor is his selection of lyrics much amiss, though he has committed several mistakes in matters of taste."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

from the oldest collections and best authorities : many of them, however, have such a strange aspect, and are so unlike the sets which are sung by every person of taste, old or young, in town or country, that we can scarcely recognize the features of our favourites. By going to the oldest collections of our music, it does not follow that we find the melodies in their original state. These melodies had been preserved, we know not how long, by oral communication, before being collected and printed : and, as different persons sing the same air very differently, according to their accurate or confused recollection of it, so, even supposing the first collectors to have possessed the industry, the taste, and discernment to choose the best they could hear (which is far from certain), still it must evidently be a chance whether the collections exhibit any of the melodies in the state they were first composed. In selecting the melodies for my own collection, I have been as much guided by the living as by the dead. Where these differed, I preferred the sets that appeared to me the most simple and beautiful, and the most generally approved : and, without meaning any compliment to my own capability of choosing, or speaking of the pains I have taken, I flatter myself that my sets will be found equally freed from vulgar errors on the one hand, and affected graces on the other.

G. T.

No. LX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

19th October, 1791.

MY DEAR FRIEND :

By this morning's post I have your list, and, in general, I highly approve of it. I shall, at more leisure, give you a critique on the whole. Clarke goes to your town by to-day's fly, and I wish you would call on him and take his opinion in general : you know his taste is a standard. He will return here again in a week or two ; so, please do not miss asking for him. One thing I hope he will do, persuade you to adopt my favourite, "Craigie-burn Wood," in your selection : it is as great a favourite of his as of mine. The lady on whom it was made is one of the finest women in Scotland ; and, in fact (entre nous), is in a manner, to me, what Sterne's Eliza was to him—a mistress, or friend, or what you will, in the guileless simplicity of

* [The despairing swain in "Saw ye my Phely" is said to have been Stephen Clarke, musician. The lady whom he persuaded the Poet to accuse of coldness and inconstancy was Phillis M'Murdo. His fantastic woes only excited a smile on her part : nor could they be welcome to a family where he had been introduced as a teacher. Musicians have sometimes fiddled and lira-lira-la'd themselves into the affections of high-born dames. The air to which these verses were composed took its name from a song of considerable merit, beginning thus :—

Platonic love. (Now don't put any of your squinting constructions on this, or have any clishmaclavier about it among our acquaintances.) I assure you that to my lovely friend you are indebted for many of your best songs of mine. Do you think that the sober, gin-horse routine of existence could inspire a man with life, and love, and joy—could fire him with enthusiasm, or melt him with pathos equal to the genius of your book?—No ! no !—Whenever I want to be more than ordinary in song ; to be in some degree equal to your diviner airs ; do you imagine I fast and pray for the celestial emanation ? Tout au contraire! I have a glorious recipe ; the very one that for his own use was invented by the divinity of healing and poetry, when erst he piped to the flocks of Admetus. I put myself on a regimen of admiring a fine woman ; and in proportion to the adorability of her charms, in proportion you are delighted with my verses. The lightning of her eye is the godhead of Parnassus, and the witchery of her smile, the divinity of Helicon!

To descend to business ; if you like my idea of "When she cam ben she bobbit," the following stanzas of mine, altered a little from what they were formerly, when set to another air, may, perhaps, do instead of worse stanzas :—

Saw ye my Phely.*

(QUASI DICAT PHILLIS.)

Tune—When she cam ben she bobbit.

I.

O saw ye my dear, my Phely ?
O saw ye my dear, my Phely ?
She's down i' the grove, she's wi' a new love,
She winna come hame to her Willy.

II.

What says she, my dearest, my Phely ?
What says she, my dearest, my Phely ?
She lets thee to wit that she has thee forgot,
And for ever disowns thee, her Willy.

III.

O had I ne'er seen thee, my Phely !
O had I ne'er seen thee, my Phely !
As light as the air, and fause as thou's fair—
Thou's broken the heart o' thy Willy.

"O when she came ben she bobbit fu' law,
And when she came ben she bobbit fu' law,
When she came ben, she kissed Cockpen,
And then denied that she did it at a'."

"O never look down my lassie ava,
O never look down my lassie ava,
Thy coatie and sark are thy ain hands' wark,
And Lady Jane's sel was never sae brow."]

Now for a few miscellaneous remarks. "The Posie" (in the Museum) is my composition; the air was taken down from Mrs. Burns's voice.* It is well known in the West Country, but the old words are trash. By the bye, take a look at the tune again, and tell me if you do not think it is the original from which "Roslin castle" is composed. The second part, in particular, for the first two or three bars, is exactly the old air. "Strathallan's Lament" is mine: the music is by our right trusty and deservedly well-beloved Allan Masterton. "Donocht-Head" is not mine: I would give ten pounds it were. It appeared first in the Edinburgh Herald; and came to the editor of that paper with the Newcastle post-mark on it.† "Whistle o'er the lave o't" is mine: the music said to be by a John Bruce, a celebrated violin player in Dumfries, about the beginning of this century. This I know, Bruce, who was an honest man, though a red-wud Highlandman, constantly claimed it; and, by all the old musical people here, is believed to be the author of it.

"Andrew and his cutty gun." The song to which this is set in the Museum is mine, and was composed on Miss Euphemia Murray, of Lintrose, commonly and deservedly called the Flower of Strathmore.

"How long and dreary is the night." I met with some such words in a collection of songs somewhere, which I altered and enlarged; and, to please you, and to suit your favourite air, I have taken a stride or two across my room, and have arranged it anew, as you will find on the other page:—

How lang and dreary is the night.

Tune—Cauld Kail in Aberdeen.

I.

How lang and dreary is the night,
When I am frae my dearie;
I restless lie frae e'en to morn,
Though I were ne'er sae weary.

* This and the other scenes to which the Poet alludes, had appeared in the "Museum," and Thomson had enquired whether they were our Bard's.—CURRIE.

† ["Donocht-Head," which the Poet praises so highly, was written by a gentleman, now dead, of the name of Pickering, who lived at Newcastle. There are some who still believe it to be by Burns himself, I know not on what grounds, except that it is equally natural and original:—

"Keen blows the wind o'er Donocht-Head,
The snaw drives snelly thro' the dale,
The Gaber-lunzie tirls my sneck,
And, shivering, tells his wae'ful tale.
Cauld is the night, oh let me in,
And dinna let your minstrel fa',
And dinna let his winding-sheet
Be naething but a wreath o' snaw.

Full ninety winters hae I seen,
And pip'd where gor-cocks whirring flew,
And mony a day I've danc'd I ween
To liltis which from my drone I blew.

* A mountain in the North.

For oh! her lanely nights are lang;
And oh, her dreams are eerie;
And oh, her widow'd heart is sair,
That's absent frae her dearie.

II.

When I think on the lightsome days
I spent wi' thee, my dearie;
And now what seas between us roar—
How can I be but eerie?

III.

How slow ye move, ye heavy hours!
The joyless day how dreary!
It was na sae ye glinted by,
When I was wi' my dearie.

For oh! her lanely nights are lang;
And oh, her dreams are eerie;
And oh, her widow'd heart is sair,
That's absent frae her dearie. ‡

Tell me how you like this. I differ from your idea of the expression of the tune. There is, to me, a great deal of tenderness in it. You cannot, in my opinion, dispense with a bass to your addenda airs. A lady of my acquaintance, a noted performer, plays and sings at the same time so charmingly that I shall never bear to see any of her songs sent into the world, as naked as Mr. What-d'ye-call-um (Ritson) has done in his London collection.

These English songs gravel me to death. I have not that command of the language that I have of my native tongue. I have been at "Duncan Gray," to dress it in English, but all I can do is deplorably stupid. For instance:

Let not Woman e'er complain.

Tune—Duncan Gray.

I.

LET not woman e'er complain
Of inconstancy in love;
Let not woman e'er complain
Fickle man is apt to rove:

My Eppie wak'd, and soon she cry'd,
Get up, guidman, and let him in;
For weel ye ken the winter night
Was short when he began his din.

My Eppie's voice, O wow it's sweet,
Even tho' she bans and scalds a wee;
But when it's tun'd to sorrow's tale,
O, haith, its doubly dear to me!
Come in, auld carl, I'll steer my fire,
I'll make it bleeze a bonnie flame;
Your bluid is thin, ye've tint the gate,
Ye should nae stray sae far frae hame.

Nae hame hae I, the minstrel said,
Sad party-strie o'erturn'd my ha';
And, weeping at the eve of life,
I wander thro' a wreath o' snaw."

"This affecting poem is apparently incomplete. The author need not be ashamed to own himself. It is worthy of Burns or of Macneil."—CURRIE.]

‡ [The earlier version of "How long and dreary is the night," will be found in another part of the volume; the measure is different, as well as many of the lines, and it is directed to be sung to a Gaelic air. Both songs are simple and affecting.]

Look abroad through nature's range,
Nature's mighty law is change ;
Ladies, would it not be strange,
Man should then a monster prove ?

II.

Mark the winds, and mark the skies ;
Ocean's ebb, and ocean's flow :
Sun and moon but set to rise,
Round and round the seasons go :
Why then ask of silly man
To oppose great nature's plan ?
We'll be constant while we can—
You can be no more, you know.

Since the above, I have been out in the country, taking a dinner with a friend, where I met with the lady whom I mentioned in the second page of this odds-and-ends of a letter. As usual, I got into song; and, returning home, I composed the following :—

The Lober's Morning Salute to his Mistress.*

Tune—Deil tak the Wars.

I.

SLEEP'ST thou, or wak'st thou, fairest creature ?
Rosy morn now lifts his eye,
Numbering ilka bud which nature
Waters wi the tears o' joy :
Now thro' the leafy woods,
And by the reeking fwoods,
Wild nature's tenants, freely, gladly stray ;
The lintwhite in his bower
Chants o'er the breathing flower ; †
The lav'rock to the sky
Ascends wi' sangs o' joy,
While the sun and thou arise to bless the day.

II.

Phœbus, gilding the brow o' morning,
Banishes ilk darksome shade,
Nature gladdening and adorning ;
Such to me my lovely maid.
When absent frae my fair,
The murky shades o' care
With startless gloom o'ercast my sullen sky ;
But when, in beauty's light,

She meets my ravish'd sight,
When thro' my very heart
Her beaming glories dart—
'Tis then I wake to life, to light, and joy.†

If you honour my verses by setting the air to them, I will vamp up the old song, and make it English enough to be understood.

I enclose you a musical curiosity, an East Indian air, which you would swear was a Scottish one. I know the authenticity of it, as the gentleman who brought it over is a particular acquaintance of mine. Do preserve me the copy I send you, as it is the only one I have, Clarke has set a bass to it, and I intend to put it into the Musical Museum. Here follow the verses I intend for it :—

The auld Man.

Tune—The Winter of Life.

I.

BUT lately seen in gladsome green,
The woods rejoic'd the day ;
Thro' gentle showers the laughing flowers
In double pride were gay :
But now our joys are fled,
On winter blasts awa !
Yet maiden May, in rich array,
Again shall bring them a'.

II.

But my white pow, nae kindly thowe
Shall melt the snaws of age ;
My trunk of eild, but buss or bield,
Sinks in Time's wintry rage.
Oh ! age has weary days,
And nights o' sleepless pain !
Thou golden time o' youthfu' prime,
Why com'st thou not again ?

I would be obliged to you if you would procure me a sight of Ritson's collection of English Songs, which you mention in your letter. I will thank you for another information, and that as speedily as you please—whether this miserable drawling hotch-potch epistle has not completely tired you of my correspondence?
R. B.

* [The Poet has himself, in part, ascribed the origin of this song to Chloris.—“ He sat sae late and drank sae stout,” at his friend's house, that the morning sun rose on him on his way home, and suggested these verses to his excited fancy. The complicated measure has communicated a laboured-like air to the stanzas; they are full, however, of truth and nature; they were favourites with the Poet, from the trouble which they cost him, perhaps; his manuscripts afford sundry variations.]

† [VAR.— “ Now to the streaming fountain,
Or up the heathy mountain,

The heart, hind, and roe, freely, wildly-wanton stray ;
In twining hazel bowers
His lay the linnet pours ;
The lav'rock to the sky, &c.”]

‡ [VAR.— “ When frae my Chloris parted,
Sad, cheerless, broken-hearted,
Then night's gloomy shades, cloudy, dark, o'ercast my sky ;
But when she charms my sight,
In pride of beauty's light:
When thro' my very heart
Her beaming glories dart,
'Tis then, 'tis then I wake to life and joy.”]

No. LXI.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, October 27th, 1794.

I AM sensible, my dear friend, that a genuine poet can no more exist without his mistress than his meat. I wish I knew the adorable she, whose bright eyes and witching smiles have so often enraptured the Scottish bard, that I might drink her sweet health when the toast is going round. "Craigie-burn Wood" must certainly be adopted into my family, since she is the object of the song; but, in the name of decency, I must beg a new chorus verse from you. "O to be lying beyond thee, dearie," is, perhaps, a consummation to be wished, but will not do for singing in the company of ladies. The songs in your last will do you lasting credit, and suit the respective airs charmingly. I am perfectly of your opinion with respect to the additional airs: the idea of sending them into the world naked as they were born was ungenerous. They must all be clothed and made decent by our friend Clarke.

I find I am anticipated by the friendly Cunningham in sending you Ritson's Scottish Collection. Permit me, therefore, to present you with his English Collection, which you will receive by the coach. I do not find his historical Essay on Scottish song interesting. Your anecdotes and miscellaneous remarks will, I am sure, be much more so. Allan has just sketched a charming design from "Maggie Lauder." She is dancing with such spirit as to electrify the piper, who seems almost dancing too, while he is playing with the most exquisite glee. I am much inclined to get a small copy, and to have it engraved in the style of Ritson's prints.

P.S. Pray what do your anecdotes say concerning "Maggie Lauder?" Was she a real personage, and of what rank? You would surely "spier for her, if you ca'd at Anstruther town."

G. T.

[Of Maggie Lauder much has been written by annotators, but no light has been thrown upon either her birth-place or her station: she is likely a creation of the minstrel muse, and belongs to the imagination. The mind of the world is essentially prosaic; it loves truth, and rejoices to find that sometimes the characters which fiction presents are derived from originals of flesh and blood. Maggie Lauder has lately obtained a longer lease of life at the hands of a northern poet. She is the heroine in Tennant's Anster Fair, a poem of great originality as well as force—the forerunner of what has been called the Beppo School of verse.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

November, 1794.

MANY thanks to you, my dear Sir, for your present: it is a book of the utmost importance to me. I have yesterday begun my anecdotes, &c., for your work. I intend drawing them up in the form of a letter to you, which will save me from the tedious dull business of systematic arrangement. Indeed, as all I have to say consists of unconnected remarks, anecdotes, scraps of old songs, &c., it would be impossible to give the work a beginning, a middle, and an end, which the critics insist to be absolutely necessary in a work. In my last I told you my objections to the song you had selected for "My lodging is on the cold ground." On my visit, the other day, to my fair Chloris (that is the poetic name of the lovely goddess of my inspiration), she suggested an idea, which I, on my return from the visit, wrought into the following song:—

Chloris.

I.

MY Chloris,* mark how green the groves,
The primrose banks how fair;
The balmy gales awake the flowers,
And wave thy flaxen hair.

II.

The lav'rock shuns the palace gay,
And o'er the cottage sings;
For nature smiles as sweet, I ween,
To shepherds as to kings.

III.

Let minstrels sweep the skilfu' string
In lordly lighted ha':
The shepherd stops his simple reed,
Blithe, in the birken shaw.

IV.

The princely revel may survey
Our rustic dance wi' scorn;
But are their hearts as light as ours,
Beneath the milk-white thorn?

V.

The shepherd, in the flow'ry glen,
In shepherd's phrase will woo:
The courtier tells a finer tale—
But is his heart as true?

VI.

These wild-wood flowers I've pu'd, to deck
That spotless breast o' thine:
The courtier's gems may witness love—
But 'tis na love like mine.

* [In another copy of this song it begins thus:—
Behold, my love, how green the groves.]

How do you like the simplicity and tenderness of this pastoral?—I think it pretty well.

I like you for entering so candidly and so kindly into the story of "ma chere Amie." I assure you, I was never more in earnest in my life than in the account of that affair which I sent you in my last.—Conjugal love is a passion which I deeply feel, and highly venerate; but somehow, it does not make such a figure in poesy as that other species of the passion,

"Where Love is liberty, and Nature law."

Musically speaking, the first is an instrument of which the gamut is scanty and confined, but the tones inexpressibly sweet; while the last has powers equal to all the intellectual modulations of the human soul. Still, I am a very poet in my enthusiasm of the passion. The welfare and happiness of the beloved object is the first and inviolate sentiment that pervades my soul; and whatever pleasure I might wish for, or whatever might be the raptures they would give me, yet, if they interfere with that first principle, it is having these pleasures at a dishonest price; and justice forbids, and generosity disdains the purchase.

Despairing of my own powers to give you variety enough in English songs, I have been turning over old collections, to pick out songs, of which the measure is something similar to what I want; and, with a little alteration, so as to suit the rhythm of the air exactly, to give you them for your work. Where the songs have hitherto been but little noticed, nor have ever been set to music, I think the shift a fair one. A song, which, under the same first verse, you will find in Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany, I have cut down for an English dress to your "Daintie Davie," as follows:—

The charming Month of May.

I.

It was the charming month of May,
When all the flow'rs were fresh and gay,
One morning, by the break of day,
The youthful, charming Chloe;
From peaceful slumber she arose,
Girt on her mantle and her hose,
And o'er the flowery mead she goes,
The youthful, charming Chloe.

Lovely was she by the dawn,
Youthful Chloe, charming Chloe,
Tripping o'er the pearly lawn,
The youthful, charming Chloe.

* [In some of the copies of this lyric the last verse runs thus:—

And should the howling wintry blast
Disturb my lassie's midnight rest,
I'll fould thee to my faithful breast,
And comfort thee, my dearie, O!

CURRIE.]

II.

The feather'd people you might see,
Perch'd all around, on every tree,
In notes of sweetest melody,

They hail the charming Chloe;
Till, painting gay the eastern skies,
The glorious sun began to rise,
Out-rival'd by the radiant eyes
Of youthful, charming Chloe.

Lovely was she by the dawn,
Youthful Chloe, charming Chloe,
Tripping o'er the pearly lawn,
The youthful, charming Chloe.

You may think meanly of this, but take a look at the bombast original, and you will be surprised that I have made so much of it. I have finished my song to "Rothemurche's Rant;" and you have Clarke to consult, as to the set of the air for singing:—

Lassie wi' the Lint-white Locks.

Tune—Rothemurche's Rant.

I.

Now nature cleeds the flowery lea,
And a' is young and sweet like thee;
O wilt thou share its joy wi' me,
And say thou'lt be my dearie, O?

Lassie wi' the lint-white locks,
Bonnie lassie, artless lassie,
Wilt thou wi' me tent the flocks?
Wilt thou be my dearie, O?

II.

And when the welcome simmer-shower
Has cheer'd ilk drooping little flower,
We'll to the breathing woodbine bower
At sultry noon, my dearie, O.

III.

When Cynthia lights, wi' silver ray,
The weary shearer's hameward way;
Thro' yellow waving fields we'll stray,
And talk o' love, my dearie, O.

IV.

And when the howling wintry blast
Disturbs my lassie's midnight rest;
Enclasped to my faithful breast,
I'll comfort thee, my dearie, O.*

Lassie wi' the lint-white locks,
Bonnie lassie, artless lassie,
Wilt thou wi' me tent the flocks?
Wilt thou be my dearie, O? †

† [It is said that the wife of Nollekens, the sculptor, was of a disposition so jealous that she would not allow him to have living models to finish his fancy-figures by; and, as the sculptor could not imagine what he did not see, he was compelled to desist from the modelling of Venuses and Graces. In like manner, there are some poets write best from what they see; they look, and talk, and think, till their feelings and

This piece has at least the merit of being a regular pastoral: the vernal morn, the summer noon, the autumnal evening, and the winter night, are regularly rounded. If you like it, well: if not, I will insert it in the Museum.

R. B.

No. LXIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

I AM out of temper that you should set so sweet, so tender an air as "Deil tak the wars," to the foolish old verses. You talk of the silliness of "Saw ye my Father;" by heavens, the odds is gold to brass! Besides, the old song, though now pretty well modernized into the Scottish language, is originally, and in the early editions, a bungling low imitation of the Scottish manner, by that genius, Tom D'Urfe; so has no pretensions to be a Scottish production. There is a pretty English song, by Sheridan, in the "Duenna," to this air, which is out of sight superior to D'Urfe's. It begins—

"When sable night each drooping plant restoring."

The air, if I understand the expression of it properly, is the very native language of simplicity, tenderness, and love. I have again gone over my song to the tune, as follows.*

Now for my English song to "Nancy's to the Greenwood," &c. :—

Farewell, thou Stream.

I.

FAREWELL, thou stream that winding flows
Around Eliza's dwelling!
O mem'ry! spare the cruel throes
Within my bosom swelling:
Condemn'd to drag a hopeless chain,
And yet in secret languish,
To feel a fire in every vein,
Nor dare disclose my anguish.

II.

Love's veriest wretch, unseen, unknown,
I fain my griefs would cover;
The bursting sigh, th' unweeting groan,
Betray the hapless lover.

fancy rise into the region of poesie, and then empty their hearts into the verse. There are others in whose imaginations eternal beauty resides, and who have no occasion to kindle themselves up by the presence of living loveliness. Burns seems to have belonged to the former class; not but that beauty had a permanent abode in his fancy, but the excitement which the voice and looks of woman occasioned saved him the trouble of drawing upon his imagination.

Those acquainted with the Poet's life and habits of study will perceive much of both in the sweet song of "Lassie wi' the lint-white locks." Dumfries is a small town; a few steps carried Burns to green lanes, daisied brae-sides, and quiet stream-banks. Men returning from labour were sure to meet him "all under the light of the moon," sauntering forth as

I know thou doom'st me to despair,
Nor wilt, nor can'st, relieve me;
But oh, Eliza, hear one prayer—
For pity's sake forgive me!

III.

The music of thy voice I heard,
Nor wist while it enslav'd me;
I saw thine eyes, yet nothing fear'd,
'Till fears no more had sav'd me:
Th' unwary sailor thus aghast,
The wheeling torrent viewing;
'Mid circling horrors sinks at last
In overwhelming ruin.

There is an air, "The Caledonian Hunt's Delight," to which I wrote a song that you will find in Johnson.—"Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon;" this air, I think, might find a place among your hundred, as Lear says of his knights. Do you know the history of the air? It is curious enough. A good many years ago, Mr. James Miller, writer in your good town,—a gentleman whom, possibly, you know,—was in company with our friend Clarke; and talking of Scottish music, Miller expressed an ardent ambition to be able to compose a Scots air. Mr. Clarke, partly by way of joke, told him to keep to the black keys of the harpsichord, and preserve some kind of rhythm, and he would infallibly compose a Scots air. Certain it is, that, in a few days, Mr. Miller produced the rudiments of an air, which Mr. Clarke, with some touches and corrections, fashioned into the tune in question. Ritson, you know, has the same story of the black keys; but this account which I have just given you, Mr. Clarke informed me of several years ago. Now, to show you how difficult it is to trace the origin of our airs, I have heard it repeatedly asserted that this was an Irish air;—nay, I met with an Irish gentleman who affirmed he had heard it in Ireland among the old women; while, on the other hand, a Countess informed me that the first person who introduced the air into this country was a baronet's lady of her acquaintance, who took down the notes from an itinerant piper in the Isle of Man. How difficult, then, to ascertain the truth respecting our poesie and music! I, myself, have lately seen a couple of ballads sung if he had no aim; his hands behind his back, his hat turned up a little behind by the shortness of his neck, and noting all, yet seeming to note nothing. Yet those who got near without being seen might hear him humming some old Scottish air, and fitting verses to it—the scene and the season supplying the imagery, and the Jeanies, the Nancies, the Phelies, and the Jessies of his admiration furnishing bright eyes, white hands, and waving tresses, as the turn of the song required.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* See the "Lover's Morning Salute to his Mistress," p. 490. Our Bard remarks upon it, "I could easily throw this into an English mould; but, to my taste, in the simple and the tender of the pastoral song, a sprinkling of the old Scottish has an inimitable effect."—CURRIE.

through the streets of Dumfries, with my name at the head of them as the author, though it was the first time I had ever seen them.

I thank you for admitting "Cragie-burn Wood," and I shall take care to furnish you with a new chorus. In fact, the chorus was not my work, but a part of some old verses to the air. If I can catch myself in a more than ordinarily propitious moment, I shall write a new "Cragie-burn Wood" altogether. My heart is much in the theme.

I am ashamed, my dear fellow, to make the request; 'tis dunning your generosity; but in a moment when I had forgotten whether I was rich or poor, I promised Chloris a copy of your songs.* It wrings my honest pride to write you this, but an ungracious request is doubly so by a tedious apology. To make you some amends, as soon as I have extracted the necessary information out of them, I will return you Ritson's volumes.

The lady is not a little proud that she is to make so distinguished a figure in your collection, and I am not a little proud that I have it in my power to please her so much. Lucky it is for your patience that my paper is done, for, when I am in a scribbling humour, I know not when to give over.

R. B.

—◆—
No. LXIV.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

15th November, 1794.

MY GOOD SIR:

SINCE receiving your last, I have had another interview with Mr. Clarke, and a long consultation. He thinks the "Caledonian Hunt" is more Bacchanalian than amorous in its nature, and recommends it to you to match the air accordingly. Pray did it ever occur to you how peculiarly well the Scottish airs are adapted for verses in the form of a dialogue? The first part of the air is generally low, and suited for a man's voice, and the second part, in many instances, cannot be sung, at concert pitch, but by a female voice. A song, thus performed, makes an agreeable variety, but few of ours are written in this form: I wish you would think of it in some of those that remain. The only one of the kind you have sent me is admirable, and will be an universal favourite.

Your verses for "Rothemurche" are so sweetly pastoral, and your serenade to Chloris, for "Deil tak the Wars," so passionately tender, that I have sung myself into raptures with them. Your song for "My lodging is on the cold ground," is likewise a diamond of the first water; I am quite dazzled and delighted with it. Some of your Chlorises, I suppose, have flaxen hair, from your partiality for this colour; else we differ about it; for I should scarcely conceive a woman to be a beauty, and reading that she had lint-white locks!

"Farewell thou stream that winding flows," I think excellent, but it is much too serious to come after "Nancy:" at least it would seem an incongruity to provide the same air with merry Scottish, and melancholy English, verses! The more that the two sets of verses resemble each other in their general character, the better. Those you have manufactured for "Dainty Davie" will answer charmingly. I am happy to find you have begun your anecdotes: † I care not how long they be, for it is impossible that any thing from your pen can be tedious. Let me beseech you not to use ceremony in telling me when you wish to present any of your friends with the songs: the next carrier will bring you three copies, and you are as welcome to twenty as to a pinch of snuff.

—◆—
No. LXV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

19th November, 1794.

YOU see, my dear Sir, what a punctual correspondent I am; though indeed you may thank yourself for the tedium of my letters, as you have so flattered me on my horsemanship with my favourite hobby, and have praised the grace of his ambling so much, that I am scarcely ever off his back. For instance, this morning, though a keen blowing frost, in my walk before breakfast, I finished my duet, which you

* [Chloris, it is said, was so pleased to see herself reflected in verse, and associated with the genius of Burns, that she showed the works of Thomson to her friends or admirers; and, as they were not few, it soon became publicly known that her flaxen locks, blue eyes, and "passing, pleasing tongue" would communicate new charms to northern song. This, it seems, gave some offence to the more staid and stately of the Poet's friends; they remonstrated with him, not on the impropriety of resorting to the beauty of a farmer's daughter to bestow grace or tenderness on his strains, but because he had given her copies of his songs, both in manuscript and print, which, in the careless gaiety of her nature, she exhibited to the world. The Poet saw that he had acted imprudently; a mutual friend was employed to reclaim the manuscripts; the lady gave them up with reluctance, but retained, and, perhaps, still retains, the work of Thomson.]

† ["The anecdotes promised by the Poet were but in part written: a rich treat has thus been lost to all his admirers. He would have given us a chapter on the human heart, informed us of the various feelings and impulses under which he wrote his lyrics—the hour and the season in which they were produced—the walks in which he rambled, and the heroines who lent look and life to the strains. Of each we would have known as much as we do of Highland Mary; nor could this have been otherwise than acceptable to the ladies themselves. We have been left to tradition, or conjecture, or accidental intimations; and the honour done to the charms of one has, we fear, sometimes been conferred on another. The Poet wrote notes of another kind on Johnson's Museum: These will be found in another portion of the volume. They are at once old and new, serious and comic, full of anecdotes and scraps of quaint and curious song, and marked everywhere with that peculiar spirit and feeling which distinguished Burns amongst all the sons of Caledonia."—CUNNINGHAM.]

were pleased to praise so much. Whether I have uniformly succeeded, I will not say; but here it is for you, though it is not an hour old :—

♫ Philly, happy be that Day.

Tune—The Sow's Tail.

HE.

O PHILLY, happy be that day,
When, roving through the gather'd hay,
My youthfu' heart was stown away,
And by thy charms, my Philly.

SHE.

O Willy, aye I bless the grove
Where first I own'd my maiden love,
Whilst thou didst pledge the Powers above
To be my ain dear Willy.

HE.

As songsters of the early year
Are ilka day mair sweet to hear,
So ilka day to me mair dear
And charming is my Philly.

SHE.

As on the brier the budding rose
Still richer breathes and fairer blows,
So in my tender bosom grows
The love I bear my Willy.

HE.

The milder sun and bluer sky
That crown my harvest cares wi' joy,
Were ne'er sae welcome to my eye
As is a sight o' Philly.

SHE.

The little swallow's wanton wing,
Tho' wafting o'er the flowery spring,
Did ne'er to me sic tidings bring
As meeting o' my Willy.

HE.

The bee that thro' the sunny hour
Sips nectar in the opening flower,
Compar'd wi' my delight is poor,
Upon the lips o' Philly.

SHE.

The woodbine in the dewy weed
When evening shades in silence meet,
Is nocht sae fragrant or sae sweet
As is a kiss o' Willy.

HE.

Let fortune's wheel at random rin,
And fools may tyne, and knaves may win;
My thoughts are a' bound up in ane,
And that's my ain dear Philly.

SHE.

What's a' the joys that gowd can gie?
I care na wealth a single flie;
The lad I love's the lad for me,
And that's my ain dear Willy.

Tell me, honestly, how you like it; and point out whatever you think faulty.

I am much pleased with your idea of singing our songs in alternate stanzas, and regret that you did not hint it to me sooner. In those that remain I shall have it in my eye. I remember your objections to the name, Philly; but it is the common abbreviation of Phillis. Sally, the only other name that suits, has, to my ear, a vulgarity about it, which unfits it for anything except burlesque. The legion of Scottish post-asters of the day, whom your brother editor, Mr. Ritson, ranks with me, as my coevals, have always mistaken vulgarity for simplicity: whereas, simplicity is as much eloignée from vulgarity, on the one hand, as from affected point and puerile conceit on the other.

I agree with you, as to the air "Craigie-burn Wood," that a chorus would, in some degree, spoil the effect; and shall certainly have none in my projected song to it. It is not, however, a case in point with "Rothemurche;" there, as in "Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch," a chorus goes, to my taste, well enough. As to the chorus going first, that is the case with "Roy's Wife" as well as "Rothemurche." In fact, in the first part of both tunes, the rhythm is so peculiar and irregular, and on that irregularity depends so much of their beauty, that we must e'en take them with all their wildness, and humour the verse accordingly. Leaving out the starting-note in both tunes has, I think, an effect that no regularity could counterbalance the want of:—

Try	{ O Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch.
and	{ O Lussie wi' the lint-white locks.
compare with	{ Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch.
	{ Lussie wi' the lint-white locks.

Does not the tameness of the prefixed syllable strike you? In the last case, with the true furor of genius, you strike at once into the wild originality of the air; whereas, in the first insipid method, it is like the grating screw of the pins before the fiddle is brought into tune. This is my taste; if I am wrong I beg pardon of the cognoscenti.

"The Caledonian Hunt" is so charming that it would make any subject in a song go down; but pathos is certainly its native tongue. Scottish Bacchanalians we certainly want, though the few we have are excellent. For instance, "Todlin Hame" is, for wit and humour, an unparalleled composition; and "Andrew and his cutty Gun" is the work of a master. By the way, are you not quite vexed to think that those men of genius, for such they certainly were, who composed our fine Scottish lyrics, should be unknown? It has given me many a heart-ache. Apropos to Bacchanalian songs in Scottish; I composed one yesterday, for an air I like much—"Lumps o' pudding":—

Contented wi' Little.

Tune—Lumps o' Pudding.

I.

CONTENTED wi' little, and cantie wi' mair,
Whene'er I foregather wi' sorrow and care,
I gie them a skelp, as they're creeping along,
Wi a cog o' guid swats, and an auld Scottish sang.

II.

I whyles claw the elbow o' troublesome thought;
But man is a sodger, and life is a faught;
My mirth and guid humour are coin in my pouch, [dare touch.
And my freedom's my lairdship nae monarch

III.

A towmond o' trouble, should that be my fa',
A night o' guid fellowship sowthers it a':
When at the blithe end o' our journey at last,
Wha the deil ever thinks o' the road he has past?

IV.

Blind chance, let her snapper and stoyte on her way;
Be't to me, be't frae me, e'en let the jade gae:
Come ease, or come travail; come pleasure or pain; [again!"
My warst word is—"Welcome, and welcome

If you do not relish the air, I will send it to Johnson. R. B.

[Pastoral verse exhibits many examples of the dramatic mode of composition: compliments and scorn, praise and censure, are bandied about by shepherds and shepherdesses, till the subject-matter is exhausted. In like manner, Willy and Philly, in the first of these lyrics, carry on the pleasant strife of compliment, till flowery comparisons grow scant, and the lovers are reduced to silence. Phillis is a favourite in northern song; in the present instance it is the true name of the heroine, Miss Phillis M'Murdo, of Dumlanrig.]

[One of the happiest examples of free wit and humour may be found in the "Auld Gudeman":—

HE.

"The auld gudeman that thou tells of,
The country kens where he was born,
Was but a silly poor vagabond,
And ilka ane leugh him to scorn;

For he did spend and make an end
Of gear that his forefathers wan;
He gart the poor stand frae the door,—
Sae tell nae mair o' the auld gudeman.

SHE.

My heart alake is liken to break,
When I think on my winsome John;
His blinkan e'e and gate sae free,
Was naething like thee, thou dosen'd drone.
His rosie cheek and flaxen hair,
And a skin as white as onie swan,
Was large and tall and comely withal,
And thou't never be like my auld gudeman."

Tradition has recorded that Burns wrote "Contented wi' little" in a moment of hope, when fortune seemed inclined to pause in her persecution, and the frozen finger of the Excise pointed to the situation of supervisor. Yet hope did not hinder him from thinking of independence, even while keeping sorrow and care at bay with a cup and song: he forgot not that his freedom was a 'lairdship nae monarch dare touch.' Of songs which honour fire-side happiness and domestic felicity we have but few, compared with those which treat of love and wine; yet of these, some are truly excellent: and, among the latter, who can refuse to include

"Contented wi' little and cantie wi' mair!"
CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

SINCE yesterday's penmanship, I have framed a couple of English stanzas, by way of an English song to "Roy's Wife." You will allow me that, in this instance, my English corresponds in sentiment with the Scottish:—

Canst thou leabe me thus, my Katy?

Tune—Roy's Wife.

I.

Is this thy plighted, fond regard,
Thus cruelly to part, my Katy?
Is this thy faithful swain's reward—
An aching, broken heart, my Katy?

Canst thou leave me thus, my Katy?
Canst thou leave me thus, my Katy?
Well thou know'st my aching heart—
And canst thou leave me thus for pity?

II.

Farewell! and ne'er such sorrows tear
That fickle heart of thine, my Katy!
Thou may'st find those will love thee dear—
But not a love like mine, my Katy!

Canst thou leave me thus, my Katy?
 Canst thou leave me thus, my Katy?
 Well thou know'st my aching heart—
 And canst thou leave me thus for pity?

Well! I think this, to be done in two or three turns across my room, and with two or three pinches of Irish blackguard, is not so far amiss. You see I am determined to have my quantum of applause from somebody.

Tell my friend Allan (for I am sure that we only want the trifling circumstance of being known to one another to be the best friends on earth) that I much suspect he has, in his plates, mistaken the figure of the stock and horn. I have at last gotten one; but it is a very rude instrument: it is composed of three parts; the stock, which is the hinder thigh-bone of a sheep, such as you see in a mutton-ham; the horn, which is a common Highland cow's horn, cut off at the smaller end, until the aperture be large enough to admit the stock to be pushed up through the horn, until it be held by the thicker end of the thigh bone; and lastly, an oaten reed, exactly cut and notched like that which you see every shepherd-boy have, when the corn-stems are green and full-grown. The reed is not made fast in the bone, but is held by the lips, and plays loose in the smaller end of the stock; while the stock, with the horn hanging on its larger end, is held by the hands in playing. The stock has six or seven ventiges on the upper side, and one back-ventige, like the common flute. This of mine was made by a man from the braes of Athole, and is exactly what the shepherds were wont to use in that country.

However, either it is not quite properly bored in the holes, or else we have not the art of blowing it rightly; for we can make little of it. If Mr. Allan chooses, I will send him a sight of mine; as I look on myself to be a kind of brother-brush with him. "Pride in poets is nae sin," and, I will say it, that I look on Mr. Allan and Mr. Burns to be the only genuine and real painters of Scottish costume in the world.*

[To the Song "Canst thou leave me thus, my Katy?" written in the character of a forsaken lover, a reply was found on the part of the lady, among the MSS. of Burns, evidently

* [This is an interesting and minute account of an ancient instrument of music, well known to the peasantry of Scotland. In the Complaynt of Scotland, written in 1548, the author draws this graphic picture of the manners of our pastoral ancestors. "I rais and returnit to the fresche fieldis that I cam fra, quhar I beheld mony hudit herdils blawand ther buc hornis and ther corne pipis, calland and convoyand mony fat floc to be fed on the fieldis. Than the scheiphirdis pat ther scheip on bankis and brais and on dry hillis, to get ther pastour. Than I beheld the scheiphirdis wyvis and ther childer that brocht there morning brakfast to the scheiphirdis. Than the scheiphirdis wyvis cutt ither rachis and seggis and gardit mony fragrant grene meduart, with the quhilkis tha covurit the end of a lye rig, and syne sat doune atogyyddir to tak there refectione, quhar thair maid grit ither of evyrie sort of mylk, baith of ky mylk, and zoue mylk, sueit mylk, and sour mylk, curdis and quhaye, sourkittis, fresche buttir, and salt buttir, reyme, flot quhaye, grene cheis, kyrn mylk. Evyrie scheiphird hed an horne spune in the lug of there bonet: thair had na breyd, but ry caikis and fustean skonnis maid of flour. Than eftir there disjune, thair began to talk of grit myrrynes that was rycht plesand to be hard."

The things "rycht plesand to be hard," consisted of "gude tallis and fabillis," and "sueit melodious sangis of natural music of the antique," after enumerating which our author goes on to tell the different musical instruments wherewith the shepherds enlivened the dance. "Than eftir this sueit celest armonye, thair began to dance in ane ring; evyrie ald scheiphird led his wyfe be the hand, and evyrie zong scheiphird led hyr quhome he luffit best. There was vij scheiphirdis, and ilk ane of them hed ane syndry instrument to play to the laif. The first hed ane drone bag pipe, the nyxt hed ane pipe maid of ane bleddir and of ane reid, the third playit on ane trump, the feyrd on ane corne pipe, the fyft playit on ane pipe maid of ain gait horne, the sext playit on ane recorder, the sevint playt on ane fiddil, and the last playt on ane quhissil."

The late Dr. Leyden, who edited the curious work from which the above extracts are given, has enriched his edition with a learned and valuable dissertation, from which we take the following passages, as illustrative of the subject in question, for he has exhausted all that can be said about it.

"The 'pipe maid of ane gait horne,' is the stock and horn, or 'buck horne' of the Scottish peasantry, formed by inserting a reed, or pipe, into a horn, which gives a full and mellow expression to the sound. The reed or whistle was often formed of the excavated elder branch, to which practice there is an allusion in Cockelby's Sow, where 'the pype maid of a bourit bourte,' is mentioned as the appropriate musical instrument of the 'nolt herdils.' The 'stoc-horn,' mentioned in the same poem, is merely a species of bugle, or open cow's horn, used for giving an alarm, like the Irish stuc or stoc, a brazen tube formed like the horn of a cow, and employed as a speaking trumpet. The pib-corn, used in some districts of Wales, seems to be only an improved species of the stock and horn, from which it differs, in having both extremities of the pipe or whistle inserted in a horn. The Welch, according to Higden, employed these 'hornes of gheet,' as he terms them, at their funerals. The stock and horn may likewise be considered as synonymous with the 'chalemaux de Cornouaille' in the Romanet of the Rose, rendered by Chaucer, 'horn pipes of Cornwall.' In Merciai's 'Les Vigiles de la mort du Roi Charles Septiesme,' the Horn pipe is likewise mentioned as a favourite pastoral instrument.

"There can be no doubt but this instrument is the 'liltyng horn' of Chaucer, such

'As haue these little heerde gromes,
 That kepten beastes in the bromes.'

"The stock and horn was so formed that the parts could be easily separated, while the horn might be employed as a bugle, and the pipe, as a simple pipe or whistle. The stock horn, in the strict sense, is the cornet, or crumhorn of the Germans, the shalmey, or chalumeau, used with the trumpet at tilts and tournaments. Thus,

'Trumpettis and schalmis with a schout
 Played or the rink began.'

"The shalmey is enumerated by Gower among the instruments of music in the court of Venus.

'In suche accorde and such a sowne
 Of bumbarde and of clariowne,
 With cornemuse and shalmeyle,
 That it was halfe a mannes hele
 So glad a noise for to here.—'

"It is curious that the pipe is excluded from 'the companie of Eldie,' in the court of Venus.

'But yet I herde no pipes there
 To make mirthe in mannes ere;
 But the musike I might knowe
 For olde men which sowned lowe,
 With harpe and lute and the citole;
 The houe dance and the carole,
 In such a wise as loue hath bede,
 A softe paas thei daunce and trede.'

in a female hand-writing. The temptation to give it to the public is irresistible; and if, in so doing, offence should be given to the fair authoress, the beauty of her verses must plead our excuse:—

Tune—Roy's Wife.

TELL me that thou yet art true,
And a' my wrongs shall be forgiven,
And when this heart proves false to thee,
Yon sun shall cease its course in heaven.

Stay, my Willie—yet believe me,
Stay, my Willie—yet believe me,
For, ah! thou know'st na' every pang
Wad wring my bosom, shouldst thou leave me.

But to think I was betray'd,
That falsehood e'er our loves should sunder!
To take the flow'ret to my breast,
And find the guilefu' serpent under.

Could I hope thou'dst ne'er deceive,
Celestial pleasures, might I choose 'em,
I'd slight, nor seek in other spheres
That heaven I'd find within thy bosom.

Stay my Willie—yet believe me,
Stay my Willie—yet believe me,
For, ah! thou know'st na' every pang
Wad wring my bosom, shouldst thou leave me.]

["It may amuse the reader to be told that, on this occasion, the gentleman and the lady have exchanged the dialects of their respective countries. The Scottish Bard makes his address in pure English: the reply on the part of the lady, in the Scottish dialect is, if we mistake not, by a young and beautiful Englishwoman."—CURRIE.]

[This reply was written by a young and beautiful Englishwoman—Mrs. Riddel. She alludes to her quarrel with the Poet: she took a flower to her bosom, and found a serpent under. In that metaphorical way she intimated that the Poet had the presumption to attempt to salute her—a piece of forwardness which a coldness of two years' continuance more than punished.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXVII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

29th November, 1794.

I ACKNOWLEDGE, my dear Sir, you are not only the most punctual, but the most delectable, correspondent I ever met with. To attempt flattering you never entered my head; the truth is, I look back with surprise at my impudence, in so frequently nibbling at lines and couplets of your incomparable lyrics, for which, perhaps, if you had served me right, you would have sent me to the devil. On the contrary, however, you have, all along, condescended to invite my criticism with so much courtesy that it ceases to be wonderful if I have sometimes given myself the airs of a reviewer. Your last budget demands unqualified praise: all the songs are charming, but the duet is a chef d'œuvre. "Lumps of pudding" shall certainly make one of my family dishes: you have cooked it so capitally that it will please all palates. Do give us a few more of this cast, when you find yourself in good spirits; these convivial songs are more wanted than those of the amorous kind, of which we have great choice. Besides, one does not often meet with a singer capable of giving the proper effect to the latter, while the former are easily sung, and acceptable to every body. I participate in your regret that the authors of some of our best songs are unknown: it is provoking to every admirer of genius.

I mean to have a picture painted from your beautiful ballad, "The Soldier's Return," to be engraved for one of my frontispieces. The most interesting point of time appears to me, when she recognizes her ain dear Willy, "She gaz'd, she reddened like a rose." The three lines immediately following are, no doubt, more impressive on the reader's feelings; but were the painter to fix on these, then you'll observe the animation and anxiety of her countenance is gone, and he could only represent her fainting in the soldier's arms. But I submit the matter to you, and beg your opinion.

Allan desires me to thank you for your accurate description of the stock and horn, and for the very gratifying compliment you pay him, in considering him worthy of standing in a niche, by the side of Burns, in the Scottish Pantheon. He has seen the rude instrument you describe, so does not want you to send it; but wishes to know whether you believe it to have ever been generally used as a musical pipe by the Scottish shepherds, and when, and in what part of the country chiefly. I doubt much if it was capable of any thing but routing and roaring. A friend of mine says, he remembers to have heard one in his younger days (made of wood instead of your bone), and that the sound was abominable.*

Do not. I beseech you, return any books.

G. T.

No. LXVIII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

December, 1794.

It is, I assure you, the pride of my heart to do any thing to forward, or add to the value of,

* The query put by Thomson is sufficiently answered by the lengthened note to the preceding letter, the value of which will be duly appreciated by every one curious in the history of Scottish music.—MOTHERWELL.

your book ; and, as I agree with you that the Jacobite song in the Museum, to "There'll never be peace till Jamie comes home" would not so well consort with Peter Pindar's excellent love-song to that air, I have just framed for you the following :—

My Nannie's awa.

Tune—There'll never be Peace, &c.

I.

Now in her green mantle blithe* nature arrays,
And listens the lambkins that bleat o'er the braes,
While† birds warble welcome in ilka green shaw ;
But to me it's delightful—my Nannie's awa !

II.

The snaw-drap & primrose our woodlands adorn,‡
And violets bathe in the weet o' the morn ;
They pain my sad § bosom, sae sweetly they blaw,
They mind me o' Nannie—and Nannie's awa !

III.

Thou lav'rock that springs frae the dews of the lawn, [dawn,
The shepherd to warn o' the grey-breaking
And thou mellow mavis that hails the night fa',
Give over for pity—my Nannie's awa !

IV.

Come autumn sae pensive, in yellow and grey,||
And soothe me with tidings o' nature's decay :
The dark dreary winter, and wild driving snaw,
Alane can delight me—now Nannie's awa !

How does this please you ?—As to the point of time for the expression, in your proposed print from my "Sodger's Return," it must certainly be at—"She gaz'd." The interesting dubity and suspense taking possession of her countenance, and the gushing fondness, with a mixture of roguish playfulness in his, strike me as things of which a master will make a great deal.—In great haste, but in great truth, yours.
R. B.

[Clarinda was the Nannie whose absence Burns laments in this pretty pastoral. His thoughts were often in Edinburgh. On festive occasions, when toasts were called for, Syme used to exclaim, "Come, we all know what Burns will give—here's Mrs. Mac." The lavoock was a favourite bird with him ; and many happy images it has supplied him with. It is, indeed, pleasant both to eye and ear to be out by grey daylight on a summer morning, when a thousand larks are ascending into the brightening air ; the warblings of some are near, and the songsters may be seen mounting as they sing : others are unseen in the cloud, and the whole atmosphere is full of melody.]

* VAR.—Gay.

† VAR.—And.—CUNNINGHAM.

‡ The primrose and daisy our glens may adorn.

No. LXIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

January, 1795.

I FEAR for my songs ; however, a few may please, yet originality is a coy feature in composition, and in a multiplicity of efforts in the same style, disappears altogether. For these three thousand years, we poetic folks have been describing the spring, for instance ; and, as the spring continues the same, there must soon be a sameness in the imagery, &c., of these said rhyming folks.

A great critic (Aikin) on songs says that love and wine are the exclusive themes for song-writing. The following is on neither subject, and consequently is no song ; but will be allowed, I think, to be two or three pretty good prose thoughts, inverted into rhyme :—

Is there, for honest Poverty.

Tune—For a' that, and a' that.

I.

Is there, for honest poverty,
That hangs his head, and a' that ?
The coward-slave, we pass him by,
We dare be poor for a' that !
For a' that, and a' that,
Our toil's obscure, and a' that ;
The rank is but the guinea-stamp,
The man's the gowd for a' that !

II.

What tho' on hamely fare we dine,
Wear hoddin grey, and a' that ;
Gie fools their silks, and knaves their wine,
A man's a man, for a' that !
For a' that, and a' that,
Their tinsel show, and a' that ;
The honest man, though e'er sae poor,
Is king o' men for a' that !

III.

Ye see yon birkie, ca'd—a lord,
Wha struts, and stares, and a' that ;
Though hundreds worship at his word,
He's but a coof for a' that :
For a' that, and a' that,
His riband, star, and a' that,
The man of independent mind
He looks and laughs at a' that !

IV.

A king can mak a belted knight,
A marquis, duke, and a' that ;
But an honest man's aboon his might,
Guid faith he mauna fa' that !

§ VAR.—Torture mv.

|| Array.—Poet's MS.

For a' that, and a' that,
Their dignities, and a' that,
The pith o' sense, and pride o' worth,
Are higher ranks than a' that.

V.

Then let us pray that come it may—
As come it will for a' that—
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth,
May bear the gree, and a' that ;
For a' that, and a' that,
It's comin' yet for a' that,
That man to man, the warld o'er,
Shall brothers be for a' that !*

I do not give you the foregoing song for your book, but merely by way of vive la bagatelle ; for the piece is not really poetry. How will the following do for "Craigie-burn Wood?"—

Craigie-burn Wood.†

I.

SWEET fa's the eve on Craigie-burn,
And blithe awakes the morrow ;
But a' the pride o' spring's return
Can yield me nocht but sorrow.

II.

I see the flowers and spreading trees,
I hear the wild birds singing ;
But what a weary wight can please,
And care his bosom wringing ?

* ["In his noble song, 'A man's a man for a' that,' the Poet has vindicated the natural and unalienable rights of his species: he has distinguished between our social condition as contemplated by God, and that artificial state brought about by the perverse ingenuity of man. In resorting to first principles, he is compelled to speak with contempt of hereditary rank, and treat it as a manifest usurpation. That genius and enterprise should raise themselves in society seem as natural as for the sun to shine ; but that they will continue in the family-line, from generation to generation, no person but a prince expects. God made genius personal, not hereditary ; he gave the wisdom to Solomon which he refused to Rehobaham ; and even in our own country, noble houses may be pointed out of which nothing remains noble save the name. Burns could not but feel that wealth, not talent, is the way to titles: the most glorious persons in British story went to the dust with plain 'master' on their coffin-lids—Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, Locke. There should be rank and honours for all those who greatly distinguish themselves in literature and arts, as well as in arms. He who would truly contemplate the history of a country should consider that its greatness arises from the union of many qualities ; Watt deserves a place as well as Wellington ; nor are the achievements of Scott to be forgotten in the account of battles by sea and shore. Titles should flow from the fountain of honour readily and unsolicited to all who are illustrious ; instead of which they flow almost solely to the wealthy. Those who have amassed fortunes by all manner of speculation, and have become swollen and big, like striped pumpkins flourishing on heaps of dung, are sure to have the sword lain on their shoulders, or their brows enclosed in coronets. There is nothing left for genius but to join in the song of Burns,—

'Then let us pray that come it may,
As come it will for a' that ;
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth,
Can bear the gree, and a' that.'

"In this sentiment men of talent should join more earnestly, since it has been publicly declared that genius is so supremely

III.

Fain, fain would I my griefs impart,
Yet dare na for your anger ;
But secret love will break my heart,
If I conceal it langer.

IV.

If thou refuse to pity me,
If thou shalt love anither,
When yon green leaves fade frae the tree,
Around my grave they'll wither.

Farewell ! God bless you.

R. B.

No. LXX.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 30th January, 1795.

MY DEAR SIR.

I THANK you heartily for "Nannie's awa," as well as for "Craigie-burn," which I think a very comely pair. Your observation on the difficulty of original writing in a number of efforts, in the same style, strikes me very forcibly ; and it has again and again excited my wonder to find you continually surmounting this difficulty, in the many delightful songs you have sent me. Your vive la bagatelle song, "For a' that," shall undoubtedly be included in my list.

G. T.

blest as not at all to require other distinction—a doctrine which decrees to dulness the star and the garter—

'Amen—and virtue is its own reward,'"

CUNNINGHAM.]

† [This sweet little song savours much of the secret love displayed in the following old verses:—

WHEN ye come to yon town end,
Fu' mony a lass ye'll see ;
Dinna, dinna, look at them,
For fear ye mindna me.
Dinna ask me gin I luv thee ?
Deed I darena tell ;
Dinna ask me gin I luv thee ?
Ask it o' yoursell.

O dinna look at me sae aft,
Sae weel as ye may trow ;
For when ye look at me sae aft,
I canna look at you.

Dinna ask me, &c.

Little ken ye but mony a ne,
Will say they fancy thee ;
But only keep your mind to them
That fancies nane but thee.

Dinna ask me gin I luv thee,—
Deed I darena tell ;
Dinna ask me gin I luv thee,—
Ask it o' yoursell.

B.

Craigie-burn Wood is situated on the banks of the river Moffat, and about three miles distant from the village of that name, celebrated for its medicinal waters. The woods of Craigie-burn and of Duncrief were at one time favourite haunts of our poet. It was there he met the "Lassie wi' the lint-white locks," and that he conceived several of his beautiful lyrics.—CURRIE.]

[In these cold words, "Your vive la bagatelle song, 'For a' that,' shall undoubtedly be included in my list," Thomson accepts the present of a song which will live while the language lasts.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXXI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

February, 1795.

HERE is another trial at your favourite air:—

Tune—Let me in this ae Night.

I.

O LASSIE, art thou sleeping yet,
Or art thou waking, I would wit?
For love has bound me hand and foot,
And I would fain be in, jo.

O let me in this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
For pity's sake this ae night,
O rise and let me in, jo!

II.

Thou hear'st the winter wind and weet,
Nae star blinks thro' the driving sleet:
Tak pity on my weary feet,
And shield me frae the rain, jo.

III.

The bitter blast that round me blaws,
Unheeded howls, unheeded fa's:
The cauldness o' thy heart's the cause
Of a' my grief and pain, jo.

O let me in this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
For pity's sake this ae night,
O rise and let me in, jo!

HER ANSWER.

I.

O tell na me o' wind and rain,
Upbraid na me wi' cauld disdain!
Gae back the gate ye cam again,
I winna let ye in, jo.

I tell you now this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
And ance for a' this ae night,
I winna let you in, jo.

II.

The snellest blast, at mirkest hours,
That round the pathless wand'rer pours,
Is nocht to what poor she endures,
That's trusted faithless man, jo.

III.

The sweetest flower that deck'd the mead,
Now trodden like the vilest weed;
Let simple maid the lesson read,
The weird may be her ain, jo.

IV.

The bird that charm'd his summer-day
Is now the cruel fowler's prey;
Let witless, trusting woman say
How aft her fate's the same, jo.

I tell you now this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
And ance for a' this ae night,
I winna let you in, jo!

I do not know whether it will do. R. B.

[If Burns drew his song of "A man's a man for a' that" solely from his own mind and fancy, there is no question that he is indebted to an old strain for the idea of these twin lyrics. He has changed the lead into gold, and dismissed a deal of dross: still the sentiment belongs to the olden times. These are part of the old words:—

"O lassie, art thou sleeping yet,
Or are you waking, I wad wit?
For love has bound me hand and fit,
And I wad fain be in, jo.

O let me in this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
O let me in this ae night,
Or I'll ne'er come back again, jo.

The night it is baith cauld and weet,
The morn it will be snaw and sleet;
My shoon are freezing to my feet,
Wi' standing here alane, jo.

I am the laird o' Windy wa's,
I come na here without a cause;
And I hae gotten mony fa's,
Wad killed a thousand men, jo.—"

"My father's waukrife in his sleep,
My mither the cha'mer keys does keep,
And a' the doors sae chirp and cheep,
I daurna let you in, jo.

Sae gae ye're ways this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night,
O gae ye're ways this ae night,
I daurna let ye in, jo."

"But I'll come stealing saftly in,
And cannily mak little din;
And then the gate to you I'll find,
If you'll direct me in, jo.

O let me in this ae night,
This ae, ae, ae night;
O let me in this ae night,
Or I'll ne'er come back again, jo."

It is said that the thoughts of Burns wandered to Woodlee-Park, and his feud with Mrs. Riddel, when he composed these songs. The lady in the old verses resisted nothing like so stoutly or successfully as the modern heroine is made to do.]

No. LXXII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Ecclefechan, 7th February, 1795.

MY DEAR THOMSON:

YOU cannot have any idea of the predicament in which I write to you. In the course of my duty as supervisor (in which capacity I have acted of late), I came yesternight to this unfortunate, wicked, little village.* I have gone forward, but snows, of ten feet deep, have impeded my progress: I have tried to "gae back the gate I cam again," but the same obstacle has shut me up within insuperable bars. To add to my misfortune, since dinner, a scraper has been torturing catgut, in sounds that would have insulted the dying agonies of a sow under the hands of a butcher, and thinks himself, on that very account, exceeding good company. In fact, I have been in a dilemma, either to get drunk, to forget these miseries; or to hang myself, to get rid of them: like a prudent man (a character congenial to my every thought, word, and deed), I, of two evils, have chosen the least, and am very drunk, at your service!

I wrote you yesterday from Dumfries. I had not time then to tell you all I wanted to say; and, Heaven knows, at present I have not capacity.

Do you know an air—I am sure you must know it—"We'll gang nae mair to yon town?" I think, in slowish time, it would make an excellent song. I am highly delighted with it; and if you should think it worthy of your attention, I have a fair dame in my eye, to whom I would consecrate it.

As I am just going to bed, I wish you a good night.

R. B.

* ["Ecclefechan is a little thriving village in Annandale: nor is it more known for its hiring fairs than for beautiful lasses and active young men. The latter, when cudgeling was regularly taught to the youth of the Scottish lowlands, distinguished themselves by skill and courage; they did not, however, enjoy their fame without contention: they had frequent feuds with the lads of Lockerby, and their laurels were put in jeopardy. On an old New Year's-day, some thirty years ago, Ecclefechan sent some two hundred 'sticks' against Lockerby: they drew themselves up beside an old fortalice, and intimated their intention of keeping their post till the sun went down:—they bit their thumbs, flourished their oak saplings, and said, 'We wad like to see wha wad hinder us.' This was a matter of joy to the lads of Lockerby: an engagement immediately took place, and Ecclefechan seemed likely to triumph, when a dounce elder of the kirk, seizing a stick from one who seemed unskilful in using it, rushed forward, broke the enemy's ranks, pushed the lads of Ecclefechan rudely out of the place, and exclaimed, 'That's the way we did lang syne!' The Poet paid Ecclefechan many a visit, friendly and official, and even wrought its almost unpronounceable name into a couple of songs."—CUNNINGHAM.]

† ["The Bard must have been tipsy indeed, to abuse sweet Ecclefechan at this rate."—CURRIE.]

‡ [The tune to which this address was written, "Where will bonnie Annie lie?" is sweet; and happily allied to words simple and unaffected, particularly if we were to take into account the exalted personages who formed the hero and

No. LXIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

25th February, 1795.

I HAVE to thank you, my dear Sir, for two epistles, one containing "Let me in this ae night;" and the other from Ecclefechan, proving that, drunk or sober, your "mind is never muddy." You have displayed great address in the above song. Her answer is excellent, and at the same time takes away the indelicacy that otherwise would have attached to his entreaties. I like the song, as it now stands, very much.

I had hopes you would be arrested some days at Ecclefechan, and be obliged to beguile the tedious forenoons by song-making. It will give me pleasure to receive the verses you intend for "O wat ye wha's in yon town."

G. T.

No. LXXIV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

May, 1795.

Address to the Wood-lark.†

Tune—*Where'll bonnie Ann lie.*Or, Loch-Eroch side.

I.

O STAY, sweet warbling wood-lark, stay,
Nor quit for me the trembling spray,
A hapless lover courts thy lay,
Thy soothing, fond complaining.

heroine of the song—viz. James, fifth duke, and Ann, duchess of Hamilton. It was written by Allan Ramsay on the eve of their marriage. The following are the first two stanzas:—

HE.

"Where wad bonny Annie lie?
Alane nae mair ye maun lie;
Wad ye a Goodman try?
Is that the thing ye'ere laking?"

SHE.

Can a lass sae young as I
Venture on the bridal tie,
Syn'e down with a Goodman lie?
I'm fledd he'd keep me waiking."

A later version of the song runs as follows:—

Where will bonnie Annie lie?
Where will bonnie Annie lie?
Where will bonnie Annie lie,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O!

Where but in her true love's bed;
Arms of love around her spread;
Pillow'd on his breast her head,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O!

There will bonnie Annie lie,
There will bonnie Annie lie,
There will bonnie Annie lie,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O!

II.

Again, again that tender part,
That I may catch thy melting art;
For surely that wad touch her heart
Wha kills me wi' disdaining.

III.

Say, was thy little mate unkind,
And heard thee as the careless wind?
Oh, nocht but love and sorrow join'd
Sic notes o' wo could wauken.

IV.

Thou tells o' never-ending care;
O' speechless grief and dark despair:
For pity's sake, sweet bird, nae mair!
Or my poor heart is broken!

Let me know, your very first leisure, how you like this song.

On Chloris being ill.

Tune—Ay wakin' O.

I.

CAN I cease to care?
Can I cease to languish?
While my darling fair
Is on the couch of anguish?

Long, long the night,
Heavy comes the morrow,
While my soul's delight
Is on her bed of sorrow.

II.

Every hope is fled,
Every fear is terror:
Slumber even I dread,
Every dream is horror.

III.

Hear me, Pow'rs divine!
Oh, in pity hear me!
Take aught else of mine,
But my Chloris spare me!

When the storm is raging high,
Calm she'll list it whistling bye!
While cozie in his arms she'll lie,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O.

Where will bonnie Annie lie?
Where will bonnie Annie lie?
Where will bonnie Annie lie,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O?

In the arms of wedded love,
Breathing thanks to Him above,
Whose care and goodness she does prove,
I' the cauld nights o' winter, O!

* [The song on the "Illness of Chloris," is one of the Poet's brief and happy things; it is modelled on an old lyric, still popular in some parts of the north, and justly so:—

"Ay wakin', oh,
Wakin' ay, and weary,
Sleep I canna get,
For thinking on my dearie.
I have fallen in love
Wi' a' the world's darling,
An' canna see the sun
For bonnie May Macfarlane."]

Long, long the night,
Heavy comes the morrow,
While my soul's delight
Is on her bed of sorrow.*

How do you like the foregoing?—The Irish air, "Humours of Glen," is a great favourite of mine, and as, except the silly stuff in the "Poor soldier," there are not any decent verses for it, I have written for it as follows:—

Caledonia.

Tune—Humours of Glen.

I.

THEIR groves o' sweet myrtle let foreign lands
reckon, [perfume;
Where bright-beaming summers exalt their
Far dearer to me you lone glen o' green breckan,
Wi' the burn stealing under the lang yellow broom:
Far dearer to me are you† humble broom bowers,
Where the blue-bell and gowan ‡ lurk lowly
unseen; [flowers,
For there, lightly tripping amang the wild
A-listening the linnet, aft wanders my Jean.

II.

Tho' rich is the breeze in their gay sunny valleys,
And auld CALEDONIA's blast on the wave;
Their sweet-scented woodlands that skirt the proud palace, [and slave!
What are they?—The haunt o' the tyrant
The slave's spicy forests, and gold-bubbling fountains,
The brave Caledonian views wi' disdain;
He wanders as free as the winds of his mountains, [Jean, §
Save love's willing fetters, the chains o' his

† [VAR.—These. ‡ VAR.—Blue-bells and gowans.]

§ [“The exquisite song of ‘Caledonia’ unites domestic affection with love of country, and is exceedingly popular. The heroine was Mrs. Burns, who so charmed the Poet by singing it with taste and feeling that he declared it to be one of his luckiest lyrics. She sang with ease and simplicity; science adorned without injuring nature: and her ‘wood note wild’ was said to be almost unequalled.”

“The original MS. of this song, with which the text has been collated, is thus marked:—‘To Provost Whigham, this first copy of the song: from the author.’

“It is remark-worthy that the song in honour of his wife was accompanied by two in honour of his friend. For the beautiful song which follows in the text, “‘Twas na her bonnie blue e’e was my ruin,’ we are indebted to Jean Lorimer. It is true that ‘Mary’ is wrought into the texture of the verse: but copies have been seen with the first line of the last verse running thus:—

‘Jeanie, I’m thine wi’ a passion sincerest.’

It has already been intimated that this Nithsdale beauty was a sort of lay-figure, on which the muse hung her garlands.”
—CUNNINGHAM.]

'Twas na her bonnie blue &c.

Tune—Laddie lie near me.

I.

'Twas na her bonnie blue e'e was my ruin ;
Fair tho' she be, that was ne'er my undoing :
'Twas the dear smile when naeboddy did mind us,
'Twas the bewitching, sweet, stown glance o'
kindness.

II.

Sair do I fear that to hope is denied me,
Sair do I fear that despair maun abide me !
But tho' fell fortune should fate us to sever,
Queen shall she be in my bosom for ever.

III.

Mary, I'm thine wi' a passion sincerest,
And thou hast plighted me love o' the dearest !
And thou'rt the angel that never can alter--
Sooner the sun in his motion would falter.

Let me hear from you. R. B.

No. LXXXV.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

You must not think, my good Sir, that I have any intention to enhance the value of my gift, when I say, in justice to the ingenious and worthy artist, that the design and execution of the Cotter's Saturday Night is, in my opinion, one of the happiest productions of Allan's pencil. I shall be grievously disappointed if you are not quite pleased with it.

The figure intended for your portrait I think strikingly like you, as far as I can remember your phiz. This should make the piece interesting to your family every way. Tell me whether Mrs. Burns finds you out among the figures.

I cannot express the feeling of admiration with which I have read your pathetic "Address to the Wood-lark," your elegant Panegyric on "Caledonia," and your affecting verses on "Chloris's illness." Every repeated perusal of these gives new delight. The other song, to "Laddie, lie near me," though not equal to these, is very pleasing.

* [This song is altered from an old English one : it preaches a sermon on matrimonial alliances, which all believe and no one obeys ; parents still use undue influence with their children, and, while securing a fleeting splendour, are heedless of entailing a lasting wretchedness.]

* [The idea of the first stanza of this song appears to have been borrowed from the old love verses that follow :—

No. LXXXVI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

How cruel are the Parents !*

Tune—John Anderson, my Jo.

I.

How cruel are the parents
Who riches only prize,
And, to the wealthy booby,
Poor woman sacrifice !
Meanwhile the hapless daughter
Has but a choice of strife ;--
To shun a tyrant father's hate,
Become a wretched wife.

II.

The rav'ning hawk pursuing,
The trembling dove thus flies,
To shun impelling ruin
Awhile her pinion tries ;
Till of escape despairing,
No shelter or retreat,
She trusts the ruthless falconer,
And drops beneath his feet !

Mark yonder Pomp.

Tune Deil tak the Wars.

I.

MARK yonder pomp of costly fashion,
Round the wealthy, titled bride :
But when compar'd with real passion,
Poor is all that princely pride.
What are the showy treasures ?
What are the noisy pleasures ?
The gay gaudy glare of vanity and art :
The polish'd jewel's blaze
May draw the wond'ring gaze,
And courtly grandeur bright
The fancy may delight,
But never, never can come near the heart. †

II.

But, did you see my dearest Chloris
In simplicity's array ;

"Love's a gentle gen'rous passion !
Source of all sublime delight ;
When, with mutual inclination,
Two fond hearts in one unite.

What are titles, pomp, or riches,
If compar'd with true content ?
That false joy which now bewitches,
When too late, we may repent." †]

Lovely as yonder sweet opening flower is,
 Shrinking from the gaze of day?
 O then, the heart alarming,
 And all resistless charming,
 In Love's delightful fetters she chains the willing soul!
 Ambition would disown
 The world's imperial crown,
 Even Avarice would deny
 His worshipp'd deity,
 And feel thro' ev'ry vein Love's raptures roll.

Well! this is not amiss. You see how I answer your orders: your tailor could not be more punctual. I am just now in a high fit for poetizing, provided that the strait-jacket of criticism don't cure me. If you can in a post or two administer a little of the intoxicating potion of your applause, it will raise your humble servant's plrenzy to any height you want. I am at this moment "holding high converse" with the Muses, and have not a word to throw away on such a prosaic dog as you are.

R. B.

No. LXXVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

May, 1795.

TEN thousand thanks for your elegant present; though I am ashamed of the value of it, being bestowed on a man who has not by any means merited such an instance of kindness. I have shewn it to two or three judges of the first abilities here, and they all agree with me in classing it as a first-rate production. My phiz is sae kenspeckle that the very joiner's apprentice whom Mrs. Burns employed to break up the parcel (I was out of town that day) knew it at once. My most grateful compliments to Allan, who has honoured my rustic muse so much with his masterly pencil. One strange coincidence is, that the little one who is making the felonious attempt on the cat's tail, is the most striking likeness of an ill-deddie, d—n'd, wee, rumble-gairie urchin of mine, whom, from that propensity to witty wickedness and manfu' mischief, which, even at twa days auld, I foresaw would form the striking features of his disposition, I named Willie Nicol; after a certain friend of mine who is one of the masters of a grammar school in a city which shall be nameless.

Give the enclosed epigram to my much-valued friend Cunningham, and tell him that on Wednesday I go to visit a friend of his, to whom his friendly partiality in speaking of me in a manner introduced me—I mean a well-known military and literary character, Colonel Dirom.

You do not tell me how you liked my two last songs. Are they condemned?

R. B.

["The picture alluded to was painted from the "Cotter's Saturday Night:" it displays at once the talent and want of taste of the ingenious artist. The scene is a solemn one: but the serenity of the moment is disturbed by what some esteem as a beauty, namely, the attempt to cut the top of the cat's tail, by the little merry urchin, seated on the floor. The unity of the sentiment is destroyed: it jars with the harmony of the rest of the picture as much as a snail does in crawling in the bosom of a new opened rose. This sense of propriety is required in such compositions: Burns was a great master in it: he introduced true love, domestic gladness, and love of country along with devotion in his noble poem of "The Cotter's Saturday Night," but he never dreamed of throwing in any of his ludicrous or humorous touches—all is as much in keeping as in the best conceived picture."—CUNNINGHAM.]

Yet Burns seems to have enjoyed the humorous touch of the Painter exceedingly, and I question whether he, for one moment, thought it out of "keeping."—J. C.

No. LXXVIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

13th May, 1795.

It gives me great pleasure to find that you are all so well satisfied with Mr. Allan's production. The chance resemblance of your little fellow, whose promising disposition appeared so very early, and suggested whom he should be named after, is curious enough. I am acquainted with that person, who is a prodigy of learning and genius, and a pleasant fellow, though no saint.

You really make me blush when you tell me you have not merited the drawing from me. I do not think I can ever repay you, or sufficiently esteem and respect you, for the liberal and kind manner in which you have entered into the spirit of my undertaking, which could not have been perfected without you. So I beg you would not make a fool of me again, by speaking of obligation.

I like your two last songs very much, and am happy to find you are in such a high fit of poetizing. Long may it last! Clarke has made a fine pathetic air to Mallet's superlative ballad of "William and Margaret," and is to give it to me, to be enrolled among the elect.

G. T.

No. LXXIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

JN "Whistle, and I'll come to ye, my lad," the iteration of that line is tiresome to my ear. Here goes what I think is an improvement:—

O whistle, and I'll come to ye, my lad,
 O whistle, and I'll come to ye, my lad;
 Tho' father, and mother, and a' should gae mad,
 Thy Jeanny will venture wi' ye, my lad.

[See LETTER XXXV.]

In fact, a fair dame, at whose shrine I, the Priest of the Nine, offer up the incense of Parnassus; a dame whom the Graces have attired in witchcraft, and whom the Loves have armed with lightning; a fair one, herself the heroine of the song, insists on the amendment, and dispute her commands if you dare!

*This is no my ain Lassie.

Tune—This is no my ain House.

I.

I SEE a form, I see a face,
 Ye weel may wi' the fairest place;
 It wants, to me, the witching grace,
 The kind love that's in her e'e.

O this is no my ain lassie,
 Fair tho' the lassie be;
 O weel ken I my ain lassie,
 Kind love is in her e'e.

II.

She's bonnie, blooming, straight, and tall,
 And lang has had my heart in thrall;
 And aye it charms my very saul,
 The kind love that's in her e'e.

III.

A thief sae pawkie is my Jean,
 To steal a blink, by a' unseen;
 But gleg as light are lovers' een,
 When kind love is in the e'e.

IV.

It may escape the courtly sparks,
 It may escape the learned clerks;
 But weel the watching lover marks
 The kind love that's in her e'e.

O this is no my ain lassie,
 Fair tho' the lassie be;
 O weel ken I my ain lassie,
 Kind love is in her e'e.†

Do you know that you have roused the torpidity of Clarke at last? He has requested me to write three or four songs for him, which he is to set to music himself. The enclosed sheet contains two songs for him, which please to present to my valued friend, Cunningham.

I enclose the sheet open, both for your inspection, and that you may copy the song "O bonnie was yon rosy brier." I do not know whether I am right; but that song pleases me, and, as it is extremely probable that Clarke's newly-roused celestial spark will be soon smothered in the fogs of indolence, if you like the song, it may go as Scottish verses to the air of "I wish my love was in a mire;" and poor Erskine's English lines may follow.

I enclose you, a "For a' that and a' that," which was never in print: it is a much superior song to mine. I have been told that it was composed by a lady.—

R. B.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Now Spring has clad the Grove in green.

A SCOTTISH SONG.

I.

Now spring has clad the grove in green,
 And strew'd the lea wi' flowers:
 The furrow'd, waving corn is seen
 Rejoice in fostering showers;
 While ilka thing in nature join
 Their sorrows to forego,
 O why thus all alone are mine
 The weary steps of woe?

II.

The trout within yon wimpling burn
 Glides swift, a silver dart,
 And safe beneath the shady thorn
 Defies the angler's art:
 My life was ance that careless stream,
 That wanton trout was I;
 But love, wi' unrelenting beam,
 Has scorch'd my fountains dry.

III.

The little flow'ret's peaceful lot,
 In yonder cliff that grows,
 Which, save the linnet's flight, I wot,
 Nae ruder visit knows,
 Was mine; till love has o'er me past,
 And blighted a' my bloom,

* [There is an old song to this tune in Ramsay's Miscellany, beginning:—

"This is no mine ain house,
 I ken by the rigging o't;
 Since with my love I've changed vows,
 I dinna like the bigging o't."]

† [This is one of the happiest of the Poet's productions. He was acquainted with all the mysteries of love-making, and familiar with all the romance of trystings in lonely places, and meetings at forbidden hours, when age and circumspection were asleep. What can be finer or truer than these lines:—

"A thief sae pawkie is my Jean,
 To steal a blink by a' unseen,
 But gleg as light are lovers' e'en,
 When kind love is in the e'e."]

And now beneath the with'ring blast
My youth and joy consume.

IV.

The waken'd lay'rock warbling springs,
And climbs the early sky,
Winnowing blithe her dewy wings
In morning's rosy eye;
As little reekt I sorrow's power,
Until the flow'ry snare
O' witching love, in luckless hour,
Made me the thrall o' care.

V.

O had my fate been Greenland snows,
Or Afric's burning zone,
Wi' man and nature leagu'd my foes,
So Peggy ne'er I'd known!
The wretch whase doom is, "hope nae mair,"
What tongue his woes can tell!
Within whase bosom, save despair,
Nae kinder spirits dwell.*

☉ Bonny was yon Rosy Brier.

I.

O BONNY was yon rosy brier,
That blooms sae far frae haunt o' man;
And bonnie she, and ah, how dear!
It shaded frae the e'min sun.

II.

Yon rosebuds in the morning dew,
How pure amang the leaves sae green;
But purer was the lover's vow
They witness'd in their shade yestreen.

III.

All in its rude and prickly bower,
That crimson rose, how sweet and fair!
But love is far a sweeter flower
Amid life's thorny path o' care.

IV.

The pathless wild, and wimpling burn,
Wi' Chloris in my arms, be mine;
And I the world, nor wish, nor scorn,
Its joys and griefs alike resign.

Written on the blank leaf of a copy of the last edition of my poems, presented to the lady whom, in so many fictitious reveries of passion, but with the most ardent sentiments of real friendship, I have so often sung under the name of Chloris:—

* [This song has some beautiful imagery; he prescribed it as a sort of poetic medicine for the heart of his friend Alexander Cunningham, which had suffered from the bright eyes and scornful tongue of an Edinburgh dame. * is no easy

To Chloris.

'Tis Friendship's pledge, my young, fair friend,
Nor thou the gift refuse,
Nor with unwilling ear attend
The moralizing muse.

Since thou, in all thy youth and charms,
Must bid the world adieu,
(A world 'gainst peace in constant arms,)
To join the friendly few.

Since thy gay morn of life o'ercast,
Chill came the tempest's lour;
(And ne'er misfortune's eastern blast
Did nip a fairer flower.)

Since life's gay scenes must charm no more,
Still much is left behind;
Still nobler wealth hast thou in store—
The comforts of the mind!

Thine is the self-approving glow
On conscious honour's part;
And—dearest gift of heaven below—
Thine friendship's truest heart.

The joys refin'd of sense and taste,
With every Muse to rove:
And doubly were the poet blest
These joys could he improve.

Une bagatelle de l'amitie.—COLLA.

No. LXXX.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

Edinburgh, 3rd August, 1795.

MY DEAR SIR:

THIS will be delivered to you by a Dr. Brianton, who has read your works, and pants for the honour of your acquaintance. I do not know the gentleman; but his friend, who applied to me for this introduction, being an excellent young man, I have no doubt he is worthy of all acceptance.

My eyes have just been gladdened, and my mind feasted, with your last packet—full of pleasant things indeed. What an imagination is yours! it is superfluous to tell you that I am delighted with all the three songs, as well as with your elegant and tender verses to Chloris.

I am sorry you should be induced to alter "O whistle and I'll come to ye, my lad," to the prosaic line, "Thy Jeanie will venture wi' ye, my lad." I must be permitted to say that I do not think the latter either reads or sings so matter for a poet to load himself with another man's woes, and sing them with a natural and deep emotion.—For some interesting particulars respecting this lady, see note at the end of this Correspondence, page 517.

well as the former. I wish, therefore, you would, in my name, petition the charming Jeanie, whoever she be, to let the line remain unaltered.

I should be happy to see Mr. Clarke produce a few airs to be joined to your verses.—Every body regrets his writing so very little, as every body acknowledges his ability to write well. Pray was the resolution formed coolly before dinner, or was it a midnight vow, made over a bowl of punch with the bard?

I shall not fail to give Mr. Cunningham what you have sent him.

P. S.—The lady's "For a' that, and a' that," is sensible enough, but no more to be compared to yours than I to Hercules.

G. T.

[Currie says that he has heard the heroine of "Whistle and I'll come to ye, my lad," sing it in the very spirit of arch simplicity that it required, and the line,

"Thy Jeanie will venture wi' ye, my lad," came gracefully from her lips. He therefore thinks Mr. Thomson's petition unreasonable. "There is no doubt that Currie alludes to Mrs. Riddel; but the heroine was one of a lower degree than her of Woodlee-Park, nor had she any talent for verse nor perhaps taste in poetry. But she was aware of the light which the genius of Burns shed on all to whom he was partial: and, moreover, it gave her a sort of distinction or pre-eminence among the rustic damsels of the vale."—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXXXI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

*Forlorn my Love, no Comfort near.

Tune—Let me in this ae Night.

I.

FORLORN, my love, no comfort near,
Far, far from thee, I wander here;

Far, far from thee, the fate severe
At which I most repine, love.

O wert thou, love, but near me;
But near, near, near me;
How kindly thou wouldst cheer me,
And mingle sighs with mine, love!

II.

Around me scowls a wintry sky,
That blasts each bud of hope and joy;
And shelter, shade, nor home have I,
Save in those arms of thine, love.

III.

Cold, alter'd friendship's cruel part,
To poison fortune's ruthless dart—
Let me not break thy faithful heart,
And say that fate is mine, love.

IV.

But dreary tho' the moments fleet,
O let me think we yet shall meet!
That only ray of solace sweet
Can on thy Chloris shine, love.

O wert thou, love, but near me;
But near, near, near me;
How kindly thou wouldst cheer me,
And mingle sighs with mine, love.

How do you like the foregoing? I have written it within this hour: so much for the speed of my Pegasus; but what say you to his bottom?

R. B.

No. LXXXII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Last May a braw Wooer.

Tune—The Lothian Lassie.

I.

LAST May a braw wooer cam down the lang glen,
And sair wi' his love he did deave me;
I said there was naething I hated like men,
The deuce gae wi'm, to believe, believe me,
The deuce gae wi'm, to believe me!

* ["The complaint of a lover of the coldness or the absence of his mistress is a favourite theme with lyric poets. But the bards of the olden and the bards of these our latter times sung with a difference. Modern minstrels keep a poor lover enduring the rain or the snow of a stormy night, while his inexorable mistress looks out at her window as cold as the northern star, and reproaches him with evil intentions and reprehensible thoughts. The elder minstrels did not make their ladies of icicles; a little maidenly bashfulness was exhibited, but at last pity influenced the dame; the doors were opened softly; green rushes were strewed on the floor and stair, to hinder the lover's steps to be heard; and he was conducted—past, perhaps, a mother's bed-side—or, more perilous still, a maiden aunt's—to a secret chamber, into which we shall not attempt to force our way. An old song, to the same air to which this song is written, gives a rude picture of such interviews:—

'O I'll come stealing saftly in,
And cannillie make little din;
To keep me here wad be a sin,
Amang the wintry rain, jo.

Cast off the shoon frae aff yere feet,
Cast back the door unto the weat;
Syn'e to my chamber craftily creep,
But ne'er come back again, jo.

O in he crept so cannillie,
O in he staw sae priville;
Nane save my sel' could hear or see—
Then he was a' my ain, jo.'

We cannot follow the old poet farther."—CUNNINGHAM.]

II.

He spak o' the darts in my bonnie black een,
And vow'd for my love he was dying;
I said he might die when he liked, for Jean,
The Lord forgie me for lying, for lying,
The Lord forgie me for lying!

III.

A weel-stocked mailen—himself for the laird—
And marriage aff-hand, were his proffers:
I never loot on that I kenn'd it, or car'd,
But thought I might hae waur offers, waur
But thought I might hae waur offers. [offers,

IV.

But what wad ye think? in a fortnight or less—
The deil tak his taste to gae near her!
He up the lang loan to my black cousin Bess,*
Guess ye how, the jad! I could bear her,
could bear her,
Guess ye how, the jad! I could bear her.

V.

But a' the niest week as I fretted wi' care,
I gaed to the tryste o' Dalgarnock,

* [In the original copy of this song sent to Thomson, this line runs thus:—

“He up the Gateslack to my black cousin Bess.”

To Gateslack, as well as to Dalgarnock in the next verse, Thomson objected; they were not sufficiently soft and suitable for the voice. To which Burns replied, “Gateslack is the name of a particular place—a kind of passage up among the Lowther hills on the confines of this country. Dalgarnock is also the name of a romantic spot near the Nith, where are still a ruined church and a burial ground. However, let the first line run

‘He up the lang loan to my black cousin Bess.’”

“It is always a pity,” says Currie, “to throw out anything that gives locality to our Poet’s verses.” In this case, to have expelled Dalgarnock would have been an injury. It is the very place where Old Mortality is represented by Scott repairing cherubs’ heads and defaced inscriptions on the grave-stones of the Cameronian worthies. It is one of the loveliest spots too on Nithside. The kirk and kirk-yard belonged to the old parish of Dalgarnock when it was incorporated with Closeburn; the affections of the people linger about the spot where their fathers’ ashes lie, and it is still used as place of interment.]

† The reader will observe the nature of the alterations which Burns thought this song required, by comparing the first version communicated to the Museum, with that sent to Thomson:—

Air.—The Lothian Lassie.

Ae day a braw wooer came down the lang glen,
And sair wi' his love he did deave me;
But I said there was naething I hated like men,
The deuce gae wi' him to believe me, believe me,
The deuce gae wi' him to believe me.

A weel stocket mailen, himself o't the laird,
An' bridal aff hand was the proffer;
I never loot on that I kenn'd or I car'd,
But I thought I might get a waur offer, waur offer,
But I thought I might get a waur offer,

He spake o' the darts o' my bonnie black een,
And O for my love he was dien';
But I said he might die when he likit for Jean,
The Gude forgie' me for lien', for lien',
The Gude forgie' me for lien'.

And wha but my fine fickle lover was there!
I glowr'd as I'd seen a warlock, a warlock,
I glowr'd as I'd seen a warlock.

VI.

But owre my left shouther I gae him a blink,
Lest neebors might say I was saucy;
My wooer he caper'd as he'd been in drink,
And vow'd I was his dear lassie, dear lassie,
And vow'd I was his dear lassie.

VII.

I spier'd for my cousin fu' couthy and sweet,
Gin she had recover'd her hearin',
And how her new shoon fit her auld shachl't feet,
But, heavens! how he fell a swearin', a
swearin',
But, heavens! how he fell a swearin'!

VIII.

He begged, for Gudesake, I wad be his wife,
Or else I wad kill him wi' sorrow;
Sae, e'en to preserve the poor body his life,
I think I maun wed him to-morrow, to-morrow,
I think I maun wed him to-morrow.†

But what do ye think! in a fortnight or less—
The deil's in his taste to gae near her!
He's down to the castle to black cousin Bess,
Think how, the jade! I could endure her, endure her,
Think how, the jade! I could endure her.

An' a' the niest week, as I fretted wi' care,
I gade to the tryste o' Dalgarnock,
And wha but my braw fickle wooer was there,
Wha glowr'd as if he'd seen a warlock, a warlock,
Wha glowr'd as if he'd seen a warlock.

But owre my left shouther I gied him a blink,
Lest neighbours should think I was saucy;
My wooer he caper'd as he'd been in drink,
And vow'd that I was a dear lassie, dear lassie,
And vow'd that I was a dear lassie.

I spier'd for my cousin fou couthy an' sweet,
An' if she'd recover'd her hearin',
An' how my auld shoon suited her shauchled feet,
Gude safe us! how he fell a swearin', a swearin',
Gude safe us! how he fell a swearin'!

He begged me for Gudesake that I'd be his wife,
Or else I wad kill him wi' sorrow;
And, just to preserve the poor body in life,
I think I will wed him to-morrow, to-morrow,
I think I will wed him to-morrow.

[“This is, in some respects, a better version of the song than the copy sent to Thomson. The third line in the seventh verse of the latter is altogether wrong, and cannot surely be as Burns wrote it. It is nonsense to ask

‘And how her new shoon fit her auld shachl't feet?’

The satiric allusion is preserved in Johnson’s version:—

‘And how my auld shoon suited her shauchled feet.’

‘Auld shoon,’ in the language of rustic wooing, represent a discarded lover. Thus, in the old song,—

‘Ye may tell the coof that gets her
That he gets but my auld shoon.’

It was this—and well it might—which made the wooer fall ‘a swearin’;’—the transposition too of the verses lets us a little into the character of the lady; she puts that sarcastic question after bestowing the blink ‘owre her left shouther.’—she was desirous of showing her lover that the conquest was not quite achieved.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

Fragment.—Chloris.

Tune—Caledonian Hunt's Delight.

I.

WHY, why tell thy lover,
Bliss he never must enjoy?
Why, why undeceive him,
And give all his hopes the lie?

II.

O why, while fancy, raptur'd, slumbers,
Chloris, Chloris all the theme,
Why, why wouldst thou, cruel,
Wake thy lover from his dream?

Such is the peculiarity of the rhythm of this air that I find it impossible to make another stanza to suit it.

I am at present quite occupied with the charming sensations of the tooth-ache, so have not a word to spare.

R. B.

No. LXXXIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

3rd June, 1795.

MY DEAR SIR:

YOUR English verses to "Let me in this ae night," are tender and beautiful; and your ballad to the "Lothian Lassie" is a masterpiece for its humour and naïveté. The fragment of the "Caledonian Hunt" is quite suited to the original measure of the air, and, as it plagues you so, the fragment must content it. I would rather, as I said before, have had Bacchanalian words, had it so pleased the Poet; but, nevertheless, for what we have received, Lord, make us thankful!

G. T.

[It was not without reason that Thomson wrote in this gentle and conciliatory strain: the Poet was suffering from ill health and depressed fortune, and that slow consuming illness which arrested him in his bright career was more than beginning to manifest itself.]

* ["Burns had made a pause in his correspondence from June, 1795, to February, 1796; and Thomson, feeling alarm, as much for the Poet's sake as for the 'dozen of Scotch and Irish airs' which he wished 'wedded to immortal verse,' wrote to make inquiries. Something in the tone of the letter, and the circumstance of pressing a sick man to write songs, seem to indicate that Thomson did not imagine that Burns was in a dangerous state. Nor is this surprising:—he was wildly gay or gloomily downcast by fits and starts: Professor Walker, who had an interview with him in the latter end of the

No. LXXXIV.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

5th Feb. 1796.

O Robby Burns, are ye sleeping yet?
Or are ye wauking, I would wit?

THE pause you have made, my dear Sir, is awful! Am I never to hear from you again? I know and I lament how much you have been afflicted of late, but I trust that returning health and spirits will now enable you to resume the pen, and delight us with your musings. I have still about a dozen Scotch and Irish airs that I wish "married to immortal verse." We have several true-born Irishmen on the Scottish list; but they are now naturalized and reckoned our own good subjects: indeed, we have none better. I believe I before told you that I had been much urged by some friends to publish a collection of all our favourite airs and songs in octavo, embellished with a number of etchings by our ingenious friend Allan: what is your opinion of this?*

G. T.

No. LXXXV.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

February 17, 1796.

MANY thanks, my dear Sir, for your handsome, elegant present to Mrs. Burns, and for my remaining volume of Peter Pindar.—Peter is a delightful fellow, and a first favourite of mine. I am much pleased with your idea of publishing a collection of our songs in octavo, with etchings. I am extremely willing to lend every assistance in my power. The Irish airs I shall cheerfully undertake the task of finding verses for.

I have, already, you know, equip three with words, and the other day I strung up a kind of rhapsody to another Hibernian melody, which I admire much:—

Wep for a Lass wi' a Tocher.

Tune—Balinamona Ora.

I.

AWA wi' your witchcraft o' beauty's alarms,
The slender bit beauty you grasp in your arms:

year, failed to perceive in his fierce tone of conversation, and the almost convulsive resolution to atide by the wine, the presence of that twofold sickness of mind and body which was soon to carry him to the grave. He was, nevertheless, to use the words of a Scottish song,

'Fading in his place;'

and his wearing away was observed by all who took any interest in his fortunes."—CUNNINGHAM.]

O, gie me the lass that has acres o' charms,
O, gie me the lass wi' the weel-stockit farms.

Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher,
Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher;
Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher,
The nice yellow guineas for me.

II.

Your beauty's a flower, in the morning that blows,
And withers the faster, the faster it grows;
But the rapturous charm o' the bonnie green
knowes, [yowes.
Ilk spring they're new deckit wi' bonnie white

III.

And e'en when this beauty your bosom has blest,
The brightest o' beauty may cloy, when possesit;
But the sweet yellow darlings wi' Geordie im-
prest,
The langer ye hae them—the mair they're carest.

Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher,
Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher;
Then hey for a lass wi' a tocher,
The nice yellow guineas for me.

If this will do, you have now four of my Irish engagement. In my by-past songs, I dislike one thing; the name Chloris—I meant it as the fictitious name of a certain lady; but, on second thoughts, it is a high incongruity to have a Greek appellation to a Scottish pastoral ballad. Of this, and some things else, in my next: I have more amendments to propose.—What you once mentioned of “flaxen locks” is just: they cannot enter into an elegant description of beauty.—Of this also again—God bless you!*

R. B.

No. LXXXVI.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

YOUR “Hey for a lass wi' a tocher,” is a most excellent song, and with you the subject is

* [“Burns, it is believed, not only determined to remove Chloris with the flaxen tresses, and Anna with the golden locks, from his songs, but to eschew their allurements and avoid their company. He began, when it was too late, to perceive that, in erring against domestic ties and forsaking his household gods, he was sinning not only against his own fame, but furnishing his heart with matter for future repentance and remorse. In the complete revision which he desired to give his songs, he had no wish to abate the humour or lessen even the occasional levities of expression in which he indulged. His aim appears to have been to change foreign names for native ones, and rely upon the Jeanes, the Marvys, the Phemics, the Ediths, and the Berthas of his own isle for exercising influence over the hearts of men. Whatever his resolutions were respecting his songs or himself, he lived not to fulfil them.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [“Like the Boar's Head in Eastcheap, and the Mermoid in Friday-street London, immortalized as these have been by something new indeed. It is the first time I have seen you debasing the god of soft desire into an amateur of acres and guineas.

I am happy to find you approve of my proposed octavo edition. Allan has designed and etched about twenty plates, and I am to have my choice of them for that work. Independently of the Hogarthian humour with which they abound, they exhibit the character and costume of the Scottish peasantry with inimitable felicity. In this respect, he himself says, they will far exceed the aquatinta plates he did for the Gentle Shepherd, because in the etching he sees clearly what he is doing, but not so with the aquatinta, which he could not manage to his mind.

The Dutch boors of Ostade are scarcely more characteristic and natural than the Scottish figures in those etchings.

G. T.

No. LXXXVII.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

April, 1796.

ALAS! my dear Thomson, I fear it will be some time ere I tune my lyre again! “By Babel streams I have sat and wept,” almost ever since I wrote you last: I have only known existence by the pressure of the heavy hand of sickness; and have counted time by the repercussions of pain! Rheumatism, cold, and fever, have formed to me a terrible combination. I close my eyes in misery, and open them without hope. I look on the vernal day, and sav with poor Fergusson—

“Say, wherefore has an all-indulgent Heaven
Light to the comfortless and wretched given?”

This will be delivered to you by a Mrs. Hyslop, landlady of the Globe Tavern here, which for these many years has been my howff, and where our friend Clarke and I have had many a merry squeeze.† I am highly delighted with the genius and wit of Shakspeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, and Ben Jonson, and many other of the prime spirits of their age, so the Globe Tavern in Dumfries, the favourite haunt of our Poet, while resident in that town, appears to be destined to a similar acceptance in the eyes of posterity.

“The ‘howff’ of which Burns speaks was a small, comfortable tavern, situated in the mouth of the Globe close, and it held at that time the rank as third among the houses of public accommodation in Dumfries. The excellence of the drink and the attentions of the proprietor were not, however, all its attractions. ‘Anna with the golden locks’ was one of the ministering damsels of the establishment; customers loved to be served by one who was not only cheerful, but whose charms were celebrated by the Bard of Kyle. On one of the last visits paid by the Poet, the wine of the ‘howff’ was more than commonly strong—or, served by Anna, it went more glibly over than usual; and when he rose to be gone, he found he could do no more than keep his balance. The

Mr. Allan's etchings. "Woo'd and married an' a'," is admirable; The grouping is beyond all praise. The expression of the figures, conformable to the story in the ballad, is absolutely faultless perfection. I next admire, "Turnim-spike." What I like least is, "Jenny said to Jocky." Besides the female being in her appearance * * * * * if you take her stooping into the account, she is at least two inches taller than her lover. Poor Cleghorn! I sincerely sympathize with him! Happy I am to think that he yet has a well-grounded hope of health and enjoyment in this world. As for me—but that is a sad subject!

R. B.

No. LXXXVIII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

4th May, 1796.

I NEED not tell you, my good Sir, what concern the receipt of your last gave me, and how much I sympathise in your sufferings. But do not, I beseech you, give yourself up to despondency, nor speak the language of despair. The vigour of your constitution, I trust, will soon set you on your feet again; and then, it is to be hoped, you will see the wisdom and the necessity of taking due care of a life so valuable to your family, to your friends, and to the world.

Trusting that your next will bring agreeable accounts of your convalescence and returning good spirits, I remain, with sincere regard, yours.

G. T.

P. S.—Mrs. Hyslop, I doubt not, delivered the gold seal to you in good condition.

[On this gold seal the Poet caused his coat of arms to be engraven, viz., a small bush; a bird singing; the legend "wood-notes wild," with the motto "better hae a wee bush than nae bield." This precious relic is now in the proper keeping of the Poet's brother-in-law, Robert Armour, of Old 'Change, London.]

No. LXXXIX.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

MY DEAR SIR,

ONCE mentioned to you an air which I have long admired, "Here's a health to them that's awa, hiney," but I forget if you took any notice of it. I have just been trying to suit it with verses; and I beg leave to recommend the air to your attention once more. I have only begun it:—

Jessy.

Tune—Here's a Health to them that's awa.

I.

HERE's a health to ane I lo'e dear!
Here's a health to ane I lo'e dear! [meet,
Thou art sweet as the smile when fond lovers
And soft as their parting tear—Jessy!

II.

Altho' thou maun never be mine,
Altho' even hope is denied;
'Tis sweeter for thee despairing
Than aught in the world beside—Jessy!

III.

I mourn through the gay, gaudy day,
As, hopeless, I muse on thy charms;
But welcome the dream o' sweet slumber,
For then I am lock't in thy arms—Jessy!

IV.

I guess by the dear angel smile,
I guess by the love-rolling e'e;
But why urge the tender confession,
'Gainst fortune's fell cruel decree!—Jessy!

Here's a health to ane I lo'e dear!
Here's a health to ane I lo'e dear! [meet,
Thou art sweet as the smile when fond lovers
And soft as their parting tear—Jessy!

["In the letter to Thomson," says Currie, "the first three stanzas only are given, and it was supposed that the Poet had gone no farther; among his manuscripts, however, the fourth stanza was found, which completes this exquisite song, the last finished offspring of his muse." The heroine is Jessie Lewars, now Mrs. Thomson of Dumfries: her tender attentions soothed the last days of the departing Poet; and, if immortality in song can be considered a recompense, she has been rewarded.—

the lovers and collectors of literary rarities. John Speirs, Esq., of Elderslie, has in his possession one of these panes of glass, upon which is written in Burns' autograph, the following verse of 'Sae flaxen were her ringlets,' given in Letter LVII. of this Correspondence:—

Here are the willing chains o' love,
By conquering Beauty's sovereign king;
But still my Chloris' dearest charm,
She says she lo'es me best of a'!]

night was frosty and the hour late; the Poet sat down on the steps of a door between the tavern and his own house, fell asleep, and did not awaken till he was almost dead with cold. To this exposure his illness has been imputed; and no doubt it contributed, with disappointed hope and insulted pride, to bring him to an early grave."—CUNNINGHAM.

On the panes of glass in the Globe, Burns was frequently in the habit of writing many of his witty jeux d'esprit, as well as fragmentary portions of his most celebrated songs. We fear these precious relics have now been wholly abstracted by

No. XC.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

THIS will be delivered by a Mr. Lewars, a young fellow of uncommon merit. As he will be a day or two in town, you will have leisure, if you chuse, to write me by him; and if you have a spare half hour to spend with him, I shall place your kindness to my account. I have no copies of the songs I have sent you,—and I have taken a fancy to review them all, and possibly may mend some of them; so, when you have complete leisure, I will thank you for either the originals or copies.* I had rather be the author of five well-written songs than of ten otherwise. I have great hopes that the genial influence of the approaching summer will set me to rights, but as yet I cannot boast of returning health. I have now reason to believe that my complaint is a flying gout: a sad business!

Do let me know how Cleghorn is, and remember me to him.

This should have been delivered to you a month ago. I am still very poorly, but should like much to hear from you.

No. XCI.

BURNS TO G. THOMSON.

Brow, on the Solway-frith, 12th July, 1796.

AFTER all my boasted independence, curst necessity compels me to implore you for five pounds. A cruel wretch of a haberdasher, to whom I owe an account, taking it into his head that I am dying, has commenced a process, and will infallibly put me into jail. Do, for God's sake, send me that sum, and that by return of post. Forgive me this earnestness, but the horrors of a jail have made me half-distracted. I do not ask all this gratuitously; for, upon returning health, I hereby promise, and engage to furnish you with five pounds' worth of the neatest song-genius you have seen. I tried my hand on "Rotheimurche," this morning. The measure is so difficult that it is impossible to infuse much genius into the lines; they are on the other side. Forgive, forgive me!

Fairest Maid on Devon banks.

Tune—Rotheimurche.

I.

Fairest maid on Devon banks,
Crystal Devon, winding Devon,
Wilt thou lay that frown aside,

And smile as thou wert wont to do?
Full well thou know'st I love thee dear!
Could'st thou to malice lend an ear?

O! did not love exclaim "Forbear,
Nor use a faithful lover so."

II.

Then come, thou fairest of the fair,
Those wonted smiles, O let me share;
And by thy beauteous self I swear
No love but thine my heart shall know.
Fairest maid on Devon banks,
Crystal Devon, winding Devon,
Wilt thou lay that frown aside,
And smile as thou wert wont to do?

["These verses," says Currie, "and the letter enclosing them, are written in a character that marks the feeble state of Burns's bodily strength. Mr. Syme is of opinion that he could not have been in any danger of a jail at Dumfries, where certainly he had many firm friends, nor under any such necessity of imploring aid from Edinburgh. But about this time (nine days before his death), his reason began at times to be unsettled, and the horrors of a jail perpetually haunted his imagination. He died on the 21st of this month."]

"I have in the Life of the Poet asserted that he was in great poverty before he died, and that sometimes, in the course of the spring of 1796, his family were all but wanting bread. Those who say he had good friends around him seem not to know that he had a soul too proud to solicit help, and to forget that there are hearts in the world ready to burst before they beg. The five pounds for which he solicited Thomson were to meet the demands of David Williamson, to whom he owed the price of the cloth of his volunteer regimentals—the money should have been paid in April: and the ten pounds which he requested, and by return of post obtained, from his cousin, James Burness, grandfather of Lieutenant Burness the Eastern Traveller, was for his wife, then about to be confined in child-bed. It is not known that he applied to any one else, and he would not have applied to either his cousin or to Thomson, had he not been sorely pressed: the fact of his being in want was known to all his neighbours, and admitted by himself.

"In this song—the last he was to measure in this world—his thoughts wandered to Charlotte Hamilton, and the banks of the Devon."—
ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

No. XCII.

G. THOMSON TO BURNS.

14th July, 1796.

MY DEAR SIR:

EVER since I received your melancholy letters by Mrs. Hyslop, I have been ruminating in what manner I could endeavour to alleviate your sufferings. Again and again I thought of a pecuniary offer, but the recollection of one of your letters on this subject, and the fear of offending your independent spirit, checked my resolution. I thank you heartily, therefore, for the frankness of your letter of the 12th, and, with great pleasure, inclose a draft for the very sum I proposed sending.* Would I were Chancellor of the Exchequer but for one day, for your sake!

* [It is almost unnecessary to say that this revival Burns did not live to perform.]

Pray, my good Sir, is it not possible for you to muster a volume of poetry? If too much trouble to you, in the present state of your health, some literary friend might be found here, who would select and arrange from your manuscripts, and take upon him the task of editor. In the mean time it could be advertised to be published by subscription. Do not shun this mode of obtaining the value of your labour: remember Pope published the Iliad by subscription. Think of this, my dear Burns, and do not reckon me intrusive with my advice. You are too well convinced of the respect and friendship I bear you, to impute any thing I say to an unworthy motive. Yours, faithfully,

G. T.

The verses to "Rothemurche," will answer finely. I am happy to see you can still tune your lyre.

["The pecuniary circumstances attending Mr. Thomson's connection with Burns appear liable, at the present day, to much misapprehension. This gentleman, whose work has ultimately met with a good sale, seems to be regarded by some as an enriched man who measured a stinted reward to a poor one, looking for a greater recompense; and several writers have on this ground spoken of him in a very ungracious manner. When we go back to the time of the correspondence between the two men, and consider their respective circumstances, and the relation in which they came to stand towards each other, the conduct of Mr. Thomson assumes quite a different aspect. He and Burns were enthusiasts, the one in music, the other in poetry; they were both of them servants of the government, on limited salaries, with rising families. Mr. Thomson, with little prospect of profit, engaged in the preparation of a work, which was designed to set forth the music of his native land to every possible advantage, and of which the paper and print alone were likely to exhaust his very moderate resources. For literary aid, in this labour of love, he applied to the great Scottish Poet, who had already gratuitously assisted Johnson in his Scottish Musical Museum. Mr. Thomson offered reasonable remuneration; but the Poet scorned the idea of recompense, and declared he would write only because it gave him pleasure. Nevertheless, Mr. Thomson, in the course of their correspondence, ventured to send a pecuniary present, which, although not forming an adequate recompense for Burns's services, was still one which such men might be apt, at that period, to offer and accept from each other. This Burns, with hesitation, accepted; but sternly forbade any further remittance, protesting that it would put a period to their correspondence. Yet Mr. Thomson, from time to time, expressed his sense of obligation by presents of a different nature, and these the Poet accepted. Burns ultimately, on an emergency, requested a renewal of the former remittance, using such terms on the occasion as showed that his former scorn of all pecuniary remuneration was still a predominant feeling in his mind. Mr. Thomson, therefore, sent the very sum asked, believing, if he presumed to send more, that he would run a greater risk of offending than of gratifying the Poet in the then irritable state of his feelings. In all this we humbly conceive that no unprejudiced person at the time would have seen grounds for any charge against Mr. Thomson.

"It may further be remarked that, at the time of the Poet's death, though many songs had been written, only six had been published, namely, those in the first half volume, so that, during the life of the Poet, the publisher had realised nothing by the songs, and must have still been greatly doubtful if he should ever recover what he had already expended on the work. Before many more of the songs had appeared in connection with his music, the friends of the Poet's family had resolved to collect his works for publication; upon which Mr. Thomson thought it a duty incumbent on him to give up the manuscripts of the whole of the songs, together with the Poet's and his own letters, to Dr. Currie, that they might form part of the edition of Burns's works. The full benefit of them, as literary compositions, was thus realised for the Poet's family, Mr. Thomson only retaining an exclusive right to publish them afterwards in connection with the music. And hence, after all, the debtor side of his account with Burns is not so great as it is apt to appear. No further debate could arise on this subject, if it were to be regarded in the light in which the parties chiefly interested have regarded it. We see that Burns himself manifests no trace of a suspicion that his correspondent was a selfish or niggardly man; and it is equally certain that his surviving family always looked on that gentleman as one of the Poet's and their own kindest friends.

* ["The dying Poet wrote entreatingly for five pounds, and Thomson sent the exact sum which he requested, from inability to send more; or, as he avers, from a dread of giving offence to the sensitive mind of Burns. It would have been as well had the sum been larger; but one cannot well see how Thomson deserves censure for doing that, and no more, which his correspondent requested him to do. Professor Walker, a man little inclined to irony, says that, on this subject, the delicate mind of Mr. Thomson is at peace with itself."—CUNNINGHAM.]

“It is a curious fact, not hitherto known to the public, nor even to Mr. Thomson himself, that the five pounds sent by him to Burns, as well as the larger sum which the Poet borrowed about the same time from his cousin, Mr. Burness of Montrose, were not made use of on the occasion, but that the bank orders for both sums remained in Burns’s house at the time of his death. This is proved by the following document, for which we are indebted to Mr. Alexander Macdonald, of the General Register House, Edinburgh:—

“The testament dative, and inventory of the debts and sums of money which were justly owing to the late Robert Burns, officer of excise in Dumfries, at the time of his decease, viz., the 21st day of July last, faithfully made out and given up by Jean Armour, widow of the said defunct, and executrix qua relicta decerned to him by decret dative of the Commissary of Dumfries, dated 16th September last.

“There was justly owing to the said defunct, at the time of his decease aforesaid, the principal sum of five pounds sterling, contained in a promissory note, dated the 14th July last, granted by Sir William Forbes and Co., bankers in Edinburgh, to George Thomson, payable on demand; which note is by the said George Thomson indorsed, payable to the defunct: Item, the principal sum of ten pounds sterling, contained in a draft dated the 15th July last, drawn by Robert Christie upon the manager for the British Linen Co. in Edinburgh, in favour of James Burness or order; which draft is by the said James Burness indorsed payable to the defunct.

Sum of the debts owing to the defunct, £15 sterling.

“Thomas Goldie of Craigmuir, commissary of the commissariat of Dumfries specially constituted for confirmation of testaments within the bounds of the said commissariat—understanding that, after due summoning and lawful warning, made by public form of edict of the executors, testamentary spouse, bairns, if any were, and intromitters with the goods and gear of the said Robert Burns, and all others having or pretending to have interest in the matter underwritten, &c. &c., I decerned therein, &c., and in His Majesty’s name, constitute, ordain, and confirm the said Jean Armour, executrix qua relicta to the said defunct, and in and to the debt and sums of money above written.—At Dumfries, 6th Oct. 1796.”—CHAMBERS.]

[“Mr. Thomson has been very much abused about this transaction, and, I confess, I do not know well what to say about it; but it must ever be regretted that George Thomson did not contrive to send him more at this dismal period than just the bare five pounds, when he could not but perceive the gloomy and altered state of the Poet’s mind. After Burns’ letter of July, 1793, I exculpate Mr. Thomson from making any attempts at remuneration, previous to the receiving this letter from Brow. . But, all things considered, I wish to God he had sent him at least ten or twenty pounds, for his own honour, and that of the literary and musical character. I am quite aware that Mr. Thomson, at that period, could not have made any money from Burns’ songs, but that, on the contrary, he must have been much money out of pocket, considering the efficient and costly way he took of bringing out the work. But then the songs were his, and poor Burns had toiled for him, while at the same time the speculation was certain and sure. Upon the whole, I cannot account for Mr. Thomson’s parsimony here; for I know him well, and he is any thing but a close-fisted niggardly gentleman. In fact, he is quite the reverse, a kind open-hearted fellow, who entertains literary and musical people most liberally, as many of my acquaintance can witness. I have written a good many songs for him myself, and it was not for want of remuneration that I did not write far more; but then he is the most troublesome devil to write songs for that ever was created, for he is always either bothering one with alterations, or else popping them in himself. But, as to niggardliness in remuneration, I can bear testimony that he rather errs on the other side; and, as an instance, I was once out of pure shame obliged to return him a violin, which I was told was valued at £35, on pretence that I had a better one, and could not be plagued with another. Both Mrs. Hogg and I had previously got presents of sterling value. George Thomson is a pragmatical but real good man. What was done cannot be recalled; but it has been compensated since by every kindness in his power to bestow.”

—HOGG.]

[“Thus terminated the correspondence of Burns with Thomson, in a manner as melancholy as it commenced joyously,—it ended in the death of one who was, and, we believe, ever will be, considered the first lyrist of his native land. On the willows of the winding Devon, the dying Bard suspended the harp of Coila, and long we fear is it destined to remain mute; for what master-hand can again touch its strings with such exquisite simplicity, skill, pathos, passion, and truth?

“In closing this portion of Burns’ works, we can scarcely trust ourself to the expression of our own individual feelings. Men differently constituted feel and think differently; and hence, were we on this occasion to say what, on a review of the correspondence now before us, we both feel and think, our sentiments perhaps would merely represent our own peculiar idiosyncracies, instead of reflecting the sentiments and emotions of the greater bulk of mankind. Still it is a deeply affecting sight to behold a fellow-being of exalted genius, of a proud and peculiarly sensitive spirit, and a truly generous heart, in the very prime of his days smitten with disease, slighted or shunned in a great measure by former friends, or those he deemed such, involved in misfortunes, and, by causes which need not be enumerated, steeped comparatively to the lips in poverty, stretched upon the bed of sickness, of suffering, and death, in circumstances so hapless and forlorn, so totally cheerless and desolate, as almost to leave no tender regret in his bosom at parting with all he once held dear or esteemed lovely on earth; or, using his own emphatic words, to sing, broken in spirit, and withered at heart,

'Farewell, thou fair day, thou green earth, and ye skies,
Now gay with the bright setting sun;
Farewell, loves and friendships, ye dear tender ties,
Our race of existence is run.'

"We attach blame to no one and to no party; but we cannot conceal from ourself the mournful fact, knowing, as we almost fancy we do, the writhings and workings of such a mind as Burns was endowed with, that he literally died of a broken heart.

"With our friend the Shepherd, we must ever regret that Mr. Thomson was so exactly mercantile as to inclose to the dying poet precisely the sum which he sought the loan of, and, what is still more curious, the precise sum which he, Mr. Thomson, "proposed sending," apparently before, as may be inferred from his own words, he was aware of Burns' peculiarly embarrassed pecuniary circumstances, and almost hopeless state of health."—MOTHERWELL.]

[Alluding to this subject, Mr. Lockhart, in his admirable Life of the Poet, says, and we agree with him in opinion: "Why Burns, who was of opinion, when he wrote his letter to Mr. Carfrae, that 'no profits are more honourable than those of the labours of a man of genius,' and whose own notions of independence had sustained no shock on the receipt of hundreds of pounds from Creech, should have spurned the suggestion of pecuniary recompense from Mr. Thomson, it is no easy matter to explain: nor do I profess to understand why Mr. Thomson took so little pains to argue the matter in limine with the poet, and convince him that the time which he himself considered as fairly entitled to be paid for by a common bookseller ought of right to be valued and acknowledged on similar terms by the editor and proprietor of a book containing both songs and music."]

"Burns," says Professor Walker, "had all the unmanageable pride of Samuel Johnson, and, if the latter threw away with indignation the new shoes which had been placed at his chamber-door, secretly and collectively by his companions, the former would have been still more ready to resent any pecuniary donation with which a single individual, after his peremptory prohibition, should avowedly have dared to insult him. He would instantly have construed such conduct into a virtual assertion that his prohibition was insincere, and his independence affected; and the more artfully the transaction had been disguised, the more rage it would have excited, as implying the same assertion with the additional charge, that if secretly made it would not be denied." But on this subject the public have an opportunity of hearing Mr. Thomson himself, who expresses himself thus:—

"Upon my publishing the first twenty-five melodies with Pleyel's symphonies and accompaniments, and songs by different authors, six of Burns' songs being of the number, (and those six were all I published in his life-time), I, of course, sent a copy of this half volume to the Poet: and as a mark of my gratitude for his excessive kindness, I ventured, with all possible delicacy, to send him a small pecuniary present, notwithstanding what he had said on the subject. He retained it after much hesitation, but wrote me (Letter 28) that, if I presumed to repeat it, he would, on the least motion of it, indignantly spurn what was past, and commence entire stranger to me.

"Who that reads the letter above referred to, and the first one which the Poet sent me, can think I have deserved the abuse which anonymous scribblers have poured upon me, for not endeavouring to remunerate the Poet? If I had dared to go farther than I did, in sending him my money, is it not perfectly clear that he would have deemed it an insult, and ceased to write another song for me?

"Had I been a selfish or avaricious man, I had a fair opportunity, upon the death of the Poet, to put money in my pocket; for I might then have published, for my own behoof, all the beautiful lyrics he had written for me, the original manuscripts of which were in my possession. But instead of doing this, I was no sooner informed that the friends of the Poet's family had come to a resolution to collect his works, and to publish them for the benefit of the family, and that they thought it of importance to include my MSS., as being likely, from their number, their novelty, and beauty, to prove an attraction to subscribers, than I felt it at once my duty to put them in possession of all the songs and of the correspondence between the Poet and myself, and accordingly, through Mr. John Syme, of Ryedale, I transmitted the whole to Dr. Currie, who had been prevailed on, immensely for the advantage of Mrs. Burns and her children, to take on himself the task of editor.

"For thus surrendering the manuscripts, I received both verbally, and in writing, the warm thanks of the Trustees for the family, Mr. John Syme, and Mr. Gilbert Burns; who considered what I had done as a fair return for the Poet's generosity of conduct to me.

"If any thing more were wanting to set me right, with respect to the anonymous calumnies circulated to my prejudice, in regard to the Poet, I have it in my power to refer to a most respectable testimonial which, to my very agreeable surprise, was sent me by Professor Josiah Walker, one of the Poet's Biographers: and, had I not been reluctant to obtrude myself on the public, I should long since have given it publicity. The Professor wrote me as follows:—

Perth, 14th April, 1811.

"DEAR SIR:

"Before I left Edinburgh, I sent a copy of my account of Burns to Lord Woodhouselee; and since my return I have had a letter from his Lordship, which among other passages, contains one that I cannot withhold from you! He writes thus:—I am glad that you have embraced the occasion which lay in your way, of doing full justice to Mr. George Thomson, who, I agree with you in thinking, was most harshly and illiberally treated by an anonymous dull calumniator. I have always regarded Mr. Thomson as a man of great worth and most respectable character: and I have every reason to believe that poor Burns felt himself as much indebted to his good counsels and active friendship as a man, as the public is sensible he was to his good taste and judgment as a critic!

"Of the unbiassed opinion of such a highly respectable gentleman and accomplished scholar as Lord Woodhouselee, I certainly feel not a little proud: it is of itself more than sufficient to silence the calumnies by which I have been assailed, first, anonymously, and afterwards, to my great surprise, by some writers who might have been expected to possess sufficient judgment to see the matter in its true light."

G. T.

"To this letter of my excellent friend Mr. Thomson," says Chambers, "little can be added. His work, the labour of his life-time, has long been held the classical depository of Scottish melody and song, and is extensively known. His own character, in the city where he has spent so many years, has ever stood high. It was scarcely necessary that Mr. Thomson should enter into a defence of himself, against the inconsiderate charges which have been brought against him.

"When Burns refused remuneration from one whom he knew to be, like himself, of the generation of Apollo, rather than of Plutus, and while his musical friend was only entering upon a task, the results of which no one could tell, how can Mr. Thomson be fairly blamed?

"If a moderate success ultimately crowned his enterprise and toil, and the success has probably been much more moderate than Mr. Thomson's assailants suppose—long after the poor bard was beyond the reach of money, and all superior consolations,—who can envy it, or who can say that it offers any offence to the manes of the unhappy poet? The charge was indeed never preferred but in ignorance, and would be totally unworthy of notice, if ignorant parties were still apt to be imposed upon by it."

ALEXANDER CUNNINGHAM AND HIS FAITHLESS FAIR ONE.

THE story of Cunningham's unfaithful mistress, which is alluded to in the song, "Now Spring has clad the grove in green," p. 506; as well as in the songs, "She's fair and fause," p. 417, and "Had I a Cave on some wild distant shore," p. 467, made a great sensation at the time, and has been kept in remembrance by the verses of the Poet. "One evening, a very few years ago," says Mr. Chambers, in 1838, "a friend of mine, visiting a musical family who resided opposite St. John's Chapel, in Prince's-street, chanced to request one of the young ladies to sing "Had I a Cave," &c. She was about to comply, when it was recollected that the heroine of the lay lived below, an aged widow, and might overhear it; for which reason the intention of singing the song was laid aside."

The "fair and fause" Peggy in question, after "plighting her troth" with Cunningham, married the late Dr. Dewar, of Princes' Street, Edinburgh. At his death he left three daughters and a son, who were all well provided for—the latter became an Advocate at the Scottish Bar, but to the great mortification and disappointment of his widow, he left her only one hundred pounds per ann., which made her in a great measure dependant on her son, having been accustomed for many years to live in the first style. Here was something like retributive justice!—Her second daughter was the celebrated Jessie Dewar, the loveliest girl that at one period adorned the Scottish metropolis. A young Clerk in the Royal Bank, of the name of L——, went almost out of his wits regarding her, and annoyed her exceedingly. Kay, the celebrated Caricaturist, published an admirable likeness of the fair girl, with her tormentor following her, and vociferating, "If it were not for these d—d blankets, I would have got her!" alluding to his mother having for many years been a retailer of Flannels in the High Street, Edinburgh. This created a good deal of merriment at the time, and the lovely young Jessie was no longer tormented by his addresses. She afterwards married the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Tournier, and is now settled in London.

The lady whom Burns has immortalized in these three songs, above alluded to, was the prototype of her lovely daughter. Every thing had been arranged for her marriage with Cunningham, who was devotedly attached to her; indeed, for a time it appears to have been reciprocated:—

"But woman is but world's gear."

Dr. Dewar, who had been paying her professional and friendly visits at the same time, made her many handsome presents; and, although her senior for many years, and not to be compared to his rival in personal appearance, or talents, he persuaded her to break off the match. Cunningham at that time not being in affluent circumstances, and the lady knowing that the Doctor had "wrouth o' gear," she consented to marry him. This was a shock which poor Cunningham never got the better of,

"Till grief his eyes did close,
Ne'er to weep more."

Such was the strength of his affection for the object of his blighted love that, long after she had jilted him, he has been seen stealthily for many an evening in the gloaming, to traverse for hours the opposite side of the street where she resided—pause for a moment opposite her windows, and when he had caught a glimpse of her, burst into tears—then wend his way slowly home by the most lonely path—his handkerchief over his eyes, completely absorbed in grief. Time mollified his hopeless passion; and his friends, knowing his extreme susceptibility, always avoided the slightest allusion to the circumstance. He died a few years' since, beloved and respected by all who had the happiness of his acquaintance.

REMARKS ON SCOTTISH SONGS AND BALLADS, ANCIENT AND MODERN;
WITH
ANECDOTES OF THEIR AUTHORS.

BY
ROBERT BURNS.

"There needs na' be so great a phrase,
 Wi' dringing dull Italian lays,
 I wad na gi'e our ain Strathspeys
 For half a hundred score o' 'em;
 They're douff and dowie at the best,
 Douff and dowie, douff and dowie;
 They're douff and dowie at the best,
 Wi' a' their variorum:
 They're douff and dowie at the best,
 Their Allegroes, and a' the rest,
 They cannot please a Scottish taste,
 Compar'd wi' Tullochgorum."

REV. JOHN SKINNER.

[The following Remarks on Scottish Song exist in the hand writing of Burns, in an interleaved copy of the first four volumes of Johnson's Musical Museum, which the Poet presented to Captain Riddel, of Friar's Carse. On the death of Mrs. Riddel, these precious volumes passed into the hands of her niece, Eliza Bayley, of Manchester, who kindly permitted Mr. Cromek to transcribe and publish them in his volume of the Reliques of Burns.

These remarks now form an integral part in all modern editions of the Poet's works.

Respecting the songs which form the subject of these remarks, Dr. Currie says:—"In the changes of language these songs may no doubt suffer change; but the associated strain of sentiment and of music will perhaps survive, while the clear stream sweeps down the vale of Yarrow, or the yellow broom waves on the Cowdenknowes."]

The Highland Queen.

THE Highland Queen, music and poetry, was composed by Mr. M'Vicar, purser of the Solebay man of war.—This I had from Dr. Blacklock.

[The Highland King, intended as a parody on the former, was the production of a young lady, the friend of Charles Wilson, of Edinburgh, who edited a collection of Songs, entitled "Cecilia," which appeared in 1779.

The following are specimens of these songs:—

THE HIGHLAND QUEEN.

How blest that youth whom gentle fate
 Has destin'd for so fair a mate!
 Has all these wond'ring gifts in store,
 And each returning day brings more;
 No youth so happy can be seen.
 Possessing thee, my Highland Queen.

THE HIGHLAND KING.

Jamie, the pride of a' the green,
 Is just my age, e'en gay fifteen:
 When first I saw him, 'twas the day
 That ushers in the sprightly May;
 Then first I felt love's powerful sting,
 And sigh'd for my dear Highland King.

THE HIGHLAND QUEEN.

No sordid wish, nor trifling joy,
 Her settled calm of mind destroy;
 Strict honour fills her spotless soul,
 And adds a lustre to the whole:

A matchless shape, a graceful mien,
All centre in my Highland Queen.

THE HIGHLAND KING.

Would once the dearest boy but say
'Tis you I love; come, come away
Unto the Kirk, my love, let's hie—
Oh me! in rapture, I comply:
And I should then have cause to sing
The praises of my Highland King.]

Bess the Gawkie.

THIS song shews that the Scottish Muses did not all leave us when we lost Ramsay and Oswald;* as I have good reason to believe that the verses and music are both posterior to the days of these two gentlemen. It is a beautiful song, and in the genuine Scots taste. We have few pastoral compositions, I mean the pastoral of nature, that are equal to this.

[The Author of this song was the Rev. James Morehead, the minister of Urr, in Galloway: he was a maker of verses, and, falling under the lash of Burns, avenged himself by some satiric lines which have much ill nature but no wit. He died in 1808. The song of Bess the Gawkie gives a lively image of the northern manners. —RITSON.]

BLYTHE young Bess to Jean did say,
Will ye gang to yon sunny brae,
Where flocks do feed and herds do stray
And sport awhile wi' Jamie?
Ah na, lass, I'll no gang there,
Nor about Jamie tak nae care,
Nor about Jamie tak nae care,
For he's taen up wi' Maggy!

For hark, and I will tell you, lass,
Did I not see your Jamie pass,
Wi' meikle gladness in his face,
Out o'er the muir to Maggy?
I wat he gae her mony a kiss,
And Maggy took them ne'er amiss;
'Tween ilka smack, pleas'd her with this,
That Bess was but a gawkie.

But whist!—nae mair of this we'll speak,
For yonder Jamie does us meet;
Instead of Meg he kiss'd sae sweet,
I trow he likes the gawkie.

O dear Bess, I hardly knew,
When I came by, your gown's sae new,
I think you've got it wet wi' dew;
Quoth she, that's like a gawkie.

The lasses fast frae him they flew,
And left poor Jamie sair to rue
That ever Maggy's face he knew,
Or yet ca'd Bess a gawkie.
As they went o'er the muir they sang,
The hills and dales with echoes rang,
The mills and dales with echoes rang,
Gang o'er the muir to Maggy.

Oh, open the Door, Lord Gregory.

It is somewhat singular that in Lanark, Renfrew, Ayr, Wigton, Kirkcudbright, and Dumfries-shires, there is scarcely an old song or tune which, from the title, &c., can be guessed to belong to, or be the production of, these counties. This, I conjecture, is one of these very few; as the ballad, which is a long one, is called, both by tradition and in printed collections, "The Lass of Lochroyan," which I take to be Lochroyan in Galloway.†

[This is a very ancient Gallowegian melody. The two verses adapted to the air, in the Museum, were compiled from the fine old ballad entitled "The Lass of Lochroyan," which was first published in a perfect state by Sir Walter Scott in his Minstrelsy of the Border. They are as follow:—

OH, open the door, Lord Gregory,
Oh, open and let me in;
The wind blows thro' my yellow hair,
The dew draps o'er my chin.
If you are the lass that I lov'd once,
As I trow you are not she,
Come gi'e me some of the tokens
That pass'd 'tween you and me.

Ah, wae be to you, Gregory!
An ill death may you die;
You will not be the death of one,
But you'll be the death of three.
Oh, don't you mind, Lord Gregory?
'Twas down at yonder burn side
We chang'd the ring off our fingers,
And I put mine on thine.]

* Oswald was a music-seller in London, where he published a collection of Scottish tunes, called "The Caledonian's Pocket Companion;" Tyler, in his treatise on music, observes that his genius in composition was sound, and his taste in the performance of Scottish music was natural and pathetic.

† [In this sweeping assertion Burns is somewhat mistaken; "Johnnie Faa, or the Gipsy Laddie," "The Lowlands of Holland," "Lord James Douglas," "The Western Tragedy, or the False Sir John," otherwise called "May Collean," "The Young Laird Ochiltree," "Johnnie Armstrong," "Lady Bothwell's Lament," "O Bothwell bank, thou bloomest fair," with many other old traditional ballads, are all locally identified with one or other of these proscribed counties. Burns is right in his supposition of the ballad now mentioned referring to Loch Ryan in Galloway. The idea of Burns's "Lord Gregory" is obviously taken from this fine old ballad.—MOTHERWELL.]

The Banks of the Tweed.

THIS song is one of the many attempts that English composers have made to imitate the Scottish manner, and which I shall, in these strictures, beg leave to distinguish by the appellation of Anglo-Scottish productions. The music is pretty good, but the verses are just above contempt.

[The song has the form of a pastoral drama: a shepherdess sings of the object of her love: the swain hears, and is enraptured:—the strain concludes with the following verse:—

For to visit my ewes, and to see my lambs play,
By the banks of the Tweed and the groves I did stray; [sigh'd,
But my Jenny, dear Jenny, how oft have I
And have vow'd endless love if you would be my bride.

To the altar of Hymen, my fair one, repair,
Where a knot of affection shall tie the fond pair,
To the pipe's sprightly notes the gay dance will we lead, [the Tweed.
And will bless the dear grove by the banks of

The air was very popular at one time in Scotland; and Johnson, at the request of several of his subscribers, was induced to give it an early place in his work. The greater part of the first volume of the Museum was engraved before Burns and Johnson became acquainted.]

The Beds of sweet Roses.

This song, as far as I know, for the first time appears here in print.—When I was a boy, it was a very popular song in Ayr-shire. I remember to have heard those fanatics, the Buchanites, sing some of their nonsensical rhymes, which they dignify with the name of hymns, to this air.*

["With the Buchanites, tradition avers that Burns was more than well acquainted. A certain western damsel, with a light foot and an ensnaring eye, was captivated by the pictures of primitive enjoyment which "our lady" (so her followers called Mrs. Buchan) painted, and,

* [Shakspeare, in his "Winter's Tale," alludes to a Puritan who sings psalms to hornpipes.]

† [Richard Hewit, Ritson observes, was taken when a boy, during the residence of Dr. Blacklock in Cumberland, to lead him.—He addressed a copy of verses to the Doctor on quitting his service. Among the verses are the following lines:

"How oft these plains I've thoughtless prest;
Whistled or sung some fair distrest,
When fate would steal a tear."

leaving Kyle, united herself to the household of that singular fanatic. The Poet, it is said, spent a whole day and night in an attempt to persuade the fair enthusiast to return: she preferred the multitude, and Burns returned to his plough and his poetry."—CUNNINGHAM.]

The song of "The Beds of Sweet Roses" is as follows:—

As I was a walking one morning in May,
The little birds were singing delightful and gay;
The little birds were singing delightful and gay;
When I and my true love did often sport and play,
Down among the beds of sweet roses, [play,
Where I and my true love did often sport and Down among the beds of sweet roses."

My daddy and my mammy I oft have heard them say,
That I was a naughty boy, and did often sport
and play; [was shy,
But I never liked in all my life a maiden that
Down among the beds of sweet roses.]

Roslin Castle.

THESE beautiful verses were the production of a Richard Hewit, a young man that Dr. Blacklock (to whom I am indebted for the anecdote) kept for some years as an amanuensis.† I do not know who is the author of the second song to the same tune. Tytler, in his amusing history of Scottish music, gives the air to Oswald; but in Oswald's own collection of Scots tunes, when he affixes an asterisk to those he himself composed, he does not make the least claim to the tune.

[Oswald was not the composer of the air of Roslin Castle. The same tune, note for note, appears in a prior publication—M'Gibbon's collection of Scots tunes, under the title of "House of Glams." The words of both the songs to this air appeared in Herd's Collection, printed in 1776. We subjoin them both:—

RÖSLIN CASTLE.

'Twas in that season of the year,
When all things gay and sweet appear,
That Colin, with the morning ray,
Arose and sung his rural lay.

"Alluding," as it said in a note, "to a sort of narrative songs, which make no inconsiderable part of the innocent amusements with which the country people pass the wintry nights, and of which the author of the present piece was a faithful reharser."

Henry Mackenzie, in his edition of Blacklock's Poems, Edinburgh, 1793, informs us that Hewit subsequently became Secretary to Lord Milton (then Lord Justice Clerk, and Sub-Minister for Scotland, under the Duke of Argyle); but that the fatigue of that station hurt his health, and he died in 1794.]

Of Nanny's charms the shepherd sung,
The hills and dales with Nanny rung;
While Roslin Castle heard the swain,
And echo'd back the cheerful strain.

Awake, sweet Muse! the breathing spring
With rapture warms; awake and sing!
Awake and join the vocal throng
Who hail the morning with a song;
To Nanny raise the cheerful lay,
O! bid her haste and come away;
In sweetest smiles herself adorn,
And add new graces to the morn!

O, hark, my love! on ev'ry spray
Each feather'd warbler tunes his lay;
'Tis beauty fires the ravish'd throng,
And love inspires the melting song:
Then let my raptur'd notes arise,
For beauty darts from Nanny's eyes;
And love my rising bosom warms,
And fills my soul with sweet alarms."]

SECOND VERSION.

FROM Roslin Castle's echoing walls,
Resound my shepherd's ardent calls;
My Colin bids me come away,
And love demands I should obey.
His melting strain, and tuneful lay,
So much the charms of love display,
I yield—nor longer can refrain,
To own my love, and bless my swain

No longer can my heart conceal
The painful-pleasing flame I feel:
My soul retorts the am'rous strain;
And echoes back in love again.
Where lurks my songster? from what grove
Does Colin pour his notes of love?
O bring me to the happy bower,
Where mutual love my bliss secure!

Ye vocal hills, that catch the song,
Repeating as it flies along,
To Colin's ears my strain convey,
And say, I haste to come away.
Ye zephyrs soft, that fan the gale,
Waft to my love the soothing tale:
In whispers all my soul express,
And tell I haste his arms to bless!

O! come, my love! thy Colin's lay
With rapture calls, O come away!
Come while the muse this wreath shall twine
Around that modest brow of thine;
O! hither haste, and with thee bring
That beauty blooming like the spring;
Those graces that divinely shine,
And charm this ravish'd breast of mine!

Saw ye Johnnie cummin' quo' she.

THIS song, for genuine humour in the verses, and lively originality in the air, is unparalleled. I take it to be very old.

[This observation had been hastily made, for the air, either when played or sung slowly, as it ought to be, is exceedingly pathetic, not lively. Burns afterwards became sensible of this, for in his letter to Thomson (No. XLII.) he says, "I enclose you Fraser's set of this tune; when he plays it slow, in fact, he makes it the language of despair. Were it possible in singing, to give it half the pathos which Fraser gives it in playing, it would make an admirable pathetic song." Mr. Thomas Fraser, to whom Burns alludes, was an intimate acquaintance of the Poet, and an excellent musician. In 1820, he was the principal oboe concerto player in Edinburgh, of which city he was a native. His style of playing the melodies of Scotland was peculiarly chaste and masterly. He died in 1825. The song in the Museum is as follows:—

"SAW ye Johnnie cummin' quo' she,

Saw ye Johnnie cummin,

O saw ye Johnnie cummin, quo', she;

Saw ye Johnnie cummin,

Wi' his blue bonnet on his head,

And his doggie runnin', quo' she;

And his doggie runnin'?

Fee him, father, fee him, quo' she;

Fee him, father, fee him:

For he is a gallant lad,

And a weel doin';

And a' the wark about the house

Gaes wi' me when I see him, quo' she;

Wi' me when I see him.

What will I do wi' him, hussy?

What will I do wi' him?

He's ne'er a sark upon his back,

And I hae nane to gie him.

I hae twa sarks into my kist,

And ane o' them I'll gie him,

And for a mark of mair fee,

Diinna stand wi' him, quo' she;

Diinna stand wi' him.

For weel do I lo'e him, quo' she:

Weel do I lo'e him:

O fee him, father, fee him, quo' she;

Fee him, father, fee him:

He'll haud the plough, thrash i' the barn,

And lie wi' me at e'en, quo' she;

Lie wi' me at e'en."]

Clout the Caldron.

A TRADITION is mentioned in the "Bee," that the second Bishop Chisholm, of Dunblane.

used to say that, if he were going to be hanged, nothing would soothe his mind so much by the way as to hear "Clout the Caldron" played.

I have met with another tradition, that the old song to this tune,

"Hae ye ony pots or pans,
Or onie broken chanlers," was composed on one of the Kenmure family in the cavalier times; and alluded to an amour he had, while under hiding, in the disguise of an itinerant tinker. The air is also known by the name of

"The Blacksmith and his Apron," which, from the rhythm, seems to have been a line of some old song to the tune

[The song of "Clout the Caldron" is familiar to all who love native humour: it is still sung over the punch-bowl, and continues to exercise its old influence when sung with true simplicity and pawkie naïveté:

I.

"HAE ye ony pots or pans,
Or ony broken chanlers?
For I'm a tinker to my trade,
And newly come frae Flanders,
As scant o' siller as o' grace,
Disbanded, we've a bad run;
Gang tell the lady o' the place,
I'm come to clout her caldron

II.

Madam, if ye hae wark for me,
I'll do't to your contentment,
And dinna care a single flie
For ony man's resentment:
For, lady fair, though I appear
To every ane a tinker,
Yet to yoursel I'm bauld to tell
I am a gentle jinker.

III.

Love, Jupiter into a swan
Turn'd for his lovely Leda;
He like a bull o'er meadows ran,
To carry off Europa.
Then may not I, as well as he,
To cheat your Argus blinker,
And win your love, like mighty Jove,
Thus hide me in a tinker?"

IV.

"Sir, ye appear a cunning man,
But this fine plot ye'll fail in,
For there is neither pot nor pan
Of mine ye'll drive a nail in.
Then bind your budget on your back,
And nails up in your apron,
For I've a tinker under tack
That's us'd to clout my caldron."]

Saw ye nae my Peggy?

THIS charming song is much older, and indeed superior to Ramsay's verses, "The Toast," as he calls them. There is another set of the words, much older still, and which I take to be the original one, but though it has a very great deal of merit, it is not quite ladies' reading.

The original words, for they can scarcely be called verses, seem to be as follows; a song familiar from the cradle to every Scottish ear.

"SAW ye my Maggie,
Saw ye my Maggie,
Saw ye my Maggie
Linkin o'er the lea?

High kilted was she,
High kilted was she,
High kilted was she,
Her coat aboon her knee.

What mark has your Maggie,
What mark has your Maggie,
What mark has your Maggie,
That ane may ken her be? (by.)"*

Though it by no means follows that the silkiest verses to an air must, for that reason, be the original song; yet I take this ballad, of which I have quoted part, to be the old verses. The two songs in Ramsay, one of them evidently his own, are never to be met with in the fire-side circle of our peasantry; while that which I take to be the old song, is in every shepherd's mouth. Ramsay, I suppose, had thought the old verses unworthy of a place in his collection.

["SAW ye nae my Peggy,
Saw ye nae my Peggy,
Saw ye nae my Peggy,
Coming o'er the lea?
Sure a finer creature
Ne'er was form'd by nature,
So complete each feature,
So divine is she.

O! how Peggy charms me!
Every look still warms me;
Every thought alarms me;
Lest she love nae me.
Peggy doth discover
Nought but charms all over;
Nature bids me love her,
That's a law to me.

* The following verse was added by the Etrrick Shepherd:—

"Maggy's a lovely woman,
She proves true to no man,
She proves true to no man,
An' has proven false to me."

Who would leave a lover,
To become a rover?
No, I'll ne'er give over,
Till I happy be!
For since love inspires me,
As her beauty fires me,
And her absence tires me,
Nought can please but she.

When I hope to gain her,
Fate seems to detain her,
Could I but obtain her,
Happy would I be!
I'll lie down before her,
Bless, sigh, and adore her,
With faint look implore her,
Till she pity me!]

The Flowers of Edinburgh.

THIS song is one of the many effusions of Scots Jacobitism.* The title "Flowers of Edin-

* [The grounds our poet had for conjecturing that this song was a Jacobite effusion, do not appear to be sufficiently plain. No such song as the one alluded to is known to exist. Subsequent to the year 1745, indeed, there was a Jacobite ballad, which was frequently sung to this air, beginning:—

To your arms, to your arms, my bonnie Highland lads!
To your arms, to your arms, at the touk o' the drum!
The battle-trumpet sounds, put on your white cockades,
For Charlie, the great Prince Regent, is come.

But this ballad, which appears in Hogg's Jacobite Reliques, has no allusion whatever to The Flowers of Edinburgh. It seems more likely that the composer had given it the name in compliment to the young ladies of the Scottish metropolis, who were then attending the dancing schools. Burns further remarks, that "it is singular enough that the Scottish muses were all Jacobites." But there are many songs composed in Scotland, at the time, directly opposed to Jacobitism. The following loyal song, composed for the use of the Revolution Club, part of which was afterwards printed at Edinburgh, by Donaldson and Reid, in 1761, may not be unacceptable to the reader:—

HIGHLAND LADDIE.

I.

WHEN you came over first frae France,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
You swore to lead our King a dance,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
And promis'd, on your royal word,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
'To mak' the Duke dance o'er the sword,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.

II.

When he to you began to play,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
You quat the green and ran away,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
The dance thus turn'd into a chase,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
It must be own'd you wan the race,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.

III.

Your partners that came o'er frae France,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
They understood not a Scots dance,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
Therefore, their complaisance to shew,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
Unto our Duke they bow'd right low,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.

burgh," has no manner of connexion with the present verses, so I suspect there has been an older set of words, of which the title is all that remains.

By the bye, it is singular enough that the Scottish Muses were all Jacobites. I have paid more attention to every description of Scots songs than perhaps any body living has done, and I do not recollect one single stanza, or even the title of the most trifling Scots air, which has the least panegyric reference to the families of Nassau or Brunswick; while there are hundreds satirizing them. This may be thought no panegyric on the Scots Poets, but I mean it as such. For myself, I would always take it as a compliment to have it said that my heart ran before my head; † and surely the gallant though unfortunate house of Stuart, the kings of our fathers for so many heroic ages, is a theme much more interesting than

* * * * *
[Some one passed a pen through the remain-

IV.

If e'er you come to dance again,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
New dancers you must bring frae Spain,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
And, that all things may be secure,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
See that your dancers be not poor,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.

V.

I think insurance you should make,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
Lest dancing you should break your neck,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.
For he that dances on a rope,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
Should not trust all unto the Pope,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.

VI.

For dancing you were never made,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
Then, while 'tis time, leave off the trade,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie;
Be thankful for your last escape,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie,
And, like your brother,* take a Cap,
Bonny laddie, Highland laddie.]

† ["Poor Burns!—Thy heart indeed ran always before thy head; but never didst thou fail to carry thy reader's heart along with thee.—Instead of kindling at the indignities offered to thy native land, hadst thou been a wise and a prudent poet, thou wouldst have tune'd thy lyre to the praise of some powerful family, and carefully abstained from drawing on thy head the resentment of the guilty great, or their descendants. Thou mightest then have rolled in affluence, and ceased to struggle under the insulting taunts of every little upstart in office. Thou mightest have flourished in thy day, and left behind thee an offspring securely treading the path of honours and preferment, instead of leaving thy wife and children poor and penniless, at the mercy of the world.—All this thou mightest have done; but then thou wouldst not have been a poet.—I do not mean to say that poetry and prudence are altogether incompatible; but that prudence which would stifle the feelings which should glow in every manly bosom, can never exist with true and genuine poetry. The prudence that would suppress the indignant strain of a Campbell at the horrors of Warsaw, or see unmoved the smoking villages and unhalloved butchery which followed in the train of Culloden, the unsophisticated muse will ever disdain. He can never be a poet who does not feel as a man."—CROMEK.]

* Cardinal York, brother of Charles, and second son of James, denominated the "Pretender."

ing words of the sentence, and the Poet's eulogium on our native race of princes must remain imperfect. We subjoin a few verses of—

The Flowers of Edinburgh.

My love was once a bonnie lad ;
He was the flow'r of a' his kin ;
The absence of his bonnie face
Has rent my tender heart in twain.
I day nor night find no delight—
In silent tears I still complain ;
And exclaim 'gainst those, my rival foes.
That hae taen frae me my darling swain.

Despair and anguish fill my breast
Since I have lost my blooming rose :
I sigh and moan while others rest ;
His absence yields me no repose.
To seek my love I'll range and rove
Thro' every grove and distant plain ;
Thus I'll never cease, but spend my days
T' hear tidings from my darling swain.

There's nothing strange in nature's change,
Since parents shew such cruelty ;
They caus'd my love from me to range,
And know not to what destiny.
The pretty kids and tender lambs
May cease to sport upon the plain ;
But I'll mourn and lament, in deep discontent,
For the absence of my darling swain !]

Jamie Gay.

JAMIE GAY is another and a tolerable Anglo-Scottish piece.

[Of Jamie Gay it will be enough to quote the first line :

“As Jamie Gay gang'd blythe his way.”

A Scottish bard would have written :

“As Jamie Gay gaed blythe his way.”

The song was originally entitled “The happy Meeting,” and was frequently sung at Ranelagh with great applause.]

My Dear Jockey.

ANOTHER Anglo-Scottish production.

[The melody is uncommonly pretty. We subjoin the first two verses of the lady's lament.

“My laddie is gane far away o'er the plain,
While in sorrow behind I am forc'd to remain ;

Tho' blue bells and violets the hedges adorn,
Tho' trees are in blossom and sweet blows the thorn,
No pleasure they give me, in vain they look gay ; [away ;
There's nothing can please me now Jockey's
Forlorn I sit singing, and this is my strain,
'Haste, haste, my dear Jockey, to me back again.’

When lads and their lasses are on the green
met, [and they chat ;
They dance and they sing, and they laugh
Contented and happy, with hearts full of glee,
I can't, without envy, their merriment see :
Those pleasures offend me, my shepherd's not there !

No pleasure I relish that Jockey don't share ;
It makes me to sigh, I from tears scarce refrain,
I wish my dear Jockey return'd back again.”]

Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' Strae.

It is self-evident that the first four lines of this song are part of a song more ancient than Ramsay's beautiful verses which are annexed to them. As music is the language of nature ; and poetry, particularly songs, are always less or more localized (if I may be allowed the verb) by some of the modifications of time and place, this is the reason why so many of our Scots airs have outlived their original, and perhaps many subsequent sets of verses ; except a single name, or phrase, or sometimes one or two lines, simply to distinguish the tunes by.

To this day, among people, who know nothing of Ramsay's verses, the following is the song, and all the song that ever I heard :

“Gin ye meet a bonnie lassie,
Gie her a kiss and let her gae ;
But gin ye meet a dirty hizzie,
Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' strae.

Fye, gae rub her, rub her, rub her,
Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' strae :
And gin ye meet a dirty hizzie,
Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' strae.”

[“Ramsay's spirited imitation,” says Cromek, “of the ‘Vides ut alta stet nive candidum, Socrate,’ of Horace, is considered as one of the happiest efforts of the author's genius.—For a very elegant critique on the poem, and a comparison of its merits with those of the original, the reader is referred to Lord Woodhouselee's ‘Remarks on the Writings of Ramsay.’

“Look up to Pentland's tow'ring tap,
Bury'd beneath great wreaths of snaw,
O'er ilka cleugh, ilk scar, and slap,
As high as ony Roman wa'.

Driving their baws frae whins or tee,
There are nae gowfers to be seen ;
Nor dousser fowk wysing a-jee
The byass-bouls on Tamson's Green.

Then fling on coals, and ripe the ribs,
And beek the house baith but and ben ;
That mutchkin stowp it hauds but dribs,
Then let's get in the tappit hen.

Good claret best keeps out the cauld,
And drives away the winter soon ;
It makes a man baith gash and bauld,
And heaves his soul beyond the moon.

Let next day come as it thinks fit,
The present minute's only ours,
On pleasure let's employ our wit,
And laugh at Fortune's fickle pow'rs.

Be sure ye dinna quit the grip
Of ilka joy, when ye are young,
Before auld age your vitals nip,
And lay ye twafald o'er a rung.

Now to her heaving bosom cling,
And sweetly taste for a' kiss ;
Frae her fair finger whoop a ring,
As token of a future bliss.

These benisons, I'm very sure,
Are of the Gods' indulgent grant ;
Then, surly Carles, whisht, forbear,
To plague us wi' your whining cant.

Sweet youth's a blyth and heartsome time ;
Then, lads and lasses, while 'tis May,
Gae pu' the gowan in its prime,
Before it wither and decay.

Watch the soft minutes of delyte,
When Jenny speaks beneath her breath,
And kisses, laying a' the wyte
On you, if she kepp ony skaith,

'Haith, ye're ill-bred,' she'll smiling say ;
'Ye'll worry me, ye greedy rook ;'
Syne frae your arms she'll rin away,
And hide hersel in some dark nook.

Her laugh will lead you to the place
Where lies the happiness you want,
And plainly tells you, to your face,
Nineteen nay-says are ha'f a grant."

The song of "Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' strae" is composed of the first four lines mentioned by Burns, and the seven concluding verses of Ramsay's spirited and elegant Scottish version of Horace's ninth Ode, given above.]

The Lass of Livingston.

THE old song, in three eight line stanzas, is well known, and has merit as to wit and humour ; but it is rather unfit for insertion.—It begins,

"THE bonnie lass o' Livingston,
Her name ye ken, her name ye ken,
And she has written in her contract,
'To lie her lane, to lie her lane.'
&c. &c. &c.

[The modern version by Allan Ramsay is as follows :—

"PAIN'D with her slighting Jamie's love,
Bell dropt a tear, Bell dropt a tear ;
The gods descended from above,
Well pleas'd to hear, well pleas'd to hear.
They heard the praises of the youth
From her own tongue, from her own tongue,
Who now converted was to truth,
And thus she sung, and thus she sung :

Bless'd days, when our ingenious sex,
More frank and kind—more frank & kind,
Did not their lov'd adorer's vex,
Butspoke their mind—butspoke their mind.
Repenting now, she promis'd fair,
Would he return—would he return,
She ne'er again wou'd give him care,
Or cause to mourn, or cause to mourn.

Why lov'd I the deserving swain, [shame,
Yet still thought shame—yet still thought
When he my yielding heart did gain,
To own my flame—to own my flame.
Why took I pleasure to torment,
And seem too coy—and seem too coy,
Which makes me now, alas ! lament
My slighted joy—my slighted joy !

Ye Fair, while beauty's in its spring,
Own your desire—own your desire,
While love's young pow'r, with his soft wing,
Fans up the fire—fans up the fire ;
O do not with a silly pride,
Or low design—or low design,
Refuse to be a happy bride,
But answer plain—but answer plain.

Thus the fair mourner 'wail'd her crime,
With flowing eyes—with flowing eyes,
Glad Jamie heard her all the time
With sweet surprise—with sweet surprise.
Some god had led him to the grove,
His mind unchang'd—his mind unchang'd ;
Flew to her arms, and cried, my love,
I am reveng'd—I am reveng'd."]

The last Time I came o'er the Moor.

RAMSAY found the first line of this song, which had been preserved as the title of the charming air, and then composed the rest of the verses to suit that line. This has always a finer effect than composing English words, or words with an idea foreign to the spirit of the old title. Where old titles of songs convey any idea at all, it will generally be found to be quite in the spirit of the air.

["There are," says Allan Cunningham, "some fine verses in this song, though some fastidious critics pronounce them over warm:—

THE last time I came o'er the moor,
I left my love behind me ;
Ye powers, what pain do I endure,
When soft ideas mind me.
Soon as the ruddy morn display'd
The beaming day ensuing,
I met betimes my lovely maid
In fit retreats for wooing.

Beneath the cooling shade we lay,
Gazing and chastely sporting ;
We kiss'd and promis'd time away,
Till night spread her black curtain.
I pitied all beneath the skies,
Ev'n kings, when she was nigh me ;
In rapture I beheld her eyes,
Which could but ill deny me.

Should I be call'd where cannons roar,
Where mortal steel may wound me ;
Or cast upon some foreign shore,
Where danger may surround me ;
Yet hopes again to see my love,
And feast on glowing kisses,
Shall make my cares at distance move,
In prospect of such blisses.

In all my soul there's not one place
To let a rival enter ;
Since she excels in ev'ry grace,
In her my love shall centre :
Sooner the seas shall cease to flow,
Their waves the Alps shall cover,
On Greenland ice shall roses grow,
Before I cease to love her.

The next time I go o'er the moor,
She shall a lover find me ;
And that my faith is firm and pure,
Tho' I left her behind me :
Then Hymen's sacred bonds shall chain
My heart to her fair bosom ;
There, while my being does remain,
My love more fresh shall blossom."}]

Johnnie's grey Brecks.

THOUGH this has certainly every evidence of being a Scottish air, yet there is a well-known tune and song in the North of Ireland, called "The Weaver and his Shuttle, O," which, though sung much quicker, is every note the very tune.

[Burns, when a lad, wrote verses to the same tune, beginning, "My father was a Farmer upon the Carrick border." The older set of verses, which Johnson, from an unaccountable fastidiousness, had rejected, are not destitute of merit. These artless strains are still sung in Scotland, at every country fire-side, and it now becomes a matter of justice to restore them:—

WHEN I was in my se'enteenth year,
I was baith blythe and bonnie, O ;
The lads lo'ed me baith far and near,
But I lo'ed none but Johnnie, O.
He gain'd my heart in twa three weeks,
He spak sae blythe and kindly, O ;
And I made him new grey breeks,
That fitted him maist finely, O.

He was a handsome fellow ;
His humour was baith frank and free ;
His honny locks sae yellow,
Like gowd they glitter'd in my ee ;
His dimpl'd chin and rosy cheeks,
And face sae fair and ruddy, O ;
And then a-day his grey breeks,
Were neither auld nor duddy, O.

But now they are threadbare worn,
They're wider than they wont to be ;
They're a' tash'd-like, and unco torn,
And clouted sair on ilka knee.
But gin I had a simmer's day,
As I hae had right mony, O,
I'd make a web o' new grey,
To be breeks to my Johnnie, O.

For he's weel worthy o' them,
And better than I hae to gie ;
But I'll take pains upo' them,
And strive frae fau'ts to keep them free.
To cleed him weel shall be my care,
And please him a' my study, O ;
But he maun wear the auld pair,
Awee, tho' they be duddy, O.]

The happy Marriage.

ANOTHER, but very pretty, Anglo-Scottish piece.

We subjoin the whole of this charming lyric.

How blest has my time been, what joys have I known, [own;
 Since wedlock's soft bondage made Jessy my
 So joyful my heart is, so easy my chain,
 That freedom is tasteless, and roving a pain.

Thro' walks grown with woodbines, as often we stray,
 Around us our boys and girls frolic and play :
 How pleasing their sport is! the wanton ones
 see,
 And borrow their looks from my Jessy and me.

To try her sweet temper, oft-times am I seen,
 In reveals all day with the nymphs on the green ;
 Though painful my absence, my doubts she beguiles, [smiles.
 And meets me at night with complaisance and

What tho' on her cheeks the rose loses its hue,
 Her wit and her humour bloom all the year
 thro' ;
 Time still, as he flies, adds increase to her truth,
 And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth.

Ye shepherds so gay, who make love to ensnare,
 And cheat with false vows the too credulous fair,
 In search of true pleasure how vainly you roam !
 To hold it for life, you must find it at home.

[The above elegant song was written by Ed-ward Moore, author of "Fables for the Female Sex," &c. In it the author exhibits not only a charming picture of real domestic happiness, but has likewise paid a delicate compliment to the amiable virtues of his wife. This lady, whose maiden name was Janet Hamilton, had a great turn for poetry, and assisted her husband in writing his tragedy of "The Gamester." One specimen of her poetry was handed about before their marriage, and afterwards appeared in "The Gentleman's Magazine" for 1749. It was addressed to a daughter of the famous Stephen Duck, and begins with the following stanza:—

You will think it, my Duck, for the fault I must own,
 Your Jessy, at last, is quite covetous grown ;
 Though millions, if fortune should lavishly pour,
 I still should be wretched, if I had not MORE.

After playing on his name, with great deli-cacy and ingenuity, through half-a-dozen stan-zas, she thus concludes :

You will wonder, my girl, who this dear one can be,
 Whose merit can boast such a conquest as me ;
 But you sha'n't know his name, though I told you before
 It begins with an M ; but I dare not say MORE.]

The Lass of Patie's Mill.

IN Sinclair's Statistical Account of Scotland, this song is localized (a verb I must use for want of another to express my idea) somewhere in the north of Scotland, and likewise is claimed by Ayr-shire. The following anecdote I had from the present Sir William Cunningham of Robert-land, who had it from the last John Earl of Loudon. The then Earl of Loudon, and father to Earl John before-mentioned, had Ramsay at Loudon, and one day walking together by the banks of Irvine water, near New Mills, at a place called Patie's Mill, they were struck with the appearance of a beautiful country girl. His lordship observed that she would be a fine theme for a song. Allan lagged behind in returning to Loudon Castle, and at dinner produced this identical song.

[“The ‘Lass of Patie’s Mill’ is one of the happiest of all Ramsay’s songs. The poet said in his preface to the ‘Tea-Table Miscellany,’ that he had omitted in his collection all songs liable to raise a blush on the cheek of beauty : this fine lyric has been pointed out as likely to do what he desired to shun, but with how little reason, these verses will prove.”—CUNNING-HAM.

THE lass of Patie's mill,
 So bonny, blyth, and gay
 In spite of all my skill,
 Hath stole my heart away.
 When teding of the hay,
 Bare-headed on the green,
 Love midst her locks did play,
 And wanton'd in her een.

Her arms white, round, and smooth,
 Breasts rising in their dawn,
 To age it would give youth,
 To press them with his hand :
 Thro' all my spirits ran
 An ecstacy of bliss,
 When I such sweetness fand,
 Wrapt in a balmy kiss.

Without the help of art,
 Like flow'rs which grace the wild,
 She did her sweets impart,
 Whene'er she spoke or smil'd.
 Her looks they were so mild,
 Free from affected pride,
 She me to love beguil'd :
 I wish'd her for my bride

O ! had I all that wealth
 Hopetoun's high mountains fill,
 Insur'd long life and health,
 And pleasure at my will,

I'd promise and fulfil,
That none but bonny she,
The lass o' Patie's Mill,
Should share the same wi' me.

The heroine of this fine song was the only daughter of John Anderson, Esq., of Patie's Mill, in the parish of Keith-Hall, and county of Aberdeen.]

The Turnimspike.*

THERE is a stanza of this excellent song for local humour, omitted in this set,—where I have placed the asterisms.

“They tak te horse then by te head,
And tere tey mak her stan', man ;
Me tell tem, me hae seen te day
Tey no had sic comman', man.”

[A highlander laments, in a half-serious and half-comic way, the privations which the act of parliament anent kilts has made him endure, and the miseries which turnpike roads and toll-bars have brought upon his country :—

“HERSELL pe highland shentleman,
Pe auld as Pothwell Prig, man ;
And mony alterations seen
Amang te lawland whig, man.

First when her to the lawlands came,
Nainsell was driving cows, man ;
There was nae laws about him's nerse,
About the preeks or trews, man.

Nainsell did wear the philabeg,
The plaid prick't on her shoulder ;
The guid claymore hung pe her pelt,
De pistol sharg'd wi' poulder.

But for wheresas these cursed preeks,
Wherewith her nerse be lockit,
O hon ! that e'er she saw the day !
For a' her houghs be prokit.

Every ting in de highlands now
Pe turn'd to alteration ;
The sodger dwell at our door-sheek,
And tat's te great vexation.

Scotland be turn't a Ningland now,
An' laws pring on de cadger ;
Nainsell wad durk him for his deeds,
But oh ! she fear te sodger.

Anither law came after that,
Me never saw te like, man ;
They mak a lang road on te crund,
And ca' him Turnimspike, man.

An' wow ! she pe a pouny road,
Like louden corn-rigs, man ;
Where twa carts may gang on her,
An' no preak ithers' legs, man.

They sharge a penny for ilka horse,
In troth she'll no be sheaper,
For nought put gaen upo' the ground,
An' they gi'e me a paper.

Nae doubts, himsell maun tra her purse,
And pay them what hims like, man ;
I'll see a shugement on his toor ;
That filthy Turnimspike, man.

But I'll awa to te Highland hills,
Where te'il a ane dare turn her,
And no come near your Turnimspike,
Unless it pe to purn her.”]

Highland Laddie.

As this was a favourite theme with our later Scottish muses, there are several airs and songs of that name. That which I take to be the oldest is to be found in the “Musical Museum,” beginning “I hae been at Crookieden.” One reason for my thinking so is that Oswald has it in his collection by the name of “The auld Highland Laddie.” It is also known by the name of “Jinglan Johnnie,” which is a well-known song of four or five stanzas, and seems to be an earlier song than Jacobite times. As a proof of this, it is little known to the peasantry by the name of “Highland Laddie ;” while every body knows “Jinglan Johnnie.” The song begins

“Jinglan John, the meickle man
He met wi' a lass was blythe and bonnie.”

have groaned with them, the sides of the Scottish lies have been convulsed with them, for the greater part of a century.
—MOTHERWELL.

Graham was born about 1724, and died in the year 1779. His “History of the Rebellion,” 1745, was a favourite work of Sir Walter Scott, and was first printed under the following quaint title :—

A full, particular, and true account of the Rebellion in 1745-6.

Composed by the Poet, D. GRAHAM.

In Stirling-shire he lives at lame.
To the tune of The gallant Grahams, &c., Glasgow, 1746.]

* [Burns says nothing about the authorship of this humorous song ; but we may mention that it, and its counterpart, “John Highlandman's remarks on Glasgow,” are from the pen of Dougald Graham, Bellman in Glasgow, and author of the factious histories of “Lothian Tam,” “Leper the Tailor,” “Simple John and his Twelve Misfortunes,” “Jocky and Maggy's Courtship,” “John Cheap the Chapman,” “The Comical sayings of Paddy from Cork with his Coat buttoned behind,” “John Falkirk's Carritches,” “Janet Clinker's Orations in the Society of Clashin' Wives,” and a “Metrical History of the Rebellion in 1745,” in which he had a personal share, &c. His works, in the form of Penny Histories, have long formed staple articles in the hawk's basket ; and, while the classic presses of Paisley, Stirling, and Falkirk,

Another "Highland Laddie" is also in the "Museum," vol. v., which I take to be Ramsay's original, as he has borrowed the chorus—"O my bonnie Highland lad," &c. It consists of three stanzas, besides the chorus; and has humour in its composition—it is an excellent but somewhat licentious * song.—It begins

"As I cam o'er Cairney-Mount,
And down among the blooming heather,
[Kindly stood the milking-shiel,
To shelter frae the stormy weather.

O my bonnie Highland lad,
My winsome, weel-far'd Highland laddie;
Wha wad mind the wind and rain,
Sae weel row'd in his tartan plaidie?

Now Phœbus blinkit on the bent, [ing;
And o'er the knowes the lambs were bleat-
But he wan my heart's consent
To be his ain at the neist meeting.

O my bonnie Highland lad,
My winsome, weel-far'd Highland laddie;
Wha wad mind the wind and rain,
Sae weel row'd in his tartan plaidie?"

This air, and the common "Highland Laddie," seem only to be different sets.

Another "Highland Laddie," also in the "Museum," vol. v., is the tune of several Jacobite fragments. One of these old songs to it only exists, as far as I know, in these four lines:—

"WHARE hae ye been a' day,
Bonnie laddie, Highland laddie?
Down the back o' Bell's brae,
Courtin' Maggie, courtin' Maggie."

Another of this name is Dr. Arne's beautiful air, called the new "Highland Laddie."

[The following morceau was found in a memorandum-book belonging to Burns:

THE HIGHLANDER'S PRAYER, AT SHERRIFF-MUIR.

"O Lord, be thou with us; but, if thou be not with us, be not against us; but leave it between the red coats and us!"

The Gentle Swain.

To sing such a beautiful air to such execrable verses is downright prostitution of common sense! The Scots verses indeed are tolerable.

* [Burns is here too fastidious. We cannot, for the life of us, see any thing licentious in this sweet song, and we have accordingly given the whole of it.]

[The Scottish Version was written by Mr. Mayne, who likewise composed some beautiful verses to the tune of "Logan Water." It commences thus:—

JEANNY'S heart was frank and free,
And woovers she had mony yet,
Her sang was aye I fa' I see
Commend me to my Johnnie yet.
For air and late, he has sic a gate
To mak a body cheery, that
I wish to be, before I die,
His ain kind dearie yet.]

He stole my tender Heart away.

THIS is an Anglo-Scottish production, but by no means a bad one.

[The following is a specimen:—

"THE fields were green, the hills were gay,
And birds were singing on each spray,
When Colin met me in the grove,
And told me tender tales of love.
Was ever swain so blythe as he,
So kind, so faithful, and so free?
In spite of all my friends could say,
Young Colin stole my heart away."]

Fairest of the Fair.

It is too barefaced to take Dr. Percy's charming song, and, by means of transposing a few English words into Scots, to offer to pass it for a Scots song.—I was not acquainted with the Editor until the first volume was nearly finished, else, had I known in time, I would have prevented such an impudent absurdity.

[The verses of Percy are very beautiful—the following is a complete copy:—

I.

"O NANCY, wilt thou go with me,
Nor sigh to leave the flaunting town?
Can silent glens have charms for thee,
The lowly cot and russet gown?
No longer drest in silken sheen,
No longer deck'd with jewels rare,
Say, canst thou quit each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?"

II.

O Nancy, when thou'rt far away,
Wilt thou not cast a wish behind?
Say, canst thou face the parching ray,
Nor shrink before the wintry wind?
O can that soft and gentle mien
Extremes of hardship learn to bear;
Nor, sad, regret each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

III.

O Nancy! canst thou love so true,
Through perils keen with me to go,
Or when thy swain mishap shall rue,
To share with him the pang of woe?
Say, should disease or pain befall,
Wilt thou assume the nurse's care,
Nor wistful those gay scenes recal
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

IV.

And when at last thy love shall die,
Wilt thou receive his parting breath?
Wilt thou repress each struggling sigh,
And cheer with smiles the bed of death?
And wilt thou o'er his breathless clay
Strew flowers, and drop the tender tear,
Nor then regret those scenes so gay
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

This very lovely song is the composition of Bishop Percy, the well-known Editor of the Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, a man who has done more for English Literature than any other half-dozen antiquaries, and one who had the finest taste and the truest feeling for poetry. "This," writes Burns, "is perhaps the most beautiful ballad in the English language."]

The Blaithrie o't.*

THE following is a set of this song, which was the earliest song I remember to have got by heart. When a child, an old woman sung it to me, and I picked it up, every word, at first hearing.

'O WILLY, weel I mind, I lent you my hand
To sing you a song which you did me command;
But my memory's so bad, I had almost forgot
That you call'd it the gear and the blaithrie o't.

* ["Shame fall the gear and the blaithrie o't.," is the tune of an old Scottish song, spoken when a young handsome girl marries an old man, upon the account of his wealth.—Kelly's Scots Proverbs, p. 296.]

† [Menzie.—Retinue—Followers.]

I'll not sing about confusion, delusion, nor pride,
I'll sing about a laddie was for a virtuous bride;
For virtue is an ornament that time will never rot,
And preferable to gear and the blaithrie o't.—

Tho' my lassie hae nae scarlets nor silks to put on,
We envy not the greatest that sits upon the throne; [smoek,
I wad rather hae my lassie, tho' she cam in her
Than a princess wi' the gear and the blaithrie
o't.—

Tho' we hae nae horses nor menzie † at command, [hand;
We will toil on our foot, and we'll work wi' our
And when wearied without rest, we'll find it
sweet in any spot,
And we'll value not the gear & the blaithrie o't.

If we hae ony babies, we'll count them as lent;
Hae we less, hae we mair, we will aye be content; [but a groat
For they say they hae mair pleasure that wins
Than the miser wi' his gear and the blaithrie o't.

I'll not meddle wi' th' affairs o' the kirk or the queen; [let them swim;
They're nae matters for a sang, let them sink,
On your kirk I'll ne'er encroach, but I'll hold it still remote,
Sae tak this for the gear and the blaithrie o't."

May Ebe, or Kate of Aberdeen.

"KATE of Aberdeen" is, I believe, the work of poor Cunningham the player; of whom the following anecdote, though told before, deserves a recital. A fat dignitary of the church coming past Cunningham one Sunday, as the poor poet was busy plying a fishing-rod in some stream near Durham, his native country, his reverence reprimanded Cunningham very severely for such an occupation on such a day. The poor poet, with that inoffensive gentleness of manners which was his peculiar characteristic, replied, that he hoped God and his reverence would forgive his seeming profanity of that sacred day, "as he had no dinner to eat, but what lay at the bottom of that pool!" This, Mr. Woods, the player, who knew Cunningham well, and esteemed him much, assured me was true.

["Cunningham was a native of Dublin; an indifferent actor, a very pretty poet, and a very worthy man. He was unaffected in his manners, and quite a simpleton, as the following anecdote will shew. His volume of poems was dedicated to Garrick, whom in his admiration of theatrical talent he naturally esteemed the first man that ever existed. He trudged up to the metropolis to present his volume to this celebrated character. He saw him; and, according to his own phrase, he was treated by him in the most humiliating and scurvy manner imaginable. Garrick assumed a cold and stately air; insulted Cunningham by behaving to him as to a common beggar, and gave him a couple of guineas, accompanied with this speech:—"Players, Sir, as well as Poets, are always poor."

"The blow was too severe for the poet. He was so confused at the time that he had not the use of his faculties, and indeed never recollected that he ought to have spurned the offer with contempt, till his best friend, Mrs. Slack, of Newcastle, reminded him of it by giving him a sound box on the ear."—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

His fine song of "Kate of Aberdeen" is as follows:—

"THE silver moon's enamour'd beam
Steals softly through the night,
To wanton with the winding stream,
And kiss reflected light.
To beds of state go balmy sleep,
Where you've so seldom been,
Whilst I May's wakeful vigils keep
With Kate of Aberdeen!

The nymphs and swains, expectant, wait,
In primrose chaplets gay,
Till morn unbars her golden gate,
And gives the promis'd May.
The nymphs and swains shall all declare
The promis'd May, when seen,
Not half so fragrant, half so fair,
As Kate of Aberdeen!

I'll tune my pipe to playful notes,
And rouse yon nodding grove;
Till new-wak'd birds distend their throats,
And hail the maid I love.
At her approach, the lark mistakes,
And quits the new-dress'd green:
Fond bird! 'tis not the morning breaks;
Tis Kate of Aberdeen!

* [If the reader refers to the note to the Flower of Yarrow, he will there find that Sir Walter Scott states this song to have been written in honour of another lady, a Miss Mary Lillias Scott. In a copy of Cromek's Reliques of Burns there is the following note on this passage in Sir Walter Scott's hand-writing: "Miss Mary Lillias Scott was the eldest daughter of John Scott, of Harden, and well known, in the 'ashionable world, by the nick-name of Cadie Scott, I believe, because she went to a masqué ball in such a disguise. I remember her, an old lady, distinguished for elegant manners and high spirit, though struggling under the disadvantages of a narrow income, as her father's estate, being entailed on heirs male, went to another branch of the Harden family, then called the High Chester family. I have heard an hundred times, from those who lived at the period, that Tweed-side, and the song called Mary Scott, the Flower of Yarrow,

Now blithesome o'er the dewy mead,
Where elves disportive play;
The festal dance young shepherds lead,
Or sing their love-tun'd lay.
Till May, in morning robe, draws nigh,
And claims a Virgin Queen;
The nymphs and swains, exulting, cry,
Here's Kate of Aberdeen!"]

Tweed Side.

In Ramsay's Tea-table Miscellany, he tells us that about thirty of the songs in that publication were the works of some young gentlemen of his acquaintance; which songs are marked with the letters D. C. &c.—Old Mr. Tytler, of Woodhouselee, the worthy and able defender of the beautiful Queen of Scots, told me that the songs marked C, in the Tea-table, were the composition of a Mr. Crawford, of the house of Achname, who was afterwards unfortunately drowned coming from France.—As Tytler was most intimately acquainted with Allan Ramsay, I think the anecdote may be depended on. Of consequence, the beautiful Song of Tweed Side is Mr. Crawford's, and indeed does great honour to his poetical talents. He was a Robert Crawford; the Mary he celebrates was a Mary Stewart, of the Castle-Milk family,* afterwards married to a Mr. John Ritchie.

I have seen a song, calling itself the original Tweed Side, and said to have been composed by a Lord Yester. It consisted of two stanzas, of which I still recollect the first—

"WHEN Maggy and I was acquaint,
I carried my noddle fu' high;
Nae lintwhite on a' the green plain,
Nor gowdspink, sae happy as me:
But I saw her sae fair, and I lo'ed:
I woo'd, but I cam nae great speed;
So now I maun wander abroad,
And lay my banes far frae the Tweed.†

[Crawford's song is still popular, as well it deserves to be:—

were both written upon this much admired lady, and could add much proof on the subject, did space permit."—WALTER SCOTT.]

† [The following is the other stanza:—

To Maggy my love I did tell,
Saut tears did my passion express;
Alas! for I lo'ed her o'er well,
And the women lo'e sic a man less.
Her heart it was frozen and cauld,
Her pride had my ruin decreed;
Therefore I will wander abroad,
And lay my banes far frae the Tweed.

John, Lord Yester, second Marquis of Tweeddale, died in 1713. He possessed considerable poetic abilities.]

I.

WHAT beauties doth Flora disclose !
 How sweet are her smiles upon Tweed !
 Yet Mary's, still sweeter than those,
 Both nature and fancy exceed.
 Nor daisy, nor sweet blushing rose,
 Nor all the gay flowers of the field,
 Nor Tweed gliding gently through those,
 Such beauty and pleasure do yield.

II.

The warblers are heard in the grove,
 The linnet, the lark, and the thrush,
 The blackbird, and sweet cooing dove,
 With music enchant every bush.
 Come, let us go forth to the mead,
 Let us see how the primroses spring,
 We'll lodge in some village on Tweed,
 And love while the feather'd folks sing.

III.

How does my love pass the long day ?
 Does Mary not 'tend a few sheep ?
 Do they never carelessly stray,
 While happily she lies asleep ?
 Tweed's murmurs should lull her to rest,
 Kind nature indulging my bliss,
 To ease the soft pains of my breast,
 I'd steal an ambrosial kiss.

IV.

'Tis she does the virgin excel,
 No beauty with her may compare ;
 Love's graces around her do dwell,
 She's fairest, where thousands are fair.
 Say, charmer, where do thy flock stray ?
 Oh ! tell me at noon where they feed ;
 Is it on the sweet wending Tay,
 Or pleasanter banks of the Tweed ?]

The Poetic.

It appears evident to me that Oswald composed his Roslin Castle on the modulation of this air.*—In the second part of Oswald's, in the three first bars, he has either hit on a wonderful similarity to, or else he has entirely borrowed, the three first bars of the old air ; and the close of both tunes is almost exactly the same. The old verses to which it was sung, when I took down the notes from a country girl's voice, had no great merit.—The following is a specimen :—

THERE was a pretty May, † and a milkin' she went ; [hair ;
 Wi' her red rosy cheeks, and her coal black
 And she has met a young man a comin' o'er the bent,
 With a double and adieu to thee, fair May.

O where are ye goin', my ain pretty May,
 Wi' thy red rosy cheeks, and thy coal black hair ?
 Unto the yowes a milkin', kind sir, she says,
 With a double and adieu to thee, fair May.

What if I gang along wi' thee, my ain pretty
 May, [hair ;
 Wi' thy red rosy cheeks, and thy coal black
 Wad I be aught the warse o' that, kind sir,
 she says,
 With a double and adieu to thee, fair May.

Mary's Dream.

THE Mary here alluded to is generally supposed to be Miss Mary Macghee, daughter to the Laird of Airds, in Galloway. The Poet was a Mr. John Lowe, ‡ who likewise wrote ano-

* [We have already stated that Oswald was not the composer of Roslin Castle.]

† [May.—Maid—Young Woman.]

‡ [“Lowe was born at Kenmore in Galloway, in the year 1750. He was the eldest of a numerous family, and, after receiving the education common to the Scottish peasantry, was appointed to the occupation of a weaver. He however found means afterwards to obtain a regular education, in the course of prosecuting which he was employed as tutor in the family of Mr. M'Ghie of Airds. A young gentleman of the name of Miller, who had been engaged to Mary, one of Mr. M'Ghie's daughters, was at this period unfortunately lost at sea, which called forth Mr. Lowe's powers in that beautiful song, ‘Mary, weep no more for me,’ which alone makes his history an object of interest to the public.

“His views were directed to the church ; but seeing no prospect of a living, he determined to try his fortune in America, and for that country he embarked, in the year 1773, being invited as tutor to the family of a brother of General Washington. From this circumstance, he seems to have cherished hopes which were never realized. He kept for some time an academy for young gentlemen, in Fredericksburg, Virginia, and at length took orders in the Episcopal Church, obtained a living, and became eminently respectable for his talents, his learning, and his sociable and pleasant manners. An event, however, soon took place, which clouded the meridian of his life, and blasted his happiness for ever.

“While in the family of Airds he had become engaged to a sister of Mary, whom he has immortalized by his song, and, after he had been two years in America, he wrote to her in the most impassioned strains. He soon afterwards, however, became enamoured of a beautiful Virginian lady, and forgot his first love on the banks of the Ken. The lady, however, was deaf to all his addresses, and he had the mortification to see her bestowed on a more fortunate and deserving lover. At the same time, a sister of this lady became passionately fond of him ; and, in a moment of silly chagrin, he allowed himself to be united to her, merely, he said, from a principle of gratitude. Every propitious planet hid its head at the hour that made them one. She proved every thing that was bad : and Lowe soon saw in his wife an abandoned woman, totally regardless of his happiness, and unfaithful even to his bed. Overwhelmed with disappointment and shame, he had recourse to the miserable expedient of dissipating, or attempting to dissipate, at the bottle, the cares and chagrin that preyed upon his heart. Habits of intemperance were thus formed, which, with their usual attendants, poverty and disease, brought him to an untimely grave, in the 48th year of his age.

“The circumstances attending his death, as described by one of his friends, were truly distressing. “Perceiving his end drawing near, and wishing to die in peace, away from his own wretched walls, he mounted a sorry palfrey, and rode some distance to the house of a friend. So much was he debilitated that scarcely could he alight in the court and walk into the house. Afterwards he revived a little, and en-ther beautiful song, called Pompey's Ghost.— I have seen a poetic epistle from him in North America, where he now is, or lately was, to a lady in Scotland.—By the strain of the verses, it appeared that they allude to some love affair.

[Lowe's exquisite song of Mary's dream will do for his name what neither the Epistle, nor Pompey's Ghost, would of themselves accomplish. The following is a faithful transcript:—

“THE moon had climb'd the highest hill,
Which rises o'er the source of Dee,
And from the eastern summit shed
Her silver light on tow'r and tree :
When Mary laid her down to sleep,
Her thoughts on Sandy far at sea ;
When soft and low a voice was heard,
Saying, ' Mary, weep no more for me !'

She from her pillow gently rais'd
Her head, to ask who there might be ;
She saw young Sandy shivering stand,
With visage pale and hollow e'e :
O, Mary dear ! cold is my clay,
It lies beneath a stormy sea ;
Far, far from thee, I sleep in death,—
So, Mary, weep no more for me !

Three stormy nights and stormy days
We toss'd upon the raging main,
And long we strove our bark to save,
But all our striving was in vain.
Even then, when horror chill'd my blood,
My heart was fill'd with love for thee :
The storm is past, and I at rest,
So, Mary, weep no more for me !

O maiden dear, thyself prepare,
We soon shall meet upon that shore
Where love is free from doubt and care,
And thou and I shall part no more.
Loud crow'd the cock, the shadow fled,
No more of Sandy could she see ;
But soft the passing Spirit said,
' Sweet Mary, weep no more for me !' ”]

The Maid that tends the Goats.

BY MR. DUDGEON.

THIS Dudgeon is a respectable farmer's son in Berwick-shire.

joyed some hours of that vivacity which was peculiar to him. But this was but the last faint gleam of a setting sun : on the third day after his arrival at the house of his friend he breathed his last. He now lies buried near Fredericksburg, Virginia, under the shade of two palm trees, but not a stone is there on which to write ' Mary, weep no more for me.' ”

The abandoned woman, to whom he had so foolishly linked his fortune, made no inquiry after him for more than a month, when she sent for his horse, which had been previously sold to defray the expenses of his funeral.

Lowe was in his person very handsome. His figure was

[The song has an original air about it, which is very pleasing :—

I.

Up among yon cliffy rocks,
Sweetly rings the rising echo,
To the maid that tends the goats,
Lilting o'er her native notes.
Hark, she sings, Young Sandie's kind,
And he's promis'd ay' to lo'e me,
Here's a brooch, I ne'er shall tine,
Till he's fairly inarr'd to me.
Drive away, ye drone time,
And bring about our bridal day.

II.

Sandy herds a flock o' sheep,
Aften does he blaw the whistle,
In a strain sae vastly sweet,
Lam'ies list'ning dare na bleat,
He's as fleet 's the mountain roe,
Hardy as the highland heather,
Wading through the winter snow,
Keeping aye his flock together ;
But wi' plaid, and bare houghs,
He braves the bleakest northern blast.

III.

Brawly he can dance and sing,
Canty glee or Highland cronach :
Nane can ever match his fling,
At a reel, or round a ring ;
Wightly can he wield a rung,
In a brawl he's aye the baughter ;
A' his praise can ne'er be sung
By the langest winded sangster.
Sangs that sing o' Sandy,
Seem short, tho' they were e'er sae lang.]

I wish my Love were in a Mire.

I NEVER heard more of the words of this old song than the title.

[The old song commenced with these characteristic words :—

“ I WISH my love were in a mire,
That I might pu' her out again.”

The verses in the Museum are in a different active, well proportioned, and rather above the middle size. His hair was auburn, his eyes blue, and penetrating, his nose aquiline, and the whole expression of his countenance open and benevolent. These qualities, united to a lively and insinuating manner, made him a favourite with the fair sex. He was, however, in love, ' more susceptible than constant ; and one act of infidelity will, by some, be supposed to have been sufficiently punished by the subsequent misfortunes of his life.' ”

N. B. His first love on the banks of the Ken was, after his death, married to a respectable country gentleman, and was alive in 1810.' ”] strain : they are a translation from Sappho, by Ambrose Phillippis :—

“BLEST as the immortal gods is he,
The youth who fondly sits by thee ;
And hears and sees thee all the while,
So softly speak, and sweetly smile.

’Twas this bereav’d my soul of rest,
And rais’d such tumults in my breast,
For while I gaz’d, in transport toss’d,
My breath was gone, my voice was lost.

My bosom glow’d, the subtle flame
Ran quick thro’ all my vital frame ;
O’er my dim eyes a darkness hung,
My ears with hollow murmurs rung.

In dewy damps my limbs were chill’d ;
My blood with gentle horrors thrill’d ;
My feeble pulse forgot to play :
I fainted—sunk—and died away.”]

Allan Water.

THIS Allan Water, which the composer of the music has honoured with the name of the air, I have been told is Allan Water, in Strathallan.

[To Robert Crawford, of Auchnames, we are indebted for this beautiful song :—

I.

“WHAT numbers shall the muse repeat,
What verse be found to praise my Annie ;
On her ten thousand graces wait,
Each swain admires and owns she’s bonnie.
Since first she strode the happy plain,
She set each youthful heart on fire ;
Each nymph does to her swain complain,
That Annie kindles new desire.

II.

This lovely, darling, dearest care,
This new delight, this charming Annie,
Like summer’s dawn she’s fresh and fair,
When Flora’s fragrant breezes fan ye.
All day the am’rous youths convene,
Joyous they sport and play before her ;
All night, when she no more is seen,
In joyful dreams they still adore her.

III.

Among the crowd Amyntor came,
He look’d, he lov’d, he bow’d to Annie ;
His rising sighs express his flame,
His words were few, his wishes many.
With smiles the lovely maid reply’d,
Kind shepherd, why should I deceive ye ?
Alas ! your love must be deny’d,
This destin’d breast can ne’er relieve ye.

IV.

Young Damon came with Cupid’s art,
His wiles, his smiles, his charms beguiling ;
He stole away my virgin heart ;
Cease, poor Amyntor ! cease bewailing.
Some brighter beauty you may find ;
On yonder plain the nymphs are many ;
Then choose some heart that’s unconfin’d,
And leave to Damon his own Annie.]

There’s nae Luck about the House.

THIS is one of the most beautiful songs in the Scots, or any other, language.—The two lines,

“ And will I see his face again !
And will I hear him speak !”

as well as the two preceding ones, are unequalled almost by anything I ever heard or read ; and the lines,

“ The present moment is our ain,
The neist we never saw,”—

are worthy of the first poet. It is long posterior to Ramsay’s days. About the year 1771, or 72, it came first on the streets as a ballad ; and I suppose the composition of the song was not much anterior to that period.

[The author of this inimitable ballad was William Julius Mickle, Esq., a native of Langholm, and well known as the elegant translator of the “Luciad, and other Poems.” He was born in 1734, and died in 1788. As the first sketch of so beautiful a song is both curious and interesting, we subjoin a copy taken from the original MS. in the author’s own handwriting :—

THERE’S nae luck about the house,
There’s nae luck at a’ ;
There’s little pleasure in the house,
When our guidman’s awa.

And are you sure the news is true ;
And do you say he’s weel ?
Is this a time to speak of wark ?
Ye jades, lay by your wheel !
Is this a time to spin a thread,
When Colin’s at the door ?
Reach me my cloak, I’ll to the quay,
And see him come ashore.

And gie to me my bigonet,
My bishop’s satin gown,
For I maun tell the baillie’s wife
That Colin’s in the town.
My turken slippers maun gae on,
My stockings pearly blue ;
’Tis a’ to pleasure my guidman,
For he’s baith leal and true.

Rise, lass, and mak a clean fire-side,
 Put on the muckle pot;
 Gie little Kate her button gown,
 And Jock his Sunday coat;
 And mak their shoon as black as slaes,
 Their hose as white as snaw;
 'Tis a' to pleasure my guidnan,
 For he's been lang awa'.

There's twa fat hens upo' the coop,
 Been fed this month and mair;
 Mak haste and thraw their necks about,
 That Colin weel may fare;
 And mak the table neat and trim;
 Let every thing be braw;
 For who kens how my Colin far'd
 When he was far awa'.

Sae true his heart, sae smooth his speech,
 His breath like caller air,
*His very foot hath music in't,
 As he comes up the stair.
 And shall I see his face again,
 And shall I hear him speak?*
 I'm downright giddy wi' the thought,
 In truth I'm like to greet.

If Colin's weel, and weel content,
 I hae nae mair to crave;
 And gin I live to mak him sae,
 I'm blest aboon the lave.
 And shall I see his face again, &c.]

[The song is indeed a fine one; but one of the best verses was the work of Dr. Beattie.

Sae true his words, sae smooth his speech,
 His breath like caller air,
 His very foot has music in't
 When he comes up the stair;
 And will I see his face again!
 And will I hear him speak!
 I'm downright dizzy with the thought,
 In troth I'm like to greet.]

Tarry Woo.

THIS is a very pretty song; but I fancy that the first half-stanza, as well as the tune itself, are much older than the rest of the words.

[The first half stanza of the old version of Tarry Woo is as follows:—

O TARRY woo is ill to spin,
 Card it weel e'er ye begin;
 Card it weel and draw it sma',
 Tarry woo's the best of a'.

Cromek remarks that the thought contained in these two lines;—

"Who'd be a king can ony tell,
 When a shepherd sings sae well?"

Is an imitation of a verse in a fine old song, "The Miller," which serves to confirm the truth of Burns's observation on the age of "Tarry Woo." We subjoin a couple of stanzas of the modern version:—

Up, ye shepherds, dance and skip,
 O'er the hills and valleys trip,
 Sing up the praise of tarry woo',
 Sing the flocks that bear it too.
 Harmless creatures without blame,
 That clead the back, and cram the wame,
 Keep us warm and hearty fou;
 Leese me on the tarry woo.

How happy is the shepherd's life,
 Far frae courts, and free of strife,
 While the gimmers bleat and bae,
 And the lambkins answer "Mae!"
 No such music to his ear;
 Of thief or fox he has no fear:
 Sturdy Kent, and colly true,
 We'll defend the tarry woo.]

Gramachree.

THE song of Gramachree was composed by Mr. Poe, a counsellor at law in Dublin. This anecdote I had from a gentleman who knew the lady, the "Molly," who is the subject of the song, and to whom Mr. Poe sent the first manuscript of his most beautiful verses. I do not remember any single line that has more true pathos than

"How can she break the honest heart that wears her in its core!"

But as the song is Irish, it had nothing to do in this collection.

[The following are the words of this exquisite song, so eulogized by the Poet:—

As down on Banna's banks I stray'd,
 One evening in May,
 The little birds in blithest notes
 Made vocal every spray:
 They sang their little notes of love;
 They sang them o'er and o'er,
 Ah! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

The daisy pied, and all the sweets
 The dawn of nature yields;
 The primrose pale, the vi'let blue,
 Lay scatter'd o'er the fields;
 Such fragrance in the bosom lies
 Of her whom I adore,
 Ah! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

I laid me down upon a bank,
 Bewailing my sad fate,
 That doom'd me thus the slave of love,
 And cruel Molly's hate.
 How can she break the honest heart
 That wears her in its core !
 Ah ! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

You said you lov'd me, Molly dear ;
 Ah ! why did I believe ?
 Yes, who could think such tender words
 Were meant but to deceive ?
 That love was all I ask'd on earth,
 Nay Heav'n could give no more,
 Ah ! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

Oh ! had I all the flocks that graze,
 On yonder yellow hill ;
 Or low'd for me the num'rous herds,
 That yon green pastures fill ;
 With her I love I'd gladly share
 My kine and fleecy store,
 Ah ! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

Two turtle doves above my head,
 Sat courting on a bough ;
 I envy'd them their happiness,
 To see them bill and coo ;
 Such fondness once for me she shew'd,
 But now, alas ! 'tis o'er ;
 Ah ! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.

Then fare thee well, my Molly dear,
 Thy loss I still shall moan ;
 Whilst life remains in Strephon's heart,
 'Twill beat for thee alone.
 Tho' thou art false, may Heav'n on thee
 Its choicest blessings pour !
 Ah ! gramachree, mo challie nouge,
 Mo Molly Astore.]

The Collier's bonnie Lassie.

THE first half stanza is much older than the days of Ramsay.—The old words began thus :

"THE collier has a dochter, and, O, she's wonder bonnie ; [lands and money.
 A laird he was that sought her, rich baith in
 She wad nae hae a laird, nor wad she be a lady ; [daddie."—
 But she wad hae a collier, the colour o' her

[The verses in Johnson's Museum are pretty ; Allan Ramsay's songs have always nature to recommend them :—

I.

"THE Collier has a daughter,
 And O, she's wonder bonny !

A laird he was that sought her,
 Rich baith in land and money.
 The tutors watch'd the motion
 Of this young honest lover,
 But love is like the ocean ;
 Wha can its deeps discover ?

II.

He had the heart to please ye
 And was by a' respected,
 His airs sat round him easy,
 Genteel, but unaffected.
 The Collier's bonnie lassie,
 Fair as the new blown lillie,
 Aye sweet and never saucy,
 Secur'd the heart of Willie.

III.

He lov'd, beyond expression,
 The charms that were about her,
 And panted for possession,
 His life was dull without her.
 After mature resolving,
 Close to his breast he held her,
 In safest flames dissolving,
 He tenderly thus tell'd her—

IV.

'My bonnie Collier's daughter
 Let naething discompose ye,
 'Tis no your scanty tocher
 Shall ever gar me lose ye :
 For I have gear in plenty,
 And love says 'tis my duty
 To ware, what heaven has lent me,
 Upon your wit and beauty.'"]

My ain kind Dearie, O.

THE old words of this song are omitted here, though much more beautiful than these inserted ; which were mostly composed by poor Fergusson, in one of his merry humours. The old words began thus :

"I'LL rowe thee o'er the lea-rig,
 My ain kind dearie, O,
 I'll rowe thee o'er the lea-rig,
 My ain kind dearie, O,
 Altho' the night were ne'er sae wat,
 And I were ne'er sae weary, O ;
 I'll rowe thee o'er the lea-rig,
 My ain kind dearie, O.—"

[The verses of Fergusson are as follow :—

"NAE herds wi' kent, and collie there,
 Shall ever come to fear ye, O,
 But lav'rocks whistling in the air,
 Shall woo, like me, their dearie, O !

While others herd their lambs and ewes,
 And toil for world's gear, my jo,

Upon the lee my pleasure grows,
Wi' you, my kind dearie O!

Will ye gang o'er the lea rig,
My ain kind dearie, O!
And cuddle there sae kindly wi' me,
My kind dearie, O!

At thorny dike, and birkin tree,
We'll daff, and ne'er be weary, O!
They'll sing ill e'en frae you and me,
Mine ain kind dearie, O!

Mary Scott, the Flower of Yarrow.*

Mr. Robertson, in his statistical account of the parish of Selkirk, says, that Mary Scott, the Flower of Yarrow, was descended from the Dryhope, and married into the Harden, family. Her daughter was married to a predecessor of the present Sir Francis Elliot, of Stobbs, and of the late Lord Heathfield.

There is a circumstance in their contract of marriage that merits attention, and it strongly marks the predatory spirit of the times. The father-in-law agrees to keep his daughter for some time after the marriage; for which the son-in-law binds himself to give him the profits of the first Michaelmas moon.†

Allan Ramsay's version is as follows:—

I.

HAPPY'S the love which meets return,
When in soft flame souls equal burn;
But words are wanting to discover
The torments of a hapless lover.
Ye registers of heaven, relate,
If looking o'er the rolls of fate,
Did you there see me mark'd to marrow,
Mary Scott, the flow'r of Yarrow?

II.

Ah, no! her form's too heav'nly fair,
Her love the gods alone must share;
While mortals with despair explore her,
And at a distance due adore her.
O, lovely maid! my doubts beguile,
Revive and bless me with a smile:
Alas, if not, you'll soon debar a'
Sigling swain on the banks of Yarrow.

III.

Be hush, ye fears, I'll not despair,
My Mary's tender as she's fair;

* MARY SCOTT.

Traditionary Set.

MARY'S red and MARY'S white,
And MARY she's the king's delight,
The king's delight and the prince's marrow,
MARY SCOTT, the flower of Yarrow.

When I look east my heart grows sair,
But when I look west it's mair and mair,

Then I'll go tell her all mine anguish,
She is too good to let me languish;
With success crown'd, I'll not envy
The folks who dwell above the sky;
When Mary Scott's become my marrow,
We'll make a paradise of Yarrow.

[“Near the lower extremity of St. Mary's Lake (a beautiful sheet of water, forming the reservoir from which the Yarrow takes its source), are the ruins of Dryhope tower, the birth-place of Mary Scott, daughter of Philip Scott of Dryhope, and famous by the traditional name of the Flower of Yarrow. She was married to Walter Scott, of Harden, no less renowned for his depredations, than his bride for her beauty. Her romantic appellation was, in latter days, with equal justice, conferred on Miss Mary Lillias Scott, the last of the elder branch of the Harden family. I well remember the talent and spirit of the latter Flower of Yarrow, though age had then injured the charms which procured her the name: and that the words usually sung to the air of ‘Tweed-Side,’ beginning, were composed in her honour.”—SIR WALTER SCOTT—Notes to Marmion—Second Canto.

‘What beauties doth Flora disclose,’

In the copy of ‘Cromek's Reliques,’ previously referred to, is the following note by Sir Walter Scott:—“I may add, for the satisfaction of the ingenious and pains-taking illustrator, that the facts could not but be well-known to me as living in the closest intimacy with the Harden family, and being descended from their eldest cadet, Scott of Raeburn.”]

Down the Burn, Davie.

I HAVE been informed that the tune of “Down the Burn, Davie,” was the composition of David Maigh, keeper of the blood slough hounds, belonging to the Laird of Riddell, in Tweeddale.

[Honest David has made us his debtor for a very pretty air: the words are by William Crawford. Burns tried, but very unsuccessfully, to diminish the warmth of this tender song.

And when I look to the banks o' Yarrow,
I mind me o' my winsome marrow.

Now she's gone to Edinbro' town
To buy braw ribbons to tie her gown,
She's bought them braid and laid them narrow,
MARY SCOTT'S the flower o' Yarrow.

† [The time when the moss-troopers and cattle-drivers on the borders began of yore their nightly depredations.]

“WHEN trees did bud, and fields were green,
 And broom bloom'd fair to see ;
 When Mary was complete fifteen,
 And love laugh'd in her e'e ;
 Blythe Davie's blinks her heart did move,
 To speak her mind thus free,
 ‘Gang down the burn, Davie, love,
 And I shall follow thee.’

Now Davie did each lad surpass
 That dwalt on yon burn side,
 And Mary was the bonniest lass,
 Just meet to be a bride ;
 Her cheeks were rosy, red and white,
 Her een were bonnie blue ;
 Her looks were like Aurora bright,
 Her lips like dropping dew.

As down the burn they took their way,
 What tender tales they said !
 His cheek to hers he aft did lay,
 And with her bosom play'd ;
 Till baith at length impatient grown,
 To be mair fully blest,
 In yonder vale they lean'd them down—
 Love only saw the rest.

What pass'd, I guess, was harmless play,
 And naething sure unmeet ;
 For ganging hame, I heard them say,
 They lik'd a walk sae sweet ;
 And that they aften should return
 Sic pleasure to renew.
 Quoth Mary, ‘Love, I like the burn,
 And aye shall follow you.’”]

Blink o'er the Burn, Sweet Bettie.*

THE old words, all that I remember, are,—
 “BLINK over the burn, sweet Betty,
 It is a cauld winter night ;
 It rains, it hails, it thunders,
 The moon she gies nae light :

* [The old set of the words are these :

I.

In summer I maw'd my meadow,
 In hairst I shure the corn,
 In winter I married a widow,
 I wish she were dead the morn.

CHORUS.

Blink over the burn, sweet Betty,
 Blink over the burn to me ;
 I would gie a' I had in the world
 But to be a widow for thee.

II.

The youth he was wampin' and wandy,
 The lassie was quite fu' o' glee ;
 And aye, as she cried to the laddie,
 Come down bonny Tweed-side to me.

III.

Come meet me again ne'er to sever,
 Come meet me where naebody can see,
 I canna think ye'e a deceiver,
 And mean but to lichtlie me.

It's a' for the sake o' sweet Betty,
 That ever I tint my way ;
 Sweet, let me lie beyond thee
 Until it be break o' day.—

O, Betty will bake my bread,
 And Betty will brew my ale,
 And Betty will be my love,
 When I come over the dale ;
 Blink over the burn, sweet Betty,
 Blink over the burn to me,
 And while I hae life, dear lassie,
 My ain sweet Betty thou's be.”

The Blithesome Bridal.

I FIND the “Blithesome Bridal” in James Watson's collection of Scots Poems printed at Edinburgh, in 1706. This collection, the publisher says, is the first of its nature which has been published in our own native Scots dialect—it is now extremely scarce.†

[The inimitable “Blithesome Bridal” is rather too long for quotation ; and who would venture to describe it? There is singular ease of expression and great force of graphic delineation. The witty catalogue of guests, and the humorous list of dinner dishes, are only equalled by Smollett's entertainment in the manner of the ancients. There is a maritime savour about the feast, which inclines one to think that it was spread somewhere on the sea-coast. For the guests take the following verses :—

COME, fye, let us a' to the wedding,
 For there will be liting there,
 For Jock will be married to Maggie,
 The lass wi' the gowden hair,
 And there will be lang kail and castocks,
 And bannocks o' barley-meal ;

“Come o'er the bourn, Betty, to me ;
 Her boat hath a leak,
 And she must not speak,
 Why she dares not come over to thee.”

Blink over the burn, sweet Betty,
 Blink over the burn to me ;
 I would gie a' I had in the world,
 But to be a widow for thee.

This must also have been an English song.—See Lear, Act 3, Scene vi.]

† [“There is a tradition in our country that Sir William Scott, of Thirlstane, was the author of this inimitably droll song, and that he once sung it at an assembly in London. The English nobility were so tickled by it that they requested to hear it again ; but Scott, feeling that it would not bear explanations, respectfully declined complying. They sent a deputation of young ladies to him, who kneeled and begged to have the song over again ; but he was obliged to remain obstinate. I asked Lord Napier if he knew this song to be his predecessor's? He doubted it, and thought that a copy of it having been found inserted among some of that knight's own compositions had given rise to the tradition.”—THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

“The author was Francis Sempill of Beltrees.”—MOTHERWELL.]

And there will be guid saut herring,
To relish a cog o' guid ale.

And there will be Sandy the sutor,
And Will wi' the meikle mou,
And there will be Tam the blutter,
With Andrew the tinkler, I trow;
And there will be bow-legg'd Robbie,
With thumbless Katie's gudeman,
And there will be blue cheek'd Dobbie,
And Laurie, the laird of the land.

And there will be sow-libber Patie,
And plookie-fac'd Wat i' the mill;
Capper-nos'd Francis and Gibbie,
That wons i' the howe o' the hill;
And there will be Alistair Sibbie,
Wha in wi' black Bessie did mool,
With snivelling Lillie and Tibbie,
The lass that stands aft on the stool.

The dishes were not unworthy of the bridal party—

And there will be fadges and brochan,
Wi' routh o' gude gabbocks o' skate;
Powsowdie and drammock and crowdie,
And caller nowt feet on a plate;
And there will be partans and buckies,
And whittings and speldings anew;
With singed sheep heads and a haggis,
And scadlips to sup till ye spew.

And there will be lapper'd milk kebbuck,
And sowens, and carles, and laps;
With swats and well-scraped paunches,
And brandy in stoups and in caps;
And there will be meal-kail and porrage,
Wi' skirk to sup till ye reve,
And roasts to roast on a brander,
Of flewks that were taken alive.

Scrapt haddock, wilks, dulse, and tangle,
And a mill o' guid snishing to prie,
When weary wi' eating and drinking,
We'll rise up and dance till we die;
Then fie let 's a' to the bridal,
For there will be liting there,
For Jock 'll be married to Maggie,
The lass wi' the gowden hair.

* ["James Tytler was the son of a country clergyman in the presbytery of Brechin, and brother to Dr. Tytler, the translator of Callimachus. He was instructed by his father in classical learning and school divinity, and attained an accurate knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages, and an extensive acquaintance with biblical literature and scholastic theology. Having discovered an early predilection for the medical profession, he was put apprentice to a surgeon in Forfar, and afterwards sent to attend the medical classes at Edinburgh. While a medical student, he cultivated experimental chemistry and controversial theology with equal assiduity. Unfortunately his religious opinions, not deemed orthodox, or Calvinistical, connected him with a society of Glassites, and involved him in a marriage with a member of that society, which terminated in a separation. He now settled in Leith, as an apothecary, depending on the patronage of his religious connections; but his separation from the

The authorship of this hearty old Scottish song has been claimed by the noble family of Napier for an ancestor who lived upon the border.

Lord Napier himself, in a letter to Mark Napier, dated Thirlestane, Dec. 15, 1831, says, "Sir William Scott was the author of that well known Scots song, 'Fye, let us a' to the bridal'—a better thing than Horace ever wrote. My authority was my father. Sir William Scott died in 1725.]"

John Hay's bonnie Lassie.

JOHN HAY'S "Bonnie Lassie" was daughter of John Hay, Earl or Marquis of Tweeddale, and the late Countess Dowager of Roxburgh. She died at Broomlands, near Kelso, some time between the years 1720 and 1740.

[The heroine of the song had store of charms, if we may put faith in the Muse:

"SHE'S fresh as the spring, and sweet as Aurora,
When birds mount and sing, bidding day a good-morrow;
The sward o' the mead, enamelled wi' daisies,
Look wither'd and dead when twinn'd of her
graces.
But if she appear where verdures invite her,
The fountains run clear, and flow'rs smell the sweeter;
'Tis heaven to be by when her wit is a flowing,
Her smiles and bright een set my spirits a glowing."

We may accept this as a picture of one of the noble beauties of the north a hundred years ago.]

The bonnie brucket Lassie.

THE first two lines of this song are all of it that is old. The rest of the song, as well as those songs in the "Museum" marked T., are the works of an obscure, tipping, but extraordinary body of the name of Tytler, commonly known by the name of Balloon Tytler,* from society, which happened soon after, with an unsteadiness that was natural to him, disappointed his expectations. When he ceased to be a Glassite he ceased not to be a firm believer in the Christian revelation, and a zealous advocate of genuine Christianity; but he never afterwards held communion with any denomination of Christians. The neglect of his business was the unavoidable consequence of his attention to religious dissensions; and having contracted debts to a considerable amount, he was obliged to remove to Berwick, and afterwards to Newcastle. In both places he was employed in preparing chemical medicines for the druggists; but the liberality of his employers being insufficient to preserve an increasing family from the evils of penury, he returned to Edinburgh, in the year 1772, in extreme poverty, and took refuge from the molestation of his creditors within the precincts of the sanctuary of Holyrood House, where debtors are privileged from arrests. At this period his wife his having projected a balloon : a mortal, who, though he drudges about Edinburgh as a common printer, with leaky shoes, a sky-lighted hat, and knee-buckles as unlike as George-by-the-grace-of-God, and Solomon-the-son-of-David ; yet that same unknown drunken mortal is author and compiler of three-fourths of Elliot's pompous Encyclopaedia Britannica, which he composed at half-a-guinea a week !

[The following verses will enable the reader to judge of the merits of Balloon Tytler :—

“ THE bonnie brucket lassie,
She's blue beneath the e'en ;
She was the fairest lassie
That danc'd on the green :
A lad he lo'ed her dearly,
She did his love return ;
But he his vows has broken,
And left her for to mourn.

' My shape,' says she, ' was handsome,
My face was fair and clean ;

deserted him and their five children, the youngest only six months old, and returned to her relations. He solaced himself for the privation of domestic happiness by composing a humorous ballad, entitled 'The Pleasures of the Abbey,' which was his first attempt in poetry. In a description of its inhabitants, the author himself is introduced in the 16th and 17th stanzas. In the avocation of an author by profession, which he was now compelled to assume, he displayed a versatility of talent, and a facility in writing, unexampled in the transactions of the press. He commenced his literary career by a publication entitled 'Essays on the most important Subjects of natural and revealed Religion,' which issued from the asylum of debtors under the peculiar circumstances of being composed, by himself, at the printing case, from his own conceptions, without a manuscript before him, and wrought off at a press of his own construction, by his own hands. He left this singular work, which was to be completed in two volumes, 8vo., unfinished, and turned aside, to attack the opinions of a new religious sect, called the Bereans, in 'A Letter to Mr. John Barclay on the Doctrine of Assurance,'—in which he again performed the functions of author, compositor, and pressman. He next sent forth, with such assistance as he could find, a monthly publication, entitled 'The Gentleman and Lady's Magazine,' which was soon abandoned for 'The Weekly Review,'—a literary miscellany which, in its turn, was discontinued in a very short time. These publications, unavoidably disfigured with many typographical deformities, made him known to the booksellers ; and from them he afterwards found constant employment in compilations, abridgments, translations, and miscellaneous essays. He now ventured to leave the miserable apartments which he had long occupied in the sanctuary for debtors, for more comfortable lodgings, first at Restalrig, and afterwards in the city ; and, if his prudence and steadiness had been equal to his talents and industry, he might have earned by his labours a complete maintenance, which never fell to his lot. As he wrote for subsistence, not from the vanity of authorship, he was engaged in many works which were anonymous, and in others which appeared with the names of his employers. He is editor, or author, of the following works : 'The Weekly Mirror,' a periodical publication which began in 1780 ; 'A System of Geography,' in 8vo. ; 'A History of Edinburgh,' 12mo. ; 'A Geographical, Historical, and Commercial Grammar,' 2 vols., 8vo. ; 'A Review of Ditchken's Theory of Inflammation,' 12mo., with a practical dedication ; 'Remarks on Mr. Pinkerton's Introduction to the History of Scotland,' 8vo. ; 'A Poetical Translation of Virgil's Eclogues,' 4to. ; 'A general Index to the Scots Magazine ;' 'A System of Chemistry,' written at the expense of a gentleman who was to put his name to it, unpublished. He gave his assistance in preparing the System of Anatomy published by A. Bell, and was an occasional contributor to the 'Medical Commen-

But now I'm bonnie brucket,
And blue beneath the een ;
My eyes were bright and sparkling,
Before that they turn'd blue ;
But now they're dull with weeping,
And a', my love, for you.

O could I live in darkness,
Or hide me in the sea,
Since my love is unfaithful,
And has forsaken me.
No other love I suffer'd
Within my breast to dwell ;
In nought have I offended,
But loving him too well.'

Her lover heard her mourning,
As by he chanc'd to pass ;
And press'd unto his bosom
The lovely brucket lass.
' My dear,' said he, ' cease grieving,
Since that your love is true,
My bonny brucket lassie,
I'll faithful prove to you.'"]

aries,' and other periodical publications of the time. He was the principal editor of the 2nd edition of the 'Encyclopaedia Britannica,' and finished, with incredible labour, a large proportion of the more considerable scientific treatises and histories, and almost all the minor articles. He had an apartment assigned him in the printing-house, where he performed the offices of compiler and corrector of the press at a salary of sixteen shillings a week ! When the third edition was undertaken, he was engaged as a stated contributor, upon more liberal terms, and wrote a larger share in the early volumes than is ascribed to him in the general preface. It was his misfortune to be continually drawn aside from the business of his employers by the delight he took in prosecuting experiments in chemistry, electricity, and mechanics, which consumed a large portion of his time and money. He conducted for some time, with success, a manufacturing process, of which he was the inventor ; but after he had disclosed his secret to the gentleman at whose expense it was carried on, he was dismissed, without obtaining either a share in the business, or a suitable compensation for his services. He was the first in Scotland who adventured in a fire-balloon, constructed upon the plan of Montgolfier. He ascended from Comely Garden, Edinburgh, amidst the acclamations of an immense multitude, and descended at a distance of a quarter of a mile, owing to some unforeseen defect in the machinery. The failure of this adventure deprived him of the public favour and applause, and increased his pecuniary difficulties. He again had recourse to his pen for subsistence, and, amidst the drudgery of writing, and the cares which pressed upon him daily, he exhilarated his spirits, at intervals, with a tune on the Irish Bagpipe, which he played with much sweetness, interposing occasionally a song of his own composition, sung with great animation. A solace of this kind was well suited to the simplicity of his manners, the modesty of his disposition, and the integrity of his character, such as they were before he suffered his social propensities to violate the rules of sobriety. Forgetting his old friends, he associated with discontented persons, and entered into a deliberate exposition of the abuses of government in 'A Pamphlet on the Excise,' and more systematically in a periodical publication, entitled 'The Historical Register,' which gratified malignity by personal invective and intemperance of language. He was concerned in the wild irrational plans of the British convention, and published 'A Handbill addressed to the People,' written in so inflammatory a style as rendered him obnoxious to government. A warrant was issued to apprehend him, and he left his native country and crossed the Atlantic for America, where he fixed his residence in the town of Salem, in the state of Massachusetts, where he established a newspaper in connection with a printer, which he continued till his death, which happened in the year 1805, in the 56th year of his age.'—CHROMER.]

Sae merry as we twa ha'e been.

THIS song is beautiful.—The chorus in particular is truly pathetic. I never could learn any thing of its author.

CHORUS.

“SAE merry as we twa ha'e been,
Sae merry as we twa ha'e been;
My heart it is like for to break,
When I think on the days we ha'e seen.”

[We owe this song to the industry of Herd : the first line of the chorus gave the name to the air two hundred years ago.

“A lass that was laden with care
Sat heavily under a thorn ;
I listen'd awhile for to hear,
When thus she began for to mourn :
Whene'er my dear shepherd was there,
The birds did melodiously sing,
And cold nipping winter did wear
A face that resembled the spring.

Our flocks feeding close by his side,
He gently pressing my hand,
I view'd the wide world in its pride,
And laugh'd at the pomp of command.
'My dear,' he would oft to me say,
'What makes you hard-hearted to me ?
Oh ! why do you thus turn away
From him who is dying for thee ?'

But now he is far from my sight,
Perhaps a deceiver may prove,
Which makes me lament day and night,
That ever I granted my love.
At eve, when the rest of the folk
Were merrily seated to spin,
I set myself under an oak,
And heavily sigh'd for him.”]

The Banks of Forth.

THIS air is Oswald's.

[“Here's anither—it's no a Scots tune, but it passes for ane—Oswald made it himsel, I reckon. He has cheated mony a ane, but he canna cheat Wandering Willie.”—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

The song in the Museum is a charming one :—

YE sylvan powers that rule the plain,
When sweetly winding Fortha glides,
Conduct me to those banks again,
Since there my charming Mary bides.

Those banks that breathe their vernal sweets,
Where ev'ry smiling beauty meets ;
Where Mary's charms adorn the plain,
And cheer the heart of ev'ry swain.

Oft in the thick embow'ring groves,
Where birds their music chirp aloud,
Alternately we sung our loves,
And Fortha's fair meanders view'd.

The meadows wore a gen'ral smile,
Love was our banquet all the while ;
The lovely prospect charm'd the eye,
To where the ocean met the sky.

Once on the grassy bank reclin'd
Where Forth ran by in murmurs deep,
It was my happy chance to find
The charming Mary lull'd asleep ;

My heart then leap'd with inward bliss,
I softly stoop'd, and stole a kiss ;
She wak'd, she blush'd, and gently blam'd,
'Why, Damon ! are you not asham'd ?'

Ye sylvan pow'rs, ye rural gods,
To whom we swains our cares impart,
Restore me to those blest abodes,
And ease, oh ! ease my love-sick heart !

Those happy days again restore,
When Mary and I shall part no more ;
When she shall fill these longing arms,
And crown my bliss with all her charms.”]

The Bush aboon Traquair.

THIS is another beautiful song of Mr. Crawford's composition. In the neighbourhood of Traquair, tradition still shews the old “Bush ;” which, when I saw it in the year 1787, was composed of eight or nine ragged birches. The Earl of Traquair has planted a clump of trees near by, which he calls “The new Bush.”

[Crawford's songs were long and justly popular : “The Bush aboon Traquair” is still a favourite.

“HEAR me, ye nymphs, and every swain,
I'll tell how Peggy grieves me ;
Tho' thus I languish and complain,
Alas ! she ne'er believes me.
My vows and sighs, like silent air,
Unheeded never move her ;
The bonny bush aboon Traquair,
Was where I first did love her.

That day she smil'd and made me glad,
No maid seem'd ever kinder ;
I thought mysel' the luckiest lad,
So sweetly there to find her.

I tri'd to sooth my am'rous flame
 In words that I thought tender ;
 If more there pass'd, I'm not to blame,
 I meant not to offend her."

Yet now she scornful flees the plain,
 The fields we then frequented ;
 If e'er we meet, she shows disdain,
 She looks as ne'er acquainted.
 The bonny bush bloom'd fair in May,
 Its sweets I'll aye remember ;
 But now her frowns make it decay ;
 It fades as in December.

Ye rural pow'rs, who hear my strains,
 Why thus should Peggy grieve me ?
 Oh ! make her partner in my pains ;
 Then let her smiles relieve me.
 If not, my love will turn despair,
 My passion no more tender ;
 I'll leave the bush aboon Traquair,
 To lonely wilds I'll wander.

"The Bush aboon Traquair," "The Broom o' the Cowden-knowes ;" "The Birks of Aberfeldy," and "The Birks of Invermay," continue to supply the curious with snuff-boxes and drinking-cups.]

Cromlet's Lilt.

THE following interesting account of this plaintive dirge was communicated to Mr. Riddel by Alexander Fraser Tytler, Esq., of Woodhouselee.

"In the latter end of the 16th century, the Chisholms were proprietors of the estate of Cromlecks (now possessed by the Drummonds). The eldest son of that family was very much attached to the daughter of Stirling of Ardoch, commonly known by the name of Fair Helen of Ardoch.

"At that time the opportunities of meeting between the sexes were more rare, consequently more sought after than now; and the Scottish ladies, far from priding themselves on extensive literature, were thought sufficiently book-learned if they could make out the Scriptures in their mother tongue. Writing was entirely out of the line of female education. At that period the most of our young men of family sought a fortune, or found a grave in France. Cromleck, when he went abroad to the war, was obliged to leave the management of his correspondence with his mistress to a lay-brother of the monastery of Dumblain, in the immediate neighbourhood of Cromleck, and near Ardoch. This man, unfortunately, was deeply sensible of Helen's charms. He artfully prepossessed her with stories to the disadvantage of Cromleck; and, by misinterpreting or keeping up the letters and messages intrusted to his care, he entirely irritated both. All connexion was broken off betwixt them: Helen was inconsolable, and Cromleck has left behind him, in the ballad called 'Cromlet's Lilt,' a proof of the elegance of his genius, as well as the steadiness of his love.

"When the artful monk thought time had sufficiently softened Helen's sorrow, he proposed himself as a lover: Helen was obdurate; but at last, overcome by the persuasions of her brother, with whom she lived, and who, having a family of thirty-one children, was probably very well pleased to get her off his hands—she submitted rather than consented to the ceremony; but there her compliance ended; and, when forcibly put into bed, she started quite frantic from it, screaming out, that after three gentle raps on the wainscot, at the bed-head, she heard Cromleck's voice, crying, 'O Helen, Helen, mind me!' Cromleck soon after coming home, the treachery of the confidant was discovered—her marriage annulled—and Helen became Lady Cromleck."

N.B. Marg. Murray, mother to these thirty-one children, was daughter of Murray of Strewn, one of the seventeen sons of Tullybardine, and whose youngest son, commonly called the Tutor of Ardoch, died in the year 1715, aged 111 years.

[The proper name of this ancient Scottish song is "Cromleck's Lilt."

The following is a complete copy of this affecting ballad, as given in the Museum:—

CROMLECK'S LILT.

I.

"SINCE all thy vows, false maid,
 Are blown to air
 And my poor heart betray'd
 To sad despair,

Into some wilderness,
 My grief I will express,
 And thy hard-heartedness,
 O cruel fair!

II.

Have I not graven our loves
 On even tree,
 In yonder spreading groves,
 Tho' false thou be:

Was not a solemn oath
 Plighted betwixt us both—
 Thou thy faith, I my troth,
 Constant to be.

III.

Some gloomy place I'll find,
 Some doleful shade,
 Where neither sun nor wind
 E'er entrance had:

Into that hollow cave,
There will I sigh and rave,
Because thou dost behave
So faithlessly.

IV.

Wild fruit shall be my meat,
I'll drink the spring,
Cold earth shall be my seat;
For covering,
I'll have the starry sky
My head to canopy,
Until my soul on high
Shall spread its wing.

V.

I'll have no funeral fire,
Nor tears for me;
No grave do I desire
Nor obsequie.
The courteous red-breast he
With leaves will cover me,
And sing my elegy,
With doleful voice

VI.

And when a ghost I am
I'll visit thee,
O thou deceitful dame,
Whose cruelty
Has killed the fondest heart
That e'er felt Cupid's dart,
And never can desert
From loving thee.]

My Dearie, if thou die.

ANOTHER beautiful song of Crawford's.

[Who the Peggy was of whose charms Crawford sung so sweetly, no one has told us.

“LOVE never more shall give me pain,
My fancy's fix'd on thee,
Nor ever maid my heart shall gain,
My Peggy, if thou die.
Thy beauty doth such pleasure give,
Thy love's so true to me,
Without thee I can never live,
My dearie, if thou die.

* [These four lines evidently refer to the fine old ballad—“The Babes in the Wood,” which must have been written in the time of James VI. The corresponding lines in the old ballad being:—

No burial those pretty babes
Of any man receives,
But Robin red-breast painfully
Did cover them with leaves.]

† [Francis Sempill of Belltrees was the author of this song. He was a grandson of Sir James Sempill, the ambassador to Queen Elizabeth, in the reign of James VI. The Sempills were a poetical family for three generations.]

If fate shall tear thee from my breast,
How shall I lonely stray?
In dreary dreams the night I'll waste,
In sighs, the silent day.
I ne'er can so much virtue find,
Nor such perfection see;
Then I'll renounce all woman-kind,
My Peggy, after thee.

No new-blown beauty fires my heart,
With Cupid's raving rage;
But thine, which can such sweets impart,
Must all the world engage.
'Twas this that like the morning sun,
Gave joy and life to me;
And when its destin'd day is done,
With Peggy let me die.

Ye pow'rs, that smile on virtuous love,
And in such pleasure share;
You who its faithful flames approve,
With pity view the fair:
Restore my Peggy's wonted charms,
Those charms so dear to me!
Oh! never rob them from these arms!
I'm lost if Peggy die.”]

She rose and let me in.†

THE old set of this song, which is still to be found in printed collections, is much prettier than this; but somebody, I believe it was Ramsay, † took it into his head to clear it of some seeming indelicacies, and made it at once more chaste and more dull.

[The version in the Museum is as follows:—

“THE night her silent sables wore
And gloomy were the skies,
Of glittering stars appear'd no more
Than those in Nelly's eyes.
When to her father's door I came,
Where I had often been,
I begg'd my fair, my lovely dame,
To rise and let me in.

But she, with accents all divine,
Did my fond suit reprove,
And while she chid my rash design,
She but inflam'd my love.

[“This is an English song of great merit, and has been Scotified by the Scots themselves.”—RITSON.]

† [No, no; it was not Ramsay. The song still remains in his Tea-Table Miscellany, and the Orpheus Caledonius, and even in Herd's Collection, in its primitive state of indelicacy. The verses in the Museum were re-touched by an able and masterly hand, who has thus presented us with a song at once chaste and elegant, in which all the energetic force and beauty of the original are preserved, without a single idea to crimson the cheek of modesty, or to cause one pang to the innocent and feeling heart.—STENHOUSE.]

Her beauty oft had pleas'd before,
While her bright eyes did roll ;
But virtue only had the pow'r
To charm my very soul.

These who would cruelly deceive,
Or from such beauty part !
I lov'd her so, I could not leave
The charmer of my heart.
My eager fondness I obey'd,
Resolv'd she should be mine,
Till Hymen to my arms convey'd
My treasure so divine.

Now happy in my Nelly's love,
Transporting is my joy,
No greater blessing can I prove,
So blest a man am I.
For beauty may a while retain,
The conquer'd flatt'ring mart,
But virtue only is the chain
Holds, never to depart.

The following verses, after the first stanza,
are given by Allan Cunningham :—

“Fast lock'd within my close embrace,
She, trembling, stood asham'd—
Her swelling breast, and glowing face,
And every touch inflam'd,
With look and accents all divine
She did my warmth reprove,—
The more she spoke, the more she look'd,
The warmer wax'd my love.

Then, then, beyond expressing,
Transporting was the joy !
I knew no greater blessing,
So blest a man was I.
And she, all ravish'd with delight,
Bid me oft come again,
And kindly vow'd that every night
She'd rise and let me in.

Fu' soon, soon I return'd again
When stars were streaming free :
Oh ! slowly, slowly came she down
And stood and gaz'd on me :
Her lovely eyes with tears ran o'er,
Repenting her rash sin—
And aye she mourn'd the fatal hour
She rose and loot me in.

But who could cruelly deceive,
Or from such beauty part ?
I lov'd her so, I could not leave
The charmer of my heart :
We wedded, and I thought me blest,
Such loveliness to win ;
And now she thanks the happy hour
She rose to loot me in.”]

Will ye go to the Ewe-Bughts,*
Marion ?

I AM not sure if this old and charming air be of the South, as is commonly said, or of the North of Scotland. There is a song apparently as ancient as “Ewe-bughts, Marion,” which sings to the same time, and is evidently of the North—it begins thus :—

THE Lord o' Gordon had three dochters,
Mary, Marget, and Jean,
They wad na stay at bonnie Castle Gordon,
But awa to Aberdeen.

[The lover begins his courtship in a way very simple and effective.

Will ye go to the ewe-bughts, Marion,
And wear in the sheep wi' me ?
The sun shines sweet, my Marion,
But nae half sae sweet as thee.

O Marion's a bonnie lass,
And the blyth blinks in her e'e ;
And fain wad I marry Marion,
Gin Marion wad marry me.]

Lewis Gordon.

THIS air is a proof how one of our Scots tunes comes to be composed out of another. I have one of the earliest copies of the song, and it has prefixed,—

“Tune of Tarry Woo—”

of which tune a different set has insensibly varied into a different air.—To a Scots critic,
the pathos of the line,

“Tho' his back be at the wa',”

Must be very striking. It needs not a Jacobite prejudice to be affected with this song.

The supposed author of “Lewis Gordon” was a Mr. Geddes, priest, at Shenval, in the Ainzie.

OH ! send Lewie Gordon hame,
And the lad I maunna name ;
Tho' his back be at the wa',
Here's to him that's far awa' !
Oh hon ! my Highland man !
Oh, my bonny Highland man ;
Weel would I my true-love ken,
Amang ten thousand Highland men.

* [Sheep-folds.]

O! to see his tartan trews,
Bonnet blue, and laigh-heel'd shoes;
Philabeg aboon his knee;
That's the lad that I'll gang wi'!
Oh hon! &c.

The princely youth, that I do mean,
Is fitted for to be king,
On his breast he wears a star;
You'd take him for the god of war.
Oh hon! &c.

O! to see this princely one,
Seated on a royal throne!
Disasters a' would disappear,
Then begins the Jub'lee year!
Oh hon! &c.

Lord Lewis Gordon, younger brother to the Duke of Gordon, commanded a detachment for the Young Chevalier, in the affair of 1745-6, and acquitted himself with great gallantry and judgment. He died in 1754.]

The Wauking o' the Fauld.

THERE are two stanzas still sung to this tune, which I take to be the original song whence Ramsay composed his beautiful song of that name in the Gentle Shepherd. It begins

“O will ye speak at our town,
As ye come frae the fauld, &c.”

I regret that, as in many of our old songs, the delicacy of this old fragment is not equal to its wit and humour.*

[The version of Allan Ramsay is as follows:—

My Peggie is a young thing,
Just enter'd in her teens;
Fair as the day, and sweet as May,
Fair as the day, and always gay.
My Peggie is a young thing,
And I'm not very auld;
Yet well I like to meet her at
The wauking o' the fauld.

My Peggy speaks sae sweetly,
Whene'er we meet alane;
I wish nae mair to lay my care,
I wish nae mair of a' that's rare.

* [There is a far older set of this song than this which Burns speaks of; it is perfectly modest, though not very poetical. The first stanza runs thus:—

COME all ye jolly shepherds
That lo'e the tarry woo,
Wha lo'e to wait upon the sheep:
An' tak delight the lambs to keep,
I'll tell ye how I met my love,
Upon an e'ning cauld,
When it was late, an' growing dark,
As I drew nigh the fauld.]

My Peggie speaks sae sweetly,
To a' the lave I'm cauld;
But she gars a' my spirits glow,
At wauking o' the fauld.

My Peggie smiles sae kindly,
Whene'er I whisper love,
That I look down on a' the town,
That I look down upon a crown.
My Peggie smiles sae kindly,
It makes me blythe and bauld;
And naething gies me sic delight
As wauking o' the fauld.

My Peggie sings sae saftly,
When on my pipe I play;
By a' the rest it is confess'd,
By a' the rest, that she sings best:
My Peggy sings sae saftly,
And in her sangs are tauld,
With innocence, the wale o' sense,
At wauking o' the fauld.]

Oh ono Chrio.†

DR. Blacklock informed me that this song was composed on the infamous massacre of Glencoe.‡

[OH! was not I a weary wight!
Maid, wife, and widow, in one night!
When in my soft and yielding arms,
O! when most I thought him free from harms.
Even at the dead time of the night,
They broke my bower, and slew my knight.
With ae lock of his jet black hair,
I'll tye my heart for evermair;
Nae sly-tongu'd youth, nor flatt'ring swain,
Shall e'er untie this knot again;
Thine still, dear youth, that heart shall be,
Nor pant for aught, save heaven and thee.]

F'll never leave thee.

THIS is another of Crawford's songs, but I do not think in his happiest manner. What an absurdity to join such names as Adonis and Mary together!

† [A vitiated pronunciation of “Ochoin och rie,” a Gaelic exclamation, generally expressive of deep sorrow and affliction, similar to that of Oh! my heart!]

‡ [For a particular account of this atrocious butchery, see Smollett, and other historians. It happened in 1691. Thirty-eight innocent and unsuspecting persons, including the chief of the clan, were inhumanly massacred in their beds, by a military party under Campbell of Glenlyon. Neither age, youth, nor sex, were spared in the dreadful carnage, and many, who escaped instant death, afterwards perished in the mountains, from the inclemency of the weather, from hunger, and fatigue.]

[One day I heard Mary say
How shall I leave thee,
Stay, dearest Adonis, stay,
Why wilt thou grieve me ?]

Corn-Rigs are bonnie.

ALL the old words that ever I could meet to this air were the following, which seem to have been an old chorus :—

O corn-rigs and rye-rigs,
O corn-rigs are bonnie ;
And where'er you meet a bonnie lass,
Preen up her cockernony.

[Ramsay wrote this song for the Gentle Shepherd.

My Patie is a lover gay,
His mind is never muddy :
His breath is sweeter than new hay,
His face is fair and ruddy.
His shape is handsome, middle size ;
He's stately in his walking ;
The shining o' his e'en surprise ;
'Tis heaven to hear him talking.

Last night I met him on the bawk,
Where yellow corn was growing ;
There mony a kindly word he spak,
That set my heart a-glowing.
He kiss'd, and vow'd he wad be mine,
And lo'ed me best of ony ;
That gars me like to sing sinsyne
" O corn-rigs are bonnie !"

Let maidens of a silly mind
Refuse what maist they're wanting ;
Since we for yielding are design'd,
We chastely should be granting :
Then I'll comply, and marry Pate,
And syne my cockernony,
He's free to touzle, air or late,
Where corn-rigs are bonnie.

Scraps of curious old song are scattered over all Scotland : here is a fragment concerning Corn-Rigs :—

" There was a piper had a cow,
An' he had nought to gie her ;
He took his pipes and play'd a tune,
And bade the cow consider.
The cow consider'd very well,
And gae the piper a penny
To play the same tune owre again,
Corn-rigs are bonnie."]

The Muckin' o' Geordie's Byre.

THE chorus of this song is old ; the rest is the work of Balloon Tytler.

[The following copy of a more modern song to this air possesses great humour ; it was written by the late Rev. T. Nicol, Minister of Inverleithing, Peebles-shire :—

MEG, muckin' at Geordie's byre,
Wrought as gin her judgment was wrang ;
Ilk daud o' the scartle strack fire,
While, loud as a lavrock she sang !
Her Geordie had promis'd to marrie,
An' Meg, a sworn fae to despair,
Not dreamin' the job could miscarrie,
Already seem'd mistress an' mair !

My neebours, she sang, aften jeer me,
And ca' me daft, halucket Meg,
An' say, they expect soon to hear me
I' the kirk, for my fun, get a fleg !
An' now 'bout my marriage they clatter,
An' Geordie, poor fallow ! they ca'
An auld dootit hav' rel !—Nae matter,
He'll keep me aye brankin an' brow !

I grant ye, his face is kenspeckle,
That his black beard is rough as a heckle,
That his mou' to his lug's rax'd about ;
But they needna let on that he's crazie,
His pike-staff wull ne'er let him fa' ;
Nor that his hair's white as a daisie,
For, fient a hair has he ava !

But a weel-penish'd mailin' has Geordie,
An' routh o' gude goud in his kist ;
An' if siller comes at my wordie,
His beautie, I never wull miss't !
Daft gouks, wha catch fire like tinder,
Think love-raptures ever wull burn !
But, wi' poortith, hearts het as a cinder
Wull cauld as an iceshogle turn !

There'll just be ae bar to my pleasure,
A bar that's aft fill'd me wi' fear.
He's sic a hard, near-be-gawn miser,
He likes his saul less than his gear !
But tho' I now flatter his failin',
An' swear nought wi' goud can compare,
Gude sooth ! it sall soon get a scailin' !
His bags sall be mouldy nae mair !

I dreamt that I rade in a chariot,
A flunkie ahint me in green ;
While Geordie cry'd out, he was harriet,
An' the saut tear was blindin' his een ;
But tho' 'gainst my spendin' he swear aye,
I'll hae frae him what ser's my turn ;
Let him slip awa whan he grows wearie,
Shame fa' me gin lang I wad mourn !

But Geordie, while Meg was haranguin',
Was cloutin' his breeks i' the bauks,
An' whan a' his failins she brang in,
His strang hazle pike-staff he tak's,—

Designin' to rex her a lounder,
He chanc'd on the ladder to slift,
An' down frae the bauks, flat's a flounder,
Flew, like a shot-starn frae the lift!

But Meg wi' the sight was quite haster'd,
An', nae doubt, was bannin' ill luck;
While the face o' poor Geordie was plaster'd,
An' his mou' was fill'd fu' wi' the muck!
Confound ye, cryd Geordie, an' spat out
The glaur that adown his beard ran;—
Preserve us! quo' Meg, as she gat out
The door,—an' thus lost a gudeman!]

Bide ye yet.

THERE is a beautiful song to this tune, beginning,

“Alas, my son, you little know—,”

which is the composition of Miss Jenny Graham, of Dumfries.

[The song which Burns commended is as follows:—

“ALAS! my son, you little know
The sorrows that from wedlock flow;
Farewell to every day of ease,
When you have got a wife to please.

Sae bide ye yet, and bide ye yet,
Ye little ken what's to betide ye yet;
The half of that will gane ye yet,
Gif a wayward wife obtain ye yet.

Your hopes are high, your wisdom small,
Woe has not had you in its thrall;
The black cow on your foot ne'er trod,
Which gars you sing along the road.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

Sometimes the rock, sometimes the reel,
Or some piece of the spinning-wheel,
She'll drive at you, my bonny chiel,
And send you headlang to the de'il.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

When I, like you, was young and free,
I valu'd not the proudest she;
Like you, my boast was bold and vain,
That men alone were born to reign.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

Great Hercules, and Sampson, too,
Were stronger far than I or you;
Yet they were baffled by their dears,
And felt the distaff and the shears.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

Stout gates of brass, and well-built walls,
Are proof 'gainst swords and cannon-balls;
But nought is found, by sea or land,
That can a wayward wife withstand.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

The authoress was a maiden lady; she lived to a good old age, and died of an asthma, the pain of which she alleviated in composing humorous Scottish songs. She was a fine dancer in her youth; a young nobleman was so much charmed with her graceful movements, and the music of her feet, that he enquired in what school she was taught. “In my mother's washing-tub,” was the answer.—CUNNINGHAM.

In the other pretty little ballad to this tune, there is as rich a vein of lively and innocent humour as is to be found in the whole compass of the Museum:—

GIN I had a wee house, and a canty wee fire,
A bonny wee wife to praise and admire,
A bonny wee yardie aside a wee burn,
Fareweel to the bodies that yammer and mourn!

Sae bide ye yet, and bide ye yet,
Ye little ken what may betide ye yet,
Some bonny wee body may be my lot,
And I'll aye be canty wi' thinking o't.

When I gang afield, and come hame at e'en,
I'll get my wee wife fu' neat and fu' clean,
And a bonnie wee bairnie up on her knee,
That will cry papa, or daddy, to me.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.

And if there should happen ever to be
A diff'rence between my wee wife and me,
In hearty good humour, altho' she be teaz'd,
I'll kiss her and clap her until she be pleas'd.

Sae bide ye yet, &c.]

HERE the remarks on the first volume of the Musical Museum conclude: the second volume has the following preface from the pen of Burns:—

“In the first volume of this work, two or three airs, not of Scots composition, have been inadvertently inserted; which, whatever excellence they may have, was improper, as the collection is solely to be the music of our own country. The songs contained in this volume, both music and poetry, are all of them the work of Scotsmen. Wherever the old words could be recovered, they have been preferred: both as suiting better the genius of the tunes, and to preserve the productions of those earlier sons of the Scottish muses, some of whose names deserved a better fate than has befallen them,—

'Buried 'midst the wreck of things which were.' Of our more modern songs, the Editor has inserted the author's names as far as he can ascertain them; and, as that was neglected in the first volume, it is annexed here. If he have made any mistakes in this affair, which he possibly may, he will be very grateful at being set right.

"Ignorance and prejudice may perhaps affect to sneer at the simplicity of the poetry or music of some of these poems; but their having been for ages the favourites of nature's judges—the common people,—was to the Editor a sufficient test of their merit. Edinburgh, March 1, 1788."

Tranent-Muir.

"TRANENT-MUIR" was composed by a Mr. Skirving, a very worthy, respectable farmer near Haddington.* I have heard the anecdote often, that Lieut. Smith, whom he mentions in the ninth stanza, came to Haddington after the publication of the song, and sent a challenge to Skirving to meet him at Haddington, and answer for the unworthy manner in which he had noticed him in his song. "Gang away back," said the honest farmer, "and tell Mr. Smith that I hae nae leisure to come to Haddington; but tell him to come here, and I'll tak a look o' him, and if he think I'm fit to fecht him, I'll fecht him; and if no, I'll do as he did—I'll rin awa."—

[Stanza ninth, as well as tenth, to which the anecdote refers, shews that the anger of the Lieutenant was any thing but unreasonable.

"And Major Bowle, that worthy soul,
Was brought down to the ground, man;
His horse being shot, it was his lot,
For to get mony a wound, man;
Lieutenant Smith, of Irish birth,
Frae whom he call'd for aid, man,
Being full of dread, lap o'er his head,
And wadna be gainsaid, man!

He made sic haste, sae spurr'd his baist,
'Twas little there he saw, man:
To Berwick rade, and falsely said,
The Scots were rebels a', man;
But let that end, for well 'tis kenn'd,
His use and wont to lie, man;
The teague is naught, he never faught,
When he had room to flee, man."

The song and the story of the challenge went long hand in hand: the latter usually ushered in the former.]

* [Mr. Skirving was tenant of East Garleton, about a mile and a half to the north of Haddington.]

Polwart on the Green.

THE author of "Polwart on the Green" is Capt. John Drummond M'Gregor, of the family of Bochalddie.

[This is one of the songs of which Sir Walter Scott says the authorship ascribed by Burns might be questioned. In the traditions of the muse, Scott will generally be found correct: his decisions were the result of many enquiries, and, as he had a memory which never deceived him, and a sagacity that rarely erred, he may be safely followed in all matters connected with song. Chalmers says, "Polwart on the Green" was written by Allan Ramsay: and in this he is followed by all authorities of any value, with the single exception of Burns. The internal evidence of the song is in favour of Ramsay.

"AT Polwart on the green,
If you'll meet me the morn,
Where lasses do conven
To dance about the thorn,
A kindly welcome ye shall meet
Frae her wha likes to view
A lover and a lad complete—
The lad and lover you.

Let dorty dames say na,
As lang as e'er they please,
Seem caulder than the snaw,
While inwardly they bleeze.
But I will frankly shaw my mind,
And yield my heart to thee;
Be ever to the captive kind
That lang's na to be free.

At Polwart on the green,
Amang the new-mown hay,
With sangs and dancing keen,
We'll pass the heartsome day.
At night if beds be o'er thrang laid
And thou be twin'd of thine,
Thou shalt be welcome, my dear lad,
To take a part of mine."

Polwart is a pleasant village, situate near Duns, in Berwick-shire. In the middle of the village stand two venerable thorns, round which the Polwart maidens, when they became brides, danced with their partners on the day of the bridal.—CUNNINGHAM.]

Strephon and Lydia.

THE following account of this song I had from Dr. Blacklock:—
The Strephon and Lydia mentioned in the song were perhaps the loveliest couple of their time. The gentleman was commonly known by the name of Beau Gibson. The lady was the "Gentle Jean," celebrated somewhere in Hamilton of Bangour's poems.—Having frequently met at public places, they had formed a reciprocal attachment, which their friends thought dangerous, as their resources were by no means adequate to their tastes and habits of life. To elude the bad consequences of such a connexion, Strephon was sent abroad with a commission, and perished in Admiral Vernon's expedition to Carthage.

The author of the song was William Wallace, Esq. of Cairnhill, in Ayr-shire.

[" ALL lonely on the sultry beach,
Expiring Strephon lay,
No hand the cordial draught to reach,
Nor cheer the gloomy way.
Ill-fated youth! no parent nigh,
To catch thy fleeting breath,
No' bride to fix thy swimming eye,
Or smooth the face of death!

Far distant from the mournful scene,
Thy parents sit at ease,
Thy Lydia rifles all the plain,
And all the spring, to please.
Ill-fated youth! by fault of friend,
Not force of foe, depress'd,
Thou fall'st, alas! thyself, thy kind,
Thy country, unredress'd!"]

My Jo, Janet.

[OF THE MUSEUM.]

JOHNSON, the publisher, with a foolish delicacy, refused to insert the last stanza of this humorous ballad.

[The sly humour of Allan Ramsay is visible in this song: it is believed, however, that he only retouched an old song, communicating to the strain some of his own peculiar glee. Johnson, a devout man, shook his head at the figurative language of the last verse.

" O SWEET Sir, for your courtesie,
When ye come by the Bass then,
For the love ye bear to me,
Buy me a keeking-glass then.
Keek into the draw well,
Janet, Janet;
And there ye'll see your bonny sell,
My jo, Janet.

Keeking in the draw-well clear,
What if I should fa' in then;
Synae a' my kin will say and swear,
I drown'd mysell for sin, then.

Had the better by the brae,
Janet, Janet;
Had the better by the brae,
My jo, Janet.

Good Sir, for your courtesie,
Coming thro' Aberdeen then,
For the love ye bear to me,
Buy me a pair of sheen then.
Clout the auld, the new are dear,
Janet, Janet;
A pair may gain ye ha'f a year,
My jo, Janet.

But what if dancing on the green,
An' skipping like a maukin,
If they should see my clouted sheen,
Of me they will be taunking.
Dance ay laigh, and late at e'en,
Janet, Janet;
Synae a' their fauts will no be seen,
My jo, Janet.

Kind Sir, for your courtesie,
When ye gae to the cross then,
For the love ye bear to me,
Buy me a pacing horse then.
Pace upo' your spinning wheel,
Janet, Janet;
Pace upo' your spinning wheel,
My jo, Janet.

My spinning wheel is auld and stiff,
The rock o't winna stand, Sir;
To keep the temper-pin in tiff,
Employs right aft my hand, Sir.
Make the best o' that ye can,
Janet, Janet;
But like it never wale a man,
My jo, Janet.]

Lobe is the Cause of my Mourning.

THE words by a Mr. R. Scott, from the town or neighbourhood of Biggar.

[We subjoin the first stanza of this exquisite song:—

By a murmuring stream a fair shepherdless lay,
Be so kind, O ye nymphs, I oft heard her say,
Tell Strephon I die, if he passes this way,
And love is the cause of my mourning.
False shepherds; that tell me of beauty & charms,
Deceive me, for Strephon's cold heart never warms;
Yet bring me this Strephon, I'll die in his arms;
O Strephon! the cause of my mourning.
But first, said she, let me go
Down to the shades below,
E'er ye let Strephon know
That I have lov'd him so:
Then on my pale cheek no blushes will shew,
That love is the cause of my mourning.]

Fife, and a' the Lands about it.

THIS song is Dr. Blacklock's. He, as well as I, often gave Johnson verses, trifling enough, perhaps, but they served as a vehicle to the music.

[The words are as follows:—

“ALLAN by his grief excited,
Long the victim of despair,
Thus deplor'd his passion slighted,
Thus address'd the scornful fair.
'Fife and all the lands about it,
Undesiring I can see;
Joy may crown my days without it,
Not, my charmer, without thee.

Must I then for ever languish,
Still complaining, still endure?
Can her form create an anguish,
Which her soul disdains to cure?
Who by hopeless passion fated,
Must I still those eyes admire,
Whilst unheeded, unregretted,
In her presence I expire?

Would thy charms improve their pow'r?
Timely think, relentless maid;
Beauty is a short-liv'd flower,
Destin'd but to bloom and fade!
Let that Heav'n, whose kind impression
All thy lovely features shew,
Melt thy soul to soft compassion
For a suff'ring lover's woe.”

[The air to which this song is written is very old: the old name is supposed to have been “Let Jamie's Lad alane.”]

Were na my Heart light I wad die.

LORD Hailes, in the notes to his Collection of ancient Scots poems, says that this song was the composition of Lady Grisel Baillie, daughter of the first Earl of Marchmont, and wife of George Baillie, of Jerviswood.

[There are few songs superior to this—the last verse has obtained a melancholy importance from being applied by Burns to his own condition, when he found himself neglected by his country, and descending to the grave.

“THERE was ance a May, and she lo'ed na men,
She biggit her bonny bow'r down in yon glen;
But now she cries dool! and a well-a-day!
Come down the green gate, & come here away.

When bonny young Johnny came o'er the sea,
He said he saw naithing sae lovely as me;
He hecht me baith rings and mony braw things:
And were na my heart light, I wad die.

He had a wee titty that lo'ed na me,
Because I was twice as bonny as she; [mother,
She rais'd such a pother 'twix'd him and his
That were na my heart light, I wad die.

The day it was set, and the bridal to be,
The wife took a dwam, and lay down to die;
She main'd and she grain'd, out of dolour and
Till he vow'd he never wad see me again. [pain,

His kin was for ane of a higher degree,
Said, What had he to do with the like of me?
Albeit I was bonny, I was na for Johnny:
And were na my heart light, I wad die.

They said, I had neither cow nor caff,
Nor dribbles of drink rins thro' the draff,
Nor pickles of meal rins thro' the mill-e'e;
And were na my heart light, I wad die.

His titty she was baith wylie and slee,
She spy'd me as I came o'er the lee;
And then she ran in and made a loud din,
Believe you ain een, an ye trow na me.

His bonnet stood ance fu' round on his brow;
His auld ane looks ay as weel as some's new;
But now he lets 't wear ony gate it will hing,
And casts dimself dowie upon the corn-bing.

And now he gaes drooping about the dykes,
And a' he dow do is to hund the tykes:
The live-lang night he ne'er steeks his e'e,
And were na my heart light, I wad die.

Were I young for thee, as I ance hae been,
We shou'd hae been galloping down on yon
And linking it on the lily-white lee; [green,
And wow gin I were but young for thee!”

[Lady Grisel Home, by whom this pathetic ballad was written, was the daughter of Sir Patrick Home, created Earl of Marchmont. She was born at Redbraes Castle, 25th December, 1665, was married to George Baillie, of Jerviswood, Esq., 17th September, 1692, and died at London, 6th December, 1746, in the 81st year of her age. Their eldest daughter, Lady Murray, of Stanhope, wrote Memoirs of the lives and characters of her parents—a piece of biography of the most affectionate and interesting kind. It was first made known by extracts, in the Appendix to Rose's observations on Fox's Historical Work, 1809, and has since been printed entire by Thomas Thomson, Esq., Advocate, Edinburgh, 1822, 8vo.

The following fragment of a song by this distinguished lady has lately been discovered, in her hand-writing, among a parcel of old letters, written about the time of her father's forfeiture:—

O THE we-bughting's bonnie, baith e'ening and morn, [reed and horn ;
When our blythe shepherds play on their bog-
While we're milking, they're liltin' baith pleasant and clear, [my dear !
But my heart's like to break when I think on

O the shepherds take pleasure to blow on the horn ; [morn ;
To raise up their flocks o' sheep soon i' the
On the bonnie green banks they feed pleasant and free— for thee !
But, alas ! my dear heart ! all my sighing's

The young Man's Dream.

THIS song is the composition of Balloon Tytler.

[And a charming song it is:—

I.

ONE night I dream'd I lay most easy,
By a murmur'ing river's side,
Where lovely banks were spread with daisies,
And the streams did smoothly glide ;
While around me, and quite over,
Spreading branches were display'd,
All interwoven in due order,
Soon became a pleasant shade.

II.

I saw my lass come in most charming,
With a look and air so sweet ;
Ev'ry grace was most alarming,
Ev'ry beauty most complete.
Cupid with his bow attended ;
Lovely Venus too was there :
As his bow young Cupid bended,
Far away flew carking care.

III.

On a bank of roses seated,
Charming my true-love sung ;
While glad echo still repeated,
And the hills and valleys rung :
At the last, by sleep oppress'd,
On the bank my love did lie,
By young Cupid still caressed,
While the graces round did fly.

IV.

The rose's red, the lily's blossom,
With her charms might not compare,
To view her cheeks and heaving bosom,
Down they droop'd as in despair.

On her slumber I encroaching,
Panting came to steal a kiss ;
Cupid smil'd at me approaching,
Seem'd to say, "There's nought amiss."

V.

With eager wishes I drew nigher,
This fair maiden to embrace ;
My breath grew quick, my pulse beat higher,
Gazing on her lovely face.
* * * * *

VI.

The nymph, awaking, quickly check'd me,
Starting up, with angry tone ;
"Thus," says she, "do you respect me ?
Leave me quick, and hence begone."
Cupid, for me interposing,
To my love did bow full low ;
She from him her hands unloosing,
In contempt struck down his bow.

VII.

Angry Cupid from her flying,
Cry'd out, as he sought the skies,
"Haughty Nymphs their love denying,
Cupid ever shall despise."
As he spoke, old Care came wand'ring,
With him stalk'd destructive Time ;
Winter froze the streams, meand'ring,
Nipt the Roses in their prime.

VIII.

Spectres then my love surrounded,
At their back march'd chilling Death :
Whilst she, frighted and confounded,
Felt their blasting, pois'nous breath :
As her charms were swift decaying,
And the furrows seiz'd her cheek ;
Forbear, ye friends ! I vainly crying,
Wak'd in the attempt to speak.]

The Tears of Scotland.

DR. Blacklock told me that Smollett, who was at the bottom a great Jacobite, composed these beautiful and pathetic verses on the infamous depredations of the Duke of Cumberland after the battle of Culloden.

[“The tears of Scotland” was a bold strain to be written in the year 1746. The picture of desolation is as true as it is moving.

MOURN, hapless Caledonia, mourn,
Thy banish'd peace, thy laurels torn !
Thy sons for valour long renown'd,
Lie slaughter'd on their native ground :
Thy hospitable roofs no more
Invite the stranger to the door ;
In smoky ruins sunk they lie,
The monuments of cruelty.

The wretched owner sees, afar,
His all become the prey of war ;
Bethinks him of his babes and wife,
Then smites his breast, and curses life.
Thy swains are famish'd on the rocks
Where once they fed their wanton flocks :
Thy ravish'd virgins shriek in vain ;
Thy infants perish on the plain.

What boots it then, in ev'ry clime,
Thro' the wide-spreading waste of time,
Thy martial glory, crown'd with praise,
Still shone with undiminish'd blaze :
Thy tow'ring spirit now is broke,
Thy neck is bended to the yoke :
What foreign arms could never quell
By civil rage and rancour fell.

The rural pipe and merry lay
No more shall cheer the happy day :
No social scenes of gay delight
Beguile the dreary winter night :
No strains, but those of sorrow, flow,
And nought be heard but sounds of woe :
While the pale phantoms of the slain
Glide nightly o'er the silent plain.

Oh ! baneful cause—oh ! fatal morn,
Accurs'd to ages yet unborn !
The sons against their father stood ;
The parent shed his children's blood !
Yet, when the rage of battle ceas'd,
The victor's soul was not appeas'd ;
The naked and forlorn must feel
Devouring flames, and murd'ring steel.

The pious mother doom'd to death,
Forsaken, wanders o'er the heath,
The bleak wind whistles round her head,
Her helpless orphans cry for bread ;
Bereft of shelter, food, and friend,
She views the shades of night descend ;
And, stretch'd beneath th' inclement skies,
Weeps o'er her tender babes, and dies.

Whilst the warm blood bedews my veins,
And unimpair'd remembrance reigns,
Resentment of my country's fate
Within my filial breast shall beat ;
And, spite of her insulting foe,
My sympathizing verse shall flow :
Mourn, hapless Caledonia, mourn
Thy banish'd peace, thy laurel's torn !]

Ah ! the poor Shepherd's mournful Fate.

Tune—Gallashiels.

THE old title, Sour Plums o' Gallashiels, probably was the beginning of a song to this air, which is now lost.

The tune of Gallashiels was composed about the beginning of the present century by the Laird of Gallashiels' piper.

[William Hamilton, of Bangour, was an amiable and accomplished gentleman, and one of our sweetest lyric poets. "His mind is pictured," says the author of the life of Lord Kames, "in his verses. They are the easy and careless effusions of an elegant fancy and a chastened taste ; and the sentiments they convey are the genuine feelings of a tender and susceptible heart, which perpetually owned the domination of some fair mistress ; but whose passion generally evaporated in song, and made no serious or permanent impression." Hamilton died in March, 1754, aged 50 years. The song which follows is one of his best ; it was censured by Dr. Johnson for an ill-paired rhyme—wishes and blushes—but harmony or rhyme is one thing, and true poetry another, and none knew this better than the critic.

"Ah ! the poor shepherd's mournful fate,
When doom'd to love and languish,
To bear the scornful fair one's hate,
Nor dare disclose his anguish !
Yet eager looks and dying sighs,
My secret soul discover ;
While rapture, trembling through mine eyes,
Reveals how much I love her.
The tender glance, the redd'ning cheek,
O'erspread with rising blushes,
A thousand various ways they speak,
A thousand various wishes.

For oh ! that form so heavenly fair,
Those languid eyes so sweetly smiling,
That artless blush and modest air,
So fatally beguiling !
The every look and every grace,
So charm whene'er I view thee ;
'Till death o'ertake me in the chase,
Still will my hopes pursue thee :
Then when my tedious hours are past,
Be this last blessing given,
Low at thy feet to breathe my last,
And die in sight of heaven."]

Mill, Mill O.—*

THE original, or at least a song evidently prior to Ramsay's, is still extant.—It runs thus :

"As I cam down yon waterside,
And by yon shellin-hill, O,
There I spied a bonnie bonnie lass,
And a lass that I lov'd right weel, O."—

* ["Burns's inimitable ballad "The Soldier's Return" is copied from this literally, as far as the story and air goes ; but how infinitely superior are his verses !"—Hogg.]

CHORUS.

The mill, mill, O, and the kill, kill, O,
 And the coggin o' Peggy's wheel, O,
 The sack and the sieve, and a' she did leave,
 And danc'd the miller's reel, O.—

[That Burns had the verses as well as the air of the "Mill, Mill, O" in his mind when he wrote "The Poor and Honest Sodger," seems pretty evident: he has, however, improved the morality of the song, as well as heightened its poetry.]

We ran and they ran.

THE author of "We ran and they ran"—was a Rev. Mr. Murdoch M'Lennan, minister at Crathie, Dee-side.

[The song in question is a rough rude chant composed in honour of some and in derision of others who fought, or fled, or fell in the battle of Sherriff-muir. The verse on Robertson of Struan, the poet, is one of the best:

But Clephane acted pretty,
 And Strowan the witty,
 A poet that pleases us a', man;
 For mine is but rhyme,
 In respect of what's fine,
 Or what he is able to draw, man."]

Waly, waly.

In the west country I have heard a different edition of the second stanza.—Instead of the four lines, beginning with, "When cockle-shells," &c., the other way ran thus:—

O wherefore need I busk my head,
 Or wherefore need I kame my hair,
 Sin my fause luvè has me forsook,
 And says he'll never luvè me mair.

[This is a very old as well as a very beautiful song: it first appeared in the "Tea Table Miscellany," and seems to have been re-touched and altered by a very skilful hand.

It is one of Sir Walter Scott's theories, that the finer and more poetic passages in our old

* [If it was, it has been very long ago, as I have traced the song and air back for many generations. The song began:—

Duncan Gray cam here to woo,
 Hey-howe the girdin o't,

oral verse have been injured, and oftentimes lost, as the ballads to which they belonged drifted along the stream of time:—

"O WALY, waly, up yon bank,
 And waly, waly, down yon brae,
 And waly by yon burn side,
 Where I and my love were wont to gae.
 O waly, waly, love is bouny
 A little while, when it is new;
 But when it's auld it waxeth cauld,
 And fades away like morning dew.

When cockle-shells turn siller bells,
 And mussels grow on ev'ry tree;
 When frost and snaw shall warm us a',
 Then shall my love prove true to me.
 I leant my back unto an aik,
 I thought it was a trustie tree;
 But first it bow'd, and syne it brake,
 And sae did my fause love to me.

Now Arthur-seat shall be my bed,
 The sheets shall ne'er be fy'd by me:
 Saint Anton's well shall be my drink,
 Since my true love's forsaken me.
 O Mart'mas wind, whan wilt thou blaw,
 And shake the green leaves aff the tree?
 O gentle death, whan wilt thou cum,
 And tak a life that wearies me?

'Tis not the frost that freezes fell,
 Nor blawing snaw's inclemencie;
 'Tis not sic cauld that makes me cry,
 But my love's heart grown cauld to me.
 Whan we cam in by Glasgow town,
 We were a comely sight to see;
 My love was clad in velvet black,
 And I mysel in cramasie.

But had I wist before I kisst,
 That love had been sae ill to win,
 I had lockt my heart in a case of gowd,
 And pinn'd it wi a siller pin.
 Oh, oh! if my young babe were born,
 And set upon the nurse's knee,
 And I mysel were dead and gone;
 For a maid again I'll never be."]

Duncan Gray.

DR. BLACKLOCK informed me that he had often heard the tradition that this air was composed by a carman in Glasgow.*

On a feast-day when we were fou,
 Sing hey the lang girdin o't.

It was rather what our gentry would account a queer song; but I have often heard both wives and lasses sing it without any reserve.—Hogg.]

Dumbarton Drums.

THIS is the last of the West Highland airs ; and from it, over the whole tract of country to the confines of Tweed-side, there is hardly a tune or song that one can say has taken its origin from any place or transaction in that part of Scotland.—The oldest Ayr-shire reel is Stewarton Lasses, which was made by the father of the present Sir Walter Montgomery Cunningham, alias Lord Lysle ; since which period there has indeed been local music in that country in great plenty.—Johnnie Faa is the only old song which I could ever trace as belonging to the extensive county of Ayr.

[The author of this song is unknown : there is some good sense in the lady's musings, though the poetic merit of the ditty is not so great :—

DUMBARTON drums beat bonny, O,
When they mind me of my dear Johnnie, O,
How happy am I
When my soldier is by,
While he kisses and blesses his Annie, O,
'Tis a soldier alone can delight me, O,
For his graceful looks do unite me, O,
While guarded in his arms,
I'll fear no war's alarms,
Neither danger nor death shall e'er fright me, O.
My love is a handsome laddie, O,
Genteel but ne'er foppish nor gaudie, O,
Tho' commissions are dear
Yet I'll buy him one this year,
For he shall serve no longer a caddie, O ;
A soldier has honour and bravery, O ;
Unacquainted with rogues and their knavery, O,
He minds no other thing
But the ladies or the King,
For every other care is but slavery, O.
Then I'll be the Captain's lady, O ;
Farewell all my friends and my daddy, O ;
I'll wait no more at home,
But I'll follow with the drum,
And where'er that beats I'll be ready, O,
Dumbarton Drums sound bonny, O ;
They are sprightly like my dear Johnnie, O :
How happy shall I be
When on my soldier's knee,
And he kisses and blesses his Annie, O !]

Cauld Kail in Aberdeen.

THIS song is by the Duke of Gordon.*—The old verses are,

“THERE'S cauld kail in Aberdeen,
And castocks in Strathbogie ;
When ilka lad maun hae his lass,
Then fye, gie me my coggie.

* He was born in 1743, and died in 1827.

There's Johnnie Smith has got a wife,
That scrimps him o' his coggie,
If she were mine, upon my life
I wad douk her in a boggie.”

CHORUS.

My coggie, Sirs, my coggie, Sirs,
I cannot want my coggie :
I wadna gie my three-girr'd cap
For e'er a quene in Bogie.—

[“The Cauld Kail” of his Grace of Gordon has long been a favourite in the north, and deservedly so, for it is full of life and manners. It is almost needless to say that kail is colewort, and much used in broth ; that castocks are the stalks of a common cabbage, and that coggie is a wooden dish for holding porridge ; it is also a drinking vessel.

“THERE'S cauld kail in Aberdeen,
And castocks in Stra'bogie ;
Gin I but hae a bonny lass,
Ye're welcome to your coggie :
And ye may sit up a' the night,
And drink till it be braid day-light
Gie me a lass baith clean and tight,
To dance the Reel o' Bogie.

In cotillons the French excel ;
John Bull loves countra-dances ;
The Spaniards dance fandangos well ;
Mynheer an allemande prances :
In foursome reels the Scots delight,
At threesome they dance wondrous light :
But twasome ding a' out o' sight,
Danc'd to the Reel o' Bogie.

Come, lads, and view your partners well,
Wale each a blythsome rogue ;
I'll tak this lassie to mysel,
She looks sae keen and vogie !
Now, piper lad, bang up the spring ;
The countra fashion is the thing,
To prie their mou's e'er we begin
To dance the Reel o' Bogie.

Now ilka lad has got a lass,
Save yon auld doited fogie ;
And ta'en a fling upo' the grass,
As they do in Stra'bogie :
But a' the lasses look sae fain,
We canna think oursels to hain,
For they maun hae their come-again
To dance the Reel o' Bogie.

Now a' the lads hae done their best,
Like true men o' Stra'bogie ;
We'll stop awhile and tak a rest,
And tipple out a coggie :
Come now, my lads, and tak your glass,
And try ilk other to surpass,
In wishing health to every lass
To dance the Reel o' Bogie.”]

For Lack of Gold.

THE country girls in Ayr-shire, instead of the line—

“She me forsook for a great duke;”

say,

“For Athole’s duke she me forsook;”

which I take to be the original reading.

This song was written by the late Dr. Austin, physician at Edinburgh.—He had courted a lady, to whom he was shortly to have been married; but the Duke of Athole, having seen her, became so much in love with her, that he made proposals of marriage, which were accepted of, and she jilted the doctor.

[The doctor gave his woes an airing in song, and then married a very agreeable and beautiful lady, by whom he had a numerous family. Nor did Jean Drummond, of Megginch, break her heart when James, Duke of Athole, died: she dried her tears, and gave her hand to Lord Adam Gordon. The song is creditable to the author.—CUNNINGHAM.]

“For lack of gold she’s left me, oh!
And of all that’s dear bereft me, oh!
For Athole’s duke, she me forsook,
And to endless care has left me, oh!
A star and garter have more art
Than youth, a true and faithful heart,
For empty titles we must part,
And for glitt’ring show she’s left me, oh!

No cruel fair shall ever move
My injur’d heart again to love,
Thro’ distant climates I must rove,
Since Jeannie she has left me, oh!
Ye pow’rs above, I to your care
Resign my faithless lovely fair,
Your choicest blessings be her share,
Tho’ she’s for ever left me, oh!”]

Here’s a Health to my true Love, &c.

THIS song is Dr. Blacklock’s. He told me that tradition gives the air to our James IV. of Scotland.

[“Scottish traditions,” says Joseph Ritson, “are to be received with great caution.” He might have said the same thing of all things oral; but I see not why northern traditions are more liable to suspicion than the legends of other lands. Had the composition of an air or a song been imputed to one of his own Henrys or Edwards, he might have questioned it; but all the Stuarts were gifted men: James the First and Fifth were accomplished poets and musicians. The whole family were lovers of music and verse: it was not, therefore, wonderful that one of them should compose a pretty piece of music.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

The words are as follow:

To me what are riches encumber’d with care!
To me what is pomp’s insignificant glare!
No minion of fortune, no pageant of state,
Shall ever induce me to envy his fate.

Their personal graces let fops idolize,
Whose life is but death in a splendid disguise;
But soon the pale tyrant his right shall resume,
And all their false lustre be hid in the tomb.

Let the meteor discovery attract the fond sage,
In fruitless researches for life to engage;
Content with my portion, the rest I forego,
Nor labour to gain disappointment and woe.

Contemptibly fond of contemptible self,
While misers their wishes concentrate in pelf;
Let the god-like delight of imparting be mine,
Enjoyment reflected is pleasure divine.

Extensive dominion and absolute power,
May tickle ambition, perhaps for an hour;
But power in possession soon loses its charms,
While conscience remonstrates, and terror alarms.

With vigour, O teach me, kind heaven, to sustain
Those ills which in life to be suffer’d remain;
And when ’tis allow’d me the goal to desery,
For my species I liv’d, for myself let me die.]

Hey tutti taiti.

I HAVE met the tradition universally over Scotland, and particularly about Stirling, in the neighbourhood of the scene, that this air was Robert Bruce’s march at the Battle of Bannockburn.

[“It does not seem at all probable,” says Ritson, “that the Scots had any martial music in the time of this monarch; it being their custom, at that period, for every man in the host to bear a little horn, with the blowing of which, as we are told by Froissart, they would make such a horrible noise as if all the devils of hell had been among them. It is not, therefore, likely that these unpolished warriors would be curious—

— 'to move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders.'

These horns, indeed, are the only music ever mentioned by Barbour, to whom any particular march would have been too important a circumstance to be passed over in silence; so that it must remain a moot point whether Bruce's army were cheered by the sound of even a solitary bagpipe."

Who would take Ritson's word for this or anything else? for certainly a more capricious and dogmatic trifler never put pen to paper. I conceived it to have been a matter perfectly understood over all Scotland, that this air was 'Bruce's March;' and, if Ritson had had the ear of a bullock, he would have perceived that this ancient air had been composed exclusively for the bugles.—HOGG.]

[The following are the two songs which accompany this air in the Musical Museum, the one is a regular tipping chant, while the other is a Jacobite effusion:—

"LANDLADY, count the lawin,
The day is near the dawin;
Ye're a' blind drunk, boys,
And I'm but jolly fou.

CHORUS.

Hey, tutti, taiti,
How, tutti, taiti,
Wha's fou' now?

Cog an ye were ay fou,
Cog an ye were ay fou,
I wad sit and sing to you,
If ye were ay fou.

Hey, tutti, &c.

Weel may we a' be!
Ill may we never see!
God bless the Queen
And the companie!

Hey, tutti, &c."

Same Tune.

"HERE is to the King, Sir,
Ye ken wha I mean, Sir,
And to every honest man
That will do't again.

CHORUS.

Fill up your bumpers high,
We'll drink a' yere barrels dry,
Out upon them, fy, fy,
That winna do't again.

Here's to the chieftains
Of the Scots Highland clans,
They hae done it mair than ance,
And will do't again.

Fill up, &c.

When you hear the trumpet sound
Tutti taiti to the drum,
Up your swords, and down your gun,
And to the louns again.

Fill up, &c.

Here is to the king o' Swede!
Fresh laurels crown his head!
Pox on every sneaking blade
That winna do't again!

Fill up, &c.

But to mak a' things right, now,
He that drinks maun fight, too,
To shew his heart's upright, too,
And that he'll do't again.

Fill up, &c."

The glorious song of "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled" has made this air immortal. That animating strain is now sung wherever freedom is felt, and the British language understood. The more like recitation it is sung, the effect is better; scientific ornament injures the simple vigour of the words and air.]

Tak your auld Cloak about ye.

A PART of this old song, according to the English set of it, is quoted in Shakspeare.

[In the drinking scene in Othello—Iago sings:

"KING Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown;
He held them sixpence all too dear,
With that he called the tailor lown;
He was a wight of high renown,
And thou art but of low degree:
'Tis pride that pulls the country down,
Then take thine auld cloak about thee."

The old Song from which these stanzas are taken was recovered by Dr. Percy, and preserved by him in his Reliques of Ancient Poetry.

The economic spirit of Stephen has been transferred by a northern minstrel to Robert Bruce: the song, of which the following is a part, is one of our best as well as oldest.

"IN winter when the rain rain'd cauld,
And frost and snaw on ilka hill,
And Boreas, with his blasts sae bauld,
Was threat'ning a' our kye to kill:
Then Bell my wife, wha loves na strife,
She said to me right hastily,
Get up, goodman, save Cromie's life,
And tak your auld cloak about ye.

My Cromie is an useful cow,
 And she is come of a good kyne;
 Aft has she wet the bairns' mou',
 And I am laith that she shou'd tyne.
 Get up, goodman, it is fu' time,
 The sun shines in the lift sae lie;
 Sloth never made a gracious end,
 Go tak your auld cloak about ye.

My cloak was ance a good grey cloak,
 When it was fitting for my wear;
 But now it's scantily worth a groat,
 For I have worn't this thirty year?
 Let's spend the gear that we have won,
 We little ken the day we'll die:
 Then I'll be proud, since I have sworn
 To have a new cloak about me.

In days when our king Robert rang,
 His trews they cost but haff a crown;
 He said they were a groat o'er dear,
 And call'd the taylor thief and loun.
 He was the king that wore a crown,
 And thou the man of laigh degree,
 'Tis pride puts a' the country down,
 Sae tak thy auld cloak about thee."]

Ye Gods, was Strephon's Picture blest?

Tune—Fourteenth of October.

THE title of this air shews that it alludes to the famous king Crispian, the patron of the honourable corporation of shoemakers.—St. Crispian's day falls on the fourteenth of October, old style, as the old proverb tells:

"On the fourteenth of October,
 Was ne'er a sutor * sober."

[William Hamilton, of Bangour, wrote this song on hearing that a young lady of birth and beauty wore his picture in her bosom. Ramsay obtained a copy from the author, and published it in the Tea Table Miscellany.

"YE gods, was Strephon's picture blest
 With the fair heaven of Chloe's breast?
 Move softer, thou fond flutt'ring heart,
 Oh gently throb, too fierce thou art.
 Tell me, thou brightest of thy kind,
 For Strephon was the bliss design'd?
 For Strephon's sake, dear charming maid,
 Did'st thou prefer his wand'ring shade?

And thou bless'd shade, that sweetly art
 Lodg'd so near my Chloe's heart,

* Sutor.—A Shoemaker.

For me the tender hour improve,
 And softly tell how dear I love.
 Ungrateful thing! it scorns to hear
 Its wretched master's ardent prayer,
 Ingrossing all that beauteous heaven
 That Chloe, lavish maid, has given.

I cannot blame thee: were I lord
 Of all the wealth these breasts afford;
 I'd be a miser too, nor give
 An alms to keep a god alive.
 Oh! smile not thus, my lovely fair,
 On these cold looks that lifeless are:
 Prize him whose bosom glows with fire,
 With eager love and soft desire.

'Tis true thy charms, O pow'rful maid!
 To life can bring the silent shade:
 Thou canst surpass the painter's art,
 And real warmth and flames impart.
 But, oh! it ne'er can love like me,
 I ever lov'd, and lov'd but thee:
 Then, charmer, grant my fond request;
 Say, thou canst love, and make me blest."

Pastoral designations were the fashion of Hamilton's day: how the ladies would have blushed and fluttered their fans to have been spoken of in song in the language of life.]

Since robb'd of all that charm'd my View.

THE old name of this air is, "the Blossom o' the Raspberry." The song is Dr. Blacklock's.

[The verse is melodious, and the sentiments of the purest nature; the subject—unrequited love. We can only give the first and last verses, as the song is a long one:—

SINCE robb'd of all that charm'd my view,
 Of all my soul e'er fancied fair,
 Ye smiling native scenes, adieu,
 With each delightful object there!
 Oh! when my heart revolves the joys
 Which in your sweet recess I knew,
 The last dread shock, which life destroys,
 Is Heaven compar'd with losing you!

Ah me! had Heaven and she prov'd kind,
 Then full of age, and free from care,
 How blest had I my life resign'd,
 Where first I breath'd this vital air:
 But since no flatt'ring hope remains,
 Let me my wretched lot pursue;
 Adieu! dear friends and native scenes!
 To all but grief and love, adieu!"]

Young Damon.

THIS air is by Oswald.

[This is one of the hurried effusions of Robert Fergusson: his attempts in lyric composition were few and sometimes not very happy.]

Tune—Highland Lamentation.

“AMIDST a rosy bank of flowers
 Young Damon mourn'd his forlorn fate,
 In sighs he spent his languid hours,
 And breath'd his woes in lonely state;
 Gay joy no more shall ease his mind,
 No wanton sports can sooth his care,
 Since sweet Amanda prov'd unkind,
 And left him full of black despair.

His looks, that were as fresh as morn,
 Can now no longer smiles impart;
 His pensive soul on sadness borne,
 Is rack'd and torn by Cupid's dart;
 Turn, fair Amanda, cheer your swain,
 Unshroud him from this vale of woe;
 Range every charm to soothe the pain
 That in his tortur'd breast doth grow.”]

Kirk wad let me be.

TRADITION in the western parts of Scotland tells that this old song, of which there are still three stanzas extant, once saved a covenanting clergyman out of a scrape. It was a little prior to the revolution, a period when being a Scots covenanter was being a felon, that one of their clergy, who was at that very time hunted by the merciless soldiery, fell in, by accident, with a party of the military. The soldiers were not exactly acquainted with the person of the reverend gentleman of whom they were in search; but, from suspicious circumstances, they fancied that they had got one of that cloth and opprobrious persuasion among them in the person of this stranger. “Mass John,” to extricate himself, assumed a freedom of manners very unlike the gloomy strictness of his sect; and, among other convivial exhibitions, sung (and, some traditions say, composed on the spur of the occasion), “Kirk wad let me be,” with such effect, that the soldiers swore he was a d—d honest fellow, and that it was impossible he could belong to those hellish conventicles; and so gave him his liberty.

The first stanza of this song, a little altered, is a favourite kind of dramatic interlude acted

* Glenae, on the small river Ae, in Annandale; the seat and designation of an ancient branch, and the present repre-

at country weddings, in the south-west parts of the kingdom. A young fellow is dressed up like an old beggar; a peruke, commonly made of carded tow, represents hoary locks; an old bonnet; a ragged plaid, or surtout, bound with a straw rope for a girdle; a pair of old shoes, with straw ropes twisted round his ankles, as is done by shepherds in snowy weather: his face they disguise as like wretched old age as they can: in this plight he is brought into the wedding house, frequently to the astonishment of strangers, who are not in the secret, and begins to sing—

“O, I am a silly auld man,
 My name it is auld Glenae,*” &c.

He is asked to drink, and by and bye to dance, which after some uncouth excuses he is prevailed on to do, the fiddler playing the tune, which here is commonly called “Auld Glenae;” in short he is all the time so plied with liquor that he is understood to get intoxicated, and, with all the ridiculous gesticulations of an old drunken beggar, he dances and staggers until he falls on the floor; yet still, in all his riot, nay, in his rolling and tumbling on the floor, with some or other drunken motion of his body, he beats time to the music, till at last he is supposed to be carried out dead drunk.

[There are many versions of this Nithsdale song; here is one of the least objectionable, but not the least curious.]

“I AM a silly puir man,
 Gaun hirplin owre a tree;
 For courting a lass in the dark
 The kirk came haunting me.
 If a' my rags were off,
 And nought but hale claes on,
 O I could please a young lass
 As well as a richer man.

The parson he ca'd me a rogue,
 The session an' thegither,
 The justice he cried, You dog,
 Your knavery I'll consider:
 Sae I drapt down on my knee
 And thus did humbly pray,
 O, if ye'll let me gae free,
 My hale confession ye'se hae.

'Twas late on tuesday at e'en,
 When the moon was on the grass;
 O, just for charity's sake,
 I was kind to a beggar lass.
 She had begged down Annan side,
 Lochmaben and Hightae;
 But deil an awmous she got,
 Till she met wi' auld Glenae.”

sentative, of the gallant and unfortunate Dalzels of Carnwath.—This is the Author's note.

The song goes on to relate what passed between the Sinner and the Session; but we cannot lift the curtain higher from this rustic drama.—CUNNINGHAM.]

Blythe was she.

I COMPOSED these verses while I stayed at Ochertyre with Sir William Murray.—The lady, who was also at Ochertyre at the same time, was the well-known toast, Miss Euphemia Murray of Lentrose, who was called, and very justly, "The Flower of Strathmore." [She was sister to my accomplished and gallant friend, Sir George Murray, who claimed for her one night the superiority to all the flowers of Yarrow from me, alleging that I could not dispute the taste of Burns. I said that neither Burns nor he had ever seen one of the virgin flowers of Yarrow, and, until such time as he himself had, I denied the position most positively. He said he had made a resolution, then, that he would come and see them. He is the best president that ever took a chair, for a large party; for he has the art of keeping every man pleased with himself, and consequently pleased with him."—HOGG.]

Johnny Faa, or the Gypsie Laddie.

THE people in Ayr-shire begin this song—

"The gypsies cam to my Lord Cassilis' yett."—

They have a great many more stanzas in this song than I ever yet saw in any printed copy.—The castle is still remaining at Maybole, where his lordship shut up his wayward spouse, and kept her for life.

[As tradition strongly vouched for the truth of the story upon which this ballad is founded, Mr. Finlay, with a laudable curiosity, resolved to make the necessary inquiries, the result of which, without much variation, he published in his "Scottish Ballads," and is as follows:

"That the Earl of Cassilis had married a nobleman's daughter contrary to her wishes, she having been previously engaged to another; but that the persuasion and importunity of her friends at last brought her to consent: That Sir John Faw, of Dunbar, her former lover, seizing the opportunity of the Earl's absence on a foreign embassy, disguised himself and a number of his retainers as gypsies, and carried off the lady, 'nothing loth.' That the Earl having returned opportunely at the time of the commission of the act, and nowise inclined to participate in his consort's ideas on the subject, collected his vassals, and pursued the lady and her paramour to the borders of England, where, having overtaken them, a battle ensued, in which Faw and his followers were all killed or taken prisoners, excepting one,

'—— the meanest of them all,
Who lives to weep and sing their fall.'

"It is by this survivor that the ballad is supposed to have been written. The Earl, on bringing back the fair fugitive, banished her a mensa et thoro, and, it is said, confined her for life in a tower at the village of Maybole, in Ayr-shire, built for the purpose; and, that nothing might remain about this tower unappropriated to its original destination, eight heads, carved in stone, below one of the turrets, are said to be the effigies of so many of the gypsies. The lady herself, as well as the survivor of Faw's followers, contributed to perpetuate the remembrance of the transaction; for if he wrote a song about it, she wrought it in tapestry; and this piece of workmanship is still preserved at Culzean Castle. It remains to be mentioned that the ford, by which the lady and her lover crossed the river Doon from a wood near Cassilis-house, is still denominated the Gypsies' Steps.

"There seems to be no reason for identifying the hero with Johnnie Faa, who was king of the gypsies about the year 1590. The coincidence of names, and the disguise assumed by the lover, is perhaps the foundation on which popular tradition has raised the structure. Upon authority so vague, nothing can be assumed; and indeed I am inclined to adopt the opinion of a correspondent, that the whole story may have been the invention of some feudal or political rival, to injure the character and hurt the feelings of an opponent; at least, after a pretty diligent search, I have been able to discover nothing that in the slightest degree confirms the popular tale."

"THE gypsies came to our lord's gate,
And wow but they sang sweetly;
They sang sae sweet, and sae complete
That down came the fair ladie.

When she came tripping down the stair,
And a' her maids before her;
As soon as they saw her weelfar'd face,
They coost the glamour o'er her.

'Gar tak frae me this gay mantile,
And bring to me a plaidie;
For if kith and kin and a' had sworn,
I'll follow the gypsie laddie.

'Yestreen I lay in a weel-made bed,
And my good lord beside me;
This night I'll lie in a tenant's barn,
Whatever shall betide me.'

Oh! come to your bed, says Johnny Faa,
Oh! come to your bed, my deary;
For I vow and swear by the hilt of my sword,
That your lord shall nae mair come near ye.

'I'll go to bed to my Johnny Faa,
And I'll go to bed to my dearie;
For I vow and swear by what past yestreen,
That my lord shall nae mair come near me.

'I'll mak a hap to my Johnny Faa,
And I'll mak a hap to my deary;
And he's get a' the coat gaes round,
And my lord shall nae mair come near me.'

And when our lord came hame at e'en,
And speir'd for his fair lady,
The tane she cry'd, and the other reply'd,
She's away wi' the gypsy laddie.

'Gae saddle to me the black, black steed,
Gae saddle and mak him ready;
Before that I either eat or sleep,
I'll gae seek my fair lady.'

And we were fifteen well-made men,
Altho' we were nae bonny;
And we were a' put down for aye,
A fair young wanton lady."*

The following verse has been added:—

"My ladie's skin, like the driven snaw,
Look'd through her satin cleedin',
Her white house, as the wine ran down,
It like a rose did redden."

John Martin, the distinguished Painter, who has all the love of a true Borderer for the strains which gladdened his ancestors, recites a Northumberland version of this strain, which calls the fortunate and unfortunate hero Gypsy Geordie.]

To Daunton me.

THE two following old stanzas to this tune have some merit:

"To daunton me, to daunton me,
O ken ye what it is that'll daunton me?—
There's eighty-eight and eighty-nine,
And a' that I hae borne sinsyne,
There's cess and press,† and Presbytrie,
I think it will do meikle for to daunton me.

But to wanton me, to wanton me,
O ken ye what it is that wad wanton me—
To see guid corn upon the rigs,
And banishment among the Whigs,

* [VAR.—The Earl of Cassilis' lady.]

And right restor'd where right sud be,
I think it would do meikle for to wanton me.

[A third verse runs thus:

"But to wanton me, to wanton me,
O ken ye what maist wad wanton me?
To see King James at Enburgh Cross
Wi' fifty thousand foot and horse;
And the usurper forc'd to flee,
O this is that maist wad wanton me!"

The Bonnie Lass made the Bed to me.

"THE Bonnie Lass made the Bed to me," was composed on an amour of Charles II. when skulking in the North, about Aberdeen, in the time of the usurpation. He formed une petite affaire with a daughter of the House of Portletham, who was the "lass that made the bed to him:"—two verses of it are,

"I kiss'd her lips sae rosy red,
While the tear stood blinkin in her e'e,
I said, My lassie, dinna cry,
For ye ay shall make the bed to me.

She took her mither's holland sheets,
And made them a' in sarks to me;
Blythe and merry may she be,
The lass that made the bed to me."

[A version of this old song, re-touched by the master hand of Burns, is inserted among the Songs, under the title of "The Lass that made the Bed to me."]

Absent.

A SONG in the manner of Shenstone.

This song and air are both by Dr. Blacklock.

[From this strain, in the manner of Shenstone, we may extract some pastoral touches:—

"YE harvests that wave in the breeze,
As far as the view can extend;
Ye mountains umbrageous with trees,
Whose tops so majestic ascend;
Your landscape what joy to survey,
Were Melissa with me to admire!
Then the harvests would glitter how gay,
How majestic the mountains aspire!]

† [Scot and lot.]

Ye zephyrs that visit my fair,
 Ye sun-beams around her that play,
 Does her sympathy dwell on my care,
 Does she number the hours of my stay?
 First perish ambition and wealth,
 First perish all else that is dear,
 E'er one sigh should escape her by stealth,
 E'er my absence should cost her one tear."]

I had a Horst, and I had nae Mair.

THIS story is founded on fact. A John Hunter, ancestor of a very respectable farming family, who live in a place in the parish, I think, of Galston, called Bar-mill, was the luckless hero that "had a horse and had nae mair."—For some little youthful follies he found it necessary to make a retreat to the West-Highlands, where "he feed himself to a Highland Laird," for that is the expression of all the oral editions of the song I ever heard. The present Mr. Hunter, who told me the anecdote, is the great grand-child of our hero.

[David Herd found, no one knows where, these capital comic verses, and published them in his collection. Johnson added the original music.

I HAD a horse, and I had nae mair,
 I gat him frae my daddy;
 My purse was light, and heart was sair,
 But my wit it was fu' ready.
 And sae I thought me on a time,
 Outwittens of my daddy,
 To fee mysel to a lawland laird,
 Wha had a bonny lady.

I wrote a letter, and thus began,—
 'Madam, be not offended,
 I'm o'er the lugs in love wi' you,
 And care not tho' ye kend it:
 For I get little frae the laird,
 And far less frae my daddy,
 And I would blythely be the man
 Would strive to please my lady.'

She read my letter, and she leugh,
 'Ye needna been sae blate, man;
 You might hae come to me yoursel,
 And tauld me o' your state, man:
 You might hae come to me yoursel,
 Outwittens o' ony body,
 And made John Gowkston of the laird,
 And kiss'd his bonny lady.'

Then she pat siller in my purse,
 We drank wine in a coggie;
 She feed a man to rub my horse,
 And wow; but I was vogie!

But I gat ne'er sae sair a fleg,
 Since I came frae my daddy.
 The laird came, rap, rap, to the yett,
 When I was wi' his lady.

Then she pat me below a chair,
 And happ'd me wi' a plaidie;
 But I was like to swarf wi' fear,
 And wish'd me wi' my daddy.
 The laird went out, he saw na me,
 I went when I was ready;
 I promis'd, but I ne'er gade back
 To kiss my bonny lady.]

Up and warn a' Willie.

THIS edition of the song, I got from Tom Niel, of facetious fame, in Edinburgh. The expression "Up and warn a' Willie," alludes to the Crantara, or warning of a Highland Clan to arms. Not understanding this, the Lowlanders in the west, and south, say, "Up and waur them a'," &c.

[The ballad given in Johnson is a sort of Gazette account of the battle of Sheriff-muir, where both generals claimed the victory; nor has the rustic minstrel decided the question. The song no sooner made its appearance than it was parodied in a scoffing ballad, of which the following is the starting verse.

Up an' waur them a', Willie,
 Up an' waur them a',
 Up and sell your sour milk,
 And craw aboon them a', Willie
 Up and waur them a', Willie,
 Up an' waur them a',
 Ye'se be prince o' Musselburgh,
 And king in Fisherraw, Willie.

Tom Niel, who gave the song to Burns, was a carpenter in Edinburgh, and lived chiefly by making coffins. He was also Precentor, or Clerk, in one of the churches. He had a good strong voice, and was greatly distinguished by his powers of mimicry, and his humorous manner of singing the old Scottish ballads.]

Auld Rob Morris.

It is remark-worthy that the song of "Hooly and Fairly," in all the old editions of it, is called "The Drunken wife o' Galloway," which localizes it to that country.

["Auld Rob Morris" and "The Drunken wife o' Galloway," are two first-rate old lyrics; the former was printed as an ancient strain in Ramsay's Tea-Table Miscellany: the latter was not discovered so early, yet it is equally authentic.

MITHER.

THERE'S Auld Rob Morris that wins in yon
glen, [men;
He's the king o' gude fallows, and wale o' auld
Has fourscore o' black sheep, and fourscore too,
And auld Rob Morris is the man ye maun loo.

DOUGHTER.

Haud your tongue, mither, and let that abee,
For his eild and my eild can never agree;
They'll never agree, and that will be seen,
For he is fourscore, and I'm but fifteen.

MITHER.

Haud your tongue, daughter, and lay by your pride,
For he's be the bridegroom, and ye's be the bride;
He shall lie by your side, and kiss ye too,
Auld Rob Morris is the man ye maun loo.

DOUGHTER.

Auld Rob Morris, I ken him fu' weel,
His back sticks out like ony peat-creel;
He's out-shinn'd, in-knee'd, and ringle-e'ed too,
Auld Rob Morris is the man I'll ne'er loo.

MITHER.

Tho' auld Rob Morris be an elderly man,
Yet his auld brass it will buy a new pan;
Then, daughter, ye shouldna be sae ill to shoo,
For auld Rob Morris is the man ye maun loo.

DOUGHTER.

But auld Rob Morris I never will hae, [grey;
His back is sae stiff, and his beard is grown
I had rather die than live wi' him a year,
Sae mair of Rob Morris I never will hear.

The "Drunken wife o' Gallowa" is in another strain: the idea is original, and it cannot be denied that the author, whoever he was, has followed up the conception with great spirit. A few verses will prove this.

OH! what had I ado for to marry, [nary;
My wife she drinks naething but sack and ca-
I to her friends complained right early,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly.

*Hooly and fairly; hooly and fairly,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!*

First she drank Crommie, and syne she drank
Garie,

Then she has drunken my bonnie grey mearie,
That carried me thro' the dub and the lairie,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!

The very grey mittens that gade on my han's,
To her ain neighbour wife she has laid them in pawns, [dearly,
Wi' my bane-headed staff that I lo'ed sae
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!

I never was given to wrangling nor strife,
Nor e'er did refuse her the comforts of life;
E'er it come to a war, I'm aye for a parley,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!

A pint wi' her cummers I wad her allow;
But when she sits down she fills hersell fou;
And when she is fou' she's unco camstrarie,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!

An when she comes hame, she lays on the lads,
And ca's a' the lasses baith limmers and jads;
And I my ain sell an auld cuckold carlie,
O! gin my wife wad drink hooly and fairly!]

Nancy's Ghost.

THIS song is by Dr. Blacklock.

[It was composed in 1787 expressly for the "Museum." It is adapted to the old air of
"Bonnie Kate of Edinburgh."

AH! hapless man, thy perjurd vow
Was to thy Nancy's heart a grave!
The damps of death bedew'd my brow
Whilst thou, the dying maid could save!"

Thus spake the vision, and withdrew;
From Sandy's cheeks the crimson fled;
Guilt and Despair their arrows threw,
And now behold the traitor dead!

Remember, swains, my artless strains,
To plighted faith be ever true;
And let no injurd maid complain
She finds false Sandy live in you!

Tune your Fiddles, &c.

THIS song was composed by the Rev. John Skinner, Nonjuror Clergyman at Linshart, near Peterhead. He is likewise author of Tullochgorum, Ewie wi' the Crooked Horn, John o' Badenyond, &c., and, what is of still more consequence, he is one of the worthiest of mankind. He is the author of an ecclesiastical history of Scotland. The air is by Mr. Marshall, butler to the Duke of Gordon; the first composer of strathspeys of the age. I have been told by somebody, who had it of Marshall himself, that he took the idea of his three most celebrated pieces, The Marquis of Huntley's Reel, His Farewell, and Miss Admiral Gordon's Reel, from the old air, "The German Lairdie."

[There is generally a dance of words in the lyric compositions of Skinner, which show that his heart was in harmony with the music: this is not wanting here:—

TUNE your fiddles, tune them sweetly,
Play the Marquis' Reel discreetly;
Here we are a band completely
Fitted to be jolly.
Come, my boys, be blythe and gaucie,
Every youngster choose his lassie,
Dance wi' life, and be not saucy,
Shy, nor melancholy.

Lay aside your sour grimaces,
Clouded brows, and drumlike faces;
Look about and see their graces,
How they smile delighted.
Now's the season to be merry,
Hang the thoughts of Charon's ferry;
Time enough to turn canstary,
When we're old and doited.]

Gil Morice.*

THIS plaintive ballad ought to have been called Child Maurice, and not Gil Morice. In its present dress, it has gained immortal honour from Mr. Home's taking from it the groundwork of his fine tragedy of Douglas. But I am of opinion that the present ballad is a modern composition; perhaps not much above the age of the middle of the last century; at least I should be glad to see or hear of a copy of the present words prior to 1650. That it was taken from an old ballad, called "Child Maurice," now lost, I am inclined to believe; but the present one may be classed with "Hardyknute," "Kenneth," "Duncan, the Laird of Woodhouselee," "Lord Livingston," "Binnorie," "The Death of Monteith," and many other modern productions, which have been swallowed by many readers as ancient fragments of old poems. This beautiful plaintive tune was composed by Mr. M'Gibbon, the selector of a collection of Scots tunes.—R. B.

In addition to the observations on Gil Morice, I add, that, of the songs which Capt. Riddel mentions, "Kenneth" and "Duncan" are juvenile compositions of Mr. M'Kenzie, "The Man of Feeling."—M'Kenzie's father shewed them in MSS. to Dr. Blacklock, as the productions of his son, from which the Doctor rightly prognosticated that the young poet would make, in his more advanced years, a respectable figure in the world of letters.

This I had from Blacklock.

[Of the many ancient ballads which have been preserved by tradition among the peasantry of Scotland, none has excited more interest in the world of letters than the beautiful and pathetic tale of "Gil Morice;" and this, no less on account of its own intrinsic merits as a piece of exquisite poetry, than of its having furnished the plot of the justly-celebrated tragedy of "Douglas." When this tragedy was originally produced at Edinburgh, in 1756, the title of the heroine was Lady Barnard: the alteration to Lady Randolph was made on its being transplanted to London. It was acted in Covent Garden in 1757. It has likewise supplied Mr. Langhorne with the principal materials from which he has woven the fabric of his sweet, though prolix, poem of 'Owen of Carron;' and Mr. Jamieson mentions that it has also been 'made the subject of a dramatic entertainment, with songs, by Mr. Rennie of Aberdeen.' From the ballad, so well known, it is needless to make any extracts: for pathetic simplicity it is all but unrivalled.]

When I upon thy Bosom lean.

THIS song was the work of a very worthy facetious old fellow, John Lapraik, late of Dalfram, near Muirkirk, which little property he was obliged to sell in consequence of some connexion as security for some persons concerned in that villanous bubble, THE AYR BANK. He has often told me that he composed this song one day when his wife had been fretting o'er their misfortunes.

[This is the very song "that some kind husband had address to some sweet wife," alluded to with such exquisite delicacy in the "Epistle to J. Lapraik."

THERE was ae sang among the rest,
Aboon them a' it pleas'd me best,
That some kind husband had address
To some sweet wife:

It thrill'd the heart-strings thro' the breast,
A' to the life.

* Mr. Pinkerton remarks that, in many parts of Scotland, "Gil" at this day, signifies "Child," as is the case in the Gaelic; thus, "Gilchrist" means the "Child of Christ."—

"Child" seems also to have been the customary appellation of a young nobleman, when about fifteen years of age.]

WHEN I UPON THY BOSOM LEAN.

WHEN I upon thy bosom lean,
 And fondly clasp thee a' my ain,
 I glory in the sacred ties
 That made us ane, wha ance were twain :
 A mutual flame inspires us baith,
 The tender look, the melting kiss :
 Even years shall ne'er destroy our love,
 But only gie us change o' bliss.

Hae I a wish? it's a' for thee ;
 I ken thy wish is me to please ;
 Our moments pass sae smooth away,
 That numbers on us look and gaze,
 Weel pleas'd they see our happy days,
 Nor envy's sel find aught to blame ;
 And ay when weary cares arise,
 Thy bosom still shall be my hame.

I'll lay me there, and take my rest,
 And if, that aught disturb my dear,
 I'll bid her laugh her cares away,
 And beg her not to drape a tear :
 Hae I a joy? its a' her ain ;
 United still her heart and mine ;
 They're like the woodbine round the tree,
 That's twin'd till death shall them disjoin.]

The Highland Character.

[OR, GARB OF OLD GAUL.]

THIS tune was the composition of Gen. Reid, and called by him "The Highland, or 42nd Regiment's March." The words are by Sir Harry Erskine.

[Sir Harry Erskine was a wit, an orator, and something of a poet: his song on the Highland character was once very popular: the commencement is indeed agreeable to national vanity, as well as suitable to the music.

In the garb of old Gaul, with the fire of old
 Rome, [we come,
 From the heath-cover'd mountains of Scotia
 Where the Romans endeavour'd our country to gain; [in vain.
 But our ancestors fought, and they fought not

No effeminate customs our sinews unbrace,
 No luxurious tables enervate our race,
 Our loud-sounding pipe bears the true martial strain,
 So do we the old Scottish valour retain.

* [Burns was quite right in this conjecture. "Leader Haughs and Yarrow" was written by one Nicol Burn, who seems to have been the last of the old Border Minstrels. "The words of Burn the Viol" are likely too his last lay.

We're tall as the oak on the mount of the vale, [assail,
 As swift as the roe which the hound doth
 As the full moon in autumn our shields do appear,
 Minerva would dread to encounter our spear.

As a storm in the ocean when Boreas blows,
 So are we enrag'd when we rush on our foes ;
 We sons of the mountains, tremendous as rocks, [ing strokes.]
 Dash the force of our foes with our thunder-

Leader-Haughs and Yarrow.

THERE is in several collections the old song of "Leader-Haughs and Yarrow." It seems to have been the work of one of our itinerant minstrels, as he calls himself, at the conclusion of his song, "Minstrel Burn."*

[Who Minstrel Burn was is a question which antiquaries seems unable to solve: that he was a borderer seems probable from the subject of his song, and that he had not a little of the poet's spirit his song survives to prove. The first and last verses are very beautiful.

I.

WHEN Phœbus bright, the azure skies
 With golden rays enlight'neth,
 He makes all Nature's beauties rise,
 Herbs, trees, and flow'rs he quick'neth :
 Amongst all those he makes his choice,
 And with delight goes thorow,
 With radiant beams and silver streams
 O'er Leader-Haughs and Yarrow.

II.

When Aries the day and night
 In equal length divideth,
 Auld frosty Saturn takes his flight,
 Nae langer he abideth ;
 Then Flora Queen, with mantle green,
 Casts aff her former sorrow,
 And vows to dwell with Ceres' sel',
 In Leader-Haughs and Yarrow.

III.

Pan playing on his aiten reed,
 And shepherds him attending,
 Do here resort their flocks to feed,
 The hills and haughs commending.
 With cur and kent upon the bent,
 Sing to the sun, good-morrow,
 And swear nae fields mair pleasure yields
 Than Leader-Haughs and Yarrow.

They appear to have been produced when "the minstrel was infirm and old;" and seem to have been intended as an addition and conclusion to his song of "Leader Haughs and Yarrow."]

IV.

A house there stands on Leaderside,*
 Surmounting my describing,
 With rooms sae rare, and windows fair,
 Like Dedalus' contriving;
 Men passing by, do often cry,
 In sooth it hath nae marrow;
 It stands as sweet on Leaderside,
 As Newark does on Yarrow.

V.

A mile below wha lists to ride,
 They'll hear the mavis singing;
 Into St. Leonard's banks she'll bide,
 Sweet birks her head o'erhinging;
 The lintwlight loud and Progne proud,
 With tuneful throats and narrow,
 Into St. Leonard's banks they sing
 As sweetly as in Yarrow.

VI.

The lapwing lilteth o'er the lee,
 With nimble wing she sporteth;
 But vows she'll flee far frae the tree
 Where Philomel resorteth:
 By break of day the lark can say,
 I'll bid you a good-morrow,
 I'll streak my wing, and, mounting, sing
 O'er Leader-Haughts and Yarrow.

VII.

Park, Wanton-waws, and Wooden-cleugh,
 The East and Western Maines,
 The wood of Lauder's fair enough,
 The corns are good in Blainshes;
 Where aits are fine, and sold by kind,
 That if ye search all thorow
 Means, Buchan, Mar, nane better are Than Leader-Haughts and Yarrow.

VIII.

In Burmill Bog, and Whiteslade Shaws,
 The fearful hare she haunteth;
 Brig-haugh and Braidwoodshiel she knaws,
 And Chapel-wood frequenteth;
 Yet when she irks, to Kaidlsy birks
 She rins, and sighs for sorrow,
 That she should leave sweet Leader-Haughts,
 And cannot win to Yarrow.

IX.

What sweeter music wad ye hear
 Than hounds and beiges crying?
 The started hare rins hard with fear,
 Upon her speed relying:
 But yet her strength it fails at length,
 Nae beilding can she burrow,
 In Sorrel's field, Cleckman, or Hag's,
 And sighs to be in Yarrow.

X.

For Rockwood, Ringwood, Spoty, Shag,
 With sight and scent pursue her,

Till, ah! her pith begins to flag,
 Nae cunning can rescue her:
 O'er dub and dyke, o'er seugh and syke,
 She'll rin the fields all thorow,
 Till faild, she fa's in Leader-Haughts,
 And bids fareweel to Yarrow.

XI.

Sing Erslington and Cowdenknows,
 Where Homes had ance commanding;
 And Drygrange with the milk-white ewes,
 'Twixt Tweed and Leader standing;
 The birds that flee throw Reedpath trees,
 And Gledswood banks ilk morrow,
 May chant and sing—Sweet Leader-Haughts,
 And bonny howms of Yarrow.

XII.

But Minstrel Burn cannot assuage
 His grief, while life endureth,
 To see the changes of this age,
 That fleeting time procureth:
 For mony a place stands in hard case,
 Where blyth fowk kend nae sorrow,
 With Homes that dwelt on Leaderside,
 And Scots that dwelt on Yarrow.

THE WORDS OF BURN THE VIOLER.†

WHAT, shall my viol silent be,
 Or leave her wonted scriding;
 But choice some sadder elegie,
 No sports and mirth deriding.

It must be fain with lower strain
 Than it was wont beforrow,
 To sound the praise of Leader-haughts
 And the bonny banks of Yarrow.

But floods have overflown the banks,
 The greenish haughts disgracing,
 And trees in woods grow thin in ranks,
 About the fields defacing.

For water waxes, wood doth waind,
 More, if I could for sorrow,
 In rural verse I could rehearse
 Of Leader-Haughts and Yarrow.

But sighs and sobs o'erset my breath,
 Sore saltish tears forth sending,
 All things sublunar here on earth
 Are subject to an ending.

So must my song, though somewhat long,
 Though late at even and morrow,
 I'll sigh and sing sweet Leader-Haughts,
 And the bonny banks of Yarrow.

* Thirlstane Castle: an ancient seat of the Earl of Lauderdale.

† [These verses do not appear to have been known to Allan Ramsay, when compiling his "Tea Table Miscellany," otherwise we think he would have printed them along with the song to which they form the melancholy companion. The above constitute, we fear, all the remaining works of Burn the Violer.]

This is no my ain House.

THE first half-stanza is old, the rest is Ramsay's. The old words are—

O THIS is no my ain house,
My ain house, my ain house;
This is no my ain house,
I ken by the biggin o't.

Bread and cheese are my door-cheeks,
My door-cheeks, my door-cheeks;
Bread and cheese are my door-cheeks,
And pan-cakes the riggin o't.

This is no my ain wean,
My ain wean, my ain wean;
This is no my ain wean,
I ken by the greetie o't.

I'll tak the curchie aff my head,
Aff my head, aff my head;
I'll tak the curchie aff my head,
And row't about the feetie o't.

The tune is an old Highland air, called
"Shuan truish willighan."

Laddie, lie near me.

THIS song is by Dr. Blacklock.

[The chief fault of the lyric compositions of this poet is want of simplicity: with how much ease Burns and the old minstrels commenced their strains, compared to the starting stanza of "Laddie, lie near me."

HARK, the loud tempest shakes the earth to its centre, [venture;
How mad were the task on a journey to
How dismal's my prospect, of life I am weary,
O! listen, my love, I beseech thee to hear me,
Hear me, hear me, in tenderness hear me;
All the long winter night, laddie, lie near me.

Nights though protracted, tho' piercing the weather, [gether;
Yet summer was endless when we were to-
Now since thy absence I feel most severely
Joy is extinguished and being is dreary,
Dreary, dreary, painful and dreary; [me.
All the long winter night, laddie, lie near

With far more natural ease the author of the old verses glides into his subject.

LANG hae we parted been, lassie, my dearie,
Now we are met again, lassie, lie near me,
Near me, near me, lassie, lie near me;
Lang hast thou lien thy lane, lassie lie near me.

A' that I hae endur'd, lassie, my dearie,
Here in thy arms is cur'd, lassie, lie near me,
Near me, near me, lassie, lie near me; [me.
Lang hast thou lien thy lane, lassie, lie near

These words have a Jacobite hue: the song was composed, it is said, by one of the Scottish exiles on returning to his family after the act of oblivion.]

The Gaberlunzie Man.*

THE Gaberlunzie Man is supposed to commemorate an intrigue of James the Vth. Mr. Callander of Craigforth published, some years ago, an edition of "Christ's Kirk on the Green," and the "Gaberlunzie Man," with notes critical and historical. James the Vth is said to have been fond of Gosford, in Aberlady Parish, and that it was suspected by his contemporaries that, in his frequent excursions to that part of the country, he had other purposes in view besides golfing and archery. Three favourite ladies, Sandilands, Weir, and Oliphant (one of them resided at Gosford, and the others in the neighbourhood), were occasionally visited by their royal and gallant admirer, which gave rise to the following satirical advice to his Majesty, from Sir David Lindsay, of the Mount, Lord Lyon. †

Sow not yere seed on Sandilands,
Spend not yere strength in Weir,
And ride not on yere Oliphants,
For gawing o' yere gear.

[Of the nature of his Majesty's nocturnal excursions this, and the ballad beginning

There was a jolly beggar, and a begging he was bound, will fully inform the reader; he indulged too in other rambles of a martial nature, of which the border still carries the tokens. James was at once a poet, a warrior, and a musician. Of his skill in ballad-making, "The Gaberlunzie Man" will be a lasting record.

THE pawky auld carle came o'er the lea,
Wi' many good e'ens and days to me,
Saying, Goodwife, for your courtesie,
Will ye lodge a silly poor man?
The night was cauld, the carle was wat,
And down ayont the ingle he sat;
My daughter's shoulders he 'gan to clap,
And cadgily ranted and sang.

O wow! quo' he, were I as free
As first when I saw this countrie,

* A Wallef-man, or tinker, who appears to have been formerly a Jack-of-all-trades.]

† [Sir David was Lion King-at-Arms, under James V.]

How blyth and merry wad I be!
 And I wad never think lang,
 He grew canty, and she grew fain;
 But little did her auld minny ken
 What thir slee twa together were say'n',
 When wooing they were sae thrang.

And O! quo' he, and ye were as black
 As e'er the crown of my daddy's hat,
 'Tis I wad lay thee on my back,
 And awa' wi' me thou shou'd gang.
 And O! quo' she, an' I were as white,
 As e'er the snaw lay on the dike,
 I'd clead me braw, and lady like,
 And awa' with thee I'd gang.

Between the twa was made a plot;
 They raise awee before the cock,
 And wilyly they shot the lock,
 And fast to the bent are they gane.
 Up in the morn the auld wife raise,
 And at her leisure put on her claise;
 Syne to the servant's bed she gaes,
 To speer for the silly poor man.

She gaed to the bed where the beggar lay,
 The strae was cauld, he was away,
 She clapt her hand, cry'd, dulefu' day!
 For some of our gear will be gane.
 Some ran to coffer, and some to kist,
 But nought was stown that cou'd be mist,
 She danc'd her lane, cry'd, praise be blest!
 I have lodg'd a leal poor man.

Since naething's awa', as we can learn,
 The kirn's to kirn, and milk to earn,
 Gae bid the house, lass, and wauken my bairn,
 And bid her come quickly ben.
 The servant gade where the daughter lay,
 The sheets were cauld, she was away,
 And fast to her goodwife did say,
 She's aff with the Gaberlunzie-man.

O fy! gar ride, and fy! gar rin,
 And haste ye find these traitors again;
 For she's be burnt, and he's be slain,
 The wearifu' Gaberlunzie-man.
 Some rade upo' horse, some ran a foot,
 The wife was wud, and out o' her wit,
 She cou'd na gang, nor yet cou'd she sit,
 But ay did curse and did ban.

Meantime far hind out o'er the lea,
 Fu' snug in a glen where nane could see,
 The twa, with kindly sport and glee,
 Cut frae a new cheese a vhang.
 The priving was good, it pleas'd them baith;
 To lo'e for ay, he gae her his aith:
 Quo' she, to leave thee I will be laith,
 My winsome Gaberlunzie man.

O kenn'd, my minnie, I were wi' you,
 Ill-fardly wad she crook her mou',

Sic a poor man she'd never trow,
 After the Gaberlunzie-man.
 My dear, quo' he, ye're yet o'er young,
 And ha' nae learn'd the beggar's tongue,
 To follow me frae town to town,
 And carry the gaberlunzie on.

Wi' cauk and keel I'll win your bread,
 And spindles and whorles for them wha need,
 Whilk is a gentle trade indeed,
 To carry the gaberlunzie on.
 I'll bow my leg, and crook my knee,
 And draw a black clout o'er my e'e;
 A cripple, or blind, they will ca' me,
 While we shall be merry and sing.

This very graphic song is printed as the composition of James V. of Scotland. "A prince," says Percy, "whose character, for wit and libertinism, bears a great resemblance to that of his gay successor, Charles II. He was noted," the Bishop adds, "for strolling about his dominions in disguise, and for his frequent gallantries with country girls. Two adventures of this kind he hath celebrated with his own pen, viz., in the Gaberlunzie-man, and The Jolly Beggar."

"I know not," says Cunningham, "where a more lively picture of living life, or a story of rustic intrigue, told with such naïveté and discretion, is to be found, than in the above song."]

The black Eagle.

THIS song is by Dr. Fordyce, whose merits as a prose writer are well known.

HARK! yonder eagle lonely wails;
 His faithful bosom grief assails;
 Last night I heard him in my dream,
 When death and woe were all the theme.
 Like that poor bird I make my moan,
 I grieve for dearest Delia gone;
 With him to gloomy rocks I fly,
 He mourns for love, and so do I.

'Twas mighty love that tam'd his breast,
 'Tis tender grief that breaks his rest;
 He droops his wings, he hangs his head,
 Since she he fondly lov'd was dead.
 With Delia's breath my joy expir'd,
 'Twas Deila's smiles my fancy fir'd;
 Like that poor bird, I pine, and prove
 Nought can supply the place of love.

Dark as his feathers was the fate
 That robb'd him of his darling mate;
 Dimm'd is the lustre of his eye,
 That wont to gaze the sun-bright sky.

To him is now for ever lost
The heart-felt bliss he once could boast ;
Thy sorrows, hapless bird, display
An image of my soul's dismay.

Dr. Fordyce perished at sea in the year 1755.]

◆

Johnnie Cope.

THIS satirical song was composed to commemorate General Cope's defeat at Preston Pans, in 1745, when he marched against the Clans.

The air was the tune of an old song, of which I have heard some verses, but now only remember the title, which was,

Will ye go the coals in the morning.

[The following is the old song to which Burns refers:—

I.

COPE sent a challenge frae Dunbar—
Charlie, meet me, an ye daur,
And I'll learn you the art of war,
If you'll meet me in the morning.

CHORUS.

Hey Johnnie Cope, are ye wakin' yet?
Or are your drums a-beatin' yet?
If ye were wakin' I would wait
To gang to the coals i' the morning.

II.

When Charlie look'd the letter upon,
He drew his sword the scabbard from,
Come follow me, my merry merry men,
To meet Johnnie Cope i' the morning.

III.

Now, Johnnie Cope, be as good's your word,
And try our fate wi' fire and sword,
And dinna tak wing like a frighten'd bird,
That's chas'd frae its nest i' the morning.

IV.

When Johnnie Cope he heard of this,
He thought it wadna be amiss
To hae a horse in readiness
To flee awa' i' the morning.

V.

Fy Johnnie, now get up and rin,
The Highland bagpipes make a din,
It's best to sleep in a hale skin,
For 'twill be a bluidie morning.

VI.

Yon's no the took o' England's drum,
But it's the war-pipes deadly strum ;
And poues the claymore and the gun—
It will be a bluidy morning.

VII.

When Johnnie Cope to Dunbar came,
They speer'd at him "Where's a' your men?"
"The deil confound me gin I ken,
For I left them a' i' the morning."

VIII.

Now, Johnnie, truth ye was na blate,
To come wi' the news o' your ain defeat,
And leave your men in sic a strait,
Sae early in the morning.

IX.

Ah! faith, quo' Johnnie, I got a fleg,
With their claymores and philabeg ;
If I face them again, deil break my leg,
Sae I wish you a good morning.
Hey Johnnie Cope, are ye wakin' yet?
Or are your drums a-beatin' yet?
If ye were wakin' I would wait
To gang to the coals i' the morning.

When Cope fled, the fleetness of his horse carried him foremost, upon which a Scotsman sarcastically complimented him, "God, Sir, but ye hae won the race, win the battle wha like !"]

◆

Cease, cease, my dear Friend to explore.

The song is by Dr. Blacklock ; I believe, but I AM not quite certain that the air is his too.

[There are some pretty lines and agreeable thoughts in this song:—

CEASE, cease, my dear friend to explore
From whence and how piencing my smart ;
Let the charms of the nymph I adore
Excuse and interpret my heart.
Then how much I admire ye shall prove,
When like me ye are taught to admire,
And imagine how boundless my love,
When you number the charms that inspire.

Than sunshine more dear to my sight,
To my life more essential than air,
To my soul she is perfect delight,
To my sense all that's pleasing and fair.
The swains, who her beauty behold,
With transport applaud every charm,
And swear that the breast must be cold
Which a beam so intense cannot warm.

Does my boldness offend my dear maid ?
Is my fondness loquacious and free ?
Are my visits too frequently paid ?
Or my converse unworthy of thee ?
Yet when grief was too big for my breast,
And labour'd in sighs to complain,
Its struggles I oft have suppress'd,
And silence impos'd on my pain.

Ah, Strephon, how vain thy desire,
 Thy numbers and music how vain,
 While merit and fortune conspire
 The smiles of the nymph to obtain.
 Yet cease to upbraid the soft choice,
 Tho' it ne'er should determine for thee;
 If my heart in her joy may rejoice,
 Unhappy thou never canst be.

Auld Robin Gray.

THIS air was formerly called, "The Bridegroom greets when the Sun gangs down." The words are by Lady Ann Lindsay, of the Balcarras family.

[WHEN the sheep are in the fauld, and a' the kye at hame,
 And a' the weary warld to sleep are gane:
 The waes of my heart fa' in show'rs frae my e'e,
 When my gudeman sleeps sound by me.

Young Jamie lo'ed me weel, and he sought me
 for his bride,
 But saving a crown he had naething else beside;
 To make that crown a pound, my Jamie gade
 to sea,
 And the crown and the pound were baith for me.

He hadna been gane a year and a day,
 When my father brak his arm, and my Jamie
 at the sea, [away;
 My mither she fell sick, and our cow was stown
 And auld Robin Gray came a courting to me.

My father coudna work, and my mither coudna spin, [win;
 I toil'd day and night, but their bread I coudna
 Auld Rob maintain'd them baith, and wi' tears in his e'e,
 Said, "Jenny, for their sakes, O marry me."

My heart it said nae, for I look'd for Jamie back, [a wrack;
 But the wind it blew high, and the ship it was
 The ship it was a wrack, why didna Jenny die,
 And why do I live to say, wae's me?

My father argu'd sair, tho' my mither didna speak, [break;
 She lookit in my face till my heart was like to Sae they gi'ed him my hand, tho' my heart was in the sea,
 And auld Robin Gray is gudeman to me.

I hadna been a wife a week but only four,
 When, sitting sae mournfully at the door,
 I saw my Jamie's wraith, for I coudna think it he, [thee."
 'Till he said, "I'm come back for to marry

O sair did we greet, and mickle did we say,
 We took but ae kiss, and we tore ourselves away;
 I wish I were dead! but I'm no like to die,
 And why do I live to say, wae's me!

I gang like a ghaist, and I carena to spin,
 I darena think on Jamie, for that wad be a sin;
 But I'll do my best a gudewife to be,
 For auld Robin Gray is kind unto me.]*

Donald and Flora.

THIS is one of those fine Gaelic tunes, preserved from time immemorial in the Hebrides; they seem to be the ground-work of many of our finest Scots pastoral tunes. The words of this song were written to commemorate the unfortunate expedition of General Burgoyne in America, in 1777.

[This fine ballad is the composition of Hector Macneil, Esq., author of the celebrated poem, "Will and Jean," and other popular works. Hector Macneil was looked up to as Scotland's hope in song when Burns died; his poems flew over the north like wildfire, and half a dozen editions were bought up in a year. The Donald of the song was Captain Stewart, who fell at the battle of Saratoga, and Flora was a young lady of Athole, to whom he was betrothed.]

WHEN merry hearts were gay,
 Careless of aught but play,
 Poor Flora slipt away,
 Sad'ning to Mora;†

* [Pinkerton, after observing that none of the "Scotch amatory ballads are written by ladies," and that the "profligacy of manners which always reigns before women can so utterly forget all sense of decency and propriety as to commence authors, is yet almost unknown in Scotland," adds, in a note, that "there is indeed, of very late years, one insignificant exception to this rule; 'Auld Robin Gray,' having got his silly psalm set to soporific music, is, to the credit of our taste, popular for the day. But after lulling some good-natured audiences asleep, he will soon fall asleep himself." Ritson, with a becoming boldness and indignation at the author of these ungracious and ungallant remarks, steps forward with his accustomed bantam-cock courage, and thus strikes at the hard forehead of Pinkerton. "Alas! this

'silly psalm' will continue to be sung, 'to the credit of our taste,' long after the author of this equally ridiculous and malignant paragraph shall be as completely forgotten as yesterday's Ephemeron, and his printed trash be only occasionally discernible at the bottom of a pie. Of the twenty-four Scottish song-writers whose names are preserved, four, if not five, are females; and, as poetesses, two more might be added to the number.

† At the time Mr. Pinkerton made this unmanly remark, he must have been aware that an examination of the characters of our principal female authors would have convinced him of its fallacy.]

† [Mora is the name of a small valley in Athole, so named by the two lovers.]

Loose flow'd her coal black hair,
Quick heav'd her bosom bare,
As thus to the troubled air
She vented her sorrow :—

“ Loud howls the northern blast,
Bleak is the dreary waste ;
Haste thee, O ! Donald, haste,
Haste to thy Flora !
Twice twelve long months are o'er,
Since, on a foreign shore,
You promis'd to fight no more,
But meet me in Mora.

“ ‘ Where now is Donald dear ?
Maids cry with taunting sneer ;
‘ Say is he still sincere
To his lov'd Flora ?
Parents upbraid my moan,
Each heart is turn'd to stone ;
Ah ! Flora, thou'rt now alone,
Friendless in Mora !

“ Come then, O come away !
Donald, no longer stay ;—
Where can my rover stray
From his lov'd Flora ?
Ah ! sure he ne'er can be False to his vows and me—
O, Heaven ! is not yonder he Bounding o'er Mora ?”

“ Never, ah ! wretched fair !
(Sigh'd the sad messenger,)
Never shall Donald mair
Meet his lov'd Flora !
Cold, cold beyond the main,
Donald, thy love, lies slain :
He sent me to sooth thy pain,
Weeping in Mora.

“ Well fought our gallant men,
Headed by brave Burgoyne,
Our heroes were thrice led on
To British glory.
But ah ! tho' our foes did flee,
Sad was the loss to thee,
While every fresh victory
Drown'd us in sorrow.

“ Here, take this trusty blade,
(Donald expiring said,)
‘ Give it to yon dear maid,
Weeping in Mora.

Tell her, oh Allan ! tell,
Donald thus bravely fell,
And that in his last farewell
He thought on his Flora.’”

Mute stood the trembling fair,
Speechless with wild despair,
Then, striking her bosom bare,
Sigh'd out, ‘ Poor Flora !
Oh ! Donald ! oh, well a day !
Was all the fond heart could say ;
At length the sound died away
Feebly, in Mora.]

The Captive Ribband.

THIS air is called “ Robie donna Gorach.”

[The song of “ The Captive Ribband” has been generally imputed to Burns. Here are the words—the reader may judge for himself: they are adapted to a Gaelic air, called Robie donna Gorach, or Daft Robin. This air is evidently a slight alteration of the fine old triple tune, entitled Earl Douglas's Lament.

DEAR MYRA, the captive Ribband's mine,
’Twas all my faithful love could gain ;
And would you ask me to resign
The sole reward that crowns my pain ?

Go, bid the hero who has run
Thro' fields of death to gather fame,
Go, bid him lay his laurels down,
And all his well-earn'd praise disclaim.

The ribband shall its freedom lose,
Lose all the bliss it had with you,
And share the fate I would impose
On thee, wert thou my captive too.

It shall upon my bosom live,
Or clasp me in a close embrace ;
And at its fortune if you grieve,
Retrieve its doom and take its place.]

The Bridal o't.

THIS song is the work of a Mr. Alexander Ross,* late schoolmaster at Lochlee ; and author truth his humble abode was little better than a desert, though not inhabited by savages ; nothing on earth being less savage than a mere uncultivated Highlander. I speak from the experience of many years of the early part of my life, which I had the happiness of spending in the North Highlands of Scotland, the country of ‘ Honest men and bonny lasses.’

“ Mr. Ross was also author of two excellent songs, called ‘ What ails the Lasses at me ?’ and ‘ The Rock and the wee pickle tow.’ They are printed in the Museum immediately after ‘ The Bridal o't.’ He was born about the year 1700. His father was a farmer in the parish of Kincardine O'Neil, Aberdeen-shire. His first settlement was at Birs, as parochial

* [“ The reader will be pleas'd to find,” says Cromek, “ from the following communication to the editor, by Mrs. Murray, of Bath (authoress of ‘ Roy's Wife of Aldivalloch,’), that Mr. Ross was one of the very few writers that practis'd what they taught.

“ I knew a good deal of Mr. Ross, author of ‘ The Fortunate Shepherdess,’ but it was many years ago.—I still remember him with respect, as a man of most amiable character. His genius and talents speak for themselves in the above-mentioned beautiful little poem, and one cannot help regretting that such abilities were only born to ‘ blush unscen, and waste their sweetness on the desert air ;’ for in of a beautiful Scots poem, called "The Fortunate Shepherdess."

[THEY say that Jockey'll speed weel o't,
They say that Jockey'll speed weel o't,
For he grows braver ilka day—
I hope we'll hae a bridal o't,
For yesternight, nae farder gane,
The backhouse at the side wa' o't,
He there wi' Meg was mirden seen—
I hope we'll hae a bridal o't.

An we had but a bridal o't,
An we had but a bridal o't,
We'd leave the rest unto gude luck,
Altho' there should betide ill o't:
For bridal days are merry times,
And young folks like the coming o't,
And scribbles they bang up their rhymes,
And pipers they the bumming o't.

The lasses like a bridal o't,
The lasses like a bridal o't,
Their brows maun be in rank and file,
Altho' that they should guide ill o't:
The boddom o' the kist is then
Turn'd up unto the inmost o't,
The end that held the kecks sae clean,
Is now become the teemest o't.

The bangster at the threshing o't,
The bangster at the threshing o't,
Afore it comes is fidgin fain,
And ilka day's a clashing o't:
He'll sell his jerkin for a groat,
His linder for anither o't,
And e'er he want to clear his shot,
His sark'll pay the tither o't.

The pipers and the fiddlers o't,
The pipers and the fiddlers o't,
Can smell a bridal unco' far,
And like to be the middlers o't;
Fan* thick and threefold they convene,
Ilk ane envies the tither o't,
And wishes nane but him alane
May ever see anither o't.

Fan they hae done wi' eating o't,
Fan they hae done wi' eating o't,
For dancing they gae to the green,
And aiblins to the beating o't:
He dances best that dances fast,
And louns at ilka reesing o't,
And claps his hands frae hough to hough,
And furls about the feezings o't.]

Todden Hame.

THIS is perhaps the first bottle song that ever was composed. The author's name is unknown.

[WHEN I've a saxpence under my thumb,
Then I'll get credit in ilka town:
But ay when I'm poor they bid me gae by;
O! poverty parts good company.
Todden hame, todlen hame,
Coudna my love come todlen hame?

Fair fa' the goodwife, and send her good sale,
She gies us w^hite bannocks to drink her ale,
Syne if her tipp^lay chance to be sma',
We'll tak a good scour o't, and ca't awa'.
Todden hame, todlen hame,
As round as a neep come todlen hame.

My kimmer and I lay down to sleep,
And twa pint-stoups at our bed-feet; [dry:
And ay when we waken'd, we drank them
What think ye of my wee kimmer and I?
Todden but, and todlen ben,
Sae round as my love comes todlen hame.

Leeze me on liquor, my todlen dow,
Ye're ay sae good humour'd when weeting
your mou';
When sober sae sour, ye'll fight wi' a flee,
That 'tis a blyth sight to the bairns and me,
When todlen hame, todlen hame, [hame.]
When round as a neep ye come todlen

The Shepherd's Preference.

THIS song is Dr. Blacklock's.—I don't know how it came by the name, but the oldest appellation of the air was, "Whistle and I'll come to you my lad."

It has little affinity to the tune commonly known by that name.

[IN May, when the daisies appear on the green,
And flow'rs in the field and the forest are seen; [up sprung,
Where lilies bloom'd bonnie, and hawthorns
A pensive young shepherd oft whistled and sung. [flow'rs,
But neither the shades nor the sweets of the Nor the blackbirds that warbled in blossoming bowers;

schoolmaster, about the year 1733. He removed to Lochlee, Forfar-shire, where he died in May, 1783, after residing fifty years in the centre of the Grampians, almost secluded from the converse of men and books. Mr. Ross's grandson, the Rev. Alexander Thomson, gives the following account of him in a letter to Mr. Campbell, author of 'An Introduction to the History of Poetry in Scotland,' dated Lintrethen, 14th June, 1798.—'He (Ross) was a plain man, had the character of being a good schoolmaster, was very religious, which appeared by his behaviour as much as by his profession. He was an excellent Latin scholar, and wrote with considerable accuracy, till the days of old age and infirmity, when he composed a poem, entitled 'The Orphan,' and attempted to publish it at Aberdeen, with some other little performances, which, on account of their inaccuracy, of which the worthy author was not so sensible as he would have formerly been, he was advised by Dr. Beattie, one of his best friends, not to publish.'''

* Fan, when—the dialect of Angus.

Could brighten his eye or his ear entertain,
For love was his pleasure, and love was his pain.

The shepherd thus sung, while his flocks all around [sound;
Drew nearer and nearer, and sigh'd to the Around, as in chains, lay the beasts of the wood,
With pity disarm'd, and with music subdu'd.
Young Jessie is fair as the spring's early flow'r, [bow'r];
And Mary sings sweet as the bird in her
But Peggy is fairer and sweeter than they,
With looks like the morning—with smiles like the day.

The blind bard continues the strain through three other verses: he had a fine ear, but external nature had begun to fade and grow dim in his remembrance.]

John O' Badenyon'd.*

THIS excellent song is the composition of my worthy friend, old Skinner, at Linshart.

[“The songs of Skinner deserve to the full the eulogiums of Burns. Our ancestors tolerated strains of a length that would weary out the patience of their descendants in singing.
But then amusements in those days were few, and he who could sing a long song, or recite a long story, was of some account: at present we have so multiplied our enjoyments that he who would sing John of Badenyon'd, or one of Robin Hood's Ballads, would be looked upon as one who desired to rob us of variety in pleasure.”—CUNNINGHAM.

WHEN first I cam to be a man
Of twenty years or so,
I thought myself a handsome youth,
And fain the world would know;
In best attire I stept abroad,
With spirits brisk and gay,
And here, and there, and every where,
Was like a morn in May.
No care had I, nor fear of want,
But rambled up and down,
And for a beau I might have pass'd
In country or in town;
I still was pleas'd where'er I went,
And when I was alone,
I tun'd my pipe and pleas'd myself
Wi' John o' Badenyon'.

Now in the days of youthful prime,
A mistress I must find,
For love, they say, gives one an air,
And ev'n improves the mind:
On Phillis fair, above the rest,
Kind fortune fix'd my eyes;
Her piercing beauty struck my heart,
And she became my choice:
To Cupid then with hearty pray'r,
I offer'd many a vow;
And danc'd, and sung, and sigh'd, and swore,
As other lovers do:
But, when at last I breath'd my flame,
I found her cold as stone;
I left the jilt, and tun'd my pipe,
To John o' Badenyon'.

When love had thus my heart beguil'd
With foolish hopes and vain;
To friendship's port I steer'd my course,
And laugh'd at lover's pain;
A friend I got by lucky chance,
'Twas something like divine,
An honest friend's a precious gift,
And such a gift was mine:
And now, whatever might betide,
A happy man was I,
In any strait I knew to whom
I freely might apply:
A strait soon came, my friend I try'd;
He heard, and spurn'd my moan;
I hi'd me home, and pleas'd myself
With John o' Badenyon'.

I thought I should be wiser next,
And would a patriot turn,
Began to doat on Johnny Wilkes,
And cry up Parson Horne.
Their manly spirit I admir'd,
And prais'd their noble zeal,
Who had with flaming tongue and pen
Maintain'd the public weal;
But e'er a month or two had past,
I found myself betray'd,
'Twas self and party after all,
For all the stir they made;
At last I saw these factious knaves
Insult the very throne,
I curs'd them a', and tun'd my pipe
To John o' Badenyon'.

And now, ye youngsters every where
Who want to make a show,
Take heed in time, nor vainly hope
For happiness below;
What you may fancy pleasure here
Is but an empty name,
For girls and friends, and books, and so,
You'll find them all the same.
Then be advis'd, and warning take
From such a man as me,
I'm neither Pope, nor Cardinal,
Nor one of high degree:

* [The words of Burns's celebrated Dirge “Man was made to Mourn,” were composed to this tune.]

You'll find displeasure everywhere ;
Then do as I have done,
E'en tune your pipe, and please yourself
With John o' Badenyon'.]

A Waukrife Minnie.*

I PICKED up this old song and tune from a country girl in Nithsdale.—I never met with it elsewhere in Scotland :—

“ WHARE are you gaun, my bonnie lass ?
Whare are you gaun, my hinnie ?”
She answer'd me right saucilie—
An errand for my minnie.

“ O whare live ye, my bonnie lass ?
O whare live ye, my hinnie ?”—
By yon burn-side, gin ye maun ken,
In a wee house wi' my minnie.

But I foor up the glen at e'en,
To see my bonnie lassie ;
And lang before the grey morn cam,
She was na hauf sae saucie.

O weary fa' the waukrife cock,
And the fomar lay his crawin !
He wauken'd the auld wife frae her sleep,
A wee blink or the dawin.

An angry wife I wat she raise,
And o'er the bed she brought her ;
And wi' a mickle hazle rung
She made her a weel pay'd dochter.

“ O fare thee weel, my bonnie lass !
O fare thee weel, my hinnie !
Thou art a gay and a bonnie lass,
But thou hast a waukrife minnie.”†

The Editor thinks it respectful to the poet to preserve the verses he thus recovered.

R. B.

[“ I have frequently heard this song sung in Nithsdale—and sung too with many variations. I am of opinion, nevertheless, that a large portion of it is the work of Burns himself. That several of the verses have been amended by him I have not the least doubt. It may gratify some to know that he lessened the indelicacy without impairing the wit of the song: his omissions too are on the same side: the concluding verse may be quoted—I have no wish to restore it—

* A watchful mother.

† [The way that I have always heard this song sung ended thus :—

“ But I'll come back an' see you yet,
For a' your waukrife minnie.”—Hogg.]

“ O though thy hair were hanks o' gowd,
And thy lips o' drappin hinnie ;
Thou hast gotten the clog that winna cling,
For a' thy waukrife minnie.”

CUNNINGHAM.]

Tullochgorum.

THIS FIRST of SONGS is the master-piece of my old friend SKINNER. He was passing the day, at the town of Cullen, I think it was [he should have said Ellon], in a friend's house, whose name was Montgomery. Mrs. Montgomery observing, en passant, that the beautiful reel of Tullochgorum wanted words, she begged them of Mr. Skinner, who gratified her wishes, and the wishes of every lover of Scottish song, in this most excellent ballad.

These particulars I had from the author's son, Bishop Skinner, at Aberdeen.

I.

COME gie's a sang, Montgomery cry'd,
And lay your disputes all aside,
What signifies't for folks to chide
For what was done before them :
Let Whig and Tory all agree,
Whig and Tory, Whig and Tory,
Whig and Tory all agree,
To drop their Whig-mig-morum.
Let Whig and Tory all agree
To spend the night in mirth and glee,
And cheerful sing, along wi' me,
The Reel o' Tullochgorum.

II.

O, Tullochgorum's my delight,
It gars us a' in ane unite,
And ony sumph that keeps up spite,
In conscience I abhor him :
For blythe and cheerie we'll be a',
Blythe and cheerie, blythe and cheerie,
Blythe and cheerie we'll be a',
And mak' a happy quorum,
For blythe and cheerie we'll be a',
As lang as we hae breath to draw,
And dance, till we be like to fa',
The Reel o' Tullochgorum.

III.

What needs there be sae great a fraise,
Wi' dringing dull Italian lays ?
I wadna gie our ain Strathspeys
For half a hunder score o' em.
They're dowf and dowie at the best,
Dowf and dowie, dowf and dowie,
Dowf and dowie at the best,
Wi' a' their variorum ;
They're dowf and dowie at the best,
Their allegros and a' the rest,

They canna' please a Scottish taste,
Compar'd wi' Tullochgorum.

IV.

Let warldly worms their minds oppress
Wi' fears o' want and double cess,
And sullen sots themselfs distress
Wi' keeping up decorum :
Shall we sae sour and sulky sit,
Sour and sulky, sour and sulky,
Sour and sulky shall we sit
Like old philosophorum ?
Shall we sae sour and sulky sit,
Wi' neither sense, nor mirth, nor wit,
Nor ever try to shake a fit
To the Reel o' Tullochgorum ?

V.

May choicest blessings e'er attend
Each honest, open-hearted friend,
And calm and quiet be his end
And all that's good watch o'er him !
May peace and plenty be his lot,
Peace and plenty, peace and plenty,
Peace and plenty be his lot,
And dainties a great store o' em ;
May peace and plenty be his lot,
Unstain'd by any vicious spot,
And may he never want a groat,
That's fond o' Tullochgorum !

VI.

But for the sullen frampish fool,
That loves to be oppression's tool,
May envy gnaw his rotten soul,
And discontent devour him !
May dool and sorrow be his chance,
Dool and sorrow, dool and sorrow,
Dool and sorrow be his chance ;
And nane say, Wae's me for him !
May dool and sorrow be his chance,
Wi' a' the ills that come frae France,
Whae'er he be that winna dance
The Reel o' Tullochgorum !

Auld Lang Syne.

RAMSAY here, as is usual with him, has taken the idea of the song, and the first line, from the old fragment, which may be seen in the "Museum," vol. v.

[In Watson's Collection of Scots Poems, Part III., Edinburgh, 1711, 8vo., there is a poem entitled "Old Long syne," written about the middle of the 17th century. It contains ten stanzas, of which the first and sixth may serve as a specimen. It is probably an English ballad, founded on one of an earlier date :—

SHOULD old acquaintance be forgot
And never thought upon,
The flames of love extinguished,
And freely past and gone ?
Is thy kind heart now grown so cold,
In that loving breast of thine,
That thou canst never once reflect
On old-long-syne ?

If e'er I have a house, my dear,
That truly is call'd mine,
And can afford but country cheer,
Or ought that's good therein ;
Tho' thou wert rebel to the king,
And beat with wind and rain,
Assurè thyself of welcome love,
For old-long-syne.]

The Ewie wi' the crooked Horn.

ANOTHER excellent song of old Skinner's.

[The "Poor Mailie" of Burns is said to have been suggested by "The Ewie wi' the crooked horn" of Skinner—with what truth the poem itself will show. The simplicity, tenderness, pathos, and humour of the verses of the bard of Kyle far exceed those of the poet of Linshart.

I.

O WERE I able to rehearse
My Ewie's praise in proper verse,
I'd sound it out as loud and fierce
As ever piper's drone could blaw.
The Ewie wi' the crookit horn
Weel deserv'd baith garse and corn ;
Sic a Ewie ne'er was born
Hereabout, nor far awa',
Sic a Ewie ne'er was born
Hereabout, nor far awa'.

II.

I never needed tar nor keil
To mark her upo' hip or heel,
Her crookit horn did just as weel
To ken her by amo' them a' ;
She never threaten'd scab nor rot,
But kept ay her ain jog trot,
Baith to the fauld and to the cot,
Was never sweir to lead nor ca' ;
Baith to the fauld and to the cot,
Was never sweir to lead nor ca'.

III.

Cauld nor hunger never dang her,
Wind nor rain could never wrang her,
Ance she lay an ouk and langer,
Out aneath a wreath o' snaw :
Whanither Ewies lap the dyke,
And ate the kail for a' the tyke,

My Ewie never play'd the like,
But tye'd about the barn yard wa';
My Ewie never play'd the like,
But tye'd about the barn yard wa'.

IV.

A better nor a thriftier beast
Nae honest man cou'd weel hae wist,
Puir silly thing, she never mist
To hae ilk year a lamb or twa.
The first she had I ga'e to Jock,
To be to him a kind of stock,
And now the laddie has a flock
Of mair nor thirty head to ca'.
And now the laddie has a flock
Of mair nor thirty head to ca'.

V.

The neist I ga'e to Jean; and now
The bairn's sae braw, has fauld sae fu',
That lads sae thick come here to woo,
They're fain to sleep on hay or straw.
I lookit aye at even' for her,
For fear the foumart might devour her,
Or some mischanter had come o'er her,
Gin the beastie bade awa;
Or some mischanter had come o'er her,
Gin the beastie bade awa.

VI.

Yet last ouk, for a' my keeping,
(Wha can speak it without weeping?)
A villain cam when I was sleeping,
And sta' my Ewie, horn and a';
I sought her sair upo' the morn,
And down aneath a buss o' thorn
I got my Ewie's crookit horn,
But ah, my Ewie was awa'.
I got my Ewie's crookit horn,
But ah, my Ewie was awa'.

VII.

O! gin I had the loun that did it,
Sworn I have as weel as said it,
Tho' a' the warld shou'd forbid it,
I wad gie his neck a thra':
I never met wi' sic a turn,
As this sin' ever I was born,
My Ewie wi' the crookit horn,
Puir sillie Ewie stown awa',
My Ewie wi' the crookit horn,
Puir silly Ewie stown awa'.]

Hughie Graham.

HERE are several editions of this ballad.—This, here inserted, is from oral tradition in Ayr-shire, where, when I was a boy, it was a popular song.—It originally had a simple old tune, which I have forgotten.

OUR lords are to the mountains gane,
A hunting o' the fallow deer,
And they have grippet Hughie Graham,
For stealing o' the bishop's mare.

And they ha'e tied him hand and foot,
And led him up, thro' Stirling toun;
The lads and lasses met him there,
Cried, Hughie Graham, thou art a loon.

O lowse my right hand free, he says,
And put my braid sword in the same;
He's no in Stirling toun this day
Daur tell the tale to Hughie Graham.

Up then bespake the brave Whitefoord,
As he sat by the bishop's knee,
Five hundred white stots I'll gie you,
If ye'll let Hughie Graham gae free.

O haud your tongue, the bishop says,
And wi' your pleading let me be;
For tho' ten Grahams were in his coat,
Hughie Graham this day shall die.

Up then bespake the fair Whitefoord,
As she sat by the bishop's knee;
Five hundred white pence I'll gie you,
If ye'll gie Hughie Graham to me.

O haud your tongue now, lady fair,
And wi' your pleading let it be;
Altho' ten Grahams were in his coat,
It's for my honour he maun die.

They've ta'en him to the gallows knowe,
He looked to the gallows tree,
Yet never colour left his cheek,
Nor ever did he blink his e'e.

At length he looked round about,
To see whatever he could spy:
And there he saw his auld father,
And he was weeping bitterly.

O haud your tongue, my father dear,
And wi' your weeping let it be;
Thy weeping's sairer on my heart
Than a' that they can do to me.

And ye may gie my brother John
My sword that's bent in the middle clear;
And let him come at twelve o'clock,
And see me pay the bishop's mare.

And ye may gie my brother James
My sword that's bent in the middle brown;
And bid him come at four o'clock,
And see his brother Hugh out down.

Remember me to Maggy my wife,
The neist time ye gang o'er the moor.
Tell her she staw the bishop's mare,
Tell her she was the bishop's whore.

And ye may tell my kith and kin,
I never did disgrace their blood ;
And when they meet the bishop's cloak
To mak it shorter by the hood.

[Burns did not choose to be quite correct in stating that this copy of the ballad of "Hughie Graham" is printed from oral tradition in Ayr-shire. The fact is, that four of the stanzas are either altered or superadded by himself.

Of this number the third and eighth are original; the ninth and tenth have received his corrections. Perhaps pathos was never more touching than in the picture of the hero singling out his poor aged father from the crowd of spectators; and the simple grandeur of preparation for this afflicting circumstance, in the verse that immediately precedes it, is matchless.

That the reader may probably appreciate the value of Burns's touches, I here subjoin two verses from the most correct copy of the ballad, as it is printed in the "Border Minstrelsy."

He looked over his left shoulder
And for to see what he might see ;
There was he aware of his auld father,
Came tearing his hair most piteouslie.

"O haud your tongue, my father," he says,
"And see that ye dinna weep for me !
For they may ravish me o' my life,
But they canna banish me from heaven hie."

CROMEK.]

A Southland Jenny.

THIS is a popular Ayr-shire song, though the notes were never taken down before. It, as well as many of the ballad tunes in this collection, was written from Mrs. Burns's voice.

["Southland Jenny" is older than the days of Allan Ramsay, for it is inserted in his "Tea Table Miscellany," with the letter Z annexed, to intimate its antiquity. It seems to be of southern manufacture, and probably owes its origin to one of those very ingenious persons who, in London, imitated the voice and manner of the northern muse, with the same happiness that Wallenstein's follower imitated the general :

"I grant that in trides you hit it off,
You can spit like the Friedlander—ape his cough."

* Tocher—Marriage portion.

† ["This statement is incorrect. On referring to 'Neil Gow and Son's,' 2nd book, p. 18, it will be seen that it is unclaimed by Nathaniel Gow or any of his family. Mr. Gow found the tune in 'Oswald's Caledonian Pocket Companion,'

The first verse will be sample sufficient of this compound strain.

A Southland Jenny that was right bonnie,
She had for a suitor a Norlan' Johnnie ;
But he was siccan a bashfu' wooer
That he could scarcely speak unto her.
But blinks o' her beauty, and hopes o' her
siller,
Fore'd him at last to tell his mind till 'er ;
My dear, quo' he, we'll nae longer tarry,
Gin ye can love me, let's o'er the muir and marry.]

My Tocher's the Jewel.*

THIS tune is claimed by Nathaniel Gow. It is notoriously taken from "The Muckin' o' Geordie's Byre." It is also to be found, long prior to Nathaniel Gow's era, in Aird's "Selection of Airs and Marches," the first edition, under the name of "The Highway to Edinburgh."†

Then, Gudwife, count the Lawin'.

THE chorus of this is part of an old song, one stanza of which I recollect :—

EVERY day my wife tells me
That ale and brandy will ruin me ;
But if gude liquor be my dead,
This shall be written on my head—
O, gudewife, count the lawin'.

The Soger Laddie.

THE first verse of this is old; the rest is by Ramsay. The tune seems to be the same with a slow air, called "Jacky Hume's Lament"—or, "The Hollin Buss"—or, "Ken ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten?"

[In Thomson's "Orpheus Caledonius," printed in 1725, both the music and words of "The Soger Laddie" may be found. The first four lines of the song have the true echo of the ancient minstrelsy.

MY soger laddie is over the sea,
And he'll bring gold and silver to me, [lady ;
And when he comes hame he will make me his
My blessings gang wi' him, my soger laddie book iii. p. 28, as a quick jig; it struck him that it would be pretty if slow; and, being without a name, he called it 'Lord Elcho's Favourite.' Oswald's book was published as long prior to Aird's era, as Aird's was to that of Gow."—CROMEK.]

My doughty laddie is handsome and brave,
And can as a soger and lover behave,
He's true to his country, to love he is steady;
There's few to compare wi' my soger laddie.

O shield him, ye Angels, frae death in alarms,
Return him with laurels to my longing arms,
Syn'e frae all my care ye'll pleasantly free me,
When back to my wishes my soger ye gie me.

O soon may his honours bloom fair on his brow,
As quickly they must, if he get but his due;
For in noble actions his courage is ready,
Which makes me delight in my soger laddie.]

Where wad Bonnie Annie lie ?

THE old name of this tune is,— Whare'll our gude-man lie ?

A silly old stanza of it runs thus—

O WHARE'LL our gudeman lie,
Gudeman lie, gudeman lie,
O whare'll our gudeman lie,
Till he shute o'er the simmer ?

Up amang the hen-bawks,
The hen-bawks, the hen-bawks,
Up amang the hen-bawks,
Amang the rotten timmer.

[Ramsay's song is as follows :—

O WHERE wad bonnie Annie lie ?
Alane nae mair ye maunna lie ;
Wad ye a gudeman try,
Is that the thing ye're lacking ?
O can a lass sae young as I
Venture on the bridal tye ?
Syn'e down wi' a gudeman lie,
I'm fley'd he'd keep me waukin.

Never judge until ye try,
Mak me your gudeman, I
Shanna hinder you to lie,
And sleep till ye be weary.
What if I shou'd wauking lie,
When the ho boys are gaun by,
Will ye tent me when I cry
My dear, I'm faint and eiry ?

In my bosom thou shalt lie,
When thou waukrife art, or dry,
Healthy cordial standing by,
Shall presently revive thee.
To your will I then comply ;
Join us, priest, and let me try,
How I'll wi' a gudeman lie,
Wha can a cordial gie me.]

Galloway Tam.

I HAVE seen an interlude (acted on a wedding) to this tune, called "The Wooing of the Maiden." These entertainments are now much worn out in this part of Scotland. Two are still retained in Nithsdale, viz. "Silly Puir Auld Glenae," and this one, "The Wooing of the Maiden."

[Galloway Tam is a fellow of merit in his way, as the song in his honour will shew :

I.

O GALLOWAY Tam can here to woo,
We'd better hae gi'en him the bawsent cow,
For our lass Bess may curse and ban
The wanton wit o' Galloway Tam.
A cannie tongue and a glance fu' gleg,
A boardly back and a lordly leg,
A heart like a fox, and a look like a lamb—
O, these are the marks o' Galloway Tam.

II.

O Galloway Tam came here to shear,
We'd better hae gi'en him the gude grey meare,
He kiss'd the gudewife & he dang'd the gudeman,
And these are the tricks o' Galloway Tam.
He ow'd the kirk a twalmonth's score,
And he doff'd his bonnet at the door ;
The loon cried out wha sung the psalm,
"There's room on the stool for Galloway Tam!"

III.

Ye lasses o' Galloway, frank and fair,
Tak tent o' your hearts and something mair ;
And bar your doors, your windows steek,
For he comes stealing like night and sleep :
O nought frae Tam but wae ye'll win,
He'll sing ye dumb and he'll dance ye blin' ;
And aff your balance he'll cowp ye then,
Tak tent o' the deil and Galloway Tam.

IV.

"Sir," quoth Mess John, "the wanton deil
Has put his birn 'boon gospel kiel,
And bound yere cloots in his black ban' :"
"For mercy loos't!" quo' Galloway Tam.
"In our kirk-fauld we maun ye bar,
And smear your fleece wi' cowp'nant tar,
And pettle ye up a dainty lamb."
"Among the yowes," quo' Galloway Tam.

V.

Eas'd of a twalmonth's graceless deeds,
He gaylie doff'd his sackcloth weeds ;
An' 'mang the maidens he laughing cam—
"Tak tent o' your hearts," quo' Galloway Tam
A cannie tongue and a glare fu' gleg,
A boardly back and a lordly leg,
A heart like a fox, and a look like a lamb—
O, these are the marks o' Galloway Tam.]

As I cam down by yon Castle Wa'.

THIS is a very popular Ayr-shire song.

[It has no doubt been greatly amended by Burns. Both music and words were unknown till he sent them to the "Museum."

As I cam down by yon castle wa',
And in by yon garden green,
O there I spied a bonnie bonnie lass,
But the flower-borders were us between.

A bonnie bonnie lassie she was,
As ever mine eyes did see ;
O five hundred pounds would I give,
For to have such a pretty bride as thee.

To have such a pretty bride as me !
Young man, ye are sairly mista'en ;
Tho' ye were king o' fair Scotland,
I wad disdain to be your queen.

Talk not so very high, bonnie lass,
O talk not so very, very high ;
The man at the fair, that wad sell,
He maun learn at the man that wad buy.

I trust to climb a far higher tree,
And herry a far richer nest.
Tak this advice o' me, bonnie lass,
Humility wad set thee best.]

Lord Ronald, my Son.

THIS air, a very favourite one in Ayr-shire, is evidently the original of Lochaber. In this manner most of our finest more modern airs have had their origin. Some early minstrel, or musical shepherd, composed the simple artless original air ; which being picked up by the more learned musician, took the improved form it bears.

[The complete ballad of "Lord Ronald" may be found under the name of "Lord Randal," in the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border." The hero of the song was poisoned—he ate a dish of adders instead of eels: this is intimated in a stray verse, which should be restored to its place, as, without it, the ballad is incomplete.

AND where did they catch them, Lord Ronald my son ? [young man ?
And where did they catch them, my handsome Beneath the bracken-bush, mother; make my bed soon, [down.]"
For I'm wearied wi' hunting, and fain wad lie

O'er the Moor among the Heather.

THIS song is the composition of Jean Glover, a girl who was not only a wh-re, but also a thief; and in one or other character has visited most of the Correction Houses in the West. She was born I believe in Kilmarnock,—I took the song down from her singing, as she was strolling through the country, with a slight-of-hand blackguard.

[COMIN' thro' the craigs o' Kyle,
Among the bonnie blooming heather,
There I met a bonnie lassie,
Keeping a' her yowes thegither.

O'er the moor among the heather,
O'er the moor among the heather,
There I met a bonnie lassie,
Keeping a' her yowes thegither.

Says I, my dearie, where is thy hame,
In moor or dale pray tell me whether ?
She says, I tent the fleecy flocks
That feed among the blooming heather.
O'er the moor, &c.

We laid us down upon a bank,
Sae warm and sunny was the weather,
She left her flocks at large to rove
Among the bonnie blooming heather.
O'er the moor, &c.

While thus we lay she sang a sang,
Till echo rang a mile and farther,
And ay the burden o' the sang
Was o'er the moor among the heather.
O'er the moor, &c.

She charm'd my heart, and aye sinsyne,
I could na think on any ither ;
By sea and sky she shall be mine !
The bonnie lass among the heather.
O'er the moor, &c.]

To the Rose-bud.

THIS song is the composition of one Johnson, a joiner in the neighbourhood of Belfast. The tune is by Oswalds, altered, evidently, from "Jockie's Grey Breeds."

[ALL hail to thee, thou bawmy bud,
Thou charming child o' simmer, hail ;
Ilk fragrant thorn and lofty wood
Does nod thy welcome to the vale.

See on thy lovely faulted form,
Glad Phœbus smiles wi' cheering eye,
While on thy head the dewy morn
Has shed the tears o' silent joy.

The tuneful tribes frae yonder bower,
Wi' sangs of joy thy presence hail;
Then haste, thou bawmy fragrant flower,
And gie thy bosom to the gale.

And see the fair industrious bee,
With airy wheel and soothing hum,
Flies ceaseless round thy parent tree,
While gentle breezes trembling come.

If ruthless Liza pass this way,
She'll pu' thee frae thy thorny stem;
Awhile thou'lt grace her virgin breast,
But soon thou'lt fade, my bonny gem.

Ah, short, too short, thy rural reign,
And yield to fate, alas! thou must:
Bright emblem of the virgin train,
Thou blooms, alas! to mix wi' dust.

Sae bonny Liza hence may learn,
Wi' every youthfu' maiden gay,
That beauty, like the simmer's rose,
In time shall wither and decay.]

Thou art gane awa.

THIS tune is the same with "Haud awa frae me, Donald."

[Both tune and words of "Thou art gane awa" have been modernized, and not unskillfully: the last verse is the best.

Tho' you've been false, yet while I live
I'll lo'e nae maid but thee, Mary;
Let friends forget as I forgive
Thy wrangs to them and me, Mary.
So then farewell!—of this be sure,
Since you've been false to me, Mary,
For a' the world I'll not endure
Half what I've done for thee, Mary.]

The Tears I shed must ever fall.

THIS song of genius was composed by a Miss Cranstoun. It wanted four lines, to make all the stanzas suit the music, which I added, and are the first four of the last stanza.

[Miss Cranstoun was the sister of George, Lord Cranstoun, a Lord of Session in Scotland. She became the second wife of one as accomplished as herself, the celebrated Professor Dugald Stewart: of her poetic genius this exquisite song will long continue a striking proof. She died on the 28th of July, 1838, at the age of seventy-one.

THE tears I shed must ever fall;
I weep not for an absent swain,
For time can past delights recall,
And parted lovers meet again.
I weep not for the silent dead,
Their toils are past, their sorrows o'er,
And those they lov'd their steps shall tread,
And death shall join to part no more.

Though boundless oceans roll between,
If certain that his heart is near,
A conscious transport glads the scene,
Soft is the sigh and sweet the tear.
E'en when by death's cold hand remov'd,
We mourn the tenant of the tomb,
To think that ev'n in death he lov'd,
Can cheer the terrors of the gloom.

But bitter, bitter is the tear
Of her who slighted love bewails,
No hopes her gloomy prospect cheer,
No pleasing melancholy hails.
Her's are the pangs of wounded pride,
Of blasted hope, and wither'd joy:
The prop she lean'd on pierc'd her side,
The flame she fed burns to destroy.

In vain does memory renew
The scenes once ting'd in transport's dye;
The sad reverse soon meets the view,
And turns the thought to agony.
Ev'n conscious virtue cannot cure
The pangs to ev'ry feeling due;
Ungen'rous youth, thy boast how poor,
To steal a heart, and break it too!

*No cold approach, no alter'd mien,
Just what would make suspicion start;
No pause the dire extremes between,
He made me blest—and broke my heart!*
Hope from its only anchor torn,
Neglected and neglecting all,
Friendless, forsaken, and forlorn,
The tears I shed must ever fall.]

Dainty Dabie.

THIS song, tradition says, and the composition itself confirms it, was composed on the Rev. David Williamson's begetting the daughter of Lady Cherrytrees with child, while a party of dragoons were searching her house to apprehend him for being an adherent to the solemn league and covenant. The pious woman had put a lady's night-cap on him, and had laid him a-bed with her own daughter, and passed him to the soldiery as a lady, her daughter's bedfellow. A mutilated stanza or two are to be found in Herd's collection, but the original song consists of five or six stanzas, and were their delicacy equal to their wit and humour, they would merit a place in any collection. The first stanza is as follows:

Being pursued by the dragoons,
Within my bed he was laid down ;
And weel I wat he was worth his room,
For he was my daintie Davie.

Ramsay's song, "Luckie Nansy," though he calls it an old song with additions, seems to be all his own, except the chorus :

I was a telling you,
Luckie Nansy, luckie Nansy,
Auld springs wad ding the new,
But ye wad never trow me.

Which I should conjecture to be part of a song, prior to the affair of Williamson.

["Luckie Nansy" is one of the very happiest of all Allan Ramsay's songs:—

WHILE fops in soft Italian verse,
Ilk fair ane's een and breast rehearse,
While sangs abound and scene is scarce,
These lines I have indited :
But neither darts nor arrows here,
Venus nor Cupid shall appear,
And yet with these fine sounds I swear,
The maidens are delighted.

I was ay telling you,
Lucky Nansy, lucky Nansy,
Auld springs wad ding the new,
But ye wad never trow me.

Nor snaw with crimson will I mix,
To spread upon my lassie's cheeks ;
And syne th' unmeaning name prefix,
Miranda, Chloe, Phillis.
I'll fetch nae smile frae Jove,
My height of extacy to prove,
Nor sighing,—thus—present my love
With roses eke and lilies.

I was ay telling you, &c.

But stay—I had amaist forgot
My mistress and my sang to boot,
And that's an unco' faut, I wot :
But Nansy, 'tis nae matter.
Ye see I clink my verse wi' rhyme,
And, ken ye, that atones the crime ;
Forbye, how sweet my numbers chime,
And slide away like water !

I was ay telling you, &c.

Now ken, my reverend sonsy fair,
Thy runkled cheeks and lyart hair,
Thy haff shut een and hodding air,
Are a' my passion's fuel.
Nae skyring gowk, my dear, can see,
Or love, or grace, or heaven in thee ;
Yet thou hast charms enow for me,
Then smile, and be na cruel.

Leeze me on thy snawy pow,
Lucky Nansy, lucky Nansy,
Dryest wood will eisthew low,
And Nansy, sae will ye now.

Troth I have sung the sang to you,
Which ne'er anither bard wad do ;
Hear then my charitable vow,
Dear venerable Nansy,
But if the warld my passion wrang,
And say, ye only live in sang,
Ken, I despise a sland'ring tongue,
And sing to please my fancy.

Leeze me on thy, &c.

Tytler, on very doubtful authority, says that Duncan Forbes, of Culoden, was the author of this song.]

Bob o' Dumblane.

RAMSAY, as usual, has modernized this song. The original, which I learned on the spot, from my old hostess in the principal inn there, is:—

LASSIE, lend me your braw hemp heckle,
And I'll lend you my thrippin-kame ;
My heckle is broken, it canna be gotten,
And we'll gae dance the bob o' Dumblane.

Twa gaed to the wood, to the wood, to the wood,
Twa gaed to the wood—three came hame :
An' it be na weel bobbit, weel bobbit, weel bobbit,
An' it be na weel bobbit, we'll bob it again.

I insert this song to introduce the following anecdote, which I have heard well authenticated. In the evening of the day of the battle of Dumblane (Sherriff-Muir) when the action was over, a Scots officer, in Argyle's army, observed to his Grace that he was afraid the rebels would g've out to the world that they had gotten the victory.—"Weel, weel," returned his Grace, alluding to the foregoing ballad, "if they think it be na weel bobbit, we'll bob it again."

[The battle of Dumblane, or Sherriff-Muir, was fought on the 13th of November, 1715, between the Earl of Mar, for the Chevalier, and the Duke of Argyle, for the government.—Both sides claimed the victory, the left wing of either army being routed. Ritson observes, it is very remarkable that the capture of Preston happened on the same day.]

THE AYR-SHIRE BALLADS.

THAT Burns was a great admirer of the ancient minstrelsy of the West of Scotland, his numerous notes on Scottish song sufficiently attest. He was well acquainted with ballad lore, and communicated several interesting specimens to Johnson's Musical Museum: of these "Hughie Graeme," "The Gude Wallace," and the "Lochmaben Harper," are the best: his attention being afterwards drawn to the subject by William Tytler, Esq., of Woodhouselee, he recollected several snatches of old ballads, wrote them down, and sent them to his friend with the following letter:

SIR,—Inclosed I have sent you a sample of the old pieces that are still to be found among our peasantry in the west.—I once had a great many of these fragments, and some of these here entire; but as I had no idea then that any body cared for them, I have forgotten them. I invariably hold it sacrilege to add any thing of my own to help out with the shattered wrecks of these venerable old compositions; but they have many various readings. If you have not seen these before, I know they will flatter your true old-style Caledonian feelings; at any rate, I am truly happy to have an opportunity of assuring you how sincerely I am, Revered Sir, your grateful and obliged humble Servant,

ROBERT BURNS.

Lawnmarket, Edinburgh, August, 1790.

Many compositions of this description he rescued from oblivion, and sent them to the "Scots Musical Museum," and it appears to have been his design to recover all which were worthy of preservation. Several of them underwent his correction and emendation, as the subjoined unpublished extract from one of his letters will testify:—

"The songs marked Z in the 'Museum,' I have given to the world as old verses of their respective tunes; but, in fact, of a good many of them little more than the chorus is ancient, though there is no reason for telling every body this piece of intelligence."

The first of these Ballads is a western version of

The Dowie Dens of Yarrow.

Tune—Willie's Rare.

NÆ birdies sang the mirky hour
Amang the braes o' Yarrow,

But slumber'd on the dewy boughs
To wait the waukening morrow.

Where shall I gang, my ain true love,
Where shall I gang to hide me;
For weel ye ken, i' yere father's bow'r,
It wad be death to find me.

O go ye to yon tavern house,
An' there count owre your lawin,
An' if I be a woman true,
I'll meet you in the dawin'.

O he's gone to yon tavern house,
An' ay he counted his lawin,
An' ay he drank to her guid health
Was to meet him in the dawin'.

O he's gone to yon tavern house,
An' counted owre his lawin,
When in there cam' three armed men,
To meet him in the dawin'.

O, woe be unto woman's wit,
It has beguiled many!
She promised to come hersel'
But she sent three men to slay me!

* * * *

Get up, get up, now, sister Ann,
I fear we've wrought you sorrow;
Get up, ye'll find your true love slain,
Among the banks of Yarrow.

She sought him east, she sought him west,
She sought him braid and narrow,
'Till in the clintin of a craig
She found him drown'd in Yarrow.

She's ta'en three links of her yellow hair,
That hung down lang and yellow,
And she's tied it about sweet Willie's waist,
An' drawn him out of Yarrow.

* * * *

I made my love a suit of clothes,
I clad him all in tartan,
But ere the morning sun arose
He was a' bluid to the gartan.

* * * *

Cetera desunt.

[Hamilton, of Bangour, must have been acquainted with this western version of the "Dowie dens of Yarrow" when he wrote his very affecting ballad: it seems also to have been known to Logan : it appears however to have escaped the researches of that most vigilant and poetic of all antiquaries, Sir Walter Scott, whose version in the Border Minstrelsy has little in common with the fragment which the Bard of Ayr preserved. It would seem that Scott had failed in obtaining the entire ballad : his copy begins obscurely as well as abruptly.

LATE at e'en drinking the wine,
And ere they paid the lawing ;
They set a combat 'tween them twa,
To fight it in the dawing.

O stay at hame, my noble lord,
O stay at hame, my marrow ;
My cruel brother will you betray,
On the dowie houms o' Yarrow.

Two tall grey stones stand about eighty paces distant from each other, to mark out the spot where this contest took place in which both perished : but whether they are to be considered as a memorial of the "Willie" of the present ballad is uncertain.]

Rob Roy.

Tune—A rude set of the Mill, Mill, O!

ROB ROY from the Highlands came Unto the Lawlan' border,
To steal awa a gay ladie,
To haud his house in order :
He cam owre the loch o' Lynn,
Twenty men his arms did carry ;
Himsel gaed in an' fand her out,
Protesting he would marry.

O will ye gae wi' me, he says,
Or will ye be my honey ;
Or will ye be my wedded wife,
For I love you best of ony :
I winna gae wi' you, she says,
Nor will I be your honey ;
Nor will I be your wedded wife,
You love me for my money.

* * * *

But he set her on a coal black steed,
Himsel lap on behind her ;
An' he's awa to the highland hills,
Whare her frien's they canna find her.

[The song went on to narrate the forcing her to bed ; when the tune changes to something like "Jenny dang the weaver."]

* * * *

Rob Roy was my father ca'd,
Macgregor was his name, ladie ;

He led a band o' heroes bauld,
An' I am here the same, ladie.
Be content, be content,
Be content to stay, ladie ;
For thou art my wedded wife
Until thy dying day, ladie.

He was a hedge unto his frien's,
A heckle to his foes, ladie ;
Every one that durst him wrang,
He took him by the nose, ladie.
I'm as bold, I'm as bold,
I'm as bold, an' more, ladie ;
He that daurs dispute my word
Shall feel my guid claymore, ladie.

["The history of Rob Roy the reader may find at great length in Maclaurin's Criminal Trials. He was the son of the Rob Roy Macgregor who figures in the Rebellion, 1715. The short account of him is this. He was outlawed by sentence of the Court of Justiciary in Scotland, in 1736, for not appearing to stand trial for the murder of a man of the name of Maclaren. In this state of outlawry, he formed the mad and desperate project of carrying off and forcibly accomplishing a marriage with Jane Key, heiress of Edinbelly, and thus getting possession of her estate. He and his brother James Macgregor, at the head of a band of armed ruffians, entered her mother's house, dragged her out, and tying her, hand and foot, with ropes, laid her across a horse, and brought her in this situation to the house of one of their clan, in a wild and sequestered part of the mountains of Argyle-shire ; where, after some show of a marriage ceremony, she was put to bed, and forcibly compelled to submit to his embraces.

On a discovery of the place of her concealment she was rescued by her relations, and Rob Roy, and his brother James, were tried capitally for the crime. James made his escape from prison before sentence, was outlawed in consequence, and some years afterwards obtained a pardon. Rob Roy was condemned and executed, February, 1753."—CROMEK.]

Young Hyndhorn.

To its own Tune.

NEAR Edinburgh was a young son born,
Hey lilelu an' a how low lan',
An' his name it was called young Hyndhorn,
An' its hey down down deedle airo.

Seven long years he served the king,
An' it's a' for the sake of his daughter Jean.

The king an angry man was he,
He sent young Hyndhorn to the sea.

An' on his finger she put a ring.

When your ring turns pale an' wan,
Then I'm in love wi' another man.

Upon a day he look'd at his ring,
It was as pale as any thing.

He's left the sea, an' he's come to the lan',
An' there he met an auld beggar man.

What news, what news, my auld beggar man,
What news, what news by sea or by lan'.

Nae news, nae news, the auld beggar said,
But the king's dochter Jean is going to be wed.

Cast aff, cast aff thy auld beggar-weed,
An' I'll gie thee my gude grey steed.

* [The story of Hynd Horn seems to have been popular with our ancient metre ballad-mongers, for it may be traced in several of the olden strains which delighted our forefathers.

Mr. Cromek seems not to have been aware of the jewel he had picked up, as it is passed over without a single remark. We have been fortunate enough to recover two copies from recitation, which, joined to the stanzas preserved by Mr. Cromek, have enabled us to present it to the public in its present complete state. Though Hynd Horn possesses no claims upon the reader's attention on account of its poetry, yet it is highly valuable as illustrative of the history of romantic ballad. In fact, it is nothing else than a portion of the ancient English metrical romance of "Kyng Horn," which some benevolent pen, peradventure, "for luf of the lewed man," hath stripped of its "quainte Inglis," and given—

"In symple speche as he couthe,
That is lightest in maune's mooth."

Of this the reader will be at once convinced, if he compares it with the romance alluded to, or rather with the fragment of the one preserved in the Auchinleck MS., entitled, "Horne Child and Maiden Riminald," both of which ancient poems are to be found in Ritson's Metrical Romances.

It is, perhaps, unnecessary to remind the reader, that Hend or Hynd means 'courtous, kind, affable,' &c., epithets, which, we doubt not, the hero of the ballad was fully entitled to assume.—MOTHERWELL.

NEAR Edinburgh was a young child born,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
And his name it was called young Hynd Horn,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

Seven long years he served the king,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
And it's a' for the sake of his dochter Jean,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

The king an angry man was he,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
He sent young Hynd Horn to the sea,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"Oh! I never saw my love before,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
Till I saw her thro' an augre bore,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"And she gave to me a gay gold ring,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,

* * *
When he cam to our guid king's yett, |sake,
He sought a glass o' wine for young Hyndhorn's

He drank out the wine an' he put in the ring,
An' he bade them carry't to the king's dochter
Jean.

* * *
O gat ye't by sea, or gat ye't by lan',
Or gat ye't aff a dead man's han'?

I gat na't by sea, I gat na't by lan',
But I gat it out of your own han'.

* * *
Go take away my bridal gown,
An' I'll follow him frae town to town.

Ye need na leave your bridal gown,
For I'll make ye ladie o' mony a town.*

With three shining diamonds set therein,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"And I gave to her a silver wand,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
With three singing lavrocks set thereon,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"What if those diamonds lose their hue?
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
Just when my love begins for to ruc,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"For when your ring turns pale and wan,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
Then I'm in love with another man,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

He's left the land, and he's gone to the sea,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And he's stay'd there seven years and a day,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

Seven lang years he has been on the sea,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
And Hynd Horn has look'd how his ring may be,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

But when he looked this ring upon,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
The shining diamonds were both pale and wan,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

Oh! the ring it was both black and blue,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
And she's either dead, or she's married,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

He's left the seas, and he's come to the land,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And the first he met was an auld beggar man,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"What news? what news? my silly auld man?
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
For it's seven years since I have seen land,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie.

"What news? what news? thou auld beggar man;
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
What news? what news? by sea or land?
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"No news at all," said the auld beggar man,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
"But there is a wedding in the king's hall,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"There is a king's dochter in the west,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And she has been married thrir nine nights past,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Into the brile-bed she winna gang,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
Till she hears tell of her ain Hynd Horn,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Wilt thou give to me thy begging coat,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And I'll give to thee my scarlet cloak,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Wilt thou give to me thy begging staff,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And I'll give to thee my good grey steed,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

The auld beggar man cast off his coat,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And he's ta'en up the scarlet cloak,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

The auld beggar man threw down his staff,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And he is mounted the good grey steed,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

The auld beggar man was bound for the mill,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
But young Hynd Horn for the king's hall,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

The auld beggar man was bound for to ride,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
But young Hynd Horn was bound for the bride,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

When he came to the king's gate,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
He asked a drink for young Hynd Horn's sake,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

These news unto the bonnie bride came,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,

That at the yett there stands an auld man,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

There stands an auld man at the king's gate,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
He asketh a drink for young Hynd Horn's sake,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"I'll go through nine fires so hot,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
But I'll give him a drink, for young Hynd Horn's sake,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

She went to the gate where the auld man did stand,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And she gave him a drink out of her own hand,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

She gave him a cup out of her own hand,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
He drunk out the drink, and dropt in the ring,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Got thou it by sea, or got thou it by land?
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
Or got thou it off a dead man's hand?
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"I got it not by sea, but I got it by land,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
For I got it out of thine own hand,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"I'll cast off my gowns of brown,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And I'll follow thee from town to town,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"I'll cast off my gowns of red,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
And along with thee I'll beg my bread,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Thou need not cast off thy gowns of brown,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
For I can make thee lady of many a town,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

"Thou need not cast off thy gowns of red,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan,
For I can maintain thee with both wine and bread,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

The bridegroom thought he had the bonnie bride wed,
With a hey lillelu and a how lo lan;
But young Hynd Horn took the bride to the bed,
And the birk and the brume blooms bonnie."

GENERAL CORRESPONDENCE.

[THE letters of Burns extend over a large portion of his life: they are varied, vigorous, and characteristic. They are addressed to persons of almost all conditions: a few are to humble farmers and little lairds: some to village shop-keepers and parish school-masters: a number are to clergymen: many to noblemen and ladies of beauty and rank, while a great variety are written to men of high literary eminence, such as Tytler, Blair, Stewart, Alison, and Moore. They contain much of the personal history of the Poet: exhibit numerous sketches of character, pictures of manners, and views of domestic life; with many of those vivid touches and original sallies which communicate to prose the feeling and sentiment of poetry. Almost all the letters which Burns wrote will be found in this edition of his works: from that first humble one which he addressed to his father, on the darkness of his future prospects, till that last and most mournful one written to James Armour, at Mauchline, begging his mother-in-law to hasten to Dumfries, for that his wife was about to be confined, and he was himself dying.

“The letters of Burns,” says Sir Walter Scott, “although containing passages of great eloquence, bear, occasionally, strong marks of affectation, with a tincture of pedantry, rather foreign to the Bard’s character and education. They are written in various tones of feeling, and modes of mind: in some instances exhibiting all the force of the writer’s talents, in others only valuable because they bear his signature.”* Another critical judge has delivered a much sterner opinion.—“The prose works of Burns,” says Jeffrey, “consist almost entirely of his letters. They bear, as well as his poetry, the seal and impress of his genius: but they contain much more bad taste, and are written with far more apparent labour. His poetry was almost all written primarily from feeling, and only secondarily from ambition. His letters seem to have been nearly all composed as exercises, and for display. There are few of them written with simplicity or plainness: and, though natural enough as to the sentiment, they are, generally, very strained and elaborate in the expression. A very great proportion of them, too, relate neither to facts nor feelings peculiarly connected with the author or his correspondent, but are made up of general declamation, moral reflections, and vague discussions—all evidently composed for the sake of effect.”

“In the critic’s almost wholesale condemnation of the prose of Burns,” says Cunningham, “the world has not concurred: he sins, somewhat indeed, in the spirit of Jeffrey’s description, but his errors are neither so serious nor so frequent as has been averred. In truth, his prose partakes largely of the character of his poetry: there is the same earnest vehemence of language: the same happy quickness of perception: the same mixture of the solemn with the sarcastic, and the humorous with the tender; and the presence everywhere of that ardent and penetrating spirit which sheds light and communicates importance to all it touches. He is occasionally turgid, it is true; neither is he so simple and unaffected in prose as he is in verse: but this is more the fault of his education than of his taste. His daily language was the dialect of his native land; and in that he expressed himself with almost miraculous clearness and precision: the language of his verse corresponds with that of his conversation: but the etiquette of his day required his letters to be in English; and in that, to him, almost foreign tongue, he now and then moved with little ease or grace. Yet though a peasant, and labouring to express himself in a language alien to his lips, his letters yield not in interest to those of the ripest scholars of the age. He wants the colloquial ease of Cowper, but he is less minute and tedious: he lacks the withering irony of Byron, but he has more humour, and infinitely less of that ‘pibble prabble’ which deforms the noble lord’s correspondence and memoranda.

“Wilson has, perhaps, expressed the truest opinion of all our critics concerning the letters of Burns, though he certainly errs when he

* [And are they not valuable inasmuch as they do bear that signature? The devotion with which the memory of Burns is cherished by his countrymen has rendered the meanest trifle which he penned inestimable in their eyes, and the same may be said with regard to the lightest and most careless effusions of the gifted spirit whom we have quoted, now since he has been called to mingle with ancestral dust within the hallowed precincts of Dryburgh abbey.—MOTHERWELL.]

says that the Poet wrote many of them when tipsy—nay, intoxicated. He belonged, indeed, to days of hard drinking: Pitt sometimes reeled when he rose to discourse on the state of the nation: Fox, it is averred, loved the bottle,—though he contrived to stand steady; and Sheridan, it is well known, perfumed his eloquence with wine. There is something like intoxication of feeling and sentiment in the letters of Burns; but in the wildest of them sense and genius predominate.”

“The letters of Burns,” observes Wilson, “are said to be too elaborate, the expression more studied and artificial than belongs to that species of composition. Now the truth is, Burns never considered letter writing ‘a species of composition’ subject to certain rules of taste and criticism. That had never occurred to him, and so much the better. But hundreds, even of his most familiar letters, are perfectly artless, though still most eloquent, compositions. Simple we may not call them, so rich are they in fancy, so overflowing in feeling, and dashed off every other paragraph with the easy boldness of a great master, conscious of his strength, even at times when, of all things in the world, he was least solicitous about display: while some there are so solemn, so sacred, so religious, that he who can read them with an unstirred heart can have no trust, no hope, in the immortality of the soul.” To this eloquent commendation the heart of Scotland responds.

Of his correspondence, Mr. Lockhart thus speaks with all the generous feeling of a congenial and sympathising mind:—

“From the time that Burns settled himself in Dumfries-shire, he appears to have conducted with much care the extensive correspondence in which his celebrity had engaged him; it is, however, very necessary in judging of these letters, and drawing inferences from their language as to the real sentiments and opinions of the writer, to take into consideration the rank and character of the persons to whom they were severally addressed, and the measure of intimacy which really subsisted between them and the Poet. In his letters, as in his conversation, Burns, in spite of all his pride, did something to accommodate himself to his company: and he who did write the series of letters addressed to Mrs. Dunlop, Dr. Moore, Mr. Dugald Stewart, Miss Chalmers, and others, eminently distinguished as these are by purity, and nobleness of feeling, and perfect propriety of language, presents himself, in other effusions of the same class, in colours which it would be rash to call his own. That he should have condescended to any such compliance must be regretted; but, in most cases, it would probably be quite unjust to push our censure further than this.”

The critique upon his prose writings by Professor Walker, which we subjoin, is equally worthy of perusal:—

“The prose writings of Burns consist almost solely of his correspondence, and are therefore to be considered as presenting no sufficient criterion of his powers. Epistolary effusions, being a sort of written conversation, participate in many of the advantages and defects of discourse. They materially vary, both in subject and manner, with the character of the person addressed, to which the mind of their author for the moment assumes an affinity. To equals they are familiar and negligent, and to superiors they can scarcely avoid that transition, to careful effort and studied correctness, which the behaviour of the writer would undergo, when entering the presence of those to whom his talents were his only introduction. Burns, from the lowness of his origin, found himself inferior in rank to all his correspondents, except his father and brother; and, although the superiority of his genius should have done more than correct this disparity of condition, yet between pretensions so incommensurable it is difficult to produce a perfect equality. Burns evidently labours to reason himself into a feeling of its completeness, but the very frequency of his efforts betrays his dissatisfaction with their success, and he may therefore be considered as writing under the influence of a desire to create or to preserve the admiration of his correspondents. In this object he must certainly have succeeded; for, if his letters are deficient in some of the charms of epistolary writing, the deficiency is supplied by others. If they occasionally fail in colloquial ease and simplicity, they abound in genius, in richness of sentiment, and strength of expression. The taste of Burns, according to the judgment of Professor Stewart, was not sufficiently correct and refined to relish chaste and artless prose, but was captivated by writers who labour their periods into a pointed and antithetical brilliancy. What he preferred he would naturally be ambitious to imitate; and though he might have chosen better models, yet those which were his choice he has imitated with success. Even in poetry, if we may judge from his few attempts in English heroic measure, he was as far from attaining, and perhaps from desiring to attain, the flowing sweetness of Goldsmith, as he is in his letters from aiming at the graceful ease of Addison, or the severe simplicity of Swift. Burns in his prose seems never to have forgot that he was a poet; but, though his style may be taxed with occasional luxuriance, and with the admission of crowded and even of compounded epithets, few will deny that genius is displayed in their invention and application, as few will deny that there is eloquence in the harangue of an Indian Sachem, although it be not in the shape to which we are accustomed, nor pruned of its flowers by the critical exactness of a British orator.

“It is to be observed, however, that Burns could diversify his style with great address to suit the taste of his various correspondents: and that when he occasionally swells it into declamation, or stiffens it into pedantry, it is for the amusement of an individual whom he knew it would amuse, and should not be mistaken for the style which he thought most proper for the public. The letter to his father, for whom he had a deep veneration, and of whose applause he was no doubt desirous, is written with care, but with no exuberance. It is grave, pious, and gloomy, like the mind of the person who was to receive it. In his correspondence with Dr. Blair, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Graham, and Mr. Erskine, his style has a respectful propriety and a regulated vigour which shew a just conception of what became himself, and suited his relation with the persons whom he addressed. He writes to Mr. Nicol in a vein of strong and ironical extravagance, which was congenial to the manner, and adapted to the taste, of his friend. To his female correspondents, without excepting the venerable Mrs. Dunlop, he is lively, and sometimes romantic; and a skilful critic may perceive his pen under the influence of that tenderness for the feminine character which has been already noticed. In short, through the whole collection, we see various shades of gravity and care, or of sportive pomp and intentional affectation, according to the familiarity which subsisted between the writer and the person for whose exclusive perusal he wrote: and before we estimate the merit of any single letter, we should know the character of both correspondents, and the measure of their intimacy. These remarks are suggested by the objections of a distinguished critic, to a letter which was communicated to Mr. Cromek, without its address, by the author of this critique, and which occurs in the 'Reliques of Burns.' The censure would perhaps have been softened, had the critic been aware that the timidity which he blames was no serious attempt at fine writing, but merely a playful effusion in mock-heroic, to divert a friend whom he had formerly succeeded in diverting with similar sallies. Burns was sometimes happy in short complimentary addresses, of which a specimen is subjoined. It is inscribed on the blank-leaf of a book presented to Mrs. Graham of Fintray, from which it was copied, by that lady's permission:—

TO MRS. GRAHAM OF FINTRAY.

'It is probable, Madam, that this page may be read when the hand that now writes it shall be mouldering in the dust: may it then bear witness that I present you these volumes as a tribute of gratitude, on my part ardent and sincere, as your and Mr. Graham's goodness to me has been generous and noble! May every child of yours, in the hour of need, find such a friend as I shall teach every child of mine that their father found in you.

ROBERT BURNS.'

"The letters of Burns may on the whole be regarded as a valuable offering to the public. They are curious, as evidences of his genius, and interesting, as keys to his character; and they can scarcely fail to command the admiration of all who do not measure their pretensions by an unfair standard."

"Of the following letters," says Currie, "a considerable number were transmitted for publication by the individuals to whom they were addressed, but very few have been printed entire. It will easily be believed that in a series of letters written without the least view to publication, various passages were found unfit for the press, from different considerations. It will also be readily supposed that our Poet, writing nearly at the same time, and under the same feelings to different individuals, would sometimes fall into the same train of sentiment and forms of expression. To avoid, therefore, the tediousness of such repetitions, it has been found necessary to mutilate many of the individual letters, and sometimes to excise parts of great delicacy—the unbridled effusions of panegyric and regard. But though many of the letters are printed from originals furnished by the persons to whom they were addressed, others are printed from first draughts, or sketches, found among the papers of our Bard. Though, in general, no man committed his thoughts to his correspondents with less consideration or effort than Burns, yet it appears that in some instances he was dissatisfied with his first essays, and wrote out his communications in a fairer character, or perhaps in more studied language. In the chaos of the manuscripts, some of the original sketches were found: and as these sketches, though less perfect, are fairly to be considered as the offspring of his mind, where they have seemed in themselves worthy of a place in this volume, we have not hesitated to insert them, though they may not always correspond exactly with the letters transmitted, which have been lost or withheld."

Time, since the days of Currie, has removed many of the obstacles which influenced him in suppressing portions of these inimitable letters. Those passages omitted from personal considerations are now restored. A number of highly interesting original letters are in this edition, for the first time, given to the world, and it is believed the correspondence of the illustrious Bard is now presented in a more complete form than it has ever yet appeared.]

No. I.

TO WILLIAM BURNES.

Irvine, Dec. 27th, 1781.

HONOURED SIR:

I HAVE purposely delayed writing, in the hope that I should have the pleasure of seeing you on New-Year's day; but work comes so hard upon us that I do not choose to be absent on that account, as well as for some other little reasons which I shall tell you at meeting. My health is nearly the same as when you were here, only my sleep is a little sounder, and on the whole I am rather better than otherwise, though I mend by very slow degrees. The weakness of my nerves has so debilitated my mind that I dare neither review past wants, nor look forward into futurity; for the least anxiety or perturbation in my breast produces most unhappy effects on my whole frame.— Sometimes, indeed, when for an hour or two my spirits are alighted, I glimmer a little into futurity; but my principal, and indeed my only pleasurable, employment, is looking backwards and forwards in a moral and religious way; I am quite transported at the thought, that ere long, perhaps very soon, I shall bid an eternal adieu to all the pains, and uneasiness, and disquietudes of this weary life; for I assure you I am heartily tired of it; and, if I do not very much deceive myself, I could contentedly and gladly resign it.

“The soul, uneasy, and confin'd at home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.”

It is for this reason I am more pleased with the 15th, 16th, and 17th verses of the 7th chapter of Revelations than with any ten times as many verses in the whole Bible, and would not exchange the noble enthusiasm with which they inspire me, for all that this world has to offer.* As for this world, I despair of ever making a figure in it. I am not formed for the bustle of the busy, nor the flutter of the gay. I shall never again be capable of entering into such scenes. Indeed, I am altogether unconcerned at the thoughts of this life. I foresee that poverty and obscurity probably await me, and I am in some measure prepared, and daily preparing, to meet them. I have but just time and paper to return you my grateful thanks for the lessons of virtue and piety you have given me, which were too much neglected at the time of giving them, but which I hope have been remembered ere it is yet too late. Present my dutiful respects to my mother, and my compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Muir; and with wishing you a merry New-year's day, I shall conclude. I am, honoured sir, your dutiful son,

ROBERT BURNES.†

P.S. My meal is nearly out, but I am going to borrow till I get more.‡

* [The verses of Scripture here alluded to are as follows:—

REV. vii. 15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple; and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.

16 They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.

17 For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne, shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.]

† [When Burns wrote this touching letter to his father, he was toiling as a heckler in his unfortunate flax speculation, a dull as well as a dusty employment. On the fourth day after it was penned, the Poet and his relation Peacock were welcoming in the new year; a lighted candle touched some flax, and there was an end to all their hopes.

Of William Burnes, the father of the Poet, much has already been said; he was a worthy and pious man, desirous of maintaining right discipline in his house, and solicitous about the present and future welfare of his children. He was somewhat austere of manners; loved not boisterous jocularity; was rarely himself moved to laughter, and has been described as abstemious of speech. His early and continued misfortunes, though they saddened his brow, never affected the warm benevolence of his nature; he was liberal to the poor, and stern and self-denying only to himself. He is buried in Alloway kirk-yard, and his grave is visited by all who desire to pay homage to the fame of his eminent son.—CUNNINGHAM.]

‡ [It is no uncommon case for a small farmer, or even cotter, in Scotland, to have a son placed at some distant seminary of learning, or serving an apprenticeship to some metropolitan writer or tradesman; in which case, the youth is almost invariably supplied with oatmeal, the staple of the poor Scotsman's life—cheese, perhaps—oaten or arley bread, &c., from the home store, by the intervention of the weekly or fortnightly carrier. There is an anecdote related of a gentleman, now high in consideration at the Scottish bar, whose father, a poor villager, in the upper ward of Lanark-shire, having contrived to get him placed at Glasgow university, supported him there chiefly by a weekly bag of oatmeal. On one occasion, the supply was stopped for nearly three weeks by a snow-storm. The young man's meal, like Burns's, was out; but his pride, or his having no intimate acquaintance, prevented him from borrowing. And this remarkable and powerful-minded man had all but perished before the dissolving snow allowed a new stock of provisions to reach him.—CHAMBERS.

“One of the most striking letters in the Collection,” (Cromek's Reliques of Burns,) says Jeffrey, “and to us, one of the most interesting, is the earliest of the whole series; being addressed to his father in 1781, six or seven years before his name had been heard out of his own family. The author was then a common flax-dresser, and his father a poor peasant;—yet there is not one trait of vulgarity, either in thought or expression; but, on the contrary, a dignity and elevation of sentiment which must have been considered as of good omen in a youth of much higher condition.”

“This letter,” says Dr. Currie, “written several years before the publication of his poems, when his name was as obscure as his condition was humble, displays the philosophical melancholy which so generally forms the poetical temperament, and that buoyant and ambitious spirit, which indicates a mind cautious of its strength. At Irvine, Burns at this time possessed a single room for his lodgings, rented perhaps at the rate of a shilling a-week. He passed his days in constant labour, as a flax-dresser, and his food consisted chiefly of oatmeal, sent to him from his father's family. The store of this humble though wholesome nutriment, it appears, was nearly exhausted, and he was about to borrow till he should obtain a supply. Yet even in this situation his active imagination had formed to itself pictures of eminence and distinction. His despair of making a figure in the world shows how ardently he wished for honourable fame; and his contempt of life, founded on this despair, is the genuine expression of a youthful and generous mind. In such a state of reflection and of suffering, the imagination of Burns naturally passed the dark boundaries of our earthly horizon, and rested on those beautiful creations of a better world, where there is neither thirst, nor hunger, nor sorrow, and where happiness shall be in proportion to the capacity of happiness.”]

No. II.

TO MR. JOHN MURDOCH,

SCHOOL-MASTER,

STAPLES INN BUILDINGS, LONDON.

Lochlea, 15th January, 1783.

DEAR SIR :

As I have an opportunity of sending you a letter without putting you to that expense which any production of mine would but ill repay, I embrace it with pleasure, to tell you that I have not forgotten, nor ever will forget, the many obligations I lie under to your kindness and friendship.

I do not doubt, Sir, but you will wish to know what has been the result of all the pains of an indulgent father, and a masterly teacher; and I wish I could gratify your curiosity with such a recital as you would be pleased with;—but that is what I am afraid will not be the case. I have, indeed, kept pretty clear of vicious habits; and, in this respect, I hope, my conduct will not disgrace the education I have gotten; but as a man of the world, I am most miserably deficient. One would have thought that, bred as I have been, under a father who has figured pretty well as un homme des affaires, I might have been what the world calls a pushing, active fellow; but to tell you the truth, Sir, there is hardly any thing more my reverse. I seem to be one sent into the world, to see and observe; and I very easily compound with the knave who tricks me of my money, if there be any thing original about him, which shews me human nature in a different light from any thing I have seen before. In short, the joy of my heart is to “study men, their manners, and their ways;” and for this darling subject, I cheerfully sacrifice every other consideration. I am quite indolent about those great concerns that set the bustling, busy sons of care agog; and if I have to answer for the present hour, I am very easy with regard to any thing further. Even the last, worst shift of the unfortunate and the wretched * does not much terrify me: I know that even then my talent for what country folks call “a sensible crack,” when once it is sanctified by a hoary head, would procure me so much esteem that even then—I would learn to be happy. However, I am under no apprehensions about that; for though indolent, yet so far as an extremely delicate constitution permits, I am not lazy; and in many things, especially in tavern matters, I am a strict economist; not, indeed, for the sake of the money; but one of the principal parts in my composition is a kind of pride of stomach; and I scorn to fear the face of any man living: above every thing, I abhor as hell the idea of sneaking in a corner to avoid a dun—possibly some pitiful, sordid wretch, who in my heart I despise and detest. ’Tis this, and this alone, that endears economy to me. In the matter of books, indeed, I am very profuse.—My favorite authors are of the sentimental kind, such as Shenstone, particularly his “Elegies;” Thomson; “Man of Feeling”—a book I prize next to the Bible; “Man of the World;” Sterne, especially his “Sentimental Journey;” Macpherson’s “Ossian,” &c.;—these are the glorious models after which I endeavour to form my conduct, and ’tis incongruous,—’tis absurd to suppose that the man whose mind glows with sentiments lighted up at their sacred flame—the man whose heart distends with benevolence to all the human race—he “who can soar above this little scene of things”—can he descend to mind the paltry concerns about which the terræ-filial race fret, and fume, and vex themselves! O how the glorious triumph swells my heart! I forget that I am a poor, insignificant devil, unnoticed and unknown, stalking up and down fairs and markets, when I happen to be in them, reading a page or two of mankind, and “catching the manners living as they rise,” whilst the men of business jostle me on every side, as an idle incumbrance in their way.—But I dare say I have by this time tired your patience; so I shall conclude with begging you to give Mrs. Murdoch—not my compliments, for that is a mere common-place story; but my warmest, kindest wishes for her welfare; and accept of the same for yourself, from, dear Sir, yours,

R. B.†

* [The last shift alluded to here must be the condition of an itinerant beggar.—CURRIE.]

† [“As exhibiting the progress of the Poet’s studies, as well as the names of his favourite authors, this letter, addressed to his old teacher at Lochlea, Mr. Murdoch, is very interesting, and affords us an insight into the origin of part of that sentimentalism and exaggeration of feeling which are occasionally perceptible, both in his prose and poetical works. After this confession, it is no marvel to us that the muse of Coila, when she presented herself to the imaginings of her only and choicest son, when sitting ‘lanely by the ingle cheek,’ had ‘a hair-brained sentimental trace strongly marked in her face.’ Burns, at this period, however, had a full consciousness of his own innate powers, and the pride of genius breaks out in almost every line. The glorious triumph does indeed swell the heart, and in his confidential letter to his early preceptor, he makes no attempts to conceal it.”—MOTHERWELL.]

John Murdoch, as has already been intimated, kept the school of Lochlea, and instructed for a time the sons of William Burness. He was much of an enthusiast in his calling, and took delight in teaching such quick boys as the Poet and his brother; he was a frequent guest at the good man’s fire-side, and spent the hours of evening in profitable conversation, on poetry, history, and religion. He removed to London, and maintained himself by his learning; nor was it without some surprise, it is said, that he first heard of his pupil’s fame in poetry.—“Gilbert,” observes this discerning teacher, “always appeared to me to possess a more lively imagination, and to be more of a wit, than Robert. I attempted to teach them a little church music; here they were left far behind by all the rest of the school. Robert’s ear, in particular, was remarkably dull, and his voice untunable; his countenance was generally grave, and expressive of a serious, contemplative, and thoughtful mind. Gilbert’s face said, ‘Mirth, with thee I mean to live;’ and certainly, if

No. III.

TO MR. JAMES BURNES,

WRITER, MONTROSE.*

Lochlea, 21st June, 1783.

DEAR SIR:

MY father received your favour of the 10th current, and as he has been for some months very poorly in health, and is in his own opinion (and, indeed, in almost every body's else) in a dying condition, he has only, with great difficulty, written a few farewell lines to each of his brothers-in-law. For this melancholy reason, I now hold the pen for him to thank you for your kind letter, and to assure you, Sir, that it shall not be my fault if my father's correspondence in the north die with him. My brother writes to John Caird, and to him I must refer you for the news of our family.

I shall only trouble you with a few particulars relative to the wretched state of this country. Our markets are exceedingly high; oatmeal, 17*d.* and 18*d.* per peck, and not to be got even at that price. We have indeed been pretty well supplied with quantities of white peas from England and elsewhere, but that resource is likely to fail us, and what will become of us then, particularly the very poorest sort, Heaven only knows. This country, till of late, was flourishing incredibly in the manufacture of silk, lawn, and carpet-weaving; and we are still carrying on a good deal in that way, but much reduced from what it was. We had also a fine trade in the shoe way, but now entirely ruined, and hundreds driven to a starving condition on account of it. Farming is also at a very low ebb with us. Our lands, generally speaking, are mountainous and barren; and our landholders, full of ideas of farming, gathered from the English and the Lothians, and other rich soils in Scotland, make no allowance for the odds of the quality of land, and consequently stretch us much beyond what in the event we will be found able to pay. We are also much at a loss for want of proper methods in our improvements of farming. Necessity compels us to leave our old schemes, and few of us have opportunities of being well in-any person, who knew the two boys, had been asked which of them was most likely to court the muses, he would surely never have guessed that Robert had a propensity of that kind.'

Mr. John Murdoch died April 20, 1824, aged seventy-seven. He had published a Radical Vocabulary of the French language, 12mo. 1783; Pronunciation and Orthography of the French language, 8vo. 1788; Dictionary of Distinctions, 8vo. 1811; and other works. He was a highly amiable and worthy man. In his later days, illness had reduced him to the brink of destitution, and an appeal was made to the friends and admirers of his illustrious pupil, in his behalf. Some money was thus raised, and applied to the relief of his necessities. It is stated, in the obituary notice of Mr. Murdoch, published in the London papers, that he had taught English in London to several distinguished foreigners; among the rest, to the celebrated Talleyrand, during his residence as an emigrant in England.]

The following is Mr. Murdoch's reply to the letter of Burns:—

London, October 20th, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR,

As my friend Mr. Brown is going from this place to your neighbourhood, I embrace the opportunity of telling you that I am yet alive, tolerably well, and always in expectation of being better. By the much-valued letters before me, I see that it was my duty to have given this intelligence about three years and nine months ago; and have nothing to allege as an excuse but that we poor, busy, bustling bodies in London are so much taken up with the various pursuits in which we are here engaged that we seldom think of any person, creature, place, or thing, that is absent. But this is not altogether the case with me; for I often think of you, and Horne, and Russell, and an unfathomed depth, and Isomon Brunstane, all in the same minute, although you and they are (as I suppose) at a considerable distance. I flatter myself, however, with the pleasing thought that you and I shall meet some time or other, either in Scotland or England. If ever you come hither, you will have the satisfaction of seeing your poems relished by the Caledonians in London, full as much they can be by those of Edinburgh. We frequently repeat some of your verses in our Caledonian Society; and you may believe that I am not a little vain that I have had some share in cultivating such a genius. I was not absolutely certain that you were the author, till a few days ago, when I made a visit to Mrs. Hill, Dr. McComb's eldest daughter, who lives in town, and who told me that she was informed of it by a letter from her sister in Edinburgh, with whom you had been in company when in that capital.

Pray let me know if you have any intention of visiting this huge, overgrown metropolis. It would afford matter for a large poem. Here you would have an opportunity of indulging your views in the study of mankind, perhaps to a greater degree than in any city upon the face of the globe; for the inhabitants of London, as you know, are a collection of all nations, kindreds, and tongues, who make it, as it were, the centre of their commerce.

* * * * *
Present my respectful compliments to Mrs. Burnes, to my dear friend Gilbert, and all the rest of her amiable children. May the Father of the Universe bless you all with those principles and dispositions that the best of parents took such uncommon pains to instil into your minds, from your earliest infancy. May you live as he did; if you do, you can never be unhappy. I feel myself grown serious all at once, and affected in a manner I cannot describe. I shall only add that it is one of the greatest pleasures I promise myself before I die, that of seeing the family of a man whose memory I revere more than that of any person that ever I was acquainted with. I am, my dear Friend,

Yours sincerely,

JOHN MURDOCH.

* [This gentleman (the son of an elder brother of my father), when he was very young, lost his parent, and having discovered in his repositories some of my father's letters, he requested that the correspondence might be renewed. My father continued till the last year of his life to correspond with his nephew, and it was afterwards kept up by my brother. Extracts from some of my brother's letters to his cousin are introduced in this edition for the purpose of exhibiting the Poet before he had attracted the notice of the public, and in his domestic family relations afterwards.—GILBERT BURNS.]

He was grandfather of Lieutenant Burnes, author of Travels in Bokhara, published a few years' since.

James Burnes, son of the Poet's uncle, lives at Montrose, and has seen fame come to his house in a two-fold way; viz. through his eminent cousin Robert, and, dearer still, through his own grandson, Lieutenant Burnes, with whose talents and intrepidity the world is well acquainted. He is now, as may be surmised, descending into the vale of years; his faculties are still unimpaired, and his love of his own ancient name nothing lessened. He adheres—and we honour him for it—to the spelling of his ancestors; and is not at all pleased at the change made in the name; and even sighs, it is said, because his grandsons have adopted, in part, the Poet's modification.—CUNNINGHAM.]

formed in new ones. In short, my dear Sir, since the unfortunate beginning of this American war, and its as unfortunate conclusion, this country has been, and still is, decaying very fast. Even in higher life, a couple of our Ayrshire noblemen, and the major part of our knights and squires, are all insolvent. A miserable job of a Douglas, Heron, and Co.'s bank, which no doubt you heard of, has undone numbers of them; and imitating English and French, and other foreign luxuries and fopperies, has ruined as many more. There is a great trade of smuggling carried on along our coasts, which, however destructive to the interests of the kingdom at large, certainly enriches this corner of it, but too often at the expense of our morals. However, it enables individuals to make, at least for a time, a splendid appearance; but Fortune, as is usual with her when she is uncommonly lavish of her favours, is generally even with them at the last; and happy were it for numbers of them if she would leave them no worse than when she found them.

My mother sends you a small present of a cheese; 'tis but a very little one, as our last year's stock is sold off; but if you could fix on any correspondent in Edinburgh or Glasgow, we would send you a proper one in the season. Mrs. Black promises to take the cheese under her care so far, and then to send it to you by the Stirling carrier.

I shall conclude this long letter with assuring you that I shall be very happy to hear from you, or any of our friends in your country, when opportunity serves.

My father sends you, probably for the last time in this world, his warmest wishes for your welfare and happiness; and my mother and the rest of the family desire to inclose their kind compliments to you, Mrs. Burness, and the rest of your family, along with those of,

Dear Sir,

Your affectionate Cousin, R. B.

No. IV.

TO MISS ELIZA B *

Lochlea, 1783.

I VERILY believe, my dear Eliza, that the pure genuine feelings of love are as rare in the world as the pure genuine principles of virtue and piety. This I hope will account for the uncommon style of all my letters to you. By uncommon, I mean their being written in such a hasty manner, which, to tell you the truth, has made me often afraid lest you should take me for some zealous bigot, who conversed with his mistress as he would converse with his minister. I don't know how it is, my dear, for though, except your company, there is nothing on earth gives me so much pleasure as writing to you, yet it never gives me those giddy raptures so much talked of among lovers. I have often thought that if a well-grounded affection be not really a part of virtue, 'tis something extremely akin to it. Whenever the thought of my Eliza warms my heart, every feeling of humanity, every principle of generosity kindles in my breast. It extinguishes every dirty spark of malice and envy which are but too apt to infest me. I grasp every creature in the arms of universal benevolence, and equally participate in the pleasures of the happy, and sympathize with the miseries of the unfortunate. I assure you, my dear, I often look up to the Divine Disposer of events with an eye of gratitude for the blessing which I hope he intends to bestow on me in bestowing you. I sincerely wish that he may bless my endeavours to make your life as comfortable and happy as possible, both in sweetening the rougher parts of my natural temper, and bettering the unkindly circumstances of my fortune. This, my dear, is a passion, at least in my view, worthy of a man, and I will add worthy of a Christian. The sordid earth-worm may profess love to a woman's person, whilst in reality his affection is centered in her pocket; and the slavish drudge may go a-wooing as he goes to the horse-market to choose one who is stout and firm, and, as we may say of an old horse, one who will be a good drudge and draw kindly. I disdain their dirty, puny ideas. I would be heartily out of humour with myself, if I thought I were capable of having so poor a notion of the sex which was designed to crown the pleasures of society. Poor devils! I don't envy them their happiness who have such notions. For my part I propose quite other pleasures with my dear partner.

R. B.

* [This, and the three succeeding letters, were included in the first edition of the posthumous works of the Poet, but, for reasons which may be easily imagined, they were omitted in the following editions by Currie, nor were they restored by Gilbert Burns when his brother's works fell under his care. The name of the lady to whom they were addressed has not transpired: she was the heroine of several songs—of "Montgomery's Peggy," of "Bonnie Peggy Alison," and of that still finer lyric commencing,

'Now westlin' winds and slaught'ring guns.'

She was educated, the Bard himself tells us, more than what was then common among young women of her station;

she was also distinguished for good sense as well as good looks. In the note on "Montgomery's Peggy," the Poet's account of his wooing and its indifferent success is given:—he desired to show his talents in letter-writing as well as display his conversational eloquence in twilight walks and stolen interviews. Currie gives these epistles to the twentieth year of Burns, and Lockhart inclines to the same period: but they seem to have been written during the year 1783: they are worthy of him in his best days: they are full of good sense and good feeling; and no doubt, "my dear Eliza" marvelled to find the impassioned lover of "The cannie hour at e'en" so reasonable and sedate on paper.—Ibid.

No. V.

TO THE SAME.

MY DEAR ELIZA :

Lochlea, 1783.

I DO not remember, in the course of your acquaintance and mine, ever to have heard your opinion on the ordinary way of falling in love, amongst people in our station in life ; I do not mean the persons who proceed in the way of bargain, but those whose affection is really placed on the person.

Though I be, as you know very well, but a very awkward lover myself, yet, as I have some opportunities of observing the conduct of others who are much better skilled in the affair of courtship than I am, I often think it is owing to lucky chance, more than to good management, that there are not more unhappy marriages than usually are.

It is natural for a young fellow to like the acquaintance of the females, and customary for him to keep them company when occasion serves : some one of them is more agreeable to him than the rest ; there is something, he knows not what, pleases him, he knows not how, in her company. This I take to be what is called love with the greater part of us ; and I must own, my dear Eliza, it is a hard game such a one as you have to play when you meet with such a lover. You cannot refuse but he is sincere, and yet though you use him ever so favourably, perhaps in a few months, or at farthest in a year or two, the same unaccountable fancy may make him as distractedly fond of another, whilst you are quite forgot. I am aware that perhaps the next time I have the pleasure of seeing you, you may bid me take my own lesson home, and tell me that the passion I have professed for you is perhaps one of those transient flashes I have been describing ; but I hope, my dear Eliza, you will do me the justice to believe me, when I assure you that the love I have for you is founded on the sacred principles of virtue and honour, and by consequence so long as you continue possessed of those amiable qualities which first inspired my passion for you, so long must I continue to love you. Believe me, my dear, it is love like this alone which can render the marriage state happy. People may talk of flames and raptures as long as they please, and a warm fancy, with a flow of youthful spirits, may make them feel something like what they describe ; but sure I am the nobler faculties of the mind with kindred feelings of the heart can only be the foundation of friendship, and it has always been my opinion that the married life was only friendship in a more exalted degree. If you will be so good as to grant my wishes, and it should please Providence to spare us to the latest period of life, I can look forward and see that even then, though bent down with wrinkled age ; even then, when all other worldly circumstances will be indifferent to me, I will regard my Eliza with the tenderest affection, and for this plain reason, because she is still possessed of these noble qualities, improved to a much higher degree, which first inspired my affection for her.

“O! happy state when souls each other draw,
When love is liberty, and nature law.”

I know were I to speak in such a style to many a girl, who thinks herself possessed of no small share of sense, she would think it ridiculous ; but the language of the heart is, my dear Eliza, the only courtship I shall ever use to you.

When I look over what I have written, I am sensible it is vastly different from the ordinary style of courtship, but I shall make no apology—I know your good nature will excuse what your good sense may see amiss.

R. B.

No. VI.

TO THE SAME.

Lochlea, 1783.

I HAVE often thought it a peculiarly unlucky circumstance in love, that though in every other situation in life telling the truth is not only the safest, but actually by far the easiest, way of proceeding, a lover is never under greater difficulty in acting, or more puzzled for expression, than when his passion is sincere, and his intentions are honourable. I do not think that it is so difficult for a person of ordinary capacity to talk of love and fondness, which are not felt, and to make vows of constancy and fidelity, which are never intended to be performed, if he be villain enough to practise such detestable conduct : but to a man whose heart glows with the principles of integrity and truth, and who sincerely loves a woman of amiable person, uncommon refinement of sentiment and purity of manners—to such a one, in such circumstances, I can assure you, my dear, from my own feelings at this present moment, courtship is a task indeed. There is such a number of foreboding fears, and distrustful anxieties crowd into my mind when I am in your company, or when I sit down to write to you, that what to speak or what to write I am altogether at a loss.

There is one rule which I have hitherto practised, and which I shall invariably keep with “Burns, in these letters, moralizes occasionally very happily on love and marriage. They are, in fact, the only sensible love-letters we have ever seen.”—MOTHERWELL.

“It is probable,” says Chambers, “that ‘my dear Eliza’ was the heroine of the Poet’s song, ‘From thee, Eliza, I must go.’”—See page 353.]

you, and that is, honestly to tell you the plain truth. There is something so mean and unmanly in the arts of dissimulation and falsehood that I am surprised they can be acted by any one in so noble, so generous a passion, as virtuous love. No, my dear Eliza, I shall never endeavour to gain your favour by such detestable practices. If you will be so good and so generous as to admit me for your partner, your companion, your bosom friend through life, there is nothing on this side of eternity shall give me greater transport; but I shall never think of purchasing your hand by any arts unworthy of a man, and, I will add, of a Christian. There is one thing, my dear, which I earnestly request of you, and it is this; that you would soon either put an end to my hopes by a peremptory refusal, or cure me of my fears by a generous consent.

It would oblige me much if you would send me a line or two when convenient. I shall only add further that, if a behaviour regulated (though perhaps but very imperfectly) by the rules of honour and virtue, if a heart devoted to love and esteem you, and an earnest endeavour to promote your happiness; if these are qualities you would wish in a friend, in a husband, I hope you shall ever find them in your real friend and sincere lover,

R. B.

No. VII.

TO THE SAME.

Lochlea, 1783.

I OUGHT, in good manners, to have acknowledged the receipt of your letter before this time, but my heart was so shocked at the contents of it that I can scarcely yet collect my thoughts so as to write you on the subject. I will not attempt to describe what I felt on receiving your letter. I read it over and over, again and again, and though it was in the politest language of refusal, still it was peremptory; "you were sorry you could not make me a return, but you wish me," what, without you I never can obtain, "you wish me all kind of happiness." It would be weak and unmanly to say that without you I never can be happy; but sure I am that sharing life with you would have given it a relish, that, wanting you, I can never taste.

Your uncommon personal advantages, and your superior good sense, do not so much strike me; these, possibly, may be met with in a few instances in others; but that amiable goodness, that tender feminine softness, that endearing sweetness of disposition, with all the charming offspring of a warm feeling heart—these I never again expect to meet with, in such a degree, in this world. All these charming qualities, heightened by an education much beyond anything I have ever met in any woman

I ever dared to approach, have made an impression on my heart that I do not think the world can ever efface. My imagination has fondly flattered myself with a wish, I dare not say it ever reached a hope, that possibly I might one day call you mine. I had formed the most delightful images, and my fancy fondly brooded over them; but now I am wretched for the loss of what I really had no right to expect. I must now think no more of you as a mistress; still I presume to ask to be admitted as a friend. As such I wish to be allowed to wait on you, and, as I expect to remove in a few days a little farther off, and you, I suppose, will soon leave this place, I wish to see or hear from you soon; and if an expression should perhaps escape me, rather too warm for friendship, I hope you will pardon it in, my dear Miss—(pardon me the dear expression for once) * * * *

R. B.

No. VIII.

TO MR. JAMES BURNESS,

MONTROSE.

Lochlea, 17th Feb. 1784.

DEAR COUSIN:

I WOULD have returned you my thanks for your kind favour of the 13th of December sooner, had it not been that I waited to give you an account of that melancholy event, which, for some time past, we have from day to day expected.

On the 13th current I lost the best of fathers. Though, to be sure, we have had long warning of the impending stroke; still the feelings of nature claim their part, and I cannot recollect the tender endearments and parental lessons of the best of friends and ablest of instructors, without feeling what perhaps the calmer dictates of reason would partly condemn.

I hope my father's friends in your country will not let their connexion in this place die with him. For my part I shall ever with pleasure—with pride, acknowledge my connexion with those who were allied by the ties of blood and friendship to a man whose memory I shall ever honour and revere.

I expect, therefore, my dear Sir, you will not neglect any opportunity of letting me hear from you, which will very much oblige,

My dear Cousin, yours sincerely,

R. B.

No. IX.

TO JAMES BURNESS,

MONTROSE.

Mossiel, August, 1784.

WE have been surprised with one of the most extraordinary phenomena in the moral world which, I dare say, has happened in the course of this half century. We have had a party of Presbytery relief, as they call themselves, for some time in this country. A pretty thriving society of them has been in the burgh of Irvine for some years past, till about two years ago, a Mrs. Buchan from Glasgow came among them, and began to spread some fanatical notions of religion among them, and, in a short time, made many converts; and, among others, their preacher, Mr. Whyte, who, upon that account, has been suspended and formally deposed by his brethren. He continued, however, to preach in private to his party, and was supported, both he, and their spiritual mother, as they affect to call old Buchan, by the contributions of the rest, several of whom were in good circumstances; till, in spring last, the populace rose and mobbed Mrs. Buchan, and put her out of the town; on which, all her followers voluntarily quitted the place likewise, and with such precipitation that many of them never shut their doors behind them: one left a washing on the green, another a cow bellowing at the crib without food, or any body to mind her, and after several stages, they are fixed at present in the neighbourhood of Dumfries. Their tenets are a strange jumble of enthusiastic jargon; among others, she pretends to give them the Holy Ghost by breathing on them, which she does with postures and practices that are scandalously indecent; they have likewise disposed of all their effects, and hold a community of goods, and live nearly an idle life, carrying on a great farce of pretended devotion in barns and woods, where they lodge and lie all together, and hold likewise a community of women, as it is another of their tenets that they can commit no moral sin. I am personally acquainted with most of them, and I can assure you the above mentioned are facts.

This, my dear Sir, is one of the many instances of the folly of leaving the guidance of sound reason and common sense in matters of religion.

* [“The Buchanites were a small community of enthusiasts, who believed the time to be at hand when there would neither be marriage nor giving in marriage—when the ground, instead of thistles and heather, would yield spontaneously the finest fruits—when all things under the sun would be in common—and ‘our lady,’ so they called Mrs. Buchan, reign spiritual queen of the earth. At first they held the doctrine of immediate translation, but a night spent in wild prayer, wild song, and wilder sermons on the top of a cold hill rebuked this part of their belief, but strengthened them in the opinion regarding their empire on earth, and confirmed ‘our lady’ in the resolution of making a tour through her imaginary dominions. She accordingly moved towards Nithsdale with all her people—some were in carts, some on horseback, and not a few on foot. She rode in front upon a white pony: and often halted to lecture them upon the loveliness of the land, and to cheer them with food from what she called her ‘Garner of mercy,’ and with drink from a large cup called ‘The comforter.’ She addressed all people as she passed along with much mildness, and spoke to them in the language of their callings. ‘James Macleish,’ she said to a gardener, who went to see her, ‘quit Mr. Copland’s garden, and come and work in that of the Lord.’—‘Thank ye,’ answered James, ‘but he was na owre kind to the last gardener

Whenever we neglect or despise these sacred monitors, the whimsical notions of a perturbed brain are taken for the immediate influences of the Deity, and the wildest fanaticism, and the most inconstant absurdities, will meet with abettors and converts. Nay, I have often thought that the more out-of-the-way and ridiculous the fancies are, if once they are sanctified under the sacred name of religion, the unhappy mistaken votaries are the more firmly glued to them.*

R. B.

No. X.

TO MR. JOHN RICHMOND,†

EDINBURGH.

Mossiel, Feb. 17, 1786.

MY DEAR SIR:

I HAVE not time at present to upbraid you for your silence and neglect; I shall only say I received yours with great pleasure. I have enclosed you a piece of rhyming ware for your perusal. I have been very busy with the muses since I saw you, and have composed, among several others, “The Ordination,” a poem on Mr. M’Kinlay’s being called to Kilmarnock: “Scotch drink,” a poem; “The Cotter’s Saturday Night;” “An Address to the De’il,” &c. I have likewise completed my poem on the “Twa Dogs,” but have not shewn it to the world. My chief patron now is Mr. Aiken in Ayr, who is pleased to express great approbation of my works. Be so good as to send me Fergusson, by Connel,‡ and I will remit you the money. I have no news to acquaint you with about Mauchline, they are just going on in the old way. I have some very important news with respect to myself, not the most agreeable—news that I am sure you cannot guess, but I shall give you the particulars another time. I am extremely happy with Smith;§ he is the only friend I have now in Mauchline. I can scarcely he had.’ ‘Our lady’ died at Auchengibardhill in Galloway, and her followers were dispersed—a few of the more resolute believers took a farm: the women spun and made large quantities of linen; the men ploughed and sowed, and made articles of turnery—their lives were inoffensive and their manners gentle—they are now all dead and gone.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [To John Richmond we are indebted for some valuable information respecting the early days and works of the Poet of Ayr-shire, for he was the companion of many of his evening hours, knew of all his poems and songs, and was acquainted with his outgoing and incomings among the dames of Kyle. Burns loved him for the frankness of his heart, and respected him for his learning, which was at least equal to what was required by a Writer in a country village. He is the sole survivor of all the Mauchline comrades of the Poet; and was then pursuing his legal studies in Edinburgh; he now resides in his native place, and rejoices in the fame of his friend.]

‡ [Connel was the Mauchline carrier.—Ibid.]

§ [Smith was then a shop-keeper in Mauchline. It was to him that Burns addressed one of his epistles, beginning, forgive your long neglect of me, and I beg you will let me hear from you regularly by Connel. If you would act your part as a friend, I am sure neither good nor bad fortune should strange or alter me. Excuse haste, as I got your's but yesterday.

“Dear Smith, the sleest paukie thief.”

I am, my dear Sir,

Yours,
ROBERT BURNES.

No. XI.

TO MR. ROBERT MUIR,*

KILMARNOCK.

Mossgiel, 20th March, 1786.

DEAR SIR :

I AM heartily sorry I had not the pleasure of seeing you as you returned through Mauchline; but as I was engaged, I could not be in town before the evening.

I here enclose you my "Scotch Drink," and "may the — follow with a blessing for your edification." I hope, sometime before we hear the govk, to have the pleasure of seeing you at Kilmarnock, when I intend we shall have a gilt between us, in a mutchkin-stoup; which will be a great comfort and consolation to,

Dear Sir,

Your humble servant,
ROBERT BURNES.

No. XII.

TO MR. AIKEN.

Mossgiel, 3rd April, 1786.

DEAR SIR :

I RECEIVED your kind letter with double pleasure, on account of the second flattering instance of Mrs. C.'s notice and approbation. I assure you I

"Turn out the brunt side o' my shin," as the famous Ramsay, of jingling memory, says, at such a patroness. Present her my most grateful acknowledgments in your very

He died in the West Indies. Cromek, who first gave this letter to the public, says this is the only letter he had met with in which the Poet added the termination ess to his name, as his father and family had spelled it; but in the letters immediately following, he still adhered to the ancient orthography.]

* [Mr. Muir was a staunch friend of the Poet, and did him many good offices. When the Edinburgh edition of his Poems was announced by subscription, he put down his name for forty copies, and used all his influence among his friends and acquaintances to induce them to be equally liberal. This was true friendship.]

† [See "Lines to Mrs. C.," page 325.]

‡ [This is the last time that the Poet spelt his name according to his forefathers: his poems were now in the press, best manner of telling truth. I have inscribed the following stanza on the blank leaf of Miss More's Work.†

My proposals for publishing I am just going to send to press. I expect to hear from you by the first opportunity.

I am ever, dear Sir, yours,
ROBERT BURNES.‡

No. XIII.

TO MR. M'WHINNIE,

WRITER, AYR.

Mossgiel, 17th April, 1786.

It is injuring some hearts, those hearts that elegantly bear the impression of the good Creator, to say to them you give them the trouble of obliging a friend; for this reason, I only tell you that I gratify my own feelings in requesting your friendly offices with respect to the enclosed, because I know it will gratify yours to assist me in it to the utmost of your power.

I have sent you four copies, as I have no less than eight dozen, which is a great deal more than I shall ever need.

Be sure to remember a poor poet militant in your prayers. He looks forward with fear and trembling to that, to him, important moment which stamps the die with—with—with, perhaps, the eternal disgrace of,

My dear Sir,

Your humble,
afflicted, tormented,
ROBERT BURNES.§

No. XIV.

TO MR. JOHN KENNEDY.

Mossgiel, 20th April, 1786.

SIR,

By some neglect in Mr. Hamilton, I did not hear of your kind request for a subscription paper 'till this day. I will not attempt any acknowledgment for this, nor the manner in which I see your name in Mr. Hamilton's suband he had to make his election. Indeed, the family aver that in the Montrose archives the name is sometimes written Burnes, but this seems not to affect the pronunciation, which was always Burness, till the Bard of Ayr deprived it of a syllable. The Miss More alluded to is the celebrated Hannah More, author of "Practical Piety," and numerous other moral and religious works.]

§ [Burns, in this letter, enclosed some subscription lists for the first edition of his poems. He had many friends in Ayr-shire; and it is gratifying to know that this gentleman, as well as the rest of the Poet's friends, was not backward in fulfilling the wishes of the Bard. Mr. M'Whinnie not only subscribed himself, but induced many others to do the same.]

scription list. Allow me only to say, Sir, I feel the weight of the debt.

I have here likewise inclosed a small piece, the very latest of my productions.* I am a good deal pleased with some sentiments myself, as they are just the native querulous feelings of a heart which, as the elegantly melting Gray says, "melancholy has marked for her own."

Our race comes on a-pace; that much expected scene of revelry and mirth; but to me it brings no joy equal to that meeting with which your last flattered the expectation of,

Sir,
Your indebted humble Servant,
R. B.

—◆—
No. XV.

TO MR. JOHN KENNEDY.

Mossgiel, 17th May, 1786.

DEAR SIR,

I HAVE sent you the above hasty copy as I promised.† In about three or four weeks I shall probably set the press a-going. I am much hurried at present, otherwise your diligence, so very friendly in my subscription, should have a more lengthened acknowledgment from

Dear Sir,
Your obliged Servant,
R. B.

—◆—
No. XVI.

TO JOHN BALLANTINE,

OF AYR.

June 1786.

HONOURED SIR:

My proposals came to hand last night, and knowing that you would wish to have it in your power to do me a service as early as any body, I enclose you half a sheet of them. I must consult you, first opportunity, on the propriety of sending my quondam friend, Mr. Aiken, a copy. If he is now reconciled to my character as an honest man, I would do it with all my soul; but I would not be beholden to the noblest being ever God created, if he imagined me to be a rascal. Apropos, old Mr. Armour prevailed with him to mutilate that unlucky paper yesterday. Would you believe it?—though I had not a hope, nor even a wish, to make her mine after her conduct; yet, when he told me the names were all out of the paper, my heart died within me, and he cut my veins with the news. Perdition seize her falsehood! ‡

R. B.

—◆—
No. XVII.

TO MR. DAVID BRICE,§

Mossgiel, June 12, 1786.

DEAR BRICE:

I RECEIVED your message by G. Paterson, and, as I am not very throng at present, I just write to let you know that there is such a worthless, rhyming reprobate, as your humble servant, still in the land of the living, though I can scarcely say in the place of hope. I have no news to tell you that will give me any pleasure to mention, or you to hear.

Poor ill-advised, ungrateful Armour came home on Friday last.|| You have heard all the particulars of that affair, and a black affair it is. What she thinks of her conduct now, I don't know; one thing I do know—she has made me completely miserable. Never man loved, or rather adored, a woman more than I did her; and, to confess a truth between you and me, I do still love her to distraction after all, though I won't tell her so if I were to see her, which I don't want to do. My poor dear unfortunate Jean! how happy have I been in thy arms! It is not the losing her that makes me so unhappy, but for her sake I feel most severely: I foresee she is in the road to, I am afraid, eternal ruin.

May Almighty God forgive her ingratitude and perjury to me, as I from my very soul forgive her; and may His grace be with her and bless her in all her future life! I can have no nearer idea of the place of eternal punishment than what I have felt in my own breast on her account. I have tried often to forget her; I have run into all kinds of dissipation and riots, mason-meetings, drinking-matches, and other mischief, to drive her out of my head, but all in vain. And now for a grand cure; the ship is on her way home that is to take me out to

* [The small piece which the Poet enclosed was the imitable "Mountain Daisy." The name which heads the manuscript is "The Gowan." It is almost a pity that the Poet changed the title.]

† [The Poet's Epistle to Rankine was enclosed in this hasty note. Burns seems to have been indefatigable in making his works known through the medium of friends: the copies of his best poems in his own hand-writing are numerous. His correspondents, living often at a distance from each other, were pleased with this mark of confidence, and read his poems to all who were willing to listen.]

‡ [In this letter we have a plain account of the destruction of the marriage-lines between the Poet and his bonnie Jean: her father consulted Mr. Aiken, and prevailed upon him to tear their names away from the unlucky certificate. Burns now alludes to Mr. Aiken as his quondam friend. Old Armour, by his bigoted pride, and foolish scruples, seems to have inflicted unnecessary anguish on two hearts warmly attached to each other.]

§ [David Brice was a shoe-maker in Glasgow, and, like most of his craft, shrewd and intelligent. He shared with Smith and Richmond the confidence of the Poet in love matters, and seems to have been fully acquainted with all the particulars which inspired that melancholy poem "The Lament."—CUNNINGHAM.]

|| [From Paisley, whither she had gone to reside for some time, at the request of her parents.]

Jamaica; and then, farewell, dear old Scotland! and farewell, dear ungrateful Jean! for never, never will I see you more.

You will have heard that I am going to commence poet in print; and to-morrow my works go to the press. I expect it will be a volume of about two hundred pages—it is just the last foolish action I intend to do; and then turn a wise man as fast as possible.

Believe me to be, dear Brice,

Your friend and well-wisher,

R. B.

—◆—
No. XVIII.

TO MR. ROBERT AIKEN.

Ayr-shire, July 1786.

SIR:

I WAS with Wilson, my printer, t'other day, and settled all our by-gone matters between us. After I had paid him all demands, I made him the offer of the second edition, on the hazard of being paid out of the first and readiest, which he declines. By his account, the paper of a thousand copies would cost about twenty-seven pounds, and the printing about fifteen or sixteen: he offers to agree to this for the printing, if I will advance for the paper, but this, you know, is out of my power; so farewell hopes of a second edition 'till I grow richer! an epocha which, I think, will arrive at the payment of the British national debt.

There is scarcely any thing hurts me so much in being disappointed of my second edition as not having it in my power to shew my gratitude to Mr. Ballantine, by publishing my poem of "The Brigs of Ayr." I would detest myself as a wretch, if I thought I were capable in a very long life of forgetting the honest, warm, and tender delicacy with which he enters into my interests. I am sometimes pleased with myself in my grateful sensations; but I believe, on the whole, I have very little merit in it, as my gratitude is not a virtue, the consequence of reflection; but sheerly the instinctive emotion of my heart, too inattentive to allow worldly maxims and views to settle into selfish habits.

I have been feeling all the various rotations and movements within, respecting the excise. There are many things plead strongly against it; the uncertainty of getting soon into business; the consequences of my follies, which may perhaps make it impracticable for me to stay at home; and besides I have for some time been pining under secret wretchedness, from causes which you pretty well know—the pang of disappointment, the sting of pride, with some wandering stabs of remorse, which never fail to settle on my vitals like vultures, when attention is not called away by the calls of society, or the vagaries of the muse. Even in the hour of social mirth, my gaiety is the madness of an intoxicated criminal under the hands of the executioner. All these reasons urge me to go abroad, and to all these reasons I have only one answer—the feelings of a father. This, in the present mood I am in, overbalances every thing that can be laid in the scale against it.

You may perhaps think it an extravagant fancy, but it is a sentiment which strikes home to my very soul: though sceptical in some points of our current belief, yet, I think, I have every evidence for the reality of a life beyond the stunted bourne of our present existence; if so, then, how should I, in the presence of that tremendous Being, the Author of existence, how should I meet the reproaches of those who stand to me in the dear relation of children, whom I deserted in the smiling innocence of helpless infancy? O, thou great unknown Power!—thou almighty God! who hast lighted up reason in my breast, and blessed me with immortality!—I have frequently wandered from that order and regularity necessary for the perfection of thy works, yet thou hast never left me, nor forsaken me!

Since I wrote the foregoing sheet, I have seen something of the storm of mischief thickening over my folly-devoted head. Should you, my friends, my benefactors, be successful in your applications for me,* perhaps it may not be in my power in that way to reap the fruit of your friendly efforts. What I have written in the preceding pages is the settled tenour of my present resolution; but should inimical circumstances forbid me closing with your kind offer, or enjoying it only threaten to entail farther misery—

To tell the truth, I have little reason for complaint; as the world, in general, has been kind to me fully up to my deserts. I was, for some time past, fast getting into the pining distrustful snarl of the misanthrope. I saw myself alone, unfit for the struggle of life, shrinking at every rising cloud in the chance-directed atmosphere of fortune, while, all defenceless, I looked about in vain for a cover. It never occurred to me, at least never with the force it deserved, that this world is a busy scene, and man, a creature destined for a progressive struggle; and that, however I might possess a warm heart and inoffensive manners (which last, by the by, was rather more than I could well boast); still, more than these passive qualities, there was something to be done. When all my schoolfellows and youthful compeers (those misguided few excepted who joined, to use a Gentoo phrase, the "hallachores" of the human race) were striking off with eager hope and earnest intent, in some one or other of the many paths of busy life, I was "standing idle in the market-place," or only left the chase of the butterfly from flower to flower, to hunt fancy from whom to whim.

* [An effort was at this time being made to obtain for the Poet an appointment in the Excise.]

You see, Sir, that if to know one's errors were a probability of mending them, I stand a fair chance: but, according to the reverend Westminster divines, though conviction must precede conversion, it is very far from always implying it.*

R. B.

No. XIX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP,

OF DUNLOP.†

Ayr-shire, July 1786.

MADAM.

I AM truly sorry I was not at home yesterday, when I was so much honoured with your

* [This letter was written under the distress of mind occasioned by the Poet's separation from his bonny Jean. Robert Aiken, to whom it is addressed, was one of the bard's best patrons: he praised his performances and encouraged him to persevere in song, when friends were few and the world far from smiling. By inscribing to him "The Cotter's Saturday Night," Burns paid a compliment—a merited one—to the accuracy of his taste, and the rectitude of his life. But the patron and the Poet were of different opinions regarding the situation in which he stood with Jean Armour—opposition begat coldness—and they became, for a time at least, estranged.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† Mrs. DUNLOP, OF DUNLOP.

[THIS excellent person died 24th May, 1815, full of days and honour, in the 65th year of her age; leaving a numerous offspring, many of whom have distinguished themselves in various parts of the British dominions. The Dunlop family was afterwards represented by her son, General James Dunlop, who was severely wounded commanding the left wing of the army at the siege of Seringapatam; the climate of the West Indies having proved fatal to his elder brother, General Andrew Dunlop, while obeying the call of his professional duty, 1819.

Frances Wallace, the only daughter and ultimately the heiress of Sir Thomas Wallace, of Craigie, in Ayr-shire, was born about the year 1731, and at the age of seventeen became the wife of John Dunlop, Esq., of Dunlop, in the same county. Although she brought her husband a very large fortune, together with the mansion of Craigie, beautifully situated on the Ayr, she was content to spend the whole of her married and dowager life, with the exception of occasional visits, in retirement at Dunlop. She there became the mother of five sons and five daughters, all of whom, except one, survived her. Her eldest son succeeded, under the name of Sir Thomas Wallace, to her paternal estate of Craigie, which, however, is not now the property of the family. Mr. Dunlop settled his own estate upon the second son, James Dunlop, a Lieutenant-General in the Army; and at one time representative of the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, in parliament, whose son, John Dunlop, Esq., of Dunlop, was in 1836 member for Ayrshire.

Without the least tincture of the pretension and parade which too often distinguish literary ladies, Mrs. Dunlop was a lady of highly cultivated understanding—fond of books, and extensively acquainted with them, and also disposed to be the kind and zealous friend of their authors. While she treated Burns with uniform affability and kindness, there was an unaffected dignity in her whole character, which seems to have at once exercised a salutary restraint over him, and raised his mind, when in communication with her's, to the exercise of its best powers. The mind of Mrs. Dunlop, overflowing with benevolent feelings, delighted in those fine emotions of the Ayr-shire poet, which found expression in the verses to a Mouse, the stanzas on a Winter Night, and the noble poem—"The Cotter's Saturday Night," which first attracted her attention to the Bard. Burns, on the other order for my copies, and incomparably more by the handsome compliments you are pleased to pay my poetic abilities. I am fully persuaded that there is not any class of mankind so feelingly alive to the titillations of applause as the sons of Parnassus: nor is it easy to conceive how the heart of the poor bard dances with rapture, when those, whose character in life gives them a right to be polite judges, honour him with their approbation. Had you been thoroughly acquainted with me, Madam, you could not have touched my darling heart-chord more sweetly than by noticing my attempts to celebrate your illustrious ancestor, the Saviour of his Country.

"Great patriot hero! ill-requited chief!"

The first book I met with in my early years, which I perused with pleasure, was "The Life of Hannibal;" the next was "The History of Sir William Wallace:" for several of my earlier years I had few other authors; and hand, glowed at finding, in the heretrix of an ancient family and historical honours, a heart as warm and philanthropic as his own. Mrs. Dunlop never felt displeas'd with Burns but once. On a visit at her house, he asked her advice respecting his going into the Excise—a step of which she decidedly disapproved. He argued the point with her very strenuously for some time; but, at last, finding that he could not prevail upon her to look favourably on the scheme, he confessed that further discussion was vain, as he had his commission in his pocket. She could not help expressing some resentment; but soon forgave a mode of procedure but too characteristic of those who ask for advice.

After the death of Burns, Mrs. Dunlop paid a visit to Dr. Currie at Liverpool, in order to consult with him respecting the publication of the Poet's works. Dr. Currie had already perused her letters to Burns, which he had found amongst the Poet's papers; and he expressed an anxious wish that she would allow of their publication, in connection with those of Burns to herself. But Mrs. Dunlop entertained an insurmountable repugnance to all public appearances, and, notwithstanding Dr. Currie's assurances of the value of her compositions, both on their own account, and as rendering Burns's Letters the more intelligible, she positively refused to allow them to see the light. She concluded her interview by half jestingly purchasing back her letters from him one by one, laying a letter of Burns for each of her own, till she obtained the whole. She then returned satisfied to Dunlop House. These letters still exist, but her family feel that they would not be fulfilling her wishes by giving them to the world.—CHAMBERS.

"Of all the friendships," says Gilbert Burns, "which Robert acquired in Ayr-shire, or elsewhere, none seemed more agreeable to him than that of Mrs. Dunlop, nor any which has been more uniformly and constantly exerted in behalf of him and his family. This lady, daughter and sole heiress to Sir Thomas Wallace, of Craigie, and lineal descendant of the illustrious Wallace, the first of Scottish warriors, possessed the qualities of mind suited to her high lineage. Preserving, in the decline of life, the generous affections of youth, her admiration of the Poet was soon accompanied by a sincere friendship for the man, which continued in after life, through good and evil report; in poverty, in sickness, and in sorrow."

Mrs. Dunlop exercised a two-fold influence over the muse of Burns; she was a poetess, and had the blood of the Wallaces in her veins. Her taste and station gave her great power in the west; she praised the Poet wherever she went, and addressed letters to him remarkable not only for their god sense and good feeling, but for a spirit of charity and toleration not common in those feverish times. She now and then, indeed, introduced not a few of her own verses into her correspondence; but she seems not to have been greedy of praise, nor to have resented her friend's want of courtesy when he forgot to commend her musings. She lived to a good old age; had the satisfaction to see the ancient spirit many a solitary hour have I stole out, after the laborious vocations of the day, to shed a tear over their glorious, but unfortunate, stories. In those boyish days I remember, in particular, being struck with that part of Wallace's story where these lines occur—

“Synne to the Leglen wood, when it was late,
To make a silent and a safe retreat.”

I chose a fine summer Sunday, the only day my line of life allowed, and walked half-a-dozen of miles to pay my respects to the Leglen wood, with as much devout enthusiasm as ever pilgrim did to Loretto; and, as I explored every den and dell where I could suppose my heroic countryman to have lodged, I recollect (for even then I was a rhymist) that my heart glowed with a wish to be able to make a song on him in some measure equal to his merits.

R. B.

No. XX.

TO MR. DAVID BRICE,

SHOE-MAKER, GLASGOW.

Mossgiel, 17th July, 1786.

I HAVE been so throng printing my Poems that I could scarcely find as much time as to write to you. Poor Armour is come back again to Mauchline, and I went to call for her, and her mother forbade me the house, nor did she herself express much sorrow for what she has done. I have already appeared publicly in church, and was indulged in the liberty of standing in my own seat. I do this to get a certificate as a bachelor, which Mr. Auld has promised me. I am now fixed to go for the West Indies in October. Jean and her friends insisted much that she should stand along with me in the kirk, but the minister would not allow it, which bred a great trouble, I assure you, and I am blamed as the cause of it, though I am sure I am innocent; but I am very much pleased, for all that, not to have had her company. I have no news to tell you that I remember. I am really happy to hear of your welfare, and that you are so well in Glasgow. I must certainly see you before I leave the country. I shall expect to hear from you soon, and am,

Dear Brice,

Yours,—R. B.

of the Wallaces revive in her son the General, and to know that Scotland revered her for her unchanging kindness to the equally accomplished and unfortunate Burns.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [The Poet, when he wrote this letter, was skulking from Carrick to Kyle, and from Kyle to Carrick: “some ill-advised persons,” he said, had “uncoupled the merciless pack of the law at his heels.” But Mr. Armour had no wish to detain him till he found bail: he was desirous that he should leave the country; and, to accomplish this, had recourse to

No. XXI.

TO MR. JOHN RICHMOND.

Old Rome Forest, 30th July, 1786.

MY DEAR RICHMOND:

MY hour is now come—you and I will never meet in Britain more. I have orders, within three weeks at farthest, to repair a-board the Nancy, Captain Smith, from Clyde, to Jamaica, and to call at Antigua. This, except to our friend Smith, whom God long preserve, is a secret about Mauchline. Would you believe it? Armour has got a warrant to throw me in jail till I find security for an enormous sum. This they keep an entire secret, but I got it by a channel they little dream of; and I am wandering from one friend's house to another, and, like a true son of the gospel, “have no where to lay my head.” I know you will pour an execration on her head, but spare the poor, ill-advised girl, for my sake; though may all the furies that rend the injured, enraged lover's bosom, await her mother until her latest hour! I write in a moment of rage, reflecting on my miserable situation—exiled, abandoned, forlorn. I can write no more—let me hear from you by the return of coach. I will write you ere I go.

I am, dear Sir,

Yours, here and hereafter,

R. B.*

No. XXII.

TO MR. JAMES SMITH,†

MAUCHLINE.

Monday Morning, Mossgiel, August, 1786.

MY DEAR SIR:

I WENT to Dr. Douglas yesterday, fully resolved to take the opportunity of Captain Smith; but I found the Doctor with a Mr. and Mrs. White, both Jamaicans, and they have deranged my plans altogether. They assure him that to send me from Savannah la Mar to Port Antonio will cost my master, Charles Douglas, upwards of fifty pounds; besides running the risk of throwing myself into a pleuritic fever, in consequence of hard travelling in the sun. On these accounts, he refuses sending me with Smith, but a vessel sails from the law. These are painful but necessary explanations.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [Of James Smith much has already been written in the Life of the Poet: Burns said he was small of stature, but large of soul; he was a joyous and witty person. The Poet was a frequent visitor at his shop in Mauchline, and shared with him and John Richmond all his little secrets in rhyme and love. The world was not kinder to him than it was to the Poet: his speculations in Scotland failed; he went to Jamaica with the hope of mending his fortune, and there found an early grave.—Ibid.]

Greenock the first of September, right for the place of my destination. The Captain of her is an intimate friend of Mr. Gavin Hamilton, and as good a fellow as heart could wish: with him I am destined to go. Where I shall shelter, I know not, but I hope to weather the storm. Perish the drop of blood of mine that fears them! I know their worst, and am prepared to meet it:—

“I’ll laugh, an’ sing, an’ shake my leg,
As lang’s I dow.”

On Thursday morning, if you can muster as much self-denial as to be out of bed about seven o’clock, I shall see you as I ride through to Cumnock. After all, Heaven bless the sex! I feel there is still happiness for me among them:—

“O woman, lovely woman! Heaven design’d you
To temper man!—we had been brutes without you!”

R. B.

—◆—
No. XXIII.

TO MR. JOHN KENNEDY.

Kilmarnock, August 1786.

MY DEAR SIR,

YOUR truly facetious epistle of the 3rd instant gave me much entertainment. I was sorry I had not the pleasure of seeing you as I passed your way, but we shall bring up all our lee way on Wednesday, the 16th current, when I hope to have it in my power to call on you and take a kind, very probably a last, adieu, before I go for Jamaica; and I expect orders to repair to Greenock every day.—I have at last made my public appearance, and am solemnly inaugurated into the numerous class.—Could I have got a carrier, you should have had a score of vouchers for my Authorship; but now you have them, let them speak for themselves.

R. B.

[The Poet here inserts his “Farewell,” which will be found at page 327.]

—◆—
No. XXIV.

TO MR. ROBERT MUIR,

KILMARNOCK.*

Mossiel, Friday noon, September, 1786.

MY FRIEND, MY BROTHER:

WARM recollection of an absent friend presses so hard upon my heart that I send him

* [Robert Muir of Kilmarnock was a constant and kind friend to the Poet; he promoted his interest in his own wide circle of acquaintance, and set the world an example the prefixed bagatelle (the Calf,) pleased with the thought that it will greet the man of my bosom, and be a kind of distant language of friendship.

You will have heard that poor Armour has re-paid me double. A very fine boy and a girl have awakened a thought and feelings that thrill, some with tender pressure and some with foreboding anguish, through my soul.

The poem was nearly an extemporaneous production, on a wager with Mr. Hamilton, that I would not produce a poem on the subject in a given time.

If you think it worth while, read it to Charles and Mr. W. Parkèr, and if they choose a copy of it, it is at their service, as they are men whose friendship I shall be proud to claim, both in this world and that which is to come.

I believe all hopes of staying at home will be abortive, but more of this when, in the latter part of next week, you shall be troubled with a visit from,

My dear Sir,

Your most devoted,

R. B.

—◆—
No. XXV.

TO MR. BURNES,

MONTROSE.

Mossiel, Tuesday noon, Sept. 26, 1786.

MY DEAR SIR:

I THIS moment receive yours—receive it with the honest hospitable warmth of a friend’s welcome. Whatever comes from you wakens always up the better blood about my heart, which your kind little recollections of my parental friends carries as far as it will go. ’Tis there that man is blest! ’Tis there, my friend, man feels a consciousness of something within him above the trodden clod! The grateful reverence to the hoary (earthly) author of his being—the burning glow when he clasps the woman of his soul to his bosom—the tender yearnings of heart for the little angels to whom he has given existence—these nature has poured in milky streams about the human heart; and the man who never rouses them to action, by the inspiring influences of their proper objects, loses by far the most pleasurable part of his existence.

My departure is uncertain, but I do not think it will be till after harvest. I will be on very short allowance of time indeed, if I do not comply with your friendly invitation. When it will be, I don’t know, but if I can make my by subscribing for forty copies of the Edinburgh edition of his poems.]

wish good, I will endeavour to drop you a line some time before. My best compliments to Mrs. —; I should [be] equally mortified should I drop in when she is abroad; but of that I suppose there is little chance.

What I have wrote Heaven knows; I have not time to review it: so accept of it in the beaten way of friendship. With the ordinary phrase—perhaps rather more than the ordinary sincerity—I am, dear Sir, ever yours,

R. B.

No. XXVI.

TO DR. ARCHD. LAWRIE.

Mossgiel, Nov. 13th, 1786.

DEAR SIR:

I HAVE, along with this, sent the two volumes of Ossian, with the remaining volume of the songs. Ossian I am not in such a hurry about, but I wish the songs, with the volume of the Scotch Poets, returned, as soon as they can be conveniently dispatched. If they are left at Mr. Wilson's, the bookseller, Kilmarnock, they will easily reach me. My most respectable compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Lawrie, and a Poet's warm wishes for their happiness;—to the young ladies, particularly the fair musician, whom I think much better qualified than ever David was, or could be, to charm an evil spirit out of Saul. Indeed, it needs not the feelings of a Poet to be interested in one of the sweetest scenes of domestic peace and kindred love that ever I saw, as I think the peaceful unity of St. Margaret's Hill can only be excelled by the harmonious concord of the Apocalypse.

I am, dear Sir,

Yours sincerely,

ROBERT BURNS.

[This truly delightful letter first appeared in THE LAND OF BURNS. Our Poet excelled all other men in well-timed compliments to those exalted individuals with whom it was his pride to associate. The family circle of Dr. Lawrie was indeed a pattern of domestic peace, harmony, and concord, rarely excelled.]

No. XXVII.

TO MISS ALEXANDER.

Mossgiel, 18th Nov. 1786.

MADAM:

POETS are such outré beings, so much the children of wayward fancy and capricious whim, that I believe the world generally allows them a larger latitude in the laws of propriety than the sober sons of judgment and prudence. I mention this as an apology for the liberties that a nameless stranger has taken with you in the enclosed poem, which he begs leave to present you with. Whether it has poetical merit any way worthy of the theme, I am not the proper judge; but it is the best my abilities can produce; and, what to a good heart will, perhaps, be a superior grace, it is equally sincere as fervent.

The scenery was nearly taken from real life, though I dare say, Madam, you do not recollect it, as I believe you scarcely noticed the poetic reueur as he wandered by you. I had roved out, as chance directed, in the favourite haunts of my muse, on the banks of the Ayr, to view nature in all the gaiety of the vernal year. The evening sun was flaming over the distant western hills; not a breath stirred the crimson opening blossom, or the verdant spreading leaf. It was a golden moment for a poetic heart. I listened to the feathered warblers, pouring their harmony on every hand, with a congenial kindred regard, and frequently turned out of my path, lest I should disturb their little songs, or frighten them to another station. Surely, said I to myself, he must be a wretch indeed who, regardless of your harmonious endeavour to please him, can eye your elusive flights to discover your secret recesses, and to rob you of all the property nature gives you—your dearest comforts, your helpless nestlings. Even the hoary hawthorn twig that shot across the way, what heart at such a time but must have been interested in its welfare, and wished it preserved from the rudely-browsing cattle, or the withering eastern blast? Such was the scene,—and such the hour, when in a corner of my prospect I spied one of the fairest pieces of nature's workmanship that ever crowned a poetic landscape or met a poet's eye, those visionary bards excepted who hold commerce with aerial beings! Had Calumny and Villainy taken my walk, they had at that moment sworn eternal peace with such an object.

What an hour of inspiration for a poet! It would have raised plain dull historic prose into metaphor and measure.

The enclosed song was the work of my return home; and perhaps it but poorly answers what might have been expected from such a scene.

I have the honour to be,

Madam,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

R. B.

[In the life of the Poet, and in the note to the song which this letter accompanied, much has been said about "The Bonnie Lass of Ballochmyle." The best excuse which can well be offered for her silence and coldness is that she lived to see how much she wronged her own fame and beauty in not accepting the honours which the muse had paid her, and to make such reparation as was in her power, by regarding the original copy of the song as an heir-loom of the house of Alexander. The braes of Ballochmyle are now visited like the braes of Yarrow and the broom of the Cowden-Knowes, by poetic pilgrims, and the scene is eagerly pointed out where the Poet saw the fair vision which inspired him.—Miss Alexander is still alive, at Ballochmyle [1840].

◆
No. XXVIII.

TO MRS. STEWART,

OF STAIR.*

November, 1786.

MADAM :

THE hurry of my preparations for going abroad has hindered me from performing my promise so soon as I intended. I have here sent you a parcel of songs, &c., which never made their appearance, except to a friend or two at most. Perhaps some of them may be no great entertainment to you, but of that I am far from being an adequate judge. The song to the tune of "Etrick Banks" [The bonnie lass of Ballochmyle] you will easily see the impropriety of exposing much, even in manuscript. I think, myself, it has some merit: both as a tolerable description of one of nature's sweetest scenes, a July evening; and one of the finest pieces of nature's workmanship, the finest indeed we know any thing of, an amiable, beautiful young woman; † but I have no common friend to procure me that permission, without which I would not dare to spread the copy.

I am quite aware, Madam, what task the world would assign me in this letter. The obscure bard, when any of the great condescend to take notice of him, should heap the altar with the incense of flattery. Their high ancestry, their own great and god-like qualities and actions, should be recounted with the most exaggerated description. This, Madam, is a task for which I am altogether unfit. Besides a certain disqualifying pride of heart, I know nothing of your connexions in life, and have no access to where your real character is to be found—the company of your compeers: and more, I am afraid that even the most refined adulation is by no means the road to your good opinion.

One feature of your character I shall ever with grateful pleasure remember;—the reception I got when I had the honour of waiting on you at Stair. I am little acquainted with politeness, but I know a good deal of benevolence of temper and goodness of heart.—Surely did those in exalted stations know how happy they could make some classes of their inferiors by condescension and affability, they would never stand so high, measuring out with every look the height of their elevation, but condescend as sweetly as did Mrs. Stewart of Stair.

R. B.

◆
No. XXIX.

TO MR. ROBERT MUIR.

Mossiel, 18th Nov., 1786.

MY DEAR SIR :

ENCLOSED you have "Tam Samson," as I intended to print him. I am thinking for my Edinburgh expedition on Monday or Tuesday, come se'ennight, for pos. † I will see you on Tuesday first.

I am ever,

Your much indebted,

R. B.

* [Mrs. Stewart of Stair, afterwards of Afton, was the first person of note who had the sagacity to discover in the Ayrshire ploughman a genius of the first order. Two or three of his songs were sufficient for this: it has already been related how his heart fluttered and his natural boldness forsook him as he walked through the rooms of the "towers of Stair" to see the fair owner for the first time. It is to be regretted that the political impetuosity of Burns, which increased much as he advanced in life, should have found vent in sarcastic sayings and sneering lampoons. Mrs. Stewart remonstrated mildly with the Poet concerning these transgressions, and told him that they furnished many with a pretext for not aiding him in his views in life, and even threw suspicion on the principles of his steadfast friends. Something like a coolness followed this; but, though Burns was nettled, he omitted no opportunity of intimating how much he felt indebted to her for her early kindness and cheering condescension.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† Miss Alexander.

‡ [The Edinburgh expedition was undertaken in consequence of the following letter, written by a critic and a poet, Thomas Blacklock, to the Rev. Mr. Lawrie, who communicated it to Gavin Hamilton, by whom it was shown to Burns:—

"EVEREST AND DEAR SIR,—I ought to have acknowledged your favour long ago, not only as a testimony of your kind remembrance, but as it gave me an opportunity of sharing one of the finest, and, perhaps one of the most genuine entertainments, of which the human mind is susceptible. A number of avocations retarded my progress in reading the poems; at last, however, I have finished that pleasing perusal. * * * It was my wish to have expressed my approbation in verse; but whether from declining life, or a temporary depression of spirits, it is at present out of my power to accomplish that agreeable intention.

Mr. Stewart, professor of morals in this university, had formerly read me three of the poems, and I had desired him to get my name inserted among the subscribers: but whether this was done or not, I never could learn. I have little intercourse with Dr. Blair, but will take care to have the poems communicated to him by the intervention of some mutual friend. * * * [The passages omitted have been already given in the LIFE of the Poet. See p. 39.]

No. XXX.

TO DR. MACKENZIE,*

MAUCHLINE;

ENCLOSING HIM VERSES ON DINING WITH LORD DAER.

Wednesday Morning, November, 1786.

DEAR SIR:

I NEVER spent an afternoon among great folks with half that pleasure as when, in company with you, I had the honour of paying my devoirs to that plain, honest, worthy man, the professor [Dugald Stewart]. I would be delighted to see him perform acts of kindness and friendship, though I were not the object; he does it with such a grace. I think his character, divided into ten parts, stands thus—four parts Socrates—four parts Nathaniel—and two parts Shakspeare's Brutus.

The accompanying verses were really extempore, but a little corrected since. They may entertain you a little with the help of that partiality with which you are so good as to favour the performances of,

Dear Sir,

Your very humble Servant,
R. B.

No. XXXI.

TO GAVIN HAMILTON, Esq.†

MAUCHLINE.

Edinburgh, Dec. 7th, 1786.

HONOURED SIR:

I HAVE paid every attention to your commands, but can only say what perhaps you will have heard before this reach you, that Muirkirklands were bought by a Mr. John Gordon, W. S., but for whom I know not; Mauchlands, Haugh Miln, &c., by a Mr. Frederick Fotheringham, supposed to be for Ballochmyle Laird, and Adam-hill and Shawood were bought for Oswald's folks.—This is so imperfect an account, and will be so late ere it reach you, that

* [The kind and venerable Dr. Mackenzie is now, alas! no more. He was, saving John Richmond, the sole survivor of the friends whom Burns numbered in the west. To him the public are indebted for much valuable information respecting the household of William Burns, and the youthful days of the Poet. He introduced Burns to Dugald Stewart and others, and sought to extend his fame, and put him on the way to fortune. This excellent man afterwards practised for many years as a surgeon in Irvine, where he attained the highest honours of the magistracy. In 1827 he retired to Edinburgh, where he died January 11th, 1837, at an advanced age.]

† [Gavin Hamilton was a gentleman of old descent, and what the Poet prized more, a person of wit and talent. At his table Burns was a frequent guest, and flashes of humour and snatches of joyous song, with good wine, lent wings to the longest nights. It is true that the Bard sat long at the were it not to discharge my conscience I would not trouble you with it; but after all my diligence I could make it no sooner, nor better.

For my own affairs, I am in a fair way of becoming as eminent as Thomas à Kempis or John Bunyan; and you may expect henceforth to see my birth-day inserted among the wonderful events, in the poor Robin's and Aberdeen Almanacks, along with the black Monday, and the battle of Bothwell-bridge.—My Lord Glencairn and the Dean of Faculty, Mr. H. Erskine, have taken me under their wing; and by all probability I shall soon be the tenth worthy, and the eighth wise, man of the world. Through my lord's influence it is inserted in the records of the Caledonian Hunt that they universally, one and all, subscribe for the second edition.—My subscription bills come out to-morrow, and you shall have some of them next post.—I have met, in Mr. Dalrymple, of Orangefield, what Solomon emphatically calls "A friend that sticketh closer than a brother."—The warmth with which he interests himself in my affairs is of the same enthusiastic kind which you, Mr. Aiken, and the few patrons that took notice of my earlier poetic days shewed for the poor unlucky devil of a poet.

I always remember Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Kennedy in my poetic prayers, but you both in prose and verse.

May could ne'er catch you but a hap,‡
Nor hunger but in plenty's lap!

Amen!

R. B.

No. XXXII.

TO JOHN BALLANTINE, Esq.‡

BANKER, AYR.

Edinburgh, 13th Dec., 1786.

MY HONOURED FRIEND:

I WOULD not write you till I could have it in my power to give you some account of myself and my matters, which by the bye is often no easy task.—I arrived here on Tuesday was table, and it is also true that he hesitated not to fall in love with Mrs. Hamilton's servant-maids: but dreigh-drinking was, in those days, regarded as a mark of a man's affection for his neighbour; and as for an hour's love and daffing with the lasses, it was expected;—a young fellow was set down as a sunph if he hesitated.—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.]

‡ [Without a cloak or great-coat.]

§ [To John Ballantine the Poet not only addressed "The Brigs of Ayr," but resorted to him for good advice when the clouds of misfortune darkened above him, and fortune, in his own words, used him hard and sharp. He was a good and a wise man, and improved much the "Auld town of Ayr" during the period of his provostship. It would appear by this letter that the Poet was in some degree reconciled to Mr. Aiken: it seems not to have been cordial, for he is no longer numbered among his correspondents.—CUNNINGHAM.]

se'night, and have suffered ever since I came to town with a miserable head-ache and stomach complaint, but am now a good deal better.—I have found a worthy, warm friend in Mr. Dalrymple, of Orangefield, who introduced me to Lord Glencairn, a man whose worth and brotherly kindness to me I shall remember when time shall be no more.—By his interest it is passed in the “Caledonian Hunt,” and entered in their books, that they are to take each a copy of the second edition, for which they are to pay one guinea.—I have been introduced to a good many of the noblesse, but my avowed patrons and patronesses are, the Duchess of Gordon—the Countess of Glencairn, with my Lord, and Lady Betty*—the Dean of Faculty—Sir John Whitefoord.—I have likewise warm friends among the literati; Professors Stewart, Blair, and Mr. Mackenzie—the Man of Feeling.—An unknown hand left ten guineas for the Ayr-shire bard with Mr. Sibbald, which I got.—I since have discovered my generous unknown friend to be Patrick Miller, Esq., brother to the Justice Clerk; and drank a glass of claret with him by invitation at his own house yester-night. I am nearly agreed with Creech to print my book, and I suppose I will begin on Monday. I will send a subscription bill or two, next post; when I intend writing my first kind patron, Mr. Aiken. I saw his son to-day, and he is very well.

Dugald Stewart, and some of my learned friends, put me in the periodical paper called the Lounger,† a copy of which I here enclose you.—I was, Sir, when I was first honoured with your notice, too obscure; now I tremble lest I should be ruined by being dragged too suddenly into the glare of polite and learned observation.

I shall certainly, my ever-honoured patron, write you an account of my every step; and better health and more spirits may enable me to make it something better than this stupid matter-of-fact epistle.

I have the honour to be,

Good Sir,

Your ever grateful humble servant,

R. B.

If any of my friends write me, my direction is, care of Mr. Creech, bookseller.

* Lady Betty Cunningham.

† The paper here alluded to was written by Mr. Mackenzie, the celebrated author of “The Man of Feeling.”

‡ [The kindness and generosity of Robert Muir, of Kilmarnock, were not unfelt by the Poet; and we must accept it as a proof of Burns's powers of pleasing that he acquired, so early in life, the regard of so many western worthies. In

No. XXXIII.

TO MR. ROBERT MUIR.‡

Edinburgh, Dec. 20th, 1786.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I HAVE just time for the carrier, to tell you that I received your letter; of which I shall say no more but what a lass of my acquaintance said of her bastard wean; she said she “did na ken wha was the father exactly, but she suspected it was some o' thae bonny black-guard smugglers, for it was like them.” So I only say your obliging epistle was like you. I enclose you a parcel of subscription bills. Your affair of sixty copies is also like you; but it would not be like me to comply.

Your friend's notion of my life has put a crotchet in my head of sketching it in some future epistle to you. My compliments to Charles and Mr. Parker.

R. B.

No. XXXIV.

TO MR. WILLIAM CHALMERS.§

WRITER, AYR.

Edinburgh, Dec. 27th, 1786.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I CONFESS I have sinned the sin for which there is hardly any forgiveness—ingratitude to friendship—in not writing you sooner; but of all men living, I had intended to have sent you an entertaining letter: and by all the plodding, stupid powers, that in nodding, conceited majesty, preside over the dull routine of business—a heavily-solemn oath this!—I am, and have been, ever since I came to Edinburgh, as unfit to write a letter of humour as to write a commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine, who was banished to the Isle of Patmos by the cruel and bloody Domitian, son to Vespasian and brother to Titus, both Emperors of Rome, and who was himself an emperor, and raised the second or third persecution, I forget which, against the Christians, and after throwing the said Apostle John, brother to the Apostle James, commonly called James the Greater, to distinguish him from another James, who was, on some account or other, known by the name of James the Less—after throwing him this letter we have the first intimation of that account of himself which he afterwards wrote and addressed to Dr. Moore, and we also have satisfactory evidence of the substantial patronage of his Ayr-shire friends.]

§ [Burns taxed his muse to propitiate with song a lady of the West, to whom William Chalmers was paying his addresses: the success of the verse is not known. See page 250.]

into a caldron of boiling oil, from which he was miraculously preserved, he banished the poor son of Zebedee to a desert island in the Archipelago, where he was gifted with the second sight, and saw as many wild beasts as I have seen since I came to Edinburgh; which, a circumstance not very uncommon in story-telling, brings me back to where I set out.

To make you some amends for what, before you reach this paragraph, you will have suffered, I enclose you two poems I have carded and spun since I past Glenbuck.

One blank in the address to Edinburgh—"Fair B——," is the heavenly Miss Burnet, daughter of Lord Monboddo, at whose house I have had the honour to be more than once. There has not been anything nearly like her in all the combinations of beauty, grace, and goodness the great Creator has formed, since Milton's Eve on the first day of her existence.

My direction is—care of Andrew Bruce, merchant, Bridge-street.

R. B.

No. XXXV.

TO GAVIN HAMILTON, Esq.

MAUCHLINE.

Edinburgh, January 7th, 1787.

* * * * *
To tell the truth, among friends, I feel a miserable blank in my heart from the want of her [alluding to Jean Armour], and I don't think I shall ever meet with so delicious an armful again. She has her faults; but so have you and I; and so has every body.

Their tricks and craft hae put me daft;
They've ta'en me in and a' that;
But clear your decks, and here's the sex,
I like the jades for a' that.
For a' that, and a' that,
And twice as muckle's a' that!

* * * * *
I have met with a very pretty girl, a Lothian farmer's daughter, whom I have almost persuaded to accompany me to the west country, should I ever return to settle there.—By the bye, a Lothian farmer is about the same as an Ayr-shire squire of the lower kind.—I had a most delicious ride from Leith to her house yesternight, in a hackney coach, with her brother

* [When the Poet exclaimed, in his "Earnest cry and Prayer,"

"O could I like Montgomeries fight,
Or gab like Boswell,"

he included Archibald, eleventh earl of Eglinton, and Colonel Hugh Montgomery of Coilsfield, afterwards twelfth earl, in the compliment. This was re-paid by subscribing ten guand two sisters, and brother's wife. We had dined altogether at a common friend's house, in Leith, and drank, danced, and sang, till late enough. The night was dark, the claret had been good, and I thirsty —

[The remainder is unfortunately wanting.]

No. XXXVI.

TO THE EARL OF EGLINTON.*

Edinburgh, January, 1787.

MY LORD:

As I have but slender pretensions to philosophy, I cannot rise to the exalted ideas of a citizen of the world, but have all those national prejudices which I believe glow peculiarly strong in the breast of a Scotchman. There is scarcely any thing to which I am so feelingly alive as the honour and welfare of my country: and, as a poet, I have no higher enjoyment than singing her sons and daughters. Fate had cast my station in the veriest shades of life; but never did a heart pant more ardently than mine to be distinguished; though, till very lately, I looked in vain on every side for a ray of light. It is easy then to guess how much I was gratified with the countenance and approbation of one of my country's most illustrious sons, when Mr. Wauchope called on me yesterday on the part of your lordship. Your munificence, my lord, certainly deserves my very grateful acknowledgments; but your patronage is a bounty peculiarly suited to my feelings. I am not master enough of the etiquette of life to know whether there be not some impropriety in troubling your lordship with my thanks, but my heart whispered me to do it.—From the emotions of my inmost soul I do it. Selfish ingratitude I hope I am incapable of; and mercenary servility, I trust, I shall ever have so much honest pride as to detest.

R. B.

No. XXXVII.

TO JOHN BALLANTINE, Esq.

Edinburgh, Jan. 14, 1787.

MY HONOURED FRIEND:

It gives me a secret comfort to observe in myself that I am not yet so far gone as Willie Gaw's Skate, "past redemption;"† for I have neat for two copies of the Poet's works, and a promise of patronage. Boswell seems not, though a native of the banks of Lugar, to have relished his portion of the compliment;—he did not subscribe, neither has he once alluded to Burns or his genius throughout all his writings.]

† [This is one of a great number of old saws that Burns, when a lad, had picked up from his mother, who had a vast collection of such fragments of traditionary wisdom.]

still this favourable symptom of grace, that when my conscience, as in the case of this letter, tells me I am leaving something undone that I ought to do, it teases me eternally till I do it.

I am still "dark as was chaos" in respect to futurity. My generous friend, Mr. Patrick Miller, has been talking with me about a lease of some farm or other in an estate called Dalswinton, which he has lately bought near Dumfries. Some life-rented embittering recollections whisper me that I will be happier any where than in my old neighbourhood, but Mr. Miller is no judge of land; and though I dare say he means to favour me, yet he may give me, in his opinion, an advantageous bargain that may ruin me. I am to take a tour by Dumfries as I return, and have promised to meet Mr. Miller on his lands some time in May.

I went to a mason-lodge yesternight, where the most Worshipful Grand Master Chartres, and all the Grand Lodge of Scotland visited.—The meeting was numerous and elegant; all the different lodges about town were present, in all their pomp. The Grand Master, who presided with great solemnity and honour to himself, as a gentleman and mason, among other general toasts, gave "Caledonia, and Caledonia's Bard, Brother Burns,"—which rung through the whole assembly with multiplied honours and repeated acclamations. As I had no idea such a thing would happen, I was downright thunderstruck, and, trembling in every nerve, made the best return in my power. Just as I had finished, some of the grand officers said, so loud that I could hear, with a most comforting accent, "Very well indeed!" which set me something to rights again.

I have to-day corrected my 152d page. My best good wishes to Mr. Aiken.

I am ever,

Dear Sir,

Your much indebted humble Servant,

R. B.

No. XXXVIII.

TO THE SAME.

January —, 1787.

WHILE here I sit, sad and solitary, by the side of a fire in a little country inn, and drying my wet clothes, in pops a poor fellow of a sodger, and tells me he is going to Ayr. By heavens! say I to myself, with a tide of good spirits which the magic of that sound, Auld Toun o' Ayr, conjured up, I will send my last song to Mr. Ballantine. Here it is—

Ye flowery banks o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fair!
How can ye chant, ye little birds,
And I sae fu' o' care! * &c.

No. XXXIX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Edinburgh, 15th January, 1787.

MADAM:

YOURS of the 9th current, which I am this moment honoured with, is a deep reproach to me for ungrateful neglect. I will tell you the real truth, for I am miserably awkward at a fib—I wished to have written to Dr. Moore before I wrote to you; but, though every day since I received yours of December 30th, the idea, the wish to write to him has constantly pressed on my thoughts, yet I could not for my soul set about it. I know his fame and character, and I am one of "the sons of little men." To write him a mere matter-of-fact affair, like a merchant's order, would be disgracing the little character I have; and to write the author of "The View of Society and Manners" a letter of sentiment—I declare every artery runs cold at the thought. I shall try, however, to write to him to-morrow or next day. His kind interposition in my behalf I have already experienced, as a gentleman waited on me the other day, on the part of Lord Eglinton, with ten guineas, by way of subscription for two copies of my next edition.

The word you object to in the mention I have made of my glorious countryman and your immortal ancestor, is indeed borrowed from Thomson; but it does not strike me as an improper epithet. I distrusted my own judgment on your finding fault with it, and applied for the opinion of some of the literati here, who honour me with their critical strictures, and they all allow it to be proper. The song you ask I cannot recollect, and I have not a copy of it. I have not composed any thing on the great Wallace, except what you have seen in print; and the enclosed, which I will print in this edition.† You will see I have mentioned some others of the name. When I composed my "Vision" long ago, I had attempted a description of Kyle, of which the additional stanzas are a part, as it originally stood. My heart glows with a wish to be able to do justice to the merits of the "Saviour of his Country," which sooner or later I shall at least attempt.

You are afraid I shall grow intoxicated with my prosperity as a poet; alas! Madam, I know myself and the world too well. I do not mean any airs of affected modesty; I am willing to believe that my abilities deserve some notice; but in a most enlightened, informed age and nation, when poetry is and has been the study of men of the first natural genius, aided with all the powers of polite learning, polite books, and polite company—to be dragged forth to the full glare of learned and polite observation, with all my imperfections of awkward rusticity and crude, unpolished ideas on my head—I assure you, Madam, I do not dissemble when I tell you I tremble for the consequences. The novelty of a poet in my obscure situation, without any of those advantages which are reckoned necessary for that character, at least at this time of day, has raised a partial tide of public notice which has borne me to a height, where I am absolutely, feelingly certain my abilities are inadequate to support me; and too surely do I see that time when the same tide will leave me, and recede, perhaps, as far below the mark of truth. I do not say this in the ridiculous affectation of self-abasement and modesty. I have studied myself, and know what ground I occupy; and, however a friend or the world may differ from me in that particular, I stand for my own opinion, in silent resolve, with all the tenaciousness of property. I mention this to you once for all to dis-burthen my mind, and I do not wish to hear or say more about it.—But, you will bear me witness that, when my bubble of fame was at the highest, I stood unintoxicated, with the inebriating cup in my hand, looking forward with rueful resolve to the hastening time when the blow of Calumny should dash it to the ground, with all the eagerness of vengeful triumph.

* [See "The Banks of Doon," page 409.]

† [See Stanzas in the "Vision," page 206, beginning "By stately tower or palace fair," to the end of the first Duain.]

“When proud fortune’s ebbing tide recedes,”

* * * *

Your patronizing me and interesting yourself in my fame and character as a poet, I rejoice in; it exalts me in my own idea: and whether you can or cannot aid me in my subscription is a trifle. Has a paltry subscription-bill any charms to the heart of a bard, compared with the patronage of the descendant of the immortal Wallace?

R. B.

No. XL.

TO DR. MOORE.*

Edinburgh, Jan., 1787.

SIR:

MRS. DUNLOP has been so kind as to send me extracts of letters she has had from you, where you do the rustic bard the honour of

* [John Moore, M.D., one of the first men of established literary reputation, who befriended the Ayr-shire Poet, was the son of the Rev. Charles Moore, of Stirling. The latter, although born in Ireland, was a cadet of the Scotch house of Mure of Rowallan, in Ayr-shire; his ancestor, Captain Alexander Mure, the son of Sir William Mure of Rowallan, having been slain in an action about the year 1648, with the rebels in Ireland, where his family continued to reside. The son of this gentleman was a military officer, who also served in Ireland under William III.; and it was owing to the family connexion with Scotland, as much as to his talents, and exemplary character, that the son of the last Captain Moore was, although an alien to the country, advanced in early life to the parochial charge at Stirling, where his son, Dr. John Moore, the subject of the present notice, was born in 1730. The family of Mure of Rowallan is said to have been originally of the tribe of O'More, in Ireland. Robert II., King of Scotland, married Elizabeth Mure, daughter of Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan, and from this marriage the Royal family of Stuart is descended.]

While Dr. Moore was yet a child, his father died, and his mother removed with him to Glasgow, where she possessed some property, inherited from her father, Anderson of Dowhill, whose family, once in great affluence in that city, had suffered much, according to Wodrow, from fines imposed in the reign of James II., for their adherence to Presbyterianism; and the participation of the last laird of Dowhill in the Darien expedition reduced the family to comparative poverty. On a temperament such as that of the author of Zeluco, the position in which his earlier years were passed exercised no inconsiderable influence in promoting those habits of industry and exertion for which, in after life, he was eminently distinguished. At Glasgow, Dr. Moore received both his elementary and academical education. So precocious were his talents that, in 1747, when only 17 years of age, he was honoured with the especial patronage of Colonel Campbell, afterwards fifth Duke of Argyle, by whom he was introduced to the hospitals connected with the British Army in Flanders, and brought under the notice of various distinguished officers, as a young man likely to be an ornament to the medical profession. At the conclusion of the war, he was for some time an attaché to the British Embassy of Lord Albemarle, in Paris. He afterwards settled in practice in Glasgow, as the partner of Mr. Hamilton, the University Professor of Anatomy. While, however, the professional accomplishments of Dr. Moore were never made the subject of doubt, a certain dislike to the drudgery of medical practice prevented him from enjoying that amount of public patronage to which, by his talents, he was entitled. It was, therefore, with no unwilling mind that, early in 1769, though for some years married and the father of several children, he agreed to take the charge of the young Duke of Hamilton, step-son of his first patron, a youth of fourteen, possessed of the most excellent dispositions, but whose health was such as to require the constant attendance of a physician. With this young nobleman, Dr. Moore made one short excursion to the Continent. But the connexion was abruptly dissolved, in July, by the death of the Duke, upon whose tomb his affectionate attendant inscribed a poetical epitaph, testifying to the promise which was thus early blighted.

In the following year, Dr. Moore was selected to attend the brother and heir of the deceased Duke—the noted Douglas, Duke of Hamilton, then a sickly boy, and as yet innocent of the vices that ultimately clouded a career which talent and generosity had combined with almost princely rank and fortune, to render illustrious. Dr. Moore and this young nobleman spent five years in continental travel, finally returning in 1778, when the Duke had attained his majority. In that year Dr. Moore removed his family to London, with the design of prosecuting his profession in a higher sphere than could be commanded in Glasgow. As yet, he had given no decided proof of his literary talents; but this he did in the following year, by the publication of his “View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany,” a work of so much vivacity and intelligence that it instantly attained a great popularity, and was translated into French, German, and Italian. In 1785, he produced his “Medical Sketches,” a work which treats on several important topics, relative to health and disease, not without an intermixture of pleasant stories and humorous sarcasm. It was at the close of the ensuing year that his attention was drawn to the poetry of Burns. Some expressions of admiration, which he had employed regarding it, in a letter to Mrs. Dunlop, and which that lady transmitted to Burns, led to a correspondence between the learned Physician and the comparatively unlettered Bard, in which the one party appears kind, without the least affectation of superiority, and the other respectful with as little display of servility. To Dr. Moore, the Poet, in the ensuing August, addressed a sketch of his own life, which was published in the front of Dr. Currie’s memoir, noticing him and his works. Those who have felt the anxieties and solitudes of authorship can only know what pleasure it gives to be noticed, in such a manner, by judges of the first character. Your criticisms, Sir, I receive with reverence: only I am sorry they mostly came too late: a peccant passage or two, that I would certainly have altered, were gone to the press.

The hope to be admired for ages is, in by far the greater part of those even who are authors of repute, an unsubstantial dream. For my part, my first ambition was, and still my strongest wish is, to please my compeers, the rustic inmates of the hamlet, while ever-changing language and manners shall allow me to be relished and understood. I am very willing to admit that I have some poetical abilities: and as few, if any, writers, either moral or poetical, are intimately acquainted with the classes of mankind among whom I have chiefly mingled, I may have seen men and manners in a different phasis from what is common, which may assist originality of thought. Still I know very well the novelty of my character has by far the greatest share in the learned and polite notice I have lately had: and in a language where Pope and Churchill have raised the laugh, and Shenstone and Gray drawn the tear; where Thomson and Beattie have painted the landscape, and Lyttleton and Collins described the heart; I am not vain enough to hope for distinguished poetic fame.

R. B.

No. XLI.

TO THE REV. G. LAWRIE,*

NEWMILLS, NEAR KILMARNOCK.

Edinburgh, Feb. 5th, 1787.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:

WHEN I look at the date of your kind letter, my heart reproaches me severely with ingrati-and has effectually associated the names of these very opposite men in our literary history.

Dr. Moore, when on the verge of sixty (1789), appeared for the first time as a writer of fiction. His novel of "Zeluco" assumed, and has ever since maintained, a high rank amongst works of that class, on account of the powerful moral painting which forms the most conspicuous feature of its composition. The interest which he felt in the affairs of France induced him to proceed, late in the summer of 1792, to Paris. He there witnessed the insurrection of the 10th of August, the dethronement of the King, the terrific massacres of September, and the tremendous party struggles which marked the remainder of that year. He was consequently enabled to gratify the curiosity of the British public by a work entitled "A Journal during a Residence in France," &c., which is allowed by Dr. Aiken to be written with impartiality and discernment. After several years spent in ease and retirement, at Richmond, he died at his house in Clifford-street, London, February 29, 1802. He left five sons, the eldest of whom was the gallant and lamented General Sir John Moore.—LAND OF BURNS.

To the accomplished Dr. Moore the Poet seems to have unbosomed himself more than to most of his patronizing friends. Nor is this to be wondered at—Moore was not only a fine scholar and a man of genius, but he was one of the kindest and most accessible of mankind. Burns seems to have possessed a natural tact for discovering how far he might go in laying his bosom bare to his companions and correspondents, and he certainly hit, as if by inspiration, the character of Dr. Moore, who, with the secrecy of a physician, and the prudence of a friend, received the communications of the rustic bard, read to the London literati such portions of the Poet's letters as he knew would be most relished; quoted the finest passages of his poems, and spread his fame with a diligence which could only arise from a hearty appreciation of his great merit. Dr. Moore's letter, to which the above was a reply, is as follows:—

Clifford-street, London, Jan. 23rd, 1787.

"SIR,—I have just received your letter, by which I find I have reason to complain of my friend Mrs. Dunlop, for transmitting to you extracts from my letters to her, by much too freely and too carelessly written for your perusal. I must forgive her, however, in consideration of her good intention, as you will forgive me, I hope, for the freedom I use with certain expressions, in consideration of my admiration of the poems in general. If I may judge of the author's disposition from his works, with all the other good qualities of a poet, he has not the irritable temper ascribed to that race of men by one of their own number, whom you have the happiness to resemble in ease and curious felicity of expression. Indeed, the poetical beauties, however original and brilliant, and lavishly scattered, are not all I admire in your works;—the love of your native country, that feeling sensibility to all the objects of humanity, and the independent spirit which breathes through the whole, give me a most favourable impression of the Poet, and have made me often regret that I did not see the poems, the certain effect of which would have been my seeing the author, last summer, when I was longer in Scotland than I have been for many years.

"I rejoice very sincerely at the encouragement you receive at Edinburgh, and I think you peculiarly fortunate in the patronage of Dr. Blair, who I am informed interests himself very much for you. I beg to be remembered to him; nobody can have a warmer regard for that gentleman than I have, which, independent of the worth of his character, would be kept alive by the memory of our common friend, the late Mr. George B—e.

"Before I received your letter, I sent enclosed in a letter to ———, a sonnet by Miss Williams, a young poetical lady, which she wrote on reading your "Mountain-daisy;" perhaps it may not displease you:—

"While soon 'd the garden's flaunting flowers' decay,
And scatter'd on the earth neglected lie,
The 'Mountain-daisy,' cherish'd by the ray
A poet drew from heaven, shall never die.
Ah, like that lonely flower the poet rose!
'Mid penury's bare soil and bitter gale;
He felt each storm that on the mountain blows,
Nor ever knew the shelter of the vale.
By genius in her native vigour nurs'd,
On nature with impassion'd look he gaz'd;
Then through the cloud of adverse fortune burst
Indignant, and in light unborrow'd blaz'd.
Scotia! from rude affliction shield thy bard;
His heaven-taught numbers Fame herself will guard."

"I have been trying to add to the number of your subscribers, but find many of my acquaintance are already among them. I have only to add that, with every sentiment of esteem, and the most cordial good wishes,

"I am

"Your obedient humble servant,

J. MOORE."

* [The Rev. Dr. Lawrie was one of the Poet's earliest friends: the door of his manse was always open to him, a seat at his table was ever at his command, and he seems to have been fully sensible of the kindness with which he was treated. The letter, to which this of Burns was in answer, is dated 22d December, 1786, and evinces Dr. Lawrie's anxiety for his honest fame:—

DEAR SIR,—I last week received a letter from Dr. Blacklock, in which he expresses a desire of seeing you. I write this to you, that you may lose no time in waiting upon him, should you not yet have seen him. "I rejoice to hear, from all corners, of your rising fame, and I wish and expect it may tower still higher by the new publication. But, as a tude in neglecting so long to answer it. I will not trouble you with any account, by way of apology, of my hurried life and distracted attention: do me the justice to believe that my delay by no means proceeded from want of respect. I feel, and ever shall feel for you, the mingled sentiments of esteem for a friend, and reverence for a father.

I thank you, Sir, with all my soul for your friendly hints, though I do not need them so much as my friends are apt to imagine. You are dazzled with newspaper accounts and distant reports; but, in reality, I have no great temptation to be intoxicated with the cup of prosperity. Novelty may attract the attention of mankind awhile; to it I owe my present eclat; but I see the time not far distant when the popular tide, which has borne me to a height of which I am, perhaps, unworthy, shall recede with silent celerity, and leave me a barren waste of sand, to descend at my leisure to my former station. I do not say this in the affection of modesty; I see the consequence is unavoidable, and am prepared for it. I had been at a good deal of pains to form a just, impartial estimate of my intellectual powers before I came here; I have not added, since I came to Edinburgh, anything to the account; and I trust I shall take every atom of it back to my shades, the coverts of my unnoticed, early years.

In Dr. Blacklock, whom I see very often, I have found what I would have expected in our friend, a clear head and an excellent heart.

By far the most agreeable hours I spend in Edinburgh must be placed to the account of Miss Lawrie and her piano-forte. I cannot help repeating to you and Mrs. Lawrie a compliment that Mr. Mackenzie, the celebrated "Man of Feeling," paid to Miss Lawrie, the other night, at the concert. I had come in at the interlude, and sat down by him till I saw Miss Lawrie in a seat not very distant, and went up to pay my respects to her. On my return to Mr. Mackenzie, he asked me who she was; I told him 'twas the daughter of a reverend friend of mine in the west country. He returned, there was something very striking, to his idea, in her appearance. On my desiring to know what it was, he was pleased to say, "She has a great deal of the elegance of a well-bred lady about her, with all the sweet simplicity of a country girl."

My compliments to all the happy inmates of St. Margaret's.

R. B.

No. XLII.

TO DR. MOORE

Edinburgh, 15th February, 1787.

SIR:

PARDON my seeming neglect in delaying so long to acknowledge the honour you have done me, in your kind notice of me, January 23d. Not many months ago I knew no other employment than following the plough, nor could boast any thing higher than a distant acquaintance with a country clergyman. Mere greatness never embarrasses me; I have nothing to ask from the great, and I do not fear their judgment: but genius, polished by learning, and at its proper point of elevation in the eye of the world, this of late I frequently meet with, and tremble at its approach. I scorn the affectation of seeming modesty to cover self-conceit. That I have some merit I do not deny; but I see, with frequent wringings of heart, that the novelty of my character, and the honest national prejudice of my countrymen, have borne me to a height altogether untenable to my abilities.

For the honour Miss Williams has done me, please, Sir, return her in my name my most grateful thanks. I have more than once thought of paying her in kind, but have hitherto quitted the idea in hopeless despondency. I had never before heard of her; but the other day I got her poems, which for several reasons, some belonging to the head, and others the offspring of the heart, give me a great deal of pleasure. I have little pretensions to critic lore; there are, I think, two characteristic features in her poetry—the unfettered wild flight of native genius, and the querulous, sombre tenderness of "time-settled sorrow."

I only know what pleases me, often without being able to tell why.*

R. B.

friend, I warn you to prepare to meet with your share of dejection and envy—a train that always accompanies great men. For your comfort I am in great hopes that the number of your friends and admirers will increase, and that you have some chance of ministerial, or even royal, patronage. Now, my friend, such rapid success is very uncommon, and do you think yourself in no danger of suffering by applause and a full purse? Remember Solomon's advice, which he spoke from experience, 'stronger is he that conquers,' &c. Keep fast hold of your rural simplicity and purity, like Telemachus, by Mentor's aid in Calypso's isle, or even in that of Cyprus. I hope you have also Minerva with you. I need not tell you how much a modest diffidence and invincible temperance adorn the most shining talents, and elevate the mind, and exalt and refine the imagination even of a poet;

"I hope you will not imagine I speak from suspicion or evil report. I assure you I speak from love and good report, and good opinion, and a strong desire to see you shine as much in the sunshine as you have done in the shade; and in the practice as you do in the theory of virtue. This is my prayer in return for your elegant composition in verse. All here join in compliments and good wishes for your further prosperity."

* [The answer of Moore is characteristic of the man: the glimpse which it gives of the household in which the heroic Sir John Moore was born and bred will be acceptable to the world.

"Clifford-street, 28th February, 1787.

"DEAR SIR:—Your letter of the 15th gave me a great deal of pleasure. It is not surprising that you improve in

No. XLIII.

TO JOHN BALLANTINE, Esq.

Edinburgh, Feb. 24, 1787.

MY HONOURED FRIEND:—

I WILL soon be with you now, in guid black prent;—in a week or ten days at farthest. I am obliged, against my own wish, to print subscribers' names; so if any of my Ayr friends have subscription bills, they must be sent in to Creech directly. I am getting my phiz done by an eminent engraver, and, if it can be ready in time, I will appear in my book, looking, like all other fools, to my title page.*

R. B.

No. XLIV.

TO THE EARL OF GLENCAIRN.

Edinburgh, February, 1787.

MY LORD:

I WANTED to purchase a profile of your lordship, which I was told was to be got in town; but I am truly sorry to see that a blundering painter has spoiled a "human face divine." The enclosed stanzas I intended to have written below a picture or profile of your lordship, could I have been so happy as to procure one with any thing of a likeness.

As I will soon return to my shades, I wanted to have something like a material object for my gratitude; I wanted to have it in my power to say to a friend, there is my noble patron, my generous benefactor. Allow me, my lord, to publish these verses. I conjure your lordship, by the honest throe of gratitude, by the generous wish of benevolence, by all the powers and feelings which compose the magnanimous mind, correctness and taste, considering where you have been for some time past. And I dare swear there is no danger of your admitting any polish which might weaken the vigour of your native powers.

"I am glad to perceive that you disdain the nauseous affectation of decrying your own merit as a poet, an affectation which is displayed with most ostentation by those who have the greatest share of self-conceit, and which only adds un-deceiving falsehood to disgusting vanity. For you to deny the merit of your poems would be arraigning the fixed opinion of the public.

"As the new edition of my 'View of Society' is not yet ready, I have sent you the former edition, which I beg you will accept as a small mark of my esteem. It is sent by sea to the care of Mr. Creech, and along with these four volumes for yourself, I have also sent my 'Medical Sketches,' in one volume, for my friend Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop: this you will be so obliging as to transmit, or, if you chance to pass soon by Dunlop, to give to her.

"I am happy to hear that your subscription is so ample, and shall rejoice at every piece of good fortune that befalls you. For you are a very great favourite in my family; and this is a higher compliment than perhaps you are aware of. It includes almost all the professions, and of course is a proof that your writings are adapted to various tastes and situations. My youngest son, who is at Winchester school, writes to me that he is translating some stanzas of your 'Hallowe'en' into Latin verse, for the benefit of his comrades.

do not deny me this petition. I owe much to your lordship: and, what has not in some other instances always been the case with me, the weight of the obligation is a pleasing load. I trust I have a heart as independent as your lordship's, than which I can say nothing more; and I would not be beholden to favours that would crucify my feelings. Your dignified character in life, and manner of supporting that character, are flattering to my pride; and I would be jealous of the purity of my grateful attachment, where I was under the patronage of one of the much favoured sons of fortune.

Almost every poet has celebrated his patrons, particularly when they were names dear to fame, and illustrious in their country; allow me, then, my lord, if you think the verses have intrinsic merit, to tell the world how much I have the honour to be,

Your lordship's highly indebted,
And ever grateful humble servant,

R. B.†

No. XLV.

TO THE EARL OF BUCHAN.

[Edinburgh, February, 1787.]

MY LORD:

THE honour your lordship has done me, by your notice and advice in yours of the 1st instant, I shall ever gratefully remember:—

"Praise from thy lips 'tis mine with joy to boast,
They best can give it who deserve it most."

Your lordship touches the darling chord of my heart, when you advise me to fire my muse at Scottish story and Scottish scenes. I wish for nothing more than to make a leisurely pilgrimage through my native country; to sit and muse on those once hard contested fields, where

"This union of taste partly proceeds, no doubt, from the cement of Scottish partiality with which they are all somewhat tinctured. Even your translator, who left Scotland too early in life for recollection, is not without it.

* * * * *

I remain, with great sincerity,
Your obedient servant,

J. MOORE.††

* [The original picture, from which Beugo engraved the portrait to which the Poet alludes, was painted by the now venerable Nasmyth—the eldest of living British artists. It is of the cabinet size, and, though deficient in that look of inspiration which belonged peculiarly to Burns, is regarded by all the North as a good likeness. The engraving by Beugo has a more melancholy air, and is of a swarther hue: this change was made by the engraver, who caused the Poet to sit to him, and finished the copper from his face, in preference to working from the picture. This painting passed into the hands of Mrs. Burns, after the death of Alexander Cunningham: it is now in the possession of the Poet's son, Captain William Burns, in India.]

† [The Earl of Glencairn seems to have refused, from motives of delicacy, the request of the Poet; and the Poet, perhaps stung by the refusal, destroyed his own copy of the verses, for they have been sought for in vain.]

Caledonia, rejoicing, saw her bloody lion borne through broken ranks to victory and fame; and, catching the inspiration, to pour the deathless names in song. But, my lord, in the midst of these enthusiastic reveries, a long-visaged, dry, moral-looking phantom strides across my imagination, and pronounces these emphatic words:—

“I, Wisdom, dwell with Prudence. Friend, I do not come to open the ill-closed wounds of your follies and misfortunes, merely to give you pain: I wish through these wounds to imprint a lasting lesson on your heart. I will not mention how many of my salutary advices you have despised: I have given you line upon line and precept upon precept; and while I was chalking out to you the straight way to wealth and character, with audacious effrontery you have zigzagged across the path, contemning me to my face: you know the consequences. It is not yet three months since home was so hot for you that you were on the wing for the western shore of the Atlantic, not to make a fortune, but to hide your misfortune.

“Now that your dear-loved Scotia puts it in your power to return to the situation of your forefathers, will you follow these will-o'-wisp meteors of fancy and whim, till they bring you once more to the brink of ruin? I grant that the utmost ground you can occupy is but half a step from the veriest poverty; but still it is half a step from it. If all that I can urge be ineffectual, let her who seldom calls to you in vain, let the call of pride prevail with you.— You know how you feel at the iron gripe of ruthless oppression: you know how you bear the galling sneer of contumelious greatness. I hold you out the conveniences, the comforts of life, independence, and character, on the one hand; I tender you civility, dependence, and wretchedness, on the other. I will not insult your understanding by bidding you make a choice.”*

This, my lord, is unanswerable. I must return to my humble station, and woo my rustic muse in my wonted way at the plough-tail.— Still, my lord, while the drops of life warm my heart, gratitude to that dear loved country in which I boast my birth, and gratitude to those her distinguished sons who have honoured me so much with their patronage and approbation, shall, while stealing through my humble shades, ever distend my bosom, and at times, as now, draw forth the swelling tear.†

R. B.

* [Copied from the Bee, vol. ii., p. 319, and compared with the author's MSS.—CURRIE.]

† [The Earl of Buchan was one of the most economical of patrons; lest the object of his kindness might chance to feel too heavily the debt of obligation, he did not hesitate to al-

No. XLVI.

TO GAVIN HAMILTON, ESQ.

Edinburgh, March 8th, 1787.

DEAR SIR:

YOUR'S came safe, and I am as usual much indebted to your goodness.— Poor Captain M.[ontgomery] is cast. Yesterday it was tried whether the husband could proceed against the unfortunate lover without first divorcing his wife, and their Gravities on the Bench were unanimously of opinion that Maxwell may prosecute for damages directly, and need not divorce his wife at all if he pleases; and Maxwell is immediately, before the Lord Ordinary, to prove, what I dare say will not be denied, the Crim. Con.—then their Lordships will modify the damages, which I suppose will be pretty heavy, as their Wisdoms have expressed great abhorrence of my gallant Right Worshipful Brother's conduct.

O, all ye powers of love unfortunate, and friendless woe, pour the balm of sympathizing pity on the grief-torn, tender heart of the hapless Fair One!

My two songs on Miss W. Alexander and Miss P. Kennedy were likewise tried yesterday by a jury of literati, and found defamatory libels against the fastidious powers of Poesy and Taste; and the author forbidden to print them under pain of forfeiture of character. I cannot help almost shedding a tear to the memory of two songs that had cost me some pains, and that I valued a good deal, but I must submit.

My most respectful compliments to Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Kennedy.—

My poor unfortunate Songs come again across my memory. D—n the pedant, frigid soul of Criticism for ever and ever!

I am ever,

Dear Sir,

Your obliged

ROBERT BURNS.

[The above interesting letter was communicated to the Editor of the present edition, by John Hamilton, Esq., the “wee curlie John —” of Burns's Poetical Dedication to his friend and patron Gavin Hamilton, Esq. It will be perused with interest by all admirers of the great Scottish Bard. The Songs so feelingly alluded to were “The Bonny Lass o' Ballochmyle,” and “The Banks o' Bonny Doon”—two of the finest lyrics in the language. They were not long in making their appearance. See pp. 357 and 409.—J. C.]

low a painter to present him with a picture, or a poet with a poem. He advised Burns to make a pilgrimage to the scenes of Scotland's battles, in the hope, perhaps, that Anaramoor would be immortalized in song, and the name of the “Commendator of Dryburgh” included in the strain.]

No. XLVII.

TO MR. JAMES CANDLISH.*

Edinburgh, March 21, 1787.

MY EVER DEAR OLD ACQUAINTANCE:

I WAS equally surprised and pleased at your letter, though I dare say you will think by my delaying so long to write to you that I am so drowned in the intoxication of good fortune as to be indifferent to old, and once dear, connections. The truth is, I was determined to write a good letter, full of argument, amplification, erudition, and, as Bayes says, all that. I thought of it, and thought of it, and, by my soul, I could not; and, lest you should mistake the cause of my silence, I just sit down to tell you so. Don't give yourself credit, though, that the strength of your logic scares me: the truth is I never mean to meet you on that ground at all. You have shown me one thing which was to be demonstrated: that strong pride of reasoning, with a little affectation of singularity, may mislead the best of hearts. I likewise, since you and I were first acquainted, in the pride of despising old women's stories, ventured in "the daring path Spinosa tūd," but experience of the weakness, not the strength of human powers, made me glad to grasp at revealed religion.

I am still, in the Apostle Paul's phrase, "The old man with his deeds," as when we were sporting about the "Lady Thorn." I shall be four weeks here yet at least; and so I shall expect to hear from you; welcome sense, welcome nonsense.

I am, with the warmest sincerity,
R. B.

No. XLVIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM DUNBAR.

Lawn-Market, Monday Morning, [March, 1787.]

DEAR SIR:

IN justice to Spenser, I must acknowledge that there is scarcely a poet in the language could have been a more agreeable present to me; and in justice to you, allow me to say, Sir, that I have not met with a man in Edinburgh to whom I would so willingly have been indebted for the gift. The tattered rhymes I herewith present you, and the handsome volumes of Spenser for which I am so much indebted to your goodness, may perhaps be not in proportion to one another; but be that as it may, my gift, though far less valuable, is as sincere a mark of esteem as yours.

The time is approaching when I shall return to my shades; and I am afraid my numerous Edinburgh friendships are of so tender a construction that they will not bear carriage with me. Yours is one of the few that I could wish of a more robust constitution. It is indeed very probable that when I leave this city, we part never more to meet in this sublunary sphere; but I have a strong fancy that in some future eccentric planet, the comet of happier systems than any with which astronomy is yet acquainted, you and I, among the harum scarum sons of imagination and whim, with a hearty shake of a hand, a metaphor and a laugh, shall recognise old acquaintance:

Where wit may sparkle all its rays,
Uncurst with caution's fears;
That pleasure, basking in the blaze,
Rejoice for endless years.

I have the honour to be, with the warmest sincerity, dear Sir, &c. R. B.

[This gentleman was the subject of the Poet's song entitled "Rattling, Roaring, Willie." He was a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh. The letter was first published in Hogg and Motherwell's edition of the Poet's Works, and was communicated by Mr. P. Buchan, of Aberdeen.]

No. XLIX.

TO _____.

ON FERGUSSON'S HEAD-STONE.

Edinburgh, March, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

YOU may think, and too justly, that I am a selfish, ungrateful fellow, having received so many repeated instances of kindness from you, and yet never putting pen to paper to say thank you; but if you knew what a devil of a life my conscience has led me on that account, your good heart would think yourself too much avenged. By the bye, there is nothing in the whole frame of man which seems to be so unaccountable as that thing called conscience. Had the troublesome yelping cur powers efficient to prevent a mischief, he might be of use; but at the beginning of the business, his feeble efforts are to the workings of passion as the infant frosts of an autumnal morning to the unclouded fervour of the rising sun: and no sooner are the tumultuous doings of the wicked deed over, than, amidst the bitter native consequences of folly, in the very vortex of our

* [The person to whom this letter is addressed—at that time a student of physic in the University of Glasgow, was a good scholar, something of a poet, and much of a controversialist. He was, it is believed, a native of the province of Galloway—was well acquainted with the poetry of John horrors, up starts conscience, and harrows us with the feelings of the damned.

Lowe, author of "Mary's Dream," and furnished a copy of the Galwegian bard's song of "Pompey's Ghost," at the request of Burns, for the Musical Museum. He was one of the very earliest of the Poet's companions, and one of the cleverest; nor was he unsuccessful in the world.]

I have enclosed you, by way of expiation, some verse and prose, that, if they merit a place in your truly entertaining miscellany, you are welcome to. The prose extract is literally as Mr. Sprott sent it me.

The inscription on the stone is as follows:—

“HERE LIES ROBERT FERGUSSON, POET,

“Born, September 5th, 1751—Died, October 16th, 1774.

“No sculptur’d marble here, nor pompous lay,

“No storied urn nor animated bust;”

This simple stone directs pale Scotia’s way

To pour her sorrows o’er her poet’s dust.”

On the other side of the stone is as follows:—

“By special grant of the managers to Robert Burns, who erected this stone, this burial-place is to remain for ever sacred to the memory of Robert Fergusson.”

Session-house within the Kirk of Canongate, the twenty-second day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven years.

Sederunt of the Managers of the Kirk and Kirk Yard funds of Canongate.

Which day, the treasurer to the said funds produced a letter from Mr. Robert Burns, of date the 6th current, which was read and appointed to be engrossed in their sederunt book, and of which letter the tenor follows:—

* [From the sinking of the ground of the neighbouring graves, the head-stone placed by Burns over Fergusson was thrown from its balance; this was observed soon after the death of the Bard of Ayr, by the Esculapian Club of Edinburgh, who, animated by that pious zeal for departed merit which had before led them to prevent some other sepulchral monuments from going to ruin, re-fixed the original stone, and added some iron work, with an additional inscription to the memory of Burns. The poetical part of it is taken, almost verbatim, from the Elegy on Captain Matthew Henderson:—

Dignum laude verum Musa vetat mori.

Lo! Genius, proudly, and to Fame she turns,

Twines CURRIE’S laurels with the wreath of BURNS.

ROSCOE.

To the Memory of

ROBERT BURNS, THE AYR-SHIRE BARD;

WHO WAS BORN AT DOONSIDE,

On the 25th of January, 1759;

AND DIED AT DUMFRIES,

On the 22nd of July, 1796.

O ROBERT BURNS! the Man, the Brother!

And art thou gone—and gone for ever!

And hast thou cross’d that unknown river,

Life’s dreary bound!

Like thee, where shall we find another,

The world around!

Go to your sculptur’d tombs, ye Great,

In a’ the tinsel trash o’ state!

But by thy honest turf I’ll wait,

Thou man of worth!

And weep the sweetest Poet’s fate,

E’er liv’d on earth.

To have raised one solid monument of masonry to both, working Fergusson’s head-stone into one side of the structure, and placing the Burns inscription on the other, would

“To the honourable baillies of Canongate, Edinburgh.—Gentlemen, I am sorry to be told that the remains of Robert Fergusson, the so justly celebrated poet, a man whose talents for ages to come will do honour to our Caledonian name, lie in your church-yard among the ignoble dead, unnoticed and unknown.

“Some memorial to direct the steps of the lovers of Scottish song, when they wish to shed a tear over the ‘narrow house’ of the bard who is no more, is surely a tribute due to Fergusson’s memory: a tribute I wish to have the honour of paying.

“I petition you then, gentlemen, to permit me to lay a simple stone over his revered ashes, to remain an unalienable property to his deathless fame. I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your very humble servant (sic subscriptur),

ROBERT BURNS.

Thereafter the said managers, in consideration of the laudable and disinterested motion of Mr. Burns, and the propriety of his request, did, and hereby do, unanimously grant power and liberty to the said Robert Burns to erect a headstone at the grave of the said Robert Fergusson, and to keep up and preserve the same to his memory in all time coming.* Extracted forth of the records of the managers, by perhaps have been more judicious.—See Letter to Mr. Peter Hill, dated Feb. 5th, 1792, relative to this monument.

WILLIAM SPROTT, Clerk.

On the subject of Fergusson’s head-stone, we find the following letter in Dr. Currie’s edition of the Poet’s works:—

March 8th, 1787.

I AM truly happy to know you have found a friend in * * * *; his patronage of you does him great honour. He is truly a good man; by far the best I ever knew, or, perhaps, ever shall know, in this world. But I must not speak all I think of him, lest I should be thought partial.

So you have obtained liberty from the magistrates to erect a stone over Fergusson’s grave? I do not doubt it; such things have been, as Shakespeare says, “in the olden time;”

“The poet’s fate is here in emblem shown,
He ask’d for bread, and he receiv’d a stone.”

It is, I believe, upon poor Butler’s tomb that this is written. But how many brothers of Parnassus, as well as poor Butler and poor Fergusson, have ask’d for bread, and been served with the same sauce!

The magistrates gave you liberty, did they? Oh, generous magistrates! * * * * celebrated over the three kingdoms for his public spirit, gives a poor poet liberty to raise a tomb to a poor poet’s memory! most generous! * * * *, once upon a time, gave that same poet the mighty sum of eighteen pence for a copy of his works. But then it must be considered that the poet was at that time absolutely starving, and brought his aid with all the earnestness of hunger. And over and above he received a * * * * worth at least, one third of the value, in exchange; but which, I believe, the poet afterwards very ungratefully expunged.

Next week I hope to have the pleasure of seeing you in Edinburgh; and, as my stay will be for eight or ten days, I wish you or * * * * would take a snug, well-aired bedroom for me, where I may have the pleasure of seeing you over a morning cup of tea. But by all accounts it will be a matter of some difficulty to see you at all, unless your company is bespoke a week before hand. There is a great rumour here concerning your great intimacy with the Duchess of

No. L.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Edinburgh, March 22d, 1787.

MADAM :

I READ your letter with watery eyes. A little, very little while ago, I had scarce a friend but the stubborn pride of my own bosom ; now I am distinguished, patronized, befriended by you. Your friendly advices—I will not give them the cold name of criticisms, I receive with reverence. I have made some small alterations in what I before had printed. I have the advice of some very judicious friends among the literati here, but with them I sometimes find it necessary to claim the privilege of thinking for myself. The noble Earl of Glencairn, to whom I owe more than to any man, does me the honour of giving me his strictures : his hints with respect to impropriety or indelicacy, I follow implicitly.

You kindly interest yourself in my future views and prospects ; there I can give you no light. It is all

“ Dark as was Chaos ere the infant sun
Was roll’d together, or had tried his beams
Athwart the gloom profound.”

The appellation of a Scottish bard is by far my highest pride ; to continue to deserve it is my most exalted ambition. Scottish scenes and Scottish story are the themes I could wish to sing. I have no dearer aim than to have it in my power, unplagued with the routine of business, for which heaven knows I am unfit enough, to make leisurely pilgrimages through Caledonia ; to sit on the fields of her battles ; to wander on the romantic banks of her rivers ; and to muse by the stately towers or venerable ruins, once the honoured abodes of her heroes.

But these are all Utopian thoughts : I have dallied long enough with life ; ’tis time to be in earnest. I have a fond, an aged mother to care for : and some other bosom ties perhaps equally tender. Where the individual only ———, and other ladies of distinction. I am really told that “ Cards to invite fly by thousands each night ;”

and if you had one, I suppose there would also be “ bribes to your old secretary.” It seems you are resolved to make hay while the sun shines, and avoid, if possible, the fate of poor Fergusson, * * * * *. Quærendu pecunia primum est, virtus post nummos, is a good maxim to thrive by : you seemed to despise it while in this part of the country, but probably some philosopher in Edinburgh has taught you better sense.

Pray are you yet engraving as well as printing—are you yet seized

“ With itch of picture in the front,
With bays and wicked rhyme upon’t ?”

But I must give up this trifling, and attend to matters that more concern myself ; so, as the Aberdeen wit says, “ Adieu, dryly ; we sal drink phan we meet.” suffers by the consequences of his own thoughtlessness, indolence, or folly, he may not be excusable ; nay shining abilities, and some of the nobler virtues, may half sanctify a heedless character ; but where God and nature have entrusted the welfare of others to his care ; where the trust is sacred, and the ties are dear, that man must be far gone in selfishness, or strangely lost to reflection, whom these connexions will not rouse to exertion.

I guess that I shall clear between two and three hundred pounds by my authorship !* with that sum I intend, so far as I may be said to have any intention, to return to my old acquaintance, the plough, and, if I can meet with a lease by which I can live, to commence farmer. I do not intend to give up poetry ; being bred to labour, secures me independence, and the muses are my chief, sometimes have been my only, enjoyment. If my practice second my resolution, I shall have principally at heart the serious business of life ; but while following my plough, or building up my shocks, I shall cast a leisure glance to that dear, that only feature of my character, which gave me the notice of my country, and the patronage of a Wallace.

Thus, honoured Madam, I have given you the bard, his situation, and his views, native as they are in his own bosom.

R. B.

No. LI.

TO THE SAME.

Edinburgh, 15th April, 1787.

MADAM :

THERE is an affectation of gratitude which I dislike. The periods of Johnson and the pauses of Sterne may hide a selfish heart. For my part, Madam, I trust I have too much pride for servility, and too little prudence for selfishness. I have this moment broken open your letter, but “ Rude am I in speech,

And therefore little can I grace my cause
In speaking for myself—”

“ The above extract,” says Dr. Currie, “ is from a letter of one of the ablest of our Poet’s correspondents, which contains some interesting anecdotes of Fergusson. The writer is mistaken in supposing the magistrates of Edinburgh had any share in the transaction respecting the monument erected for Fergusson by our Bard ; this, it is evident, passed between Burns and the Kirk Session of the Canongate. Neither at Edinburgh, nor any where else, do magistrates usually trouble themselves to inquire how the house of a poor poet is furnished, or how his grave is adorned.”

See additional letter on this subject, dated September, 1789.]

* [It has not hitherto been stated accurately how much the Poet made by the subscription copy of his poems : the clear profit has indeed been calculated at seven hundred pounds ; but such calculations can be at the best but lucky guesses, in the absence of a correct subscription-paper. Some put down their names for ten copies and took but one, while others subscribed for one and paid a guinea.]

so I shall not trouble you with any fine speeches and hunted figures. I shall just lay my hand on my heart and say, I hope I shall ever have the truest, the warmest, sense of your goodness.

I come abroad in print, for certain on Wednesday. Your orders I shall punctually attend to; only, by the way, I must tell you that I was paid before for Dr. Moore's and Miss Williams' copies, through the medium of Commissioner Cochrane in this place, but that we can settle when I have the honour of waiting on you.

Dr. Smith* was just gone to London the morning before I received your letter to him.

R. B.

No. LII.

TO DR. MOORE.

Edinburgh, 23d. April, 1787.

I RECEIVED the books, and sent the one you mentioned to Mrs. Dunlop. I am ill skilled in beating the coverts of imagination for metaphors of gratitude. I thank you, Sir, for the honour you have done me; and to my latest hour will warmly remember it. To be highly pleased with your book is what I have in common with the world; but to regard these volumes as a mark of the author's friendly esteem is a still more supreme gratification.

I leave Edinburgh in the course of ten days or a fortnight, and, after a few pilgrimages over some of the classic ground of Caledonia, Cowden Knowes, Banks of Yarrow, Tweed, &c., I shall return to my rural shades, in all likelihood never more to quit them. I have formed many intimacies and friendships here, but I am afraid they are all of too tender a construction to bear carriage a hundred and fifty miles. To the rich, the great, the fashionable, the polite, I have no equivalent to offer; and I am afraid my meteor appearance will by no means entitle me to a settled correspondence with any of you, who are the permanent lights of genius and literature.

My most respectful compliments to Miss Williams. If once this tangent flight of mine were over, and I were returned to my wonted leisurely motion in my old circle, I may probably endeavour to return her poetic compliment in kind.

R. B.

[The answer of Dr. Moore was as follows:—

“Clifford Street, May 23, 1787.

“DEAR SIR—I had the pleasure of your letter by Mr. Creech, and soon after he sent me the new edition of your poems. You seem to think it incumbent on you to send to each subscriber a number of copies proportionate to his subscription money, but you may depend upon it, few subscribers expect more than one copy, whatever they subscribed; I must inform you, however, that I took twelve copies for those subscribers, for whose money you were so accurate as to send me a receipt, and Lord Eglinton told me he had sent for six copies for himself, as he wished to give five of them as presents.

“Some of the poems you have added in this last edition are very beautiful, particularly the ‘Winter Night,’ the ‘Address to Edinburgh,’ ‘Green grow the Rashers,’ and the two songs immediately following—the latter of which is exquisite. By the way, I imagine, you have a peculiar talent for such compositions, which you ought to indulge. No kind of poetry demands more delicacy or higher polishing. Horace is more admired on account of his Odes than all his other writings. But nothing now added is equal to your “Vision” and “Cotter’s Saturday Night.” In these are united fine imagery, natural and pathetic description, with sublimity of language and thought. It is evident that you already possess a great variety of expression and command of the English language; you ought, therefore, to deal more sparingly, for the future, in the provincial dialect—why should you, by using that, limit the number of your admirers to those who understand the Scottish, when you can extend it to all persons of taste who understand the English language? In my opinion you should plan some larger work than any you have as yet attempted. I mean, reflect upon some proper subject, and arrange the plan in your mind, without beginning to execute any part of it till you have studied most of the best English poets, and read a little more of history. The Greek and Roman stories you can read in some abridgment, and soon become master of the most brilliant facts, which must highly delight a poetical mind. You should also, and very soon may, become master of the heathen mythology, to which there are everlasting allusions in all the poets, and which in itself is charmingly fanciful. What will require to be studied with more attention is modern history; that is, the history of France and Great Britain, from the beginning of Henry the Seventh’s reign. I know very well you have a mind capable of attaining knowledge by a shorter process than is commonly used, and I am certain you are capable of making a better use of it, when attained, than is generally done.

I beg you will not give yourself the trouble of writing to me when it is inconvenient, and make no apology when you do write for having postponed it—be assured of this, however, that I shall always be happy to hear from you. I think my friend Mr. — told me that you had some poems in manuscript by you, of a satirical and humorous nature (in which, by the way, I think you very strong), which your prudent friends prevailed on you to omit, particularly one called 'Somebody's Confession:;' if you will entrust me with a sight of any of these, I will pawn my word to give no copies, and will be obliged to you for a perusal of them.

* [Adam Smith, the distinguished author of “The Wealth of Nations,” &c.]

I understand you intend to take a farm, and make the useful and respectable business of husbandry your chief occupation: this I hope will not prevent your making occasional addresses to the nine ladies who have shown you such favour, one of whom visited you in the 'auld clay biggin.' Virgil, before you, proved to the world that there is nothing in the business of husbandry inimical to poetry; and I sincerely hope that you may afford an example of a good poet being a successful farmer. I fear it will not be in my power to visit Scotland this season; when I do, I'll endeavour to find you out, for I heartily wish to see and converse with you. If ever your occasions call you to this place, I make no doubt of your paying me a visit, and you may depend on a very cordial welcome from this family. I am, dear Sir, your friend and obedient servant,

J. MOORE."]

No. LIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Edinburgh, 30th April, 1787.

—YOUR criticisms, Madam, I understand very well, and could have wished to have pleased you better. You are right in your guess that I am not very amenable to counsel. Poets, much my superiors, have so flattered those who possessed the adventitious qualities of wealth and power, that I am determined to flatter no created being, either in prose or verse.

I set as little by princes, lords, clergy, critics, &c., as all these respective gentry do by my bardship. I know what I may expect from the world, by and bye—illiberal abuse, and perhaps contemptuous neglect.

I am happy, Madam, that some of my own favourite pieces are distinguished by your particular approbation. For my "Dream,"* which has unfortunately incurred your loyal displeasure, I hope in four weeks, or less, to have the honour of appearing, at Dunlop, in its defence in person.

R. B.

No. LIV.

TO THE REV. DR. HUGH BLAIR.

Lawn-market, Edinburgh, 3rd May, 1787.

REVEREND & MUCH-RESPECTED SIR:

I LEAVE Edinburgh to-morrow morning, but could not go without troubling you with half a line, sincerely to thank you for the kindness, patronage, and friendship you have shown me. I often felt the embarrassment of my singular situation; drawn forth from the veriest shades of life to the glare of remark; and honoured by the notice of those illustrious names of my country whose works, while they are applauded to the end of time, will ever instruct and mend the heart. However the meteor-like novelty of my appearance in the world might attract notice, and honour me with the acquaintance of the permanent lights of genius and literature, those who are truly benefactors of the immortal nature of man, I knew very well that my utmost merit was far unequal to the task of preserving that character when once the novelty was over; I have made up my mind that abuse, or almost even neglect, will not surprise me in my quarters.

I have sent you a proof impression of Beugo's work† for me, done on Indian paper, as a trifling but sincere testimony with what heart-warm gratitude I am, &c.

R. B.

[The answer of Blair to this letter contains a full refutation of all those who asserted that the Poet's life in Edinburgh was wild and irregular:—

"Argyle-square, Edinburgh, 4th May, 1787.

"DEAR SIR:—I was favoured this forenoon with your very obliging letter, together with an impression of your portrait, for which I return you my best thanks. The success you have met with I do not think was beyond your merits; and if I have had any small hand in contributing to it, it gives me great pleasure. I know no way in which literary persons who are advanced in years can do more service to the world than in forwarding the efforts of rising genius, or bringing forth unknown merit from obscurity. I was the first person who brought out to the notice of the world the poems of Ossian; first, by the 'Fragments of ancient Poetry,' which I published, and afterwards, by my setting on foot the undertaking for collecting and publishing the 'Works of Ossian;' and I have always considered this as a meritorious action of my life.

"Your situation, as you say, was indeed very singular: and in being brought out, all at once,

* [The well-known poem beginning, "Guid morning to your majesty." (See p. 254.) Mrs. Dunlop had probably recommended its being omitted in the second edition, on the score of prudence.]

† The portrait of the Poet after Nasmyth.

from the shades of deepest privacy to so great a share of public notice and observation, you had to stand a severe trial. I am happy that you have stood it so well; and, as far as I have known or heard, though in the midst of many temptations, without reproach to your character and behaviour.

"You are now, I presume, to retire to a more private walk of life; and I trust will conduct yourself there with industry, prudence, and honour. You have laid the foundation for just public esteem. In the midst of those employments, which your situation will render proper, you will not, I hope, neglect to promote that esteem, by cultivating your genius, and attending to such productions of it as may raise your character still higher. At the same time be not in too great a haste to come forward. Take time and leisure to improve and mature your talents. For on any second production, you give the world, your fate, as a poet, will very much depend. There is no doubt a gloss of novelty, which time wears off. As you very properly hint yourself, you are not to be surprised if in your rural retreat you do not find yourself surrounded with that glare of notice and applause which here shone upon you. No man can be a good poet without being somewhat of a philosopher. He must lay his account that any one, who exposes himself to public observation, will occasionally meet with the attacks of illiberal censure, which it is always best to overlook and despise. He will be inclined sometimes to court retreat, and to disappear from public view. He will not affect to shine always; that he may at proper seasons come forth with more advantage and energy. He will not think himself neglected if he be not always praised. I have taken the liberty, you see, of an old man to give advice and make reflections, which your own good sense will I dare say render unnecessary.

When you return, if you come this way, I will be happy to see you, and to know concerning your future plans of life. You will find me by the 22nd of this month, not in my house in Argyle-square, but at a country-house at Restalrig, about a mile east from Edinburgh, near the Musselburgh-road. Wishing you all success and prosperity, I am, with real regard and esteem,

"Dear Sir,

"Yours sincerely,

"HUGH BLAIR."]

* [Mr. Peter Hill, afterwards in business for himself as a bookseller, and honoured by the poet's correspondence. Reared with Mr. Creech, he was in his turn master to Mr. Constable. He died at an advanced age, in 1836.]

† [This letter first appeared in Hogg and Motherwell's

No LV.

TO MR. PATISON,
BOOKSELLER, PAISLEY.

Berry-well, near Dunse, May 11th, 1787.

DEAR SIR:

I AM sorry I was out of Edinburgh, making a slight pilgrimage to the classic scenes of this country, when I was favoured with yours of the 11th instant, enclosing an order of the Paisley banking company on the Royal bank, for twenty-two pounds seven shillings sterling, payment in full, after carriage deducted, for ninety copies of my book I sent you. According to your motions, I see you will have left Scotland before this reaches you, otherwise I would send you "Holy Willie" with all my heart. I was so hurried that I absolutely forgot several things I ought to have minded, among the rest, sending books to Mr. Cowan; but any order of yours will be answered at Creech's shop. You will please remember that non-subscribers pay six shillings; this is Creech's profit; but those who have subscribed, though their names have been neglected in the printed list, which is very incorrect, they are supplied at the subscription price.

I was not at Glasgow, nor do I intend for London; and I think Mrs. Fame is very idle to tell so many lies on a poor Poet. When you or Mr. Cowan write for copies, if you should want any, direct to Mr. Hill,* at Mr. Creech's shop, and I write to Mr. Hill by this post, to answer either of your orders. Hill is Mr. Creech's first clerk, and Creech himself is presently in London. I suppose I shall have the pleasure, against your return to Paisley, of assuring you how much I am,

Dear Sir,

Your obliged humble Servant,

R. B.†

No. I.VI.

TO MR. W. NICOL,

MASTER OF THE HIGH SCHOOL, EDINBURGH.

Carlisle, June 1, 1787.

KIND, HONEST-HEARTED WILLIE:

I'M sitten down here, after seven and forty miles ridin', e'en as forjesket and forniaw'd as a forfoughten cock, to gie you some notion o' my land lower-like stravaguin sin the sorrowfu' edition of Burns's works, and is valuable inasmuch as it shows the number of the Poet's works which were subscribed for in Paisley. The original MS. is in the hands of Charles Hutcheson, Esq. of Glasgow.]

hour that I sheuk hands and parted wi' auld Reekie.

My auld, ga'd gleyde o' a meere has huch-yall'd up hill and down brae, in Scotland and England, as teugh and birnie as a vera devil wi' me.* It's true, she's as poor's a sang-maker and as hard's a kirk, and tipper-taipers when she taks the gate, first like a lady's gentlewoman in a minuwae, or a hen on a het girdle; but she's a yauld, poutherie girran for a' that, and has a stomack like Willie Stalker's meere that wad hae disgeested tumbler-wheels, for she'll whip me aff her five stümparts o' the best aits at a down-sittin and ne'er fash her thumb.—When ance her ringbanes and spavies, her crucks and cramps, are fairly soupl'd, she beets to, beets to, and aye the hindmost hour the tightest. I could wager her price to a thretty pennies, that for twa or three wooks ridin' at fifty mile a day, the deil-sticket & five gallopers acquesth Clyde and Whithorn could cast saut on her tail.

I hae dander'd owre a' the kintra frae Dumbar to Selcraig, and hae foregath'er'd wi' mony a guid fallaw, and monie a weelfar'd hizzie.—I met wi' twa dink quines in particlar, ane o' them a sonsie, fine, fodgeg lass, baith braw and bonnie; the tither was a clean-shankit, straught, tight, weelfar'd winch, as blythe's a lintwhite on a flowerie thorn, and as sweet and modest's a new blawn plumrose in a hazle shaw. They were baith bred to mainers by the beuk, and onie ane o' them had as muckle smeddum and rumblegumption as the half o' some presbytries that you and I baith ken. They play'd me sic a deevil o' a shavie that I daur say, if my harigals were turn'd out, ye wad see twa nicks i' the heart o' me like the mark o' a kail-whittle in a castock.

I was gaun to write you a lang pystle, but, Gude forgie me, I gat mysel sae noutouriously bitchify'd the day, after kail-time, that I can hardly stoiter but and ben.

My best respects to the guidwife and a' our common friens, especiall Mr. and Mrs. Cruikshank, and the honest guidman o' Jock's Lodge.

I'll be in Dumfries the morn gif the beast be to the fore, and the branks bide hale.

Gude be wi' you, Willie! Amen!

R. B.†

* [This mare was the Poet's favourite, Jenny Geddes. She was named by him, says Cromek, after the old woman who, in her zeal against religious innovation, threw a stool at the Dean of Edinburgh's head, when he attempted, in 1637, to introduce the Scottish Liturgy.—“On Sunday, the twenty-third of July, the Dean of Edinburgh prepared to officiate in St. Giles's. The congregation continued quiet till the service began, when an old woman, impelled by sudden indignation, started up, and exclaiming aloud, ‘Villain! dost thou say the mass at my lug?’ threw the stool on which she had been sitting at the Dean's head. A wild uproar commenced that instant. The service was interrupted. The woman invaded the desk with execrations and outeries, and the Dean disengaged himself from his surplice to escape from her hands.”]

† [This letter cannot be otherwise than obscure to many a

No. LVII.

TO MR. JAMES SMITH,

AT MILLER AND SMITH'S OFFICE,
LINLITHGOW.

Mauchline, 11th June, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

I DATE this from Mauchline, where I arrived on Friday evening last. I slept at John Dow's, and called for my daughter; Mr. Hamilton and family; your mother, sister, and brother; my quondam Eliza, &c., all—all well. If any thing had been wanting to disgust me completely at Armour's family, their mean servile compliance would have done it. Give me a spirit like my favourite hero, Milton's Satan:

“Hail, horrors! hail,
Infernal world! and thou, profoundest Hell,
Receive thy new possessor! one who brings
A mind not to be chang'd by place or time!”

I cannot settle to my mind.—Farming—the only thing of which I know anything, and Heaven above knows but little do I understand even of that, I cannot, dare not risk on farms as they are. If I do not fix, I will go for Jamaica. Should I stay, in an unsettled state at home, I would only dissipate my little fortune, and ruin what I intend shall compensate my little ones for the stigma I have brought on their names.

I shall write you more at large soon; as this letter costs you no postage, if it be worth reading you cannot complain of your pennyworth.

I am ever,

My dear Sir,

Yours,

R. B.

[The above letter now appears for the first time in a complete edition of the Poet's works.]

No. LVIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM NICOL.

Mauchline, June 18, 1787.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I AM now arrived safe in my native country, after a very agreeable jaunt, and have the reader; nor can we hope, by a mere explanation of the words individually, to let English light in upon northern darkness. The gentleman to whom it was addressed understood it well: he was of humble parentage, and, like our Poet, forced his way to distinction by his talents and his learning: having achieved eminence, he sat quiet for a time, and seemed to be satisfied with himself. His love for pleasant company, and lively sallies of humour or of wit, led him to indulge in the pleasures of the table, and carried him to an early grave. He died in 1797.—CUNNINGHAM.

[“No man had ever more command of the ancient Doric dialect than Burns. He has left a curious testimony of his skill in the above letter—an attempt to read a sentence of which would break the teeth of most modern Scotchmen.”—SIR WALTER SCOTT. It is written in the west-country dialect, and does not present any difficulty to a native.—MOTHERWELL.]

pleasure to find all my friends well. I breakfasted with your grey-headed, reverend friend, Mr. Smith; and was highly pleased both with the cordial welcome he gave me, and his most excellent appearance and sterling good sense.

I have been with Mr. Miller at Dalswinton, and am to meet him again in August. From my view of the lands, and his reception of my bardship, my hopes in that business are rather mended; but still they are but slender.

I am quite charmed with Dumfries folks—Mr. Burnside, the clergyman, in particular, is a man whom I shall ever gratefully remember; and his wife, Gude forgie me! I had almost broke the tenth commandment on her account. Simplicity, elegance, good sense, sweetness of disposition, good humour, kind hospitality, are the constituents of her manner and heart: in short—but if I say one word more about her, I shall be directly in love with her.

I never, my friend, thought mankind very capable of anything generous; but the stateliness of the patricians in Edinburgh, and the servility of my plebeian brethren (who perhaps formerly eyed me askance) since I returned home, have nearly put me out of conceit altogether with my species. I have bought a pocket Milton, which I carry perpetually about with me, in order to study the sentiments—the dauntless magnanimity, the intrepid, unyielding independence, the desperate daring, and noble defiance of hardship, in that great personage, SATAN. 'Tis true, I have just now a little cash; but I am afraid the star that hitherto has shed its malignant, purpose-blasting rays full in my zenith; that noxious planet, so baneful in its influences to the rhyming tribe, I much dread it is not yet beneath my horizon.—Misfortune dodges the path of human life; the poetic mind finds itself miserably deranged in, and unfit for, the walks of business; add to all, that thoughtless follies and hare-brained whims, like so many ignes fatui, eternally diverging from the right line of sober discretion, sparkle with step-bewitching blaze in the idly-gazing eyes of the poor heedless Bard, till, pop, he falls like Lucifer, never to hope again." God grant this may be an unreal picture with respect to me! but should it not, I have very little dependence on mankind. I will close my letter with this tribute my heart bids me pay you—the many ties of acquaintance and friendship which I have, or think I have in life, I have felt along the lines, and, damn them, they are almost all of them of such frail contexture that I am sure they would not stand the breath of the least adverse breeze of fortune; but from you, my ever dear Sir, I look with confidence for the Apostolic love that shall wait on me "through good report and bad report,"—the love which Solomon emphatically says "is strong as death." My compliments to Mrs. Nicol, and all the circle of our common friends.

P.S. I shall be in Edinburgh about the latter end of July.

R. B.

◆
No. LIX.

TO MR. JAMES CANDLISH.

Edinburgh, 1787.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

IF once I were gone from this scene of hurry and dissipation, I promise myself the pleasure of that correspondence being renewed which has been so long broken. At present I have time for nothing. Dissipation and business engross every moment. I am engaged in assisting an honest Scotch enthusiast,* a friend of mine, who is an engraver, and has taken it into his head to publish a collection of all our songs set to music, of which the words and music are done by Scotsmen. This, you will easily guess, is an undertaking exactly to my taste. I have collected, begged, borrowed, and stolen, all the songs I could meet with. Pompey's Ghost, words and music, I beg from you immediately, to go into his second number—the first is already published. I shall shew you the first number when I see you in Glasgow, which will be in a fortnight or less. Do be so kind as to send me the song in a day or two: you cannot imagine how much it will oblige me. Direct to me at Mr. W. Cruickshank's, St. James's Square, New Town, Edinburgh.†

R. B.

* Johnson, the publisher and proprietor of the Musical Museum.

† The reply to the Poet's letter bears testimony to the taste and talents of one of Burns's early companions.

"Your kind letter came to hand, and I would have answered it sooner, had I not delayed, in expectation of finding some person who could enable me to comply with your request. Being myself unskilled in music as a science, I made an attempt to get the song you mentioned, set by some other hand; but as I could not accomplish this, I must send you the words without the music. Some of Edina's fair nymphs may perhaps be able to do you a piece of service which I would have done with the greatest pleasure had it been in my power. It is with the greatest sincerity I applaud your attempt to give the world a more correct and more elegant collection of Scottish songs than has hitherto appeared. They have been long and much admired, and yet perhaps no poetical compositions ever met with approbation more disproportioned to their merit. Many, from an affectation perhaps of a more than usual knowledge of ancient literature, extol, with the most extravagant praises, the pastoral productions of the Greek and Roman poets; and attempt to persuade us that in them alone is to be found that natural simplicity, and that tenderness of sentiment, which constitute the true excellence of that species of writing. For my own part, though I cannot altogether divest myself of partiality to the ancients, whose merit will cease only to be admired with the universal wreck of men and letters, yet I am persuaded that in many of the songs of our own nation, there are beauties which it would be vain to look for in the most admired poetical compositions of antiquity. They are the offspring of nature; they are expressed in the language of simplicity

No. LX.

TO WILLIAM NICOL, Esq.

Auchtertyre, Monday, June, 1787.*

MY DEAR SIR:

I FIND myself very comfortable here, neither oppressed by ceremony, nor mortified by neglect. Lady Augusta is a most engaging woman, and very happy in her family, which makes one's out-goings and in-comings very agreeable. I called at Mr. Ramsay's of Auchtertyre † as I came up the country, and am so delighted with him that I shall certainly accept of his invitation to spend a day or two with him as I return. I leave this place on Wednesday or Thursday.

Make my kind compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Cruikshank and Mrs. Nicol, if she is returned.

I am ever, dear Sir,

Your deeply indebted,—R. B.

[Burns was now on his first tour in the Highlands: he set out in no pleasant mood, for he scattered sharp epigrams and bitter lampoons on all and sundry as he travelled along. The verses on the window of the inn at Stirling—on Carron Foundry, and on Inverary, belong to this jaunt: nor had the witchery of beauty or the presence of learning any influence over his muse. The following complimentary verse is said to have been composed about this period—it is an epitaph on Nicol himself:—

Ye maggots feast on Willie's brain,
For few sic feasts ye've gotten;
And fix your claws on Willie's heart,
For de'il a bit o't's rotten.]

No. LXI.

TO WILLIAM CRUIKSHANK,

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, EDINBURGH. †

Auchtertyre, Monday, June 1787.

I HAVE nothing, my dear Sir, to write to and the love songs, breathing sentiments that are inspired by the most tender and exquisite feelings, are in unison with the human heart. There is no one in whose veins the smallest drop of Scottish blood circulates but must feel the most heartfelt pleasure when he reflects that those songs, which do such honour to both the genius and to the feelings of his countrymen; which, in simplicity of language, and in the sensibility that pervades them, have never been equalled by those of any nation; and which have been so much admired by foreigners, will continue to be sung with delight by both sexes, while Scots men and the Scots language remain.—If the collection is to be published by subscription, put down my name for a copy. My time this winter is very much employed—no less than ten hours a day. Expecting to see you soon, I am yours most sincerely.—JAMES CANDLISH. †]

* [The seat of Sir William Murray, Bart.—delightfully situated in Strathearn, two miles from Crieff. Sir W. and Lady Augusta Murray were the parents of Sir George Murray, at one time Secretary for the Colonies.]

† [Auchtertyre, on the Teith, near Stirling. Mr. Ramsay was an enthusiast in classical literature, somewhat after the you, but that I feel myself exceedingly comfortably situated in this good family: just notice enough to make me easy, but not to embarrass me. I was storm-staid two days at the foot of the Ochill-hills, with Mr. Tait of Herveyston and Mr. Johnston of Alva, but was so well pleased that I shall certainly spend a day on the banks of the Devon as I return. I leave this place I suppose on Wednesday, and shall devote a day to Mr. Ramsay at Auchtertyre, near Stirling: a man to whose worth I cannot do justice. My respectful kind compliments to Mrs. Cruikshank, and my dear little Jeanie, and, if you see Mr. Masterton, please remember me to him.

I am ever,

My dear Sir, &c.—R. B.

No. LXII. §

TO MISS ———.

1787.

MY DEAR COUNTRYWOMAN:

I AM so impatient to show you that I am once more at peace with you that I send you the book I mentioned directly, rather than wait the uncertain time of seeing you. I am afraid I have mislaid or lost Collins' Poems, which I promised to Miss Irvin. If I can find them, I will forward them by you; if not, you must apologize for me.

I know you will laugh at it when I tell you that your piano and you together have played the deuce somehow about my heart. My breast has been widowed these many months, and I thought myself proof against the fascinating witchcraft; but I am afraid you will "feelingly convince me what I am." I say, I am afraid, because I am not sure what is the matter with me. I have one miserable bad symptom; when you whisper, or look kindly to another, it gives me a draught of damnation. I have a kind of wayward wish to be with you ten mi-manner of the Baron Bradwardine, joining to it a keen relish of the homely literature of his native country.]

‡ [William Cruikshank, one of the masters of the high school of Edinburgh, was kind and obliging, and, as his station required, a good scholar. At his house Burns resided in the latter part of 1787, and passed many pleasant evenings. The house was the uppermost floor of the building, marked No. 30 (then No. 2) in St. James's-square; Burns's apartment looked into the green inclosure behind the Register House. The "dear little Jeanie" of this letter was the "Rose-bud" of one of his sweetest poems: she was not only beautiful, but sang with feeling, and played on various musical instruments with such grace as called forth, on several occasions, the commendations of the Bard. The letter is chiefly valuable as a record of his friendships and of his line of march into the Highlands.

§ [The letter, dated June 30th, 1787, addressed to Mr. James Smith, Linlithgow, and forming No. LVIII. of the General Correspondence, in the former edition of Cunningham's Burns, is omitted here, as the whole of it is inserted in the LIFE, pp. 60 and 61, of the present edition.

nutes by yourself, though what I would say Heaven above knows, for I am sure I know not. I have no formed design in all this; but just, in the nakedness of my heart, write you down a mere matter-of-fact story. You may perhaps give yourself airs of distance on this, and that will completely cure me; but I wish you would not: just let us meet, if you please, in the old beaten way of friendship.

I will not subscribe myself your humble servant, for that is a phrase, I think, at least fifty miles off from the heart; but I will conclude with sincerely wishing that the Great Protector of innocence may shield you from the barbed dart of calumny, and hand you by the covert snare of deceit.

R. B.

["This letter," says Cromeke, in his MS. Memoranda, "appears to have been written during the year 1784, and was probably addressed to the Peggy mentioned in the Poet's common-place book."

There are reasons for doubting this, and, amongst others, the allusion to the piano, which instrument, we are told by Gilbert Burns, Robert did not hear played till autumn 1786, when he was spending an evening in the house of Dr. Lawrie, at Loudon. It seems more likely that this letter was addressed, in 1787, to the lady whom the poet alludes to in his letter to James Smith, [dated June 30th of that year] descriptive of his first Highland tour. See LIFE. p. 61.]

No. LXIII.

TO MR. JOHN RICHMOND.

Mossiel, 7th July, 1787.

MY DEAR RICHMOND:

I AM all impatience to hear of your fate since the old confounder of right and wrong has turned you out of place, by his journey to answer his indictment at the bar of the other world. He will find the practice of the court so different from the practice in which he has for so many years been thoroughly hackneyed, that his friends, if he had any connections truly of that kind, which I rather doubt, may well tremble for his sake. His chicanery, his left-handed wisdom, which stood so firmly by him, to such good purpose, here, like other accomplices in robbery and plunder, will, now the piratical business is blown, in all probability turn king's evidences, and then the devil's bag-piper will touch him off "Bundle and go!"

If he has left you any legacy, I beg your pardon for all this; if not, I know you will swear to every word I said about him.

* [A short letter to Mr. Ainslie, dated Arrachar, June 28th, 1787, will be found in the LIFE, p. 60.]

I have lately been rambling over by Dum-barton and Inverary, and running a drunken race on the side of Loch Lomond with a wild Highlandman; his horse, which had never known the ornaments of iron or leather, zig-zagged across before my old spavin'd hunter, whose name is Jenny Geddes, and down came the Highlandman, horse and all, and down came Jenny and my bardship; so I have got such a skinful of bruises and wounds that I shall be at least four weeks before I venture on my journey to Edinburgh.

Not one new thing under the sun has happened in Mauchline since you left it. I hope this will find you as comfortably situated as formerly, or, if Heaven pleases, more so; but, at all events, I trust you will let me know, of course, how matters stand with you, well or ill. 'Tis but poor consolation to tell the world when matters go wrong; but you know very well your connection and mine stands on a different footing.

I am ever, my dear friend, yours,

R. B.

No. LXIV.

TO ROBERT AINSLIE, Esq.*

Mauchline, July, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

MY life, since I saw you last, has been one continued hurry; that savage hospitality which knocks a man down with strong liquors is the devil. I have a sore warfare in this world; the devil, the world, and the flesh, are three formidable foes. The first I generally try to fly from; the second, alas! generally flies from me; but the third is my plague, worse than the ten plagues of Egypt.

I have been looking over several farms in this country; one in particular, in Nithsdale, pleased me so well that, if my offer to the proprietor is accepted, I shall commence farmer at Whit-Sunday. If farming do not appear eligible, I shall have recourse to my other shift; † but this to a friend.

I set out for Edinburgh on Monday morning; how long I stay there is uncertain, but you will know so soon as I can inform you myself. However I determine, poesy must be laid aside for some time; my mind has been vitiated with idleness, and it will take a good deal of effort to habituate it to the routine of business.

I am, my dear Sir,

Yours sincerely,

R. B.

† [The Excise.]

[The poet makes a similar complaint of the "savage hospitality" of his admirers to Mrs. Dunlop: he lived in days of hard drinking, when all glasses which were raised to the lips full were not set down till empty.—"Here I am," he says, in one of his letters, "sitting with an atmosphere of hypochondriac vapours about me, like the thickening fogs of an October morning. Job cursed his day, but I go farther; I curse my day and doubly curse my night: by night I get myself fou'; by night I sing merry songs; by night

'I moop wi' the servant hizzie;'

in short, by night, as Sir John Falstaff says, 'I am, as one may say, little better than one of the wicked.' To-day has been a day of sackcloth and ashes. The parliamentary powers of my mind have had a solemn meeting to consider on a bill of reform: I dread an opposition in the lower house, but I am determined to carry it through."]

No. LXV.

TO DR. MOORE.

Mauchline, 2nd August, 1787.

SIR :

FOR some months past I have been rambling over the country, but I am now confined with some lingering complaints, originating, as I take it, in the stomach. To divert my spirits a little in this miserable fog of ennui, I have taken a whim to give you a history of myself. My name has made some little noise in this country; you have done me the honour to interest yourself very warmly in my behalf; and I think a faithful account of what character of a man I am, and how I came by that character, may perhaps amuse you in an idle moment. I will give you an honest narrative, though I know it will be often at my own expense; for I assure you, Sir, I have, like Solomon, whose character, excepting in the trifling affair of wisdom, I sometimes think I resemble,—I have, I say, like him turned my eyes to behold madness and folly, and like him, too, frequently shaken hands with their intoxicating friendship. After you have perused these pages, should you think them trifling and impertinent, I only beg leave to tell you that the poor author wrote them under some twitching qualms of conscience, arising from a suspicion that he was doing what he ought not to do; a predicament he has more than once been in before.

I have not the most distant pretensions to assume that character which the pye-coated guardians of escutcheons call a gentleman. When at Edinburgh last winter, I got acquainted in the herald's office; and, looking through that granary of honours, I there found almost every name in the kingdom; but for me,

"My ancient but ignoble blood
Has crept thro' scoundrels ever since the flood."

Gules, purple, argent, &c., quite disowne me.

My father was of the north of Scotland, the son of a farmer, and was thrown by early misfortunes on the world at large; where, after many years' wanderings and sojournings, he picked up a pretty large quantity of observation and experience, to which I am indebted for most of my little pretensions to wisdom.—I have met with few who understood men, their manners, and their ways, equal to him; but stubborn, ungainly integrity, and headlong, ungovernable irascibility, are disqualifying circumstances; consequently, I was born a very poor man's son. For the first six or seven years of my life, my father was gardener to a worthy gentleman of small estate in the neighbourhood of Ayr. Had he continued in that station, I must have marched off to be one of the little underlings about a farm-house; but it was his dearest wish and prayer to have it in his power to keep his children under his own eye, till they could discern between good and evil; so, with the assistance of his generous master, my father ventured on a small farm on his estate.

At those years, I was by no means a favourite with any body. I was a good deal noted for a retentive memory, a sturdy something in my disposition, and an enthusiastic idiot [idiotic] piety. I say idiot piety, because I was then but a child. Though it cost the schoolmaster some thrashings, I made an excellent English scholar; and, by the time I was ten or eleven years of age, I was a critic in substantives, verbs, and particles. In my infant and boyish days, too, I owed much to an old woman who resided in the family, remarkable for her ignorance, credulity, and superstition. She had, I suppose, the largest collection in the country of tales and songs concerning devils, ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, warlocks, spunkies, kelpies, elf-candles, dead-lights, wraiths, apparitions, cantraps, giants, enchanted towers, dragons, and other trumpery.—This cultivated the latent seeds of poetry; but had so strong an effect on my imagination that to this hour, in my nocturnal rambles, I sometimes keep a sharp look out in suspicious places; and, though nobody can be more sceptical than I am in such matters, yet it often takes an effort of philosophy to shake off these idle terrors. The earliest composition that I recollect taking pleasure in was The Vision of Mirza, and a hymn of Addison's, beginning, "How are thy servants blest, O Lord!" I particularly remember one half-stanza which was music to my boyish ear—

"For though on dreadful whirls we hung High on the broken wave—"

I met with these pieces in Mason's English Collection, one of my school-books. The first two books I ever read in private, and which gave me more pleasure than any two books I ever read since, were The Life of Hannibal, and The History of Sir William Wallace. Hannibal gave my young ideas such a turn that I used to strut in raptures up and down after the recruiting drum and bagpipe, and wish myself tall enough to be a soldier, while the story of Wallace poured a Scottish prejudice into my veins, which will boil along there till the flood-gates of life shut in eternal rest.

Polemical divinity about this time was putting the country half mad, and I, ambitious of shining in conversation parties on Sundays, between sermons, at funerals, &c., used a few years afterwards to puzzle Calvinism with so much heat and indiscretion that I raised a hue and cry of heresy against me, which has not ceased to this hour.

My vicinity to Ayr was of some advantage to me. My social disposition, when not checked by some modifications of spirited pride, was, like our catechism definition of infinitude, without bounds or limits. I formed several connexions with other youngers, who possessed superior advantages; the youngling actors who were busy in the rehearsal of parts, in which they were shortly to appear on the stage of life, where, alas! I was destined to drudge behind the scenes. It is not commonly at this green age that our young gentry have a just sense of the immense distance between them and their ragged play-fellows. It takes a few dashes into the world to give the young great man that proper, decent, unnoticed disregard for the poor, insignificant, stupid devils, the mechanics and peasantry around him, who were, perhaps, born in the same village. My young superiors never insulted the clouterly appearance of my plough-boy carcase, the two extremes of which were often exposed to all the inclemencies of all the seasons. They would give me stray volumes of books; among them, even then, I could pick up some observations, and one, whose heart, I am sure, not even the "Munny Begum" scenes have tainted, helped me to a little French. Parting with these my young friends and benefactors, as they occasionally went off for the East or West Indies, was often to me a sore affliction; but I was soon called to more serious evils. My father's generous master died; the farm proved a ruinous bargain; and, to clench the misfortune, we fell into the hands of a factor, who sat for the picture I have drawn of one in my tale of "The Twa Dogs." My father was advanced in life when he married; I was the eldest of seven children, and he, worn out by early hardships, was unfit for labour. My father's spirit was soon irritated, but not easily broken. There was a freedom in his lease in two years more, and, to weather these two years, we retrenched our expenses. We lived very poorly: I was a dexterous ploughman for my age; and the next eldest to me was a brother (Gilbert), who could drive the plough very well, and help me to thrash the corn. A novel-writer might, perhaps, have viewed these scenes with some satisfaction, but so did not I; my indignation yet boils at the recollection of the scoundrel factor's insolent threatening letters, which used to set us all in tears.

This kind of life—the cheerless gloom of a hermit, with the unceasing moil of a galley-slave, brought me to my sixteenth year; a little before which period I first committed the sin of rhyme. You know our country custom of coupling a man and woman together as partners in the labours of harvest. In my fifteenth autumn, my partner was a bewitching creature, a year younger than myself. My scarcity of English denies me the power of doing her justice in that language, but you know the Scottish idiom: she was a "bonnie, sweet, sonsie lass." In short, she, altogether unwittingly to herself, initiated me in that delicious passion which, in spite of acid disappointment, gin-horse prudence, and book-worm philosophy, I hold to be the first of human joys, our dearest blessing here below! How she caught the contagion I cannot tell; you medical people talk much of infection from breathing the same air, the touch, &c.; but I never expressly said I loved her.—Indeed, I did not know myself why I liked so much to loiter behind with her, when returning in the evening from our labours; why the tones of her voice made my heart-strings thrill like an Æolian harp; and particularly why my pulse beat such a furious ratan, when I looked and fingered over her little hand to pick out the cruel nettle-stings and thistles. Among her other love-inspiring qualities, she sung sweetly; and it was her favourite reel to which I attempted giving an embodied vehicle in rhyme. I was not so presumptuous as to imagine that I could make verses like printed ones, composed by men who had Greek and Latin; but my girl sung a song which was said to be composed by a small country laird's son, on one of his father's maids with whom he was in love; and I saw no reason why I might not rhyme as well as he; for, excepting that he could smear sheep, and cast peats, his father living in the moorlands, he had no more scholar-craft than myself.

Thus with me began love and poetry; which at times have been my only, and, till within the last twelve months, have been my highest, enjoyment. My father struggled till he reached the freedom in his lease, when he entered on a larger farm, about ten miles farther in the country. The nature of the bargain he made was such as to throw a little ready money into his hands at the commencement of his lease, otherwise the affair would have been impracticable. For four years we lived comfortably here, but a difference commencing between him and his landlord as to terms, after three years' tossing and whirling in the vortex of litigation, my father was just saved from the horrors of a jail by a consumption, which, after two years' promises, kindly stepped in, and carried him away, to where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary are at rest!

It is during the time that we lived on this farm that my little story is most eventful. I was, at the beginning of this period, perhaps, the most ungainly awkward boy in the parish—no solitaire was less acquainted with the ways of the world. What I knew of ancient story was gathered from Salmon's and Guthrie's Geographical Grammars; and the ideas I had formed of modern manners, of literature, and criticism, I got from the Spectator. These, with Pope's Works, some Plays of Shakspeare, Tull and Dickson on Agriculture, The Pantheon, Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding, Stackhouse's History of the Bible, Justice's British Gardener's Directory, Boyle's Lectures, Allan Ramsay's Works, Taylor's Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin, A Select Collection of English Songs, and Hervey's Meditations, had formed the whole of my reading. The collection of songs was my vade mecum. I pored over them, driving my cart, or walking to labour, song by song, verse by verse; carefully noting the true tender, or sublime, from affectation and fustian. I am convinced I owe to this practice much of my critic-craft, such as it is.

In my seventeenth year, to give my manners a brush, I went to a country dancing-school. My father had an unaccountable antipathy against these meetings, and my going was, what to this moment I repent, in opposition to his wishes.* My father, as I said before, was subject to strong passions; from that instance of disobedience in me, he took a sort of dislike to me, which, I believe, was one cause of the dissipation which marked my succeeding years. I say dissipation, comparatively with the strictness, and sobriety, and regularity of presbyterian country life; for though the will-o'-wisp meteors of thoughtless whim were almost the sole lights of my path, yet early ingrained piety and virtue kept me for several years afterwards within the line of innocence. The great misfortune of my life was to want an aim. I had felt early some stirrings of ambition, but they were the blind gropings of Homer's Cyclops round the walls of his cave. I saw my father's situation entailed on me perpetual labour. The only two openings, by which I could enter the temple of fortune, were the gate of niggardly economy, or the path of little chicaning bargaining. The first is so contracted an aperture I never could squeeze myself into it—the last I always hated—there was contamination in the very entrance! Thus abandoned of aim or view in life, with a strong appetite for sociability, as well from native hilarity as from a pride of observation and remark; a constitutional melancholy or hypochondriacism that made me fly solitude; add to these incentives to social life my reputation for bookish knowledge, a certain wild logical talent, and a strength of thought, something like the rudiments of good sense; and it will not seem surprising that I was generally a welcome guest wherc I visited, or any great wonder that always, where two or three met together, there was I among them. But far beyond all other impulses of my heart was un penchant à l'adorable moitié du genre humain. My heart was completely tinder, and was eternally lighted up by some goddess or other; and, as in every other warfare in this world, my fortune was various; sometimes I was received with favour, and sometimes I was mortified with a repulse. At the plough, scythe, or reap-hook, I feared no competitor, and thus I set absolute want at defiance; and, as I never cared farther for my labours than while I was in actual exercise, I spent the evenings in the way after my own heart. A country lad seldom carries on a love adventure without an assisting confidant.

I possessed a curiosity, zeal, and intrepid dexterity that recommended me as a proper second on these occasions; and, I dare say, I felt as much pleasure in being in the secret of half the loves of the parish of Tarbolton as ever did statesman in knowing the intrigues of half the courts of Europe. The very goose-feather in my hand seems to know instinctively the well-worn path of my imagination, the favourite theme of my song; and is with difficulty restrained from giving you a couple of paragraphs on the love-adventures of my compeers, the humble inmates of the farm-house and cottage; but the grave sons of science, ambition, or avarice baptize these things by

* ["I wonder," says Gilbert Burns, "how Robert could attribute to our father that lasting resentment of his going to a dancing school against his will, and of which he was incapable. I believe the truth was that about this time he began to see the dangerous impetuosity of my brother's passions, as well as his not being amenable to counsel, which often irritated my father, and which, he would naturally think, a dancing-school was not likely to correct. But he was proud of Robert's genius, which he bestowed more expense on cultivating than on the rest of the family—and he was equally delighted with his warmth of heart and conversational powers. He had indeed that dislike of dancing-schools which Robert mentions; but so far overcame it during Robert's first month of attendance that he permitted the rest of the family that were fit for it to accompany him during the second month. Robert excelled in dancing, and was for some time distractedly fond of it."] the name of follies. To the sons and daughters of labour and poverty they are matters of the most serious nature: to them the ardent hope, the stolen interview, the tender farewell, are the greatest and most delicious parts of their enjoyments.

Another circumstance in my life which made some alteration in my mind and manners, was that I spent my nineteenth summer on a smuggling coast, a good distance from home, at a noted school, to learn mensuration, surveying, dialling, &c., in which I made a pretty good progress. But I made a greater progress in the knowledge of mankind. The contraband trade was at that time very successful, and it sometimes happened to me to fall in with those who carried it on. Scenes of swaggering riot and roaring dissipation were, till this time, new to me; but I was no enemy to social life. Here, though I learnt to fill my glass, and to mix without fear in a drunken squabble, yet I went on with a high hand with my geometry, till the sun entered Virgo, a month which is always a carnival in my bosom, when a charming fillette, who lived next door to the school, overset my trigonometry, and set me off at a tangent from the spheres of my studies. I, however, struggled on with my sines and co-sines for a few days more; but stepping into the garden one charming noon to take the sun's altitude, there I met my angel

"Like Proserpine gathering flowers, Herself a fairer flower—"

It was in vain to think of doing any more good at school. The remaining week I staid I did nothing but craze the faculties of my soul about her, or steal out to meet her; and the two last nights of my stay in the country, had sleep been a mortal sin, the image of this modest and innocent girl had kept me guiltless.

I returned home very considerably improved. My reading was enlarged with the very important addition of Thomson's and Shenstone's Works; I had seen human nature in a new phasis; and I engaged several of my school-fellows to keep up a literary correspondence with me. This improved me in composition. I had met with a collection of letters by the wits of Queen Anne's reign, and I pored over them most devoutly. I kept copies of any of my own letters that pleased me, and a comparison between them and the composition of most of my correspondents flattered my vanity. I carried this whim so far that, though I had not three-farthings' worth of business in the world, yet almost every post brought me as many letters as if I had been a broad plodding son of the day-book and ledger.

My life flowed on much in the same course till my twenty-third year. Vive l'amour, et vive la bagatelle, were my sole principles of action. The addition of two more authors to my library gave me great pleasure; Sterne and Mackenzie—Tristram Shandy and the Man of Feeling were my bosom favourites. Poesy was still a darling walk for my mind, but it was only indulged in according to the humour of the hour. I had usually half a dozen or more pieces on hand; I took up one or other, as it suited the momentary tone of the mind, and dismissed the work as it bordered on fatigue. My passions, when once lighted up, raged like so many devils, till they got vent in rhyme; and then the conning over my verses, like a spell, soothed all into quiet! None of the rhymes of those days are in print, except "Winter, a dirge," the eldest of my printed pieces; "The Death of poor Mailie," "John Barleycorn," and songs first, second, and third. Song second was the ebullition of that passion which ended the forementioned school-business.

My twenty-third year was to me an important æra. Partly through whim, and partly that I wished to set about doing something in life, I joined a flax-dresser in a neighbouring town (Irvine), to learn his trade. This was an unlucky affair. My * * * and to finish the whole, as we were giving a welcome carousal to the new year, the shop took fire and burnt to ashes, and I was left, like a true poet, not worth a sixpence.

I was obliged to give up this scheme; the clouds of misfortune were gathering thick round my father's head; and, what was worst of all, he was visibly far gone in a consumption; and to crown my distresses, a belle fille, whom I adored, and who had pledged her soul to meet me in the field of matrimony, jilted me, with peculiar circumstances of mortification. The finishing evil that brought up the rear of this infernal file, was my constitutional melancholy being increased to such a degree, that for three months I was in a state of mind scarcely to be envied by the hopeless wretches who have got their mittimus—"Depart from me, ye accursed!"

From this adventure I learned something of a town life; but the principal thing which gave my mind a turn was a friendship I formed with a young fellow, a very noble character, but a hapless son of misfortune.* He was the son of a simple mechanic; but a great man in the neighbourhood, taking him under his patronage, gave him a genteel education, with a view of bettering his situation in life. The patron dying just as he was ready to launch out into the world, the poor fellow in despair went to sea; where, after a variety of good and ill-fortune, a little before I was acquainted with him he had

* [The individual here alluded to was named Richard Brown. His mature life was an improvement upon his youth, and he died, in the enjoyment of general respect, within the last few years, at Greenock.]

been set on shore by an American privateer, on the wild coast of Connaught, stripped of every thing. I cannot quit this poor fellow's story without adding that he is at this time master of a large West-Indiaman belonging to the Thames.

His mind was fraught with independence, magnanimity, and every manly virtue. I loved and admired him to a degree of enthusiasm, and of course strove to imitate him. In some measure, I succeeded; I had pride before, but he taught it to flow in proper channels. His knowledge of the world was vastly superior to mine, and I was all attention to learn. He was the only man I ever saw who was a greater fool than myself where woman was the presiding star; but he spoke of illicit love with the levity of a sailor, which hitherto I had regarded with horror. Here his friendship did me a mischief, and the consequence was that, soon after I resumed the plough, I wrote the "Poet's Welcome."[†] My reading only increased while in this town by two stray volumes of Pamela, and one of Ferdinand Count Fathom, which gave me some idea of novels. Rhyme, except some religious pieces that are in print, I had given up; but meeting with Fergusson's Scottish Poems, I strung anew my wildly-sounding lyre with emulating vigour. When my father died, his all went among the hell-hounds that growl in the kennel of justice; but we made a shift to collect a little money in the family amongst us, with which, to keep us together, my brother and I took a neighbouring farm. My brother wanted my hair-brained imagination, as well as my social and amorous madness; but in good sense, and every sober qualification, he was far my superior.

I entered on this farm with a full resolution, "come, go to, I will be wise!" I read farming books, I calculated crops; I attended markets; and in short, in spite of the devil, and the world, and the flesh, I believe I should have been a wise man; but the first year, from unfortunately buying bad seed, the second from a late harvest, we lost half our crops. This over-set all my wisdom, and I returned, "like the dog to his vomit, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire."

I now began to be known in the neighbourhood as a maker of rhymes. The first of my poetic offspring that saw the light was a burlesque lamentation on a quarrel between two reverend Calvinists, both of them dramatis personæ in my "Holy Fair." I had a notion myself that the piece had some merit; but to prevent the worst, I gave a copy of it to a friend, who was very fond of such things, and told him that I could not guess who was the author of it, but that I thought it pretty clever.

With a certain description of the clergy, as well as laity, it met with a roar of applause. "Holy Willie's Prayer" next made its appearance, and alarmed the kirk-session so much that they held several meetings to look over their spiritual artillery, if haply any of it might be pointed against profane rhymers. Unluckily for me, my wanderings led me on another side, within point-blank shot of their heaviest metal. This is the unfortunate story that gave rise to my printed poem, "The Lament." This was a most melancholy affair, which I cannot yet bear to reflect on, and had very nearly given me one or two of the principal qualifications for a place among those who have lost the chart, and mistaken the reckoning of rationality. I gave up my part of the farm to my brother; in truth it was only nominally mine; and made what little preparation was in my power for Jamaica. But, before leaving my native country for ever, I resolved to publish my poems. I weighed my productions as impartially as was in my power; I thought they had merit; and it was a delicious idea that I should be called a clever fellow, even though it should never reach my ears—a poor negro-driver—or perhaps a victim to that inhospitable clime, and gone to the world of spirits! I can truly say that, pauvre inconnu as I then was, I had pretty nearly as high an idea of myself and of my works as I have at this moment, when the public has decided in their favour. It ever was my opinion that the mistakes and blunders, both in a rational and religious point of view, of which we see thousands daily guilty, are owing to their ignorance of themselves.—To know myself had been all along my constant study. I weighed myself alone; I balanced myself with others; I watched every means of information, to see how much ground I occupied as a man and as a poet; I studied assiduously Nature's design in my formation—where the lights and shades in my character were intended. I was pretty confident my poems would meet with some applause; but at the worst, the roar of the Atlantic would deafen the voice of censure, and the novelty of West Indian scenes make me forget neglect. I threw off six hundred copies, of which I had got subscriptions for about three hundred and fifty.—My vanity was highly gratified by the reception I met with from the public; and, besides, I pocketed, all expenses deducted, nearly twenty pounds. This sum came very seasonably, as I was thinking of indenting myself, for want of money to procure my passage. As soon as I was master of nine guineas, the price of wafting me to the torrid zone, I took a steerage passage in the first ship that was to sail from the Clyde, for "Hungry ruin had me in the wind."

I had been for some days skulking from covert to covert, under all the terrors of a jail;

[†] "Rob the Rhymer's Welcome to his Bastard Child."

as some ill-advised people had uncoupled the merciless pack of the law at my heels. I had taken the last farewell of my few friends; my chest was on the road to Greenock; I had composed the last song I should ever measure in Caledonia—"The gloomy night is gathering fast," when a letter from Dr. Blacklock to a friend of mine overthrew all my schemes, by opening new prospects to my poetic ambition. The doctor belonged to a set of critics, for whose applause I had not dared to hope. His opinion, that I would meet with encouragement in Edinburgh for a second edition, fired me so much that away I posted for that city, without a single acquaintance, or a single letter of introduction. The baneful star that had so long shed its blasting influence in my zenith for once made a revolution to the nadir; and a kind Providence placed me under the patronage of one of the noblest of men, the Earl of Glencairn. Oublie moi, grand Dieu, si jamais je l'oublie!

I need relate no farther. At Edinburgh I was in a new world; I mingled among many classes of men, but all of them new to me, and I was all attention to "catch" the characters and "the manners living as they rise." Whether I have profited, time will shew.*

* * * * *

My most respectful compliments to Miss Williams. Her very elegant and friendly letter I cannot answer at present, as my presence is requisite in Edinburgh, and I set out to-morrow.

R. B.

No. LXVI.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE, JUN.

BERRYWELL, DUNSE.

Edinburgh, 23rd August, 1787.

"As I gaed up to Danse,
To warp a pickle yarn,
Robin, silly body,
He gat me wi' bairn."

FROM henceforth, My dear Sir, I am determined to set off with my letters like the periodical writers, viz., prefix a kind of text, quoted from some classic of undoubted authority,

* [The first intimation which the Poet gives of his intention to write an account of himself is contained in his letter to Robert Muir: that he might do it more at his leisure, he retired for a while to Mauchline, and in the scenes that formerly inspired him, composed this most valuable biography.—"I mentioned to you," he says, to an Edinburgh beauty, [Clarinda] "my letter to Dr. Moore, giving an account of my life: it is truth, every word of it; and will give you the just idea of a man whom you have honoured with your friendship. I am afraid you will hardly be able to make sense of so torn a piece." To the same lady, he says, on the same interesting subject, "I have been this morning taking a peep through, as Young finely says, such as the author of the immortal piece of which my text is a part. What I have to say on my text is exhausted in chatter I wrote you the other day, before I had the pleasure of receiving yours from Inverleithing; and sure never was any thing more lucky, as I have but the time to write this, that Mr. Nicol on the opposite side of the table takes to correct a proof sheet of a thesis. They are gabbling Latin so loud that I cannot hear what my own soul is saying in my own skull, so must just give you a matter-of-fact sentence or two, and end, if time permit, with a verse de rei generatione.

'The dark postern of time long elapsed.'

To-morrow I leave Edinburgh in a chase: Nicol thinks it more comfortable than horse-back, to which I say Amen; so Jenny Geddes goes home to Ayr-shire, to use a phrase of my mother's, "wi' her finger in her mouth."

Now for a modest verse of classical authority:—

The cats like kitchen,
The dogs like broo;
The lasses like the lads weel,
And th' auld wives too.

CHORUS.

And we're a' noddin,
Nid, nid, noddin,
We're a noddin fou at e'en.†

If this does not please you, let me hear from you: if you write any time before the first of September, direct to Inverness, to be left at the post-office till called for; the next week at Aberdeen; the next at Edinburgh.

The sheet is done, and I shall just conclude with assuring you that I am, and ever with pride shall be, my dear Sir, yours, &c.

ROBERT BURNS.

Call your boy what you think proper, only interject Burns. What do you say to a scripture name; for instance, Zimri Burns Ainslie, or Archetophel, &c. Look your Bible for these two heroes—if you do this, I will repay the compliment.

[The above humourous epistle from the Poet was originally inserted in Pickering's edition of the poetical works of Robert Burns. It is

And you will easily guess it was a rueful prospect. What a tissue of thoughtlessness, weakness, and folly! My life reminded me of a ruined temple! what proportion in some parts! what unsightly gaps, what prostrate ruins in others! I knelt down before The Father of mercies, and said, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son!' I rose eased and strengthened. I despise the superstition of a fanatic, and I love the religion of a man. The future, said I to myself, is still before me—there let me—

'On reason build resolve,
That column of true m-jesty in man.'"]

† [See song commencing "Gude E'en to you Kimmer."] extremely characteristic, and will be read with great interest by every admirer of the Poet. It is printed from the original MS. in the hand-writing of Burns.]

No. LXVII.

TO MR. ROBERT MUIR.

Stirling, 26th August, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

I INTENDED to have written you from Edinburgh, and now write you from Stirling to make an excuse. Here am I, on my way to Inverness, with a truly original, but very worthy man, a Mr. Nicol, one of the masters of the High-school in Edinburgh. I left Auld Reekie yesterday morning, and have passed, besides by-excursions, Linlithgow, Borrowstouness, Falkirk, and here am I undoubtedly. This morning I knelt at the tomb of Sir John the Graham, the gallant friend of the immortal Wallace; and two hours ago I said a fervent prayer for old Caledonia over the hole in a blue whinstone, where Robert de Bruce fixed his royal standard on the banks of Bannockburn; and just now, from Stirling Castle, I have seen by the setting sun the glorious prospect of the windings of Forth through the rich carse of Stirling, and skirting the equally rich carse of Falkirk. The crops are very strong, but so very late that there is no harvest, except a ridge or two perhaps in ten miles, all the way I have travelled from Edinburgh.

I left Andrew Bruce* and family all well.—I will be at least three weeks in making my tour, as I shall return by the coast, and have many people to call for.

My best compliments to Charles, our dear kinsman and fellow saint; and Messrs. W. and H. Parkers. I hope Hughoc† is going on and prospering with God and Miss M'Causlin.

If I could think on any thing sprightly, I should let you hear every other post; but a dull, matter-of-fact business like this scrawl, the less and seldomer one writes, the better.

Among other matters-of-fact I shall add this that I am and ever shall be,

My dear Sir,

Your obliged,

R. B.‡

* [Of the North Bridge, Edinburgh.]

† [The Hughoc of poor Mailie.]

‡ [This is the first letter which the Poet wrote during his excursion northward with Nicol. No Scotsman will read

No. LXVIII.

TO GAVIN HAMILTON, Esq.

Stirling, 28th August, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

HERE I am on my way to Inverness. I have rambled over the rich, fertile carses of Falkirk and Stirling, and am delighted with their appearance: richly waving crops of wheat, barley, &c., but no harvest at all yet, except, in one or two places, an old-wife's ridge. Yesterday morning I rode from this town up the meandering Devon's banks, to pay my respects to some Ayr-shire folks at Harvieston. After breakfast, we made a party to go and see the famous Caudron-linn, a remarkable cascade in the Devon, about five miles above Harvieston; and, after spending one of the most pleasant days I ever had in my life, I returned to Stirling in the evening. They are a family, Sir, though I had not had any prior tie—though they had not been the brother and sisters of a certain generous friend of mine—I would never forget them. I am told you have not seen them these several years, so you can have very little idea of what these young folks are now. Your brother is as tall as you are, but slender rather than otherwise; and I have the satisfaction to inform you that he is getting the better of those consumptive symptoms which I suppose you know were threatening him.—His make, and particularly his manner, resemble you, but he will still have a finer face. (I put in the word still, to please Mrs. Hamilton.) Good sense, modesty, and at the same time a just idea of that respect that man owes to man, and has a right in his turn to exact, are striking features in his character; and, what with me is the Alpha and the Omega, he has a heart that might adorn the breast of a poet! Grace has a good figure, and the look of health and cheerfulness, but nothing else remarkable in her person. I scarcely ever saw so striking a likeness as is between her and your little Bessie; the mouth and chin particularly. She is reserved at first; but, as we grew better acquainted, I was delighted with the native frankness of her manner, and the sterling sense of her observation. Of Charlotte I cannot speak in common terms of admiration: she is not only beautiful, but lovely. Her form is elegant; her features not regular, but they have the smile of sweetness, and the settled complacency of good nature in the highest degree; and her complexion, now that she has happily recovered her wonted health, is equal to Miss Burnet's. After the exercise of our riding to the Falls, without emotion what he says about Bannockburn; nor will those who are interested in his poetry fail to see that "Wee Hughoc," who figures in "Poor Mailie," is not forgotten; the Bard hopes he is prospering with God and Miss M'Causlin.]

Charlotte was exactly Dr. Donne's mistress :—

—“ Her pure and eloquent blood
Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought
That one would almost say her body thought.”

Her eyes are fascinating ; at once expressive of good sense, tenderness, and a noble mind. §

I do not give you all this account, my good Sir, to flatter you. I mean it to reproach you. Such relations the first peer in the realm might own with pride ; then why do you not keep up more correspondence with these so amiable young folks ? I had a thousand questions to answer about you. I had to describe the little ones with the minuteness of anatomy. They were highly delighted when I told them that John* was so good a boy, and so fine a scholar, and that Willie was going on still very pretty ; but I have it in commission to tell her from them that beauty is a poor silly bauble without she be good. Miss Chalmers I had left in Edinburgh, but I had the pleasure of meeting with Mrs. Chalmers, only Lady Mackenzie being rather a little alarmingly ill of a sore throat, somewhat marred our enjoyment.

I shall not be in Ayr-shire for four weeks.— My most respectful compliments to Mrs. Hamilton, Miss Kennedy, and Doctor Mackenzie. I shall probably write him from some stage or other.

I am ever, Sir,

Yours most gratefully,

R. B.

No. LXIX.

TO MR. WALKER,

BLAIR OF ATHOLE.

Inverness, 5th September, 1787.

MY DEAR SIR :

I HAVE just time to write the foregoing, † and to tell you that it was (at least most part of it) the effusion of a half-hour I spent at Bruar. I do not mean it was extempore, for I have endeavoured to brush it up as well as Mr. Nicol's chat and the jogging of the chaise would allow. It eases my heart a good deal, as rhyme is the coin with which a poet pays his debts of honour or gratitude. What I owe to the noble family of Athole, of the first kind, I shall ever proudly boast ; what I owe of the last, so help me God in my hour of need ! I shall never forget.

The “ little angel-band !” I declare I prayed for them very sincerely to-day at the Fall of Fyers. I shall never forget the fine family-piece I saw at Blair ; the amiable, the truly noble duchess, ‡ with her smiling little seraph in her lap, at the head of the table : the lovely “ olive plants,” as the Hebrew bard finely says, round the happy mother : the beautiful Mrs. G— ; the lovely, sweet Miss C. &c. I wish I had the powers of Guido to do them justice ! My Lord Duke's kind hospitality—markedly kind indeed. Mr. Graham of Fintray's charms of conversation—Sir W. Murray's friendship. In short, the recollection of all that polite, agreeable company raises an honest glow in my bosom.

R. B.

[Mr. Walker, to whom this letter is addressed, was Tutor to the children of the Duke of Athol. He afterwards became Professor of Humanity (Classical Literature) in the University of Glasgow. He was a native of Ayr-shire, and an accomplished scholar and gentleman. Happening to be in Edinburgh when Burns made his first appearance there, he sought his acquaintance, and was his frequent companion at the tables of Blair and Stewart. On his third and last excursion into the Highlands, the Poet found Walker an useful and prudent friend. With considerable tact he separated Burns from Nicol ; and, having provided the latter with a fishing-rod and some choice wine to drink by the secluded pools of the Bruar, carried the bard into the company of the ladies of the house of Athole, and made him acquainted with Graham of Fintray. He visited him, too, at Dumfries, and, when the copyright of Currie's edition had expired, he wrote, with considerable taste and feeling, his life anew, and edited his poems. All that passed under his own eye the Professor related with dramatic truth and ease : his account of Burns at the table of Dr. Blair, and of his two days' conversation with him in 1795, are fine specimens of his talents. He died in 1831.— CUNNINGHAM.]

No. LXX.

TO MR. GILBERT BURNS

Edinburgh, 17th September, 1787.

MY DEAR BROTHER :

I ARRIVED here safe yesterday evening, after a tour of twenty-two days, and travelling near § [Miss Charlotte Hamilton was celebrated by Burns in his charming song, “ The Banks of the Devon.” She became the wife of Dr. Adair, physician in Harrowgate, and has been dead for some years.]

* [Son of Mr. Gavin Hamilton—the “ wee curlie Johnnie” of The Dedication, now [1840] residing in London.]

† [The Humble Petition of Bruar-water. See page 275.]

‡ [Jane, daughter of Charles, ninth Lord Cathcart. The “ little angel band” consisted of Lady Charlotte Murray, aged twelve, afterwards the wife of Sir John Menzies of Castle-Menzies ; Lady Amelia, aged seven, now Viscountess Strathallan ; and Lady Elizabeth, an infant of five months, now Lady Macgregor Murray of Lanrick.]

six hundred miles, windings included. My farthest stretch was about ten miles beyond Inverness. I went through the heart of the Highlands by Crieff, Taymouth, the famous seat of Lord Breadalbane, down the Tay, among cascades and Druidical circles of stones, to Dunkeld, a seat of the Duke of Athole; thence across Tay, and up one of his tributary streams to Blair of Athole, another of the duke's seats, where I had the honour of spending nearly two days with his Grace and family; thence many miles through a wild country among cliffs grey with eternal snows and gloomy savage glens, till I crossed Spey and went down the stream through Strathspey, so famous in Scottish music;* Badenoch, &c., till I reached Grant Castle, where I spent half a day with Sir James Grant and family; and then crossed the country for Fort George, but called by the way at Cawdor, the ancient seat of Macbeth; there I saw the identical bed in which tradition says king Duncan was murdered: lastly, from Fort George to Inverness.

I returned by the coast, through Nairn, Forres, and so on, to Aberdeen, thence to Stonehive,† where James Burness, from Montrose, met me by appointment. I spent two days among our relations, and found our aunts, Jean and Isabel, still alive, and hale old women. John Cairn, though born the same year with our father, walks as vigorously as I can—they have had several letters from his son in New York. William Brand is likewise a stout old fellow; but further particulars I delay till I see you, which will be in two or three weeks. The rest of my stages are not worth rehearsing: warm as I was from Ossian's country, where I had seen his very grave, what cared I for fishing-towns or fertile carse? I slept at the famous Brodie of Brodie's one night, and dined at Gordon Castle next day, with the duke, duchess, and family. I am thinking to cause my old mare to meet me, by means of John Ronald, at Glasgow; but you shall hear farther from me before I leave Edinburgh. My duty and many compliments from the north to my mother; and my brotherly compliments to the rest. I have been trying for a berth for William, but am not likely to be successful. Farewell.

R. B.

[The Bard's own account of this Highland Tour to his brother, as communicated in the

* [A quick kind of dancing tunes are called Strathspeys, from this vale, the place of their nativity.]

† [Stonehaven.]

‡ [To this young lady the Poet addressed twelve or fourteen letters, most of them in his happiest manner. They contained it seems so many allusions to the beauty and so many compliments to the acquirements of Charlotte Hamilton, as was displeasing to

“The fairest maid on Devon's banks.”

In a moment of prejudice or passion, she threw the original letter, is highly characteristic and expressive of his feelings at that time. He well knew in what light the prudent Gilbert would view those dashing expensive journeys. Gilbert was a calm, considerate, and sensible man, with next to nothing of the enthusiast or the Poet in his nature: he was as unlikely to enter into the high musings and raptures of Robert as to carry conviviality to excess. As a critic and editor, he displayed considerable taste, feeling, and knowledge: his merits as a farmer stand on a sure foundation, though some men of the west aver that he was too much of an arm-chair agriculturist. The fame of his brother, as well as his own merits, helped him onwards: he died in 1827, much and widely respected.

“The letters that passed between Gilbert and his brother are among the most precious of the series—here there could be no disguise. That the brothers had entire knowledge of, and confidence in, each other, no one can doubt; and the plain, manly, affectionate language in which they both write is truly honourable to them and to the parents who reared them.”—LOCKHART.]

No. LXXI.

TO MISS MARGARET CHALMERS,‡

[NOW MRS. HAY, OF EDINBURGH.]

Sept. 26, 1787.

I SEND Charlotte the first number of the songs; I would not wait for the second number; I hate delays in little marks of friendship, as I hate dissimulation in the language of the heart. I am determined to pay Charlotte a poetic compliment, if I could hit on some glorious old Scotch air, in number second.§ You will see a small attempt on a shred of paper in the book; but though Dr. Blacklock commended it very highly, I am not just satisfied with it myself. I intend to make it a description of some kind: the whining cant of love, except in real passion, and by a masterly hand, is to me as insufferable as the preaching cant of old Father Smeaton, whig-minister at Kilmaurs. Darts, flames, Cupids, loves, graces, and all that farrago, are just a Mauchline * * * * a senseless rabble.

I got an excellent poetic epistle yesternight from the old, venerable author of “Tullochgorum,” “John of Badenyon,” &c.|| I supnals into the fire; and nothing was saved except such fragments as were found among the Bard's memoranda. They appear in the order of their dates. Miss Margaret Chalmers was the youngest daughter of the deceased James Chalmers, Esq., of Fingland. She married, December 9th, 1788, Lewis Hay, Esq. of the banking firm of Sir William Forbes, James Hunter, and Company, Edinburgh. Mrs. Hay afterwards resided at Pau, in the South of France.]

§ Of the Scots Musical Museum.

|| [The Rev. John Skinner, episcopal minister at Longside, near Peterhead.]

pose you know he is a clergyman. It is by far the finest poetic compliment I ever got. I will send you a copy of it.

I go on Thursday or Friday to Dumfries, to wait on Mr. Miller about his farms.—Do tell that to Lady Mackenzie, that she may give me credit for a little wisdom. “I wisdom dwell with Prudence.” What a blessed fire-side!—How happy should I be to pass a winter evening under their venerable roof! and smoke a pipe of tobacco, or drink water-gruel with them! What solemn, lengthened, laughter-quashing gravity of phiz! What sage remarks on the good-for-nothing sons and daughters of indiscretion and folly! And what frugal lessons, as we straitened the fire-side circle, on the uses of the poker and tongs!

Miss N. is very well, and begs to be remembered in the old way to you. I used all my eloquence, all the persuasive flourishes of the hand, and heart-melting modulation of periods in my power, to urge her out of Harvieston, but all in vain. My rhetoric seems quite to have lost its effect on the lovely half of mankind.—I have seen the day—but that is a “tale of other years.”—In my conscience I believe that my heart has been so oft on fire that it is absolutely vitrified. I look on the sex with something like the admiration with which I regard the starry sky in a frosty December night. I admire the beauty of the Creator’s workmanship; I am charmed with the wild but graceful eccentricity of their motions, and—wish them good night. I mean this with respect to a certain passion dont j’ai eu l’honneur d’être un miserable esclave: as for friendship, you and Charlotte have given me pleasure, permanent pleasure, “which the world cannot give, nor take away,” I hope; and which will outlast the heavens and the earth.

R. B.

 No. LXXII.

TO THE SAME.

Without date.

I HAVE been at Dumfries, and at one visit more shall be decided about a farm in that country. I am rather hopeless in it; but as my brother is an excellent farmer, and is, besides, an exceedingly prudent, sober man (qualities which are only a younger brother’s fortune in our family), I am determined, if my Dumfries business fail me, to return into partnership with him, and at our leisure take another farm in the neighbourhood.

I assure you I look for high compliments from you and Charlotte on this very sage instance of my unfathomable, incomprehensible wisdom. Talking of Charlotte, I must tell her that I have, to the best of my power, paid her a poetic compliment, now completed. The air is admirable: true old Highland. It was the tune of a Gaelic song, which an Inverness lady sang me when I was there; and I was so charmed with it that I begged her to write me a set of it from her singing; for it had never been set before. I am fixed that it shall go in Johnson’s next number; so Charlotte and you need not spend your precious time in contradicting me. I won’t say the poetry is first-rate; though I am convinced it is very well; and, what is not always the case with compliments to ladies, it is not only sincere, but just.

[Here follows the song of “The Banks of the Devon.”—See page 369.]

R. B.

 No. LXXIII.

TO JAMES HOY, Esq.

GORDON CASTLE.

Edinburgh, 20th October, 1787.

SIR:

I will defend my conduct in giving you this trouble, on the best of Christian principles—“Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even unto them.”—I shall certainly, among my legacies, leave my latest curse on that unlucky predicament which hurried—tore me away from Castle Gordon. May that obstinate son of Latin prose [Nicoll] be curst to Scotch mile periods, and damned to seven league paragraphs; while Declension and Conjugation, Gender, Number, and Time, under the ragged banners of Dissonance and Disarrangement, eternally rank against him in hostile array.

Allow me, Sir, to strengthen the small claim I have to your acquaintance, by the following request. An engraver, James Johnson, in Edinburgh, has, not from mercenary views, but from an honest Scotch enthusiasm, set about collecting all our native songs and setting them to music; particularly those that have never been set before. Clarke, the well known musician, presides over the musical arrangement, and Drs. Beattie and Blacklock, Mr. Tytler of Woodhouselee, and your humble servant to the utmost of his small power, assist in collecting the old poetry, or sometimes for a fine air make a stanza, when it has no words. The brats, too tedious to mention, claim a parental pang from my bardship. I suppose it will appear in Johnson’s second number—the first was published before my acquaintance with him. My request is—“Cauld Kail in Aberdeen” is one intended for this number, and I beg a copy of his Grace of Gordon’s words to it, which you were so kind as to repeat to me.* You may be sure we won't prefix the author's name, except you like, though I look on it as no small merit to this work that the names of many of the authors of our old Scotch songs, names almost forgotten, will be inserted. I do not well know where to write to you—I rather write at you; but if you will be so obliging, immediately on receipt of this, as to write me a few lines, I shall perhaps pay you in kind, though not in quality. Johnson's terms are:—each number a handsome pocket volume, to consist at least of a hundred Scotch songs, with basses for the harpsichord, &c. The price to subscribers, 5s.; to non-subscribers 6s. He will have three numbers, I conjecture.

My direction for two or three weeks will be at Mr. William Cruikshank's, St. James's-square, New-town Edinburgh.

I am.—

Sir,

Your's to command,

R. B.

The answer to the above letter is as follows:—

Gordon Castle, October 31st, 1787.

[SIR:

If you were not sensible of your fault as well as of your loss, in leaving this place so suddenly, I should condemn you to starve upon cauld kail for ae towmont at least; and as for Dick Latine [Mr. Nicol], your travelling companion, without banning him wi' a' the curses contained in your letter (which he'll no value a banbee) I should give him nought but Stra' bogie castocks to chew for sax ouks, or aye until he was as sensible of his error as you seem to be of yours.

* * * *

Your song [Bonnie Castle Gordon] I shewed without producing the author; and it was judged by the Duchess to be the production of Dr. Beattie. I sent a copy of it by her Grace's desire to a Mrs. M'Pherson, in Badenoch, who sings Morag, and all other Gaelic songs, in great perfection. I have recorded it likewise, by Lady Charlotte's desire, in a book belonging to her Ladyship; where it is in company with a great many other poems and verses, some of the writers of which are no less eminent for their political than for their poetical abilities. When the Duchess was informed that you were the author, she wished you had written the verses in Scotch.

Any letter directed to me here will come to hand safely; and, if sent under the Duke's

* [Alexander, fourth Duke of Gordon, who entertained Burns at Gordon Castle, possessed considerable abilities for song writing, though few of his verses have been made pubcover, it will likewise come free; that is, as long as the Duke is in this country.

I am, Sir, yours sincerely,
JAMES HOY.]

No. LXXIV.

TO REV. JOHN SKINNER.

Edinburgh, October 25, 1787.

REVEREND AND VENERABLE SIR:

ACCEPT, in plain dull prose, my most sincere thanks for the best poetical compliment I ever received. I assure you, Sir, as a poet, you have conjured up an airy demon of vanity in my fancy, which the best abilities in your other capacity would be ill able to lay. I regret, and while I live I shall regret, that, when I was in the north, I had not the pleasure of paying a younger brother's dutiful respect to the author of the best Scotch song ever Scotland saw—"Tullochgorum's my delight!" The world may think slightly of the craft of song-making, if they please, but, as Job says—"O! that mine adversary had written a book!"—let them try. There is a certain something in the old Scotch songs, a wild happiness of thought and expression, which peculiarly marks them, not only from English songs, but also from the modern efforts of song-wrights, in our native manner and language. The only remains of this enchantment, these spells of the imagination, rest with you. Our true brother, Ross of Lochlea, was likewise "owre cannie"—a "wild warlock"—but now he sings among the "sons of the morning."

I have often wished, and will certainly endeavour, to form a kind of common acquaintance among all the genuine sons of Caledonian song. The world, busy in low prosaic pursuits, may overlook most of us; but "reverence thyself." The world is not our peers, so we challenge the jury. We can lash that world, and find ourselves a very great source of amusement and happiness independent of that world.

There is a work going on in Edinburgh, just now, which claims your best assistance. An engraver in this town has set about collecting and publishing all the Scotch songs, with the music, that can be found. Songs in the English language, if by Scotchmen, are admitted, but the music must all be Scotch. Drs. Beattie and Blacklock are lending a hand, and the first musician in town presides over that department. I have been absolutely crazed about it, collecting old stanzas, and every information remaining respecting their origin, authors, &c. &c. This last is but a very fragment business; but at the end of his second number—the first is already published—a small

lic. The song alluded to by Burns seems to have been obtained from Mr. Hoy, as it appears in the second volume of the Museum.]

account will be given of the authors, particularly to preserve those of latter times. Your three songs, "Tullochgorum," "John of Badenyon," and "Ewie wi' the crookit Horn," go in this second number. I was determined, before I got your letter, to write you, begging that you would let me know where the editions of these pieces may be found, as you would wish them to continue in future times; and if you would be so kind to this undertaking as send any songs, of your own or others, that you would think proper to publish, your name will be inserted among the other authors,—“Nill ye, will ye.” One half of Scotland already give your songs to other authors. Paper is done. I beg to hear from

* [The Poet summoned almost all the Bards of Caledonia to aid him in providing words for the Scottish airs in Johnson's Musical Museum. The songs of "Tullochgorum" and "John of Badenyon" have made the name of Skinner dear to all the lovers of Scottish poetry. He was a man cheerful and pious, and performed his duties as episcopal pastor of Longside for nearly sixty-five years. Burns met his son, afterwards Bishop of Aberdeen, during his last tour in the north, and lamented that he did not know where Linshart—his father's residence—lay, as he would have gone twenty miles out of his way to have seen the author of "Tullochgorum." The poetical works of Skinner were collected soon after his death, on the 16th of June, 1807, and published in Edinburgh. He was a wit as well as a priest and poet. His grandson, John, paid less regard to his lessons than he wished: he suddenly desisted from instructing him, and said—"Oh! I forgot the old prophecy—Thomas the Rhymmer has settled the matter—I shall trouble myself no farther." The boy turned to his grandfather, and said, "What has he said of me, grandpapa?"—"O! more than I like; ye shall hear—

"The world shall four John Skinners see,
The first shall teach a school;
The other two shall parsons be,
The fourth shall be a fool!"

John Skinner the fourth flew to his task, and became a learned man.—CUNNINGHAM.

The following is Mr. Skinner's reply to Burns:—

Linshart, November 14th, 1787.

SIR,

Your kind letter, without date, but of post-mark October 25th, came to hand only this day; and, to testify my punctuality to my poetic engagement, I sit down immediately to answer it in kind.

Your acknowledgment of my poor but just encomiums on your surprising genius, and your opinion of my rhyming excursions, are both, I think, by far too high. The difference between our two tracts of education and ways of life is entirely in your favour, and gives you the preference every manner of way. I know a classical education will not create a versifying taste, but it mightily improves and assists it;—and though, where both these meet, there may sometimes be ground for approbation, yet where taste appears single, as it were, and neither cramped nor supported by acquisition, I will always sustain the justice of its prior claim to applause. A small portion of taste, this way, I have had almost from childhood, especially in the old Scottish dialect; and it is as old a thing as I remember, my fondness for "Christ's-kirk on the green," which I had by heart ere I was twelve years of age, and which some year ago I attempted to turn into Latin verse. While I was young, I dabbled a good deal in these things: but on getting the black gown I gave it pretty much over, 'till my daughters grew up, who, being all good singers, plagued me for words to some of their favourite tunes, and so extorted these effusions, which have made a public appearance beyond my expectations, and contrary to my intentions, at the same time that I hope there is nothing to be found in them uncharacteristic, or unbecoming the cloth, which I would always wish to see respected.

As to the assistance you propose from me in the undertaking you are engaged in [his collection of Scottish songs], I am sorry I cannot give it so far as I could wish, and you, you; the sooner the better, as I leave Edinburgh in a fortnight or three weeks.—I am,

With the warmest sincerity,
Your obliged humble servant,—R. B.

No. LXXV.

TO JAMES HOY, Esq.

GORDON CASTLE.†

Edinburgh, 6th November, 1787.

DEAR SIR:

I WOULD have wrote you immediately on receipt of your kind letter, but a mixed impulse perhaps, expect. My daughters, who were my only intelligencers, are all foris familiate, and the old woman, their mother, has lost that taste. There are two from my own pen, which I might give you, if worth the while. One to the old Scottish tune of Dumbarton drums. The other, perhaps, you have met with, as your noble friend, the Duchess, has, I am told, heard of it. It was squeezed out of me by a brother parson in her neighbourhood, to accommodate a new Highland reel for the Marquis's birth-day, to the stanza of "Tune your fiddles, tune them sweetly," &c.

If this last answer your purpose, you may have it from a brother of mine, Mr. James Skinner, Writer, in Edinburgh, who I believe can give the music too.

There is another humorous thing, I have heard said to be done by the Catholic priest, Geddes, and which hit my taste much.

"There was a wee wifekie, was coming frae the fair,
Had gotten a little drapikie, which bred her meikle care;
It took upo' the wife's heart, and she began to spue,
And quo' the wee wifekie, 'I wish I binna fou,' &c.

I have heard of another new composition, by a young ploughman of my acquaintance, that I am vastly pleased with, to the tune of The humours of Glen, which I fear won't do, as the music, I am told, is of Irish original. I have mentioned these, such as they are, to show you my readiness to oblige you, and to contribute my mite, if I could, to the patriotic work you have in hand, and which I wish all success to. You have only to notify your mind, and what you want of the above shall be sent you.

Meantime, while you are thus employed, do not sheath your own proper and piercing weapon. From what I have seen of yours already, I am inclined to hope for much good. One lesson of virtue and morality delivered in your amusing style, and from such as you, will operate more than dozens would do from such as me, who shall be told it is our employment, and be never more minded: whereas, from a pen like yours, as being one of the many, what comes will be admired. Admiration will produce regard, and regard will leave an impression, especially when example goes along.

Now binna saying I'm ill-bred,
Else, by my troth, I'll no be glad;
For cadgers, ye have heard it said,
And sic like fry,
Maun ye be harland in their trade,
And sae maun I.

Wishing you, from my poet-pen, all success, and in my other character, all happiness and heavenly direction,

I remain, with esteem,

Your sincere friend,

JOHN SKINNER.†]

† [James Hoy, librarian to the Duke of Gordon, was in all respects a very remarkable character: in singleness of heart and simplicity of manners he rivalled Dominic Sampson; nor did a forty years' intercourse with the wealthy and the far-descended work any change in his manners—the originality of the man was neither smoothed nor softened, nor of gratitude and esteem whispered to me that I ought to send you something by way of return. When a poet owes anything, particularly when he is indebted for good offices, the payment that usually recurs to him—the only coin indeed in which he is probably conversant—is rhyme. Johnson sends the books by the fly, as directed, and begs me to enclose his most grateful thanks: my return I intended should have been one or two poetic bagatelles which the world have not seen, or, perhaps, for obvious reasons, cannot see. These I shall send you before I leave Edinburgh. They may make you laugh a little, which, on the whole, is no bad way of spending one's precious hours and still more precious breath: at any rate, they will be, though a small, yet a very sincere mark of my respectful esteem for a gentleman whose farther acquaintance I should look upon as a peculiar obligation.

The duke's song, independent totally of his dukeship, charms me. There is I know not what of wild happiness of thought and expression peculiarly beautiful in the old Scottish song style, of which his Grace, old venerable Skinner, the author of "Tullochgorum," &c., and the late Ross, of Lochilea, of true Scottish poetic memory, are the only modern instances that I recollect, since Ramsay with his contemporaries, and poor Bob Fergusson went to the world of deathless existence and truly immortal song. The mob of mankind, that many-headed beast, would laugh at so serious a speech about an old song; but, as Job says, "O that mine adversary had written a book!" Those who think that composing a Scotch song is a trifling business—let them try.

I wish my Lord Duke would pay a proper attention to the Christian admonition—"Hide not your candle under a bushel," but "Let your light shine before men." I could name half a dozen dukes that I guess are a devilish deal worse employed; nay, I question if there are half a dozen better: perhaps there are not half that scanty number whom Heaven has favoured with the tuneful, happy, and, I will say, glorious gift.

I am, dear Sir,

Your obliged humble servant,

R. B.

No. LXXVI.

TO Miss M——N.

November, 1787.

Saturday Noon, No. 2, St. James's Square,
New Town, Edinburgh.

HERE have I sat, my dear Madam, in the stony altitude of perplexed study for fifteen vexatious minutes, my head askew, bending over the intended card; my fixed eye insensible to the very light of day poured around; my pendulous goose-feather, loaded with ink, hanging over the future letter, all for the important purpose of writing a complimentary card to accompany your trinket.

Compliment is such a miserable Greenland expression, lies at such a chilly polar distance from the torrid zone of my constitution, that I cannot, for the very soul of me, use it to any person for whom I have the twentieth part of the esteem every one must have for you who knows you.

As I leave town in three or four days, I can give myself the pleasure of calling on you only for a minute. Tuesday evening, some time about seven or after, I shall wait on you for your farewell commands.

The hinge of your box I put into the hands of the proper connoisseur; but it is, like Willy Gaw's Skate, past redemption. The broken glass, likewise, went under review; but deliberative wisdom thought it would too much endanger the whole fabric.

I am, dear Madam,

With all the sincerity of enthusiasm,

Your very obedient servant,

R. B.

[Concerning the name of this lady inquiries have been made in vain. The communication appeared, for the first time, in "Burns' Letters to Clarinda." The import of those celebrated letters has been much misrepresented; they are sentimental flirtations chiefly—a sort of Corydon-and-Phyllis affair, with here and there passages over-warm, and expressions too graphic, such as all had to endure who were honoured with the correspondence of Burns.—CUNNINGHAM.]

did it lessen in the least his stoical indifference to riches. His love of learning, and the example of simplicity and virtue which he exhibited, gained him respect far and wide:—the Duke's library was to him a castle, nor did he love to leave his command, save when on Sunday he rode to Elgin, to attend the Seceder meeting-house, for he was a zealous dissenter from the established kirk. It was the business of Hoy, during the day, to store his mind with all such knowledge as the publications of the time supplied, and then over a bottle of claret, after dinner, impart to his Grace of Gordon all that he reckoned valuable or important. He studied astronomy, entomology, and botany, and made valuable observations on each: if he despised wealth, he was equally indifferent about fame; his self-denial regarding all things that worldly men valued was wonderful. Burns was delighted with his blunt straight-forward manner; and the librarian strove, it is said, to re-pay it by giving the postboy a crown to contrive, no matter how, to stop the Bard's departure from Fochabers. The fierce impetuosity of Nicol prevented this."—ROBERT CARRUTHERS.]

No. LXXVII.
TO Miss CHALMERS.

Edinburgh, Nov. 21, 1787.

I HAVE one vexatious fault to the kindly-welcome, well-filled sheet which I owe to your and Charlotte's* goodness—it contains too much sense, sentiment, and good-spelling. It is impossible that even you two, whom I declare to my God I will give credit for any degree of excellence the sex are capable of attaining, it is impossible you can go on to correspond at that rate; so, like those who, Shenstone says, retire because they have made a good speech, I shall, after a few letters, hear no more of you. I insist that you shall write whatever comes first: what you see, what you read, what you hear, what you admire, what you dislike, trifles, bagatelles, nonsense; or to fill up a corner, e'en put down a laugh at full length. Now none of your polite hints about flattery: I leave that to your lovers, if you have or shall have any; though, thank heaven, I have found at last two girls who can be luxuriantly happy in their own minds and with one another, without that commonly necessary appendage to female bliss—A LOVER.

Charlotte and you are just two favourite resting-places for my soul in her wanderings through the weary, thorny wilderness of this world. God knows I am ill-fitted for the struggle: I glory in being a Poet, and I want to be thought a wise man—I would fondly be generous, and I wish to be rich. After all, I am afraid I am a lost subject. "Some folk hae a hantle o' fauts, an' I'm but a ne'er-do-weel."

Afternoon—To close the melancholy reflections at the end of last sheet, I shall just add a piece of devotion commonly known in Carrick by the title of the "Wabster's grace:"—

"Some say we're thieves, and e'en sae are we,
Some say we lie, and e'en sae do we!
Gude forgie us, and I hope sae will he!
—Up and to your looms, lads."

R. B.

No. LXXVIII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE,
EDINBURGH.

*Edinburgh, Sunday Morning,
Nov. 23, 1787.*

I BEG, my dear Sir, you would not make any appointment to take us to Mr. Ainslie's to-night. On looking over my engagements, constitution, present state of my health, some little vexatious soul concerns, &c., I find I can't sup abroad to-night. I shall be in to-day till one o'clock if you have a leisure hour.

* [Miss Hamilton.]

You will think it romantic when I tell you that I find the idea of your friendship almost necessary to my existence.—You assume a proper length of face in my bitter hours of blue-devilism, and you laugh fully up to my highest wishes at my good things.—I don't know, upon the whole, if you are one of the first fellows in God's world, but you are so to me. I tell you this just now in the conviction that some inequalities in my temper and manner may perhaps sometimes make you suspect that I am not so warmly as I ought to be your friend.

R. B.

No. LXXIX.

TO ROBERT AINSLIE.

Mauchline, ——— 1787.

MY DEAR AINSLIE:

THERE is one thing for which I set great store by you as a friend, and it is this: "I have not a friend upon earth, besides yourself, to whom I can talk nonsense without forfeiting some degree of esteem. Now, to one like me, who never weighs what he says, such a friend is a valuable treasure. I was never a knave, but I have been a fool all my life, and, in spite of all my endeavours, I see now plainly that I shall never be wise. Now it rejoices my heart to have met with such a fellow as you, who, though you are not just such a hopeless fool as I, yet I trust you will never listen so much to the temptation of the devil, as to grow so very wise that you will in the least disrespect an honest fellow, because he is a fool. In short, I have set you down as the staff of my old age, when the whole host of my friends will, after a decent show of pity, have forgot me.

'Though in the morn comes sturt and strife,
Yet joy may come ere noon;
And I hope to live a merry, merry life,
When a' their days are done.'

Write me soon, were it but a few lines, just to tell me how that good sagacious man your father is—that kind dainty body your mother—that strapping child your brother Douglas—and my friend Rachael, who is as far beyond Rachael of old as she was before her blue-eyed sister Leah.

R. B.

No. LXXX.

TO JAMES DALRYMPLE, Esq.,

ORANGEFIELD.

Edinburgh, 1787.

DEAR SIR:

I SUPPOSE the devil is so elated with his success with you that he is determined by a coup de main to complete his purposes on you all at once, in making you a poet. I broke open the letter you sent me; hummed over the rhymes; and, as I saw they were extempore, said to myself, they were very well; but when I saw at the bottom a name that I shall ever value with grateful respect, "I gapit wide, but naething spak." I was nearly as much struck as the friends of Job, of affliction-bearing memory, when they sat down with him seven days and seven nights, and spake not a word.

I am naturally of a superstitious cast, and as soon as my wonder-seared imagination regained its consciousness, and resumed its functions, I cast about what this mania of yours might portend. My foreboding ideas had the wide stretch of possibility; and several events, great in their magnitude, and important in their consequences, occurred to my fancy. The downfall of the conclave, or the crushing of the Cork rumps; a ducal coronet to Lord George Gordon, and the protestant interest; or St. Peter's keys, to * * * * *

You want to know how I come on. I am just in statu quo, or, not to insult a gentleman with my Latin, in "auld use and wont." The noble Earl of Glencairn took me by the hand to-day, and interested himself in my concerns, with a goodness like that benevolent being, whose image he so richly bears. He is a stronger proof of the immortality of the soul than any that philosophy ever produced. A mind like his can never die. Let the worshipful squire H. L., or the reverend Mass J. M. go into their primitive nothing. At best, they are but ill-digested lumps of chaos, only one of them strongly tinged with bituminous particles and sulphureous effluvia. But my noble patron, eternal as the heroic swell of magnanimity, and the generous throb of benevolence, shall look on with princely eye at "the war of elements, the wreck of matter, and the crash of worlds."*

R. B.

No. LXXXI.

TO THE EARL OF GLENCAIRN.

Edinburgh, December, 1787.

MY LORD:

I KNOW your lordship will disapprove of my ideas in a request I am going to make to you; but I have weighed, long and seriously weighed, my situation, my hopes and turn of mind, and am fully fixed to my scheme if I can possibly effectuate it. I wish to get into the Excise; I am told that your lordship's interest will easily procure me the grant from the commissioners; and your lordship's patronage and goodness, which have already rescued me from obscurity, wretchedness, and exile, embolden me to ask that interest. You have likewise put it in my power to save the little tie of home that sheltered an aged mother, two brothers, and three sisters from destruction. There, my lord, you have bound me over to the highest gratitude.

My brother's farm is but a wretched lease, but I think he will probably weather out the remaining seven years of it; and, after the assistance which I have given and will give him, to keep the family together, I think, by my guess, I shall have rather better than two hundred pounds, and instead of seeking, what is almost impossible at present to find, a farm that I can certainly live by, with so small a stock, I shall lodge this sum in a banking-house, a sacred deposit, excepting only the calls of uncommon distress or necessitous old age.

These, my lord, are my views: I have resolved from the maturest deliberation; and now I am fixed, I shall leave no stone unturned to carry my resolve into execution. Your lordship's patronage is the strength of my hopes; nor have I yet applied to any body else. Indeed my heart sinks within me at the idea of applying to any other of the great who have honoured me with their countenance. I am ill-qualified to dog the heels of greatness with the impertinence of solicitation, and tremble nearly as much at the thought of the cold promise as the cold denial; but to your lordship I have not only the honour, the comfort, but the pleasure of being

Your lordship's much obliged

And deeply indebted humble servant,

R. B.

[For some notice of this nobleman, see "The Poet's Lament," page 309.]

No. LXXXII.

TO MISS CHALMERS.

Edinburgh, Dec. 12, 1787.

I AM here under the care of a surgeon, with a bruised limb extended on a cushion; and the tints of my mind vying with the livid horror preceding a midnight thunder-storm. A drunken coachman was the cause of the first, and incomparably the lightest evil; misfortune, bodily constitution, hell, and myself, have formed a "quadruple alliance" to guarantee the other.

* [James Dalrymple, Esq. of Orangefield, interested himself in the fortunes of Burns; he was a gentleman by birth, and, as this letter intimates, something of a poet.

Who the worshipful squire H. L. was we have not been told; Mass J. M. was probably Mr. Moodie, minister of Riccarton.—CUNNINGHAM.]

I got my fall on Saturday, and am getting slowly better.

I have taken tooth and nail to the Bible, and am got through the five books of Moses, and half way in Joshua. It is really a glorious book. I sent for my book-binder to-day, and ordered him to get me an octavo Bible in sheets, the best paper and print in town; and bind it with all the elegance of his craft.

I would give my best song to my worst enemy, I mean the merit of making it, to have you and Charlotte by me. You are angelic creatures, and would pour oil and wine into my wounded spirit.

I enclose you a proof copy of the "Banks of the Devon," which present with my best wishes to Charlotte. The "Ochil-hills"* you shall probably have next week for yourself.—None of your fine speeches!

R. B.

No. LXXXIII.

TO THE SAME.

Edinburgh, Dec. 19, 1787.

I BEGIN this letter in answer to your's of the 17th current, which is not yet cold since I read it. The atmosphere of my soul is vastly clearer than when I wrote you last. For the first time, yesterday I crossed the room on crutches. It would do your heart good to see my bardship, not on my poetic, but on my oaken, stilts; throwing my best leg with an air! and with as much hilarity in my gait and countenance as a May frog leaping across the newly harrowed ridge, enjoying the fragrance of the refreshed earth, after the long-expected shower!

I can't say I am altogether at my ease when I see any where in my path that meagre, squallid, famine-faced spectre, poverty; attended, as he always is, by iron-fisted oppression, and leering contempt; but I have sturdily withstood his buffetings many a hard-laboured day already, and still my motto is—I DARE! My worst enemy is moi-meme. I lie so miserably open to the inroads and incursions of a mischievous, light-armed, well-mounted banditti, under the banners of imagination, whim, caprice, and passion: and the heavy-armed veteran regulars of wisdom, prudence, and forethought move so very, very slow, that I am almost in a state of perpetual warfare, and, alas! frequent defeat. There are just two creatures I would envy, a horse in his wild state, traversing the forests of Asia, or an oyster on some of the desert shores of Europe. The one has not a wish without enjoyment, the other has neither wish nor fear.

R. B.

No. LXXXIV.

TO CHARLES HAY, Esq.,

ADVOCATE,†

ENCLOSING VERSES ON THE DEATH OF THE LORD PRESIDENT.

December, 1787.

SIR:

THE enclosed poem was written in consequence of your suggestion, last time I had the pleasure of seeing you. It cost me an hour or two of next morning's sleep, but did not please me; so it lay by, an ill-digested effort, till the other day that I gave it a critic brush.

These kind of subjects are much hackneyed; and, besides, the wailings of the rhyming tribe over the ashes of the great are cursedly suspicious, and out of all character for sincerity.—These ideas damped my muse's fire; however, I have done the best I could, and, at all events, it gives me an opportunity of declaring that I have the honour to be,

Sir,
Your obliged humble Servant,
R. B.

LXXXV.

TO SIR JOHN WHITEFOORD.

Edinburgh, December, 1787.

SIR:

MR. MACKENZIE, in Mauchline, my very warm and worthy friend, has informed me how much you are pleased to interest yourself in my fate as a man, and (what to me is incomparably dearer) my fame as a poet. I have, Sir, in one or two instances, been patronized by those of your character in life, when I was introduced to their notice by  friends to them, and honoured acquaintances to me; but you are the first gentleman in the country whose benevolence and goodness of heart has interested himself for me, unsolicited and unknown.

I am not master enough of the etiquette of these matters to know, nor did I stay to inquire, whether formal duty bade, or cold propriety disallowed, my thanking you in this manner as I am convinced, from the light in which you kindly view me, that you will do me the justice

* [The song in honour of Miss Chalmers, beginning "Where braving angry winter's storms. See p. 374.]

† [Ultimately a judge, under the designation of Lord

Newton. He died October 19th, 1811, leaving a strong reputation for his bacchanalianism, of which many whimsical anecdotes are told.]

to believe this letter is not the manœuvre of the needy, sharpening author, fastening on those in upper life who honour him with a little notice of him or his works. Indeed, the situation of poets is generally such, to a proverb, as may, in some measure, palliate that prostitution of heart and talents they have at times been guilty of. I do not think prodigality is, by any means, a necessary concomitant of a poetic turn, but I believe a careless, indolent attention to economy is almost inseparable from it; then there must be, in the heart of every bard of Nature's making, a certain modest sensibility, mixed with a kind of pride, that will ever keep him out of the way of those windfalls of fortune which frequently light on hardy impudence and foot-licking servility. It is not easy to imagine a more helpless state than his whose poetic fancy unfits him for the world, and whose character as a scholar gives him some pretensions to the politesse of life—yet is as poor as I am.

For my part, I thank Heaven my star has been kinder; learning never elevated my ideas above the peasant's shed, and I have an independent fortune at the plough-tail.

I was surprised to hear that any one who pretended in the least to the manners of the gentleman should be so foolish, or worse, as to stoop to traduce the morals of such a one as I am, and so inhumanly cruel, too, as to meddle with that late most unfortunate, unhappy part of my story. With a tear of gratitude, I thank you, Sir, for the warmth with which you interposed in behalf of my conduct. I am, I acknowledge, too frequently the sport of whim, caprice, and passion, but reverence to God, and integrity to my fellow-creatures, I hope I shall ever preserve. I have no return, Sir, to make you for your goodness but one—a return which, I am persuaded, will not be unacceptable—the honest, warm wishes of a grateful heart for your happiness, and every one of that lovely flock, who stand to you in a filial relation. If ever calumny aim the poisoned shaft at them, may friendship be by to ward the blow!

R. B.

No. LXXXVI.
TO MISS WILLIAMS,*

ON READING THE POEM OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

Edinburgh, Dec. 1787.

I KNOW very little of scientific criticism, so

* [Miss Williams had in the previous June addressed a complimentary epistle to Burns, which appeared in the Edinburgh Magazine for Sept. 1817, when the above letter also appeared for the first time, along with the following note by the Editor—the late Thomas Pringle.

"The Critique, though not without some traits of the poet's usual sound judgment and discrimination, appears on the whole to be much in the strain of those gallant and flattering responses which men of genius sometimes find it incumbent to issue when consulted upon the productions of their female admirers." In one of her letters to Burns, all I can pretend to in that intricate art is merely to note, as I read along, what passages strike me as being uncommonly beautiful, and where the expression seems to be perplexed or faulty.

The poem opens finely. There are none of these idle prefatory lines which one may skip over before one comes to the subject. Verses 9th and 10th in particular,

"Where ocean's unseem bound Leaves a drear world of waters round," are truly beautiful. The simile of the hurricane is likewise fine; and, indeed, beautiful as the poem is, almost all the similes rise decidedly above it. From verse 31st to verse 50th is a pretty eulogy on Britain. Verse 36th, "That foul drama deep with wrong," is nobly expressive. Verse 46th, I am afraid, is rather unworthy of the rest; "to dare to feel" is an idea that I do not altogether like. The contrast of valour and mercy, from the 46th verse to the 50th, is admirable.

Either my apprehension is dull, or there is something a little confused in the apostrophe to Mr. Pitt. Verse 55th is the antecedent to verses 57th and 58th, but in verse 58th the connection seems ungrammatical:—

"Powers * * * * *
* * * * *
With no gradations mark'd their flight,
But rose at once to glory's height."

Ris'n should be the word instead of rose. Try it in prose. Powers,—their flight marked by no gradations, but [the same powers] risen at once to the height of glory. Likewise, verse 53rd, "For this," is evidently meant to lead on the sense of the verses 59th, 60th, 61st, and 62nd: but let us try how the thread of connection runs:—

"For this * * * * *
* * * * *
The deeds of mercy that embrace
A distant sphere, an alien race,
Shall virtue's lips record, and claim
The fairest honours of thy name."

I beg pardon if I misapprehend the matter, but this appears to me the only imperfect passage in the poem. The comparison of the sun-beam is fine.

The compliment to the Duke of Richmond is, I hope, as just as it is certainly elegant. The thought, the poetess, after expressing her admiration of "The Vision," "The Cotter's Saturday Night," and "The Mouse," says—"My mother's family is Scotch, and the dialect has been familiar to me from my infancy; I am, therefore, qualified to taste the charms of your native poetry, and, as I feel the strongest attachment for Scotland, I share the triumph of your country in producing your laurels." The merits of Miss Williams are widely known; nor is it little honour to her muse that her fine song of "Evan Banks" has been imputed to Burns by Cromek and other good judges.—]

"Virtue * * * *
* * * *"

Sends from her unsullied source
The gems of thought their purest force," is exceeding beautiful. The idea, from verse 81st to the 85th, that the "blest degree" is like the beams of morning ushering in the glorious day of liberty, ought not to pass unnoticed or unapplauded. From verse 85th to verse 108th, is an animated contrast between the unfeeling selfishness of the oppressor on the one hand, and the misery of the captive on the other. Verse 88th might perhaps be amended thus: "Nor ever quit her narrow maze." We are said to pass a bound, but we quit a maze. Verse 100th is exquisitely beautiful:—

"They, whom wasted blessings tire."

Verse 110th is I doubt a clashing of metaphors; "to load a span" is, I am afraid, an unwar-rantable expression. In verse 114th, "Cast the universe in shade," is a fine idea. From the 115th verse to the 142nd is a striking description of the wrongs of the poor African. Verse 120th, "The load of unremitted pain," is a remarkable, strong expression. The address to the advocates for abolishing the slave-trade, from verse 143rd to verse 208th is animated with the true life of genius. The picture of oppression,—

"While she links her impious chain,
And calculates the price of pain;
Weighs agony in sordid scales,
And marks if death or life prevails,"— is nobly executed.

What a tender idea is in verse 180th! Indeed, that whole description of home may vie with Thomson's description of home, somewhere in the beginning of his Autumn. I do not remember to have seen a stronger expression of misery than is contained in these verses:—

"Condemned, severe extreme, to live
When all is fled that life can give."

The comparison of our distant joys to distant objects is equally original and striking.

The character and manners of the dealer in the infernal traffic is a well done, though a horrid, picture. I am not sure how far introducing the sailor was right; for, though the sailor's common characteristic is generosity, yet, in this case, he is certainly not only an unconcerned witness, but, in some degree, an efficient agent in the business. Verse 224th is a nervous expressive—"The heart convulsive anguish breaks." The description of the captive wretch when he arrives in the West Indies is carried on with equal spirit. The thought that the oppressor's sorrow, on seeing the slave pine, is like the butcher's regret when his destined lamb dies a natural death, is exceedingly fine.

I am got so much into the cant of criticism that I begin to be afraid lest I have nothing except the cant of it; and, instead of elucidating my author, am only benighting myself. For this reason, I will not pretend to go through the whole poem. Some few remaining beautiful lines, however, I cannot pass over. Verse 280th is the strongest description of selfishness I ever saw. The comparison in verses 285th and 286th is new and fine; and the line, "Your arms to penury you lend," is excellent. In verse 317th, "like" should certainly be "as" or "so;" for instance—

"His sway the hardened bosom leads
To cruelty's remorseless deeds;
As (or, so) the blue lightning when it springs
With fury on its livid wings,
Darts on the goal with rapid force,
Nor heeds that ruin marks its course."

If you insert the word "like" where I have placed "as," you must alter "darts" to "darting," and "heeds" to "heeding," in order to make it grammar. A tempest is a favourite subject with the poets, but I do not remember anything even in Thomson's Winter superior to your verses from the 347th to the 351st. Indeed, the last simile, beginning with "Fancy may dress, &c.," and ending with the 350th verse, is, in my opinion, the most beautiful passage in the poem; it would do honour to the greatest names that ever graced our profession.

I will not beg your pardon, Madam, for these strictures, as my conscience tells me that for once in my life I have acted up to the duties of a Christian, in doing as I would be done by.

R. B.

No. LXXXVII.

TO MR. RICHARD BROWN,*

IRVINE.

Edinburgh, 30th Dec. 1787.

MY DEAR SIR:

I HAVE met with few things in life which have given me more pleasure than Fortune's

* [Richard Brown was the individual whom Burns, in his autobiographical letter to Dr. Moore, describes as his companion at Irvine—who's mind was fraught with every manly virtue, and who, nevertheless, was the means of making him regard illicit love with levity. The morning of his life was indeed changeable and stormy; but fortitude, perseverance, and prudence carried him over the troubled waters, and the afternoon of his existence was tranquil and sunny. He corresponded for a time, as will be seen, with the Poet, and even threatened a visit to Ellisland; but on learning how freely he had been written about in the memoir, he changed his mind, and for many years loved not to allude to the Bard of Kyle. He died lately much respected and regretted in Greenock.

It was in December of this year, as intimated by the above letter that the poet became acquainted with Mrs. Mac Lehosé, kindness to you since those days in which we met in the vale of misery; as I can honestly say that I never knew a man who more truly deserved it, or to whom my heart more truly wished it. I have been much indebted since that time to your story and sentiments for steeling my mind against evils, of which I have had a pretty decent share. My will-o'-wisp fate you know: do you recollect a Sunday we spent together in Eglinton woods? You told me, on my repeating some verses to you, that you wondered I could resist the temptation of sending verses of such merit to a magazine. It was from this remark I derived that idea of my own pieces, which encouraged me to endeavour at the character of a poet. I am happy to hear that you will be two or three months at home. As soon as a bruised limb will permit me, I shall return to Ayr-shire, and we shall meet; "and faith, I hope we'll not sit dumb, nor yet cast out!"

I have much to tell you "of men, their manners, and their ways," perhaps a little of the other sex. Apropos, I beg to be remembered to Mrs. Brown. There I doubt not, my dear friend, but you have found substantial happiness. I expect to find you something of an altered, but not a different, man; the wild, bold, generous young fellow composed into the steady affectionate husband, and the fond careful parent. For me, I am just the same will-o'-wisp being I used to be. About the first and fourth quarters of the moon, I generally set in for the trade wind of wisdom; but about the full and change, I am the luckless victim of mad tornadoes, which blow me into chaos. Almighty love still reigns and revels in my bosom; and I am at this moment ready to hang myself for a young Edinburgh widow,* who has wit and wisdom more murderously fatal than the assassinating stiletto of the Sicilian bandit, or the poisoned arrow of the savage African. My highland dirk, that used to hang beside my crutches, I have gravely removed into a neighbouring closet, the key of which I cannot command in case of spring-tide paroxysms. You may guess of her wit by the following verses, which she sent me the other day. [See note To Clarinda p. 270.]

My best compliments to our friend Allan.—
Adieu!

R. B.

a young, beautiful, and talented woman, residing with an infant family in Edinburgh, while her husband was pushing his fortune in the West Indies. She first met the poet in the house of a common friend in Alison's Square, Potterrow, at tea. The sprightly and intelligent character of the lady made a powerful impression on the poet, and she was in turn pleased to meet a man of such extraordinary genius. A friendship of the intellect and the more refined sentiments

No. LXXXVIII.

TO GAVIN HAMILTON.

Edinburgh, Dec. 1787.

MY DEAR SIR,

IT is indeed with the highest pleasure that I congratulate you on the return of days of ease and nights of pleasure, after the horrid hours of misery in which I saw you suffering existence when last in Ayr-shire. I seldom pray for anybody—"I'm baith dead-sweer and wretched ill o't;" but most fervently do I beseech the Power that directs the world that you may live long and be happy, but live no longer than you are happy. It is needless for me to advise you to have a reverend care of your health. I know you will make it a point never at one time to drink more than a pint of wine (I mean an English pint), and that you will never be witness to more than one bowl of punch at a time, and that cold drams you will never more taste; and, above all things, I am convinced, that after drinking perhaps boiling punch, you will never mount your horse and gallop home in a chill late hour. Above all things, as I understand you are in habits of intimacy with that Boanerges of Gospel powers, Father Auld, be earnest with him that he will wrestle in prayer for you, that you may see the vanity of vanities in trusting to, or even practising the casual moral works of charity, humanity, generosity, and forgiveness of things, which you practised so flagrantly that it was evident you delighted in them, neglecting, or perhaps profanely despising, the wholesome doctrine of faith without works, the only author of salvation. A hymn of thanksgiving would, in my opinion, be highly becoming from you at present, and, in my zeal for your well-being, I earnestly press on you to be diligent in chaunting over the two enclosed pieces of sacred poesy. My best compliments to Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Kennedy.

Yours, &c.,

R. B.

[The memory of Burns is warmly cherished by the descendants of the gentleman to whom this letter is addressed. Dr. Hamilton, of Mauchline, bought at the sale of the furniture of "Auld Nanse Tinnock" the arm-chair in which the Bard was accustomed to sit when he visited her howff, and presented it to the Mason took place between them, and gave rise to a series of letters from Burns, of a peculiarly ardent and eloquent character, which he addressed to the fair lady under the name of Clarinda.]

* [This was a slip of the pen—Burns knew well enough she was a married woman, and that her husband was then in Jamaica.]

Lodge, where it is now the seat for the grand master.

The worthy Doctor, the eldest son of Gavin Hamilton, died in the month of Nov. 1839.]

No. LXXXIX.

TO Miss CHALMERS.

Edinburgh, Dec. 1787.

MY DEAR MADAM:

I JUST now have read yours. The poetic compliments I pay cannot be misunderstood. They are neither of them so particular as to point you out to the world at large; and the circle of your acquaintances will allow all I have said. Besides, I have complimented you chiefly, almost solely, on your mental charms. Shall I be plain with you? I will; so look to it. Personal attractions, madam, you have much above par; wit, understanding, and worth, you possess in the first class. This is a cursed flat way of telling you these truths, but let me hear no more of your sheepish timidity. I know the world a little. I know what they will say of my poems—by second sight I suppose—for I am seldom out in my conjectures; and you may believe me, my dear madam, I would not run any risk of hurting you by any ill-judged compliment. I wish to show to the world the odds between a poet's friends and those of simple prosemen. More for your information—both the pieces go in. One of them, "Where braving angry winter's storms," is already set—the tune is Neil Gow's Lamentation for Abercairny; the other is to be set to an old Highland air in Daniel Dow's collection of ancient Scots music; the name is "Ha a Chaillich air mo Dheith." My treacherous memory has forgot every circumstance about Les Incas, only I think you mentioned them as being in Creech's possession. I shall ask him about it. I am afraid the song of "Somebody" will come too late—as I shall, for certain, leave town in a week for Ayr-shire, and from that to Dumfries, but there my hopes are slender. I leave my direction in town, so any thing, wherever I am, will reach me.

I saw your's to —; it is not too severe, nor did he take it amiss. On the contrary, like a whipt spaniel, he talks of being with you in the Christmas days. Mr. — has given him the invitation, and he is determined to accept of it. O selfishness! he owns, in his sober moments, that from his own volatility of inclination, the circumstances in which he is situated, and his knowledge of his father's disposition, the whole affair is chimerical—yet he will gratify an idle penchant at the enormous, cruel expense, of perhaps ruining the peace of the very woman for whom he professes the generous passion of love! he is a gentleman in his mind and manners—tant pis! He is a volatile school-boy—the heir of a man's fortune who well knows the value of two times two!

Perdition seize them and their fortunes, be-fore they should make the amiable, the lovely — the derided object of their purse-proud contempt!

I am doubly happy to hear of Mrs. —'s recovery, because I really thought all was over with her. There are days of pleasure yet awaiting her:

"As I came in by Glenap,
I met with an aged woman;
She bad me cheer up my heart,
For the best o' my days was comin'."*

This day will decide my affairs with Creech. Things are, like myself, not what they ought to be; yet better than what they appear to be.

"Heaven's Sovereign saves all beings but himself
That hideous sight—a naked human heart."

Farewell! remember me to Charlotte.

R. B.

No. XC.

TO Mrs. DUNLOP.

Edinburgh, January 21, 1788.

AFTER six weeks' confinement, I am beginning to walk across the room. They have been six horrible weeks; anguish and low spirits made me unfit to read, write, or think.

I have a hundred times wished that one could resign life as an officer resigns a commission: for I would not take in any poor, ignorant wretch, by selling out. Lately I was a six-penny private; and, God knows, a miserable soldier enough; now I march to the campaign, a starving cadet: a little more conspicuously wretched.

I am ashamed of all this; for though I do want bravery for the warfare of life, I could wish, like some other soldiers, to have as much fortitude or cunning as to dissemble or conceal my cowardice.

As soon as I can bear the journey, which will be, I suppose, about the middle of next week, I leave Edinburgh: and soon after I shall pay my grateful duty at Dunlop-House.

R. B.

No. XCI.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER

TO THE SAME.

Edinburgh, February 12th, 1788.

SOME things in your late letters hurt me: not that you say them, but that you mistake me.

* [This is an old popular rhyme—a great favourite with the Poet. Glenap is in the South of Ayr-shire.]

Religion, my honoured Madam, has not only been all my life my chief dependence but my dearest enjoyment. I have, indeed, been the luckless victim of wayward follies; but, alas! I have ever been "more fool than knave." A mathematician without religion is a probable character: an irreligious poet is a monster.

* * * *

R. B.

No. XCII.

TO THE REV. JOHN SKINNER.

Edinburgh, 14th February, 1788.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR :

I HAVE been a cripple now near three months, though I am getting vastly better, and have been very much hurried beside, or else I would have wrote you sooner. I must beg your pardon for the epistle you sent me appearing in the Magazine. I had given a copy or two to some of my intimate friends, but did not know of the printing of it till the publication of the Magazine. However, as it does great honour to us both, you will forgive it.

The second volume of the songs I mentioned to you in my last is published to-day. I send you a copy, which I beg you will accept as a mark of the veneration I have long had, and shall ever have, for your character, and of the claim I make to your continued acquaintance. Your songs appear in the third volume, with your name in the index; as I assure you, Sir, I have heard your "Tullochgorum," particularly among our west-country folks, given to many different names, and most commonly to the immortal author of "The Minstrel," who, indeed, never wrote any thing superior to "Gie's a sang, Montgomery cried." Your brother has promised me your verses to the Marquis of Huntley's reel, which certainly deserve a place in the collection. My kind host, Mr. Cruikshank, of the high school here, and said to be one of the best Latinists in this age, begs me to make you his grateful acknowledgments for the entertainment he has got in a Latin publication of yours, that I borrowed for him from your acquaintance and much respected friend in this place, the Reverend Dr. Webster. Mr. Cruikshank maintains that you write the best Latin since Buchanan. I leave Edinburgh to-morrow, but shall return in three weeks. Your song you mentioned in your last, to the tune of "Dumbarton Drums," and the other, which you say was done by a brother in trade of mine, a ploughman, I shall thank you much for a copy of each. I am ever, Reverend Sir, with the most respectful esteem and sincere veneration, yours,

R. B.

No. XCIII.

TO RICHARD BROWN.

Edinburgh, February 15, 1788.

MY DEAR FRIEND :

I RECEIVED yours with the greatest pleasure. I shall arrive at Glasgow on Monday evening; and beg, if possible, you will meet me on Tuesday. I shall wait for you Tuesday all day. I shall be found at Davies's, Black Bull inn. I am hurried, as if hunted by fifty devils, else I should go to Greenock; but if you cannot possibly come, write me, if possible, to Glasgow, on Monday; or direct to me at Mossiel by Mauchline; and name a day and place in Ayr-shire, within a fortnight from this date, where I may meet you. I only stay a fortnight in Ayr-shire, and return to Edinburgh. I am ever, my dearest friend, yours,

R. B.

[The letters to Richard Brown, says Professor Walker, written at a period when the Poet was in the full blaze of reputation, shewed that he was at no time so dazzled with success as to forget the friends who had anticipated the public by discovering his merit.]

No. XCIV.

TO MISS CHALMERS.

Edinburgh, Sunday, February 15, 1788.

TO-MORROW, my dear madam, I leave Edinburgh. I have altered all my plans of future life. A farm that I could live in, I could not find; and, indeed, after the necessary support my brother and the rest of the family required, I could not venture on farming in that style suitable to my feelings. You will condemn me for the next step I have taken. I have entered into the Excise. I stay in the west about three weeks, and then return to Edinburgh for six weeks' instructions; afterwards, for I get employ instantly, I go où il plait à Dieu et mon Roi. I have chosen this, my dear friend, after mature deliberation. The question is not at what door of fortune's palace we shall enter in, but what doors does she open to us? I was not likely to get any thing to do. I wanted un bât, which is a dangerous, an unhappy situation. I got this without any hanging on, or mortifying solicitation; it is immediate bread, and, though poor in comparison of the last eighteen months of my existence, 'tis luxury in comparison of all my preceding life: besides, the Commissioners are some of them my acquaintances, and all of them my firm friends.

R. B.

No. XCV.

TO MRS. ROSE, OF KILRAVOCK.

Edinburgh, February 17th, 1788.

MADAM :

YOU are much indebted to some indispensable business I have had on my hands, otherwise my gratitude threatened such a return for your obliging favour as would have tired your patience. It but poorly expresses my feelings to say that I am sensible of your kindness : it may be said of hearts such as yours is, and such, I hope, mine is, much more justly than Addison applies it,—

“Some souls by instinct to each other turn.”

There was something in my reception at Kilravock so different from the cold, obsequious, dancing-school bow of politeness, that it almost got into my head that friendship had occupied her ground without the intermediate march of acquaintance. I wish I could transcribe, or rather transfuse into language, the glow of my heart when I read your letter. My ready fancy, with colours more mellow than life itself, painted the beautifully wild scenery of Kilravock—the venerable grandeur of the castle—the spreading woods—the winding river, gladly leaving his unsightly, heathy source, and lingering with apparent delight as he passes the fairy walk at the bottom of the garden ;—your late distressful anxieties—your present enjoyments—your dear little angel, the pride of your hopes ;—my aged friend, venerable in worth and years, whose loyalty and other virtues will strongly entitle her to the support of the Almighty Spirit here, and his peculiar favour in a happier state of existence. You cannot imagine, Madam, how much such feelings delight me ; they are the dearest proofs of my own immortality. Should I never revisit the north, as probably I never will, nor again see your hospitable mansion, were I, some twenty years' hence, to see your little fellow's name making a proper figure in a newspaper paragraph, my heart would bound with pleasure.

I am assisting a friend in a collection of Scottish songs, set to their proper tunes ; every air worth preserving is to be included : among others, I have given “Morag,” and some few Highland airs which pleased me most, a dress which will be more generally known, though far, far inferior in real merit. As a small mark of my grateful esteem, I beg leave to present you with a copy of the work, as far as it is printed ; the Man of Feeling, that first of men, has promised to transmit it by the first opportunity.

I beg to be remembered most respectfully to my venerable friend, and to your little Highland chieftain. When you see the “two fair spirits of the hill,” at Kildrummie,* tell them I have done myself the honour of setting myself down as one of their admirers for at least twenty years to come, consequently they must look upon me as an acquaintance for the same period ; but, as the Apostle Paul says, “this I ask of grace, not of debt.”

I have the honour to be, Madam, &c.

R. B.

[The Poet was hurried away from Kilravock, the reader will remember, by the impetuous temper of his companion, Nicol. Of the elegance of the society which he forsook some idea may be formed from the following letter from the elder Mrs. Rose :—

Kilravock Castle, 30th November, 1787.

SIR :

I HOPE you will do me the justice to believe that it was no defect in gratitude for your punctual performance of your parting promise that has made me so long in acknowledging it, but merely the difficulty I had in getting the Highland songs you wished to have accurately noted ; they are at last inclosed, but how shall I convey along with them those graces they acquired from the melodious voice of one of the fair spirits of the hill of Kildrummie ! These I must leave to your imagination to supply. It has powers sufficient to transport you to her side, to recall her accents, and to make them still vibrate in the ears of memory. To her I am indebted for getting the inclosed notes.—They are clothed with ‘thoughts that breathe, and words that burn.’ These, however, being in an unknown tongue to you, you must again have recourse to that same fertile imagination of yours to interpret them, and suppose a lover's description of the beauties of an adored mistress—why did I say unknown? The language of love is an universal one, that seems to have escaped the confusion of Babel, and to be understood by all nations.

“I rejoice to find that you were pleased with so many things, persons, and places in your northern tour, because it leads me to hope you may be induced to revisit them again. That the old castle of Kilravock, and its inhabitants, were amongst these, adds to my satisfaction. I am even vain enough to admit your very flattering application of the line of Addison ; at any rate allow me to believe that ‘friendship will maintain the ground she has occupied, in both our hearts,’ in spite of absence, and that when we do meet, it will be as acquaintance of a score of years' standing ; and on this footing consider me as interested in the future course of your fame, so splendidly commenced. Any communications of the progress of your muse will be received with great gratitude, and the fire of your genius will have power to warm even us frozen sisters of the north.

* Miss Sophia Brodie, of L—, and Miss Rose, of Kilravock.
2 T 2

"The fire-sides of Kilravock and Kildrummie unite in cordial regards to you. When you incline to figure either in your idea, suppose some of us reading your poems, and some of us singing your songs, and my little Hugh looking at your picture, and you'll seldom be wrong. We remember Mr. Nicol with as much goodwill as we can do anybody who hurried Mr. Burns from us.

Farewell, Sir, I can only contribute the widow's mite to the esteem and admiration excited by your merits and genius, but this I give as she did, with all my heart—being sincerely yours,

EL. ROSE."]

—◆—
No. XCVI.

TO RICHARD BROWN.

Mossgiel, 24th February, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

I CANNOT get the proper direction for my friend in Jamaica, but the following will do:—To Mr. Jo. Hutchinson, at Jo. Brownrigg's, Esq., care of Mr. Benjamin Henriquez, merchant, Orange-street, Kingston. I arrived here, at my brother's, only yesterday, after fighting my way through Paisley and Kilmarnock, against those old powerful foes of mine, the devil, the world, and the flesh—so terrible in the fields of dissipation. I have met with few incidents in my life which gave me so much pleasure as meeting you in Glasgow. There is a time of life beyond which we cannot form a tie worthy the name of friendship. "O youth! enchanting stage, profusely blest." Life is a fairy scene: almost all that deserves the name of enjoyment or pleasure is only a charming delusion; and in comes repining age, in all the gravity of hoary wisdom, and wretchedly chases away the bewitching phantom. When I think of life, I resolve to keep a strict lookout in the course of economy, for the sake of worldly convenience and independence of mind; to cultivate intimacy with a few of the companions of youth, that they may be the friends of age; never to refuse my liquorish humour a handful of the sweetmeats of life, when they come not too dear; and, for futurity,—

"The present moment is our ain,
The neist we never saw!"

How like you my philosophy? Give my best compliments to Mrs. B., and believe me to be,

My dear Sir,

Yours most truly,

R. B.

[The Poet was now nearly recovered from the disaster of the "maimed limb:" he endured his confinement with the more patience that it enabled him to carry on his correspondence with Clarinda—and write songs for Johnson's Musical Museum.—CUNNINGHAM.]

—◆—
No. XCVII.

TO ———.

Mossgiel, Friday Morning.

SIR:

THE language of refusal is to me the most difficult language on earth, and you are the [only] man of the world, excepting one of R. Hon^{ble}. designation, to whom it gives me the greatest pain to hold such language. My brother has already got money, and shall want nothing in my power to enable him to fulfil his engagement with you; but to be security on so large a scale, even for a brother, is what I dare not do, except I were in such circumstances of life as that the worst that might happen could not greatly injure me.

I never wrote a letter which gave me so much pain in my life, as I know the unhappy consequences; I shall incur the displeasure of a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, and to whom I am deeply obliged.

I am ever,

Sir,

Your obliged and very humble Servt.,

ROBERT BURNS.

—◆—
[The above letter, which now appears for the first time in an edition of the Poet's works, was evidently written towards the end of February, 1788, and before he had settled with his publisher, Creech. He was not then aware how his affairs would turn out, and therefore acted with prudence. It will be seen, in his letter to Dr. Moore, how munificently he acted for the relief of his brother's distresses.]

—◆—
No. XCVIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM CRUIKSHANK.

Mauchline, March 3d, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

APOLOGIES for not writing are frequently like apologies for not singing—the apology better than the song. I have fought my way severely through the savage hospitality of this country, to send every guest drunk to bed if they can.

I executed your commission in Glasgow, and I hope the cocoa came safe. 'Twas the same price and the very same kind as your former parcel, for the gentleman recollected your buying there perfectly well.

I should return my thanks for your hospitality (I leave a blank for the epithet, as I know none can do it justice) to a poor, way-faring bard, who was spent and almost overpowered, fighting with prosaic wickedness in high places; but I am afraid lest you should burn the letter whenever you come to the passage, so I pass over it in silence. I am just returned from visiting Mr. Miller's farm. The friend whom I told you I would take with me was highly pleased with the farm; and as he is, without exception, the most intelligent farmer in the country, he has staggered me a good deal. I have the two plans of life before me; I shall balance them to the best of my judgment, and fix on the most eligible. I have written Mr. Miller, and shall wait on him when I come to town, which shall be the beginning or middle of next week: I would be in sooner, but my unlucky knee is rather worse, and I fear for some time will scarcely stand the fatigue of my excise instructions. I only mention these ideas to you: and, indeed, except Mr. Ainslie, whom I intend writing to to-morrow, I will not write at all to Edinburgh till I return to it. I would send my compliments to Mr. Nicol, but he would be hurt if he knew I wrote to anybody and not to him: so I shall only beg my best, kindest, kindest compliments to my worthy hostess and the sweet little rose-bud.

So soon as I am settled in the routine of life, either as an Excise-officer, or as a farmer, I propose myself great pleasure from a regular correspondence with the only man almost I ever saw who joined the most attentive prudence with the warmest generosity.

I am much interested for that best of men, Mr. Wood; I hope he is in better health and spirits than when I saw him last.

I am ever,

My dearest friend,

Your obliged, humble Servant,

R. B.

* [The "sensible" farmer who accompanied Burns to Dalswinton, and influenced him in taking the farm of Ellisland, was Mr. Tait of Glenconner, to whom the Poet addressed a metrical epistle [see page 248]. The two plans which he says lay before him, were farming and the Excise. The farm of Ellisland was, at the time of the Poet's leaving it, sadly out of heart. The original vigour of the ground had been extracted from it by a succession of occupants who had neither money to purchase manure, nor knowledge in the science of farming. In the hands of the present proprietor it bears tall and weighty crops, and may be compared with the best farms in the parish.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [Dr. Currie omits all allusion to the circumstances which led to a permanent union between Burns and his Jean. That the mind of the Poet, notwithstanding all past irritation, and various entanglements with other beauties, was never altogether alienated from her is evident; but up to June, 1787, when he first returned from Edinburgh to Mauchline, he certainly did not entertain any self-avowed notion of ever again renewing his acquaintance with her. It was in this state of his feelings, that, one day, soon after his return from Edinburgh, when meeting some friends over a glass at John Dow's tavern, close to the residence of his once fondly

No. XCIX.

TO ROBERT AINSLIE, Esq.

Mauchline, 3rd March, 1788.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I AM just returned from Mr. Miller's farm. My old friend whom I took with me was highly pleased with the bargain, and advised me to accept of it. He is the most intelligent sensible farmer in the county,* and his advice has staggered me a good deal. I have the two plans before me: I shall endeavour to balance them to the best of my judgment, and fix on the most eligible. On the whole, if I find Mr. Miller in the same favourable disposition as when I saw him last, I shall in all probability turn farmer.

I have been through sore tribulation, and under much buffeting of the wicked one since I came to this country. Jean I found banished, forlorn, destitute, and friendless: I have reconciled her to her fate, and I have reconciled her to her mother.†

I shall be in Edinburgh the middle of next week. My farming ideas I shall keep private till I see. I got a letter from Clarinda yesterday, and she tells me she has got no letter of mine but one. Tell her that I wrote to her from Glasgow, from Kilmarnock, from Mauchline, and yesterday from Cunnock as I returned from Dumfries. Indeed she is the only person in Edinburgh I have written to till this day. How are your soul and body putting up?—a little like man and wife, I suppose.

R. B.

No. C.

TO RICHARD BROWN.

Mauchline, 7th March, 1788.

I HAVE been out of the country, my dear friend, and have not had an opportunity of writing till loved mistress, he chanced to encounter her in the court behind the inn, and was immediately inflamed with all his former affection. Their correspondence was renewed—was attended with its former results—and, towards the end of the year, when the Poet was fixed helplessly in Edinburgh, by a bruised limb, her shame becoming apparent to her parents, she was turned out of doors, and would have been utterly destitute, if she had not obtained shelter from a relation in the village of Ardrossan. Jean was once more delivered of twins—girls—on the 3rd of March, 1788, the date of the above letter: the infants died a few days after their birth.—Ultimately, on the 3d of August, as we learn from the session books, the Poet and Jean were openly married; when Burns being informed that it was customary for the bridegroom, in such cases, to bestow something on the poor of the parish, gave a guinea for that purpose. The ceremony took place in Dow's tavern, unsanctioned by the lady's father, who never, to the day of the Poet's death, would treat him as a friend; even Gavin Hamilton, from respect for the feelings of Armour, declined being present. It was not till the ensuing winter that Mrs. Burns joined her husband at Ellisland—their only child Robert following her in the subsequent spring.—CHAMBERS.]

now, when I am afraid you will be gone out of the country too. I have been looking at farms, and, after all, perhaps I may settle in the character of a farmer. I have got so vicious a bent to idleness, and have ever been so little a man of business, that it will take no ordinary effort to bring my mind properly into the routine: but you will say a "great effort is worthy of you." I say so myself; and butter up my vanity with all the stimulating compliments I can think of. Men of grave, geometrical minds, the sons of "which was to be demonstrated," may cry up reason as much as they please; but I have always found an honest passion, or native instinct, the truest auxiliary in the warfare of this world. Reason almost always comes to me like an unlucky wife to a poor devil of a husband, just in sufficient time to add her reproaches to his other grievances.

I am gratified with your kind inquiries after Jean; as, after all, I may say with Othello—

— "Excellent wretch!
Perdition catch my soul, but I do love thee!"

I go for Edinburgh on Monday.

Yours,—R. B.

No. CI.

TO MR. MUIR, KILMARNOCK.

Mossgiel, 7th March, 1788.

DEAR SIR:

I HAVE partly changed my ideas, my dear friend, since I saw you. I took old Glenconner with me to Mr. Miller's farm, and he was so pleased with it that I have wrote an offer to Mr. Miller, which, if he accepts, I shall sit down a plain farmer, the happiest of lives when a man can live by it. In this case I shall not stay in Edinburgh above a week. I set out on Monday, and would have come by Kilmarnock, but there are several small sums owing me for my first edition about Galston and Newmills, and I shall set off so early as to dispatch my business and reach Glasgow by night. When I return, I shall devote a forenoon or two to make some kind of acknowledgment for all the kindness I owe your friendship. Now that I hope to settle with some credit and comfort at home, there was not any friendship or friendly correspondence that promised me more pleasure than yours; I hope I will not be disappointed. I trust the spring will renew your shattered frame, and make your friends happy. You and I have often agreed that life is no great blessing on the whole. The close of life, indeed, to a reasoning age, is—

"Dark as was chaos, ere the infant sun
Was roll'd together, or had try'd his beams
Athwart the gloom profound."

* [One of the daughters of Mrs. Dunlop, it is here intimated, was painting a sketch from the Coila of "The Vision." Several eminent artists have embodied various of the scenes in the poetry of Burns. David Allan succeeded in

But an honest man has nothing to fear. If we lie down in the grave, the whole man a piece of broken machinery, to moulder with the clods of the valley, be it so; at least there is an end of pain, cure, woes and wants: if that part of us called mind does survive the apparent destruction of the man—away with old-wife prejudices and tales! Every age and every nation has had a different set of stories; and as the many are always weak of consequence, they have often, perhaps always, been deceived: a man conscious of having acted an honest part among his fellow-creatures—even granting that he may have been the sport at times of passions and instincts—he goes to a great unknown Being, who could have no other end in giving him existence but to make him happy, who gave him those passions and instincts, and well knows their force.

These, my worthy friend, are my ideas; and I know they are not far different from yours. It becomes a man of sense to think for himself, particularly in a case where all men are equally interested, and where, indeed, all men are equally in the dark.

Adieu, my dear Sir; God send us a cheerful meeting!

R. B.

No. CII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Mossgiel, 17th March, 1788.

MADAM:

THE last paragraph in yours of the 20th February affected me most, so I shall begin my answer where you ended your letter. That I am often a sinner with any little wit I have, I do confess: but I have taxed my recollection, to no purpose, to find out when it was employed against you. I hate an ungenerous sarcasm a great deal worse than I do the devil; at least as Milton describes him; and though I may be rascally enough to be sometimes guilty of it myself, I cannot endure it in others. You, my honoured friend, who cannot appear in any light but you are sure of being respectable—you can afford to pass by an occasion to display your wit, because you may depend for fame on your sense; or, if you choose to be silent, you know you can rely on the gratitude of many, and the esteem of all; but, God help us, who are wits or witlings by profession, if we stand not for fame there, we sink unsupported!

I am highly flattered by the news you tell me of Coila. I may say to the fair painter* who does me so much honour, as Dr. Beattie says to Ross the poet of his muse Scots, from one or two attempts: Stothard hit off three or four happy groups; Burnet wrought in the very spirit of "John Anderson, my jo;" and Wilkie added charms to the song of "Duncan Gray."] which, by the bye, I took the idea of Coila ('tis a poem of Beattie's in the Scottish dialect, which perhaps you have never seen):—

"Ye shak your head, but o' my fegs,
Ye've set auld Scots on her legs;
Lang had she lien wi' beffis and flegs,
Bumbaz'd and dizzie,
Her fiddle wanted strings and pegs,
Wae's me, poor hizzie!"

R. B.

No. CIII.

TO MISS CHALMERS.

Edinburgh, March 14th, 1788.

I KNOW, my ever dear friend, that you will be pleased with the news when I tell you I have at last taken a lease of a farm. Yesterday I completed a bargain with Mr. Miller, of Dalswinton, for the farm of Ellisland, on the banks of the Nith, between five and six miles above Dumfries. I begin at Whit-Sunday to build a house, drive lime, &c.;* and heaven be my help! for it will take a strong effort to bring my mind into the routine of business. I have discharged all the army of my former pursuits, fancies, and pleasures; a motley host! and have literally and strictly retained only the ideas of a few friends, which I have incorporated into a life-guard. I trust in Dr. Johnson's observation, "Where much is attempted, something is done." Firmness, both in sufferance and exertion, is a character I would wish to be thought to possess: and have always despised the whining yelp of complaint, and the cowardly, feeble resolve.

Poor Miss K. is ailing a good deal this winter, and begged me to remember her to you the first time I wrote to you. Surely woman, amiable woman, is often made in vain. Too delicately formed for the rougher pursuits of ambition; too noble for the dirt of avarice, and even too gentle for the rage of pleasure; formed in-

* [In building his farm-house the Poet had to perform the part of superintendent of the works; to dig the foundations, collect the stones, seek the sand, cart the lime, and see that all was performed according to the specifications; these were the uncouth cares of which he afterwards complained.]

† [The excitement to which Burns alludes was occasioned by the dilatory movements of Creech in settling accounts between him and the Poet. The baillie parted with his money as a lover with his mistress—

"With slow, reluctant, amorous delay."

"During the Poet's residence in Glasgow, a characteristic instance occurred of the way in which he would repress petulance and presumption. A young man of some literary pretensions, who had newly commenced business as a bookseller, had been in the practice of writing notices of Burns's Poems in a style so flippant, and withal so patronising, as to excite feelings in the poet towards him very different from what he counted upon. Reckoning, however, upon a very grateful reception from Burns, he was particularly anxious for an early introduction to his company, and, as his friends knew, had been at some pains to prepare himself for making a dazzling impression upon the Ayr-shire ploughman, as it was then the fashion, amongst a certain kind of literary folks, to call the poet. At the moment the introduction took place, Burns was engaged in one of his happiest and most deed for, and highly susceptible of, enjoyment and rapture; but that enjoyment, alas! almost wholly at the mercy of the caprice, malevolence, stupidity, or wickedness of an animal at all times comparatively unfeeling, and often brutal.

R. B.

No. CIV.

TO RICHARD BROWN.

Glasgow, 26th March, 1788.

I AM monstrously to blame, my dear Sir, in not writing to you, and sending you the Directory. I have been getting my tack extended, as I have taken a farm; and I have been racking shop accounts with Mr. Creech, both of which, together with watching, fatigue, and a load of care almost too heavy for my shoulders, have in some degree actually fevered me.† I really forgot the Directory yesterday, which vexed me; but I was convulsed with rage a great part of the day. I have to thank you for the ingenious, friendly, and elegant epistle from your friend Mr. Crawford. I shall certainly write to him, but not now. This is merely a card to you, as I am posting to Dumfries-shire, where many perplexing arrangements await me. I am vexed about the Directory; but, my dear Sir, forgive me; these eight days I have been positively crazed. My compliments to Mrs. B. I shall write to you at Grenada.—I am ever, my dearest friend,

Yours,—R. B.

No. CV.

TO MR. ROBERT CLEGHORN. †

Mauchline, 31st March, 1788.

YESTERDAY, my dear Sir, as I was riding through a track of melancholy, joyless muirs, playful veins with my friend and another intimate or two; but, upon the gentleman's presentation, who advanced in a manner sufficiently affable, the 'ploughman' assumed an air of such dignified coldness as froze him into complete silence during the time he remained in his company."—CORRESPONDENT OF THE SCOTSMAN, 1828.]

† [Cleghorn had no little skill in musical composition: he was, besides, something of a farmer, and a pleasant and social man. He sent the following reply to the Poet's letter:—

Saughton Mills, April 27th, 1788.

I WAS favoured with your very kind letter of the 31st ult., and consider myself greatly obliged to you for your attention in sending me the song to my favourite air, Captain O'Keen. The words delight me much—they fit the tune to a hair. I wish you would send me a verse or two more; and, if you have no objection, I would have it in the Jacobite style. Suppose it should be sung after the fatal field of Culloden, by the unfortunate Charles. Tenucci personates the lovely Mary Stuart in the song, Queen Mary's Lamentation. Why may not I sing in the person of her great-great-grandson?

Any skill I have in country business you may truly command. Situation, soil, customs of countries, may vary from each other; but Farmer Attention is a good farmer in every between Galloway and Ayr-shire, it being Sunday, I turned my thoughts to psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs; and your favourite air, "Captain O'Kean," coming at length into my head, I tried these words to it. You will see that the first part of the tune must be repeated.*

I am tolerably pleased with these verses, but as I have only a sketch of the tune, I leave it with you to try if they suit the measure of the music.

I am so harassed with care and anxiety, about this farming project of mine, that my muse has degenerated into the veriest prose-wench that ever picked cinders, or followed a tinker. When I am fairly got into the routine of business, I shall trouble you with a longer epistle; perhaps with some queries respecting farming: at present, the world sits such a load on my mind that it has effaced almost every trace of the poet in me.

My very best compliments and good wishes to Mrs. Cleghorn.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CVI.

TO MR. WILLIAM DUNBAR,
EDINBURGH.

Mauchline, 7th April, 1788.

I HAVE not delayed so long to write to you, my much respected friend, because I thought no farther of my promise. I have long since given up that kind of formal correspondence, where one sits down irksomely to write a letter, because we think we are in duty bound so to do.

I have been roving over the country, as the farm I have taken is forty miles from this place, hiring servants, and preparing matters; but most of all, I am earnestly busy to bring about a revolution in my own mind. As, till within these eighteen months, I never was the wealthy master of ten guineas, my knowledge of business is to learn; add to this, my late scenes of idleness and dissipation have enervated my mind to an alarming degree. Skill in the sober science of life is my most serious and hourly study. I have dropt all conversation and all reading (prose reading), but what tends in some way or other to my serious aim. Except one worthy young fellow, I have not one single correspondent in Edinburgh. You have indeed kindly made me an offer of that kind. The world of wits, and gens comme il faut which I lately left, and with whom I never again will intimately mix—from that port, Sir, I expect your Gazette: what les beaux esprits are saying, what they are doing, and what they are singing. Any sober intelligence from my sequestered walks of life; any droll original; any passing remark, important forsooth, because it is mine; any little poetic effort, however embryoth; these, my dear Sir, are all you have to expect from me. When I talk of poetic efforts, I must have it always understood that I appeal from your wit and taste to your friendship and good nature. The first would be my favourite tribunal, where I defied censure; but the last, where I declined justice.

I have scarcely made a single distich since I saw you. When I meet with an old Scots air that has any facetious idea in its name, I have a peculiar pleasure in following out that idea for a verse or two.

I trust that this will find you in better health than I did last time I called for you. A few lines from you, directed to me at Mauchline, were it but to let me know how you are, will set my mind a good deal [at rest]. Now, never shun the idea of writing me because perhaps you may be out of humour or spirits. I could give you a hundred good consequences attending a dull letter; one, for example, and the remaining ninety-nine some other time—it will always serve to keep in countenance, my much respected Sir, your obliged friend and humble servant,†

R. B.

—◆—
No. CVII.

TO MISS CHALMERS.

Mauchline, 7th April, 1788.

I AM indebted to you and Miss Nimmo for letting me know Miss Kennedy. Strange! how apt we are to indulge prejudices in our judgments of one another! Even I, who pique myself on my skill in marking characters—because I am too proud of my character as a man, to be dazzled in my judgment for glaring wealth; and too proud of my situation as a poor man to be biassed against squalid poverty—I was unacquainted with Miss K.'s very uncommon worth.

I am going on a good deal progressive in mon grand but, the sober science of life. I have lately made some sacrifices, for which, were I vivâ voce with you to paint the situation place. Mrs. Cleghorn joins me in best compliments. I am, in the most comprehensive sense of the word, your very sincere friend,

ROBERT CLEGHORN.

The Poet complied with his friend's request, and wrote the two remaining stanzas of his beautiful song, THE CHEVALIER'S LAMENT.]

* [Here the Bard gives the first two stanzas of the Chevalier's Lament.]

† [The gentleman to whom the above letter is addressed, was a writer to the Signet, in Edinburgh, with whom the Poet appears to have been on very intimate and friendly terms.]

and recount the circumstances, you would applaud me.*

R. B.

No. CVII.*

TO THE SAME.

[No date.]

Now for that wayward, unfortunate thing, myself. I have broke measures with Creech, and last week I wrote him a frosty, keen letter. He replied in terms of chastisement, and promised me upon his honour that I should have the account on Monday; but this is Tuesday, and yet I have not heard a word from him. God have mercy on me! a poor damned, incautious, duped, unfortunate fool! The sport, the miserable victim of rebellious pride, hypochondriac imagination, agonizing sensibility, and bedlam passions!

"I wish that I were dead, but I'm no like to die!" I had lately "a hair-breadth 'scape in th' imminent deadly breach" of love too. Thank my stars I got off heart-whole, "waur fleyed than hurt."—Interruption.

I have this moment got a hint: I fear I am something like—undone—but I hope for the best. Come, stubborn pride and unshrinking resolution; accompany me through this, to me, miserable world! You must not desert me! Your friendship I think I can count on, though I should date my letters from a marching regiment. Early in life, and all my life, I reckoned on a recruiting drum as my forlorn hope. Seriously, though, life at present presents me with but a melancholy path: but—my limb will soon be sound, and I shall struggle on.

R. B.

No. CVIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Mauchline, 23th April, 1788.

MADAM:

YOUR powers of reprehension must be great indeed, as I assure you they made my heart ache with penitential pangs, even though I was really not guilty. As I commence farmer at Whit-Sunday, you will easily guess I must be pretty busy; but that is not all. As I got the offer of the Excise business without solicitation, and as it costs me only six months' attendance for instructions, to entitle me to a commission—which commission lies by me, and at any future period, on my simple petition, can be resumed—I thought five-and-thirty pounds a year was no bad dernier ressort for a poor poet, if fortune in her jade tricks should kick him down from the little eminence to which she has lately helped him up.

For this reason, I am at present attending these instructions to have them completed before Whit-Sunday. Still, Madam, I prepared with the sincerest pleasure to meet you at the Mount, and came to my brother's on Saturday night, to set out on Sunday; but for some nights preceding I had slept in an apartment, where the force of the winds and rains was only mitigated by being sifted through numberless apertures in the windows, walls, &c. In consequence I was on Sunday, Monday, and part of Tuesday, unable to stir out of bed, with all the miserable effects of a violent cold.

You see, Madam, the truth of the French maxim, le vrai n'est pas toujours le vrai-sensible; your last was so full of expostulation, and was something so like the language of an offended friend, that I began to tremble for a correspondence, which I had with grateful pleasure set down as one of the greatest enjoyments of my future life.

Your books have delighted me: Virgil, Dryden, and Tasso,† were all equally strangers to me; but of this more at large in my next.

R. B.

No. CIX.

TO MR. JAMES SMITH,

AVON PRINTFIELD, LINLITHGOW.

Mauchline, April 28th, 1788.

BEWARE of your Strasburgh, my good Sir! Look on this as the opening of a correspondence, like the opening of a twenty-four gun battery!

There is no understanding a man properly without knowing something of his previous ideas (that is to say, if the man has any ideas; for I know many who, in the animal-muster, pass for men, that are the scanty masters of only one idea on any given subject, and by far the greatest part of your acquaintances and mine can barely boast of ideas, 1·25—1·5—1·75 (or some such fractional matter); so to let you a little into the secrets of my pericranium, there is, you must know, a certain clean-limbed, handsome, bewitching young hussy of your acquaintance, to whom I have lately and privately given a matrimonial title to my corpus.

* [The sacrifices to which the Poet alludes were honourable to his heart; he determined—in spite of the frowns of some, and the smiles of others—to unite his fortunes with those of Jean Armour.]

† [The Tasso with which Mrs. Dunlop indulged the Poet was the translation of Hoole: a work, in spite of the commendation of Johnson, as inferior in beauty to the version of Fairfax, as a beggar's pike-staff is to a pear-tree in full blossom.—CUNNINGHAM.]

"Bode a robe and wear it, Bode a pock and bear it," says the wise old Scots adage! I hate to presage ill-luck; and as my girl has been doubly kinder to me than even the best of women usually are to their partners of our sex, in similar circumstances, I reckon on twelve times a brace of children against I celebrate my twelfth wedding-day: these twenty-four will give me twenty-four gossipings, twenty-four christenings (I mean one equal to two), and I hope, by the blessing of the God of my fathers, to make them twenty-four dutiful children to their parents, twenty-four useful members of society, and twenty-four approved servants of their God! * * *

"Light's heartsome," quo' the wife when she was stealing sheep. You see what a lamp I have hung up to lighten your paths, when you are idle enough to explore the combinations and relations of my ideas. 'Tis now as plain as a pike-staff why a twenty-four gun battery was a metaphor I could readily employ.

Now for business—I intend to present Mrs. Burns with a printed shawl, an article of which I dare say you have a variety: 'tis my first present to her since I have irrevocably called her mine, and I have a kind of whimsical wish to get her the first said present from an old and much valued friend of hers and mine, a trusty Trojan, on whose friendship I count myself possessed of as a life-rent lease.

Look on this letter as a "beginning of sorrows;" I will write you till your eyes ache reading nonsense.

Mrs. Burns ('tis only her private designation) begs her best compliments to you.

R. B.

No. CX.

TO PROFESSOR DUGALD STEWART.*

Mauchline, 3d May, 1788.

SIR:

I ENCLOSE you one or two more of my bagatelles. If the fervent wishes of honest gratitude have any influence with that great, unknown Being, who frames the chain of causes and events, prosperity and happiness will attend your visit to the Continent, and return you safe to your native shore.

* [Of the accomplished Dugald Stewart, the kindness of his heart and the amenity of his manners were as conspicuous as his talents. The account of Burns, which he rendered to Currie, will always be read with interest.—vide Memoir, p. 41.]

The Poet in his memoranda, thus alludes to his respected patron:—"I never spent an afternoon among great folks with half that pleasure as when I had the honour of paying my devoirs to that plain, honest, worthy man, Professor Stewart. I would be delighted to see him perform acts of kindness and friendship, though I were not the object,—he does it with such a grace. I think his character divided into

Wherever I am, allow me, Sir, to claim it as my privilege to acquaint you with my progress in my trade of rhymes; as I am sure I could say it with truth, that, next to my little fame, and the having it in my power to make life more comfortable to those whom nature has made dear to me, I shall ever regard your countenance, your patronage, your friendly good offices, as the most valued consequence of my late success in life.

R. B.

No. CXI.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Mauchline, 4th May, 1788.

MADAM:

DRYDEN'S Virgil has delighted me. I do not know whether the critics will agree with me, but the Georgics are to me by far the best part of Virgil. It is indeed a species of writing entirely new to me; and has filled my head with a thousand fancies of emulation: but, alas! when I read the Georgics, and then survey my own powers, 'tis like the idea of a Shetland pony, drawn up by the side of a thorough-bred hunter, to start for the plate. I own I am disappointed in the Æneid. Faultless correctness may please, and does highly please, the lettered critic: but to that awful character I have not the most distant pretensions. I do not know whether I do not hazard my pretensions to be a critic of any kind when I say that I think Virgil, in many instances, a servile copier of Homer. If I had the Odyssey by me, I could parallel many passages where Virgil has evidently copied, but by no means improved, Homer. Nor can I think there is any thing of this owing to the translators; for, from every thing I have seen of Dryden, I think him, in genius and fluency of language, Pope's master. I have not perused Tasso enough to form an opinion: in some future letter, you shall have my ideas of him; though I am conscious my criticisms must be very inaccurate and imperfect, as there I have ever felt and lamented my want of learning most.†

R. B.

ten parts, stands thus:—four parts Socrates—four parts Nathaniel—and two parts Shakspeare's Brutus."†]

† [A national poem was long present to the fancy of Burns: but he seems to have hesitated between the stately versification of the English muse and the homely strains of Coila—death prevented him from deciding. It would not appear that Burns, though he loved "The Task" so much that he carried it in his pocket, had extended his reading to Cowper's Translation of Homer. The graphic beauty and natural force of that fine version would not have been lost on a lover of clear images and nervous manly language.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. CXII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

Mauchline, May 26th, 1788.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I AM two kind letters in your debt, but I have been from home, and horridly busy, buying and preparing for my farming business, over and above the plague of my Excise instructions, which this week will finish.

As I flatter my wishes that I foresee many future years' correspondence between us, 'tis foolish to talk of excusing dull epistles; a dull letter may be a very kind one.—I have the pleasure to tell you that I have been extremely fortunate in all my buyings and bargainings hitherto; Mrs. Burns not excepted; which title I now avow to the world. I am truly pleased with this last affair: it has indeed added to anxieties for futurity, but it has given a stability to my mind and resolutions unknown before; and the poor girl has the most sacred enthusiasm of attachment to me, and has not a wish but to gratify my every idea of her deportment. I am interrupted.—Farewell! my dear Sir.

R. B.

No. CXIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

27th May, 1788.

MADAM:

I HAVE been torturing my philosophy to no purpose, to account for that kind partiality of yours which has followed me, in my return to the shade of life, with assiduous benevolence. Often did I regret, in the fleeting hours of my late will-o'-wisp appearance, that "here I had no continuing city;" and, but for the consolation of a few solid guineas, could almost lament the time that a momentary acquaintance with wealth and splendour put me so much out of conceit with the sworn companions of my road through life—insignificance and poverty.

There are few circumstances relating to the unequal distribution of the good things of this life that give me more vexation (I mean in what I see around me) than the importance the opulent bestow on their trifling family affairs, compared with the very same things on the contracted scale of a cottage. Last afternoon I had the honour to spend an hour or two at a good woman's fire-side, where the planks that composed the floor were decorated with a splendid carpet, and the gay table sparkled with silver and china. 'Tis now about term-day,* and there has been a revolution among those creatures, who though in appearance partakers, and equally noble partakers, of the same nature with Madame, are from time to time—their nerves, their sinews, their health, strength, wisdom, experience, genius, time, nay a good part of their very thoughts—sold for months and years, not only to the necessities, the conveniences, but the caprices of the important few. We talked of the insignificant creatures; nay, notwithstanding their general stupidity and rascality, did some of the poor devils the honour to commend them. But light be the turf upon his breast who taught, "Reverence thyself!" We looked down on the unpolished wretches, their impertinent wives and clouterly brats, as the lordly bull does on the little dirty ant-hill, whose puny inhabitants he crushes in the carelessness of his ramble, or tosses in the air in the wantonness of his pride.

* [The hiring-season naturally introduced the conversation to which the Poet indignantly alludes. In Scotland, servants are hired half-yearly from term to term, or, in other words, from Whit-Sunday to Martinmas, and from Martinmas to

R. B.

No. CXIV.

TO THE SAME.

AT MR. DUNLOP'S, HADDINGTON.

Ellisland, 13th June, 1788.

"Where'er I roam, whatever realms I see,
My heart, untravell'd, fondly turns to thee;
Still to my friend it turns with ceaseless pain,
And drags, at each remove, a lengthen'd chain."

GOLDSMITH.

THIS is the second day, my honoured friend, that I have been on my farm. A solitary inmate of an old, smoky spence; far from every object I love, or by whom I am beloved; nor any acquaintance older than yesterday, except Jenny Geddes, the old mare I ride on; while uncouth cares and novel plans hourly insult my awkward ignorance and bashful inexperience. There is a foggy atmosphere native to my soul in the hour of care; consequently the dreary objects seem larger than the life. Extreme sensibility, irritated and prejudiced on the gloomy side by a series of misfortunes and disappointments, at that period of my existence when the soul is laying in her cargo of ideas for the voyage of life, is, I believe, the principal cause of this unhappy frame of mind.

"The valiant, in himself, what can he suffer?
Or what need he regard his single woes?" &c.

Your surmise, Madam, is just; I am indeed a husband.

* * * *

To jealousy or infidelity I am an equal stranger. My preservative from the first is the Whit-Sunday. In England, servants are engaged by the month, and are more at the mercy of the changeable and the capricious.]

most thorough consciousness of her sentiments of honour, and her attachment to me: my antidote against the last is my long and deep-rooted affection for her.

In housewife matters, of aptness to learn and activity to execute, she is eminently mistress: and during my absence in Nithsdale, she is regularly and constantly apprentice to my mother and sisters in their dairy and other rural business.*

The muses must not be offended when I tell them the concerns of my wife and family will, in my mind, always take the pas; but I assure them their ladyships will ever come next in place.

You are right that a bachelor state would have ensured me more friends; but, from a cause you will easily guess, conscious peace in the enjoyment of my own mind, and unmistrusting confidence in approaching my God, would seldom have been of the number.

I found a once much-loved and still much-loved female, literally and truly cast out to the mercy of the naked elements; but I enabled her to purchase a shelter;—there is no sporting with a fellow-creature's happiness or misery.

The most placid good-nature and sweetness of disposition; a warm heart, gratefully devoted with all its powers to love me; vigorous health and sprightly cheerfulness, set off to the best advantage by a more than commonly handsome figure; these, I think, in a woman, may make a good wife, though she should never have read a page but the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, nor have danced in a brighter assembly than a penny pay-wedding.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CXV.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

Ellisland, June 14th, 1788.

THIS is now the third day, my dearest Sir, that I have sojourned in these regions; and during these three days you have occupied more of my thoughts than in three weeks preceding: in Ayr-shire I have several variations of friendship's compass—here it points invariably to the pole. My farm gives me a good many uncouth cares and anxieties, but I hate the language of complaint. Job, or some one of his friends, says well—"Why should a living man complain?"

I have lately been much mortified with contemplating an unlucky imperfection in the very framing and construction of my soul; namely, a blundering inaccuracy of her olfactory organs in hitting the scent of craft or design in my fellow-creatures. I do not mean any compliment to my ingenuousness, or to hint that the defect is in consequence of the unsuspecting simplicity of conscious truth and honour: I take it to be, in some way or other, an imperfection in the mental sight; or, metaphor apart, some modification of dullness. In two or three small instances lately, I have been most shamefully out.

* [It was one of the pleasing theories of the Poet, in the pursuit of independence, that while he watched the public revenue as a gauger, his wife would superintend the whole system of in-door and out-door economy of a farmer's establishment, and that between them money would come pouring in. To insure this, he began a war against the nature

I have all along, hitherto, in the warfare of life, been bred to arms among the light-horse—the piquet-guards of fancy; a kind of hussars and Highlanders of the brain; but I am firmly resolved to sell out of these giddy battalions, who have no ideas of a battle but fighting the foe, or of a siege but storming the town. Cost what it will, I am determined to buy in among the grave squadrons of heavy-armed thought, or the artillery corps of plodding contrivance.

What books are you reading, or what is the subject of your thoughts, besides the great studies of your profession? You said something about religion in your last. I don't exactly remember what it was, as the letter is in Ayr-shire; but I thought it not only prettily said, but nobly thought. You will make a noble fellow if once you were married. I make no reservation of your being well-married: you have so much sense, and knowledge of human nature, that, though you may not realize perhaps the ideas of romance, yet you will never be ill-married.

Were it not for the terrors of my ticklish situation respecting provision for a family of children, I am decidedly of opinion that the step I have taken is vastly for my happiness. As it is, I look to the Excise scheme as a certainty of maintenance; a maintenance!—luxury to what either Mrs. Burns or I were born to.

Adieu!—R. B.

—◆—
No. CXVI.

TO THE SAME.

Mauchline, 23rd June, 1788.

THIS letter, my dear Sir, is only a business scrap. Mr. Miers, profile painter in your town, has executed a profile of Dr. Blacklock for me: do me the favour to call for it, and sit to him yourself for me, which put in the same size as the doctor's. The account of both profiles will of the soil of Ellisland, by trying to turn it into pasturage: and he caused his wife to be instructed in the business of the dairy, with the hope of making cheese rivaling the far-famed Dunlop; but

"The best laid schemes of mice and men Gang aft agley."—CUNNINGHAM.]

be fifteen shillings, which I have given to James Connel, our Mauchline carrier, to pay you when you give him the parcel. You must not, my friend, refuse to sit. The time is short; when I sat to Mr. Miers, I am sure he did not exceed two minutes. I propose hanging Lord Glencairn, the Doctor, and you in trio over my new chimney-piece that is to be.*

Adieu.—R. B.

No. CXVII.

TO THE SAME.

Ellisland, June 30th, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

I JUST now received your brief epistle; and, to take vengeance on your laziness, I have, you see, taken a long sheet of writing-paper, and have begun at the top of the page, intending to scribble on to the very last corner.

I am vexed at that affair of the * * *, but dare not enlarge on the subject until you send me your direction, as I suppose that will be altered on your late master and friend's death.† I am concerned for the old fellow's exit, only as I fear it may be to your disadvantage in any respect—for an old man's dying, except he have been a very benevolent character, or in some particular situation of life that the welfare of the poor or the helpless depended on him, I think it an event of the most trifling moment to the world. Man is naturally a kind, benevolent animal, but he is dropped into such a needy situation here in this vexatious world, and has such a whore-son, hungry, growling, multiplying pack of necessities, appetites, passions, and desires about him, ready to devour him for want of other food; that in fact he must lay aside his cares for others that he may look properly to himself. You have been imposed upon in paying Mr. Miers for the profile of a Mr. H. I did not mention it in my letter to you, nor did I ever give Mr. Miers any such order. I have no objection to lose the money, but I will not have any such profile in my possession.

I desired the carrier to pay you, but as I mentioned only 15s. to him, I will rather enclose you a guinea note. I have it not, indeed, to spare here, as I am only a sojourner in a strange land in this place; but in a day or two I return to Mauchline, and there I have the bank-notes through the house like salt permits.

There is a great degree of folly in talking unnecessarily of one's private affairs. I have just now been interrupted by one of my new neighbours, who has made himself absolutely contemptible in my eyes, by his silly, garrulous pruriency. I know it has been a fault of my own, too; but from this moment I abjure it as I would the service of hell! Your poets, spend-thrifts, and other fools of that kidney, pretend, forsooth, to crack their jokes on prudence; but 'tis a squalid vagabond, glorying in his rags. Still, imprudence respecting money matters is much more pardonable than imprudence respecting character. I have no objection to prefer prodigality to avarice, in some few instances; but I appeal to your observation, if you have not met, and often met, with the same disingenuousness, the same hollow-hearted insincerity, and disintegrative depravity of principle, in the hackneyed victims of profusion, as in the unfeeling children of parsimony. I have every possible reverence for the much talked-of world beyond the grave, and I wish that which piety believes, and virtue deserves, may be all matter of fact. But in things belonging to, and terminating in this present scene of existence, man has serious and interesting business on hand. Whether a man shall shake hands with welcome in the distinguished elevation of respect, or shrink from contempt in the abject corner of insignificance; whether he shall wanton under the tropic of plenty, at least enjoy himself in the comfortable latitudes of easy convenience, or starve in the arctic circle of dreary poverty; whether he shall rise in the manly consciousness of a self-approving mind, or sink beneath a galling load of regret and remorse—these are alternatives of the last moment.

You see how I preach. You used occasionally to sermonize too; I wish you would, in charity, favour me with a sheet full in your own way. I admire the close of a letter Lord Bolingbroke wrote to Dean Swift:—"Adieu, dear Swift! with all thy faults I love thee entirely: make an effort to love me with all mine!" Humble servant, and all that trumpery, is now such a prostituted business that honest friendship, in her sincere way, must have recourse to her primitive, simple,—farewell!

R. B.

No. CXVIII.

TO MR. GEORGE LOCKHART,

MERCHANT, GLASGOW.

Mauchline, 18th July, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

I AM just going for Nithsdale, else I would

* [The kindness of Mr. Field, proflist, Strand, has not only indulged me with a look at the original outline of the Poet's face, but has put me in possession of a capital copy. It is the size of life: the contour is fine—nay, noble: the nose is a little blunt at the point: the mouth is full and well-shaped, the forehead high, and the whole air that of freedom and genius. It is one of thirty thousand likenesses taken by the same skilful hand.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [Mr. Samuel Mitchelson, W. S. He died on the 21st of June previous.]

certainly have transcribed some of my rhyming things for you. The Misses Baillie I have seen in Edinburgh. "Fair and lovely are thy works, Lord God Almighty! Who would not praise thee for these thy gifts in thy goodness to the sons of men!" It needed not your fine taste to admire them. I declare, one day I had the honour of dining at Mr. Baillie's, I was almost in the predicament of the children of Israel, when they could not look on Moses' face for the glory that shone in it when he descended from Mount Sinai.

I did once write a poetic address from the Falls of Bruar to his Grace of Athole, when I was in the Highlands. When you return to Scotland, let me know, and I will send such of my pieces as please myself best. I return to Mauchline in about ten days.

My compliments to Mr. Purden. I am in truth, but at present in haste,

Yours,—R. B.

No. CXIX.

TO MR. PETER HILL.

MY DEAR HILL:

I SHALL say nothing to your mad present—you have so long and often been of important service to me, and I suppose you mean to go on conferring obligations until I shall not be able to lift up my face before you. In the mean time as Sir Roger de Coverley, because it happened to be a cold day in which he made his will, ordered his servants great coats for mourning, so, because I have been this week plagued with an indigestion, I have sent you by the carrier a fine old ewe-milk cheese.*

Indigestion is the devil: nay, 'tis the devil and all. It besets a man in every one of his senses. I lose my appetite at the sight of successful knavery, and sicken to loathing at the noise and nonsense of self-important folly. When the hollow-hearted wretch takes me by the hand, the feeling spoils my dinner; the proud man's wine so offends my palate that it chokes me in the gullet; and the pulvilsed, feathered, pert coxcomb, is so disgusting in my nostril that my stomach turns.

If ever you have any of these disagreeable sensations, let me prescribe for you patience and a bit of my cheese. I know that you are no niggard of good things among your friends, and some of them are in much need of a slice. There, in my eyes, is our friend Smellie; a man positively of the first abilities and greatest strength of mind, as well as one of the best hearts and keenest wits that I have ever met with; when you see him, as, alas! he too is smarting at the pinch of distressful circumstances, aggravated by the sneer of contumelious greatness—a bit of my cheese alone will not cure him, but if you add a tankard of brown stout, and superadd a magnum of right Oporto, you will see his sorrows vanish like the morning mist before the summer sun.

Candlish, the earliest friend, except my only brother, that I have on earth, and one of the worthiest fellows that ever any man called by the name of friend, if a luncheon of my cheese would help to rid him of some of his superabundant modesty, you would do well to give it him.

David,† with his Courant, comes, too, across my recollection, and I beg you will help him largely from the said ewe-milk cheese, to enable him to digest those bedaubing paragraphs with which he is eternally larding the lean characters of certain great men in a certain great town. I grant you the periods are very well turned; so, a fresh egg is a very good thing, but when thrown at a man in a pillory, it does not at all improve his figure, not to mention the irreparable loss of the egg.

My facetious friend Dunbar I would wish also to be a partaker: not to digest his spleen, for that he laughs off, but to digest his last night's wine at the last field-day of the Crochallan corps.‡

Among our common friends I must not forget one of the dearest of them—Cunningham. The brutality, insolence, and selfishness of a world unworthy of having such a fellow as he is in it, I know, sticks in his stomach, and if you can help him to anything that will make him a little easier on that score, it will be very obliging.

As to honest John Somerville, he is such a contented, happy man, that I know not what can annoy him, except, perhaps, he may not have got the better of a parcel of modest anecdotes which a certain poet gave him one night at supper, the last time the said poet was in town.

Though I have mentioned so many men of law, I shall have nothing to do with them professedly—the faculty are beyond my prescription. As to their clients that is another thing; God knows they have much to digest!

The clergy I pass by; their profundity of erudition, and their liberality of sentiment; their total want of pride, and their detestation of hypocrisy, are so proverbially notorious as to place them far, far above either my praise or censure.

I was going to mention a man of worth,

* [Peter Hill was a bookseller, and the present to which the Poet alludes was some valuable books. Burns felt unwilling to lie under obligations; and hence his return in "a fine old ewe-milk cheese," a savoury morsel that no doubt snacked of the ewe-bughts.]

† Mr. David Ramsay, printer of the Edinburgh Evening Courant.

‡ A club of choice spirits, already alluded to.

whom I have the honour to call friend, the Laird of Craigdarroch; but I have spoken to the landlord of the King's-Arms-inn here, to have at the next county meeting a large ewe-milk cheese on the table, for the benefit of the Dumfries-shire Whigs, to enable them to digest the Duke of Queensberry's late political conduct.

I have just this moment an opportunity of a private hand to Edinburgh, as perhaps you would not digest double postage.

R. B.

 No. CXX.

TO ROBERT GRAHAM, Esq.,

OF FINTRAY.

SIR:

WHEN I had the honour of being introduced to you at Athole-house, I did not think so soon of asking a favour of you. When Lear, in Shakspeare, asked Old Kent, why he wished to be in his service, he answers, "Because you have that in your face which I would fain call master." For some such reason, Sir, do I now solicit your patronage. You know, I dare say, of an application I lately made to your Board to be admitted an officer of Excise. I have, according to form, been examined by a supervisor, and to-day I gave in his certificate, with a request for an order for instructions. In this affair, if I succeed, I am afraid I shall but too much need a patronizing friend. Propriety of conduct as a man, and fidelity and attention as an officer, I dare engage for; but with any thing like business, except manual labour, I am totally unacquainted.

I had intended to have closed my late appearance on the stage of life, in the character of a country farmer; but after discharging some filial and fraternal claims, I find I could only fight for existence in that miserable manner which I have lived to see throw a venerable parent into the jaws of a jail; whence death, the poor man's last, and often best, friend, rescued him.*

I know, Sir, that to need your goodness is to have a claim on it; may I, therefore, beg your patronage to forward me in this affair, till I be appointed to a division; where, by the help of rigid economy, I will try to support that independence so dear to my soul, but which has been too often so distant from my situation.

R. B.

* [The filial and fraternal claims to which this letter refers were as follows. Two hundred pounds lent to his brother Gilbert, to enable him to fight out the remainder of the lease of Mossiel—and a considerable sum given to his mother for her own contingencies. Burns was ever a dutiful son and a kind brother.]

† [The verses inclosed were the lines written in Friars'-Carse Hermitage;—"the first fruits," says the Poet else-

No. CXXI.

TO WILLIAM CRUIKSHANK

Ellisland, August, 1788.

I HAVE not room, my dear friend, to answer all the particulars of your last kind letter. I shall be in Edinburgh on some business very soon; and, as I shall be two days, or perhaps three, in town, we shall discuss matters vivá voce. My knee, I believe, will never be entirely well; and an unlucky fall this winter has made it still worse. I well remember the circumstance you allude to, respecting Creech's opinion of Mr. Nicol; but, as the first gentleman owes me still about fifty pounds, I dare not meddle in the affair.

It gave me a very heavy heart to read such accounts of the consequence of your quarrel with that puritanic, rotten-hearted, hell-commissioned scoundrel, A——. If, notwithstanding your unprecedented industry in public, and your irreproachable conduct in private life, he still has you so much in his power, what ruin may he not bring on some others I could name?

Many and happy returns of seasons to you, with your dearest and worthiest friend, and the lovely little pledge of your happy union. May the great Author of life, and of every enjoyment that can render life delightful, make her that comfortable blessing to you both, which you so ardently wish for, and which, allow me to say, you so well deserve! Glance over the foregoing verses, and let me have your blots! †

Adieu.

R. B.

 No. CXXII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Mauchline, August 2nd, 1788.

HONOURED MADAM:

YOUR kind letter welcomed me, yesternight, to Ayr-shire. I am, indeed, seriously angry with you at the quantum of your luckpenny; but, vexed and hurt as I was, I could not help laughing very heartily at the noble lord's apology for the missed napkin.

I would write you from Nithsdale, and give you my direction there, but I have scarce an opportunity of calling at a post-office once in a fortnight. I am six miles from Dumfries, am where, "of my intercourse with the Nithsdale Muse." Some of his best poems were written on the Banks of the Nith; viz., the "Lines on Friars'-Carse Hermitage;" the verses "On Captain Grose's Peregrinations;" "The Whistle;" the "Elegy on Captain Matthew Henderson," and "Tam o' Shanter," with many exquisite songs. The walk in which the Poet loved to muse is still shewn and revered at Ellisland.]

scarcely ever in it myself, and, as yet, have little acquaintance in the neighbourhood. Besides, I am now very busy on my farm, building a dwelling-house; as at present I am almost an evangelical man in Nithsdale, for I have scarce "where to lay my head."

There are some passages in your last that brought tears in my eyes. "The heart knoweth its own sorrows, and a stranger intermeddleth not therewith." The repository of these "sorrows of the heart" is a kind of sanctum sanctorum: and 'tis only a chosen friend, and that, too, at particular, sacred times, who dares enter into them:—

"Heaven oft tears the bosom-chorus
That nature finest strung."

You will excuse this quotation for the sake of the author. Instead of entering on this subject farther, I shall transcribe you a few lines I wrote in a hermitage, belonging to a gentleman in my Nithsdale neighbourhood. They are almost the only favours the muses have conferred on me in that country.—[See Lines written in Friars-Carse Hermitage, page 278.]

Since I am in the way of transcribing, the following were the production of yesterday as I jogged through the wild hills of New Cumnock. I intend inserting them, or something like them, in an epistle I am going to write to the gentleman on whose friendship my Excise hopes depend, Mr. Graham of Fintray, one of the worthiest and most accomplished gentlemen, not only of this country, but, I will dare to say it, of this age. The following are just the first crude thoughts "unhousel'd, unanointed, unanneal'd."—*

* * * *

Here the muse left me. I am astonished at what you tell me of Anthony's writing me. I never received it. Poor fellow! you vex me much by telling me that he is unfortunate. I shall be in Ayr-shire in ten days from this date. I have just room for an old Roman farewell.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CXXIII.

TO THE SAME.

Mauchline, August 10th, 1788.

MY MUCH HONOURED FRIEND :

YOURS of the 24th June is before me. I found it, as well as another valued friend—my wife—waiting to welcome me to Ayr-shire: I met both with the sincerest pleasure.

When I write you, Madam, I do not sit down to answer every paragraph of yours, by echoing every sentiment, like the faithful Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, answering a speech from the best of kings! I express myself in the fulness of my heart, and may, perhaps, be guilty of neglecting some of your kind inquiries; but not, from your very odd reason, that I do not read your letters. All your epistles for several months have cost me nothing, except a swelling throb of gratitude, or a deep-felt sentiment of veneration.

When Mrs. Burns, Madam, first found herself "as women wish to be who love their lords," as I loved her nearly to distraction, we took steps for a private marriage. Her parents got the hint; and not only forbade me her company and their house, but, on my rumoured West Indian voyage, got a warrant to put me in jail, till I should find security in my about-to-be paternal relation. You know my lucky reverse of fortune. On my eclatant return to Mauchline, I was made very welcome to visit my girl. The usual consequences began to betray her; and, as I was at that time laid up a cripple in Edinburgh, she was turned, literally turned out of doors, and I wrote to a friend to shelter her till my return, when our marriage was declared. Her happiness or misery were in my hands, and who could trifle with such a deposit?

I can easily fancy a more agreeable companion for my journey of life; but, upon my honour, I have never seen the individual instance.

Circumstanced as I am, I could never have got a female partner for life who could have entered into my favourite studies, relished my favourite authors, &c., without probably entailing on me at the same time expensive living, fantastic caprice, perhaps apish affectation, with all the other blessed boarding-school acquirements, which (pardonnez moi, Madame,) are sometimes to be found among females of the upper ranks, but almost universally pervade the misses of the would-be gentry.

I like your way in your church-yard lucubrations. Thoughts that are the spontaneous result of accidental situations, either respecting health, place, or company, have often a strength and always an originality that would in vain be looked for in fancied circumstances and studied paragraphs. For me, I have often thought of keeping a letter, in progression by me, to send you when the sheet was written out. Now I talk of sheets, I must tell you, my reason for writing to you on paper of this kind is my pruriency of writing to you at large. A page of post is on such a dis-social, narrow-minded scale, that I cannot abide it; and double letters, at least in my miscellaneous reverie manner, are a monstrous tax in a close correspondence.*

R. B.

* See "First Epistle to Robert Graham," p. 281, commencing "Pity the tuneful muses' hapless strain."

* [In Burns's own Memoranda are these words: I am more and more pleased with the step I took respecting my Jean.

No. CXXIV.

TO THE SAME.

Ellisland, 16th August, 1788.

I AM in a fine disposition, my honoured friend, to send you an elegiac epistle; and want only genius to make it quite Shenstonian:

"Why droops my heart with fancied woes forlorn?
Why sinks my soul beneath each wintry sky?"

My increasing cares in this, as yet, strange country—gloomy conjectures in the dark vista of futurity—consciousness of my own inability for the struggle of the world—my broadened mark to misfortune in a wife and children;—I could indulge these reflections, till my humour should ferment into the most acid chagrin, that would corrode the very thread of life.

To counterwork these baneful feelings, I have sat down to write to you; as I declare upon my soul I always find that the most sovereign balm for my wounded spirit.

I was yesterday at Mr. Miller's to dinner, for the first time. My reception was quite to my mind: from the lady of the house quite flattering. She sometimes hits on a couplet or two, impromptu. She repeated one or two to the admiration of all present. My suffrage, as a professional man, was expected: I for once went agonizing over the belly of my conscience. Pardon me, ye, my adored household gods, independence of spirit, and integrity of soul! In the course of conversation, "Johnson's Musical Museum," a collection of Scottish songs with the music, was talked of. We got a song on the harpsichord, beginning,

"Raving winds around her blowing."*

The air was much admired: the lady of the house asked me whose were the words. "Mine, Madam—they are indeed my very best verses;" she took not the smallest notice of them! The old Scottish proverb says well, "king's chaff is better than ither folks' corn." I was going to make a New Testament quotation about "casting pearls," but that would be too virulent, for the lady is actually a woman of sense and taste.

Two things, from my happy experience, I set down as apothegms in life. A wife's head is immaterial compared with her heart; and Virtue's (for wisdom, what poet pretends to it?) "ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

It is really amusing to observe how anxious the poet has been to reconcile himself and his friends to his marrying a woman of homely understanding and rustic manners. In a letter to Mrs. Dunlop, it drives him into a frantic tirade against all those refinements which constitute the lady—refinements of which he had practically expressed his admiration by his relish of the society of Miss Chalmers, Mrs.

After all that has been said on the other side of the question, man is by no means a happy creature, I do not speak of the selected few, favoured by partial heaven, whose souls are tuned to gladness amid riches and honours, and prudence and wisdom. I speak of the neglected many, whose nerves, whose sinews, whose days are sold to the minions of fortune.

If I thought you had never seen it, I would transcribe for you a stanza of an old Scottish ballad, called, "The Life and Age of Man;" beginning thus:

"'Twas in the sixteenth hunder year
Of God and fifty-three,
Frac Christ was born, that bought us dear,
As writings testify."

I had an old grand-uncle, with whom my mother lived awhile in her girlish years; the good old man, for such he was, was long blind ere he died, during which time his highest enjoyment was to sit down and cry, while my mother would sing the simple old song of "The Life and Age of Man."

It is this way of thinking, it is these melancholy truths, that make religion so precious to the poor, miserable children of men.—If it is a mere phantom, existing only in the heated imagination of enthusiasm,

"What truth on earth so precious as the lie!"

My idle reasonings sometimes make me a little sceptical, but the necessities of my heart always give the cold philosophisings the lie. Who looks for the heart weaned from earth; the soul affianced to her God; the correspondence fixed with heaven; the pious supplication and devout thanksgiving, constant as the vicissitudes of even and morn; who thinks to meet with these in the Court, the palace, in the glare of public life? No: to find them in their precious importance and divine efficacy, we must search among the obscure recesses of disappointment, affliction, poverty, and distress.

I am sure, dear Madam, you are now more than pleased with the length of my letters. I return to Ayr-shire the middle of next week: and it quickens my pace to think that there will be a letter from you waiting me there. I must be here again very soon for my harvest.

R. B.

M'Lehose, Miss Hamilton, Mrs. Dunlop, and many others. His whole conduct on this point only manifests that when, after some experience of Edinburgh society, he had to content himself with his village mistress, he did not make up his mind to the union without some degree of soreness, and that the cause of this soreness was his preference of those very elegancies in the female character which he affected to condemn. Under no other feeling, perhaps, could so sensible a man as Burns have expressed disregard for so important a matter as the intellect of the woman who was to be his wife and the mother of his children.—CHAMBERS.]

* [See page 371.]

No. CXXV.

TO MR. BEUGO,

ENGRAVER, EDINBURGH.

Ellisland, 9th Sept. 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

THERE is not in Edinburgh above the number of the graces whose letters would have given me so much pleasure as yours of the 3d instant, which only reached me yesternight.

I am here on my farm, busy with my harvest; but for all that most pleasurable part of life called SOCIAL COMMUNICATION, I am here at the very elbow of existence. The only things that are to be found in this country, in any degree of perfection, are stupidity and canting. Prose, they only know in graces, prayers, &c., and the value of these they estimate as they do their plaiding webs—by the ell! As for the muses, they have as much an idea of a rhinoceros as of a poet. For my old capricious, but good-natured, hussy of a muse—

“By banks of Nith I sat and wept
When Coila I thought on,
In midst thereof I hung my harp
The willow trees upon.”

I am generally about half my time in Ayr-shire with my “darling Jean,” and then I, at lucid intervals, throw my horny fist across my be-cobwebbed lyre, much in the same manner as an old wife throws her hand across the spokes of her spinning-wheel.

I will send the “Fortunate Shepherdess,” as soon as I return to Ayr-shire, for there I keep it with other precious treasure. I shall send it by a careful hand, as I would not for any thing it should be mislaid or lost. I do not wish to serve you from any benevolence, or other grave Christian virtue; ’tis purely a selfish gratification of my own feelings whenever I think of you.

If your better functions would give you leisure to write me, I should be extremely happy; that is to say, if you neither keep nor look for a regular correspondence. I hate the idea of being obliged to write a letter. I sometimes write a friend twice a week, at other times once a quarter.

I am exceedingly pleased with your fancy in making the author you mention place a map of Iceland instead of his portrait before his works: ’twas a glorious idea.

Could you conveniently do me one thing?—whenever you finish any head I should like to have a proof copy of it. I might tell you a long story about your fine genius; but, as what every body knows cannot have escaped you, I shall not say one syllable about it.

R. B.

No. CXXVI.

TO MISS CHALMERS,

EDINBURGH.

Ellisland, near Dumfries, Sept. 16th, 1788.

WHERE are you? and how are you? and is Lady Mackenzie recovering her health? for I have had but one solitary letter from you. I will not think you have forgot me, Madam; and, for my part—

“When thee, Jerusalem, I forget,
Skill part from my right hand!”

“My heart is not of that rock, nor my soul careless as that sea.” I do not make my progress among mankind as a bowl does among its fellows—rolling through the crowd without bearing away any mark or impression, except where they lit in hostile collision.

I am here, driven in with my harvest-folks by bad weather; and as you and your sister once did me the honour of interesting yourselves much à l’égard de moi, I sit down to beg the continuation of your goodness. I can truly say that, all the exterior of life apart, I never saw two, whose esteem flattered the nobler feelings of my soul—I will not say more, but so much, as Lady Mackenzie and Miss Chalmers. When I think of you—hearts the best, minds the noblest of human kind—unfortunate even in the shades of life—when I think I have met with you, and have lived more of real life with you in eight days than I can do with almost anybody I meet with in eight years—when I think on the improbability of meeting you in this world again—I could sit down and cry like a child! If ever you honoured me with a place in your esteem, I trust I can now plead more desert. I am secure against that crushing grip of iron poverty, which, alas! is less or more fatal to the native worth and purity of, I fear, the noblest souls; and a late important step in my life has kindly taken me out of the way of those ungrateful iniquities, which, however overlooked in fashionable license, or varnished in fashionable phrase, are indeed but lighter and deeper shades of VILLANY.

Shortly after my last return to Ayr-shire, I married “my Jean.” This was not in consequence of the attachment of romance, perhaps; but I had a long and much-loved fellow-creature’s happiness or misery in my determination, and I durst not trifle with so important a deposit. Nor have I any cause to repent it. If I have not got polite tattle, modish manners, and fashionable dress, I am not sickened and disgusted with the multifarious curse of boarding-school affectation: and I have got the handsomest figure, the sweetest temper, the soundest constitution, and the kindest heart in the county. Mrs. Burns believes, as firmly as her creed, that I am le plus bel esprit, et le plus honnête homme in the universe; although she scarcely ever in her life, except the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and the Psalms of David in metre, spent five minutes together on either prose or verse. I must except also from this last a certain late publication of Scots poems, which she has perused very devoutly; and all the ballads in the country, as she has (O the partial lover! you will cry) the finest "wood note wild" I ever heard. I am the more particular in this lady's character, as I know she will henceforth have the honour of a share in your best wishes. She is still at Mauchline, as I am building my house; for this hovel that I shelter in, while occasionally here, is pervious to every blast that blows, and every shower that falls; and I am only preserved from being chilled to death by being suffocated with smoke. I do not find my farm that pennyworth I was taught to expect, but I believe, in time, it may be a saving bargain. You will be pleased to hear that I have laid aside idle éclat, and bind every day after my reapers.

To save me from that horrid situation of at any time going down, in a losing bargain of a farm, to misery, I have taken my Excise instructions, and have my commission in my pocket for any emergency of fortune. If I could set all before your view, whatever disrespect you, in common with the world, have for this business, I know you would approve of my idea.

I will make no apology, dear Madam, for this egotistic detail; I know you and your sister will be interested in every circumstance of it. What signify the silly, idle gewgaws of wealth, or the ideal trumpery of greatness! When fellow-partakers of the same nature fear the same God, have the same benevolence of heart, the same nobleness of soul, the same detestation at every thing dishonest, and the same scorn at every thing unworthy—if they are not in the dependence of absolute beggary, in the name of common sense are they not EQUALS? And if the bias, the instinctive bias of their souls run the same way, may they not be FRIENDS?

When I may have an opportunity of sending you this, Heaven only knows. Shenstone says, "When one is confined idle within doors by bad weather, the best antidote against ennui is to read the letters of, or write to, one's friends;" in that case then, if the weather continues thus, I may scrawl you half a quire.

* [Mr. Morison was a Mauchline cabinet-maker, an excellent workman, and a worthy intelligent person. The Poet, with a feeling for which no one but a worldling will blame him, ordered his furniture to be made in his native place; and Morison made it neat and serviceable. The eight-day

I very lately—to wit, since harvest began—wrote a poem, not in imitation, but in the manner, of Pope's Moral Epistles. It is only a short essay, just to try the strength of my Muse's pinion in that way. I will send you a copy of it, when once I have heard from you. I have likewise been laying the foundation of some pretty large poetic works: how the superstructure will come on, I leave to that great maker and marrer of projects—TIME. Johnson's collection of Scots songs is going on in the third volume; and, of consequence, finds me a consumpt for a great deal of idle metre. One of the most tolerable things I have done in that way is two stanzas I made to an air a musical gentleman of my acquaintance composed for the anniversary of his wedding-day, which happens on the seventh of November. Take it as follows:—

"The day returns—my bosom burns,
The blissful day we twa did meet," &c. See p. 378.

I shall give over this letter for shame. If I should be seized with a scribbling fit, before this goes away, I shall make it another letter; and then you may allow your patience a week's respite between the two. I have not room for more than the old, kind, hearty farewell!

To make some amends, mes chères Mesdames, for dragging you on to this second sheet; and to relieve a little the tiresomeness of my unstudied and uncorrectible prose, I shall transcribe you some of my late poetic bagatelles; though I have, these eight or ten months, done very little that way. One day, in a hermitage on the banks of Nith, belonging to a gentleman in my neighbourhood, who is so good as give me a key at pleasure, I wrote as follows; supposing myself the sequestered, venerable inhabitant of the lonely mansion.

LINES WRITTEN IN PRIARS-CARSE HERMITAGE.

Thou whom chance may hither lead,
Be thou clad in russet weed, &c. See p. 278.

R. B.

No. CXXVII.

TO MR. MORISON,

MAUCLINE.*

Ellisland, September 22, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

NECESSITY obliges me to go into my new house even before it be plastered. I will inha-clock, which went from Mossiel to Ellisland, is also of Mauchline manufacture; it was sold at the death of the Poet's widow for five-and-thirty pounds, and is now in London.]

bit the one end until the other is finished. About three weeks more, I think, will at farthest be my time, beyond which I cannot stay in this present house. If ever you wished to deserve the blessing of him that was ready to perish; if ever you were in a situation that a little kindness would have rescued you from many evils; if ever you hope to find rest in future states of untried being—get these matters of mine ready. My servant will be out in the beginning of next week for the clock. My compliments to Mrs. Morison.

I am, after all my tribulation,
Dear Sir, yours,—R. B.

—◆—
No. CXXVIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP,
OF DUNLOP.

Mauchline, 27th. Sept. 1788.

I HAVE received twins, dear madam, more than once; but scarcely ever with more pleasure than when I received yours of the 12th instant. To make myself understood; I had wrote to Mr. Graham, enclosing my poem addressed to him, and the same post which favoured me with yours brought me an answer from him. It was dated the very day he had received mine; and I am quite at a loss to say whether it was most polite or kind.

Your criticisms, my honoured benefactress, are truly the work of a friend. They are not the blasting deprecations of a canker-toothed, caterpillar critic; nor are they the fair statement of cold impartiality, balancing with unfeeling exactitude the pro and con of an author's merits; they are the judicious observations of animated friendship, selecting the beauties of the piece.* I have just arrived from Nithsdale, and will be here a fortnight. I was on horseback this morning by three o'clock; for between my wife and my farm is just forty-six miles. As I jogged on in the dark, I was taken with a poetic fit, as follows:

"Mrs. Ferguson of Craigarroch's lamentation for the death of her son; an uncommonly promising youth of eighteen or nineteen years of age.

"Fate gave the word—the arrow sped,
And pierced my darling's heart, &c."†

You will not send me your poetic rambles, but, you see, I am no niggard of mine. I am

* [Burns entertained no great respect for what may be styled technical criticism. He loved the man who judged of poetical compositions from the heart—but looked with an evil eye upon those who decided by the cold decisions of the head.]

† [See page 280.]

sure your impromptus give me double pleasure; what falls from your pen can neither be unentertaining in itself, nor indifferent to me.

The one fault you found is just; but I cannot please myself in an emendation.

What a life of solicitude is the life of a parent! You interested me much in your young couple.

I would not take my folio paper for this epistle, and now I repent it. I am so jaded with my dirty long journey that I was afraid to draw into the essence of dulness with any thing larger than a quarto, and so I must leave out another rhyme of this morning's manufacture.

I will pay the sapientipotent George, most cheerfully, to hear from you ere I leave Ayrshire.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CXXIX.

TO MR. PETER HILL.

Mauchline, 1st October, 1788.

I HAVE been here in this country about three days, and all that time my chief reading has been the "Address to Lochlomond" you were so obliging as to send to me.‡ Were I impanelled one of the author's jury, to determine his criminality respecting the sin of poesy, my verdict should be "guilty! A poet of nature's making!" It is an excellent method for improvement, and what I believe every poet does, to place some favourite classic author in his own walks of study and composition, before him, as a model. Though your author had not mentioned the name, I could have, at half a glance, guessed his model to be Thomson. Will my brother-poet forgive me, if I venture to hint that his imitation of that immortal bard is in two or three places rather more servile than such a genius as his required?—e. g.

"To soothe the maddening passions all to peace."
ADDRESS.
"To soothe the throbbing passions into peace."
THOMSON.

I think the "Address" is in simplicity, harmony, and elegance of versification, fully equal to the "Seasons." Like Thomson, too, he has looked into nature for himself: you meet with no copied description. One particular criticism I made at first reading; in no one instance has he said too much. He never flags in his progress, but, like a true poet of nature's making, kindles in his course. His beginning is simple

‡ [The poem entitled "An Address to Loch-Lomond," is said to be written by a gentleman, now one of the masters of the high-school at Edinburgh, and the same who translated the beautiful story of "The Paria," as published in the Bee of Dr. Anderson.—CURRIE.]

and modest, as if distrustful of the strength of his pinion; only, I do not altogether like—

“Truth,
The soul of every song that’s nobly great.”

Fiction is the soul of many a song that is nobly great. Perhaps I am wrong: this may be but a prose criticism. Is not the phrase, in line 7, page 6, “Great lake,” too much vulgarized by every-day language for so sublime a poem?

“Great mass of waters, theme for nobler song,” is perhaps no emendation. His enumeration of a comparison with other lakes is at once harmonious and poetic. Every reader’s ideas must sweep the “Winding margin of a hundred miles.”

The perspective that follows mountains blue—the imprisoned billows beating in vain—the wooded isles—the digression on the yew-tree—“Benlomond’s lofty, cloud-envelop’d head,” &c., are beautiful. A thunder-storm is a subject which has been often tried, yet our poet in his grand picture has interjected a circumstance, so far as I know, entirely original:—

“the gloom
Deep seam’d with frequent streaks of moving fire.”

In his preface to the Storm, “the glens how dark between,” is noble highland landscape! The “rain ploughing the red mould,” too, is beautifully fancied. “Ben-lomond’s lofty, pathless top,” is a good expression; and the surrounding view from it is truly great: the “silver mist,

Beneath the beaming sun,” is well described; and here he has contrived to enliven his poem with a little of that passion which bids fair, I think, to usurp the modern muses altogether. I know not how far this episode is a beauty upon the whole, but the swain’s wish to carry “some faint idea of the vision bright,” to entertain her “partial listening ear,” is a pretty thought. But in my opinion the most beautiful passages in the whole poem are the fowls crowding, in wintry frosts, to Lochlomond’s “hospitable flood;” their wheeling round, their lighting, mixing, diving, &c.; and the glorious description of the sportsman. This last is equal to any thing in the “Seasons.” The idea of “the floating tribes distant seen, far glistening to the moon,” provoking his eye as he is obliged to leave them, is a noble ray of poetic genius. “The howling winds,” the “hideous roar” of “the white cascades,” are all in the same style.

I forget that while I am thus holding forth with the heedless warmth of an enthusiast, I am perhaps tiring you with nonsense. I must, however, mention that the last verse of the sixteenth page is one of the most elegant compliments I have ever seen. I must likewise notice that beautiful paragraph beginning “The gleaming lake,” &c. I dare not go into the particular beauties of the last two paragraphs, but they are admirably fine, and truly Ossianic.

I must beg your pardon for this lengthened scrawl. I had no idea of it when I began—I should like to know who the author is; but, whoever he be, please present him with my grateful thanks for the entertainment he has afforded me.

A friend of mine desired me to commission for him two books, “Letters on the Religion essential to Man,” a book you sent me before; and “The World Unmasked, or the Philosopher the greatest Cheat.” Send me them by the first opportunity. The Bible you sent me is truly elegant; I only wish it had been in two volumes.

R. B.

No. CXXX.

TO THE EDITOR OF “THE STAR.”*

November 8th, 1788.

SIR:

NORWITHSTANDING the opprobrious epithets with which some of our philosophers and gloomy sectarians have branded our nature—the principle of universal selfishness, the proneness to all evil, they have given us—still, the detestation in which inhumanity to the distressed, or insolence to the fallen, are held by all mankind, shews that they are not natives of the human heart. Even the unhappy partner of our kind, who is undone—the bitter consequence of his follies or his crimes—who but sympathizes with the miseries of this ruined profligate brother? We forget the injuries, and feel for the man.

I went, last Wednesday, to my parish church, most cordially to join in grateful acknowledgment to the AUTHOR OF ALL GOOD, for the consequent blessings of the glorious revolution. To that auspicious event we owe no less than our liberties, civil and religious; to it we are likewise indebted for the present Royal Family, the ruling features of whose administration have ever been mildness to the subject, and tenderness of his rights.*

* [One of the conductors of the “London Star” at that period, and for many years afterwards, was John Mayne, a warm-hearted Dumfriessian, and author of “Logan Braes,” and a lyric more touching still, “The Muffled Drum.” His poem of “Glasgow” has been several times reprinted, and his “Siller Gun” appeared in a fourth edition in 1835, with notes by the Author. This amiable and worthy man died in 1836. It is, perhaps, one of the best of our local poems, full of character and manners—joyous humour and rustic gaiety.]

Bred and educated in revolution principles, the principles of reason and common sense, it could not be any silly political prejudice which made my heart revolt at the harsh, abusive manner in which the reverend gentleman† mentioned the House of Stuart, and which, I am afraid, was too much the language of the day. We may rejoice sufficiently in our deliverance from past evils, without cruelly raking up the ashes of those whose misfortune it was, perhaps, as much as their crime, to be the authors of those evils; and we may bless GOD for all his goodness to us as a nation, without, at the same time, cursing a few ruined, powerless exiles, who only harboured ideas, and made attempts, that most of us would have done, had we been in their situation.

“The bloody and tyrannical House of Stuart” may be said with propriety and justice, when compared with the present royal family, and the sentiments of our days; but is there no allowance to be made for the manners of the times? Were the royal contemporaries of the Stuarts more attentive to their subjects’ rights? Might not the epithets of “bloody and tyrannical” be, with at least equal justice, applied to the House of Tudor, of York, or any other of their predecessors?

The simple state of the case, Sir, seems to be this:—at that period, the science of government, the knowledge of the true relation between king and subject, was, like other sciences and other knowledge, just in its infancy, emerging from dark ages of ignorance and barbarity.

The Stuarts only contended for prerogatives which they knew their predecessors enjoyed, and which they saw their contemporaries enjoying; but these prerogatives were inimical to the happiness of a nation and the rights of subjects.

In this contest between prince and people, the consequence of that light of science which had lately dawned over Europe, the monarch of France, for example, was victorious over the struggling liberties of his people: with us, luckily, the monarch failed, and his unwarrantable pretensions fell a sacrifice to our rights and happiness. Whether it was owing to the wisdom of leading individuals, or to the justling of parties, I cannot pretend to determine; but likewise, happily for us, the kingly power was shifted into another branch of the family, who, as they owed the throne solely to the call of a free people, could claim nothing inconsistent with the covenanted terms which placed them there.

The Stuarts have been condemned and laughed at for the folly and impracticability of their attempts in 1715 and 1745. That they failed, I bless GOD; but cannot join in the ridicule against them. Who does not know that the abilities or defects of leaders and commanders are often hidden until put to the touchstone of exigency; and that there is a caprice of fortune, an omnipotence in particular accidents and conjunctures of circumstances, which exalt us as heroes, or brand us as madmen, just as they are for or against us?

Man, Mr. Publisher, is a strange, weak, inconsistent being: who would believe, Sir, that in this our Augustan age of liberality and refinement, while we seem so justly sensible and jealous of our rights and liberties, and animated with such indignation against the very memory of those who would have subverted them—that a certain people under our national protection should complain, not against our monarch and a few favourite advisers, but against our WHOLE LEGISLATIVE BODY, for similar oppression, and almost in the very same terms, as our forefathers did of the House of Stuart! I will not, I cannot, enter into the merits of the cause; but I dare say the American Congress, in 1776, will be allowed to be as able and as enlightened as the English Convention was in 1688; and that their posterity will celebrate the centenary of their deliverance from us as duly and sincerely as we do ours from the oppressive measures of the wrong-headed House of Stuart.

To conclude, Sir; let every man who has a tear for the many miseries incident to humanity, feel for a family illustrious as any in Europe, and unfortunate beyond historic precedent; and let every Briton (and particularly every Scotsman), who ever looked with reverential pity on the dotage of a parent, cast a veil over the fatal mistakes of the kings of his forefathers.

R. B.

No. CXXXI.

TO MRS. DUNLOP,
AT MOREHAM MAINS.

Mauchline, 13th November, 1788.

MADAM:

I HAD the very great pleasure of dining at Dunlop yesterday. Men are said to flatter women because they are weak; if it is so, poets must be weaker still; for Misses R. and K. and Miss G. M’K., with their flattering attentions, and artful compliments, absolutely turned my head. I own they did not lard me over as many a poet does his patron, but they

* [This passage evinces the loyal feelings of our Bard, and may well be contrasted with the bitter lines on Stirling, so ridiculously carped upon by some critics.]

† [The preacher alluded to was Mr. Kirkpatrick, a man equally stern and worthy. He got a “harmonious call” to a parish with a smaller stipend than Dunscore, and accepted it.]

so intoxicated me with their sly insinuations and delicate inuendos of compliment, that, if it had not been for a lucky recollection how much additional weight and lustre your good opinion and friendship must give me in that circle, I had certainly looked upon myself as a person of no small consequence. I dare not say one word how much I was charmed with the Major's friendly welcome, elegant manner, and acute remark, lest I should be thought to balance my orientalisms of applause over-against the finest quey [Heifer] in Ayr-shire, which he made me a present of to help and adorn my farming stock. As it was on hallow-day, I am determined annually as that day returns, to decorate her horns with an ode of gratitude to the family of Dunlop.

So soon as I know of your arrival at Dunlop, I will take the first conveniency to dedicate a day, or perhaps two, to you and friendship, under the guarantee of the Major's hospitality. There will soon be three-score and ten miles of permanent distance between us; and now that your friendship and friendly correspondence is entwisted with the heart-strings of my enjoyment of life, I must indulge myself in a happy day of the "The feast of reason and the flow of soul."

R. B.

No. CXXXII.

TO MR. JAMES JOHNSON,

ENGRAVER.

Mauchline, November 15th, 1788.

MY DEAR SIR:

I HAVE sent you two more songs. If you have got any tunes, or any thing to correct, please send them by return of the carrier.

I can easily see, my dear friend, that you will very probably have four volumes. Perhaps you may not find your account lucratively in this business; but you are a patriot for the music of your country; and I am certain posterity will look on themselves as highly indebted to your public spirit. Be not in a hurry; let us go on correctly, and your name shall be immortal.

I am preparing a flaming preface for your third volume. I see every day new musical publications advertised; but what are they? Gaudy, hunted butterflies of a day, and then vanish for ever: but your work will outlive the momentary neglects of idle fashion, and defy the teeth of time.

Have you never a fair goddess that leads you a wild-goose chase of amorous devotion? Let me know a few of her qualities, such as whether she be rather black, or fair; plump, or thin; short, or tall, &c.; and choose your air, and I shall task my muse to celebrate her.*

R. B.

No. CXXXIII.

TO DR. BLACKLOCK.

Mauchline, November 15th, 1788.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:

AS I hear nothing of your motions, but that you are, or were, out of town, I do not know where this may find you, or whether it will find you at all. I wrote you a long letter, dated from the land of matrimony, in June; but either it had not found you, or, what I dread more, it found you or Mrs. Blacklock in too precarious a state of health and spirits to take notice of an idle packet.

I have done many little things for Johnson, since I had the pleasure of seeing you; and I have finished one piece, in the way of Pope's "Moral Epistles;" but, from your silence, I have every thing to fear, so I have only sent you two melancholy things, which I tremble lest they should too well suit the tone of your present feelings.

In a fortnight I move, bag and baggage, to Nithsdale; till then, my direction is at this place; after that period, it will be at Ellisland, near Dumfries. It would extremely oblige me, were it but half a line, to let me know how you are, and where you are. Can I be indifferent to the fate of a man to whom I owe so much? A man whom I not only esteem, but venerate.

My warmest good wishes and most respectful compliments to Mrs. Blacklock, and Miss Johnston, if she is with you.

I cannot conclude without telling you that I am more and more pleased with the step I took respecting "my Jean." Two things, from my happy experience, I set down as apophthegms in life. A wife's head is immaterial, compared with her heart; and—"Virtue's (for wisdom what poet pretends to

* [James Johnson, proprietor of the "Musical Museum," was a kindly sort of person, and indulged his correspondent, the Bard, with many a flowing bowl during their studies on the mystic art of uniting music and poetry. The engraved pewter plates of the work became, after his death, the property of Mr. Blackwood; and it is the wonder of many that a publisher so shrewd and enterprising has hitherto refrained from giving a new edition of a work so truly characteristic and national to the world: a copy of "The Scots Musical Museum" is one of the rarest of all rare things in the public market.—CUNNINGHAM.

A new edition has appeared of this celebrated work (1840), containing some valuable remarks on Scottish Song by the late ingenious Mr. Stenhouse, and the indefatigable Librarian to the writers of the Signet, Mr. David Laing. We have enriched the present edition of the Poet's works by many interesting quotations from the work in question.—C.]

it ?) ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." Adieu !* R. B.

[Here follow "The mother's lament for the loss of her son," and the song beginning "The lazy mist hangs from the brow of the hill." See p. 280; and p. 380.]

No. CXXXV.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 17th December, 1788.

MY DEAR HONOURED FRIEND :

YOURS, dated Edinburgh, which I have just read, makes me very unhappy. "Almost blind and wholly deaf," are melancholy news of human nature; but when told of a much-loved and honoured friend, they carry misery in the sound. Goodness on your part, and gratitude on mine, began a tie which has gradually entwisted itself among the dearest chords of my bosom, and I tremble at the omens of your late and present ailing habit and shattered health. You miscalculate matters, widely, when you forbid my waiting on you, lest it should hurt my worldly concerns. My small scale of farming is exceedingly more simple and easy than what you have lately seen at Moreham Mains. But, be that as it may, the heart of the man and the fancy of the poet are the two grand considerations for which I live: if miry ridges and dirty dunghills are to engross the best part of the functions of my soul immortal, I had better been a rook or a magpie at once, and then I should not have been plagued with any ideas superior to breaking of clods and picking up grubs; not to mention barn-door cocks or mallards, creatures with which I could almost exchange lives at any time. If you continue so deaf, I am afraid a visit will be no great pleasure to either of us; but if I hear you are got so well again as to be able to relish conversation, look you to it, Madam, for I will make my threatenings good. I am to be at the New-year-day fair of Ayr; and, by all that is sacred in the world, friend, I will come and see you.

Your meeting, which you so well describe, with your old schoolfellow and friend, was truly interesting. Out upon the ways of the world!—They spoil these "social offsprings of the heart." Two veterans of the "men of the world" would have met with little more heart-workings than two old hacks worn out on the road. Apropos, is not the Scotch phrase, "Auld lang syne," exceedingly expressive?

* [It was little that Blacklock had in his power to do for a brother poet—but that little he did with a fond alacrity, and with a modest grace.—"Poetry was to him the dear solace of perpetual blindness; cheerfulness, even to gaiety, was, notwithstanding that irremediable misfortune, long the predominant colour of his mind. In his latter years, when the gloom might otherwise have thickened around him, hope,

There is an old song and tune which have often thrilled through my soul. You know I am an enthusiast in old Scotch songs. I shall give you the verses on the other sheet, as I suppose Mr. Ker will save you the postage.

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot?"†

Light be the turf on the breast of the Heaven-inspired poet who composed this glorious fragment! There is more of the fire of native genius in it than in half-a-dozen of modern English Bacchanalians! Now I am on my hobby-horse, I cannot help inserting two other old stanzas, which please me mightily:—

"Go fetch to me a pint of wine."‡

R. B.

No. CXXXV.

TO MISS DAVIES.

December, 1788.

MADAM :

I UNDERSTAND my very worthy neighbour, Mr. Riddel, has informed you that I have made you the subject of some verses. There is something so provoking in the idea of being the burthen of a ballad that I do not think Job, or Moses, though such patterns of patience and meekness, could have resisted the curiosity to know what that ballad was: so my worthy friend has done me a mischief, which I dare say he never intended; and reduced me to the unfortunate alternative of leaving your curiosity ungratified, or else disgusting you with foolish verses, the unfinished production of a random moment, and never meant to have met your ear. I have heard or read somewhere of a gentleman who had some genius, much eccentricity, and very considerable dexterity with his pencil. In the accidental group of life into which one is thrown, wherever this gentleman met with a character in a more than ordinary degree congenial to his heart, he used to steal a sketch of the face, merely, he said, as a nota bene, to point out the agreeable recollection to his memory. What this gentleman's pencil was to him, my muse is to me; and the verses I do myself the honour to send you are a memento exactly of the same kind that he indulged in.

It may be more owing to the fastidiousness of my caprice than the delicacy of my taste; but I am so often tired, disgusted, and hurt with faith, devotion the most fervent and sublime, exalted his mind to heaven, and made him maintain his wonted cheerfulness in the expectation of a speedy dissolution."—HERON.]

† [See p. 474.]

‡ [See p. 379.]

It is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that these songs are both of Burns's own composition.

the insipidity, affectation, and pride of mankind, that when I meet with a person "after my own heart," I positively feel what an orthodox Protestant would call a species of idolatry, which acts on my fancy like inspiration; and I can no more desist rhyming, on the impulse, than an Eolian harp can refuse its tones to the streaming air. A distich or two would be the consequence, though the object which hit my fancy were grey-bearded age; but where my theme is youth and beauty, a young lady whose personal charms, wit, and sentiment are equally striking and unaffected—by heavens! though I had lived three-score years a married man, and three-score years before I was a married man, my imagination would hallow the very idea: and I am truly sorry that the enclosed stanzas have done such poor justice to such a subject.*

R. B.

No. CXXXVI.

TO MR. JOHN TENNANT.†

December, 22, 1788.

I YESTERDAY tried my cask of whiskey for the first time, and I assure you it does you great credit. It will bear five waters, strong; or six, ordinary toddy. The whiskey of this country is a most rascally liquor; and, by consequence, only drunk by the most rascally part of the inhabitants. I am persuaded, if you once get a footing here, you might do a great deal of business, in the way of consumpt; and should you commence distiller again, this is the native barley country. I am ignorant if, in your present way of dealing, you would think it worth your while to extend your business so far as this country side. I write you this on the account of an accident, which I must take the merit of having partly designed to. A neighbour of

* [The Laird of Glenriddel, it appears, had informed that Burns was making a ballad on her beauty. The Poet took advantage of this, and sent the song enclosed in this truly characteristic letter.
"The charming, lovely Davies"]

† [Mr. Tennant, of Ayr, one of the few surviving early friends of Burns, has the following recollections respecting him:—"He first knew the poet, when attending Mr. Murdoch's school at Ayr, he being then fifteen, and Burns a year and a half older. Burns and he were favourite pupils of Murdoch, who used to take them alternately to live with him, allowing them a share of his bed. Mr. Murdoch was a well-informed and zealous teacher—a particularly good French scholar, inasmuch that he at one time taught the language in France. He thought his voice had some peculiar quality of power, adapting it in an uncommon degree for French pronunciation. To this predilection of the teacher it is probably owing that Burns acquired so much French, and had such a fancy for introducing snatches of it into his letters. Murdoch was so anxious to advance his two favourite pupils that, while they were living with him, he was always taking opportunities of communicating knowledge. The intellectual gifts of Burns even at this time greatly impressed his fellow-scholar. Robert and Gilbert mine, a John Currie, miller in Carse-mill;—a man who is, in a word, a "very" good man, even for a £500 bargain—he and his wife were in my house the time I broke open the cask. They keep a country public house, and sell a great deal of foreign spirits, but all along thought that whiskey would have degraded this house. They were perfectly astonished at my whiskey, both for its taste and strength; and, by their desire, I write you to know if you could supply them with liquor of an equal quality, and what price. Please write me by first post, and direct to me at Ellisland, near Dumfries. If you could take a jaunt this way yourself, I have a spare spoon, knife, and fork, very much at your service. My compliments to Mrs. Tennant, and all the good folks in Glenconner and Barquharrie.

R. B.

No. CXXXVII.

TO JOHN RICHMOND,

EDINBURGH.

[Mossgiel, 9th July, 1766.]

MY DEAR FRIEND,

WITH the sincerest grief I read your letter. You are truly a son of misfortune. I shall be extremely anxious to hear from you how your health goes on; if it is in any way re-establishing: or if Leith promises well; in short, how you feel in the inner man.

No news worth any thing: only godly Bryan was in the inquisition yesterday, and half the country-side as witnesses against him. He still stands out steady and denying: but proof was led yester-night of circumstances highly suspicious; almost de facto: one of the servant girls made faith that she upon a time rashly entered the house—to speak in your cant, "in the hour of cause."

Burns were like no other young men. Their style of language was quite above that of their compeers. Robert had borrowed great numbers of books, and acquainted himself with their contents. He read rapidly, but remembered all that was interesting or valuable in what he read. He had the New Testament more at command than any other youth ever known to Mr. Tennant; who was, altogether, more impressed in these his boyish days by the discourse of the youthful poet than he afterwards was by his published verses. The elocution of Burns resembled that of Edmund Kean—deep, thoughtful, emphatic; and in controversy, no man could stand before him.†

‡ [The mill of John Currie stood on a small stream, which feeds the Loch of Friars-Carse. A little island seems to float in the midst of this sheet of water, to which it is said the people in ancient times, during an English raid, carried their most valuable effects.

Among the letters and memoranda of the Poet, many lines and couplets occur in praise of ale, or the "dearest of distillations—last and best." Some are worse—some better than the following:—

"I may be drunk to-night,
I'll never be drunk no more:
But aye where they sell guid ale,
I may look in at the door."]

I have waited on Armour since her return home: not from any the least view of reconciliation, but merely to ask for her health, and—to you I will confess it—from a foolish bantering fondness—very ill placed indeed. The mother forbade me the house, nor did Jean shew the penitence that might have been expected. However, the priest, I am informed, will give me a certificate as a single man, if I comply with the rules of the church, which, for that very reason, I intend to do.

I am going to put on sackcloth and ashes this day. I am indulged so far as to appear in my own seat. Peccavi, pater, miserere mei. My book will be ready in a fortnight. If you have any subscribers, return them by Connell. The Lord stand with the righteous: amen, amen.*

R. B.

No. CXXXVIII.

TO JAMES JOHNSON,†

EDITOR OF THE SCOTS MUSICAL MUSEUM.

[Lawnmarket, Friday noon, 3d May, 1787.]

DEAR SIR:

I have sent you a song never before known, for your collection; the air by M'Gibbon, but I know not the author of the words, as I got it from Dr. Blacklock.

Farewell, my dear Sir! I wished to have seen you, but I have been dreadfully thronged, as I march to-morrow. Had my acquaintance with you been a little older, I would have asked the favour of your correspondence, as I have met with few people whose company and conversation gave me so much pleasure, because I have met with few whose sentiments are so congenial to my own.

When Dunbar and you meet, tell him that I left Edinburgh with the idea of him hanging somewhere about my heart.

Keep the original of this song till we meet again, whenever that may be.

R. B.

No. CXXXIX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

[Ellisland, New-year-day Morning, 1789.]

THIS, dear Madam, is a morning of wishes, and would to God that I came under the apos-

* [The minister who so boldly took it upon him to pronounce Burns a single man, after he had been married according to the law and usage of Scotland, was the Rev. Mr. Auld, of Mauchline. That he had no such power, no one can deny. The kirk of Scotland and the civil law were long at variance on the important subject of marriage. When a young pair were married by a magistrate, the minister of their parish not uncommonly caused them to endure a rebuke in the church before they were re-admitted to its bosom; this was sometimes resisted by the more obstinate or knowing of the peasantry, and ill blood, harsh words, and threats of kirk-censure were the consequence. Burns, instead of mounting the common seat of shame, was allowed to stand in his own seat. There might be other reasons for this: Auld was alarmed lest severity on his part should call forth a burning satire on that of the other; moreover, the re-

tle James's description!—the prayer of a righteous man availeth much. In that case, Madam, you should welcome in a year full of blessings; every thing that obstructs or disturbs tranquility and self-enjoyment should be removed, and every pleasure that frail humanity can taste should be yours. I own myself so little a Presbyterian that I approve of set times and seasons of more than ordinary acts of devotion, for breaking in on that habituated routine of life and thought, which is so apt to reduce our existence to a kind of instinct, or even sometimes, and with some minds, to a state very little superior to mere machinery.

This day; the first Sunday of May; a breezy, blue-skied noon some time about the beginning, and a hoary morning and calm sunny day, about the end of autumn; these, time out of mind, have been with me a kind of holiday.

I believe I owe this to that glorious paper in the Spectator, "The Vision of Mirza," a piece that struck my young fancy before I was capable of fixing an idea to a word of three syllables: "On the 5th day of the moon, which, according to the custom of my forefathers, I always keep holy, after having washed myself, and offered up my morning devotions, I ascended the high hill of Bagdat, in order to pass the rest of the day in meditation and prayer."

We know nothing, or next to nothing, of the substance or structure of our souls, so cannot account for those seeming caprices in them that one should be particularly pleased with this thing, or struck with that, which, on minds of a different cast, makes no extraordinary impression. I have some favourite flowers in spring, among which are the mountain-daisy, the hare-bell, the fox-glove, the wild brier-rose, the budding birch, and the hoary hawthorn, that I view and hang over with particular delight. I never hear the loud, solitary whistle of the curlew in a summer noon, or the wild mixing cadence of a troop of grey plovers, in an autumnal morning, without feeling an elevation of soul like the enthusiasm of devotion or poetry. Tell me, my dear friend, to what can this be owing? Are we a piece of machinery, which, like the Eolian harp, passive, takes the impression of the passing accidentance-stool had other occupants; the poet was one of seven who appeared, figuratively at least, in sack-cloth on the same day. In one of his memorandum books occurs the following singular entry:—"Mem.: to enquire at Mr. M'Math whether, when a man has appeared in church for a child, and had another prior to it in point of time, but not discovered till after, he is liable for that one again. Note. The child was five and a half years old before the father was cited."

The above Letter was communicated to Mr. Cunningham by James Grierson, Esq., of Dalgonar, in Dumfries-shire.]

† [This letter was first published in Hogg and Motherwell's edition of the Poet's works, and was communicated by James Smith, Esq., of Jordan-hill. The song which it enclosed has not been ascertained.]

dent? Or do these workings argue something within us above the trodden clod? I own myself partial to such proofs of those awful and important realities—a God that made all things—man's immaterial and immortal nature—and a world of weal or woe beyond death and the grave.*

R. B.

No. CXL.

TO DR. MOORE.

Ellisland, 4th Jan. 1789.

SIR,

As often as I think of writing to you, which has been three or four times every week these six months, it gives me something so like the idea of an ordinary-sized statue offering at a conversation with the Rhodian colossus, that my mind misgives me, and the affair always miscarries somewhere between purpose and resolve. I have at last got some business with you, and business letters are written by the style-book. I say my business is with you, Sir, for you never had any with me, except the business that benevolence has in the mansion of poverty.

The character and employment of a poet were formerly my pleasure, but are now my pride. I know that a very great deal of my late eclat was owing to the singularity of my situation, and the honest prejudice of Scotsmen; but still, as I said in the preface to my first edition, I do look upon myself as having some pretensions from Nature to the poetic character. I have not a doubt but the knack, the aptitude, to learn the muses' trade, is a gift bestowed by Him "who forms the secret bias of the soul;"—but I as firmly believe that excellence in the profession is the fruit of industry, labour, attention, and pains. At least I am resolved to try my doctrine by the test of experience. Another appearance from the press I put off to a very distant day, a day that may never arrive—but poesy I am determined to prosecute with all my vigour. Nature has given very few, if any, of the profession, the talents of shining in every species of composition. I shall try (for until trial it is impossible to know) whether she has qualified me to shine in any one. The worst of it is, by the time one has finished a piece, it has been so often viewed and reviewed before the mental eye that one loses, in a good measure, the powers of critical discrimination. Here the best criterion I know is a friend—not only of abilities to judge, but with good-nature enough, like a prudent teacher with a young learner, to praise perhaps a little more than is exactly just, lest the thin-skinned animal fall into that most deplorable of all poetic diseases—heart-breaking despondency of himself.—Dare I, Sir, already immensely indebted to your goodness, ask the additional obligation of your being that friend to me? I enclose you an essay of mine in a walk of poesy to me entirely new; I mean the epistle addressed to R. G., Esq., or Robert Graham, of Fintray Esq., a gentleman of uncommon worth, to whom I lie under very great obligations. The story of the poem, like most of my poems, is connected with my own story, and to give you the one, I must give you something of the other. I cannot boast of Mr. Creech's ingenuous fair dealing with me. He kept me hanging about Edinburgh from the 7th August 1787, until the 13th April 1788, before he would condescend to give me a statement of affairs; nor had I got it even then, but for an angry letter I wrote him, which irritated his pride. "I could" not a "tale" but a detail "unfold," but what am I that should speak against the Lord's anointed Bailie of Edinburgh?†

I believe I shall, in the whole, (100*l.* copy-right included,) clear about 400*l.* some little odds; and even part of this depends upon what the gentleman has yet to settle with me. I give you this information, because you did me the honour to interest yourself much in my welfare. I give you this information, but I give it to yourself only, for I am still much in the gentleman's mercy. Perhaps I injure the man in the idea I am sometimes tempted to have of him—God forbid I should! A little time will try, for in a month I shall go to town to wind up the business if possible.

To give the rest of my story in brief, I have married "my Jean," and taken a farm: with the first step I have every day more and more reason to be satisfied: with the last, it is rather the reverse. I have a younger brother, who

* [That this mood of feeling and reflection was not uncommon in the household of "The Burns Family," the following letter, written on the same day, will sufficiently shew:

"DEAR BROTHER,

"I HAVE just finished my New-year's day breakfast in the usual form, which naturally makes me call to mind the days of former years, and the society in which we used to begin them; and when I look at our family vicissitudes, 'thro' the dark postern of time long elapsed, I cannot help remarking to you, my dear brother, how good the God of Seasons is to us; and that, however some clouds may seem to lower over the portion of time before us, we have great reason to hope that all will turn out well.

"Mossiel, 1st Jan., 1789.

"Your mother and sisters, with Robert the second, join me in the compliments of the season to you and Mrs. Burns, and beg you will remember us in the same manner to William, the first time you see him.

"I am, dear Brother, yours,

"GILBERT BURNS."]

† [Those who publish books for authors are not in general the most prompt in rendering returns, and for this there is some reason, as well as excuse, in the forms and circumstances of the book-trade; but Mr. Creech was remarkable for his reluctance to settle accounts of any kind, and of this the poet seems to have been eminently a victim.—CHAMBERS.]

supports my aged mother; another still younger brother, and three sisters, in a farm. On my last return from Edinburgh, it cost me about 180*l.* to save them from ruin. Not that I have lost so much—I only interposed between my brother and his impending fate by the loan of so much. I give myself no airs on this, for it was mere selfishness on my part: I was conscious that the wrong scale of the balance was pretty heavily charged, and I thought that throwing a little filial piety and fraternal affection into the scale in my favour, might help to smooth matters at the grand reckoning. There is still one thing would make my circumstances quite easy: I have an excise officer's commission, and I live in the midst of a country division. My request to Mr. Graham, who is one of the Commissioners of Excise, was, if in his power, to procure me that division. If I were very sanguine, I might hope that some of my great patrons might procure me a treasury warrant for supervisor, surveyor-general, &c.

Thus, secure of a livelihood, "to thee, sweet poetry, delightful maid," I would consecrate my future days.*

R. B.

 No. CXLII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

Ellisland, Jan. 6, 1789.

MANY happy returns of the season to you, my dear Sir! May you be comparatively happy up to your comparative worth among the sons of men; which wish would, I am sure, make you one of the most blest of the human race.

I do not know if passing as a "Writer to the signet" be a trial of scientific merit, or a mere business of friends and interest. However it be, let me quote you my two favourite passages, which, though I have repeated them ten thousand times, still they rouse my manhood and steel my resolution like inspiration.

— "On Reason build resolve,
That column of true majesty in man."

YOUNG.

"Hear, Alfred, hero of the state,
Thy genius heaven's high will declare;
The triumph of the truly great
Is never, never to despair!
Is never to despair!"

MASQUE OF ALFRED.

I grant you enter the lists of life, to struggle for bread, business, notice, and distinction, in common with hundreds.—But who are they? Men, like yourself, and of that aggregate body your compeers, seven tenths of whom come short of your advantages natural and accidental; while two of those that remain either neglect their parts, as flowers blooming in a desert, or mis-spend their strength, like a bull goring a bramble bush.

* [The poet was not slow in perceiving that Ellisland was not the bargain he had reckoned on. He had intimated this before to Margaret Chalmers; and time only confirmed his surmises. Well might he apply to himself the words of Scripture, "And behold nothing which this man sets his heart upon shall prosper."—CUNNINGHAM.]

But to change the theme: I am still catering for Johnson's publication; and among others, I have brushed up the following old favourite song a little, with a view to your worship. I have only altered a word here and there; but if you like the humour of it, we shall think of a stanza or two to add to it.†

R. B.

 No. CXLII.

TC

PROFESSOR DUGALD STEWART.

Ellisland, 20th Jan. 1789.

SIR,

THE enclosed sealed packet I sent to Edinburgh, a few days after I had the happiness of meeting you in Ayr-shire, but you were gone for the Continent. I have now added a few more of my productions, those for which I am indebted to the Nithsdale Muses. The piece inscribed to R. G., Esq., is a copy of verses I sent Mr. Graham, of Fintray, accompanying a request for his assistance in a matter, to me, of very great moment. To that gentleman I am already doubly indebted: for deeds of kindness of serious import to my dearest interests, done in a manner grateful to the delicate feelings of sensibility. This poem is a species of composition new to me, but I do not intend it shall be my last essay of the kind, as you will see by the "Poet's Progress." These fragments, if my design succeed, are but a small part of the intended whole. I propose it shall be the work of my utmost exertions, ripened by years; of course I do not wish it much known. The fragment beginning "A little upright, pert, tart, &c.," I have not shewn to man living, till I now send it you. It forms the postulata, the axioms, the definition of a character, which, if it appear at all, shall be placed in a variety of lights. This particular part I send you merely as a sample of my hand at portrait-sketching; but, lest idle conjecture should pretend to point out the original, please to let it be for your single, sole inspection.

† [The name of the song which the poet brushed up and sent to his friend is no where intimated; it was no doubt one of a humorous or convivial cast. He was at this period, and indeed for years after, busily employed in writing original compositions, and in collecting and amending scraps of old song for Johnson's Musical Museum.]

Need I make any apology for this trouble to a gentleman who has treated me with such marked benevolence and peculiar kindness—who has entered into my interests with so much zeal, and on whose critical decisions I can so fully depend? A poet as I am by trade, these decisions are to me of the last consequence. My late transient acquaintance among some of the mere rank and file of greatness, I resign with ease; but to the distinguished champions of genius and learning I shall be ever ambitious of being known. The native genius and accurate discernment in Mr. Stewart's critical strictures; the justness (iron justice, for he has no bowels of compassion for a poor poetic sinner) of Dr. Gregory's remarks, and the delicacy of Professor Dalzel's taste, I shall ever revere.*

I shall be in Edinburgh some time next month.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your highly obliged, and very humble servant,

R. B.

No CXLIII.

TO BISHOP GEDDES.†

Ellisland, 3d Feb. 1789.

VENERABLE FATHER,

As I am conscious that, wherever I am, you do me the honour to interest yourself in my welfare, it gives me pleasure to inform you, that I am here at last, stationary in the serious business of life, and have now not only the retired leisure, but the hearty inclination, to attend to those great and important questions—what I am? where I am? and for what I am destined?

In that first concern, the conduct of the man, there was ever but one side on which I was habitually blameable, and there I have secured myself in the way pointed out by Nature and Nature's God. I was sensible that, to so helpless a creature as a poor poet, a wife and family were incumbrances, which a species of prudence would bid him shun; but when the alternative was, being at eternal warfare with myself, on account of habitual follies, to give them no worse name, which no general example, no licentious wit, no sophistical infidelity, would, to me, ever justify, I must have been a fool to have hesitated, and a madman to have made another choice. Besides, I had in "my Jean" a long and much loved fellow creature's happiness or misery among my hands—and who could trifle with such a deposit?

In the affair of a livelihood, I think myself tolerably secure: I have good hopes of my farm, but should they fail, I have an excise commission, which, on my simple petition, will, at any time, procure me bread. There is a certain stigma affixed to the character of an excise officer, but I do not pretend to borrow honour from my profession; and though the salary be comparatively small, it is luxury to any thing that the first twenty-five years of my life taught me to expect.

Thus, with a rational aim and method in life, you may easily guess, my reverend and much-honoured friend, that my characteristical trade is not forgotten. I am, if possible, more than ever an enthusiast to the muses. I am determined to study man and nature, and in that view incessantly; and to try if the ripening and corrections of years can enable me to produce something worth preserving.

You will see in your book, which I beg your pardon for detaining so long, that I have been tuning my lyre on the banks of Nith. Some large poetic plans that are floating in my imagination, or partly put in execution, I shall impart to you when I have the pleasure of meeting with you; which, if you are then in Edinburgh, I shall have about the beginning of March.

That acquaintance, worthy Sir, with which you were pleased to honour me, you must still allow me to challenge; for with whatever unconcern I give up my transient connexion with the merely Great, I cannot lose the patronizing notice of the learned and good, without the bitterest regret.

R. B.

* [The poet alludes to the merciless strictures of Dr. Gregory on the poem the "Wounded Hare," when he says he has no bowels of compassion for a poor poetic sinner. Stewart was more gentle in his criticisms: of him and his lady—a poetess of no mean powers—Burns ever spoke in terms almost rapturous; they were kind to him when friends were few and praise scanty—he was not a man to forget such obligations.]

† [Alexander Geddes, to whom this letter is addressed, was born at Arradowl in Banff-shire, in 1737. He was a scholar and controversialist; a poet, too, and one of the bishops of the broken remnant of the ancient Catholic church of Scotland. He is known in verse as the author of a very clever rustic poem, beginning

"There was a wee wifekie, was coming frae the fair."

He is also known as the translator of one of the books of the Iliad. In his controversies and conversation he was so liberal that he incurred the displeasure of some of his brethren in Scotland, which induced him to remove to London, where he was patronized by Lord Petre, and undertook a "New Translation of the Bible," the prospectus to which is said to have alarmed both Jews and Christians. He was a man of undoubted talents and learning; his temper was quick, and his vanity not little. He died 20th February, 1802, in the sixty-fifth year of his age.

The volume which Burns sent to the bishop was the Edinburgh copy of his poems, with the addition, in his own hand-writing, of such compositions as the muse of Nithsdale had inspired. The blanks too in the print were all filled up. This precious book belongs to Margaret Geddes, the wife of John Hyslop, surgeon, Finsbury-square, grandson of John Maxwell, of Terraughty, to whom the poet addressed one of his most spirited epistles; it is in good preservation, and is equally excellent hands.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. CXLIV.

TO MR. JAMES BURNES.

Ellisland, 9th Feb. 1789.

MY DEAR SIR,

WHY I did not write to you long ago is what, even on the rack, I could not answer. If you can in your mind form an idea of indolence, dissipation, hurry, cares, change of country, entering on untried scenes of life, all combined, you will save me the trouble of a blushing apology. It could not be want of regard for a man for whom I had a high esteem before I knew him—an esteem which has much increased since I did know him; and, this caveat entered, I shall plead guilty to any other indictment with which you shall please to charge me.

After I parted from you, for many months my life was one continued scene of dissipation. Here at last I am become stationary, and have taken a farm and—a wife.

The farm is beautifully situated on the Nith, a large river that runs by Dumfries, and falls into the Solway frith. I have gotten a lease of my farm as long as I pleased; but how it may turn out is just a guess, and it is yet to improve and enclose, &c.; however, I have good hopes of my bargain on the whole.

My wife is my Jean, with whose story you are partly acquainted. I found I had a much loved fellow-creature's happiness or misery among my hands, and I durst not trifle with so sacred a deposit. Indeed I have not any reason to repent the step I have taken, as I have attached myself to a very good wife, and have shaken myself loose of every bad failing.

I have found my book a very profitable business, and with the profits of it I have begun life pretty decently. Should fortune not favour me in farming, as I have no great faith in her fickle ladyship, I have provided myself in another resource, which, however some folks may affect to despise it, is still a comfortable shift in the day of misfortune. In the heyday of my fame, a gentleman, whose name at least I dare say you know, as his estate lies somewhere near Dundee, Mr. Graham, of Fintray, one of the Commissioners of Excise, offered me the commission of an excise officer. I thought it prudent to accept the offer; and accordingly I took my instructions, and have my commission by me. Whether I may ever do duty, or be a penny the better for it, is what I do not know; but I have the comfortable assurance that, come whatever ill fate will, I can, on my simple petition to the Excise-Board, get into employ.

We have lost poor uncle Robert this winter. He has long been very weak, and, with very little alteration on him, he expired 3rd Jan.

His son William has been with this winter, and goes in May to be an apprentice to a mason. His other son, the eldest, John, comes to me I expect in summer. They are both remarkably stout young fellows, and promise to do well. His only daughter, Fanny, has been with me ever since her father's death, and I purpose keeping her in my family till she be quite woman grown, and fit for better service. She is one of the cleverest girls, and has one of the most amiable dispositions, I have ever seen.*

All friends in this country and Ayr-shire are well. Remember me to all friends in the north. My wife joins me in compliments to Mrs. B. and family.

I am ever, my dear Cousin,

Yours, sincerely,

R. B.

No. CXLV.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 4th March, 1789.

HERE am I, my honoured friend, returned safe from the capital. To a man who has a home, however humble or remote—if that home is, like mine, the scene of domestic comfort—the bustle of Edinburgh will soon be a business of sickening disgust.

“Vain pomp and glory of this world, I hate you!”

When I must skulk into a corner, lest the rattling equipage of some gaping blockhead should mangle me in the mire, I am tempted to exclaim—“What merits has he had, or what demerit have I had, in some state of pre-existence, that he is ushered into this state of being with the sceptre of rule, and the key of riches in his puny fist, and I am kicked into the world, the sport of folly, or the victim of pride?” I have read somewhere of a monarch (in Spain I think it was), who was so out of humour with the Ptolomean system of astronomy that he said, had he been of the CREATOR'S council, he could have saved him a great deal of labour and absurdity. I will not defend this blasphemous speech; but often, as I have glided with humble stealth through the pomp of Princes'-street, it has suggested itself to me, as an improvement on the present human figure, that a man, in proportion to his own

* Fanny Burns, the poet's cousin, merited all the commendations he has here bestowed. She subsequently became the wife of Adam Armour, the brother of Bonnie Jean;

she went with her husband to Mauchline, and is still alive (1838). Her son is now with his paternal uncle, pursuing successfully the honourable calling of a London merchant.]

conceit of his consequence in the world, could have pushed out the longitude of his common size, as a snail pushes out his horns, or as we draw out a perspective. This trifling alteration, not to mention the prodigious saving it would be in the tear and wear of the neck and limbsinews of many of his majesty's liege subjects, in the way of tossing the head and tiptoe strutting, would evidently turn out a vast advantage, in enabling us at once to adjust the ceremonials in making a bow, or making way to a great man, and that too within a second of the precise spherical angle of reverence, or an inch of the particular point of respectful distance, which the important creature itself requires; as a measuring-glance at its towering altitude would determine the affair like instinct.

You are right, Madam, in your idea of poor Mylne's poem, which he has addressed to me. The piece has a good deal of merit, but it has one great fault—it is, by far, too long. Besides, my success has encouraged such a shoal of ill-spawned monsters to crawl into public notice, under the title of Scottish Poets, that the very term Scottish Poetry borders on the burlesque. When I write to Mr. Carfrae, I shall advise him rather to try one of his deceased friend's English pieces. I am prodigiously hurried with my own matters, else I would have requested a perusal of all Mylne's poetic performances; and would have offered his friends my assistance in either selecting or correcting what would be proper for the press. What it is that occupies me so much, and perhaps a little oppresses my spirits, shall fill up a paragraph in some future letter. In the mean time, allow me to close this epistle with a few lines done by a friend of mine * * *. I give you them, that, as you have seen the original, you may guess whether one or two alterations I have ventured to make in them be any real improvement.

“ Like the fair plant that from our touch withdraws,
Shrink, mildly fearful, even from applause,
Be all a mother's fondest hope can dream,
And all you are, my charming * * * *, seem.
Straight as the fox-glove, ere her bells disclose,
Mild as the maiden-blushing hawthorn blows,
Fair as the fairest of each lovely kind,
Your form shall be the image of your mind;
Your manners shall so true your soul express
That all shall long to know the worth they guess;
Congenial hearts shall greet with kindred love,
And even sick'ning envy must approve.”*

R. B.

* [These beautiful lines, we have reason to believe, are the production of the lady to whom this letter is addressed. —CERRIE.]

† [The letter of the Rev. Peter Carfrae to the poet of Ayrshire is as follows:—

January 2nd, 1789.

SIR,—If you have lately seen Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, you have certainly heard of the author of the verses which

No. CXLVI.

TO THE REV. P. CARFRAE.

March, 1789.

REV. SIR:

I do not recollect that I have ever felt a severer pang of shame than on looking at the date of your obliging letter which accompanied Mr. Mylne's poem.

I am much to blame: the honour Mr. Mylne has done me, greatly enhanced in its value by the endearing, though melancholy, circumstance of its being the last production of his muse, deserved a better return.

I have, as you hint, thought of sending a copy of the poem to some periodical publication; but, on second thoughts, I am afraid that, in the present case, it would be an improper step. My success, perhaps as much accidental as merited, has brought an inundation of nonsense under the name of Scottish poetry. Subscription-bills for Scottish poems have so dunned, and daily do dun the public, that the very name is in danger of contempt. For these reasons, if publishing any of Mr. Mylne's poems in a magazine, &c., be at all prudent, in my opinion it certainly should not be a Scottish poem. The profits of the labours of a man of genius are, I hope, as honourable as any profits whatever; and Mr. Mylne's relations are most justly entitled to that honest harvest which fate has denied himself to reap. But let the friends of Mr. Mylne's fame (among whom I crave the honour of ranking myself) always keep in eye his respectability as a man and as a poet, and take no measure that, before the world knows any thing about him, would risk his name and character being classed with the fools of the times.

I have, Sir, some experience of publishing; and the way in which I would proceed with Mr. Mylne's poems is this:—I would publish, in two or three English and Scottish public papers, any one of his English poems which should, by private judges, be thought the most excellent, and mention it, at the same time, as one of the productions of a Lothian farmer, of respectable character, lately deceased, whose poems his friends had it in idea to publish, soon, by subscription, for the sake of his numerous family:—not in pity to that family, but in justice to what his friends think the poetic merits of the deceased; and to secure, in the most effectual manner, to those tender connexions, whose right it is, the pecuniary reward of those merits. † accompany this letter. He was a man highly respectable for every accomplishment and virtue which adorns the character of a man or a Christian. To a great degree of literature, of taste, and poetic genius, were added an invincible modesty of temper, which prevented, in some measure, his figuring in life, and confined the perfect knowledge of his character and talents to the small circle of his chosen friends. He was ultimately taken from us, a few weeks ago, by an inflamma-

R. B.

No. CXLVII.

TO DR. MOORE.

Ellisland, 23rd March, 1789.

SIR:

THE gentleman who will deliver you this is a Mr. Nielson, a worthy clergyman in my neighbourhood, and a very particular acquaintance of mine.* As I have troubled him with this packet, I must turn him over to your goodness, to recompense him for it in a way in which he much needs your assistance, and where you can effectually serve him:—Mr. Nielson is on his way for France, to wait on his Grace of Queensberry, on some little business of a good deal of importance to him, and he wishes for your instructions respecting the most eligible mode of travelling, &c., for him, when he has crossed the Channel. I should not have dared to take this liberty with you, but that I am told, by those who have the honour of your personal acquaintance, that to be a poor honest Scotchman is a letter of recommendation to you, and that to have it in your power to serve such a character gives you much pleasure.

The enclosed ode is a compliment to the memory of the late Mrs. Oswald, of Auchencruive. You, probably, knew her personally, an honour of which I cannot boast; but I spent my early years in her neighbourhood, and among her servants and tenants. I know that she was detested with the most heartfelt cordiality. However, in the particular part of her conduct which roused my poetic wrath, she was much less blameable. In January last, on my road to Ayr-shire, I had put up at Bailie Whigham's, in Sanquhar, the only tolerable inn in the place. The frost was keen, and the grim evening and howling wind were ushering in a night of snow and drift. My horse and I were both much fatigued with the labours of the day, and just as my friend the Bailie and I were bidding defiance to the storm, over a smoking bowl, in wheels the funeral pageantry of the late great Mrs. Oswald, and poor I was forced to brave all the horrors of the tempestuous night, and jade my horse, my young favourite horse, whom I had just christened Pegasus, twelve miles farther on, through the wildest moors and hills of Ayr-shire, to New Cumnock, the next inn. The powers of poesy and prose sink under me, when I would describe what I felt. Suffice it to say that, when a good fire at New Cumnock had so far recovered my frozen sinews, I sat down and wrote the enclosed ode.

I was at Edinburgh lately, and settled finally with Mr. Creech; and I must own that, at last, he has been amicable and fair with me.

R. B.†

tory fever, in the prime of life—beloved by all who enjoyed his acquaintance, and lamented by all who have any regard for virtue or genius. There is a woe pronounced in Scripture against the person whom all men speak well of; if ever that woe fell upon the head of mortal man, it fell upon him. He has left behind him a considerable number of compositions, chiefly poetical; sufficient, I imagine, to make a large octavo volume. In particular, two complete and regular tragedies, a farce of three acts, and some smaller poems on different subjects. It falls to my share, who have lived in the most intimate and uninterrupted friendship with him from my youth upwards, to transmit to you the verses he wrote on the publication of your incomparable poems. It is probable they were his last, as they were found in his scrutoire, folded up in the form of a letter addressed to you, and, I imagine, were only prevented from being sent by himself by that melancholy dispensation which we still bemoan. The verses themselves I will not pretend to criticise when writing to a gentleman whom I consider as entirely qualified to judge of their merit. They are the only verses he seems to have attempted in the Scottish style; and I hesitate not to say, in general, that they will bring no dishonour on the Scottish muse;—and allow me to add that, if it is your opinion they are not unworthy of the Author, and will be no discredit to you, it is the inclination of Mr. Mylne's friends that they should be immediately published in some periodical work, to give the world a specimen of what may be expected from his performances in the poetic line, which, perhaps, will be afterwards published for the advantage of his family.

I must beg the favour of a letter from you, acknowledging the receipt of this, and to be allowed to subscribe myself, with great regard,

Sir, your most obedient servant,

P. CARFRAE.]

* [The Rev. Edward Nielson, whom the poet introduces to the notice of Moore, was Minister of Kirkbean, on the Solway;—he was eloquent and learned, a jovial man, and loved good cheer and merry company, rather more than became his station. He lived on a smuggling coast; numbered among his parishioners men concerned in the contraband trade, nor did he escape the suspicion of silently permitting a traffic which injured the morals of his people more deeply than either his admonitions or example could mend.]

† [Dr. Moore's reply to this letter is as follows:—

Clifford-street, June 10, 1789.

“DEAR SIR,

“I thank you for the different communications you have made me of your occasional productions in manuscript, all of which have merit, and some of them merit of a different kind from what appears in the poems you have published. You ought carefully to preserve all your occasional productions, to correct and improve them at your leisure; and when you can select as many of these as will make a volume, publish it either at Edinburgh or London, by subscription; on such an occasion, it may be in my power, as it is very much in my inclinations, to be of service to you.

“If I were to offer an opinion, it would be that in your future productions you should abandon the Scottish stanza and dialect, and adopt the measure and language of modern English poetry.

“The stanza which you use in imitation of Christ Kirk on the Green, with the tiresome repetition of ‘that day,’ is fatiguing to English ears, and I should think not very agreeable to Scottish.

“All the fine satire and humour of your Holy Fair is lost on the English; yet, without more trouble to yourself, you could have conveyed the whole to them. The same is true of some of your other poems. In your Epistle to James Smith, the stanzas from that beginning with this line, ‘This life, so far’s I understand,’ to that which ends with, ‘Short while it grieves,’ are easy, flowing, gaily philosophical, and, of Horatian elegance—the language is English, with a few Scottish words, and some of those so harmonious as to add to the beauty; for what poet would not prefer gleaming to twilight?

“I imagine that by carefully keeping, and occasionally polishing and correcting, those verses, which the Muse dictates, you will, within a year or two, have another volume as large as the first, ready for the press; and this without diverting you from every proper attention to the study and practice of husbandry, in which I understand you are very

No. CXLVIII.

TO MR. WILLIAM BURNS.

Isle, March 25, 1789.

I HAVE stolen from my corn-sowing this minute to write a line to accompany your shirt and hat, for I can no more. Your sister Nannie arrived yesternight, and begs to be remembered to you. Write me every opportunity—never mind postage. My head, too, is as addle as an egg this morning, with dining abroad yesterday. I received yours by the mason. Forgive me this foolish-looking scrawl of an epistle.

I am ever,

My dear William,

Yours,

R. B.

P. S.—If you are not then gone from Longtown, I'll write you a long letter by this day se'nnight. If you should not succeed in your tramps, don't be dejected, nor take any rash step—return to us in that case, and we will court Fortune's better humour. Remember this, I charge you.*

R. B.

No. CXLIX.

TO MR. HILL.

Ellisland, 2nd April, 1789.

I WILL make no excuse, my dear Bibliopolus, (GOD forgive me for murdering language!) that I have sat down to write you on this vile paper.

It is economy, Sir; it is that cardinal virtue, prudence; so I beg you will sit down, and either compose or borrow a panegyric. If you are going to borrow, apply to * * * * * † to compose, or rather to compound, something very clever on my remarkable frugality; that I write to one of my most esteemed friends on this wretched paper, which was originally intended for the venal fist of some drunken exciseman, to take dirty notes in a miserable vault of an ale-cellar.

learned, and which I fancy you will choose to adhere to as a wife, while poetry amuses you from time to time as a mistress. The former, like a prudent wife, must not shew ill humour, although you retain a sneaking kindness to this agreeable gipsy, and pay her occasional visits, which in no manner alienates your heart from your lawful spouse, but tends, on the contrary, to promote her interest. I desired Mr. Cadell to write to Mr. Creech, to send you a copy of Zeluco. This performance has had great success here; but I shall be glad to have your opinion of it, because I value your opinion, and because I know you are above saying what you do not think.

"I beg you will offer my best wishes to my very good friend, Mrs. Hamilton, who I understand is your neighbour. If she is as happy as I wish her, she is happy enough. Make my compliments also to Mrs. Burns, and believe me to be with sincere esteem, dear Sir, yours, &c. ———"

* [The original of the above letter from the Poet to his

O Frugality! thou mother of ten thousand blessings—thou cook of fat beef and dainty greens!—thou manufacturer of warm Shetland hose, and comfortable surtouts!—thou old housewife, darning thy decayed stockings with thy ancient spectacles on thy aged nose!—lead me, hand me in thy clutching palsied fist, up those heights, and through those thickets, hitherto inaccessible, and impervious to my anxious, weary feet:—not those Parnassian crags, bleak and barren, where the hungry worshippers of fame are, breathless, clambering, hanging between heaven and hell; but those glittering cliffs of Potosi, where the all-sufficient, all-powerful deity, Wealth, holds his immediate Court of joys and pleasures; where the sunny exposure of plenty, and the hot walls of profusion, produce those blissful fruits of luxury, exotics in this world, and natives of Paradise!

—Thou withered sybil, my sage conductress, usher me into thy refulgent, adored presence!—The power, splendid and potent as he now is, was once the puling nursing of thy faithful care, and tender arms!—Call me thy son, thy cousin, thy kinsman, or favourite, and adjure the god, by the scenes of his infant years, no longer to repulse me as a stranger, or an alien, but to favour me with his peculiar countenance and protection!—He daily bestows his greatest kindness on the undeserving and the worthless—assure him that I bring ample documents of meritorious demerits! Pledge yourself for me, that, for the glorious cause of LUCRE, I will do any thing, be any thing—but the horse-leech of private oppression, or the vulture of public robbery!

But to descend from heroics.

* * * *

I want a Shakspeare; I want likewise an English dictionary—Johnson's, I suppose, is the best. In these, and all my prose commissions, the cheapest is always the best for me. There is a small debt of honour that I owe Mr. Robert Clegghorn, in Saughton Mills, my worthy friend, and your well-wisher. Please give him, and urge him to take it, the first time you see him, ten shillings worth of any thing you have to sell, and place it to my account.

brother William, is in the possession of Mr. J. Fraser, of the Red Lion Inn, Shakspeare Square, Edinburgh (a poet of no mean powers, and author of "Craigmillar," the "Soldier's Dream," and many other pieces, 1 vol. published in Edinburgh some time ago). The letter is framed and placed between two plates of glass—is suspended in one of the public apartments of the "Red Lion," where, trifling though it be, it is regarded by many visitors as a relic of no ordinary interest, and may be seen by any of the Poet's admirers. The letter was presented by Mr. Begg, schoolmaster, Ormiston, East Lothian, the poet's nephew (son of Nannie, alluded to in the letter.) to Mr. St. George Haddington, and by the latter gentleman to our friend Fraser.—The letter itself is common-place enough, but the P. S. is strongly characteristic of Burns.—Kilmarnock Journal.

† [Probably the name required to fill up this blank was CREECH.—CHAMBERS.]

The library scheme that I mentioned to you is already begun, under the direction of Captain Riddel. There is another in emulation of it going on at Closeburn, under the auspices of Mr. Monteith, of Closeburn, which will be on a greater scale than ours. Captain Riddel gave his infant society a great many of his old books, else I had written you on that subject; but, one of these days, I shall trouble you with a commission for "The Monkland Friendly Society"*—a copy of The Spectator, Mirror, and Lounger, Man of Feeling, Man of the World, Guthrie's Geographical Grammar, with some religious pieces, will likely be our first order.

When I grow richer, I will write to you on gilt post, to make amends for this sheet. At present, every guinea has a five guinea errand with

My dear Sir,
Your faithful, poor, but honest friend,
R. B.

No. CL.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 4th April, 1789.

I NO sooner hit on any poetic plan of fancy but I wish to send it to you: and if knowing and reading these give half the pleasure to you that communicating them to you gives to me I am satisfied.

I have a poetic whim in my head, which I at present dedicate, or rather inscribe, to the Right Hon. Charles James Fox; but how long that fancy may hold, I cannot say. A few of the first lines I have just rough-sketch'd as follows:—[See the Sketch inscribed to the illustrious Statesman, page 283, with some additional lines recently published.]

On the 20th current I hope to have the honour of assuring you, in person, how sincerely I am—

R. B.

No. CLI.

TO MRS. M'URDO,

DRUMLANRIG.

Ellisland, 2nd May 1789.

MADAM:

I HAVE finished the piece which had the happy fortune to be honoured with your approbation; and never did little Miss with more sparkling pleasure shew her applauded sampler to partial mamma than I now send my poem † to you and Mr. M'Murdo if he is returned to Drumlanrig. You cannot easily imagine what thin-skinned animals—what sensitive plants poor poets are. How do we shrink into the embittered corner of self-abasement, when neglected or condemned by those to whom we look up! and how do we, in erect importance, add another cubit to our stature on being noticed and applauded by those whom we honour and respect! My late visit to Drumlanrig has, I can tell you, Madam, given me a balloon waft up Parnassus, where on my fancied elevation I regard my poetic self with no small degree of complacency. Surely, with all their sins, the rhyming tribe are not ungrateful creatures.—I recollect your goodness to your humble guest—I see Mr. M'Murdo adding to the politeness of the gentleman the kindness of a friend, and my heart swells, as it would burst with warm emotions and ardent wishes! It may be it is not gratitude—it may be a mixed sensation. That strange, shifting, doubling animal MAN is so generally, at best, but a negative, often a worthless, creature, that we cannot see real goodness and native worth without feeling the bosom glow with sympathetic approbation.

With every sentiment of grateful respect,

I have the honour to be,

Madam,

Your obliged and grateful humble servant,

R. B.

No. CLII.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Ellisland, 4th May, 1789.

MY DEAR SIR,

YOUR duty-free favour of the 26th April I received two days ago; I will not say I perused it with pleasure; that is the cold compliment of ceremony; I perused it, Sir, with delicious satisfaction;—in short, it is such a letter that not you, nor your friend, but the legislature, by express proviso in their postage laws, should frank. A letter informed with the soul of friendship is such an honour to human nature, that they should order it free ingress and egress to and from their bags and mails, as an encouragement and mark of distinction to super-eminent virtue.

* [The Monkland Society existed only while Captain Riddel lived, whose activity and taste aided in its establishment and continuance. Such clubs, when wisely conducted, are extremely beneficial: they diffuse useful and elegant knowledge among the rude and unlettered, and direct men's minds to the contemplation of what is worthy and noble. History, biography, voyages and travels, are chiefly required; the peasantry of the north are sufficiently well acquainted with divinity and verse.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The poem alluded to was the song entitled, "There was a lass and she was fair," inserted at page 463. The heroine was the eldest daughter of Mrs. M'Murdo, and sister to Phillis. Their charms gave lustre to some of the poet's happiest lyrics.]

I have just put the last hand to a little poem, which I think will be something to your taste. One morning lately, as I was out pretty early in the fields, sowing some grass seeds, I heard the burst of a shot from a neighbouring plantation, and presently a poor little wounded hare came crippling by me. You will guess my indignation at the inhuman fellow who could shoot a hare at this season, when all of them have young ones. Indeed there is something in that business of destroying for our sport individuals in the animal creation, that do not injure us materially, which I could never reconcile to my ideas of virtue.

Inhuman man! curse on thy barb'rous art,
And blasted be thy murder-aiming eye!
May never pity soothe thee with a sigh,
Nor ever pleasure glad thy cruel heart!

[See "The Wounded Hare," page 284.]

Let me know how you like my poem. I am doubtful whether it would not be an improvement to keep out the last stanza but one altogether.*

Cruikshank † is a glorious production of the Author of man. You, he, and the noble Colonel ‡ of the Crochallan Fencibles are to me

"Dear as the ruddy drops which warm my heart."

I have a good mind to make verses on you all, to the tune of "Three good fellows ayont the glen."

R. B.

No. CLIII.

TO MR. SAMUEL BROWN. §

Mossiel, 4th May, 1789.

DEAR UNCLE,

THIS, I hope, will find you and your conjugal yoke-fellow in your good old way; I am impatient to know if the Ailsa fowling be commended for this season yet, as I want three or four stones of feathers, and I hope you will bespeak them for me. It would be a vain attempt for me to enumerate the various transactions I have been engaged in since I saw you last; but this know—I am engaged in a smuggling trade, and God knows if ever any poor man experienced better returns, two for one; but as freight and delivery have turned out so dear, I am thinking of taking out a license and beginning in fair trade. I have taken a farm on the borders of the Nith, and in imitation of the old Patriarchs, get men-servants and maid-servants, and flocks and herds, and beget sons and daughters.

Your obedient Nephew,
R. B.

No. CLIV.

TO RICHARD BROWN.

Mauchline, 21st May, 1789.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I WAS in the country by accident, and hearing of your safe arrival, I could not resist the temptation of wishing you joy on your return—wishing you would write to me before you sail again—wishing you would always set me down as your bosom friend—wishing you long life and prosperity, and that every good thing may attend you—wishing Mrs. Brown and your little ones as free of the evils of this world as is consistent with humanity—wishing you and she were to make two at the ensuing lying-in, with which Mrs. B. threatens very soon to favour me—wishing I had longer time to write to you at present; and, finally, wishing that, if there is to be another state of existence, Mr. B., Mrs. B., our little ones, and both families, and you and I, in some snug retreat, may make a jovial party to all eternity!

My direction is at Ellisland, near Dumfries.

Your's,
R. B.

* [The poem on the Wounded Hare had also been sent by Burns to Dr. Gregory for his criticism.
The following is that gentleman's reply:—

Edinburgh, June 2nd, 1789.

"DEAR SIR,
"I TAKE the first leisure hour I could command to thank you for your letter, and the copy of verses enclosed in it. As there is real poetic merit, I mean both fancy and tenderness, and some happy expressions in them, I think they well deserve that you should revise them carefully, and polish them to the utmost. This, I am sure, you can do if you please, for you have great command both of expression and of rhymes; and you may judge from the two last pieces of Mrs. Hunter's poetry, that I gave you, how much correctness and high polish enhance the value of such compositions. As you desire it, I shall with great freedom give you my most rigorous criticisms on your verses. I wish you would give me another edition of them, much amended, and I will send it to Mrs. Hunter, who I am sure will have much pleasure in reading it. Pray give me likewise for myself, and her too, a copy (as much amended as you please) of the 'Water Fowl on Loch Turit.'"

Here follows the criticism, which is inserted after the poem itself—p. 285.]

† ["Mr. Cruikshank of the High School. We know a gentleman in mature life, who lived as boarder and pupil with Cruikshank, and to whom the character of the man, in consequence of the severity of his discipline, appeared in a very different light from what it did in the eyes of his boon-companion—Burns."—CHAMBERS.]

‡ [Mr. William Dunbar, W. S.]

§ [Samuel Brown was brother to the poet's mother, and seems to have been a joyous and tolerant sort of person. He appears also to have been somewhat ignorant of the poet's motions, for the license to which he alludes was taken out nearly a twelvemonth before this letter was written.]

No. CLV.

TO MR. JAMES HAMILTON.*

Ellisland, 26th May, 1789.

DEAR SIR,

I SEND you by John Glover, Carrier, the above account for Mr. Turnbull, as I suppose you know his address.

I would fain offer, my dear Sir, a word of sympathy with your misfortunes; but it is a tender string, and I know not how to touch it. It is easy to flourish a set of high-flown sentiments on the subjects that would give great satisfaction to—a breast quite at ease; but as ONE observes, who was very seldom mistaken in the theory of life, "The heart knoweth its own sorrows, and a stranger intermeddeth not therewith."

Among some distressful emergencies that I have experienced in life, I ever laid this down as my foundation of comfort—That he who has lived the life of an honest man has by no means lived in vain!

With every wish for your welfare and future success,

I am, my dear Sir,

Sincerely yours,

R. B.

No. CLVI.

TO WILLIAM CREECH, Esq.

Ellisland, 30th May, 1789.

SIR,

I HAD intended to have troubled you with a long letter, but at present the delightful sensations of an omnipotent tooth-ache so engross all my inner man as to put it out of my power even to write nonsense. However, as in duty bound, I approach my bookseller with an offering in my hand—a few poetic clinches, and a song:—To expect any other kind of offering from the Rhyming Tribe would be to know them much less than you do. I do not pretend that there is much merit in these morçeaux, but I have two reasons for sending them; prima, they are mostly ill-natured, so are in unison with my present feelings, while fifty troops of infernal spirits are driving post from ear to ear along my jaw bones; and secondly, they are so short, that you cannot leave off in the middle, and so hurt my pride in the idea that you found any work of mine too heavy to get through.

I have a request to beg of you, and I not only beg of you, but conjure you, by all your wishes and by all your hopes, that the muse will spare the satiric wink in the moment of your foibles; that she will warble the song of rapture round your hymeneal couch; and that she will shed on your turf the honest tear of elegiac gratitude! Grant my request as speedily as possible—send me by the very first fly or coach for this place three copies of the last edition of my poems, which place to my account.

Now may the good things of prose, and the good things of verse, come among thy hands, until they be filled with the good things of this life, prayeth

R. B.†

No. CLVII.

TO MR. M^Y ULEY,

OF DUMBARTON.

Ellisland, 4th June, 1789.

DEAR SIR,

THOUGH I am not without my fears respecting my fate at that grand, universal inquest of right and wrong, commonly called The Last Day, yet I trust there is one sin, which that arch-vagabond, Satan, who I understand is to be king's evidence, cannot throw in my teeth—I mean ingratitude. There is a certain pretty large quantum of kindness for which I remain, and, from inability, I fear must still remain, your debtor; but, though unable to repay the debt, I assure you, Sir, I shall ever warmly remember the obligation. It gives me the sincerest pleasure to hear by my old acquaintance, Mr. Kennedy, that you are, in immortal Allan's language, "Hale, and weel, and living;" and that your charming family are well, and promising to be an amiable and respectable addition to the company of performers, whom the Great Manager of the Drama of Man is bringing into action for the succeeding age.

With respect to my welfare, a subject in which you once warmly and effectively interested yourself, I am here in my old way, holding my plough, marking the growth of my

* [James Hamilton was a grocer in Glasgow, and interested himself early in the fame and fortunes of the poet. That he had not the success in life which his friend imagined he merited seems plain by this letter, and perhaps there are few who will not feel that Burns has, with uncommon delicacy, consoled with him in his misfortunes, and suggested a topic of consolation at once rational and religious.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The poetic address to "The Tooth-ache" seems to be the offspring of this period. The "venomed stang" was fully felt during the composition of the epistle: but no one, save a sufferer under this "hell of a' diseases," can sympathize in the expression that fifty troops of infernal spirits were driving post from ear to ear along his jaw-bones! This letter may be taken as another proof of the poet's desire to render himself acceptable to his friends: he seldom folded up one without enclosing in it, or inserting in one of the pages, a short poem or one of his sweetest lyrics.—CUNNINGHAM.]

corn, or the health of my dairy; and at times sauntering by the delightful windings of the Nith, on the margin of which I have built my humble domicile, praying for seasonable weather, or holding an intrigue with the Muses; the only gypsies with whom I have now any intercourse. As I am entered into the holy state of matrimony, I trust my face is turned completely Zion-ward; and as it is a rule with all honest fellows to repeat no grievances, I hope that the little poetic licences of former days will of course fall under the oblivious influence of some good-natured statute of celestial prescription. In my family devotion, which, like a good Presbyterian, I occasionally give to my household^d folks, I am extremely fond of the psalm, "Let not the errors of my youth," &c.; and that other; "Lo! children are God's heritage," &c.; in which last Mrs. Burns, who by the bye has a glorious "wood-note wild" at either old song or psalmody, joins me with the pathos of Handel's Messiah.

R. B.

 No. CLVIII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

Ellisland, 8th June, 1789.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I AM perfectly ashamed of myself when I look at the date of your last. It is not that I forget the friend of my heart and the companion of my peregrinations; but I have been condemned to drudgery beyond sufferance, though not, thank God, beyond redemption. I have had a collection of poems by a lady put into my hands to prepare them for the press; which horrid task, with sowing corn with my own hand, a parcel of masons, wrights, plasterers, &c., to attend to, roaming on business through Ayr-shire—all this was against me, and the very first dreadful article was of itself too much for me.

13th. I have not had a moment to spare from incessant toil since the 8th. Life, my dear Sir, is a serious matter. You know, by experience, that a man's individual self is a good deal, but believe me, a wife and family of children, whenever you have the honour to be a husband and a father, will shew you that your present and most anxious hours of solitude are spent on trifles. The welfare of those who are very dear to us, whose only support, hope, and stay we are—this, to a generous mind, is another sort of more important object of care than any concerns whatever which centre merely in the individual. On the other hand, let no young, unmarried, rake-helly dog among you make a song of his pretended liberty, and freedom from care. If the relations we stand in to king, country, kindred, and friends, be any thing but the visionary fancies of dreaming metaphysicians; if religion, virtue, magnanimity, generosity, humanity, and justice, be aught but empty sounds; then the man who may be said to live only for others, for the beloved, honourable female, whose tender faithful embrace endears life, and for the helpless little innocents who are to be the men and women, the worshippers of his God, the subjects of his king, and the support, nay the very vital existence of his COUNTRY, in the ensuing age;—compare such a man with any fellow whatever, who, whether he bustle and push in business, among labourers, clerks, statesmen; or whether he roar and rant, and drink and sing in taverns—a fellow over whose grave no one will breathe a single heigh-ho, except from the cobweb-tie of what is called good fellowship—who has no view nor aim but what terminates in himself—if there be any grovelling earth-born wretch of our species, a renegade to common sense, who would fain believe that the noble creature man is no better than a sort of fungus, generated out of nothing, nobody knows how, and soon dissipating in nothing, nobody knows where; such a stupid beast, such a crawling reptile, might balance the foregoing unexaggerated comparison, but no one else would have the patience.

Forgive me, my dear Sir, for this long silence. To make you amends, I shall send you soon, and more encouraging still, without any postage, one or two rhymes of my later manufacture.*

R. B.

 No. CLIX.

TO MR. M'URDO.†

Ellisland, 19th June, 1789.

SIR:

A POET and a beggar are, in so many points of view, alike, that one might take them for the same individual character under different designations; were it not that though, with a trifling poetic license, most poets may be styled beggars, yet the converse of the proposition

* [This truly noble letter is worth a volume of sermons on domestic morality: he who wrote it spoke from his own experience, and no one has talked more wisely on the subject.]

† [John M'Urdo, of Drumlanrig, was one of Burns' firmest Nithsdale friends, and was united with others, at the poet's death, in the management of his affairs, which prospered so well that two hundred pounds per annum became the widow's portion for many years before she was laid in the grave. Burns was sensible of other charms at Drumlanrig than those of loveliness, wit, and a well-spread table: he admired the mansion, copied after the design of Inigo Jones—and more the winding Nith, which seems anxious at that place to become as picturesque as possible. The rushing river, the woody banks, the stately towers, and the lofty hills, all unite in rendering this one of the pleasanter spots in Upper Nithsdale.—CUNNINGHAM.]

does not hold—that every beggar is a poet. In one particular, however, they remarkably agree; if you help either the one or the other to a mug of ale, or the picking of a bone, they will very willingly repay you with a song. This occurs to me at present, as I have just despatched a well-lined rib of John Kirkpatrick's Highlander: a bargain for which I am indebted to you, in the style of our ballad printers, "Five excellent new songs." The enclosed is nearly my newest song, and one that has cost me some pains, though that is but an equivocal mark of its excellence. Two or three others, which I have by me, shall do themselves the honour to wait on your after leisure: petitioners for admittance into favour must not harass the condescension of their benefactor.

You see, Sir, what it is to patronise a poet. 'Tis like being a magistrate in a petty borough; you do them the favour to preside in their council for one year, and your name bears the prefatory stigma of Bailie for life.

With, not the compliments, but the best wishes, the sincerest prayers of the season for you, that you may see many and happy years with Mrs. M'Murdo, and your family; two blessings, by the bye, to which your rank does not, by any means, entitle you—a loving wife and fine family being almost the only good things of this life to which the farm-house and cottage have an exclusive right.

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your much indebted and very humble servant,

R. B.

No. CLX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 21st June, 1789.

DEAR MADAM:

WILL you take the effusions, the miserable effusions of low spirits, just as they flow from their bitter spring? I know not of any particular cause for this worst of all my foes besetting me; but for some time my soul has been beclouded with a thickening atmosphere of evil imaginations and gloomy presages.

Monday Evening.

I have just heard Mr. Kirkpatrick preach a sermon. He is a man famous for his benevolence, and I revere him; but from such ideas of my Creator, good Lord, deliver me! Religion, my honoured friend, is surely a simple business, as it equally concerns the ignorant and the learned, the poor and the rich. That there is an incomprehensible Great Being, to whom I owe my existence, and that he must be intimately acquainted with the operations and progress of the internal machinery, and consequent outward deportment of this creature which he has made—these are, I think, self-evident propositions. That there is a real and eternal distinction between virtue and vice, and consequently, that I am an accountable creature; that from the seeming nature of the human mind, as well as from the evident imperfection, nay, positive injustice, in the administration of affairs, both in the natural and moral worlds, there must be a retributive scene of existence beyond the grave—must, I think, be allowed by every one who will give himself a moment's reflection. I will go farther, and affirm that, from the sublimity, excellence, and purity of his doctrine and precepts, unparalleled by all the aggregated wisdom and learning of many preceding ages, though, to appearance, he himself was the obscurest and most illiterate of our species—therefore Jesus Christ was from God.

Whatever mitigates the woes, or increases the happiness of others, this is my criterion of goodness; and whatever injures society at large, or any individual in it, this is my measure of iniquity.

What think you, madam, of my creed? I trust that I have said nothing that will lessen me in the eye of one, whose good opinion I value almost next to the approbation of my own mind.

R. B.

No. CLXI.

TO MISS WILLIAMS.

Ellisland, August, 1789.

MADAM:

OF the many problems in the nature of that wonderful creature, man, this is one of the most extraordinary, that he shall go on from day to day, from week to week, from month to month, or perhaps from year to year, suffering a hundred times more in an hour from the impotent consciousness of neglecting what he ought to do than the very doing of it would cost him. I am deeply indebted to you, first for a most elegant poetic compliment; * then, for a polite, obliging letter; and, lastly, for your excellent poem on the Slave-Trade; and yet, wretch that I am! though the debts were debts of honour, and the creditor a lady, I have put off and put off even the very acknowledgment of the obligation, until you must indeed be the very angel I take you for if you can forgive me.

Your poem I have read with the highest pleasure. I have a way whenever I read a book—I mean a book in our own trade, Madam, a poetic one—and when it is my own property, that I take a pencil and mark at the ends of verses, or note on margins and odd papers, little criticisms of approbation or disapprobation as I perceive along. I will make no apology for presenting you with a few unconnected thoughts that occurred to me in my repeated perusals of your poem. I want to shew you that I have honesty enough to tell you what I take to be truths, even when they are not quite on the side of approbation; and I do it in the firm faith that you have equal greatness of mind to hear them with pleasure.

* [See Dr. Moore's letter of January 23d, 1787.]

I had lately the honour of a letter from Dr. Moore, where he tells me that he has sent me some books: they are not yet come to hand, but I hear they are on the way.

Wishing you all success in your progress in the path of fame; and that you may equally escape the danger of stumbling through incautious speed, or losing ground through loitering neglect,* I am, &c.

R. B.

No. CLXII.

TO MR. JOHN LOGAN.†

Ellisland, near Dumfries, 7th Aug 1789.

DEAR SIR:

I INTENDED to have written you long ere now, and as I told you I had gotten three stanzas and a half on my way in a poetic epistle to you; but that old enemy of all good works, the devil, threw me into a prosaic mire, and for the soul of me I cannot get out of it. I dare not write you a long letter, as I am go-

* [The lady to whom this letter is addressed was the well known Helen Maria Williams—her answer is characteristic:—

“7th August, 1789.

“DEAR SIR,

“I DO NOT lose a moment in returning you my sincere acknowledgments for your letter, and your criticism on my poem, which is a very flattering proof that you have read it with attention. I think your objections are perfectly just, except in one instance.

“You have indeed been very profuse of panegyric on my little performance. A much less portion of applause from you would have been gratifying to me; since I think its value depends entirely upon the source whence it proceeds—the incense of praise, like other incense, is more grateful from the quality, than the quantity, of the odour.

“I hope you still cultivate the pleasures of poetry, which are precious even independent of the rewards of fame. Perhaps the most valuable property of poetry is its power of disengaging the mind from worldly cares, and leading the imagination to the richest springs of intellectual enjoyment; since, however frequently life may be chequered with gloomy scenes, those who truly love the Muse can always find one little path adorned with flowers and chequered by sunshine.”

† [Of Knockshinnoch, in Glen Afton, Ayr-shire.]

‡ [An error into which the previous biographers of Burns have fallen is corrected by this letter. The “Kirk’s Alarm” is neither an early production nor of western descent; it was composed at Ellisland with the hope of rendering some service to the Reverend Dr. M’Gill, against whom a cry of heresy had been raised—and not without reason. There are extant two copies of this satire in the poet’s hand-writing; one is contained in the Afton MSS. and the other is in the collection of the daughter of the gentleman to whom this letter is addressed.—CUNNINGHAM.]

ing to intrude on your time with a long ballad. I have, as you will shortly see, finished “The Kirk’s Alarm;” but now that is done, and that I have laughed once or twice at the conceits in some of the stanzas, I am determined not to let it get into the public; so I send you this copy, the first that I have sent to Ayr-shire, except some few of the stanzas, which I wrote off in embryo for Gavin Hamilton, under the express provision and request that you will only read it to a few of us, and do not on any account give, or permit to be taken, any copy of the ballad. If I could be of any service, to Dr. M’Gill, I would do it, though it should be at a much greater expense than irritating a few bigoted priests, but I am afraid serving him in his present embarras is a task too hard for me. I have enemies enow, God knows, though I do not wantonly add to the number. Still, as I think there is some merit in two or three of the thoughts, I send it to you as a small but sincere testimony how much, and with what respectful esteem,

I am, dear Sir,

Your obliged humble servant,

R. B.;

No. CLXIII.

TO MR. ———.‡

Ellisland, September, 1789.

MY DEAR SIR,

THE hurry of a farmer in this particular season, and the indolence of a poet at all times

‡ [The name of the gentleman to whom this letter is addressed has unfortunately been suppressed by Dr. Currie; this is the more to be lamented since he seems to have wanted neither talent nor spirit, as his letter, to which that of Burns is an answer, will sufficiently shew:

“London, 5th August, 1789.

“MY DEAR SIR,

“EXCUSE me when I say that the uncommon abilities which you possess must render your correspondence very acceptable to any one. I can assure you, I am particularly proud of your partiality, and shall endeavour, by every method in my power, to merit a continuance of your politeness.

“When you can spare a few moments, I should be proud of a letter from you, directed for me, Gerard-street, Soho.

“I cannot express my happiness sufficiently at the instance of your attachment to my late inestimable friend, Bob Fergusson [in the erection of a monument to him], who was particularly intimate with myself and relations. While I recollect with pleasure his extraordinary talents, and many amiable qualities, it affords me the greatest consolation that I am honoured with the correspondence of his successor in national simplicity and genius. That Mr. Burns has refined in the art of poetry must readily be admitted; but, notwithstanding many favourable representations, I am yet to learn that he inherits his convivial powers.

“There was such a richness of conversation, such a plenitude of fancy and attraction in him, that when I call the happy period of our intercourse to my memory, I feel myself in a state of delirium. I was then younger than him by eight or ten years; but his manner was so felicitous that he enraptured every person around him, and infused into the hearts of young and old the spirit which operated on his own mind.”] and seasons, will, I hope, plead my excuse for neglecting so long to answer your obliging letter of the 5th of August.

That you have done well in quitting your laborious concern in * * * I do not doubt; the weighty reasons you mention were, I hope, very, and deservedly indeed, weighty ones, and your health is a matter of the last importance; but whether the remaining proprietors of the paper have also done well is what I much doubt. The * * *, so far as I was a reader, exhibited such a brilliancy of point, such an elegance of paragraph, and such a variety of intelligence, that I can hardly conceive it possible to continue a daily paper in the same degree of excellence: but if there was a man who had abilities equal to the task, that man's assistance the proprietors have lost.

When I received your letter I was transcribing for * * * my letter to the magistrates of the Canongate, Edinburgh, begging their permission to place a tomb-stone over poor Ferguson, and their edict in consequence of my petition, but now I shall send them to * * * *. Poor Ferguson! If there be a life beyond the grave, which I trust there is; and if there be a good God presiding over all nature, which I am sure there is; thou art now enjoying existence in a glorious world, where worth of the heart alone is distinction in the man; where riches, deprived of all their pleasure-purchasing powers, return to their native sordid matter; where titles and honours are the disregarded reveries of an idle dream: and where that heavy virtue, which is the negative consequence of steady dulness, and those thoughtless, though often destructive, follies, which are the unavoidable aberrations of frail human nature, will be thrown into equal oblivion as if they had never been!

Adieu, my dear Sir! So soon as your present views and schemes are concentrated in an aim, I shall be glad to hear from you; as your welfare and happiness is by no means a subject indifferent to

Yours, R. B.

No. CLXIV.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 6th Sept. 1789.

DEAR MADAM,

I HAVE mentioned in my last my appointment to the Excise, and the birth of little Frank; who, by the bye, I trust will be no discredit to the honourable name of Wallace,* as he has a fine manly countenance, and a figure that might do credit to a little fellow two months older; and likewise an excellent good temper, though when he pleases he has a pipe only not quite so loud as the horn that his immortal name-sake blew as a signal to take out the pin of Stirling bridge.

I had some time ago an epistle, part poetic, and part prosaic, from your poetess, Mrs. J. Little, a very ingenious, but modest composition.† I should have written her as she re-

* [This child, named Francis Wallace, after Mrs. Dunlop, died at the early age of fourteen. He is described as having been, to all appearance, the most promising of all Burns's children.]

† [The poetic Epistle from Miss Janet Little was ushered in by the following account of herself:—

“ Loudon House, 12th July, 1789.

“ SIR,

“ THOUGH I have not the happiness of being personally acquainted with you, yet amongst the number of those who have read and admired your publications, may I be permitted to trouble you with this? You must know, Sir, I am somewhat in love with the Muses, though I cannot boast of any favours they have deigned to confer upon me as yet; my situation in life has been very much against me as to that. I have spent some years in and about Ecclefechan (where my parents reside), in the station of a servant, and am now come to Loudon House, at present possessed by Mrs. H—; she is daughter to Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, whom I understand you are particularly acquainted with. As I had the pleasure of perusing your poems, I felt a partiality for the author, which I should not have experienced had you been in a more dignified station. I wrote a few verses of address to you, which I did not then think of ever presenting; but as fortune seems to have favoured me in this, by bringing me into a family by whom you are well known, and much esteemed, and where, perhaps, I may have an opportunity of seeing you; I shall, in hopes of your future friendship, take the liberty to transcribe them.

I.
Fair fa' the honest rustic swain,
The pride o' a' our Scottish plain;
Thou giv's us joy to hear thy strain,
And notes sae sweet;
Old Ramsay's shade reviv'd again
In thee we greet.

II.
Lov'd Thalia, that delightfu' muse,
Seem'd lang shut up as a recluse;
To all she did her aid refuse,
Since Allan's day;
'Till Burns arose, then did she chuse
To grace his lay.

III.
To hear thy sang all ranks desire,
Sae weel you strike the dormant lyre,
Apollo with poetic fire
Thy breast doth warm,
And critics silently admire
Thy art to charm.

IV.
Cæsar and Luath weel can speak,
'Tis pity e'er their gabs should steek,
But into human nature keek,
And knots unravel;
To hear their lectures once a week,
Nine miles I'd travel.

V.
Thy dedication to G. H.,
An unco bonnie hame-spun speech,
Wi' winsome glee the heart can teach
A better lesson
Than servile bards, who fawn and sleet,
Like beggar's messon.

VI.
When slighted love becomes your theme,
And woman's faithless vows you blame,
With so much pathos you exclaim
In your L—nt;
But glanc'd by the most frigid dame,
She would relent.

quested, but for the hurry of this new business. I have heard of her and her compositions in this country; and I am happy to add, always to the honour of her character. The fact is, I know not well how to write to her: I should sit down to a sheet of paper that I knew not how to stain. I am no dab at fine-drawn letter-writing; and, except when prompted by friendship or gratitude, or, which happens extremely rarely, inspired by the Muse (I know not her name) that presides over epistolary writing, I sit down, when necessitated to write, as I would sit down to beat hemp.

Some parts of your letter of the 20th August struck me with the most melancholy concern for the state of your mind at present.

Would I could write you a letter of comfort; I would sit down to it with as much pleasure as I would to write an epic poem, of my own composition, that should equal the Iliad. Religion, my dear friend, is the true comfort! A strong persuasion in a future state of existence; a proposition so obviously probable that, setting revelation aside, every nation and people, so far as investigation has reached, for at least near four thousand years, have, in some mode or other, firmly believed it. In vain would we reason and pretend to doubt. I have myself done so to a very daring pitch; but when I reflected that I was opposing the most ardent wishes and the most darling hopes of good men, and flying in the face of all human belief in all ages, I was shocked at my own conduct.

I know not whether I have ever sent you the following lines, or if you have ever seen them; but it is one of my favourite quotations, which I keep constantly by me in my progress through life, in the language of the book of Job,

“Against the day of battle and of war”—

spoken of religion :

“’Tis this, my friend, that streaks our morning bright,
 ’Tis this that gilds the horror of our night.
 When wealth forsakes us, and when friends are few
 When friends are faithless, or when foes pursue;
 ’Tis this that wards the blow, or stills the smart,
 Disarms affliction, or repels his dart;
 Within the breast bids purest raptures rise,
 Bids smiling conscience spread her cloudless skies.”

VII.

The daisy, too, ye sing wi’ skill;
 And weel ye praise the whiskey gill;
 In vain I blunt my feckless quill,
 Your fame to raise;
 While echo sounds frae ilka hill,
 To Burns’s praise

VIII.

Did Addison or Pope but hear,
 Or Sam, that critic most severe,
 A ploughboy sing wi’ throat sae clear,
 Their works would a’ in pieces tear,
 Their works would a’ in pieces tear,
 An’ curse your page.

I have been busy with Zeluco. The Doctor is so obliging as to request my opinion of it; and I have been revolving in my mind some kind of criticisms on novel-writing, but it is a depth beyond my research. I shall however digest my thoughts on the subject as well as I can. Zeluco is a most sterling performance.

Farewell! A Dieu, le bon Dieu, je vous commende!

R. B.

No. CLXV.

TO CAPTAIN RIDDEL,

CARSE.

Ellistard, 16th Oct. 1789.

SIR,

BRO with the idea of this important day at Friar’s Carse, I have watched the elements and skies, in the full persuasion that they would announce it to the astonished world by some phenomena of terrific portent.—Yesternight until a very late hour did I wait with anxious horror, for the appearance of some Comet firing half the sky; or aerial armies of sanguinary Scandinavians, darting athwart the startled heavens, rapid as the ragged lightning, and horrid as those convulsions of nature that bury nations.

The elements, however, seem to take the matter very quietly: they did not even usher in this morning, with triple suns and a shower of blood, symbolical of the three potent heroes, and the mighty claret-shed of the day.—For me, as Thomson in his Winter says of the storm—I shall “Hear astonished, and astonished sing”

The whistle and the man; I sing
 The man that won the whistle, &c.

Here are we met, three merry boys,
 Three merry boys I trow are we;
 And mony a night we’ve merry been,
 And mony mae we hope to be.

Wha first shall rise to gang awa,
 A cuckold coward loun is he;
 Wha last beside his chair shall fa’
 He is the king amang us three.

IX.

Sure Milton’s eloquence were faint,
 The beauties of your verse to paint;
 My rude unpolish’d strokes but taint
 Their brilliancy;
 Th’ attempt would doubtless vex a saint,
 And weel may thee.

X.

The task I’ll drop, wi’ heart sincere,
 To Heaven present my humble pray’r,
 That all the blessings mortals share,
 May be by turns
 Dispens’d by an indulgent care
 To ROBERT BURNS!]

To leave the heights of Parnassus and come to the humble vale of prose—I have some misgivings that I take too much upon me, when I request you to get your guest, Sir Robert Lawrie, to frank the two enclosed covers for me, the one of them, to Sir William Cunningham, of Robertland, Bart., at Kilmarnock,—the other, to Mr. Allan Masterton, Writing-Master, Edinburgh. The first has a kindred claim on Sir Robert, as being a brother Baronet, and likewise a keen Foxite; the other is one of the worthiest men in the world, and a man of real genius; so, allow me to say he has a fraternal claim on you. I want them franked for to-morrow, as I cannot get them to the post to-night.—I shall send a servant again for them in the evening. Wishing that your head may be crowned with laurels to-night, and free from aches to-morrow,

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your deeply indebted humble Servant,

R. B.*

—◆—
No. CLXVI.

TO CAPTAIN RIDDEL.

Ellisland, 1789.

SIR,

I WISH from my inmost soul it were in my power to give you a more substantial gratification and return for all the goodness to the poet, than transcribing a few of his idle rhymes.—However, “an old song,” though to a proverb an instance of insignificance, is generally the only coin a poet has to pay with.

If my poems which I have transcribed, and mean still to transcribe into your book, were equal to the grateful respect and high esteem I bear for the gentleman to whom I present them, they would be the finest poems in the language.—As they are, they will at least be a testimony with what sincerity I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your devoted humble Servant,

R. B.

—◆—
No. CLXVII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

Ellisland, 1st Nov. 1789.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I HAD written you long ere now, could I have guessed where to find you, for I am sure you have more good sense than to waste the precious days of vacation time in the dirt of business and Edinburgh.—Wherever you are, God bless you, and lead you not into temptation, but deliver you from evil!

I do not know if I have informed you that I am now appointed to an Excise division, in the middle of which my house and farm lie. In this I was extremely lucky. Without ever having been an expectant, as they call their journeymen excisemen, I was directly planted down to all intents and purposes an officer of excise; there to flourish and bring forth fruits—worthily of repentance.

I know not how the word exciseman, or still more opprobrious, gauger, will sound in your ears. I too have seen the day when my auditory nerves would have felt very delicately on this subject; but a wife and children are things which have a wonderful power in blunting these kind of sensations. Fifty pounds a year for life, and a provision for widows and orphans, you will all-w is no bad settlement for a poet. For the ignominy of the profession, I have the encouragement which I once heard a recruiting sergeant give to a numerous, if not a respectable, audience, in the streets of Kilmarnock.—“Gentlemen, for your further and better encouragement, I can assure you that our regiment is the most blackguard corps under the Crown, and consequently with us an honest fellow has the surest chance of preferment.”

You need not doubt that I find several very unpleasant and disagreeable circumstances in my business; but I am tired with and disgusted at the language of complaint against the evils of life. Human existence in the most favourable situations does not abound with pleasures, and has its inconveniences and ills; capricious foolish man mistakes these inconveniences and ills as if they were the peculiar property of his particular situation; and hence that eternal fickleness, that love of change, which has ruined, and daily does ruin many a fine fellow, as well as many a blockhead, and is almost, without exception, a constant source of disappointment and misery.

I long to hear from you how you go on—not so much in business as in life. Are you pretty well satisfied with your own exertions, and tolerably at ease in your internal reflections? 'Tis much to be a great character as a lawyer, but beyond comparison more to be a great character as a man. That you may be both the one and the other is the earnest wish, and that you will be both is the firm persuasion of,

My dear Sir, &c.

R. B.

* [The bard seems to have prepared himself for celebrating a contest which did not take place for a year afterwards. The whistle was contended for 16th Oct. 1790: the successful competitor, Fergusson, of Craighdarroch, was killed by a fall from his horse, many years after this jovial contest; he excelled in ready eloquence, and loved witty company.—CUNNINGHAM.

See the Poem of “The Whistle” page 307.]

No. CLXVIII.

TO MR. RICHARD BROWN.

Ellisland, 4th November, 1789.

I HAVE been so hurried, my ever dear friend, that though I got both your letters, I have not been able to command an hour to answer them as I wished; and even now you are to look on this as merely confessing debt, and craving days. Few things could have given me so much pleasure as the news that you were once more safe and sound on terra firma, and happy in that place where happiness is alone to be found, in the fire-side circle. May the benevolent Director of all things peculiarly bless you in all those endearing connections consequent on the tender and venerable names of husband and father! I have indeed been extremely lucky in getting an additional income of £50 a year, while, at the same time, the appointment will not cost me above £10 or £12 per annum of expenses more than I must have inevitably incurred. The worst circumstance is that the Excise division which I have got is so extensive, no less than 161 parishes to ride over; and it abounds besides with so much business that I can scarcely steal a spare moment. However, labour endears rest, and both together are absolutely necessary for the proper enjoyment of human existence. I cannot meet you any where. No less than an order from the Board of Excise, at Edinburgh, is necessary before I can have so much time as to meet you in Ayr-shire. But do you come, and see me. We must have a social day, and perhaps lengthen it out with half the night, before you go again to sea. You are the earliest friend I now have on earth, my brothers excepted: and is not that an endearing circumstance? When you and I first met, we were at the green period of human life. The twig would easily take a bent, but would as easily return to its former state. You and I not only took a mutual bent, but, by the melancholy, though strong influence of being both of the family of the unfortunate, we were entwined with one another in our growth towards advanced age; and blasted by the sacrilegious hand that shall attempt to undo the union! You and I must have one bumper to my favourite toast, "May the companions of our youth be the friends of our old age!" Come and see me one year; I shall see you at Port Glasgow the next, and if we can contrive to have a gossiping between our two bed-fellows, it will be so much additional pleasure. Mrs. Burns joins me in kind compliments to you and Mrs. Brown. Adieu!

I am ever, my dear Sir, yours,

R. B.

No. CLXIX.

TO R. GRAHAM, Esq.

OF FINTRAY.

9th December, 1789.

SIR:

I HAVE a good while had a wish to trouble you with a letter, and had certainly done it long ere now—but for a humiliating something that throws cold water on the resolution, as if one should say, "You have found Mr. Graham a very powerful and kind friend indeed, and that interest he is so kindly taking in your concerns you ought, by every thing in your power to keep alive and cherish." Now, though since God has thought proper to make one powerful and another helpless, the connection of obliger and obliged is all fair: and though my being under your patronage is to me highly honourable, yet, Sir, allow me to flatter myself that, as a poet and an honest man, you first interested yourself in my welfare, and principally as such still you permit me to approach you.

I have found the excise business go on a great deal smoother with me than I expected; owing a good deal to the generous friendship of Mr. Mitchell, my collector, and the kind assistance of Mr. Findlater, my supervisor. I dare to be honest, and I fear no labour. Nor do I find my hurried life greatly inimical to my correspondence with the Muses. Their visits to me, indeed, and I believe to most of their acquaintance, like the visits of good angels, are short and far between: but I meet them now and then, as I jog through the hills of Nithsdale, just as I used to do on the banks of Ayr. I take the liberty to inclose you a few bagatelles, all of them the productions of my leisure thoughts in my excise rides.

If you know, or have ever seen, Captain Grose, the antiquarian, you will enter into any humour that is in the verses on him. Perhaps you have seen them before, as I sent them to a London Newspaper. Though I dare say you have none of the solemn-league-and-covenant fire, which shone so conspicuous in Lord George Gordon, and the Kilwarnock weavers, yet I think you must have heard of Dr. McGill, one of the clergymen of Ayr, and his heretical book. God help him, poor man! Though he is one of the worthiest, as well as one of the ablest, of the whole priesthood of the Kirk of Scotland, in every sense of that ambiguous term, yet the poor Doctor and his numerous family are in imminent danger of being thrown out to the mercy of the winter-winds. The enclosed ballad on that business is, I confess, too local, but I laughed myself at some conceits in it, though I am convinced in my conscience that there are a good many heavy stanzas in it too.

The election ballad, as you will see, alludes to the present canvass in our string of boroughs.

I do not believe there will be such a hard run match in the whole general election.

I am too little a man to have any political attachments; I am deeply indebted to, and have the warmest veneration for, individuals of both parties; but a man who has it in his power to be the father of a country, and who * * , is a character that one cannot speak of with patience.

Sir J. J. does "what man can do," but yet I doubt his fate.†

No. CLXX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 13th December, 1789.

MANY thanks, dear Madam, for your sheetful of rhymes. Though at present I am below the veriest prose, yet from you every thing pleases. I am groaning under the miseries of a diseased nervous system; a system, the state of which is most conducive to our happiness—or the most productive of our misery. For now near three weeks I have been so ill with a nervous head-ache that I have been obliged for a time to give up my excise-books, being scarce able to lift my head, much less to ride once a week over ten muir parishes. What is man?—To-day, in the luxuriance of health, exulting in the enjoyment of existence; in a few days, perhaps in a few hours, loaded with conscious painful being, counting the tardy pace of the lingering moments by the repercussions of anguish, and refusing or denied a comforter. Day follows night, and night comes after day, only to curse him with life which gives him no pleasure; and yet the awful, dark termination of that life is something at which he recoils.

"Tell us, ye dead; will none of you in pity

Disclose the secret—

What 'tis you are, and we must shortly be?

—'tis no matter,

A little time will make us learn'd as you are."

Can it be possible that, when I resign this frail, feverish being, I shall still find myself in conscious existence? When the last grasp of agony has announced that I am no more to those that knew me, and the few who loved me; when the cold, stiffened, unconscious, ghastly corse is resigned into the earth, to be

* [Dr. Currie has here obviously suppressed a bitter allusion to the Duke of Queensberry.]

† [In this letter, besides the verses on Grose, the poet enclosed the Kirk's Alarm, and the first ballad on Miller's election. His heart seems to have been with Johnstone in the latter affair; he cordially disliked the Duke of Queensberry, a nobleman who herried the land which he ought to have enriched, and squandered his rents among the prey of unsightly reptiles, and to become in time a trodden clod, shall I be yet warm in life, seeing and seen, enjoying and enjoyed? Ye venerable sages, and holy flamens, is there probability in your conjectures, truth in your stories, of another world beyond death; or are they all alike, baseless visions, and fabricated fables? If there is another life, it must be only for the just, the benevolent, the amiable, and the humane; what a flattering idea, then, is a world to come! Would to God I as firmly believed it as I ardently wish it! There I should meet an aged parent, now at rest from the many buffetings of an evil world, against which he so long and so bravely struggled. There should I meet the friend, the disinterested friend of my early life; the man who rejoiced to see me, because he loved me and could serve me.—Muir,‡ thy weaknesses were the aberrations of human nature, but thy heart glowed with every thing generous, manly, and noble; and if ever emanation from the All-good Being animated a human form, it was thine!—There should I, with speechless agony of rapture, again recognize my lost, my ever dear Mary! whose bosom was fraught with truth, honour, constancy, and love.

"Pimps, sharpers, bawds, and opera girls."

"My Mary, dear departed shade!

Where is thy place of heavenly rest?

Sceat thou thy lover lowly laid?

Hear'st thou the groans that rend his breast?"

Jesus Christ, thou amiablest of characters! I trust thou art no impostor, and that thy revelation of blissful scenes of existence beyond death and the grave is not one of the many impositions which time after time have been palmed on credulous mankind. I trust that in thee "shall all the families of the earth be blessed," by being yet connected together in a better world, where every tie that bound heart to heart, in this state of existence, shall be, far beyond our present conceptions, more endearing.

I am a good deal inclined to think with those who maintain that what are called nervous affections are in fact diseases of the mind. I cannot reason, I cannot think; and but to you I would not venture to write any thing above an order to a cobbler. You have felt too much of the ills of life not to sympathise with a diseased wretch, who has impaired more than half of any faculties he possessed. Your goodness will excuse this distracted scrawl, which the Captain Miller, the candidate in the Queensberry interest and son of the poet's landlord, was a Whig—yet this seems not to have overcome Burns's aversion to old Q., a name under which the caricaturists of London loved to lampoon the person of his Grace.—See "Verses on the Destruction of the Woods of Drumlanrig," and "Lines on the Duke of Queensberry," pages 290-1.]

‡ [Muir, so feelingly alluded to in this letter, was one of the poet's earliest and least assuming friends—he was mild and benevolent, and did deeds of kindness without seeming to do them.]

writer dare scarcely read, and which he would throw into the fire, were he able to write any thing better, or indeed any thing at all.

Rumour told me something of a son of yours who was returned from the East or West Indies. If you have gotten news from James or Anthony, it was cruel in you not to let me know; as I promise you, on the sincerity of a man, who is weary of one world, and anxious about another, that scarce any thing could give me so much pleasure as to hear of any good thing befalling my honoured friend.

If you have a minute's leisure, take up your pen in pity to le pauvre miserable, R. B.

No. CLXXI.

TO LADY W[INFRED] M[AXWELL]
CONSTABLE.*

Ellisland, 16th December, 1789.

MY LADY:

In vain have I from day to day expected to hear from Mrs. Young, as she promised me at Dalswinton that she would do me the honour to introduce me at Tinwald; and it was impossible, not from your ladyship's accessibility, but from my own feelings, that I could go alone. Lately, indeed, Mr. Maxwell of Carruchen in his usual goodness offered to accompany me, when an unlucky indisposition on my part hindered my embracing the opportunity. To court the notice or the tables of the great, except where I sometimes have had a little matter to ask of them, or more often the pleasanter task of witnessing my gratitude to them, is what I never have done, and I trust never shall do. But with your ladyship I have the honour to be connected by one of the strongest and most endearing ties in the whole moral world. Common sufferers, in a cause where even to be unfortunate is glorious, the cause of heroic loyalty! Though my fathers had not illustrious honours and vast properties to hazard in the contest, though they left their humble cottages only to add so many units more to the unnoted crowd that followed their leaders, yet what they could they did, and what they had they lost: with unshaken firmness and unconcealed political attachments, they shook hands with ruin for what they esteemed the cause of their king and their country. This language and the enclosed verses † are for your ladyship's eye alone. Poets are not very famous for their prudence: but as I can do nothing for a cause which is now nearly no more, I do not wish to hurt myself. I have the honour to be, my lady, your ladyship's obliged and obedient humble servant,

R. B.

No. CLXXII.

TO PROVOST MAXWELL, OF LOCHMABEN.

Ellisland, 20th December, 1789.

DEAR PROVOST,

As my friend Mr. Graham goes for your good town to-morrow, I cannot resist the temptation to send you a few lines, and as I have nothing to say, I have chosen this sheet of foolscap, and begun as you see at the top of the first page, because I have ever observed that when once people have fairly set out they know not where to stop. Now that my first sentence is concluded, I have nothing to do but to pray heaven to help me on to another. Shall I write you on Politics or Religion, two master subjects for your sayers of nothing? Of the first I dare say by this time you are nearly surfeited; ‡ and for the last, whenever they may talk of it who make it a kind of company concern, I never could endure it beyond a soliloquy. I might write you on farming, on building, on marketing, but my poor distracted mind is so torn, so jaded, so racked and bedeviled with the task of the superlatively damned to make one guinea do the business of three, that I detest, abhor, and swoon at the very word business, though no less than four letters of my very short surname are in it.

Well, to make the matter short, I shall betake myself to a subject ever fruitful of themes; a subject the turtle feast of the sons of Satan, and the delicious secret sugar plum of the babes of grace—a subject sparkling with all the jewels that wit can find in the mines of genius; and pregnant with all the stores of learning from Moses and Confucius to Franklin and Priestley—in short, may it please your Lordship, I intend to write * * *

[Here the Poet inserted a song which can only be sung at times when the Punch Bowl has done its duty and wild wit is set free.]

If at any time you expect a field-day§ in your town, a day when Dukes, Earls, and Knights pay their court to weavers, tailors, and cobblers, I should like to know of it two or three days before hand. It is not that I care

* [Representative of the ancient family of Nithsdale.]

† [Those addressed to Mr. William Tytler.—See p. 278.]

The above interesting letter first appeared in Hogg and Motherwell's Edition of the Poet's works. It was communicated by Sir Cuthbert Sharpe, Provost of Sunderland.]

‡ [The Provost, as the leading voter in Marjorie of the

Mony Lochs, must have recently had a sufficiency of politics.]

§ [The Miller and Johnstone contest at that time agitated the Boroughs, and to this the poet alludes when he requests to receive notice of a field-day among the chief men of the district.]

three skips of a cur dog for the politics, but I should like to see such an exhibition of human nature. If you meet with that worthy old veteran in religion and good fellowship, Mr. Jeffrey,* or any of his amiable family, I beg you will give them my best compliments.†

R. B.

No. CLXXIII.

TO SIR JOHN SINCLAIR.

1790.

SIR,

THE following circumstance has, I believe, been omitted in the statistical account, transmitted to you, of the parish of Dunscore, in Nithsdale. I beg leave to send it to you, because it is new, and may be useful. How far it is deserving of a place in your patriotic publication, you are the best judge.

To store the minds of the lower classes with useful knowledge is certainly of very great importance, both to them as individuals, and to society at large. Giving them a turn for reading and reflection is giving them a source of innocent and laudable amusement; and besides, raises them to a more dignified degree in the scale of rationality. Impressed with this idea, a gentleman in this parish, Robert Riddel, Esq., of Glenriddel, set on foot a species of circulating library, on a plan so simple as to be practicable in any corner of the country; and so useful as to deserve the notice of every country gentleman who thinks the improvement of that part of his own species, whom chance has thrown into the humble walks of the peasant and the artizan, a matter worthy of his attention.

Mr. Riddel got a number of his own tenants and farming neighbours to form themselves into a society for the purpose of having a library among themselves. They entered into a legal engagement to abide by it for three years; with a saving clause or two, in case of a removal to a distance, or death. Each member, at his entry, paid five shillings; and at each of their meetings, which were held every fourth Saturday, sixpence more. With their entry-money, and the credit which they took on the faith of their future funds, they laid in a tolerable stock of books at the commencement. What authors they were to purchase was always decided by the majority. At every meeting, all the books, under certain fines and forfeitures, by way of penalty, were to be produced; and the members had their choice of the volumes in rotation. He whose name stood for that night first on the list had his choice of what volume he pleased in the whole collection; the second had his choice after the first; the third after the second, and so on to the last. At next meeting, he who had been first on the list at the preceding meeting was last at this; he who had been second was first; and so on through the whole three years. At the expiration of the engagement, the books were sold by auction, but only among the members themselves; each man had his share of the common stock, in money or in books, as he chose to be a purchaser or not.

At the breaking up of this little society, which was formed under Mr. Riddel's patronage, what with benefactions of books from him, and what with their own purchases, they had collected together upwards of one hundred and fifty volumes. It will easily be guessed that a good deal of trash would be bought. Among the books, however, of this little library, were Blair's Sermons, Robertson's History of Scotland, Hume's History of the Stuarts, The Spectator, Idler, Adventurer, Mirror, Lounger, Observer, Man of Feeling, Man of the World, Chrysal, Don Quixote, Joseph Andrews, &c. A peasant who can read and enjoy such books is certainly a much superior being to his neighbour, who perhaps stalks beside his team, very little removed, except in shape, from the brutes he drives.

Wishing your patriotic exertions their so much merited success,

I am, Sir,

Your humble servant,

A PEASANT.‡

* [The Reverend Andrew Jeffrey, Minister of Lochmaben, and father of the heroine of that exquisite song "The Blue eyed Lass." His son, Hugh Jeffrey, is a worthy person and skilful with the pen—yet one nevertheless

"Whom fortune uses hard and sharp."]

† [The original of this letter is in the possession of Mr. Henderson, of Langholm, and from the singular song which it contains cannot but be considered as a great curiosity.]

‡ [The above letter is inserted in the third volume of Sir John Sinclair's Statistical Account of Scotland, p. 598.—It was enclosed to Sir John by Mr. Riddel himself in the following letter:—

"SIR JOHN,

"I enclose you a letter, written by Mr. Burns, as an addition to the account of Dunscore parish. It contains an account of a small library which he was so good (at my desire) as to set on foot, in the barony of Monkland, or Friar's Carse, in this parish. As its utility has been felt, particularly among the younger class of people, I think that if a similar plan were established in the different parishes of Scotland it would tend greatly to the speedy improvement of the tenantry, trades-people, and work-people. Mr. Burns was so good as to take the whole charge of this small concern. He was treasurer, librarian, and censor, to our little society, who will long have a grateful sense of his public spirit and exertions for their improvement and information.

I have the honour to be, Sir John,

Your's most sincerely,

ROBERT RIDDEL.¶]

No. CLXXIV.

TO CHARLES SHARPE, Esq.

OF HODDAM,*

Under a fictitious Signature, enclosing a Ballad. 1790 or 1791.

IT is true, Sir, you are a gentleman of rank and fortune, and I am a poor devil: you are a feather in the cap of Society, and I am a very hobnail in his shoes; yet I have the honour to belong to the same family with you, and on that score I now address you. You will perhaps suspect that I am going to claim affinity with the ancient and honourable house of Kirkpatrick: No, no, Sir: I cannot indeed be properly said to belong to any house, or even any province or kingdom; as my mother, who for many years was spouse to a marching regiment, gave me into this bad world aboard the packet-boat, somewhere between Donaghadee and Portpatrick. By our common family, I mean, Sir, the family of the Muses. I am a fiddler and a poet; and you, I am told, play an exquisite violin, and have a standard taste in the Belles Lettres. The other day, a brother catgut gave me a charming Scots air of your composition. If I was pleased with the tune, I was in raptures with the title you have given it; and, taking up the idea, I have spun it into the three stanzas enclosed. Will you allow me, Sir, to present you them, as the dearest offspring that a misbegotten son of poverty and rhyme has to give? I have a longing to take you by the hand and unburthen my heart by saying, "Sir, I honour you as a man who supports the dignity of human nature, amid an age when frivolity and avarice have, between them, debased us below the brutes that perish!" But, alas, Sir! to me you are unapproachable. It is true, the Muses baptized me in Castalian streams, but the thoughtless gipsies forgot to give me a name. As the sex have served many a good fellow, the Nine have given me a great deal of pleasure, but, bewitching jades! they have beggared me. Would they but spare me a little of their castles! Were it only in my power to say that I have a shirt on my back! But the idle wenches, like Solomon's lilies, "they toil not, neither do they spin;" so I must e'en continue to tie my remnant of a cravat, like the hangman's rope, round my naked throat, and coax my galligaskins to keep together their many-coloured fragments. As to the affair of shoes, I have given that up. My pilgrimages in my ballad-trade, from town to town, and on your stony-hearted turnpikes too, are what not even the hide of Job's behemoth could bear. The coat on my back is no more: I shall not speak evil of the dead. It would be equally unhandsome and ungrateful to find fault with my old surtout, which so kindly supplies and conceals the want of that coat. My hat indeed is a great favourite; and though I got it literally for an old song, I would not exchange it for the best beaver in Britain. I was, during several years, a kind of fac-totum servant to a country clergyman, where I pickt up a good many scraps of learning, particularly in some branches of the mathematics. Whenever I feel inclined to rest myself on my way, I take my seat under a hedge, laying my poetic wallet on the one side, and my fiddle-case on the other, and, placing my hat between my legs, I can by means of its brim, or rather brims, go through the whole doctrine of the Comic Sections.

However, Sir, don't let me mislead you, as if I would interest your pity. Fortune has so much forsaken me that she has taught me to live without her; and, amid all my rags and poverty, I am as independent, and much more happy than a monarch of the world. According to the hackneyed metaphor, I value the several actors in the great drama of life simply as they act their parts. I can look on a worthless fellow of a duke with unqualified contempt, and can regard an honest scavenger with sincere respect. As you, Sir, go through your rôle with such distinguished merit, permit me to make one in the chorus of universal applause, and assure you that with the highest respect,

I have the honour to be, &c.

No. CLXXV.

TO MR. GILBERT BURNS.

Ellisland, 11th January, 1790.

DEAR BROTHER,

I MEAN to take advantage of the frank, though I have not in my present frame of mind much appetite for exertion in writing. My

* [The family of Hoddam is one of old standing in the county of Dumfries; it has mingled blood with some of the noblest names in the south of Scotland, and is at present worthily represented by General Sharpe, Member of Parliament for the five boroughs. Nor is the name known through that alone; my friend Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe is distinguished by his scholarship and genius, by his critical knowledge both in literature and art, and by a wit terse and keen. The poet in this humorous letter seriously alludes to the connexion between his correspondent and the Knight of Closeburn—and, what was still more welcome, perhaps, congratulates him on his being able to reckon kin with the Muses. Charles Sharpe of Hoddam had not only fine taste in musical composition, but wrote verses with a happiness which justified, I am told, the commendations of Burns.—CUNNINGHAM.

He was the father of Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Esq., the friend of Sir Walter Scott, and a contributor of Original Ballad Poetry to the Border Minstrelsy.—CHAMBERS.]

nerves are in a cursed state. I feel that horrid hypochondria pervading every atom of both body and soul. This farm has undone my enjoyment of myself. It is a ruinous affair on all hands. But let it go to hell! I'll fight it out and be off with it.

We have gotten a set of very decent players here just now. I have seen them an evening or two. David Campbell, in Ayr, wrote to me by the manager of the company, a Mr. Sutherland, who is a man of apparent worth. On New-year-day evening I gave him the following prologue, which he spouted to his audience with applause.

[The Poet here inserts the Prologue spoken at the theatre, Dumfries, on New-year-day evening, for which See page 287.]

I can no more.—If once I was clear of this cursed farm, I should respire more at ease.*

R. B.

No. CLXXVI.

TO WILLIAM DUNBAR, W.S.

Ellisland, 14th January, 1790.

SINCE we are here creatures of a day, since "a few summer days, and a few winter nights, and the life of man is at an end," why, my dear much-esteemed Sir, should you and I let negligent indolence, for I know it is nothing worse, step in between us and bar the enjoyment of a mutual correspondence? We are not shapen out of the common, heavy, methodical clod, the elemental stuff of the plodding selfish race, the sons of Arithmetic and Prudence; our feelings and hearts are not benumbed and poisoned by the cursed influence of riches, which, whatever blessing they may be in other respects, are no friends to the nobler qualities of the heart: in the name of random sensibility, then, let never the moon change on our silence any more. I have had a tract of bad health most part of this winter, else you had heard from me long ere now. Thank Heaven, I am now got so much better as to be able to partake a little in the enjoyments of life.

Our friend, Cunningham, will perhaps have told you of my going into the Excise. The truth is, I found it a very convenient business to have £50 per annum, nor have I yet felt any of these mortifying circumstances in it that I was led to fear.

* ["The best laid schemes of mice and men," says the bard, "gang aft agley," and surely no speculation in which Burns ever engaged promised more comfort to his bosom, and abundance to his board, than did the leasing of Ellisland. Yet the farm was undoubtedly too high rented during the period of his occupation, and he probably had not the skill or the patience to enable him to cultivate ground with the peculiar nature of which he was unacquainted. Soon after he forsook it, the half of Ellisland was let to a neighbouring farmer for the same rent which the poet gave for the Feb. 2d.—I have not, for sheer hurry of business, been able to spare five minutes to finish my letter. Besides my farm business, I ride on my Excise matters at least 200 miles every week. I have not by any means given up the Muses. You will see in the 3d. vol. of Johnson's Scots songs that I have contributed my mite there.

But, my dear Sir, little ones that look up to you for paternal protection are an important charge. I have already two fine healthy stout little fellows, and I wish to throw some light upon them. I have a thousand reveries and schemes about them, and their future destiny. Not that I am an Utopian projector in these things. I am resolved never to breed up a son of mine to any of the learned professions. I know the value of independence; and since I cannot give my sons an independent fortune, I shall give them an independent line of life. What a chaos of hurry, chance, and changes is this world, when one sits soberly down to reflect on it! To a father, who himself knows the world, the thought that he shall have sons to usher into it must fill him with dread; but if he have daughters, the prospect in a thoughtful moment is apt to shock him.

I hope Mrs. Fordyce and the two young ladies are well. Do let me forget that they are nieces of yours, and let me say that I never saw a more interesting, sweeter pair of sisters in my life. I am the fool of my feelings and attachments. I often take up a volume of my Spenser to realise you to my imagination,† and think over the social scenes we have had together. God grant that there may be another world more congenial to honest fellows beyond this. A world where these rubs and plagues of absence, distance, misfortunes, ill health, &c., shall no more damp hilarity and divide friendship. This I know is your throng season, but half a page will much oblige, my dear Sir, yours sincerely,

R. B.†

No. CLXXVII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 25th January, 1790.

It has been owing to unremitting hurry of business that I have not written to you, Madam, long ere now. My health is greatly better, whole; but then it must be remembered that the prospect of hostilities with France had raised the price of grain and the value of ground. Land which let with difficulty at ten shillings per acre in 1788, was leased with ease at three pounds in the course of a few years.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The Poet here alludes to a present of Spenser's Poems, which Mr. Dunbar had previously made him.]

The above interesting letter was communicated by Mr. P. Buchan, of Aberdeen, and first appeared in Hogg and Motherwell's Edition of the Poet's works.]

and I now begin once more to share in satisfaction and enjoyment with the rest of my fellow-creatures.

Many thanks, my much esteemed friend, for your kind letters; but why will you make me run the risk of being contemptible and mercenary in my own eyes? When I pique myself on my independent spirit, I hope it is neither poetic license, nor poetic rant; and I am so flattered with the honour you have done me, in making me your compeer in friendship and friendly correspondence, than I cannot without pain, and a degree of mortification, be reminded of the real inequality between our situations.

Most sincerely do I rejoice with you, dear Madam, in the good news of Anthony. Not only your anxiety about his fate, but my own esteem for such a noble, warm-hearted, manly young fellow, in the little I had of his acquaintance, has interested me deeply in his fortunes.

Falconer, the unfortunate author of the "Shipwreck," which you so much admire, is no more. After witnessing the dreadful catastrophe he so feelingly describes in his poem, and after weathering many hard gales of fortune, he went to the bottom with the Aurora frigate!

I forget what part of Scotland had the honour of giving him birth; but he was the son of obscurity and misfortune. He was one of those daring adventurous spirits which Scotland, beyond any other country, is remarkable for producing.* Little does the fond mother think, as she hangs delighted over the sweet little leech at her bosom, where the poor fellow may hereafter wander, and what may be his fate. I remember a stanza in an old Scottish ballad, which, notwithstanding its rude simplicity, speaks feelingly to the heart:

"Little did my mother think,
That day she cradled me,
What land I was to travel in,
Or what death I should die!"†

Old Scottish songs are, you know, a favourite study and pursuit of mine, and now I am on that subject, allow me to give you two stanzas of another old simple ballad, which I am sure will please you. The catastrophe of the piece is a poor ruined female, lamenting her fate. She concludes with this pathetic wish:

"O that my father had ne'er on me smil'd;
O that my mother had ne'er to me sung!
O that my cradle had never been rock'd!
But that I had died when I was young!

O that the grave it were my bed;
My blankets were my winding sheet;
The clocks and the worms my bedfellows a'!
And O sae sound as I should sleep!"

I do not remember, in all my reading, to have met with any thing more truly the language of misery than the exclamation in the last line. Misery is like love; to speak its language truly, the author must have felt it.

I am every day expecting the doctor to give your little godson† the small pox. They are rife in the country, and I tremble for his fate. By the way, I cannot help congratulating you on his looks and spirit. Every person who sees him acknowledges him to be the finest, handsomest child he has ever seen. I am myself delighted with the manly swell of his little chest, and a certain miniature dignity in the carriage of his head, and the glance of his fine black eye, which promise the undaunted gallantry of an independent mind.

I thought to have sent you some rhymes, but time forbids. I promise you poetry until you are tired of it, next time I have the honour of assuring you how truly I am, &c.

R. B.

No. CLXXVIII.

TO MR. PETER HILL,
BOOKSELLER, EDINBURGH.

Ellisland, 2nd Feb. 1790.

No! I will not say one word about apologies or excuses for not writing—I am a poor, ras-

* ["Falconer," says Currie, "was in early life a sailor-boy, on board a man of war, in which capacity he attracted the notice of Campbell, the author of the satire on Dr. Johnson, entitled 'Lexiphanes,' then purser of the ship. Campbell took him as a servant, and delighted in giving him instruction; and when Falconer afterwards acquired celebrity boasted of him as a scholar. The Editor had this information from a surgeon of a man of war, in 1777, who knew both Campbell and Falconer, and who himself perished soon after by shipwreck, on the coast of America."]

Falconer's parentage was humble, but his education was above the common; he displayed his poetic talents at an early age in a poem published in 1751, in memory of Frederick Prince of Wales; the Shipwreck, by which his name will be known to posterity, appeared in 1762, and obtained for him the notice of the Duke of York. His marine Dictionary, printed in 1769, introduced his name to many on whom the pathos of his poetry was lost; nor should it be forgotten that, before he sailed on his last fatal expedition, he wrote a poem called the Demagogue, in which he satirised with skill, as well as bitterness, one of the profligate patriots of the day. Falconer was a native of one of the towns in the coast of Fife, and his parents, who had suffered some misfortunes, removed to one of the sea-ports of England, where they both died soon after of an epidemic fever, leaving poor Falconer, then a boy, forlorn and destitute; in consequence of which he entered on board a man of war. He died in 1770.]

† [This touching sentiment occurs in the Ballad of the "Queen's Marie," or as some sets have it, "Mary Hamilton." One stanza will indicate the ballad to which we allude; it is thus:—

Yestreen the Queen had four Maries,
This day she'll have but three;
There was Mary Seaton, and Mary Beaton,
And Mary Carmichael, and me.
(See Border Minstrelsy.)

Queen Mary had four attendants of her own Christian name. In the ballad quoted by Burns, one of these gentlewomen is described as murdering her illegitimate child, and suffering for the crime; and the verse quoted is one of her last expressions at the place of execution.]

‡ The bard's second son, Francis.

cally gauger, condemned to gallop at least 200 miles every week to inspect dirty ponds and yeasty barrels, and where can I find time to write to, or importance to interest, any body? The upbraidings of my conscience, nay the upbraidings of my wife, have persecuted me on your account these two or three months past.—I wish to God I was a great man, that my correspondence might throw light upon you, to let the world see what you really are: and then I would make your fortune, without putting my hand in my pocket for you, which, like all other great men, I suppose I would avoid as much as possible. What are you doing, and how are you doing? Have you lately seen any of my few friends? What has become of the BOROUGH REFORM, or how is the fate of my poor name-sake Mademoiselle Burns decided? O man! but for thee and thy selfish appetites, and dishonest artifices, that beauteous form, and that once innocent and still ingenuous mind, might have shone conspicuous and lovely in the faithful wife, and the affectionate mother; and shall the unfortunate sacrifice to thy pleasures have no claim on thy humanity!*

I saw lately in a Review some extracts from a new poem, called the Village Curate; send it me. I want likewise a cheap copy of The World. Mr. Armstrong, the young poet, who does me the honour to mention me so kindly in his works, please give him my best thanks for the copy of his book—I shall write him, my first leisure hour. I like his poetry much, but I think his style in prose quite astonishing.

Your book came safe, and I am going to trouble you with farther commissions. I call it troubling you—because I want only BOOKS; the cheapest way, the best; so you may have to hunt for them in the evening auctions. I want Smollett's Works, for the sake of his incomparable humour. I have already Roderick Random, and Humphrey Clinker.—Peregrine Pickle, Launcelot Greaves, and Ferdinand, Count Fathom, I still want; but as I said, the veriest ordinary copies will serve me. I am nice only in the appearance of my poets. I forget the price of Cowper's Poems, but, I believe, I must have them. I saw the other day proposals for a publication, entitled, "Banks's new and complete Christian's Family Bible," printed for C. Cooke, Paternoster-row, London.—He promises at least to give in the work, I think it is three hundred and odd engravings, to which he has put the names of the first artists in London.—You will know the character of the performance, as some numbers of it are published; and, if it is really what it pretends to be, set me down as a subscriber, and send me the published numbers.†

Let me hear from you, your first leisure minute, and trust me you shall in future have no reason to complain of my silence. The dazzling perplexity of novelty will dissipate, and leave me to pursue my course in the quiet path of methodical routine.

R. B.

No. CLXXIX.

TO MR. W. NICOL.

Ellisland, Feb. 9th, 1790.

MY DEAR SIR,

THAT d-mned mare of yours is dead. I would freely have given her price to have saved her; she has vexed me beyond description. Indebted as I was to your goodness beyond what I can ever repay, I eagerly grasped at your offer to have the mare with me. That I might at least shew my readiness in wishing to be grateful, I took every care of her in my power. She was never crossed for riding above half a score of times by me, or in my keeping. I drew her in the plough, one of three, for one poor week. I refused fifty-five shillings for her, which was the highest bode I could squeeze for her. I fed her up and had her in fine order for Dumfries fair; when, four or five days before the fair, she was seized with an unaccountable disorder in the sinews, or somewhere in the bones of the neck: with a weakness or total want of power in her fillets, and in short the whole vertebræ of her spine seemed to be diseased and unhinged, and in eight-and-forty hours, in spite of the two best farriers in the country, she died and be d-mned to her! The farriers said that she had been quite strained in the fillets beyond cure before you had bought her; and that the poor devil, though she might keep a little flesh, had been jaded and quite worn out with fatigue and oppression. While she was with me, she was under my own eye, and I assure you, my much valued friend, every thing was done for her that could be

* [The frail female here alluded to had been the subject of some rather oppressive magisterial proceedings, which took their character from Creech, and roused some public feeling in her behalf.]

† [Perhaps no set of men more effectually avail themselves of the easy credulity of the public than a certain description of Paternoster-row booksellers. Three hundred and odd engravings!—and by the first artists in London, too!—no wonder that Burns was dazzled by the splendour of the promise. It is no unusual thing for this class of impostors to illustrate the Holy Scriptures by plates originally engraved for the History of England, and I have actually seen subjects designed by our celebrated artist Steward, from Clarissa Harlowe and the Novelist's Magazine, converted, with incredible dexterity, by these Bookselling-Breslows, into Scriptural embellishments! One of these vendors of 'Family Bibles' lately called on me to consult me professionally about a folio engraving he brought with him.—It represented Mons. Buffon, seated, contemplating various groups of animals that surrounded him: he merely wished, he said, to be informed whether by unclothing the Naturalist, and giving him a rather more resolute look, the plate could not, at a trifling expense, be made to pass for "Daniel in the Lion's Den!"—CROMEK.]

done; and the accident has vexed me to the heart. In fact I could not pluck up spirits to write to you, on account of the unfortunate business.

There is little new in this country. Our theatrical company, of which you must have heard, leave us this week. Their merit and character are indeed very great, both on the stage and in private life; not a worthless creature among them; and their encouragement has been accordingly. Their usual run is from eighteen to twenty-five pounds a night: seldom less than the one, and the house will hold no more than the other. There have been repeated instances of sending away six, and eight, and ten pounds a night for want of room. A new theatre is to be built by subscription; the first stone is to be laid on Friday first to come. Three hundred guineas have been raised by thirty subscribers, and thirty more might have been got if wanted. The manager, Mr. Sutherland, was introduced to me by a friend from Ayr; and a worthier or cleverer fellow-I have rarely met with. Some of our clergy have slipt in by stealth now and then; but they have got up a farce of their own. You must have heard how the Rev. Mr. Lawson of Kirkmahoe, seconded by the Rev. Mr. Kirkpatrick of Dunscore, and the rest of that faction, have accused, in formal process, the unfortunate and Rev. Mr. Heron of Kirkgunzeon, that, in ordaining Mr. Nielson to the cure of souls in Kirkbean, he, the said Heron, feloniously and treasonably bound the said Nielson to the confession of faith, so far as it was agreeable to reason and the word of God!

Mrs. B. begs to be remembered most gratefully to you. Little Bobby and Frank are charmingly well and healthy. I am jaded to death with fatigue. For these two or three months, on an average, I have not ridden less than two hundred miles per week. I have done little in the poetic way. I have given Mr. Sutherland two Prologues; one of which was delivered last week. I have likewise strung four or five barbarous stanzas, to the tune of Chevy Chase, by way of Elegy on your poor unfortunate mare, beginning (the name she got here was Peg Nicholson)

"Peg Nicholson was a good bay mare,
As ever trode on air;
But now she's floating down the Nith,
And past the mouth o' Cairn."

[See page 293.]

My best compliments to Mrs. Nicol, and little Neddy, and all the family; I hope Ned is a good scholar, and will come out to gather nuts and apples with me next harvest.*

R. B.

No. CLXXX.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Ellisland, 13th February, 1790.

I BEG your pardon, my dear and much valued friend, for writing to you on this very unfashionable, unsightly sheet—

"My poverty, but not my will, consents."

But to make amends, since of modish post I have none, except one poor widowed half-sheet of gilt, which lies in my drawer among my plebeian fool's-cap pages, like the widow of a man of fashion, whom that unpolite scoundrel, Necessity, has driven from Burgundy and Pine-apple, to a dish of Bohea, with the scandal-bearing helpmate of a village priest; or a glass of whisky-toddy, with a ruby-nosed yoke-fellow of a foot-padding exciseman—I make a vow to enclose this sheet-full of epistolary fragments in that my only scrap of gilt paper.

I am indeed your unworthy debtor for three friendly letters. I ought to have written to you long ere now, but it is a literal fact I have scarcely a spare moment. It is not that I will not write to you; Miss Burnet is not more dear to her guardian angel, nor his grace the Duke of Queensberry to the powers of darkness, than my friend Cunningham to me. It is not that I cannot write to you; should you doubt it, take the following fragment, which was intended for you some time ago, and be convinced that I can antithesize sentiment, and circumvolute periods, as well as any coiner of phrase in the regions of philology.

December, 1789.

MY DEAR CUNNINGHAM,

WHERE are you? And what are you doing? Can you be that son of levity, who takes up a friendship as he takes up a fashion; or are you, like some other of the worthiest fellows in the world, the victim of indolence, laden with fetters of ever-increasing weight?

What strange beings we are! Since we have a portion of conscious existence, equally capable of enjoying pleasure, happiness, and rapture, or of suffering pain, wretchedness, and misery, it is surely worthy of an inquiry, whether there be not such a thing as a science of golden pippin, and the true honey-pear, were plentiful in the old orchard of the house of Comyn, at Dalswinton, but the garden of Ellisland, during the superintendance of the poet, produced only green kale and gooseberries—it is otherwise now.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [The nuts, which the poet promised the son of his friend, might be gathered on every burn-bank in the vale of Nith; not so the apples; a few might be seen in private gardens, and gentlemen's orchards, but they were not to be found giving beauty to the hedge-rows, and fragrance to the public road, as in the sunnier regions of the south. The ancient life; whether method, economy, and fertility of expedients, be not applicable to enjoyment; and whether there be not a want of dexterity in pleasure, which renders our little scantling of happiness still less; and a profuseness, an intoxication in bliss, which leads to satiety, disgust, and self-abhorrence. There is not a doubt but that health, talents, character, decent competency, respectable friends, are real substantial blessings; and yet do we not daily see those who enjoy many or all of these good things contrive notwithstanding to be as unhappy as others to whose lot few of them have fallen? I believe one great source of this mistake or misconduct is owing to a certain stimulus, with us called ambition, which goads us up the hill of life, not as we ascend other eminences, for the laudable curiosity of viewing an extended landscape, but rather for the dishonest pride of looking down on others of our fellow creatures, seemingly diminutive in humbler stations, &c.

Sunday, 14th February, 1790.

GOD help me! I am now obliged to join

“Night to day, and Sunday to the week.”

If there be any truth in the orthodox faith of these churches, I am d-mned past redemption, and what is worse, d-mned to all eternity. I am deeply read in Boston's Four-fold State, Marshal on Sanctification, Guthrie's Trial of a Saving Interest, &c.; but “there is no balm in Gilead, there is no physician there,” for me; so I shall e'en turn Arminian, and trust to “Sincere though imperfect obedience.”

Tuesday, 16th.

LUCKILY for me, I was prevented from the discussion of the knotty point at which I had just made a full stop. All my fears and cares are of this world: if there is another, an honest man has nothing to fear from it. I hate a man that wishes to be a Deist; but I fear, every fair, unprejudiced inquirer must in some degree be a Sceptic. It is not that there are any very staggering arguments against the immortality of man; but, like electricity, phlogiston, &c., the subject is so involved in darkness that we want data to go upon. One thing frightens me much; that we are to live for ever, seems too good news to be true. That we are to enter into a new scene of existence, where, exempt from want and pain, we shall enjoy ourselves and our friends without satiety or separation—how much should I be indebted to any one who could fully assure me that this was certain!

My time is once more expired. I will write to Mr. Cleghorn soon. God bless him and all his concerns! And may all the powers that preside over conviviality and friendship be present with all their kindest influence, when the bearer of this, Mr. Syme, and you meet! I wish I could also make one.

Finally, brethren, farewell! Whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are gentle, whatsoever things are charitable, whatsoever things are kind, think on these things, and think on

R. B.*

No. CLXXXI.

TO MR. HILL.

Ellisland, 2nd March, 1790.

At a late meeting of the Monkland Friendly Society, it was resolved to augment their library by the following books, which you are to send us as soon as possible:—The Mirror, The Lounger, Man of Feeling, Man of the World, (these, for my own sake, I wish to have by the

January 28th, 1790.

* [The following letters from the pen of Alexander Cunningham will be read with interest:—

Edinburgh, May 25th, 1789.

“MY DEAR BURNS,

I AM much indebted to you for your last friendly elegant epistle, and it shall make a part of the vanity of my composition to retain your correspondence through life. It was remarkable your introducing the name of Miss Burnet at a time when she was in such ill health; and I am sure it will grieve your gentle heart to hear of her being in the last stage of consumption. Alas! that so much beauty, innocence, and virtue, should be nipt in the bud! Hers was the smile of cheerfulness—of sensibility, not of allurement; and her elegance of manners corresponded with the purity and elevation of her mind.

How does your friendly muse? I am sure she still retains her affection for you, and that you have many of her favours in your possession, which I have not seen. I weary much to hear from you. * * * * I beseech you do not forget me. * * * * I most sincerely hope all your concerns in life prosper, and that your roof-tree enjoys the blessing of good health. All your friends here are well, among whom, and not the least, is your acquaintance Cleghorn. As for myself, I am well, as far as * * * * will let a man be; but with these I am happy. When you meet with my very agreeable friend, J. Syme, give him for me a hearty squeeze, and bid God bless him.

Is there any probability of your being soon in Edinburgh?”

“In some instances it is reckoned unpardonable to quote any one's own words, but the value I have for your friendship nothing can more truly or more elegantly express than

‘Time but the impression stronger makes,
As streams their channels deeper wear.’

“Having written to you twice without having heard from you, I am apt to think my letters have miscarried. My conjecture is only framed upon the chapter of accidents turning up against me, as it too often does, in the trivial, and I may with truth add, the more important affairs of life; but I shall continue occasionally to inform you what is going on among the circle of your friends in these parts. In these days of merriment, I have frequently heard your name claimed at the jovial board—under the roof of our hospitable friend at Stenhouse-mills, there were no

‘Lingering moments number'd with care.’

“I saw your Address to the New-year, in the Dumfries Journal. Of your productions I shall say nothing, but my acquaintances allege that when your name is mentioned, which every man of celebrity must know often happens, I am the champion, the Mendoza, against all snarling critics, and narrow-minded reptiles, of whom a few on this planet do crawl.

“With best compliments to your wife, and her Black-eyed sister, I remain, yours, &c.’”] first carrier), Knox's History of the Reformation; Rae's History of the Rebellion in 1715; any good History of the Rebellion in 1745; A Display of the Secession Act and Testimony, by Mr. Gibb; Hervey's Meditations; Beveridge's Thoughts; and another copy of Watson's Body of Divinity.

I wrote to Mr. A. Masterton three or four months ago, to pay some money he owed me into your hands, and lately I wrote to you to the same purpose, but I have heard from neither one nor other of you.

In addition to the books I commissioned in my last, I want very much an Index to the Excise Laws, or an Abridgment of all the Statutes now in force, relative to the Excise, by Jellinger Symons; I want three copies of this book: if it is now to be had, cheap or dear, get it for me. An honest country neighbour of mine wants, too, a Family Bible, the larger the better, but second-handed, for he does not choose to give above ten shillings for the book. I want likewise for myself, as you can pick them up, second-handed or cheap, copies of Otway's Dramatic Works, Ben Jonson's, Dryden's, Congreve's, Wycherley's, Vanbrugh's, Cibber's, or any Dramatic Works of the more modern, Macklin, Garrick, Foote, Colman, or Sheridan. A good copy, too, of Molière, in French, I much want. Any other good dramatic authors in that language I want also; but comic authors chiefly, though I should wish to have Racine, Corneille, and Voltaire, too. I am in no hurry for all, or any of these, but if you accidentally meet with them very cheap, get them for me.*

And now, to quit the dry walk of business, how do you do, my dear friend? and how is Mrs. Hill? I trust, if now and then not so elegantly handsome, at least as amiable, and sings as divinely as ever. My good wife too has a charming "wood-note wild;" now could we four

I am out of all patience with this vile world, for one thing. Mankind are by nature benevolent creatures, except in a few scoundrelly instances. I do not think that avarice of the good things we chance to have is born with us; but we are placed here amid so much nakedness, and hunger, and poverty, and want, that we are under a cursed necessity of studying selfishness, in order that we may EXIST! Still there are, in every age, a few souls that all the wants and woes of life cannot debase to selfishness, or even to the necessary alloy of caution and prudence. If ever I am in danger of vanity, it is when I contemplate myself on this side of my disposition and character. God knows I am no saint; I have a whole host of follies and sins to answer for; but if I could, and I believe I do it as far as I can, I would wipe away all tears from all eyes. Adieu!

R. B.

No. CLXXXII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 10th April, 1790.

I HAVE just now, my ever honoured friend, enjoyed a very high luxury, in reading a paper of the Lounger. You know my national prejudices. I had often read and admired the Spectator, Adventurer, Rambler, and World; but still with a certain regret that they were so thoroughly and entirely English. Alas! have I often said to myself, what are all the boasted advantages which my country reaps from the union, that can counterbalance the annihilation of her independence, and even her very name! I often repeat that couplet of my favourite poet, Goldsmith—

"—— States, of native liberty possess,
Tho' very poor, may yet be very blest."

Nothing can reconcile me to the common terms, 'English Ambassador, English Court,' &c. And I am out of all patience to see that equivocal character, Hastings, impeached by "the Commons of England." Tell me, my friend, is this weak prejudice? I believe in my conscience such ideas as "my country; her independence; her honour; the illustrious names that mark the history of my native land;" &c. —I believe these, among your men of the world, men who in fact guide for the most part and govern our world, are looked on as so many modifications of wrong-headedness. They know the use of bawling out such terms, to rouse or lead THE RABBLE; but for their own private use, with almost all the able statesmen that ever existed, or now exist, when they talk of right and wrong, they only mean proper and improper; and their measure of conduct is, not what they OUGHT, but what they DARE. For the truth of this I shall not ransack the history of nations, but appeal to one of the ablest judges of men that ever lived—the celebrated Earl of Chesterfield. In fact, a man who could thoroughly control his vices whenever they interfered with his interests, and who could completely put on the appearance of every virtue as often as it suited his purposes, is, on the

* [That Burns at this period had turned his thoughts on the drama, his order to his bookseller for dramatic works, and his letters to Lady Harriet Don, plainly enough intimate. "No man knows," he thus writes, "what nature has fitted him for till he try; and if, after a preparatory course of some years' study of men and books, I should find myself unequal to the task, there is no great harm done. Virtue and study are their own reward. I have got Shakespeare, and begun with him; and I shall stretch a point, and make myself-master of all the dramatic authors of any repute in both English and French—the only languages which I know."]

Stanhopean plan, the perfect man; a man to lead nations. But are great abilities, complete without a flaw, and polished without a blemish, the standard of human excellence? This is certainly the staunch opinion of men of the world; but I call on honour, virtue, and worth, to give the Stygian doctrine a loud negative! However, this must be allowed, that, if you abstract from man the idea of an existence beyond the grave, then, the true measure of human conduct is, proper and improper: virtue and vice, as dispositions of the heart, are, in that case, of scarcely the same import and value to the world at large as harmony and discord in the modifications of sound; and a delicate sense of honour, like a nice ear for music, though it may sometimes give the possessor an ecstasy unknown to the coarser organs of the herd, yet, considering the harsh gratings, and inharmonic jars, in this ill-tuned state of being, it is odds but the individual would be as happy, and certainly would be as much respected by the true judges of society as it would then stand, without either a good ear or a good heart.

You must know I have just met with the Mirror and Lounger for the first time, and I am quite in raptures with them; I should be glad to have your opinion of some of the papers. The one I have just read, Lounger, No. 61, has cost me more honest tears than any thing I have read of a long time.* Mackenzie has been called the Addison of the Scots, and, in my opinion, Addison would not be hurt at the comparison. If he has not Addison's exquisite humour, he as certainly outdoes him in the tender and the pathetic. His Man of Feeling (but I am not counsel learned in the laws of criticism) I estimate as the first performance in its kind I ever saw. From what book, moral or even pious, will the susceptible young mind receive impressions more congenial to humanity and kindness, generosity and benevolence; in short, more of all that ennobles the soul to herself, or endears her to others—than from the simple affecting tale of poor Harley? † writings, I do not know if they are the fittest reading for a young man who is about to set out, as the phrase is, to make his way into life. Do not you think, Madam, that among the few favoured of Heaven in the structure of their minds (for such there certainly are), there may be a purity, a tenderness, a dignity, and elegance of soul which are of no use, nay, in some degree, absolutely disqualifying for the truly important business of making a man's way into life? If I am not much mistaken, my gallant young friend, A * * * * *, I is very much under these disqualifications; and for the young females of a family I could mention, well may they excite parental solicitude, for I, a common acquaintance, or as my vanity will have it, an humble friend, have often trembled for a turn of mind which may render them eminently happy—or peculiarly miserable!

Still, with all my admiration of Mackenzie's

I have been manufacturing some verses lately; but as I have got the most hurried season of excise business over, I hope to have more leisure to transcribe any thing that may show how much I have the honour to be, Madam,

Yours, &c.

R. B.

No. CLXXXIII.

TO COLLECTOR MITCHELL. §

Ellisland, 1790.

SIR:

I SHALL not fail to wait on Captain Riddell to-night—I wish and pray that the goddess of justice herself would appear to-morrow among our hon. gentlemen, merely to give them a word in their ear that mercy to the thief is injustice to the honest man. For my part I have galloped over my ten parishes these four days, until this moment that I am just alighted, or rather, that my poor jackass-skeleton of a horse has let me down; for the miserable devil has been on his knees half a score of times within the last twenty miles, telling me in his own way, to him by you, as he expressed to me a very strong desire to see you at his house on the banks of the Tweed. Once more I wish you every thing pleasant and prosperous.

“Yours very faithfully,

“HENRY MACKENZIE.”

It is singular that the poet read the Mirror and Lounger for the first time in 1790—in the year 1786 there appeared in the latter a generous article from the pen of Mackenzie on the poems of Burns, in which he was placed nigh the summit of the Scottish Parnassus.]

‡ [Probably Anthony, a son of Mrs. Dunlop, is here alluded to.]

§ [Collector Mitchell was a kind and considerate gentleman, and befriended the poet on several occasions; to his grandson, Mr. John Campbell, surgeon, in Aberdeen, we are indebted for this characteristic letter.]

* [This paper relates to attachments between servants and masters, and concludes with the story of Albert Blanc.]

† [Of all the letters which Burns wrote to Henry Mackenzie, not one has been handed down to us; the following is from the pen of the Man of Feeling, and was addressed to the poet when about to set off on his Border tour:—

“DEAR SIR,

“AMIDST a variety of occupations in which I am at this moment engaged, I have only time to scrawl these few lines to return you very sincere and cordial thanks for the engraving and the letter accompanying it. The anecdote you obligingly communicate is not less gratifying to the feelings of the man than flattering to the vanity of the author.

“I heartily wish you a pleasant journey and all happiness and success in the cause and in the objects of it. I hope, as soon as you return to Edinburgh, to have the pleasure of seeing you. Mr. Stewart told me he had given you a letter to Mr. Brydone, otherwise I would have written a few lines

'Behold, am not I thy faithful jade of a horse, on which thou hast ridden these many years?'

In short, Sir, I have broke my horse's wind, and almost broke my own neck, besides some injuries in a part that shall be nameless, owing to a hard-hearted stone for a saddle. I find that every offender has so many great men to espouse his cause that I shall not be surprised if I am committed to the strong hold of the law to-morrow for insolence to the dear friends of the gentlemen of the country.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obliged and obedient humble

R. B.

—
No. CLXXXIV.

TO DR. MOORE.

Excise-Office, Dumfries, 14th July, 1790.

SIR:

COMING into town this morning, to attend my duty in this office, it being collection-day, I met with a gentleman who tells me he is on his way to London; so I take the opportunity of writing to you, as franking is at present under a temporary death. I shall have some snatches of leisure through the day, amid our horrid business and bustle, and I shall improve them as well as I can; but let my letter be as stupid as * * * * *, as miscellaneous as a newspaper, as short as a hungry grace-before-meat, or as long as a law-paper in the Douglas cause; as ill spelt as country John's billet-doux, or as unsightly a scrawl as Betty Byre-Mucker's answer to it; I hope, considering circumstances, you will forgive it; and as it will put you to no expense of postage, I shall have the less reflection about it.

I am sadly ungrateful in not returning you my thanks for your most valuable present, Zeluco. In fact, you are in some degree blameable for my neglect. You were pleased to express a wish for my opinion of the work, which so flattered me that nothing less would serve my over-weening fancy than a formal criticism on the book. In fact, I have gravely planned a comparative view of you, Fielding, Richardson, and Smollett, in your different qualities and merits as novel-writers. This, I own, betrays my ridiculous vanity, and I may probably never bring the business to bear; but I am fond of the spirit young Elihu shews in the

* [The sonnets to which Burns alludes were those of Charlotte Smith; in the volume which belonged to the poet one note alone intimates that the book passed through his hands; the fair authoress, in giving the source of line 14, in the 8th sonnet—

"Have power to cure all sadness but despair," quotes Milton—

book of Job—"And I said, I will also declare my opinion." I have quite disfigured my copy of the book with my annotations. I never take it up without at the same time taking my pencil, and marking with asterisms, parentheses, &c., wherever I meet with an original thought, a nervous remark on life and manners, a remarkable well-turned period, or a character sketched with uncommon precision.

Though I should hardly think of fairly writing out my "Comparative View," I shall certainly trouble you with my remarks, such as they are.

I have just received from my gentleman that horrid summons in the book of revelations—"That time shall be no more!"

The little collection of sonnets have some charming poetry in them. If indeed I am indebted to the fair author for the book, and not, as I rather suspect, to a celebrated author of the other sex, I should certainly have written to the lady, with my grateful acknowledgments, and my own ideas of the comparative excellence of her pieces. I would do this last, not from any vanity of thinking that my remarks could be of much consequence to Mrs. Smith, but merely from my own feelings as an author, doing as I would be done by.*

R. B.

—
No. CLXXXV.

TO MR. MURDOCH,

TEACHER OF FRENCH, LONDON.

Ellisland, July 16, 1790.

MY DEAR SIR,

I RECEIVED a letter from you a long time ago, but unfortunately as it was in the time of my peregrinations and journeyings through Scotland, I mislaid or lost it, and by consequence your direction along with it. Luckily my good star brought me acquainted with Mr. Kennedy, who, I understand, is an acquaintance of yours: and by his means and mediation I hope to replace that link which my unfortunate negligence had so unluckily broken in the chain of our correspondence. I was the more vexed at the vile accident as my brother William, a journeyman saddler, has been for some time in London; and wished above all things for your direction, that he might have paid his respects to his Father's Friend.

"Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
All sadness but despair."

To this Burns added with the pen

"He sang sae sweet as might dispel
A' rage but fell despair."

[These lines are to be found in one version at least of the fine ballad of Gil Morice.]

His last address he sent me was, "Wm. Burns, at Mr. Barber's, saddler, No. 181, Strand." I wrote him by Mr. Kennedy, but neglected to ask him for your address; so, if you find a spare half minute, please let my brother know by a card where and when he will find you, and the poor fellow will joyfully wait on you, as one of the few surviving friends of the man whose name, and Christian name too, he has the honour to bear.

The next letter I write you shall be a long one. I have much to tell you of "hair-breadth 'scapes in th' imminent deadly breach," with all the eventful history of a life, the early years of which owed so much to your kind tutorage; but this at an hour of leisure. My kindest compliments to Mrs. Murdoch and family.

I am ever, my dear Sir,
Your obliged friend,
R. B.*

* [The reply to this letter was as follows:—
From Mr. Murdoch to the Bard.

Hart-street, Bloomsbury Square, London, September 14th, 1790.

"MY DEAR FRIEND,

"Yours of the 16th of July, I received on the 26th, in the afternoon, per favour of my friend Mr. Kennedy, and at the same time was informed that your brother was ill. Being engaged in business till late that evening, I set out next morning to see him, and had thought of three or four medical gentlemen of my acquaintance, to one or other of whom I might apply for advice, provided it should be necessary. But when I went to Mr. Barber's, to my great astonishment and heart-felt grief I found that my young friend had, on Saturday, bid an everlasting farewell to all sublunary things.—It was about a fortnight before that he had found me out, by Mr. Stevenson's accidentally calling at my shop to buy something. We had only one interview, and that was highly entertaining to me in several respects. He mentioned some instruction I had given him when very young, to which he said he owed, in a great measure, the philanthropy he possessed. He also took notice of my exhorting you all, when I wrote, about eight years ago, to the man who, of all mankind that I ever knew, stood highest in my esteem, "not to let go your integrity." You may easily conceive that such conversation was both pleasing and encouraging to me; I anticipated a deal of rational happiness from future conversations. Vain are our expectations and hopes. They are so almost always—perhaps (nay, certainly), for our good. Were it not for disappointed hopes, we could hardly spend a thought on another state of existence, or be in any degree reconciled to the quitting of this. I know of no one source of consolation to those who have lost young relatives equal to that of their being of a good disposition, and of a promising character.

* * * * *

Be assured, my dear friend, that I cordially sympathize with you all, and particularly with Mrs. W. Burness, who is undoubtedly one of the most tender and affectionate mothers that ever lived. Remember me to her in the most friendly manner, when you see her, or write. Please present my best compliments to Mrs. R. Burns, and to your brother and sisters. There is no occasion for me to exhort you to filial duty; and to use your united endeavours in rendering the evening of life as comfortable as possible to a mother who has dedicated so great a part of it in promoting your temporal and spiritual welfare.

Your letter to Dr. Moore I delivered at his house, and shall most likely know your opinion of Zeluco, the first time I meet with him. I wish and hope for a long letter. Be particular about your mother's health. I hope she is too much a christian to be afflicted above measure, or to sorrow as those who have no hope.

No. CLXXXVI.

TO MR. M'MURDO.

Ellisland, 2nd August, 1790.

SIR,

Now that you are over with the sirens of Flattery, the harpies of Corruption, and the furies of Ambition, these infernal deities, that on all sides, and in all parties, preside over the villainous business of Politics, permit a rustic muse of your acquaintance to do her best to soothe you with a song.—

You know Henderson—I have not flattered his memory.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obliged humble servant,

R. B.†

One of the most pleasing hopes I have is to visit you all; but I am commonly disappointed in what I most ardently wish for.

I am, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

JOHN MURDOCH."

The promised account of himself was never written: but this is the less to be regretted since we have that which he rendered of his earlier days to Dr. Moore—a valuable memoir, from which all biographers have borrowed. This letter was communicated to Cromek by Mr. Murdoch, accompanied by the following interesting note:—

*London, Hart-street, Bloomsbury,
Dec. 28th, 1807.*

"DEAR SIR,

"The enclosed letter, which I lately found among my papers, I copy for your perusal, partly because it is Burns's, partly because it makes honourable mention of my rational christian friend, his father; and likewise because it is rather flattering to myself. I glory in no one thing so much as an intimacy with good men—the friendship of others reflect no honour, when I recollect the pleasure (and I hope benefit) I received from the conversation of WILLIAM BURNES, especially when on the Lord's Day we walked together for about two miles to the house of prayer, there publicly to adore and praise the Giver of all good. I entertain an ardent hope that together we shall renew the glorious theme in distant worlds, with powers more adequate to the mighty subject, THE EXUBERANT BENEFICENCE OF THE GREAT CREATOR.

But to the letter:—

I promised myself a deal of happiness in the conversation of my dear young friend; but my promises of this nature generally prove fallacious. Two visits were the utmost that I received. At one of them, however, he repeated a lesson which I had given him about twenty years before, when he was a mere child, concerning the pity and tenderness due to animals. To that lesson (which it seems was brought to the level of his capacity) he declared himself indebted for almost all the philanthropy he possessed.

Let not parents and teachers imagine that it is needless to talk seriously to children. They are sooner fit to be reasoned with than is generally thought. Strong and indelible impressions are to be made before the mind be agitated and ruffled by the numerous train of distracting cares and unruly passions, whereby it is frequently rendered almost unsusceptible of the principles and precepts of rational religion and sound morality.

But I find myself digressing again. Poor William! then in the bloom and vigour of youth, caught a putrid fever, and, in a few days, as real chief mourner, I followed his remains to the land of forgetfulness.

JOHN MURDOCH."

† [This brief letter enclosed the admirable poem on the death of Captain Matthew Henderson, and no one could

No. CLXXXVII.
TO MRS. DUNLOP.

8th August, 1790.

DEAR MADAM,

AFTER a long day's toil, plague, and care, I sit down to write to you. Ask me not why I have delayed it so long! It was owing to hurry, indolence, and fifty other things; in short to any thing—but forgetfulness of la plus aimable de son sexe. By the bye, you are indebted your best courtesy to me for this last compliment; as I pay it from my sincere conviction of its truth—a quality rather rare in compliments of these grinning, bowing, scraping times.

Well, I hope writing to you will ease a little my troubled soul. Sorely has it been bruised to-day! A ci-devant friend of mine, and an intimate acquaintance of yours, has given my feelings a wound that I perceive will gangrene dangerously ere it cure. He has wounded my pride!^{*}

R. B.

No. CLXXXVIII.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Ellisland, 8th August, 1790.

FORGIVE me, my once dear, and ever dear, friend, my seeming negligence. You cannot sit down and fancy the busy life I lead.

I laid down my goose feather to beat my brains for an apt simile, and had some thoughts of a country grannum at a family christening; a bride on the market-day before her marriage; or a tavern-keeper at an election-dinner; but the resemblance that hits my fancy best is that blackguard miscreant, Satan, who roams about like a roaring lion, seeking, searching whom he may devour. However, tossed about as I am, if I choose (and who would not choose) to bind down with the crampets of attention the brazen foundation of integrity, I may rear up the superstructure of Independence, and, from its daring turrets, bid defiance to the storms of fate. And is not this a “consummation devoutly to be wished?”

* * * * *
* * * * *

“Thy spirit, Independence, let me share:
Lord of the lion-heart, and eagle-eye!
Thy steps I follow with my bosom bare,
Nor heed the storm that howls along the sky!”

Are not these noble verses? They are the introduction of Smollet's Ode to Independence: if you have not seen the poem, I will send it to you.—How wretched is the man that hangs on by the favours of the great! To shrink from every dignity of man, at the approach of a lordly piece of self-consequence, who amid all his tinsel glitter, and stately hauteur, is but a creature formed as thou art—and perhaps not so well formed as thou art—came into the world a puling infant as thou didst, and must go out of it as all men must, a naked corse.

R. B.

No. CLXXXIX.

TO DR. ANDERSON.*

[1790.]

SIR :

I AM much indebted to my worthy friend Dr. Blacklock for introducing me to a gentleman of Dr. Anderson's celebrity; but when you do me the honour to ask my assistance in your proposed publication, alas, Sir! you might as well think to cheapen a little honesty at the sign of an advocate's wig, or humility under the Geneva band. I am a miserable hurried devil, worn to the marrow in the friction of holding the noses of the poor publicans to the grindstone of the Excise! and like Milton's Satan, for private reasons, am forced

“To do what yet, tho' damn'd, I would abhor.”

—and except a couplet or two of honest execration

* * * * * R. B.

better feel than the gentleman to whom it was addressed the difference between the dissonance of politics, and the harmony of the muse. Who Henderson was has been a source of some solicitude; Mrs. Burns had only heard of his name, and Mrs. M'Murdo remembered him as an agreeable and witty man, but knew nothing of his lineage. Sir Thomas Wallace was applied to, and his communication afforded a little more light. He was intimate, he said, with Henderson, and much attached to him, as all who knew him were. During the stay of Burns in Edinburgh the Captain lived in the High Street, dined regularly at Fortune's Tavern, and was a member of the Capillaire Club, which was composed of all who inclined to the witty and the joyous. “With his family,” says Sir Thomas, “I was not acquainted: but he was a gentleman of true principles and probity, and for abilities, goodness of heart, gentleness of nature, sprightly wit, and sparkling humour would have been an honour to any family in the land.”

* [Who this ci-devant friend was, and what was the nature of the quarrel between him and the poet, remain in obscurity.

“The preceding letter to Mrs. Dunlop explains the feelings under which this was written. The strain of indignant invective goes on some time longer in the style which our bard was too apt to indulge, and of which the reader has already seen so much.”—CURRIE.]

* [Dr. Robert Anderson was one of the kindest and most benevolent authors of his time: his door was never shut against the deserving, and he held out his hand to almost all young literary aspirants. He was one of the first to discover the genius of Campbell, and the poet acknowledged his discernment in a dedication. He has been for some time numbered with the dead.—CUNNINGHAM.]

This fragment, first published by Cromek, is placed by him and subsequent editors under 1794, and by Mr. Cunningham is supposed to be addressed to Dr. Robert Anderson, the editor of the British Poets. We have little doubt that the gentleman addressed was Dr. James Anderson, a well-known agricultural and miscellaneous writer, and the editor of a weekly miscellany entitled “The Bee.” This publication was commenced in Edinburgh, December, 1790, and concluded in January 1794, when it formed eighteen

No. CXC.

TO CRAWFORD TAIT, Esq.

EDINBURGH.

Ellisland, 15th October, 1790.

DEAR SIR:

ALLOW me to introduce to your acquaintance the bearer, Mr. Wm. Duncan, a friend of mine, whom I have long known and long loved. His father, whose only son he is, has a decent little property in Ayr-shire, and has bred the young man to the law, in which department he comes up an adventurer to your good town. I shall give you my friend's character in two words: as to his head, he has talents enough, and more than enough, for common life; as to his heart, when nature had kneaded the kindly clay that composes it, she said, "I can no more."

You, my good Sir, were born under kinder stars; but your fraternal sympathy, I well know, can enter into the feelings of the young man, who goes into life with the laudable ambition to do something, and to be something among his fellow-creatures; but whom the consciousness of friendless obscurity presses to the earth, and wounds to the soul!

Even the fairest of his virtues are against him. That independent spirit, and that ingenuous modesty, qualities inseparable from a noble mind, are, with the million, circumstances not a little disqualifying. What pleasure is in the power of the fortunate and the happy, by their notice and patronage, to brighten the countenance and glad the heart of such depressed youth! I am not so angry with mankind for their deaf economy of the purse:—The goods of this world cannot be divided without being lessened—but why be a niggard of that which bestows bliss on a fellow-creature, yet takes nothing from our own means of enjoyment? We wrap ourselves up in the cloak of our own better fortune, and turn away our eyes, lest the wants and woes of our brother-mortals should disturb the selfish apathy of our souls!

I am the worst hand in the world at asking a favour. That indirect address, that insinuating implication, which, without any positive request, plainly expresses your wish, is a talent not to be acquired at a plough-tail. Tell me then, for you can, in what periphrasis of language, in what circumvolution of phrase, I shall envelope, yet not conceal, this plain story.—"My dear Mr. Tait, my friend Mr. Duncan, whom I have the pleasure of introducing to you, is a young lad of your own profession, and a gentleman of much modesty, and great worth. Perhaps it may be in your power to assist him in the, to him, important consideration of getting a place; but, at all events, your notice and acquaintance will be a very great acquisition to him; and I dare pledge myself that he will never disgrace your favour."

You may possibly be surprised, Sir, at such a letter from me; 'tis, I own, in the usual way of calculating these matters, more than our acquaintance entitles me to; but my answer is short: Of all the men at your time of life, whom I knew in Edinburgh, you are the most accessible on the side on which I have assailed you. You are very much altered indeed from what you were when I knew you, if generosity point the path you will not tread, or humanity call to you in vain.

As to myself, a being to whose interest I believe you are still a well-wisher, I am here, breathing at all times, thinking sometimes, and rhyming now and then. Every situation has its share of the cares and pains of life, and my situation, I am persuaded, has a full ordinary allowance of its pleasures and enjoyments.

My best compliments to your father and Miss Tait. If you have an opportunity, please remember me in the solemn-league-and-covenant of friendship to Mrs. Lewis Hay.* I am a wretch for not writing her; but I am so hack-volumes. The above letter by Burns, from the allusion it makes to his usual occupation by business, as well as from the bitterness of the expressions, seems to have been written in the latter part of the year, and was probably, to an application for the conduct of "The Bee," then about to be started. For these reasons, the present editor has shifted its place in the present correspondence.—CHAMBERS.

That this is evident will appear by the following Poetical Epistle of Dr. Blacklock to the Poet:—

Edinburgh, September 1st, 1790.

"How does my dear friend, much I languish to hear,
His fortune, relations, and all that are dear?
With love of the Muses so strongly still smitten,
I meant this epistle in verse to have written;
But from age and infirmity, indolence flows,
And this, much I fear, will restore me to prose.
Anon to my business I wish to proceed,—
Dr. Anderson guides and provokes me to speed,
A man of integrity, genius, and worth,
Who soon a performance intends to set forth;
A work miscellaneous, extensive, and free,
Which will weekly appear, by the name of the Bee,

Of this from himself I inclose you a plan,
And hope you will give what assistance you can.
Entangled with business, and haunted with care,
In which more or less human nature must share,
Some moments of leisure the Muses will claim,
A sacrifice due to amusement and fame,
The Bee, which sucks honey from ev'ry gay bloom,
With some rays of your genius her work may allume,
Whilst the flow'r whence her honey spontaneously flows,
As fragrantly smells, and as vig'rously grows.

Now with kind gratulations 'tis time to conclude,
And add, your promotion is here understood;
Thus free from the servile employ of excise, Sir,
We hope, soon to hear you commence supervisor;
You then, more at leisure, and free from controul,
May indulge the strong passion that reigns in your soul:
But I, feeble I, must to nature give way;
Devoted cold death's, and longevity's prey.
From verses though languid my thoughts must unbend,
Tho' still I remain your affectionate friend,

THOS. BLACKLOCK."']

* [Formerly Miss Margaret Chalmers.]

neyed with self-accusation in that way that my conscience lies in my bosom with scarce the sensibility of an oyster in 'ts shell. Where is Lady M'Kenzie? wherever she is, God bless her! I likewise beg leave to trouble you with compliments to Mr. Wm. Hamilton; and Mrs. Hamilton and family; and Mrs. Chalmers, when you are in that country. Should you meet with Miss Nimmo, please remember me kindly to her.

R. B.

 No. CXCL.

TO

Ellisland, 1790.

DEAR SIR:

WHETHER, in the way of my trade, I can be of any service to the Rev. Doctor, is I fear very doubtful. Ajax's shield consisted, I think, of seven bull hides and a plate of brass, which altogether set Hector's utmost force at defiance. Alas! I am not a Hector, and the worthy Doctor's foes are as securely armed as Ajax was. Ignorance, superstition, bigotry, stupidity, malevolence, self-conceit, envy—all strongly bound in a massy frame of brazen impudence! Good God, Sir! to such a shield, humour is the peck of a sparrow, and satire the pop-gun of a school-boy. Creation-disingering scelerats such as they, God only can mend, and the devil only can punish. In the comprehending way of Caligula, I wish they all had but one neck. I feel impotent as a child to the ardour of my wishes! O for a withering curse to blast the germs of their wicked machinations! O for a poisonous tornado, winged from the torrid zone of Tartarus, to sweep the spreading crop of their villainous contrivances to the lowest hell!*

R. B.

 No. CXCLII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, November, 1796.

"As cold waters to a thirsty soul, so is good news from a far country."

Fate has long owed me a letter of good news from you, in return for the many tidings of sorrow which I have received. In this instance I most cordially obey the apostle—"Rejoice with them that do rejoice"—for me, to sing for joy, is no new thing; but to preach for joy, as I have done in the commencement of this

* [This letter I suspect was addressed to Gavin Hamilton: it enclosed the Kirk's Alarm, written to aid the cause of Dr. McGill. Both the preacher and the poet failed: McGill recanted his heresy, and Burns had the mortification of epistle, is a pitch of extravagant rapture to which I never rose before.

I read your letter—I literally jumped for joy—How could such a mercurial creature as a poet lumpishly keep his seat, on the receipt of the best news from his best friend? I seized my gilt-headed Wangee rod, an instrument indispensably necessary in my left hand, in the moment of inspiration and rapture; and stride, stride—quick and quicker—out skipt I among the broomy banks of Nith to muse over my joy by retail. To keep within the bounds of prose was impossible. Mrs. Little's is a more elegant, but not a more sincere, compliment to the sweet little fellow than I, extempore almost, poured out to him in the following verses.

"Sweet flow'ret, pledge o' meikle love,
And ward o' mony a prayer,
What heart o' stane wad thou na move
Sae helpless, sweet, an fair!"

(Vide p. 249.)

I am much flattered by your approbation of my Tam o' Shanter, which you express in your former letter; though, by the bye, you load me in that said letter with accusations heavy and many; to all which I plead, not guilty! Your book is, I hear, on the road to reach me. As to printing of poetry, when you prepare it for the press, you have only to spell it right, and place the capital letters properly: as to the punctuation, the printers do that themselves.

I have a copy of Tam o' Shanter ready to send you by the first opportunity: it is too heavy to send by post.

I heard of Mr. Corbet† lately. He, in consequence of your recommendation, is most zealous to serve me. Please favour me soon with an account of your good folks; if Mrs. H. is recovering, and the young gentleman doing well.

R. B.

 No. CXCLIII.

TO LADY W. M. CONSTABLE.

Ellisland, 11th January, 1791.

MY LADY,

NOTHING less than the unlucky accident of having lately broken my right arm could have prevented me, the moment I received your ladyship's elegant present by Mrs. Miller, from returning you my warmest and most grateful acknowledgments; I assure your ladyship, I shall set it apart: the symbols of religion shall only be more sacred. In the moment of poetic composition, the box shall be my inspiring hurting the feelings of many, without benefiting one.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [One of the general supervisors of Excise.]

genius. When I would breath the comprehensive wish of benevolence for the happiness of others, I shall recollect your ladyship; when I would interest my fancy in the distresses incident to humanity, I shall remember the unfortunate Mary.*

R. B.

No. CXCIV.

TO WILLIAM DUNBAR, W. S.†

Ellisland, 17th January, 1791.

I AM not gone to Elysium, most noble colonel;‡ but am still here in this sublunary world, serving my God by propagating his image, and honouring my king by begetting him loyal subjects.

Many happy returns of the season await my friend. May the thorns of care never beset his path! May peace be an inmate to his bosom, and rapture a frequent visitor of his soul! May the blood-hounds of misfortune never track his steps, nor the screech-owl of sorrow alarm his dwelling! May 'enjoyment tell thy hour, and pleasure number thy days, thou friend of the bard! "Blessed be he that bleaseth thee, and cursed be he that curseth thee!!!"

As a further proof that I am still in the land of existence, I send you a poem, the latest I have composed. I have a particular reason for wishing you only to show it to select friends, should you think it worthy a friend's perusal; but if, at your first leisure hour, you will favour me with your opinion of, and strictures on, the performance, it will be an additional obligation on, dear Sir, your deeply indebted humble servant,

R. B.

* [This letter was written acknowledging the present of a valuable snuff-box, with a fine picture of Mary Queen of Scots on the lid. This was the gift of Lady Winifred Maxwell Constable, in grateful return for the Poet's "Lament" of that ill-starred Princess. Lady Winifred was the last in descent of the noble family of Nithsdale; a lady equally generous and gentle, and who was not the less respected by the people around because her house had suffered in the cause of the Stuarts. The possessions of the family were once very ample; but few estates thrive in civil wars, rebellions, and confiscations: one noble barony after another passed out of the hands of the Maxwells; and the title was extinguished, never, ' fear, to be revived.

‡ The bastion Castle of Caerlaverock on the Solway, and the College of Lincluden on the banks of the Nith, are still included in the family possessions, and are preserved with more care than what is usual with ruins in the South of Scotland. At the family seat, the bed in which Queen Mary slept, during her flight from the fatal field of Langside: a letter from Charles the First, summoning Lord Maxwell with as many armed men as he could muster, to aid him in supporting the Crown against the Parliament: and the letter from the last Countess, describing the all but miraculous

No. CXCIV.

TO MRS. GRAHAM,

OF FINTRAY.

Ellisland, January, 1791.

MADAM,

WHETHER it is that the story of our Mary Queen of Scots has a peculiar effect on the feelings of a poet, or whether I have, in the enclosed ballad, succeeded beyond my usual poetic success, I know not; but it has pleased me beyond any effort of my muse for a good while past; on that account I enclose it particularly to you. It is true, the purity of my motives may be suspected. I am already deeply indebted to Mr. Graham's goodness; and what, in the usual ways of men, is of infinitely greater importance, Mr. G. can do me service of the utmost importance in time to come. I was born a poor dog; and however I may occasionally pick a better bone than I used to do, I know I must live and die poor: but I will indulge the flattering faith that my poetry will considerably outlive my poverty; and, without any fustian affectation of spirit, I can promise and affirm that it must be no ordinary craving of the latter shall ever make me do any thing injurious to the honest fame of the former. Whatever may be my failings, for failings are a part of human nature, may they ever be those of a generous heart, and an independent mind! It is no fault of mine that I was born to dependence; nor is it Mr. Graham's chiefest praise that he can command influence; but it is his merit to bestow, not only with the kindness of a brother, but with the politeness of a gentleman; and I trust it shall be mine to receive with thankfulness, and remember with undiminished gratitude.

R. B.

escape of her husband from the Tower of London in 1715— unite in telling the history of the House of Nithsdale, and the cause—the honourable cause—of its decline.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The gentleman to whom the above letter is addressed, and which is for the first time published, was a writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, with whom the poet appears to have been on very intimate and friendly terms. For this and three other letters to the same individual, inserted afterwards, we are indebted to the activity and industry of Mr. P. Buchan of Aberdeen, who has been unremitting in his exertions to recover every scrap connected with the name or fame of our national Bard. In his communications to us, Mr. Buchan states that "the four letters referred to belong to Misses Ogilvie, daughters of the late Rev. and ingenious John Ogilvie, D. . . of Midmar, author of the poems on 'Providence,' 'Paradise,' and 'Britannia,' and that after having made the tour of part of Europe and America, they had again crossed the Atlantic, and are now first given to the public in this complete edition of Burns' works."—MOTHERWELL.]

‡ [So styled as President of the Convivial Society, known by the name of The Crochallan Fencibles.]

No. CXCVI.

TO MR. PETER HILL

Ellisland, 17th January, 1791.

TAKE these two guineas, and place them over against that damned account of yours! which has gagged my mouth these five or six months! I can as little write good things as apologies to the man I owe money to. O the supreme curse of making three guineas do the business of five! Not all the labours of Hercules; not all the Hebrews' three centuries of Egyptian bondage, were such an insuperable business, such an infernal task!! Poverty; thou half-sister of death, thou cousin-german of hell! where shall I find force of execration equal to the amplitude of thy demerits? Oppressed by thee, the venerable ancient, grown hoary in the practice of every virtue, laden with years and wretchedness, implores a little—little aid to support his existence, from a stony-hearted son of Mammon, whose sun of prosperity never knew a cloud; and is by him denied and insulted. Oppressed by thee, the man of sentiment, whose heart glows with independence, and melts with sensibility, inly pines under the neglect, or writhes in bitterness of soul under the contumely, of arrogant, unfeeling wealth. Oppressed by thee, the son of genius, whose ill-starred ambition plants him at the tables of the fashionable and polite, must see, in suffering silence, his remarks neglected, and his person despised, while shallow greatness, in his idiot attempts at wit, shall meet with countenance and applause. Nor is it only the family of worth that have reason to complain of thee: the children of folly and vice, though in common with thee the offspring of evil, smart equally under thy rod. Owing to thee, the man of unfortunate disposition and neglected education is condemned as a fool for his dissipation, despised and shunned as a needy wretch, when his follies, as usual, bring him to want; and when his unprincipled necessities drive him to dishonest practices, he is abhorred as a miscreant, and perishes by the justice of his country. But far otherwise is the lot of the man of family and fortune. His early follies and extravagance are spirit and fire; his consequent wants are the embarrassments of an honest fellow; and when, to remedy the matter, he has gained a legal commission to plunder distant provinces, or massacre peaceful nations, he returns, perhaps, laden with the spoils of rapine and murder; lives wicked and respected, and dies a scoundrel and a lord.—Nay, worst of all, alas for helpless woman! the needy prostitute, who has shivered at the corner of the street, waiting to earn the wages of casual prostitution, is left neglected and insulted, ridden down by the chariot wheels of the coroneted RIP, hurrying on to the guilty assignation; she who, without the same necessities to plead, riots nightly in the same guilty trade.

Well! divines may say of it what they please; but execration is to the mind what phlebotomy is to the body: the vital sluices of both are wonderfully relieved by their respective evacuations.*

R. B.

No. CXCVII.

TO MR. ALEX^R. CUNNINGHAM.†Ellisland, 23d January, 1791.

MANY happy returns of the season to you, my dear friend! As many of the good things of this life as are consistent with the usual mixture of good and evil in the cup of Being!

I have just finished a poem (Tam o' Shanter) which you will receive enclosed. It is my first essay in the way of tales.

I have these several months been hammering at an elegy on the amiable and accomplished Miss Burnet. I have got, and can get, no farther than the following fragment, on which please give me your strictures. In all kinds of poetic composition, I set great store by your opinion; but in sentimental verses, in the poetry of the heart, no Roman Catholic ever set more

* [The poet's eloquent apostrophe to Poverty has all his usual strength of sentiment and language. In conversation he loved to dwell upon the subject: he felt that without wealth he could not have full independence; he beheld the little that his poems brought melt silently away, and he looked forward with much fear and with little hope.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The following is an extract of a letter from Mr. Alexander Cunningham to the Poet, dated Edinburgh, October 14th, 1790.

"I lately received a letter from our friend Barncallie. [John Syme, Esq., of Barncallie, afterwards of Ryedale.] What a charming fellow lost to society—born to great expectations—with superior abilities, a pure heart, and untainted morals, his fate in life has been hard indeed—still I am persuaded he is happy; not like the gallant, the gay Lothario, but in the simplicity of rural enjoyment, unmixed with regret at the remembrance of the days of other years.

I saw Mr. Dunbar put under the cover of your newspaper,

Mr. Wood's poem on Thomson. This poem has suggested an idea to me which you alone are capable to execute—a song adapted to each season of the year. The task is difficult, but the theme is charming; should you succeed, I will undertake to get new music worthy of the subject. What a fine field for your imagination, and who is there alive can draw so many beauties from Nature and pastoral imagery as yourself? It is, by the way, surprising that there does not exist, so far as I know, a proper song for each season. We have songs on hunting, fishing, skating, and one autumnal song, Harvest Home. As your muse is neither spavined nor rusty, you may mount the hill of Parnassus, and return with a sonnet in your pocket for every season. For my suggestions, if I be rude, correct me; if impertinent, chastise me; if presuming, despise me. But if you blend all my weaknesses, and pound out one grain of insincerity, then am I not thy value on the infallibility of the Holy Father than I do on yours.

Faithful Friend &c.']*]

I mean the introductory couplets as text verses.

[Here follows a portion of the elegy on Miss Burnet, for the whole of which see pages 308-9.]

Let me hear from you soon. Adieu!
R. B.

—◆—
No. CXCVIII.

TO A. F. TYTLER, Esq.

Ellisland, February, 1791.

SIR,

NOTHING less than the unfortunate accident I have met with could have prevented my grateful acknowledgments for your letter. His own favourite poem, and that an essay in the walk of the muses entirely new to him, where consequently his hopes and fears were on the most anxious alarm for his success in the attempt; to have that poem so much applauded by one of the first judges, was the most delicious vibration that ever thrilled along the heart-strings of a poor poet. However, Providence, to keep up the proper proportion of evil with the good, which it seems is necessary in this sub-lunary state, thought proper to check my exultation by a very serious misfortune. A day or two after I received your letter, my horse came down with me and broke my right arm. As this is the first service my arm has done me since its disaster, I find myself unable to do more than just in general terms thank you for this additional instance of your patronage and friendship. As to the faults you detected in the piece, they are truly there: one of them, the hit at the lawyer and priest, I shall cut out; as to the falling off in the catastrophe, for the reason you justly adduce it cannot easily be remedied. Your approbation, Sir, has given me such additional spirits to persevere in this species of poetic composition that I am already revolving two or three stories in my fancy. If I can bring these floating ideas to bear any kind of embodied form, it will give me an additional opportunity of assuring you how much I have the honour to be, &c.

R. B.*

—◆—
No. CXCIX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 7th Feb. 1791.

WHEN I tell you, Madam, that by a fall, not from my horse, but with my horse, I have been a cripple some time, and that this is the first day my arm and hand have been able to serve me in writing; you will allow that it is

* [That no one welcomed the appearance of the far-famed Tam o' Shanter with a livelier sense of its merits than the late Lord Woodhouselee, the following letter will testify.

Edinburgh, March 12th, 1791.

"Mr. Hill yesterday put into my hands a sheet of Grose's Antiquities, containing a Poem of yours, entitled, Tam o' Shanter, a tale. The very high pleasure I have received from the perusal of this admirable piece I feel demands the warmest acknowledgments.

"Hill tells me he is to send off a packet for you this day; I cannot resist, therefore, putting on paper what I must have told you in person, had I met with you after the recent perusal of your tale, which is, that I feel I owe you a debt which, if undischarged, would reproach me with ingratitude. I have seldom in my life tasted of higher enjoyment from any work of genius than I have received from this composition; and I am much mistaken if this poem alone, had you never written another syllable, would not have been sufficient to have transmitted your name down to posterity with high reputation. In the introductory part, where you paint the character of your hero, and exhibit him at the ale-house ingle, with his tripping cronies, you have delineated nature with a humour and naïveté that would have done honour to Matthew Prior; but when you describe the infernal orgies of the witches' sabbath, and the hellish scenery in which they are exhibited, you display a power of imagination that Shakspeare himself could not have exceeded. I know not that I have ever met with a picture of more horrible fancy than the following:

'Coffins stood round like open presses,
That shaw'd the dead in their last dresses;
And by some devilish cantrip sleight,
Each in his cauld hand held a light.'

But when I came to the succeeding lines, my blood ran cold within me:—

'A knife a father's throat had mangled,
Whom his ain son of life bereft;
The grey hairs net stack to the heft.'

"And here, after the two following lines, 'Wi' mair o' horrible and awfu,' &c., the descriptive part might perhaps have been better closed than the four lines which succeed, which, though good in themselves, yet, as they derive all their merit from the satire they contain, are here rather misplaced among the circumstances of pure horror.† The initiation of the young witch is most happily described—the effect of her charms exhibited in the dance on Satan himself—the apostrophe—'Ah, little thought thy reverend graunie!'—the transport of Tam, who forgets his situation, and enters completely into the spirit of the scene, are all features of high merit in this excellent composition. The only fault it possesses is that the winding up, or conclusion, of the story, is not commensurate to the interest which is excited by the descriptive and characteristic painting of the preceding parts.—The preparation is fine, but the result is not adequate. But for this perhaps you have a good apology—you stick to the popular tale.

"And now that I have got out my mind, and feel a little relieved of the weight of that debt I owed you, let me end this desultory scroll by an advice;—You have proved your talent for a species of composition, in which but a very few of our own poets have succeeded—Go on—write more tales in the same style—you will eclipse Prior and La Fontaine; for, with equal wit, equal power of numbers, and equal naïveté of expression, you have a bolder and more vigorous imagination."‡]

† [Our Bard profited by Mr. Tytler's criticism, and expunged the four lines accordingly.

They are as follow:—

CURRIE

Three lawyers' tongues turn'd inside out,
Wi' lies seam'd like a beggar's clout,
And priests' hearts rotten, black as muck,
Lay stinking, vile, in every neuk.]

too good an apology for my seemingly ungrateful silence. I am now getting better, and am able to rhyme a little, which implies some tolerable ease; as I cannot think that the most poetic genius is able to compose on the rack.

I do not remember if ever I mentioned to you my having an idea of composing an elegy on the late Miss Burnet, of Monboddo. I had the honour of being pretty well acquainted with her, and have seldom felt so much at the loss of an acquaintance as when I heard that so amiable and accomplished a piece of God's work was no more. I have, as yet, gone no farther than the following fragment, of which please let me have your opinion. You know that elegy is a subject so much exhausted that any new idea on the business is not to be expected: 'tis well if we can place an old idea in a new light. How far I have succeeded as to this last, you will judge from what follows:

(See the Elegy page 308.)

I have proceeded no further.

Your kind letter, with your kind remembrance of your godson, came safe. This last, Madam, is scarcely what my pride can bear. As to the little fellow, he is, partiality apart, the finest boy I have for a long time seen. He is now seventeen months old, has the small-pox and measles over, has cut several teeth, and never had a grain of doctor's drugs in his bowels.

I am truly happy to hear that the "little floweret" is blooming so fresh and fair, and that the "mother plant" is rather recovering her drooping head. Soon and well may her "cruel wounds" be healed! I have written thus far with a good deal of difficulty. When I get a little abler you shall hear farther from,

Madam, yours, R. B.

No. CC.

TO THE REV. ARCH. ALISON.

Ellistand, near Dumfries, 14th Feb. 1791.

SIR,

You must by this time have set me down as one of the most ungrateful of men. You did me the honour to present me with a book, which does honour to science and the intellectual powers of men, and I have not even so much as acknowledged the receipt of it. The fact is, you yourself are to blame for it. Flattered as I was by your telling me that you wished to have my opinion of the work, the old spiritual enemy of mankind, who knows well that vanity is one of the sins that most easily beset me, put it into my head to ponder over the performance with the look-out of a critic, and to draw up, forsooth, a deep learned digest of strictures on a composition, of which, in fact, until I read the book, I did not even know the first principles. I own, Sir, that, at first glance, several of your propositions startled me as paradoxical. That the martial clangor of a trumpet had something in it vastly more grand, heroic, and sublime, than the twingle twangle of a jew's-harp; that the delicate flexure of a rose-twigg, when the half-blown flower is heavy with the tears of the dawn, was infinitely more beautiful and elegant than the upright stub of a burdock; and that from something innate and independent of all associations of ideas;—these I had set down as irrefragable, orthodox truths, until perusing your book shook my faith.—In short, Sir, except Euclid's Elements of Geometry, which I made a shift to unravel by my father's fire-side, in the winter evening of the first season I held the plough, I never read a book which gave me such a quantum of information, and added so much to my stock of ideas, as your "Essays on the Principles of Taste." One thing, Sir, you must forgive my mentioning as an uncommon merit in the work, I mean the language. To clothe abstract philosophy in elegance of style sounds something like a contradiction in terms; but you have convinced me that they are quite compatible.*

I enclose you some poetic bagatelles of my late composition. The one in print is my first essay in the way of telling a tale.

I am, Sir, &c.

R. B.

* [The eloquent Alison was much pleased with this rustic recognition of the principles which he laid down in his able and popular work. The theory, however, has been rudely shaken by various hands. A man must have forgot nature who at any time preferred a rank weed to a fragrant flower, or thought the skreigh of a clockin' hen more martial than the clang of a trumpet or the cry of the eagle. But "legs were made for stockings," says Voltaire, "therefore we wear stockings."—CUNNINGHAM.

A present which Mr. Alison sent him afterwards of his "Essays on Taste" drew from Burns a letter of acknowledgment, which I remember to have read with some degree of surprise at the distinct conception he appeared from it to have formed of the general principles of the doctrine of association. When I saw Mr. Alison in Shropshire last autumn, I forgot to enquire if the letter be still in existence. If it is, you may easily procure it by means of our friend Mr. Houlbrooke.—DUGALD STEWART.

The above letter is the one alluded to by the learned Professor.

"It is difficult to read without a smile that letter of Mr. Dugald Stewart, in which he describes himself to Mr. Alison, as being surprised to discover that Burns, after reading the latter author's elegant Essay on Taste, had really been able to form some shrewd-enough notion of the general principles of the association of ideas! It is amusing enough to trace the lingering reluctance of some of these polished scholars, about admitting even to themselves in his absence, what it is certain they all felt sufficiently when they were actually in his presence. The extraordinary resources Burns displayed in conversation—the strong vigorous sagacity of his observations on life and manners—the splendour of his wit, and the glowing energy of his eloquence, when his feelings were stirred, made him the object of serious admiration among those practised masters of the art of talk; that galaxy of eminent men of letters, who, in their various departments, shed lustre at that period on the name of Scotland."—LOCKHART.

The doctrine here alluded to is one peculiar, we believe, to the Scotch school of metaphysicians, and mainly consists in

No. CCI.

TO THE REV. G. BAIRD.*

Ellisland, February, 1791.

REVEREND SIR,

WHY did you, my dear Sir, write to me in such a hesitating style on the business of poor Bruce? Don't I know, and have I not felt, the many ills, the peculiar ills, that poetic flesh is heir to? You shall have your choice of all the unpublished poems I have; and, had your letter had my direction so as to have reached me sooner (it only came to my hand this moment), I should have directly put you out of suspense on the subject. I only ask that some prefatory advertisement in the book, as well as the subscription bills, may bear that the publication is solely for the benefit of Bruce's mother. I would not put it into the power of ignorance to surmise, or malice to insinuate, that I clubbed a share in the work from mercenary motives. Nor need you give me credit for any remarkable generosity in my part of the business. I have such a host of peccadilloes, failings, follies, and backslidings (any body but myself an assertion that our ideas of beauty in objects of all kinds arise from our associating with them some other ideas of an agreeable kind. For instance, our notion of beauty in the cheek of a pretty maiden arises from our notions of her health, innocence, and so forth; our notion of the beauty of a Highland prospect, such as the Trosachs, from our notions of the romantic kind of life formerly led in it; as if there was no female beauty independent of both health and innocence, or fine scenery where men had not formerly worn tartans and claymores. The whole of this letter of Burns is, in reality (though perhaps unmeant by him), a satire on this doctrine, which, notwithstanding the eloquence of an Alison, a Stewart, and a Jeffrey, must now be considered as amongst the dreams of philosophy.—CHAMBERS.]

* [The poet's reverend correspondent solicited his help in the contemplated edition of Bruce in these words:—

"SIR,

"London, 8th February, 1791.

"I TROUBLE you with this letter to inform you that I am in hopes of being able very soon to bring to the press a new edition (long since talked of) of Michael Bruce's Poems. The profits of the edition are to go to his mother—a woman of eighty years of age—poor and helpless. The poems are to be published by subscription; and it may be possible, I think, to make out a 2s. 6d. or 3s. volume, with the assistance of a few hitherto unpublished verses, which I have got from the mother of the poet.

"But the design I have in view in writing to you is not merely to inform you of these facts; it is to solicit the aid of your name and pen in support of the scheme. The reputation of Bruce is already high with every reader of classical taste, and I shall be anxious to guard against tarnishing his character, by allowing any new poems to appear that may lower it. For this purpose, the MSS. I am in possession of have been submitted to the revision of some whose critical talents I can trust to, and I mean still to submit them to others.

"May I beg to know, therefore, if you will take the trouble of perusing the MSS.—of giving your opinion, and suggesting what curtailments, alterations, or amendments, occur to you as advisable? And will you allow us to let it be known that a few lines by you will be added to the volume?

"I know the extent of this request. It is bold to make it. But I have this consolation, that, though you see it proper to refuse it, you will not blame me for having made it; you will see my apology in the motive.

might perhaps give some of them a worse appellation), that by way of some balance, however trifling, in the account, I am fain to do any good that occurs in my very limited power to a fellow-creature, just for the selfish purpose of clearing a little of the vista of retrospection.

* * * * *

R. B.

No. CCII.

TO DR. MOORE.

Ellisland, 28th February, 1791.

I DO not know, Sir, whether you are a subscriber to Grose's Antiquities of Scotland. If you are, the enclosed poem will not be altogether new to you. Captain Grose did me the favour to send me a dozen copies of the proof sheet, of which this is one. Should you have read the piece before, still this will answer the principal end I have in view: it will give me another opportunity of thanking you for all your goodness to the rustic bard; and also of shewing you that the abilities you have been pleased to commend and patronize are still employed in the way you wish.†

"May I just add, that Michael Bruce is one in whose company, from his past appearance, you would not, I am convinced, blush to be found, and as I would submit every line of his that should now be published to your own criticisms, you would be assured that nothing derogatory either to him or you would be admitted in that appearance he may make in future.

"You have already paid an honourable tribute to kindred genius, in Fergusson—I fondly hope that the mother of Bruce will experience your patronage.

"I wish to have the subscription papers circulated by the 14th of March, Bruce's birth-day; which I understand some friends in Scotland talk this year of observing—at that time it will be resolved, I imagine, to place a plain, humble stone over his grave. This, at least, I trust you will agree to do—to furnish, in a few couplets, an inscription for it.

"On these points may I solicit an answer as early as possible; a short delay might disappoint us in procuring that relief to the mother which is the object of the whole.

"You will be pleased to address for me under cover to the Duke of Athole, London." G. B.

P.S. Have you ever seen an engraving published here some time ago, from one of your poems, "O thou pale Orb!" [If you have not, I shall have the pleasure of sending it to you.]

† [Dr. Moore, it would appear, was less enthusiastic than Lord Woodhouselee in the cause of Tam o'Shanter; nor did he feel the exquisite poetry of the Elegy on Matthew Henderson—he has spoken for himself on the subject—the following is his letter:

"DEAR SIR,

London, 29th March, 1791.

"YOUR letter of the 28th February I received only two days ago, and this day I had the pleasure of waiting on the Rev. Mr. Baird, at the Duke of Athole's, who had been so obliging as to transmit it to me, with the printed verses on Alloa Church, the Elegy on Capt. Henderson, and the Epitaph. There are many poetical beauties in the former; what I particularly admire are the three striking similes from 'Or like the snow falls on the river,' and the eight lines which begin with

'By this time he was cross the ford,' so exquisitely expressive of the superstitious impressions of the country. And the twenty-two lines from

'Coffins stood round like open presses,'

The Elegy on Captain Henderson is a tribute to the memory of a man I loved much. Poets have in this the same advantage as Roman Catholics; they can be of service to their friends after they have past that bourne where all other kindness ceases to be of avail. Whether, after all, either the one or the other be of any real service to the dead is, I fear, very problematical; but I am sure they are highly gratifying to the living: and as a very orthodox text, I forget where in scripture, says, "whatsoever is not of faith is sin;" so say I, whatsoever is not detrimental to society, and is of positive enjoyment, is of God, the giver of all good things, and ought to be received and enjoyed by his creatures with thankful delight. As almost all my religious tenets originate from my heart, I am wonderfully pleased with the idea that I can still keep up a tender intercourse with the dearly beloved friend, or still more dearly beloved mistress, who is gone to the world of spirits.

The ballad on Queen Mary was begun while I was busy with Percy's Reliques of English Poetry. By the way, how much is every honest heart, which has a tincture of Caledonian prejudice, obliged to you for your glorious story of Buchanan and Targe! 'Twas an unequivocal proof of your loyal gallantry of soul giving Targe the victory. I should have been mortified to the ground if you had not.

I have just read over, once more of many times, your Zeluco. I marked with my pencil, as I went along, every passage that pleased me particularly above the rest; and one or two, I think, which, with humble deference, I am disposed to think unequal to the merits of the book. I have sometimes thought to transcribe these marked passages, or at least so much of them as to point where they are, and send them to you. Original strokes that strongly depict the human heart is your and Fielding's province, beyond any other novelist I have ever perused. Richardson indeed might, perhaps, be excepted; but unhappily, his dramatis personæ are beings of another world; and, however they may captivate the inexperienced, romantic fancy of a boy or a girl, they will ever, in proportion as we have made human nature our study, dissatisfy our riper years.

As to my private concerns, I am going on, a mighty tax-gatherer before the Lord, and have lately had the interest to get myself ranked on the list of Excise as a supervisor. I am not yet employed as such, but in a few years I shall fall into the file of supervisorship by seniority. I have had an immense loss in the death of the Earl of Glencairn; the patron from whom all my fame and fortune took its rise. Independent of my grateful attachment to him, which was indeed so strong that it pervaded my very soul, and was entwined with the thread of my existence; as soon as the prince's friends had got in (and every dog you know has his day), my getting forward in the Excise would have been an easier business than otherwise it will be. Though this was a consummation devoutly to be wished, yet, thank Heaven, I can live and rhyme as I am! and as to my boys, poor little fellows! if I cannot place them on as high an elevation in life as I could wish, I shall, if I am favoured so much by the Disposer of events as to see that period, fix them on as broad and independent a basis as possible. Among the many wise adages which have been treasured up by our Scottish ancestors, this is one of the best, Better be the head o' the commonalty than the tail o' the gentry.

But I am got on a subject which, however interesting to me, is of no manner of consequence to you; so I shall give you a short poem on the other page, and close this with assuring you how sincerely I have the honour to be, Yours, &c.

R. B.

* * * *

Written on the blank leaf of a book, which which, in my opinion, are equal to the ingredients of Shakespeare's cauldron in Macbeth.

"As for the Elegy, the chief merit of it consists in the graphical description of the objects belonging to the country in which the poet writes, and which none but a Scottish poet could have described, and none but a real poet and close observer of Nature could have so described.

"There is something original, and wonderfully pleasing, in the Epitaph.

"I remember you once hinted before, what you repeat in your last, that you had made some remarks on Zeluco, on the margin. I should be very glad to see them, and regret you did not send them before the last edition, which is just published. Pray transcribe them for me; I sincerely value your opinion very highly, and pray do not suppress one of those in which you censure the sentiment or expression. Trust me it will break no squares between us—I am not akin to the Bishop of Grenada.

"I must now mention what has been on my mind for some time; I cannot help thinking you imprudent, in scattering abroad so many copies of your verses. It is most natural to give a few to confidential friends, particularly to those who are connected with the subject, or who are perhaps themselves the subject, but this ought to be done under promise not to give other copies. Of the poem you sent me on Queen Mary, I refused every solicitation for copies, but I lately saw it in a newspaper. My motive for cautioning you on this subject is that I wish to engage you to collect all your fugitive pieces, not already printed, and after they have been re-considered, and polished to the utmost of your power, I would have you publish them by another subscription; in promoting of which I will exert myself with pleasure.

"In your future compositions I wish you would use the modern English. You have shewn your powers in Scottish sufficiently. Although in certain subjects it gives additional zest to the humour, yet it is lost to the English; and why should you write only for a part of the island, when you can command the admiration of the whole?

"If you chance to write to my friend Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, I beg to be affectionately remembered to her. She must not judge of the warmth of my sentiments respecting her, by the number of my letters; I hardly ever write a line but on business; and I do not know that I should have scribbled all this to you, but for the business part, that is, to instigate you to a new publication; and to tell you that, when you think you have a sufficient number to make a volume, you should set your friends on getting subscriptions. I wish I could have a few hours' conversation with you; I have many things to say, which I cannot write. If I ever go to Scotland, I will let you know, that you may meet me at your own house, or my friend Mrs. Hamilton's, or both.

"Adieu, my dear Sir. &c. &c."

I presented to a very young lady, whom I had formerly characterised under the denomination of The Rose Bud.—(See Lines to Miss Cruikshank, page 249.)

No. CCIII.

TO MR. ALEX. CUNNINGHAM. *

Ellisland, 12th March, 1791.

If the foregoing piece be worth your strictures, let me have them. For my own part, a thing that I have just composed always appears through a double portion of that partial medium in which an author will ever view his own works. I believe, in general, novelty has something in it that inebriates the fancy, and not unfrequently dissipates and fumes away like other intoxication, and leaves the poor patient, as usual, with an aching heart. A striking instance of this might be adduced, in the revolution of many a hymeneal honeymoon. But lest I sink into stupid prose, and so sacrilegiously intrude on the office of my parish priest, I shall fill up the page in my own way, and give you another song of my late composition, which will appear perhaps in Johnson's work, as well as the former.

You must know a beautiful Jacobite air, There'll never be peace 'till Jamie comes hame. When political combustion ceases to be the object of princes and patriots, it then, you know, becomes the lawful prey of historians and poets.

"By yon castle wa' at the close of the day,
I heard a man sing, tho' his head it was grey;
And as he was singing, the tears fast down came—
There'll never be peace till Jamie comes hame."[†]

[See page 397.]

If you like the air, and if the stanza hit your fancy, you cannot imagine, my dear friend, how much you would oblige me if, by the charms of your delightful voice, you would give my honest effusion to "the memory of joys that are past," to the few friends whom you indulge in that pleasure. But I have scribbled on 'till I hear the clock has intimated the near approach of—

* [This gentleman was joyous and companionable; told a pleasing story; sung songs merry or sad with much taste, and was always welcome where wine flowed and mirth abounded. He was from first to last the stedfast friend of Burns; he bestirred himself actively, too, in behalf of the poet's family.]

† [This beautiful little Jacobite ditty having appeared in Johnson's Museum with the old song mark at it, it has been received as an old song all over Scotland. There was an old song, but I do not know where to find it. I remember only two lines:

My heart it is sair, and will soon break in twa;
For there's few good fellows sin' Jamie's awa.

This last line is the name of the air in the very old collections of Scottish tunes.—HOGG.]

"That hour, o' night's black arch the key-stane."—

So good night to you! Sound be your sleep, and delectable your dreams! Apropos, how do you like this thought in a ballad I have just now on the tapis?

"I look to the west when I gae to rest,
That happy my dreams and my slumbers may be;
Far, far in the west is he I lo'e best,
The lad that is dear to my babie and me!"

Good night, once more, and God bless you!

R. B.

No. CCIV.

TO MR. ALEXANDER DALZEL,[‡]

FACTOR, FINDLAYSTON.

Ellisland, 19th March, 1791.

MY DEAR SIR:

I HAVE taken the liberty to frank this letter to you, as it encloses an idle poem of mine, which I send you; and God knows you may perhaps pay dear enough for it if you read it through. Not that this is my own opinion; but the author, by the time he has composed and corrected his work, has quite pored away all his powers of critical discrimination.

I can easily guess from my own heart what you have felt on a late most melancholy event. God knows what I have suffered, at the loss of my best friend, my first and dearest patron and benefactor; the man to whom I owe all that I am and have! I am gone into mourning for him, and with more sincerity of grief than I fear some will, who by nature's ties ought to feel on the occasion.

I will be exceedingly obliged to you indeed, to let me know the news of the noble family, how the poor mother and the two sisters support their loss. I had a packet of poetic bagatelles ready to send to Lady Betty, when I saw the fatal tidings in the newspaper. I see by the same channel that the honoured REMAINS of my noble patron are designed to be brought to the family burial place. Dare I trouble you to let me know privately before the day of interment, that I may cross the country, and steal among the crowd, to pay a tear to the last sight of my ever revered benefactor? It will oblige me beyond expression.

‡ [This gentleman, the factor, or steward, of Burns's noble friend, Lord Glencairn, with a view to encourage a second edition of the poems, laid the volume before his lordship, with such an account of the rustic bard's situation and prospects as from his slender acquaintance with him he could furnish. The result, as communicated to Burns by Mr. Dalzel, is highly creditable to the character of Lord Glencairn. After reading the book, his lordship declared that its merits greatly exceeded his expectation, and he took it with him as a literary curiosity to Edinburgh. He repeated his wishes to be of service to Burns, and desired Mr. Dalzel to inform him that, in patronizing the book, ushering it with effect into the world, or treating with the booksellers, he would most willingly give every aid in his power; adding his request that Burns would take the earliest opportunity of letting him know in what way or manner he could best further his interests.—CROMEK.]

R. B.

No. CCV.

TO ———.

Ellisland, March, 1791.

DEAR SIR:

I AM exceedingly to blame in not writing you long ago; but the truth is that I am the most indolent of all human beings; and when I matriculate in the Herald's office, I intend that my supporters shall be two sloths, my crest a slow-worm, and the motto, "Deil tak the foremost." So much by way of apology for not thanking you sooner for your kind execution of my commission.

I would have sent you the poem; but somehow or other it found its way into the public papers, where you must have seen it.*

I am ever, dear Sir, yours sincerely,

R. B.

No. CCVI.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Ellisland, 11th April, 1791.

I AM once more able, my honoured friend, to return you, with my own hand, thanks for the many instances of your friendship, and particularly for your kind anxiety in this last disaster that my evil genius had in store for me. However, life is chequered—joy and sorrow—for on Saturday morning last, Mrs. Burns made me a present of a fine boy; rather stouter, but not so handsome as your godson was at his time of life. Indeed I look on your little name-sake to be my chef d'œuvre in that species of manufacture, as I look on Tam o' Shanter to be my standard performance in the poetical line. 'Tis true, both the one and the other discover a spice of roguish waggery that might perhaps be as well spared; but then they also shew, in my opinion, a force of genius, and a finishing polish, that I despair of ever excelling. Mrs. Burns is getting stout again, and laid as lustily about her to-day at breakfast as a reaper from the corn-ridge. That is the peculiar privilege and blessing of our hale, sprightly damsels, that are bred among the hay and heather. † We cannot hope for that highly polished mind, that charming delicacy of soul, which is found among the female world in the more elevated stations of life, and which is certainly by far the most bewitching charm in the famous cestus of Venus. ‡ It is indeed such an inestimable treasure that, where it can be had in its native heavenly purity, unstained by some one or other of the many shades of affectation, and unalloyed by some one or other of the many species of caprice, I declare to heaven, I should think it cheaply purchased at the expense of every other earthly good! But as this angelic creature is, I am afraid, extremely rare in any station and rank of life, and totally denied to such a humble one as mine, we meaner mortals must put up with the next rank of female excellence—as fine a figure and face we can produce as any rank of life whatever; rustic, native grace; unaffected modesty, and unsullied purity; nature's mother-wit, and the rudiments of taste; a simplicity of soul, unsuspecting of, because unacquainted with, the crooked ways of a selfish, interested, disingenuous world; and the dearest charm of all the rest, a yielding sweetness of disposition, and a generous warmth of heart, grateful for love on our part, and ardently glowing with a more than equal return; these, with a healthy frame, a sound, vigorous constitution, which your higher ranks can scarcely

Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes."

POPE.

"She spoke, and from her heaving bosom loosed the various girdle with care. There were contained her soul-winning charms; there was love; there melting desire; there, of lovers, the tender vows—the pleasing flattery was there which takes by stealth the souls of the wise."—MACPHERSON.

"It was an ambush of sweet snares, replete
With love, desire, soft intercourse of hearts,
And music of resistless whisper'd sounds,
Which from the wisest win their best resolves."

COWPER.

"Then from her breast unclasp'd the embroider'd zone,
Where each embellishment divinely shone:
There dwell the allurements, all that love inspire,
There soft seduction, there intense desire,
There witchery of words, whose flatteries weave
Wiles that the wisdom of the wise deceive."

SOTHEBY.]

2 Z 2

* [The poem to which the poet alludes is the Lament of Mary Queen of Scots; that his works found their way to the newspapers could excite no wonder; he gave copies to many of his friends, and they in their turn distributed copies among their acquaintances. Burns seems never to have surmised that he was injuring his own pocket by this practice; the poems which he wrote at Ellisland, and the songs which he composed for Johnson and Thomson, would have made a volume, and brought him a thousand pounds.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [To illustrate what the poet says here, it may be mentioned that the accouchement had taken place (as we learn from his family bible) only two days before, namely, April 9th. This child was named William Nicol, after the eccentric teacher of the Edinburgh High School.]

‡ [Homer's description of the Cestus of Venus has been rendered into English by many skilful hands; here are four versions:]

"In this was every art and every charm,
To win the wisest, and the coldest warm;
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
The kind deceit, the still-reviving fire, ever hope to enjoy, are the charms of lovely woman in my humble walk of life.

This is the greatest effort my broken arm has yet made. Do let me hear, by the first post, how *cher petit Monsieur comes on with the small-pox. May almighty goodness preserve and restore him!

R. B.

No. CCVII.

TO MR. ALEX. CUNNINGHAM.

11th June, 1791.

LET me interest you, my dear Cunningham, in behalf of the gentleman who waits on you with this. He is a Mr. Clarke, of Moffat, principal schoolmaster there, and is at present suffering severely under the persecution of one or two powerful individuals of his employers. He is accused of harshness to boys that were placed under his care. God help the teacher, if a man of sensibility and genius, and such is my friend Clarke, when a booby father presents him with his booby son, and insists on lighting up the rays of science in a fellow's head whose skull is impervious and inaccessible by any other way than a positive fracture with a cudgel: a fellow whom in fact it savours of impiety to attempt making a scholar of, as he has been marked a blockhead in the book of fate, at the almighty fiat of his Creator.

The patrons of Moffat-school are, the ministers, magistrates, and town-council of Edinburgh, and as the business comes now before them, let me beg my dearest friend to do every thing in his power to serve the interests of a man of genius and worth, and a man whom I particularly respect and esteem. You know some good fellows among the magistracy and council, but particularly you have much to say with a reverend gentleman to whom you have the honour of being very nearly related, and whom this country and age have had the honour to produce. I need not name the historian of Charles V.† I tell him, through the medium of his nephew's influence, that Mr. Clarke is a gentleman who will not disgrace even his patronage. I know the merits of the cause thoroughly, and say it, that my friend is falling a sacrifice to prejudiced ignorance.

God help the children of dependence! Hated and persecuted by their enemies, and too often, alas! almost unexceptionably, received by their friends with disrespect and reproach, under the thin disguise of cold civility and humiliating advice. O! to be a sturdy savage, stalking in the pride of his independence, amid the solitary wilds of his deserts, rather than in civilized life, helplessly to tremble for a subsistence, precarious as the caprice of a fellow-creature! Every man has his virtues, and no man is without his failings; and curse on that privileged plain-dealing of friendship which, in the hour of my calamity, cannot reach forth the helping hand without at the same time pointing out those failings, and apportioning them their share in procuring my present distress. My friends, for such the world calls ye, and such ye think yourselves to be, pass by my virtues, if you please, but do, also, spare my follies; the first will witness in my breast for themselves, and the last will give pain enough to the ingenuous mind without you. And, since deviating more or less from the paths of propriety and rectitude must be incident to human nature, do thou, Fortune, put it in my power always from myself and of myself to bear the consequence of those errors! I do not want to be independent that I may sin, but I want to be independent in my sinning.

To return in this rambling letter to the subject I set out with, let me recommend my friend, Mr. Clarke, to your acquaintance and good offices; his worth entitles him to the one, and his gratitude will merit the other.‡ I long much to hear from you. Adieu!

R. B.

No. CCVIII.

TO THE EARL OF BUCHAN.

Ellisland, June, 1791.

MY LORD,

LANGUAGE sinks under the ardour of my feelings when I would thank your lordship for the honour you have done me in inviting me to make one at the coronation of the bust of Thomson.§ In my first enthusiasm in reading the card you did me the honour to write me,

* [Mrs. Henri's child, and the grand-child of Mrs. Dunlop.—See note to the Verses on the Birth of a posthumous Child, page 249.]

† [Dr. Robertson was uncle to Mr. Alex. Cunningham.]

‡ [To the person on whose behalf he sought to interest his friend, Burns addressed many letters, which were carefully preserved till the death of Mr. Clarke, when his widow, offended by some free language in which they indulged, committed them to the flames.]

§ [In the following terms the noble lord invited the poet to his seat:
Dryburgh Abbey, June 17th, 1791.

“LORD BUCHAN has the pleasure to invite Mr. Burns to make one at the coronation of the bust of Thomson, on Ednam Hill, on the 22nd of September; for which day perhaps his muse may inspire an ode suited to the occasion. Suppose Mr. Burns should, leaving the Nith, go across the country, and meet the Tweed at the nearest point from his farm—and, wandering along the pastoral banks of Thomson's pure parent stream, catch inspiration on the devious walk, till he finds Lord Buchan sitting on the ruins of Dryburgh. There the Commendator will give him a hearty welcome, and try to light his lamp at the pure flame of native genius, upon the altar of Caledonian virtue. This poetical perambulation of the Tweed is a thought of the late Sir Gilbert Elliot, and of the Minto, followed out by his accomplished grandson, the present Sir Gilbert, who having been with Lord Buchan lately, the project was renewed, and will, they hope, be executed in the manner proposed.”]

I overlooked every obstacle, and determined to go; but I fear it will not be in my power. A week or two's absence, in the very middle of my harvest, is what I much doubt I dare not venture on. I once already made a pilgrimage up the whole course of the Tweed, and fondly would I take the same delightful journey down the windings of that delightful stream.

Your lordship hints at an ode for the occasion: but who would write after Collins? I read over his verses to the memory of Thomson, and despaired.—I got indeed to the length of three or four stanzas, in the way of address to the shade of the bard, on crowning his bust. I shall trouble your lordship with the subjoined copy of them, which, I am afraid, will be but too convincing a proof how unequal I am to the task. However, it affords me an opportunity of approaching your lordship, and declaring how sincerely and gratefully I have the honour to be, &c.,

R. B.*

[Here follow the verses, for which see page 310.]

No. CCIX.

TO MR. THOMAS SLOAN.†

Ellisland, Sept. 1, 1791.

MY DEAR SLOAN,

SUSPENSE is worse than disappointment; for that reason I hurry to tell you that I just now learn that Mr. Ballantine does not choose to interfere more in the business. I am truly sorry for it, but cannot help it.

You blame me for not writing you sooner, but you will please to recollect that you omitted one little necessary piece of information—your address.

However, you know equally well my hurried life, indolent temper, and strength of attachment. It must be a longer period than the longest life “in the world's hale and undegenerate days,” that will make me forget so dear a friend as Mr. Sloan. I am prodigal enough at times, but I will not part with such a treasure as that.

I can easily enter into the embarras of your present situation. You know my favourite quotation from Young—

———“On Reason build RESOLVE!
That column of true majesty in man.”——

And that other favourite one from Thomson's Alfred—

“What proves the hero truly GREAT,
Is never, never to despair.”

Or shall I quote you an author of your acquaintance?

“—Whether DOING, SUFFERING, or FORBEARING,
You may do miracles by—PERSEVERING.”

I have nothing new to tell you. The few friends we have are going on in the old way. I sold my crop on this day se'ennight, and sold it very well. A guinea an acre, on an average, above value. But such a scene of drunkenness was hardly ever seen in this country. After the rous was over, about thirty people engaged in a battle, every man for his own hand, and fought it out for three hours. Nor was the scene much better in the house. No fighting, indeed, but folks lying drunk on the floor, and decanting, until both my dogs got so drunk by attending them that they could not stand. You will easily guess how I enjoyed the scene; as I was no farther over than you used to see me.

Mrs. B. and family have been in Ayr-shire these many weeks.

Farewell! and God bless you, my dear friend!

R. B.

No. CCX.

TO LADY E. CUNNINGHAM.‡

Ellisland, September, 1791,

MY LADY,

I WOULD, as usual, have availed myself of the privilege your goodness has allowed me, of

* [The public praised the verses, on which the Commentator of Dryburgh wrote to the poet as follows:—

September 16th, 1791.

“Your address to the shade of Thomson has been well received by the public; and though I should disapprove of your allowing Pegasus to ride you off the field of your honourable and useful profession, yet I cannot resist an impulse which I feel at this moment to suggest to your muse, Harvest Home, as an excellent subject for her grateful song, in which the peculiar aspects and manners of our country might furnish an excellent portrait and landscape of Scotland, for the employment of happy moments of leisure and recess, from your more important occupations.

“Your Halloween, and Saturday Night, will remain to distant posterity as interesting pictures of rural innocence and happiness in your native country, and were happily written in the dialect of the people; but Harvest Home being suited to descriptive poetry, except where colloquial, may escape the disguise of a dialect which admits of no elegance or dignity of expression. Without the assistance of any god or goddess, and without the invocation of any foreign muse, you may convey in epistolary form the description of a scene so gladdening and picturesque, with all the concomitant local position, landscape and costume, contrasting the peace, improvement, and happiness of the borders, of the once hostile nations of Britain, with their former oppression and misery, and showing, in lively and beautiful colours, the beauties and joys of a rural life. And as the unvisited heart is naturally disposed to overflow with gratitude in the moment of prosperity, such a subject would furnish you with an amiable opportunity of perpetuating the names of Glencairn, Miller, and your other eminent benefactors; which, from what I know of your spirit, and have seen of your poems and letters, will not deviate from the chastity of praise, that is so uniformly united to true taste and genius.”]

† [Thomas Sloan was a west of Scotland man, and seems to have been on intimate terms with Burns. He accompanied him on that excursion to Wanlockhead when Burns moved a blacksmith, by his verse and his wit, to frost the shoes of his horse, as related at page 306.]

‡ [Sister of the recently deceased, and of the then existing, Earls of Glencairn. Her ladyship died unmarried, in August, 1804.]

sending you any thing I compose in my poetical way; but as I had resolved, so soon as the shock of my irreparable loss would allow me, to pay a tribute to my late benefactor, I determined to make that the first piece I should do myself the honour of sending you. Had the wing of my fancy been equal to the ardour of my heart, the enclosed had been much more worthy your perusal: as it is, I beg leave to lay it at your ladyship's feet. As all the world knows my obligations to the late Earl of Glencairn, I would wish to shew, as openly, that my heart glows, and shall ever glow, with the most grateful sense and remembrance of his lordship's goodness. The sables I did myself the honour to wear to his lordship's memory were not the "mockery of woe." Nor shall my gratitude perish with me!—If, among my children, I shall have a son that has a heart, he shall hand it down to his child as a family honour, and a family debt, that my dearest existence I owe to the noble house of Glencairn!

I was about to say, my lady, that if you think the poem may venture to see the light, I would, in some way or other, give it to the world.*

R. B.

* [The poem enclosed was The Lament for James, Earl of Glencairn. It is probable that the Earl's sister thought well of the verses—for they were published soon after. The poet sent copies of "The Lament" and "The Whistle" to Mr. Tytler, afterwards Lord Woodhouselee; the answer which he received contains judicious censure as well as merited praise:

"DEAR SIR,

Edinburgh, November 27th, 1791.

"YOU have much reason to blame me for neglecting till now to acknowledge the receipt of a most agreeable packet, containing The Whistle, a ballad; and the Lament; which reached me about six weeks ago in London, whence I am just returned. Your letter was forwarded to me from Edinburgh, where, as I observed by the date, it had lain for some days. This was an additional reason for me to have answered it immediately on receiving it; but the truth was, the bustle of business, engagements and confusion of one kind or another, in which I found myself immersed all the time I was in London absolutely put it out of my power. But to have done with apologies, let me now endeavour to prove myself in some degree deserving of the very flattering compliment you pay me, by giving you at least a frank and a candid, if it should not be a judicious, criticism on the poems you sent me.

"The ballad of 'The Whistle' is, in my opinion, truly excellent. The old tradition which you have taken up is the best adapted for a Bacchanalian composition of any I have ever met with, and you have done it full justice. In the first place, the strokes of wit arise naturally from the subject, and are uncommonly happy. For example,

'The bands grew the tighter, the more they were wet.'

'Cynthia hinted she'd find them next morn.'

'Tho' fate said a hero should perish in light,
So up rose bright Phœbus, and down fell the knight.'

In the next place, you are singularly happy in the discrimination of your heroes, and in giving each the sentiments and language suitable to his character. And lastly, you have much merit in the delicacy of the panegyric which you have contrived to throw on each of the dramatis personæ, perfectly appropriate to his character. The compliment to Sir

No. CCXI.

TO COLONEL FULLARTON,

OF FULLARTON.†

Ellisland, October 3d, 1791.

SIR,

I HAVE just this minute got the frank, and next minute must send it to post, else I purposed to have sent you two or three other bagatelles that might have amused a vacant hour, about as well as "Six excellent new Songs," or the "Aberdeen prognostications for the year to come."‡ I shall probably trouble you soon with another packet, about the gloomy month of November, when the people of England hang and drown themselves—any thing generally is better than one's own thoughts.

Fond as I may be of my own productions, it is not for their sake that I am so anxious to send you them. I am ambitious, covetously ambitious, of being known to a gentleman whom I am proud to call my countryman; § a gentleman who was a foreign ambassador as soon as he was a man; and a leader of armies as soon as he was a soldier; and that with an

Robert, the blunt soldier, is peculiarly fine. In short, this composition, in my opinion, does you great honour, and I see not a line or a word in it which I could wish to be altered.

"As to 'The Lament,' I suspect, from some expressions in your letter to me, that you are more doubtful with respect to the merits of this piece than of the other, and I own I think you have reason: for, although it contains some beautiful stanzas, as the first, 'The wind blew hollow,' &c.; the fifth, 'Ye scatter'd birds,' the thirteenth, 'Awake thy last sad voice,' &c., yet it appears to me faulty as a whole, and inferior to several of those you have already published in the same strain. My principal objection lies against the plan of the piece. I think it was unnecessary and improper to put the lamentation in the mouth of a fictitious character, an aged bard.—It had been much better to have lamented your patron in your own person, to have expressed your genuine feelings for his loss, and to have spoken the language of nature, rather than that of fiction, on the subject. Compare this with your poem of the same title in your printed volume, which begins, 'O thou pale Orb!' and observe what it is that forms the charm of that composition. It is that it speaks the language of truth and of nature.

"The change is, in my opinion, injudicious, too, in this respect, that an aged bard has much less need of a patron and protector than a young one. I have thus given you with much freedom my opinion of both the pieces. I should have made a very ill return to the compliment you paid me, if I had given you any other than my genuine sentiments.

"It will give me great pleasure to hear from you when you find leisure, and I beg you will believe me ever

Dear Sir, yours, &c.]"

† [This gentleman, it will be recollected is honourably mentioned in "The Vision."—See page 206, "Byrdone's brave ward," &c.]

‡ [A conspicuous branch of popular literature in Scotland till a recent period consisted of coarse brochures of four leaves, sold at a half-penny, and generally containing something appropriate to the title of "Six Excellent New Songs," &c. The other branch of popular literature mentioned in the text consisted of almanacs, published at Aberdeen, at the price of a penny.]

§ [Meaning, probably, a native of the same county.]

eclat unknown to the usual minions of a Court—men who, with all the adventitious advantages of princely connections, and princely fortunes, must yet, like the caterpillar, labour a whole life-time before they reach the wished-for height, there to roost a stupid chrysalis, and doze out the remaining glimmering existence of old age.

If the gentleman that accompanied you when you did me the honour of calling on me is with you, I beg to be respectfully remembered to him. I have the honour to be your highly obliged and most devoted humble servant,*

R. B.

No. CCXII.

TO MR. AINSLIE.

Ellisland, 1791.

MY DEAR AINSLIE,

CAN you minister to a mind diseased? can you, amid the horrors of penitence, regret, remorse, head-ache, nausea, and all the rest of the d—d hounds of hell that beset a poor wretch who has been guilty of the sin of drunkenness—can you speak peace to a troubled soul?

Miserable perdu that I am, I have tried every thing that used to amuse me, but in vain: here must I sit, a monument of the vengeance laid up in store for the wicked, slowly counting every chink of the clock as it slowly, slowly, numbers over these lazy scoundrels of hours, who, d—n them, are ranked up before me, every one at his neighbour's backside, and

* [This letter originally appeared in the Paisley Magazine, 1828, accompanied by the following note. "With the following relic from the pen of our Poet, we have been favoured by a friend. It was addressed to Colonel Fullarton whilst resident in England, accompanied as would also seem by some verses. It is not perhaps to be expected that any thing will be discovered tending further to elucidate the character of Burns: indeed, his genius may be said to have been of such an open and uncompromising nature as irrepresibly to have unfolded in almost every sentence of his inimitable writings. Yet, as an additional fragment of that frame of thought so characteristic of its great author, the present letter is worthy of preservation. Colonel Fullarton had not been introduced to Burns prior to his return from India about 1784; but, having at this period met with him, he continued ever after an enthusiastic and warm friend of his distinguished countryman; and, to his imperishable honour, he has been commemorated in some of the Poet's finest productions. We shall only farther add that the original letter remains in the possession of the honourable Mrs. Hamilton Fullarton, the Colonel's widow, and till now has never been published.

"The letter of the Poet to his cousin James Burness, dated June 21, 1783, exhibits Burns in the character of a man of business, and we humbly think he writes upon the evils of paper currency, the depression of trade, and the decay of the agricultural interests, with the best political economist of the present day. He has generally been supposed to be a very indifferent farmer, but the following compliment paid to his observation in dairy matters, by no incompetent judge, we think right to insert. In a note to a General View of the Agriculture of the County of Ayr, by Colonel Fullarton, of Fullarton, drawn up for the consideration of the Board of Agriculture, and internal improvement, and published at every one with a burthen of anguish on his back, to pour on my devoted head—and there is none to pity me. My wife scolds me; my business torments me, and my sins come staring me in the face, every one telling a more bitter tale than his fellow.—When I tell you even  has lost its power to please, you will guess something of my hell within, and all around me—I began Elibanks and Elibraes, but the stanzas fell unenjoyed and unfinished from my listless tongue: at last I luckily thought of reading over an old letter of yours, that lay by me in my book-case, and I felt something, for the first time since I opened my eyes, of pleasurable existence.—Well—I begin to breathe a little, since I began to write to you. How are you, and what are you doing? How goes Law? Apropos, for connexion's sake do not address to me supervisor, for that is an honour I cannot pretend to—I am on the list, as we call it, for a supervisor, and will be called out by and bye to act as one; but at present, I am a simple gauger, tho' t'other day I got an appointment to an excise division of *25*l.* per annum* better than the rest. My present income, down money, is *70*l.* per annum*.

I have one or two good fellows here whom you would be glad to know.† R. B.

No. CCXIII.

TO MISS DAVIES.†

IT is impossible, Madam, that the generous warmth and angelic purity of your youthful Edinburgh, 1793, the author says, at p. 58, 'In order to prevent the danger arising from horned cattle in studs and straw yards, the best mode is to cut out the budding knob, or root of the horn, while the calf is very young. This was suggested to me by Mr. Robert Burns, whose general talents are no less conspicuous than the poetic powers which have done so much honour to the county where he was born.'‡

† [The poet was one of the most candid of correspondents: he confessed his follies freely to his friends; nay, it has been surmised that he sometimes aggravated them, in order to excuse his indolence in answering letters—or from imagining that it was incumbent in a son of song to maintain a reputation for irregularity.—CUNNINGHAM.]

‡ [Those who remember the pleasing society which, in the year 1791, Dumfries afforded, cannot have forgotten "the charming lovely Davies" of the lyrics of Burns. Her maiden name was Deborah, and she was the youngest daughter of Dr. Davies of Tenby in Pembroke-shire; between her and the Riddels of Friars Carse there were ties of blood or friendship, and her eldest sister, Harriet, was married to Captain Adam Gordon, of the noble family of Kenmure. Her education was superior to that of most young ladies of her station of life; she was equally agreeable and witty; her company was much courted in Nithsdale, and others than Burns respected her talents in poetic composition. She was then in her twentieth year, and so little and so handsome that some one, who desired to compliment her, welcomed her to the Vale of Nith as one of the Graces in miniature.

It was the destiny of Miss Davies to become acquainted with Captain Delany, a pleasant and sightly man, who made himself acceptable to her by sympathizing in her pursuits, and by writing verses to her, calling her his "Stella," an ominous name, which might have brought the memory of Swift's unhappy mistress to her mind. An offer of marriage mind can have any idea of that moral disease under which I unhappily must rank as the chief of sinners; I mean a torpidity of the moral powers, that may be called a lethargy of conscience. — In vain Remorse rears her horrent crest, and rouses all her snakes: beneath the deadly-fixed eye and leaden hand of Indolence, their wildest ire is charmed into the torpor of the bat, slumbering out the rigours of winter in the chink of a ruined wall. Nothing less, Madam, could have made me so long neglect your obliging commands. Indeed I had one apology — the bagatelle was not worth presenting. Besides, so strongly am I interested in Miss Davies's fate and welfare in the serious business of life, amid its chances and changes, that to make her the subject of a silly ballad is downright mockery of these ardent feelings; 'tis like an impertinent jest to a dying friend.

Gracious Heaven! why this disparity between our wishes and our powers? Why is the most generous wish to make others blest impotent and ineffectual—as the idle breeze that crosses the pathless desert? In my walks of life I have met with a few people to whom how gladly would I have said — “Go, be happy! I know that your hearts have been wounded by the scorn of the proud, whom accident has placed above you—or worse still, in whose hands are, perhaps, placed many of the comforts of your life. But there! ascend that rock, Independence, and look justly down on their littleness of soul. Make the worthless tremble under your indignation, and the foolish sink before your contempt; and largely impart that happiness to others which, I am certain, will give yourselves so much pleasure to bestow.”

Why, dear Madam, must I wake from this delightful reverie, and find it all a dream? Why, amid my generous enthusiasm, must I find myself poor and powerless, incapable of wiping one tear from the eye of pity, or of adding one comfort to the friend I love! Out upon the world! say I, that its affairs are administered so ill! They talk of reform;—good

Heaven! what a reform would I make among the sons, and even the daughters, of men!—Down, immediately, should go fools from the high places where misbegotten chance has perked them up, and through life should they skulk, ever haunted by their native insignificance, as the body marches accompanied by its shadow.—As for a much more formidable class, the knaves, I am at a loss what to do with them: Had I a world, there should not be a knave in it.

But the hand that could give I would liberally fill: and I would pour delight on the heart that could kindly forgive, and generously love.

Still the inequalities of life are, among men, comparatively tolerable—but there is a delicacy, a tenderness, accompanying every view in which we can place lovely Woman, that are grated and shocked at the rude, capricious distinctions of Fortune. Woman is the blood-royal of life: let there be slight degrees of precedency among them—but let them be ALL sacred.—Whether this last sentiment be right or wrong, I am not accountable; it is an original component feature of my mind.

R. B.

No. CCXIV.

TO Mrs. DUNLOP.*

Ellisland, 17th December, 1791.

MANY thanks, to you, Madam, for your good news respecting the little floweret and the mother-plant. I hope my poetic prayers have been heard, and will be answered up to the warmest sincerity of their fullest extent; and then Mrs. Henri will find her little darling the representative of his late parent, in every thing but his abridged existence.

I have just finished the following song which, to a lady the descendant of Wallace—and many heroes of his truly illustrious line—and herself was made and accepted; but Delany's circumstances were urged as an obstacle; delays ensued; a coldness on the lover's part followed; his regiment was called abroad—he went with it; she heard from him once and no more, and was left to mourn the change of affection—to droop and die. He perished in battle or by a foreign climate, soon after the death of the young lady of whose love he was unworthy.

The following verses on this unfortunate attachment form part of a poem found among her papers at her death; she takes Delany's portrait from her bosom, presses it to her lips, and says,

'Next to thyself 'tis all on earth,
Thy Stella dear doth hold,
The glass is clouded with my breath,
And as my bosom cold:
That bosom which so oft has glow'd
With love and friendship's name,
Where you the seed of love first sow'd,
That kindled into flame.

'You there neglected let it burn,
It seized the vital part,
And left my bosom as an urn
To hold a broken heart;
I once had thought I should have been
A tender happy wife,
And past my future days serene
With thee, my James, through life.'

The information contained in this note was obligingly communicated by H. P. Davies, Esq., nephew of the lady.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [To the friendship of this accomplished lady we owe many of the best of the poet's letters:—it was one of his remarks that between the men of rustic life and the polite world he observed little difference—that in the former, though unpollished by fashion, and unenlightened by science, he had found much observation and much intelligence; but a refined and accomplished woman was a being almost new to him, and of which he had formed but a very inadequate idea.—CROMEK.]

the mother of several soldiers, needs neither preface nor apology.

“Scene—A field of battle—time of the day, evening; the wounded and dying of the victorious army are supposed to join in the following

SONG OF DEATH.

“Farewell, thou fair day, thou green earth, and ye skies,
Now gay with the bright setting sun;
Farewell, loves and friendships, ye dear, tender ties—
Our race of existence is run!”

[See page 414.]

The circumstance that gave rise to the foregoing verses was—looking over with a musical friend M'Donald's collection of Highland airs, I was struck with one, an Isle of Skye tune, entitled “Oran an Aoig, or, the Song of Death,” to the measure of which I have adapted my stanzas. I have of late composed two or three other little pieces, which, ere yon full-orbed moon, whose broad impudent face now stares at old mother earth all night, shall have shrunk into a modest crescent, just peeping forth at dewy dawn, I shall find an hour to transcribe for you. A Dieu je vous commende.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CCXV.

TO MR. WILLIAM SMELLIE,*

PRINTER.

Dumfries, 22nd January, 1792.

I SIT down, my dear Sir, to introduce a young lady to you, and a lady in the first ranks of fashion, too. What a task! to you—who care no more for the herd of animals called young ladies than you do for the herd of animals called young gentlemen. To you—who despise and detest the groupings and combinations of fashion, as an idiot painter that seems industrious to place staring fools and unprincipled knaves in the foreground of his picture, while men of sense and honesty are too often thrown in the dimmest shades. Mrs. Riddel, † who will take this letter to town with her, and send it to you, is a character that, even in your own way, as a naturalist and a philosopher, would be an acquisition to your acquaintance. The lady, too, is a votary of the muses; and, as I think myself somewhat of a judge in my own trade, I assure you that her verses, always correct, and often elegant, are much beyond the common run of the lady-poetesses of the day. She is a great admirer of your book; ‡ and, hearing me say that I was acquainted with you, she begged to be known to you, as she is just going to pay her first visit to our Caledonian capital. I told her that her best way was to desire her near relation, and your intimate friend, Craigdarroch, to have you at his house while she was there; and, lest you might think of a lively West Indian girl of eighteen, as girls of eighteen too often deserve to be thought of, I should take care to remove that prejudice. To be impartial, however, in appreciating the lady's merits, she has one unlucky failing: a failing which you will easily discover, as she seems rather pleased with indulging in it; and a failing that you will easily pardon, as it is a sin which very much besets yourself;—where she dislikes, or despises, she is apt to make no more a secret of it than where she esteems and respects.

I will not present you with the unmeaning compliments of the season, but I will send you my warmest wishes and most ardent prayers, that FORTUNE may never throw your SUBSISTENCE to the mercy of a KNAVE, nor set your CHARACTER on the judgment of a FOOL; but, that, upright and erect, you may walk to an honest grave, where men of letters shall say, “Here lies a man who did honour to science,” and men of worth shall say, “Here lies a man who did honour to human nature.”

R. B.

—◆—
No. CCXVI.

TO MR. PETER HILL,

BOOKSELLER, EDINBURGH.

Dumfries, February 5th, 1792.

MY DEAR FRIEND:

I SEND you by the bearer, (Mr. Clark, a particular friend of mine), six pounds and a shilling, which you will dispose of as follows:—Five pounds ten shillings, per account I owe Mr. R. Burn, architect, for erecting the stone over the grave of poor Ferguson. He was two years in erecting it, after I had commissioned him for it; and I have been two years in paying him, after he sent me his account; so

* [William Smellie was the son of a mason in Edinburgh, and served an apprenticeship to learn the art of printing with Hamilton and Balfour. The hours of remission from labour—too often squandered—were employed by Smellie in acquiring knowledge, and he attended some of the University classes with such success that he was enabled to put forth that edition of Terence which gained the prize offered by the Philosophical Society. He aided too in the composition of Buchan's Domestic Medicine; wrote the chief articles in the first edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, aided Gilbert Stuart in editing the Edinburgh Magazine and Review, which perished because of the satiric and acrimonious spirit of the said Gilbert, and translated Buffon's Natural History. But the work through which his name will likely be remembered, is the Philosophy of Natural History, the first volume of which was published in 1790. He died June 24th, 1795, leaving a name of no common eminence as a naturalist.]

† [Maria Woodleigh, by marriage Mrs. Riddel, resided at Woodleigh Park, near Dumfries. She is to be carefully distinguished from Mrs. Riddel, of Friar's Carse, another friend of the Poet.—CHAMBERS.]

‡ [The Philosophy of Natural History.]

he and I are quits. He had the hardiesse to ask me interest on the sum; but, considering that the money was due by one Poet for putting a tomb-stone over the grave of another, he may, with grateful surprise, thank Heaven that ever he saw a farthing of it.

With the remainder of the money pay yourself for the "Office of a Messenger," that I bought of you; and send me by Mr. Clark a note of its price. Send me, likewise, the fifth volume of the "Observer," by Mr. Clark; and if any money remain let it stand to account.

My best compliments to Mrs. Hill.

I sent you a maukin by last week's fly, which I hope you received.*

Yours most sincerely,
ROBERT BURNS.

—◆—
No. CCXVII.

TO MR. W. NICOL.

20th February, 1792.

O THOU, wisest among the wise, meridian blaze of prudence, full moon of discretion, and chief of many counsellors! How infinitely is thy puddle-headed, rattle-headed, wrong-headed, round-headed slave indebted to thy super-eminent goodness, that from the luminous path of thy own right-lined rectitude, thou lookest benignly down on an erring wretch, of whom the zig-zag wanderings defy all the powers of calculation, from the simple copulation of units, up to the hidden mysteries of fluxions! May one feeble ray of that light of wisdom which darts from thy sensorium, strait as the arrow of heaven, and bright as the meteor of inspiration, may it be my portion, so that I may be less unworthy of the face and favour of that father of proverbs, and master of maxims, that antipode of folly, and magnet among the sages, the wise and witty Willie Nicol! Amen! Amen! Yea, so be it!

For me! I am a beast, a reptile, and know nothing! From the cave of my ignorance, amid the fogs of my dulness, and pestilential fumes of my political heresies, I look up to thee, as doth a toad through the iron-barred lucerne of a pestiferous dungeon, to the cloudless glory of a summer sun! Sorely sighing in bitterness of soul, I say, when shall my name be the quotation of the wise, and my countenance be the delight of the godly, like the illustrious lord of Laggan's many hills?† As for him, his works are perfect: never did the pen of calumny blur the fair page of his reputation, nor the bolt of hatred fly at his dwelling.

Thou mirror of purity, when shall the elfine lamp of my glimmerous understanding, purged from sensual appetites and gross desires, shine like the constellation of thy intellectual powers!—As for thee, thy thoughts are pure, and thy lips are holy. Never did the unhallowed breath of the powers of darkness, and the pleasures of darkness, pollute the sacred flame of thy sky-descended and heaven-bound desires: never did the vapours of impurity stain the unclouded serene of thy cerulean imagination. O that like thine were the tenor of my life, like thine the tenor of my conversation!—then should no friend fear for my strength, no enemy rejoice in my weakness! Then should I lie down and rise up, and none to make me afraid.—May thy pity and thy prayer be exercised for, O thou lamp of wisdom and mirror of morality! thy devoted slave,‡

R. B.

—◆—
No. CCXVIII.

TO FRANCIS GROSE, Esq., F.S.A.‡

Dumfries, 1792.

SIR,

I BELIEVE among all our Scots literati you have not met with Professor Dugald Stewart, who fills the moral philosophy chair in the University of Edinburgh. To say that he is a man of the first parts, and, what is more, a man of the first worth, to a gentleman of your general acquaintance, and who so much enjoys the luxury of unencumbered freedom and undisturbed privacy, is not perhaps recommendation enough:—but when I inform you that Mr. Stewart's principal characteristic is your favourite feature; that sterling independence of mind, which, though every man's right, so few men have the courage to claim, and fewer still the magnanimity to support:—When I tell you that, unseduced by splendour, and undisturbed by wretchedness, he appreciates the merits of the various actors in the great drama of life, merely as they perform their parts—in short, he is a man after your own heart, and I comply with his earnest request in letting you know that he wishes above all things to meet

* [The original of the above curious letter of the Poet was given to Mr. Cochrane by his old friend and school-fellow, David Constable; the eldest and talented son of the late Archibald Constable—the prince of Edinburgh Publishers. It was afterwards in the possession of the late Geo. H. King, Esq., of Glasgow, who died on the 17th of January, 1840.]

† [Mr. Nicol had purchased a small piece of ground called Laggan, on the Nith. There took place the Bacchanalian scene which called forth "Willie brew'd a peck o' Maut."]

‡ [This strain of irony was occasioned by a letter from Mr. Nicol, containing good advice. The poet seems to have been reading the love-letter written by the schoolmaster at the request of Mr. Thomas Pipes.—CUNNINGHAM.]

§ [Mr. Grose, in the introduction to his "Antiquities of Scotland," acknowledges his obligations to Burns in the following paragraph, some of the terms of which will scarcely fail to amuse the modern reader:—

"To my ingenious friend, Mr. Robert Burns, I have been seriously obligated; he was not only at the pains of making out what was most worthy of notice in Ayr-shire, the country honoured by his birth, but he also wrote, expressly for this work, the pretty tale annexed to Alloway Church."

This "pretty tale" being "Tam o' Shanter!"]

with you. His house, Catrine, is within less than a mile of Sorn Castle, which you proposed visiting; or, if you could transmit him the enclosed, he would with the greatest pleasure meet you any where in the neighbourhood. I write to Ayr-shire to inform Mr. Stewart that I have acquitted myself of my promise. Should your time and spirits permit your meeting with Mr. Stewart, 'tis well; if not, I hope you will forgive this liberty, and I have at least an opportunity of assuring you with what truth and respect,

I am, Sir,

Your great admirer,
and very humble servant,
R. B.

—◆—
No. CCXIX.

TO THE SAME.

Dumfries, 1792.

AMONG the many witch stories I have heard, relating to Alloway kirk, I distinctly remember only two or three.

Upon a stormy night, amid whistling squalls of wind, and bitter blasts of hail; in short, on such a night as the devil would choose to take the air in; a farmer or farmer's servant was plodding and plashing homeward with his plough-irons on his shoulder, having been getting some repairs on them at a neighbouring smithy. His way lay by the kirk of Alloway, and, being rather on the anxious look out in approaching a place so well known to be a favourite haunt of the devil, and the devil's friends and emissaries, he was struck aghast by discovering through the horrors of the storm and stormy night, a light, which on his nearer approach plainly showed itself to proceed from the haunted edifice. Whether he had been fortified from above on his devout supplication, as is customary with people when they suspect the immediate presence of Satan; or whether, according to another custom, he had got courageously drunk at the smithy, I will not pretend to determine; but so it was that he ventured to go up to, nay, into, the very kirk. As luck would have it, his temerity came off unpunished.

The members of the infernal junto were all out on some midnight business or other, and he saw nothing but a kind of kettle or caldron, depending from the roof, over the fire, simmering some heads of unchristened children, limbs of executed malefactors, &c., for the business of the night.—It was in for a penny, in for a pound, with the honest ploughman: so without ceremony he unhooked the caldron from off the fire, and pouring out the damnable ingredients, inverted it on his head, and carried it fairly home, where it remained long in the family, a living evidence of the truth of the story.

Another story, which I can prove to be equally authentic, was as follows:

On a market day in the town of Ayr, a farmer from Carrick, and consequently whose way lay by the very gate of Alloway kirk-yard, in order to cross the river Doon at the old bridge, which is about two or three hundred yards farther on than the said gate, had been detained by his business, till by the time he reached Alloway it was the wizard hour, between night and morning.

Though he was terrified with a blaze streaming from the kirk, yet it is a well-known fact that to turn back on these occasions is running by far the greatest risk of mischief,—he prudently advanced on his road. When he had reached the gate of the kirk-yard, he was surprised and entertained, through the ribs and arches of an old Gothic window, which still faces the highway, to see a dance of witches merrily footing it round their old sooty black-guard master, who was keeping them all alive with the power of his bag-pipe. The farmer, stopping his horse to observe them a little, could plainly descry the faces of many old women of his acquaintance and neighbourhood. How the gentleman was dressed tradition does not say, but that the ladies were all in their smocks: and one of them happening unluckily to have a smock which was considerably too short to answer all the purpose of that piece of dress, our farmer was so tickled that he involuntarily burst out, with a loud laugh, "Weel luppen, Maggy wi' the short sark!" and, recollecting himself, instantly spurred his horse to the top of his speed. I need not mention the universally known fact that no diabolical power can pursue you beyond the middle of a running stream. Lucky it was for the poor farmer that the river Doon was so near, for notwithstanding the speed of his horse, which was a good one, against he reached the middle of the arch of the bridge, and consequently the middle of the stream, the pursuing, vengeful hags, were so close at his heels that one of them actually sprung to seize him; but it was too late, nothing was on her side of the stream but the horse's tail, which immediately gave way at her infernal grip, as if blasted by a stroke of lightning; but the farmer was beyond her reach. However, the unsightly, tail-less condition of the vigorous steed was, to the last hour of the noble creature's life, an awful warning to the Carrick farmers not to stay too late in Ayr markets.

The last relation I shall give, though equally true, is not so well identified as the two former, with regard to the scene; but, as the best authorities give it for Alloway, I shall relate it.

On a summer's evening, about the time that nature puts on her sables to mourn the expiry of the cheerful day, a shepherd boy belonging to a farmer in the immediate neighbourhood of Alloway Kirk had just folded his charge, and was returning home. As he passed the kirk, in the adjoining field, he fell in with a crew of men and women, who were busy pulling stems of the plant Ragwort. He observed that, as each person pulled a Ragwort, he or she got astride of it, and called out, "Up horsie!" on which the Ragwort flew off, like Pegasus, through the air with its rider. The foolish boy likewise pulled his Ragwort, and cried with the rest, "Up horsie!" and, strange to tell, away he flew with the company. The first stage at which the cavalcade stopt was a merchant's wine cellar in Bourdeaux, where, without saying By your leave, they quaffed away at the best the cellar could afford, until the morning, foe to the imps and works of darkness, threatened to throw light on the matter, and frightened them from their carousals.

The poor shepherd lad, being equally a stranger to the scene and the liquor, heedlessly got himself drunk; and when the rest took horse, he fell asleep, and was found so next day by some of the people belonging to the Merchant. Somebody, that understood Scotch, asking him what he was, he said such-a-one's herd in Alloway, and, by some means or other getting home again, he lived long to tell the world the wondrous tale.*

I am, &c.

R. B.

No. CCXX.

TO MR. J. CLARKE,

EDINBURGH.

July 16, 1792.

MR. BURNS begs leave to present his most respectful compliments to Mr. Clarke.—Mr. B. some time ago did himself the honour of writing Mr. C. respecting coming out to the country, to give a little musical instruction in a highly respectable family,† where Mr. C. may have his own terms, and may be as happy as indolence, the devil, and the gout will permit him. Mr. B. knows well how Mr. C. is engaged with another family; but cannot Mr. C. find two or three weeks to spare to each of them?

Mr. B. is deeply impressed with, and awfully conscious of, the high importance of Mr. C.'s time, whether in the winged moments of symphonious exhibition, at the keys of harmony, while listening seraphs cease their own less delightful strains; or in the drowsy arms of slumberous repose, in the arms of his dearly beloved elbow chair, where the frowsy, but potent power of indolence circumsfuses her vapours round, and sheds her dews on the head of her darling son. But half a line conveying half a meaning from Mr. C. would make Mr. B. the happiest of mortals.

No. CCXXI.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Annan Water Foot, 22nd August, 1792.

Do not blame me for it, Madam—my own conscience, hackneyed and weather-beaten as it is, in watching and reproving my vagaries, follies, indolence, &c., has continued to punish me sufficiently.

* * * * *

Do you think it possible, my dear and honoured friend, that I could be so lost to gratitude for many favours, to esteem for much worth, and to the honest, kind, pleasurable tie of now old acquaintance, and I hope and am sure of progressive, increasing friendship—as for a single day not to think of you—to ask the Fates what they are doing and about to do with my much loved friend and her wide scattered connexions, and to beg of them to be as kind to you and yours as they possibly can?

Apropos! (though how it is apropos, I have not leisure to explain) Do you know that I am almost in love with an acquaintance of yours?—Almost! said I—I am in love, souse, over head and ears, deep as the unfathomable abyss of the boundless ocean; but the word Love, owing to the intermingledoms of the good and the bad, the pure and the impure in this world, being rather an equivocal term for expressing one's sentiments and sensations, I must do justice to the sacred purity of my attachment. Know, then, that the heart-struck awe; the distant humble approach; the delight we should have in gazing upon and listening to a Messenger of Heaven, appearing in all the unspotted purity of his celestial home, among the coarse, polluted, far inferior sons

* [This letter was inserted in the "Censura Literaria."—It was communicated to Sir Egerton Brydges, the Editor of that work, by Mr. Gilchrist of Stamford, with the following remark.

† "In a collection of miscellaneous papers of the Antiquary Grose, which I purchased a few years since, I found the accompanying letter written to him by Burns, when the former was collecting the Antiquities of Scotland. When I premise it was on the second tradition that he afterwards formed the inimitable tale of 'Tam o' Shanter,' I cannot doubt of its being read with great interest. It were 'burning daylight' to point out to a reader (and who is not a reader of Burns?) the thoughts he afterwards transplanted into the rhythmic narrative."

‡ [The family to whom this letter refers was that of M^r Murdo, then of Drumlanrig, now of Dumfries. The remarks on the Poet's songs have already intimated with what success the musician exerted his talents, and how Burns aided him by composing lyrics in honour of the charms of the family.]

of men, to deliver to them tidings that make their hearts swim in joy, and their imaginations soar in transport—such, so delighting and so pure, were the emotions of my soul on meeting the other day with Miss Lesley Baillie, your neighbour, at M—. Mr. B. with his two daughters, accompanied by Mr. H. of G., passing through Dumfries a few days ago, on their way to England, did me the honour of calling on me; on which I took my horse (though God knows I could ill spare the time), and accompanied them fourteen or fifteen miles, and dined and spent the day with them. 'Twas about nine, I think, when I left them, and, riding home, I composed the following ballad, of which you will probably think you have a dear bargain, as it will cost you another groat of postage. You must know that there is an old ballad beginning with—

“ My bonnie Lizzie Baillie
I'll rove thee in my plaidie,” &c.

So I parodied it as follows, which is literally the first copy, “unointed, unanneal'd;” as Hamlet says.—

“ O saw ye bonny Lesley
As she gaed o'er the border?
She's gane like Alexander,
To spread her conquests farther.”

See page 416.

So much for ballads. I regret that you are gone to the east country, as I am to be in Ayrshire in about a fortnight. This world of ours, notwithstanding it has many good things in it, yet it has ever had this curse, that two or three people, who would be the happier the oftener they met together, are, almost without exception, always so placed as never to meet but once or twice a-year, which, considering the few years of a man's life, is a very great “evil under the sun,” which I do not recollect that Solomon has mentioned in his catalogue of the miseries of man. I hope and believe that there is a state of existence beyond the grave, where the worthy of this life will renew their former intimacies, with this endearing addition, that, “we meet to part no more!”

* * * * *

“ Tell us, ye dead,

Will none of you in pity disclose the secret
What 'tis you are, and we must shortly be!”

A thousand times have I made this apostrophe to the departed sons of men, but not one of them has ever thought fit to answer the question. “O that some courteous ghost would blab it out!” but it cannot be; you and I, my friend, must make the experiment by ourselves, and for ourselves. However, I am so convinced that an unshaken faith in the doctrines of religion is not only necessary, by making us better men, but also by making us happier men, that I should take every care that your little godson, and every little creature that shall call me father, shall be taught them.

So ends this heterogeneous letter, written at this wild place of the world, in the intervals of my labour of discharging a vessel of rum from Antigua.

R. B.

—◆—
No. CCXXII.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Dumfries, 10th September, 1792.

No! I will not attempt an apology.—Amid all my hurry of business, grinding the faces of the publican and the sinner on the merciless wheels of the Excise; making ballads, and then drinking, and then singing them; and, over and above all, the correcting the press-work of two different publications; still, still I might have stolen five minutes to dedicate to one of the first of my friends and fellow-creatures. I might have done, as I do at present, snatched an hour near “witching time of night,” and scrawled a page or two. I might have congratulated my friend on his marriage; or I might have thanked the Caledonian archers for the honour they have done me (though to do myself justice, I intended to have done both in rhyme, else I had done both long ere now). Well, then, here is to your good health! for you must know I have set a nipperkin of toddy by me, just by way of spell, to keep away the meikle-horned deil, or any of his subaltern imps who may be on their nightly rounds.

But what shall I write to you?—“The voice said cry,” and I said, “what shall I cry?”—O, thou spirit! whatever thou art, or wherever thou makest thyself visible! be thou a bogle by the eerie side of an auld thorn, in the dreary glen through which the herd-callan maun bicker in his gloamin route frae the faulde!—be thou a brownie, set, at dead of night, to thy task by the blazing ingle, or in the solitary barn, where the repercussions of thy iron flail half affright thyself, as thou performest the work of twenty of the sons of men, ere the cock-crowing summon thee to thy ample cog of substantial brose—be thou a kelpie, haunting the ford or ferry, in the starless night, mixing thy laughing yell with the howling of the storm and the roaring of the flood, as thou viewest the perils and miseries of man on the foundering horse, or in the tumbling boat!—or, lastly, be thou a ghost, paying thy nocturnal visits to the hoary ruins of decayed grandeur; or performing thy mystic rites in the shadow of the time-worn church, while the moon looks, without a cloud, on the silent, ghastly dwellings of the dead around thee; or taking thy stand by the bedside of the villain, or the murderer, pourtraying on his dreaming fancy, pictures, dreadful as the horrors of unveiled hell, and terrible as the wrath of incensed Deity!—Come, thou spirit, but not in these horrid forms; come with the milder, gentle, easy inspirations, which thou breathest round the wig of a prating advocate, or the tête of a tea-sipping gossip, while their tongues run at the light-horse gallop of clish-ma-claver for ever and ever—come and assist a poor devil who is quite jaded in the attempt to share half an idea among half a hundred words; to fill up four quarto pages, while he has not got one single sentence of recollection, information, or remark, worth putting pen to paper for.

I feel, I feel the presence of supernatural assistance! circled in the embrace of my elbow-chair, my breast labours, like the bloated Sybil on her three-footed stool, and like her, too, labours with Nonsense.—Nonsense, auspicious name! Tutor, friend, and finger-post in the mystic mazes of law; the cadaverous paths of physic; and particularly in the sightless soarings of SCHOOL DIVINITY, who, leaving Common Sense confounded at his strength of pinion, Reason, delirious with eyeing his giddy flight; and Truth creeping back into the bottom of her well, cursing the hour that ever she offered her scorned alliance to the wizard power of Theologic Vision—raves abroad on all the winds. “On earth Discord! a gloomy Heaven above, opening her jealous gates to the nineteen thousandth part of the title of mankind! and below, an inescapable and inexorable hell, expanding its leviathan jaws for the vast residue of mortals!!!”—O doctrine! comfortable and healing to the weary, wounded soul of man! Ye sons and daughters of affliction, ye pauvres miserables, to whom day brings no pleasure, and night yields no rest, be comforted! “’Tis but one to nineteen hundred thousand that your situation will mend in this world;” so, alas, the experience of the poor and the needy too often affirms; and ’tis nineteen hundred thousand to one, by the dogmas of * * * * *, that you will be damned eternally in the world to come!

But of all Nonsense, Religious Nonsense is the most nonsensical; so enough, and more than enough of it. Only, by the bye, will you, or can you, tell me, my dear Cunningham, why a sectarian turn of mind has always a tendency to narrow and illiberalize the heart? They are orderly; they may be just; nay, I have known them merciful: but still your children of sanctity move among their fellow-creatures with a nostril-snuffing putrescence, and a foot-spurning filth, in short, with a conceited dignity that your titled * * * * * or any other of your Scottish lordlings of seven centuries standing display, when they accidentally mix among the many-aproned sons of mechanical life. I remember, in my plough-boy days, I could not conceive it possible that a noble lord could be a fool, or a godly man could be a knave.—How ignorant are plough-boys!—Nay, I have since discovered that a godly woman may be a * * * !—But hold—Here’s t’ye again—this rum is generous Antigua, so a very unfit menstruum for scandal.

Apropos, how do you like, I mean really like, the married life? Ah, my friend! matrimony is quite a different thing from what your love-sick youths and sighing girls take it to be! But marriage, we are told, is appointed by God, and I shall never quarrel with any of his institutions. I am a husband of older standing than you, and shall give you my ideas of the conjugal state (en passant; you know I am no Latinist, is not conjugal derived from jugum, a yoke?) Well then, the scale of good wifeship I divide into ten parts.—Goodnature, four; Good Sense, two; Wit, one; Personal Charms, viz., a sweet face, eloquent eyes, fine limbs, graceful carriage (I would add a fine waist too, but that is so soon spoilt, you know), all these, one; as for the other qualities belonging to, or attending on a wife, such as Fortune, Connexion, Education (I mean education extraordinary), Family blood, &c., divide the two remaining degrees among them as you please; only, remember that all these minor properties must be expressed by fractions, for there is not any one of them, in the aforesaid scale, entitled to the dignity of an integer.

As for the rest of my fancies and reveries—how I lately met with Miss Lesley Baillie, the most beautiful, elegant woman in the world—how I accompanied her and her father’s family fifteen miles on their journey, out of pure devotion, to admire the loveliness of the works of God, in such an unequalled display of them—how, in galloping home at night, I made a ballad on her, of which these two stanzas make a part—

Thou, bonnie Lesley, art a queen,
Thy subjects we before thee;
Thou, bonnie Lesley, art divine,
The hearts o’ men adore thee.

The very Deil he could na scathe
Whatever wad belang thee!
He’d look into thy bonnie face,
And say, ‘I canna wrang thee.’

—behold all these things are written in the chronicles of my imagination, and shall be read by thee, my dear friend, and by thy beloved spouse, my other dear friend, at a more convenient season.

Now, to thee, and to thy before-designed bosom-companion, be given the precious things brought forth by the sun, and the precious things brought forth by the moon, and the benignest influences of the stars, and the living streams which flow from the fountains of life, and by the tree of life, for ever and ever! Amen!

R. B.

No. CCXXIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Dumfries, 24th September, 1792.

I HAVE this moment, my dear Madam, yours of the twenty-third. All your other kind reproaches, your news, &c., are out of my head when I read and think on Mrs. Henri's situation. Good God! a heart-wounded helpless young woman—in a strange, foreign land, and that land convulsed with every horror that can harrow the human feelings—sick—looking, longing for a comforter, but finding none—a mother's feelings, too:—but it is too much: he who wounded (He only can) may He heal!

* * * *

I wish the farmer great joy of his new acquisition to his family. * * * *! I cannot say that I give him joy of his life as a farmer. 'Tis, as a farmer paying a dear, unconscionable rent, a cursed life! As to a laird farming his own property; sowing his own corn in hope; and reaping it, in spite of brittle weather, in gladness; knowing that none can say unto him, "What dost thou?"—fattening his herds; shearing his flocks; rejoicing at Christmas; and begetting sons and daughters, until he be the venerated, grey-haired leader of a little tribe—'tis a heavenly life! but Devil take the life of reaping the fruits that another must eat.

Well, your kind wishes will be gratified, as to seeing me when I make my Ayr-shire visit. I cannot leave Mrs. B——, until her nine months' race is run, which may perhaps be in three or four weeks. She, too, seems determined to make me the patriarchal leader of a band. However, if Heaven will be so obliging as to let me have them in the proportion of three boys to one girl, I shall be so much the more pleased. I hope, if I am spared with them, to shew a set of boys that will do honour to my cares and name; but I am not equal to the task of rearing girls. Besides, I am too poor; a girl should always have a fortune. Apropos, your little godson is thriving charmingly, but is a very devil. He, though two years younger, has completely mastered his brother. Robert is indeed the mildest, gentlest creature I ever saw. He has a most surprising memory, and is quite the pride of his school-master.

You know how readily we get into prattle upon a subject dear to our heart—you can excuse it. God bless you and yours!

R. B.

* [Mrs. Henri, daughter of Mrs. Dunlop, died at Muges, near Aiguillon, September 15th, 1792. The above letter is one

No. CCXXIV.

TO THE SAME.

SUPPOSED TO HAVE BEEN WRITTEN ON THE DEATH OF MRS. HENRI, HER DAUGHTER.*

Dumfries, September, 1792.

I HAD been from home, and did not receive your letter until my return the other day.—What shall I say to comfort you, my much-valued, much-afflicted friend! I can but grieve with you; consolation I have none to offer, except that which religion holds out to the children of affliction—children of affliction!—how just the expression! and, like every other family, they have matters among them which they hear, see, and feel in a serious, all-important manner, of which the world has not, nor cares to have, any idea. The world looks indifferently on, makes the passing remark, and proceeds to the next novel occurrence.

Alas, Madam! who would wish for many years? What is it but to drag existence until our joys gradually expire, and leave us in a night of misery—like the gloom which blots out the stars one by one, from the face of night, and leaves us, without a ray of comfort, in the howling waste!

I am interrupted, and must leave off. You shall soon hear from me again.

R. B.

No. CCXXV.

TO THE SAME.

Dumfries, 6th December, 1792.

I SHALL be in Ayr-shire, I think, next week; and, if at all possible, I shall certainly, my much esteemed friend, have the pleasure of visiting at Dunlop-house.

Alas, Madam! how seldom do we meet in this world, that we have reason to congratulate ourselves on accessions of happiness! I have not passed half the ordinary term of an old man's life, and yet I scarcely look over the obituary of a newspaper that I do not see some names that I have known, and which I and other acquaintances little thought to meet with there so soon. Every other instance of the mortality of our kind makes us cast an anxious look into the dreadful abyss of uncertainty, and shudder with apprehension for our own fate.—But of how different an importance are the lives of different individuals! Nay, of what importance is one period of the same life, more than another! A few years ago, I could have of condolence on this melancholy event. See note to the "Stanzas on the birth of a Posthumous Child," page 249.]

laid down in the dust, "careless of the voice of the morning;" and now not a few, and these most helpless individuals, would, on losing me and my exertions, lose both their "staff and shield." By the way, these helpless ones have lately got an addition; Mrs. B—— having given me a fine girl since I wrote you. There is a charming passage in Thomson's "Edward and Eleanora:"

"The valiant, in himself, what can he suffer?
Or what need he regard his single woes?" &c.

As I am got in the way of quotations, I shall give you another from the same piece, peculiarly, alas! too peculiarly apposite, my dear Madam, to your present frame of mind:

"Who so unworthy but may proudly deck him
With his fair-weather virtue, that exults
Glad o'er the summer main? the tempest comes,
The rough winds rage aloud; when from the helm
This virtue shrinks, and in a corner lies
Lamenting—Heavens! if privileged from trial
How cheap a thing were virtue!"

I do not remember to have heard you mention Thomson's dramas. I pick up favourite quotations, and store them in my mind as ready armour, offensive or defensive, amid the struggle of this turbulent existence. Of these is one, a very favourite one, from his "Alfred:"

"Attach thee firmly to the virtuous deeds
And offices of life; to life itself,
With all its vain and transient joys, sit loose."

Probably I have quoted some of these to you formerly, as indeed, when I write from the heart, I am apt to be guilty of such repetitions. The compass of the heart, in the musical style of expression, is much more bounded than that of the imagination; so the notes of the former are extremely apt to run into one another; but in return for the paucity of its compass, its few notes are much more sweet. I must still give you another quotation, which I am almost sure I have given you before, but I cannot resist the temptation. The subject is religion—speaking of its importance to mankind, the author says,

"'Tis this, my friend, that streaks our morning bright."

I see you are in for double postage, so I shall e'en scribble out t'other sheet. We, in this country here, have many alarms of the reforming, or rather the republican, spirit of your part of the kingdom. Indeed, we are a good deal in commotion ourselves. For me, I am a placeman, you know; a very humble one indeed,

* [Graham, of Fintray, stood the Poet's friend in this hour of peril, and the Board of Excise had the generosity to permit him to continue to eat the "bitter bread" of his situation for the remainder of his life. Burns, in his letter to Erskine of Mar, enters fully into the history of this dark transaction.—CUNNINGHAM.]

Heaven knows, but still so much as to gag me. What my private sentiments are, you will find out without an interpreter.

* * * * *

I have taken up the subject, and the other day, for a pretty actress's benefit night, I wrote an address, which I will give on the other page, called "The Rights of Woman:"

"While Europe's eye is fix'd on mighty things,"

[See page 314.]

I shall have the honour of receiving your criticisms in person at Dunlop.

R. B.

No. CCXXVI.

TO R. GRAHAM, Esq.,

FINTRAY.*

December, 1792.

SIR:

I HAVE been surprised, confounded, and distracted by Mr. Mitchel, the collector, telling me that he has received an order from your Board† to enquire into my political conduct, and blaming me as a person disaffected to government.

Sir, you are a husband—and a father.—You know what you would feel to see the much-loved wife of your bosom, and your helpless, prattling little ones, turned adrift into the world, degraded and disgraced from a situation in which they had been respectable and respect'd, and left almost without the necessary support of a miserable existence. Alas, Sir! must I think that such, soon, will be my lot? and from the d-mned, dark insinuations of hellish groundless envy too! I believe, Sir, I may aver it, and in the sight of Omniscience, that I would not tell a deliberate falsehood, no, not though even worse horrors, if worse can be, than those I have mentioned, hung over my head; and I say that the allegation, whatever villain has made it, is a lie! To the British Constitution, on revolution principles, next after my God, I am most devoutly attached; you, Sir, have been much and generously my friend.—Heaven knows how warmly I have felt the obligation, and how gratefully I have thanked you.—Fortune, Sir, has made you powerful, and me impotent; has given you patronage, and me dependence.—I would not for my single self, call on your humanity; were such my insular, unconnected situation, I would despise the tear that now swells in my eye—I could brave misfortune, I could face ruin; for at the worst, “Death’s thousand doors stand open;” but, good God! the tender concerns that I have mentioned, the claims and ties that I see at this moment, and feel around me, how they unnerve courage, and wither resolution! To your patronage, as a man of some genius, you have allowed me a claim; and your esteem, as an honest man, I know is my due: To these, Sir, permit me to appeal; by these may I adjure you to save me from that misery which threatens to overwhelm me, and which, with my latest breath I will say it, I have not deserved.

† [The Commissioners of the Scottish Board of Excise were at this period, George Brown, Thomas Wharton, James Stodart, Robert Graham, of Fintray, and John Grieve, Esquires.]

R. B.

No. CCXXVII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Dumfries, 31st December, 1792.

DEAR MADAM,

A HURRY of business, thrown in heaps by my absence, has until now prevented my returning my grateful acknowledgements to the good family of Dunlop, and you in particular, for that hospitable kindness which rendered the four days I spent under that genial roof, four of the pleasantest I ever enjoyed.—Alas, my dearest friend! how few and fleeting are those things we call pleasures! on my road to Ayrshire, I spent a night with a friend whom I much valued; a man whose days promised to be many; and on Saturday last we laid him in the dust!

Jan. 2, 1793.

I HAVE just received yours of the 30th, and feel much for your situation. However, I heartily rejoice in your prospect of recovery from that vile jaundice. As to myself, I am better, though not quite free of my complaint.—You must not think, as you seem to insinuate, that in my way of life I want exercise.

* [“The following extract,” says Cromek, “from a letter addressed by Robert Bloomfield to the Earl of Buchan, contains so interesting an exhibition of the modesty inherent in real worth, and so philosophical, and at the same time so poetical an estimate of the different characters and destinies of Burns and its author, that I should esteem myself culpable were I to withhold it from the public view.”

“The illustrious soul that has left amongst us the name of Burns, has often been lowered down to a comparison with me; but the comparison exists more in circumstances than in essentials. That man stood up with the stamp of superior intellect on his brow; a visible greatness: and great and patriotic subjects would only have called into action the powers of his mind, which lay inactive while he played calmly and exquisitely the pastoral pipe.

“The letters to which I have alluded in my preface to the ‘Rural Tales’ were friendly warnings, pointed with immediate reference to the fate of that extraordinary man. ‘Remember Burns!’ has been the watch-word of my friends. I do remember Burns; but I am not Burns! neither have I his fire to fan or to quench; nor his passions to control! Where then is my merit if I make a peaceful voyage on a smooth sea, and with no mutiny on board? To a lady [I

Of that I have enough; but occasional hard drinking is the devil to me. Against this I have again and again bent my resolution, and have greatly succeeded. Taverns I have totally abandoned: it is the private parties in the family way, among the hard drinking gentlemen of this country, that do me the mischief—but even this, I have more than half given over.*

Mr. Corbet can be of little service to me at present; at least, I should be shy of applying. I cannot possibly be settled as a supervisor for several years. I must wait the rotation of the list, and there are twenty names before mine.—I might indeed get a job of officiating, where a settled supervisor was ill, or aged; but that hauls me from my family, as I could not remove them on such an uncertainty. Besides, some envious, malicious devil has raised a little demur on my political principles, and I wish to let that matter settle before I offer myself too much in the eye of my supervisors. I have set, henceforth, a seal on my lips, as to these unlucky politics; but to you I must breathe my sentiments. In this, as in every thing else, I shall shew the undisguised emotions of my soul. War I deprecate: misery and ruin to thousands are in the blast that announces the destructive demon. * * R. B.

No. CCXXVIII.

TO THE SAME.†

5th January, 1793.

You see my hurried life, Madam: I can only command starts of time; however, I am glad of one thing; since I finished the other sheet, the political blast that threatened my welfare is overblown. I have corresponded with Commissioner Graham, for the board had made me the subject of their animadversions; and now I have the pleasure of informing you that all is set to rights in that quarter.‡ Now have it from herself), who remonstrated with him on his danger from drink, and the pursuits of some of his associates, he replied, ‘Madam, they would not thank me for my company, if I did not drink with them.—I must give them a slice of my constitution.’ How much to be regretted that he did not give them thinner slices of his constitution, that it might have lasted longer!’”

† [In Dr. Currie’s edition this letter is dated January 1792, and appears in the place appropriate to that date. The present editor, entertaining no doubt that the real date is 1793, has transferred it from the former to the present place. What gives reason to believe the latter the true date is the allusion to the “political blast” that had threatened the poet’s welfare.—CHAMBERS.

The Editor of the present edition agrees with Mr. Chambers.—J. C.]

‡ [The poet spoke mildly to Mrs. Dunlop concerning the conduct of the Excise in the affair of what he called his political delinquencies; he was not so bird-mouthed to Erskine of Mar: his letter to that gentleman will remain a monument to the eternal dishonour of the government of that day, and the Board of Commissioners.—CUNNINGHAM.]

as to these informers, may the devil be let loose to — but, hold! I was praying most fervently in my last sheet, and I must not so soon fall a swearing in this.

Alas! how little do the wantonly or idly officious think what mischief they do by their malicious insinuations, indirect impertinence, or thoughtless blabbings! What a difference there is in intrinsic worth, candour, benevolence, generosity, kindness,—in all the charities and all the virtues—between one class of human beings and another. For instance, the amiable circle I so lately mixed with in the hospitable hall of Dunlop, their generous hearts—their uncontaminated dignified minds—their informed and polished understandings—what a contrast, when compared—if such comparing were not downright sacrilege—with the soul of the miscreant who can deliberately plot the destruction of an honest man that never offended him, and with a grin of satisfaction see the unfortunate being, his faithful wife, and prattling innocents, turned over to beggary and ruin!

Your cup, my dear Madam, arrived safe. I had two worthy fellows dining with me the other day, when I, with great formality, produced my whigmaleerie cup, and told them that it had been a family-piece among the descendants of William Wallace. This roused such an enthusiasm that they insisted on bumpering the punch round in it; and, by and bye, never did your great ancestor lay a Sutherland more completely to rest than for a time did your cup my two friends. Apropos, this is the season of wishing. May God bless you, my dear friend, and bless me, the humblest and sincerest of your friends, by granting you yet many returns of the season! May all good things attend you and yours wherever they are scattered over the earth!

R. B.

No. CCXXIX.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

3d March, 1793.

SINCE I wrote to you the last lugubrious sheet, I have not had time to write farther. When I say that I had not time, that as usual means that the three demons, indolence, business, and ennui, have so completely shared my hours among them as not to leave me a five minutes' fragment to take up a pen in.

Thank heaven, I feel my spirits buoying upwards with the renovating year. Now I shall in good earnest take up Thomson's songs. I dare say he thinks I have used him unkindly, and, I must own, with too much appearance of truth. Apropos, do you know the much admired old Highland air called "the Sutor's Dochter?" It is a first-rate favourite of mine, and I have written what I reckon one of my best songs to it. I will send it to you, as it was sung with great applause in some fashionable circles by Major Robertson, of Lude, who was here with his corps.

* * * * *

There is one commission that I must trouble you with. I lately lost a valuable seal, a present from a departed friend, which vexes me much.

I have gotten one of your Highland pebbles, which I fancy would make a very decent one; and I want to cut my armorial bearing on it; will you be so obliging as inquire what will be the expense of such a business? I do not know that my name is matriculated, as the heralds call it, at all; but I have invented arms for myself, so you know I shall be chief of the name; and, by courtesy of Scotland, will likewise be entitled to supporters. These, however, I do not intend having on my seal. I am a bit of a herald, and shall give you, secundum artem, my arms. On a field, azure, a holly bush, seeded, proper, in base; a shepherd's pipe and crook, saltier-wise, also proper, in chief. On a wreath of the colours, a wood-lark perching on a sprig of bay-tree, proper, for crest. Two mottoes; round the top of the crest, Wood notes wild; at the bottom of the shield, in the usual place, Better a wee bush than nae bield.* By the shepherd's pipe and crook I do not mean the nonsense of painters of Arcadia, but a Stock and Horn, and a Club, such as you see at the head of Allan Ramsay, in Allan's quarto edition of the Gentle Shepherd. By the bye, do you know Allan? He must be a man of very great genius—Why is he not more known?—Has he no patrons? or do "Poverty's cold wind and crushing rain beat keen and heavy" on him? I once, and but once, got a glance of that noble edition of the noblest pastoral in the world; and dear as it was, I mean, dear as to my pocket, I would have bought it; but I was told that it was printed and engraved for subscribers only. He is the only artist who has his genuine pastoral costume. What, my dear Cunningham, is there in riches, that they narrow and harden the heart so? I think that, were I as rich as the sun, I should be as generous as the day; but as I have no reason to imagine my soul a nobler one than any other man's, I must conclude that wealth imparts a bird-lime quality to the possessor, at which the man, in his native poverty, would have revolted. What has led me to the remainder of his life. It is still in the family, and regarded as a relique.]

* [The seal with the arms which the ingenious poet invented was carefully cut in Edinburgh and used by him

this is the idea of such merit as Mr. Allan possesses, and such riches as a nabob or government contractor possesses, and why they do not form a mutual league. Let wealth shelter and cherish unprotected merit, and the gratitude and celebrity of that merit will richly repay it.*

R. B.

 No. CCXXX.

TO MISS BENSON,

NOW MRS. BASIL MONTAGU.

Dumfries, 21st March, 1793.

MADAM,

AMONG many things for which I envy those hale, long-lived old fellows before the flood, is this in particular, that, when they met with any body after their own heart, they had a charming long prospect of many, many happy meetings with them in after-life.

Now, in this short, stormy, winter day of our fleeting existence, when you now and then, in the chapter of accidents, meet an individual whose acquaintance is a real acquisition, there are all the probabilities against you that you shall never meet with that valued character more. On the other hand, brief as this miserable being is, it is none of the least of the miseries belonging to it, that if there is any miscreant whom you hate, or creature whom you despise, the ill-run of the chances shall be so against you that, in the overtakings, turnings, and jostlings of life, pop, at some unlucky corner, eternally comes the wretch upon you, and will not allow your indignation or contempt a moment's repose. As I am a sturdy believer in the powers of darkness, I take these to be the doings of that old author of mischief, the devil. It is well-known that he has some kind of short-hand way of taking down our thoughts, and I make no doubt that he is perfectly acquainted with my sentiments respecting Miss Benson: how much I admired her abilities and valued her worth, and how very fortunate I thought myself in her acquaintance. For this last reason, my dear Madam, I must entertain no hopes of the very great pleasure of meeting with you again.

Miss Hamilton tells me that she is sending a packet to you, and I beg leave to send you the enclosed sonnet, though, to tell you the real truth, the sonnet is a mere pretence, that I may have the opportunity of declaring with how much respectful esteem I have the honour to be, &c.

R. B.

 No. CCXXXI.

TO PATRICK MILLER, Esq.

OF DALSWINTON.

Dumfries, April, 1793.

SIR,

MY poems having just come out in another edition—will you do me the honour to accept of a copy? A mark of my gratitude to you, as a gentleman to whose goodness I have been much indebted; of my respect for you, as a patriot who, in a venal, sliding age, stands forth the champion of the liberties of my country; and of my veneration for you, as a man whose benevolence of heart does honour to human nature.

There was a time,† Sir, when I was your dependant: this language then would have been like the vile incense of flattery—I could not have used it.—Now that connexion is at an end, do me the honour to accept of this honest tribute of respect from, Sir,

Your much indebted humble servant,

R. B.

* [That Burns admired such a painter as Allan was to be expected: they both wrought on nature of Scottish growth, and both excelled in pictures of humour and glee. As an artist, however, Allan's merits are of a limited nature; he neither excelled in fine drawing nor in harmonious colouring, and grace and grandeur were beyond his reach. He painted portraits, which are chiefly remarkable for a strong homely resemblance: he painted landscapes, but these want light and air, and he attempted the historical, but, save in one picture, "The Corinthian Maid," all his efforts in that way were failures. His genius lay in expression, especially in grave humour and open drollery. Yet it would be difficult perhaps to name one of his pictures where nature is not overcharged: he could not stop his hand till he had driven his subject into the debatable land that lies between truth and caricature. He is among painters what Allan Ramsay is among poets, a fellow of infinite humour, and excelling in all manner of rustic drollery, but deficient in fine sensibility of conception, and little acquainted with lofty emotion or high imagination. Allan was born at Alloa, in Stirling-shire; studied in Glasgow and at Rome; returned to his native land, became Master of the Edinburgh Academy, and died there 6th August, 1796, in the fifty-third year of his age. In person he was under the middle size, his form slender, his face coarse and long, and his hair of the colour of sand. His looks were mean and unpromising, till he was in company to his liking, when his large grey eyes grew bright and penetrating, his manners pleasing, and his conversation sprightly and humorous, inclining to satire, and replete with observation and anecdote.—CUNNINGHAM.

At his death, he left a series of drawings illustrative of Burns's Works.]

† [The time to which Burns alludes was when he held the farm of Ellisland as tenant to Mr. Miller. Between the laird and the farmer there passed no stern words respecting the relinquishing of the lease—but it occasioned a coldness which continued till the death of the latter. At the burial of the Bard, the eyes of Miller were wet when many around were dry.—CUNNINGHAM.]

No. CCXXXII.

TO JOHN FRANCIS ERSKINE, Esq.,

OF MAR.*

Dumfries, 13th April, 1793.

SIR :

DEGENERATE as human nature is said to be—and, in many instances, worthless and unprincipled it is—still there are bright examples to the contrary: examples that, even in the eyes of superior beings, must shed a lustre on the name of Man.

Such an example have I now before me, when you, Sir, came forward to patronise and befriend a distant obscure stranger, merely because poverty had made him helpless, and his British hardihood of mind had provoked the arbitrary wantonness of power. My much esteemed friend, Mr. Riddell of Glenriddel, has just read me a paragraph of a letter he had from you. Accept, Sir, of the silent throb of gratitude; for words would but mock the emotions of my soul.

You have been misinformed as to my final dismissal from the Excise; I am still in the service.—Indeed, but for the exertions of a gentleman who must be known to you, Mr. Graham of Fintray—a gentleman who has ever been my warm and generous friend—I had, without so much as a hearing, or the slightest previous intimation, been turned adrift, with my helpless family, to all the horrors of want.—Had I had any other resource, probably I might have saved them the trouble of a dismissal; but the little money I gained by my publication is almost every guinea embarked, to save from ruin an only brother, who, though one of the worthiest, is by no means one of the most fortunate, of men.

In my defence to their accusations, I said that whatever might be my sentiments of republics, ancient or modern, as to Britain, I abjured the idea:—That a CONSTITUTION, which, in its original principles, experience had proved to be in every way fitted for our happiness in society, it would be insanity to sacrifice to an untried visionary theory:—That, in consideration of my being situated in a department, however humble, immediately in the hands of people in power, I had forborne taking any active part, either personally, or as an author, in the present business of REFORM. But that, where I must declare my sentiments, I would say there existed a system of corruption between the executive power and the representative part of the legislature, which boded no good to our glorious CONSTITUTION; and which every patriotic Briton must wish to see amended.—Some such sentiments as these, I stated in a letter to my generous patron Mr.

Graham, which he laid before the Board at large; where, it seems, my last remark gave great offence; and one of our supervisors-general, a Mr. Corbet, was instructed to inquire on the spot, and to document me—"that my business was to act, not to think; and that, whatever might be men or measures, it was for me to be silent and obedient."

Mr. Corbet was likewise my steady friend; so between Mr. Graham and him, I have been partly forgiven; only I understand that all hopes of my getting officially forward are blasted.

Now, Sir, to the business in which I would more immediately interest you. The partiality of my COUNTRYMEN has brought me forward as a man of genius, and has given me a character to support. In the POET I have avowed manly and independent sentiments, which I trust will be found in the MAN. Reasons of no less weight than the support of a wife and family, have pointed out as the eligible, and, situated as I was, the only eligible, line of life for me, my present occupation. Still my honest fame is my dearest concern; and a thousand times have I trembled at the idea of those degrading epithets that malice or misrepresentation may affix to my name. I have often, in blasted anticipation, listened to some future hackney scribbler, with the heavy malice of savage stupidity exulting in his hireling paragraphs—"BURNS, notwithstanding the fanfaronade of independence to be found in his works, and after having been held forth to public view and to public estimation as a man of some genius, yet, quite destitute of resources within himself to support his borrowed dignity, he dwindled into a paltry exciseman, and slunk out the rest of his insignificant existence in the meanest of pursuits, and among the vilest of mankind."

In your illustrious hands, Sir, permit me to lodge my disavowal and defiance of these slanderous falsehoods. BURNS was a poor man from birth, and an exciseman by necessity: but—I will say it! the sterling of his honest worth no poverty could debase, and his independent British mind oppression might bend, but could not subdue.—Have not I, to me, a more precious stake in my Country's welfare, than the richest dukedom in it? I have a large family of children, and the prospect of many more. I have three sons, who, I see already, have brought into the world souls ill qualified to inhabit the bodies of SLAVES.—Can I look tamely on, and see any machination to wrest from them the birthright of my boys,—the little independent BRITONS in whose veins runs my own blood?—No! I will not! should my heart's blood stream around my attempt to defend it!

* [Mr. Erskine, of Mar, was at all times of his life a staunch Whig. He became Earl of Mar, in 1824, in consequence of the reversal of his grandfather's attainder. He died August 20th, 1825, aged eighty-four.]

Does any man tell me that my full efforts can be of no service; and that it does not belong to my humble station to meddle with the concern of a nation?

I can tell him that it is on such individuals as I that a nation has to rest, both for the hand of support, and the eye of intelligence. The uninformed MOB may swell a nation's bulk; and the titled, tinsel, courtly throng may be its feathered ornament; but the number of those who are elevated enough in life to reason and to reflect, yet low enough to keep clear of the venal contagion of a Court—these are a nation's strength!

I know not how to apologize for the impertinent length of this epistle; but one small request I must ask of you farther—When you have honoured this letter with a perusal, please to commit it to the flames. BURNS, in whose behalf you have so generously interested yourself, I have here, in his native colours, drawn as he is; but should any of the people in whose hands is the very bread he eats get the least knowledge of the picture, it would ruin the poor BARD for ever!

My poems having just come out in another edition, I beg leave to present you with a copy as a small mark of that high esteem and ardent gratitude with which I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your deeply indebted,

And ever devoted humble servant,

R. B.*

No. CCXXXIII.

TO MR. ROBERT AINSLIE.

April 26, 1793.

I AM d-mnably out of humour, my dear Ainslie, and that is the reason, why I take up the pen to you: 'tis the nearest way (probatum est), to recover my spirits again.

* [Erskine of Mar gave a copy of the poet's letter to Cromek, who published it in the "Reliques." It was rumoured that Burns was not only admonished by the Board of Excise, but actually dismissed from his situation; this induced Erskine to propose a subscription in his favour, which was refused by the bard with that elevation of sentiment which characterized his mind. It was well that the future Earl of Mar heard the report, since it drew from Burns this truly manly and well considered letter—it was all but the latest act of his life to write it down from his memory among his memoranda. The late Mr. Findlater, his superior officer in Dumfries at the time, eulogized the conduct of the Board of Excise; averred that the bard received only a gentle—a courteous admonition and was never for a moment in danger of being dismissed. Burns informed Graham that Mitchell had confounded him with the information that he had received orders to inquire into his political conduct, for he was blamed as a person disaffected to the government. In the present letter the poet farther says that, but for the interposition of Graham of Fintray, he would have been turned adrift with his helpless family to all the horrors of want; and moreover that he was documented by the Board, that his business was to act, not to think, and that, whatever might be men and measures, it was his duty to be silent and obedient.

I received your last, and was much entertained with it; but I will not at this time, nor at any other time, answer it.—Answer a letter! I never could answer a letter in my life!—I have written many a letter in return for letters I have received; but then—they were original matter—spurt away! zig, here; zag, there; as if the devil, that my grannie (an old woman indeed) often told me, rode on will-o'-wisp, or, in her more classic phrase, SPUNKIE, were looking over my elbow.—Happy thought that idea has engendered in my head! SPUNKIE—thou shalt henceforth be my symbol, signature, and tutelary genius! Like thee, hap-step-and-lopw, here-awa-there-awa, higglety-pigglety, pell-mell, hither-and-yont, ransam, happy-go-lucky, up tails-a'-by-the-light-o'-the-moon—has been, is, and shall be, my progress through the mosses and moors of this vile, bleak, barren wilderness of a life of ours.

Come then, my guardian spirit! like thee, may I skip away, amusing myself by and at my own light: and if any opaque-souled lubber of mankind complain that my elfine, lambent, glimmerous wanderings have misled his stupid steps over precipices, or into bogs; let the thick-headed Blunderbuss recollect that he is not SPUNKIE:—that

SPUNKIE'S wanderings could not copied be;
Amid these perils none durst walk but he.—

* * * * *

I have no doubt but scholar-craft may be caught, as a Scotsman catches the itch,—by friction. How else can you account for it that born blockheads, by mere dint of handling books, grow so wise that even they themselves are equally convinced of and surprised at their own parts? I once carried this philosophy to that degree that in a knot of country folks who had a library amongst them, and who, to the honour of their good sense, made me factotum in the business; one of our members, a little, wise-looking, squat, upright, jabbering body of Those who contradict the testimony of Burns should do it on better authority than their own assertion; the poet's word will weigh down any other man's, so long as he speaks from his own knowledge. Findlater argued; Burns stated facts. The poet is supported by the testimony of Robert Ainslie, to whom all his affairs were known; in a letter dated 3rd September, 1834, without being aware that his illustrious friend's assertions were impeached, he says, "You know that the poet was a 'friend of the people' during the days of political ferment in his time: a circumstance which impeded his advancement in the excise—he never rose higher than the 'nicked stick,' the badge and implement of a common gauger. The Commissioners of Excise, irritated at his opinions, wrote him a formal official letter, sealing with the large seal of office, informing him that a 'petty officer' had 'no business with politics.'" The proud heart of Burns did not like this humbling; after a few wrathful words in secret to one of his friends, he took a pencil and wrote these lines on the envelope:

"In politics if you would mix,
And low your station be,
Keep this in mind—be deaf and blind,
Let great folks hear and see."

CUNNINGHAM.]

a tailor, I advised him, instead of turning over the leaves, to bind the book on his back.—Johnnie took the hint; and, as our meetings were every fourth Saturday, and Pricklouse having a good Scots mile to walk in coming, and, of course, another in returning, Bodkin was sure to lay his hand on some heavy quarto, or ponderous folio, with, and under which, wrapt up in his grey plaid, he grew wise, as he grew weary, all the way home. He carried this so far that an old musty Hebrew Concordance, which we had in a present from a neighbouring priest, by mere dint of applying it, as doctors do a blistering plaster, between his shoulders, Stitch, in a dozen pilgrimages, acquired as much rational theology as the said priest had done by forty years' perusal of the pages.

Tell me, and tell me truly, what you think of this theory.*

Yours,
SPUNKIE.

No. CCXXXIV.

TO MISS KENNEDY,

EDINBURGH.

MADAM :

Permit me to present you with the enclosed song as a small, though grateful tribute, to the honour of your acquaintance. I have, in these verses, attempted some faint sketches of your portrait in the unembellished simple manner of descriptive TRUTH.—Flattery, I leave to your LOVERS, whose exaggerating fancies may make

* [What a strange hipperty-skipperly letter this is to AINSLIE ! that is to say, to AINSLIE as we know him now,—the author of "The Father's Gift," and many beautiful little religious works, fitted for youth of both sexes. Ainslie, since ever I knew him, and that has been considerably upwards of twenty years, has been much the same,—a downright honest, sleepy-headed, kind-hearted gentleman, and his good humour never failing him, not even in his sleep, with which he generally favours the company once or twice in an evening. But even then, there is a benevolence in his countenance that beams more intensely than when he is awake. I have seen him fall fast asleep in the blue parlour at Ambrose's, with North in the chair, and myself croupier. Honest Ainslie ! That is a constitutional failing which he cannot help ; for a man of kinder or better intentions never was born. He is now, alas ! the only relic that I know of, of the real intimate acquaintances of Burns.—Hogg, 1837.]

What havoc a few years have made among the friends and admirers of the Poet ! Since the above note was penned, the kind-hearted shepherd of Etrick—his able co-adjutor, Motherwell—and his friend Ainslie, have all paid the debt of nature. Hamilton of Mauchline, the eldest son of Gavin Hamilton—Mr. Alexander Findlater, and my old friend, George H. King, have also within these few months gone to that bourne "whence no traveller returns."—J. C.]

† [The Poet has been called the flatterer of woman, but there is, perhaps, little flattery in saying that a beauteous creature is beautiful. The song addressed to the young lady them imagine you still nearer perfection than you really are.

Poets, Madam, of all mankind, feel most forcibly the powers of BEAUTY ; as, if they are really POETS of nature's making, their feelings must be finer, and their taste more delicate than most of the world. In the cheerful bloom of SPRING, or the pensive mildness of AUTUMN ; the grandeur of SUMMER, or the hoary majesty of WINTER ; the poet feels a charm unknown to the rest of his species. Even the sight of a fine flower, or the company of a fine woman—(by far the finest part of God's works below), have sensations for the poetic heart that the HERD of man are strangers to.—On this last account, Madam, I am, as in many other things, indebted to Mr. Hamilton's kindness in introducing me to you. Your lovers may view you with a wish, I look on you with pleasure ; their hearts, in your presence, may glow with desire, mine rises with admiration.

That the arrows of misfortune, however they should, as incident to humanity, glance a slight wound, may never reach your heart—that the snares of villany may never beset you in the road of life—that INNOCENCE may hand you by the path of HONOUR to the dwelling of PEACE, is the sincere wish of him who has the honour to be, &c.

R. B.†

No. CCXXXV.

TO MISS CRAIK.†

Dumfries, August, 1793.

MADAM :

SOME rather unlooked-for accidents have prevented my doing myself the honour of a has not been named. Miss Kennedy claimed relationship with the Hamiltons of Mossiel.—CUNNINGHAM.]

The above letter, which originally appeared in Cromek's Reliques, has been hitherto classed among those written in 1793, but from the following extract of an original letter to Gavin Hamilton, Esq., dated Edinburgh, March 8th, 1787, now published exclusively in the present Edition, a much earlier date is assigned to it.

"My two songs on Miss W. Alexander,* and Miss P. Kennedy† were tried yesterday by a jury of literati, and found defamatory libels against the fastidious powers of Poesy and Taste ; and the Author forbid to print them under pain of forfeiture of character. I cannot help almost shedding a tear to the memory of two songs that had cost me some pains, and that I valued a good deal, but I must submit."

Again in the same letter, he adds:—

"My poor unfortunate songs come again across my memory—D—in the pedant, frigid soul of Criticism for ever and ever !"

‡ [Miss Helen Craik, of Arbigland, had merit both as a poetess and novelist : her ballads may be compared with those of Maeneil, and her novels, amid much graphic force, had a seasoning of the satiric, which rendered them acceptable to all who understood their allusions. She died some years ago at Allonby : she was much of an enthusiast, and lived estranged from her family for a long period of her life.

* [The Lass o' Ballochmyle. † The Banks of Doon.]

second visit to Arbigland, as I was so hospitably invited, and so positively meant to have done. However, I still hope to have that pleasure before the busy months of harvest begin.

I enclose you two of my late pieces, as some kind of return for the pleasure I have received in perusing a certain MS. volume of poems in the possession of Captain Riddel. To repay one with an old song, is a proverb, whose force, you, Madam, I know, will not allow. What is said of illustrious descent is, I believe, equally true of a talent for poetry, none ever despised it who had pretensions to it. The fates and characters of the rhyming tribe often employ my thoughts when I am disposed to be melancholy. There is not, among all the martyrologies that ever were penned, so rueful a narrative as the lives of the poets.—In the comparative view of wretches, the criterion is not what they are doomed to suffer, but how they are formed to bear. Take a being of our kind; give him a stronger imagination and a more delicate sensibility,—which, between them, will ever engender a more ungovernable set of passions than are the usual lot of man; implant in him an irresistible impulse to some idle vagary, such as arranging wild flowers in fantastical nosegays, tracing the grasshopper to his haunt by his chirping song, watching the frisks of the little minnows in the sunny pool, or hunting after the intrigues of butterflies—in short, send him adrift after some pursuit which shall eternally mislead him from the paths of lucre, and yet curse him with a keener relish than any man living for the pleasures that lucre can purchase; lastly, fill up the measure of his woes by bestowing on him a spurning sense of his own dignity, and you have created a wight nearly as miserable as a poet. To you, Madam, I need not recount the fairy pleasures the muse bestows to counterbalance this catalogue of evils. Bewitching poetry is like bewitching woman; she has in all ages been accused of misleading mankind from the councils of wisdom and the paths of prudence, involving them in difficulties, baiting them with poverty, branding them with infamy, and plunging them in the whirling vortex of ruin; yet, where is the man but most own that all our happiness on earth is not worthy the name—that even the holy hermit's solitary prospect of paradisiacal bliss is but the glitter of a northern sun, rising over a frozen region, compared with the many pleasures, the nameless raptures that we owe to the lovely Queen of the heart of Man!

R. B.

No. CCXXXVI.

TO LADY GLENCAIRN.*

MY LADY:

THE honour you have done your poor poet, in writing him so very obliging a letter, and the pleasure the enclosed beautiful verses have given him, came very seasonably to his aid amid the cheerless gloom and sinking despondency of diseased nerves and December weather. As to forgetting the family of Glencairn, Heaven is my witness with what sincerity I could use those old verses which please me more in their rude simplicity than the most elegant lines I ever saw:—

If thee, Jerusalem, I forget,
Skill part from my right hand.

My tongue to my mouth's roof let cleave,
If I do thee forget,
Jerusalem, and thee above
My chief joy do not set.—

When I am tempted to do anything improper, I dare not, because I look on myself as accountable to your ladyship and family. Now and then, when I have the honour to be called to the tables of the great, if I happen to meet with any mortification from the stately stupidity of self-sufficient squires, or the luxurious insolence of upstart nabobs, I get above the creatures by calling to remembrance that I am patronized by the Noble House of Glencairn; and at gala-times, such as New-year's day, a christening, or the Kirm-night, when my punch-bowl is brought from its dusty corner and filled up in honour of the occasion, I begin with,—The Countess of Glencairn! My good woman, with the enthusiasm of a grateful heart, next cries, My Lord! and so the toast goes on until I end with Lady Harriet's little angel, † whose epithalamium I have pledged myself to write.

Miss Craik's father was one of the wisest gentlemen and most sensible improvers of property on the Scottish side of the Solway: his taste, too, in architecture, was of a pure kind; he lived to a good old age, and had the misfortune to witness with his own eyes the melancholy death of his only son. The heir of Arbigland, accompanied by some sixteen young men of the parish, set off one summer morning in his pleasure skiff, to pay a visit to the English shore; when more than half-way over the Solway, a whirlwind suddenly arose, seized the sails, whirled the skiff around, and down it went with all on board—though a vessel was near, not a soul was saved. The wretched father saw all this from a seat on the top of the house; after the skiff sank, he sat still for an hour, looking fixedly, it is said, on the sea. Arbigland is now the property of his grandson, Douglas Hamilton Craik, Esq. The situation on the Solway side is beautiful: the house is a model of proportion and elegant workmanship; the woods, which partly enclose it, are very lofty, and some of the firs of the spruce tribe are of enormous girth. Burns was a frequent visitor here; nor has the ancient hospitality of the house of Craik declined, nor its love of literature.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [Widow of William, thirteenth Earl of Glencairn, and mother of the patron of Burns.]

† [Lady Harriet Don was the daughter of Lady Glencairn. Her child was the late accomplished Sir Alexander Don, of Newton Don, Bart., whose widow is married to Sir James Maxwell Wallace, the only surviving brother of Robert Wallace, of Kelly, Esq., M. P. for Greenock. See note to Burns's Ode of "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," p. 476.]

When I received your ladyship's letter, I was just in the act of transcribing for you some verses I have lately composed; and meant to have sent them my first leisure hour, and acquainted you with my late change of life. I mentioned to my lord my fears concerning my farm. Those fears were indeed too true; it is a bargain would have ruined me, but for the lucky circumstance of my having an Excise commission.

People may talk as they please of the ignominy of the Excise; fifty pounds a year will support my wife and children, and keep me independent of the world; and I would much rather have it said that my profession borrowed credit from me than that I borrowed credit from my profession. Another advantage I have in this business, is the knowledge it gives me of the various shades of human character, consequently assisting me vastly in my poetic pursuits. I had the most ardent enthusiasm for the muses when nobody knew me, but myself, and that ardour is by no means cooled now that my lord Glencairn's goodness has introduced me to all the world. Not that I am in haste for the press. I have no idea of publishing, else I certainly had consulted my noble generous patron; but after acting the part of an honest man, and supporting my family, my whole wishes and views are directed to poetic pursuits. I am aware that though I were to give performances to the world superior to my former works, still, if they were of the same kind with those, the comparative reception they would meet with would mortify me. I have turned my thoughts on the drama. I do not mean the stately buskin of the tragic muse.

* * * *

Does not your ladyship think that an Edinburgh theatre would be more amused with affectation, folly, and whim of true Scottish growth, than manners, which by far the greatest part of the audience can only know at second hand?

I have the honour to be,
Your ladyship's ever devoted and grateful humble servant,
R. B.

No. CCXXXVII.

TO JOHN M'URDO, Esq.*

Dumfries, December, 1793.

SIR,

IT is said that we take the greatest liberties with our greatest friends, and I pay myself a very high compliment in the manner in which I am going to apply the remark. I have owed you money longer than ever I owed it to any man.—Here is Ker's account, and here are six guineas; and now, I don't owe a shilling to man—nor woman either. But for these damned dirty, dog's-ear'd little pages,* I had done myself the honour to have waited on you long ago. Independent of the obligations your hospitality has laid me under; the consciousness of your superiority in the rank of man and gentleman, of itself was fully as much as I could ever make head against; but to owe you money, too, was more than I could face.

I think I once mentioned something of a collection of Scots songs I have for some years been making: I send you a perusal of what I have got together. I could not conveniently spare them above five or six days, and five or six glances of them will probably more than suffice you. A very few of them are my own. When you are tired of them, please leave them with Mr. Clint, of the King's Arms. There is not another copy of the collection in the world; and I should be sorry that any unfortunate negligence should deprive me of what has cost me a good deal of pains.†

R. B.

No. CCXXXVIII.

TO JOHN M'URDO, Esq.,

DRUMLANRIG.

Dumfries, 1793.

WILL Mr. M'Urdo do me the favour to accept of these volumes; a trifling but sincere mark of the very high respect I bear for his worth as a man, his manners as a gentleman, and his kindness as a friend. However inferior, now, or afterwards, I may rank as a poet; one honest virtue to which few poets can pretend, I trust I shall ever claim as mine:—to no man, whatever his station in life, or his power to serve me, have I ever paid a compliment at the expense of TRUTH.‡

THE AUTHOR.

* [Scottish Bank Notes.]

† [The collection of songs mentioned in this letter are not unknown to the curious in such loose lore. They were printed by an obscure bookseller when death had secured him against the indignation of Burns. It was of such compositions that the Poet thus entreated the world—"The author begs whoever into whose hands they may fall, that they will do him the justice not to publish what he himself thought proper to suppress."‡]

‡ [These words are written on the blank leaf of the poet's works, published in two small volumes in 1793: the handwriting is bold and free—the pen seems to have been conscious that it was making a declaration of independence. —CUNNINGHAM.]

No. CCXXXIX.

TO CAPTAIN ———.*

Dumfries, 5th December, 1793.

SIR,

HEATED AS I was with wine yesternight, I was perhaps rather seemingly impertinent in my anxious wish to be honoured with your acquaintance. You will forgive it: it was the impulse of heart-felt respect. "He is the father of the Scottish county reform, and is a man who does honour to the business at the same time that the business does honour to him," said my worthy friend Glenriddel to somebody by me who was talking of your coming to this country with your corps. "Then," I said, "I have a woman's longing to take him by the hand, and say to him, 'Sir, I honour you as a man to whom the interests of humanity are dear, and as a patriot to whom the rights of your country are sacred.'"

In times like these, Sir, when our commoners are barely able, by the glimmer of their own twilight understandings, to scrawl a frank, and when lords are what gentlemen would be ashamed to be, to whom shall a sinking country call for help? To the independent country gentleman. To him who has too deep a stake in his country not to be in earnest for her welfare; and who in the honest pride of man can view with equal contempt the insolence of office and the allurements of corruption.

I mentioned to you a Scots ode or song I had lately composed, and which I think has some merit. Allow me to enclose it. When I fall in with you at the theatre, I shall be glad to have your opinion of it. Accept of it, Sir, as a very humble, but most sincere, tribute of respect from a man who, dear as he prizes poetic fame, yet holds dearer an independent mind. I have the honour to be,†

R. B.

No. CCXLI.

TO MRS. RIDDEL,†

WHO WAS ABOUT TO BESPEAK A PLAY ONE EVENING AT THE DUMFRIES THEATRE.

I AM thinking to send my "Address" to some periodical publication, but it has not got your sanction, so pray look over it.

* [Not unlikely Captain Robertson, of Lude.—CHAMBERS.]

† [This excellent letter originally appeared in Mr. Robert Chambers's interesting collection of Scottish songs. He obtained it from Mr. Stewart, of Dalguise, and employed it, as has already been done in this edition, to illustrate that glorious war ode,

"SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLEED."]

As to the Tuesday's play, let me beg of you, my dear Madam, to give us, "The Wonder, a Woman keeps a Secret!" to which please add, "The Spoilt Child"—you will highly oblige me by so doing.

Ah, what an enviable creature you are! There now, this cursed gloomy blue-devil day, you are going to a party of choice spirits—

"To play the shapes
Of frolic fancy, and incessant form
Those rapid pictures, assembled train
Of fleet ideas, never join'd before,
Where lively wit excites to gay surprise;
Or folly-painting humour, grave himself,
Calls laughter forth, deep-shaking every nerve."

But as you rejoice with them that do rejoice, do also remember to weep with them that weep, and pity your melancholy friend,

R. B.

No. CCXLI.

TO A LADY,

IN FAVOUR OF A PLAYER'S BENEFIT.

MADAM,

Dumfries, 1794.

YOU were so very good as to promise me to honour my friend with your presence on his benefit night. That night is fixed for Friday first: the play a most interesting one! "The Way to Keep Him." I have the pleasure to know Mr. G. well. His merit as an actor is generally acknowledged. He has genius and worth which would do honour to patronage: he is a poor and modest man; claims which from their very silence have the more forcible power on the generous heart. Alas, for pity! that from the indolence of those who have the good things of this life in their gift, too often does brazen-fronted impertunity snatch that boon, the rightful due of retiring, humble want! Of all the qualities we assign to the Author and Director of Nature, by far the most enviable is—to be able "To wipe away all tears from all eyes." O what insignificant, sordid wretches are they, however chance may have loaded them with wealth, who go to their graves, to their magnificent mausoleums, with hardly the consciousness of having made one poor honest heart happy!

But I crave your pardon, Madam; I came to beg, not to preach.

R. B.

† [This lady, to whom the bard has so happily and justly applied the above quotation, paid the debt of nature a few months ago. The graces of her person were only equalled by the singular endowments of her mind, and her poetical talents rendered her an interesting friend to Burns, in a part of the world where he was in a great measure excluded from the sweet intercourse of literary society. GILBERT BURNS, 1820.]

No. CCXLII.

TO THE EARL OF BUCHAN,

WITH A COPY OF BRUCE'S ADDRESS TO HIS TROOPS AT BANNOCKBURN.Dumfries, 12th January, 1794.

MY LORD,

WILL your lordship allow me to present you with the enclosed little composition of mine, as a small tribute of gratitude for the acquaintance with which you have been pleased to honour me? Independent of my enthusiasm as a Scotsman, I have rarely met with any thing in history which interests my feelings as a man equal with the story of Bannockburn. On the one hand, a cruel, but able, usurper, leading on the finest army in Europe to extinguish the last spark of freedom among a greatly-daring and greatly-injured people; on the other hand, the desperate relics of a gallant nation devoting themselves to rescue their bleeding country, or perish with her.

Liberty! thou art a prize truly and indeed invaluable! for never canst thou be too dearly bought!

If my little ode has the honour of your lordship's approbation, it will gratify my highest ambition.

I have the honour to be, &c.

R. B.

No. CCXLIII.

TO MRS. RIDDEL.*

DEAR MADAM,

I MEANT to have called on you yesternight, but as I edged up to your box-door, the first object which greeted my view was one of those lobster-coated puppies, sitting like another dragon, guarding the Hesperian fruit. On the conditions and capitulations you so obligingly offer, I shall certainly make my weather-beaten rustic pliz a part of your box-furniture on Tuesday; when we may arrange the business of the visit.

Among the profusion of idle compliments, which insidious craft, or unmeaning folly, incessantly offer at your shrine—a shrine, how far exalted above such adoration—permit me, were it but for rarity's sake, to pay you the honest tribute of a warm heart and an independent mind; and to assure you, that I am, thou most amiable, and most accomplished of

* [The following five letters to Mrs. Riddel, and those marked 257-8, evidently relate to the Poet's quarrel with that lady; but, being without date, Dr. Currie has inextricably thy sex, with the most respectful esteem, and fervent regard, thine, &c.

R. B.

No. CCXLIV.

TO THE SAME.

I WILL wait on you, my ever valued friend, but whether in the morning I am not sure. Sunday closes a period of our curst revenue business, and may probably keep me employed with my pen until noon. Fine employment for a poet's pen! There is a species of the human genus that I call the gin-horse class: what enviable dogs they are! Round, and round, and round they go,—Mundell's ox, that drives his cotton mill, is their exact prototype—without an idea or wish beyond their circle; fat, sleek, stupid, patient, quiet, and contented; while here I sit, altogether Novemberish, a d—d melange of fretfulness and melancholy; not enough of the one to rouse me to passion, nor of the other to repose me in torpor; my soul flouncing and fluttering round her tenement, like a wild finch, caught amid the horrors of winter, and newly thrust into a cage. Well, I am persuaded that it was of me the Hebrew sage prophesied, when he foretold—“And behold, on whatsoever this man doth set his heart, it shall not prosper!” If my resentment is awaked, it is sure to be where it dare not squeak; and if— * * *

Pray that wisdom and bliss be more frequent visitors of

R. B.

No. CCXLV.

TO THE SAME.

I HAVE this moment got the song from Syme, and I am sorry to see that he has spoilt it a good deal. It shall be a lesson to me how I lend him any thing again.

I have sent you “Werter,” truly happy to have any the smallest opportunity of obliging you.

'Tis true, Madam, I saw you once since I was at Woodlee; and that once froze the very life-blood of my heart. Your reception of me was such that a wretch meeting the eye of his judge, about to pronounce sentence of death on him, could only have envied my feelings and situation. But I hate the theme, and never more shall write or speak on it.

One thing I shall proudly say, that I can confused them. Probably No. 257 should be printed first, and the rest after an interval, as well as in a different arrangement.—CHAMBERS.]

pay Mrs. R. a higher tribute of esteem, and appreciate her amiable worth more truly, than any man whom I have seen approach her.

R. B.

No. CCXLVI.

TO THE SAME.

I HAVE often told you, my dear friend, that you had a spice of caprice in your composition, and you have as often disavowed it; even perhaps while your opinions were, at the moment, irrefragably proving it. Could any thing estrange me from a friend such as you?—No! To-morrow I shall have the honour of waiting on you.

Farewell, thou first of friends, and most accomplished of women; even with all thy little caprices!*

R. B.

No. CCXLVII.

TO THE SAME.

MADAM,

I RETURN your common-place book. I have perused it with much pleasure, and would have continued my criticisms, but, as it seems the critic has forfeited your esteem, his strictures must lose their value.

If it is true that "offences come only from the heart," before you I am guiltless. To admire, esteem, and prize you, as the most accomplished of women, and the first of friends—if these are crimes, I am the most offending thing alive.

In a face where I used to meet the kind complacency of friendly confidence, now to find cold neglect, and contemptuous scorn—is a wrench that my heart can ill bear. It is, however, some kind of miserable good luck, that while de haut-en-bas rigour may depress an offending wretch to the ground, it has a tendency to rouse a stubborn something in his bosom which, though it cannot heal the

* [Beauty is sometimes a little whimsical, and it is said that Mrs. Riddell gave the bard the full benefit of the "caprice" which he persists in saying was a part of her composition. She was no less sensible of his imperfections, but then she did not shut her eyes as many did on his high qualities, and chronicle nothing in her memory but that he was always

"Craz'd wi' love or daiz'd wi' drink."

CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The offended lady, soothed by this submissive letter, re-admitted the bard to her friendship. He found her, in the words of another minstrel,

"Forgiving all and good."

The language in which Burns commonly indulged, even in mixed companies, was racy and vigorous, scaring minds of small calibre, and giving occasion to the sensitive and the delicate to lament that he had not got his masculine intrepidity of speech tamed down by education and polished company.—CUNNINGHAM.]

wounds of his soul, is at least an opiate to blunt their poignancy.

With the profoundest respect for your abilities; the most sincere esteem, and ardent regard for your gentle heart and amiable manners; and the most fervent wish and prayer for your welfare, peace, and bliss, I have the honour to be, Madam, your most devoted humble servant,

R. B.†

No. CCXLVIII.

TO JOHN SYME, Esq.‡

You know that, among other high dignities, you have the honour to be my supreme court of critical judicature, from which there is no appeal. I enclose you a song which I composed since I saw you, and I am going to give you the history of it. Do you know that among much that I admire in the characters and manners of those great folks whom I have now the honour to call my acquaintances, the Oswald family, there is nothing charms me more than Mr. Oswald's unconcealable attachment to that incomparable woman. Did you ever, my dear Syme, meet with a man who owed more to the Divine Giver of all good things than Mr. O.? A fine fortune; a pleasing exterior; self-evident amiable dispositions, and an ingenuous upright mind, and that informed, too, much beyond the usual run of young fellows of his rank and fortune: and to all this, such a woman!—but of her I shall say nothing at all, in despair of saying any thing adequate: in my song, I have endeavoured to do justice to what would be his feelings, on seeing, in the scene I have drawn, the habitation of his Lucy. As I am a good deal pleased with my performance, I in my first fervour thought of sending it to Mrs. Oswald, but on second thoughts, perhaps what I offer as the honest incense of genuine respect might, from the well-known character of poverty and poetry, be construed into some modification or other of that servility which my soul abhors.§

R. B.

‡ [This gentleman held the office of distributor of stamps at Dumfries. Burns, who at first lived in the floor above his office, formed an intimacy with him, which lasted till the death of the poet. Mr. Syme was an agreeable table companion, and possessed considerable wit, the effusions of which were sometimes mistaken for Burns's. He died at his house of Ryedale, near Dumfries, November 24, 1831, in his seventy-seventh year.]

§ [The song enclosed was that fine one beginning, composed on Mrs. Oswald, of Auchencruive.—See page 424.

'O wat ye wha's in yon town,'

The oral communications of the poet with his friend John Syme were numerous; not so his communications with the pen: they were for some years near neighbours, and intercourse by letter was unnecessary. In one of Cunningham's letters he says to Burns, "I lately received a letter from our friend Barncallie—what a charming fellow lost to society—born to great expectations—with superior abilities, a pure heart and untainted morals; his fate in life has been hard in-

No. CCXLIX.

TO Miss —.

MADAM,

Dumfries, 1794.

Nothing short of a kind of absolute necessity could have made me trouble you with this letter. Except my ardent and just esteem for your sense, taste, and worth, every sentiment arising in my breast, as I put pen to paper to you, is painful. The scenes I have passed with the friend of my soul and his amiable connexions! the wretch at my heart to think that he is gone, for ever gone from me, never more to meet in the wanderings of a weary world! and the cutting reflection of all, that I had most unfortunately, though most undeservedly, lost the confidence of that soul of worth, ere it took its flight!

These, Madam, are sensations of no ordinary anguish.—However, you also may be offended with some imputed improprieties of mine; sensibility you know I possess, and sincerity none will deny me.

To oppose these prejudices, which have been raised against me, is not the business of this letter. Indeed it is a warfare I know not how to wage. The powers of positive vice I can in some degree calculate, and against direct malevolence I can be on my guard; but who can estimate the fatuity of giddy caprice, or ward off the unthinking mischief of precipitate folly?

I have a favour to request of you, Madam; and of your sister, Mrs. —, through your means. You know that, at the wish of my late friend, I made a collection of all my trifles in verse which I had ever written. They are many of them local, some of them puerile and silly, and all of them unfit for the public eye. As I have some little fame at stake—a fame that I trust may live when the hate of those who “watch for my halting,” and the contumelious sneer of those whom accident has made my superiors, will, with themselves, be gone to the regions of oblivion—I am uneasy now for the fate of those manuscripts—Will Mrs. — have the goodness to destroy them, or return them to me? As a pledge of friendship they were bestowed; and that circumstance indeed was all their merit. Most unhappily for me, that merit they no longer possess; and I hope that Mrs. —’s goodness, which I well know, and ever will revere, will not refuse this favour to a man whom she once held in some degree of estimation.*

deed.” It was the fate of Syme to lose the estate of Barn-callie in Galloway, which passed from the family at his father’s death. Of his talents something has already been said; he was one of the most agreeable men in company that ever did honour to a toast—he was celebrated too for his wit, his wine, and his dinners; some of his epigrams were imputed to Burns. His wife, a very handsome woman, was a most affectionate mother—her chief pleasure lay in seeing

With the sincerest esteem, I have the honour to be, Madam, &c.

R. B.

No. CCL.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

26th February, 1794.

CANST thou minister to a mind diseased? Canst thou speak peace and rest to a soul tost on a sea of troubles, without one friendly star to guide her course, and dreading that the next surge may overwhelm her? Canst thou give to a frame, tremblingly alive as the tortures of suspense, the stability and hardihood of the rock that braves the blast? If thou canst not do the least of these, why wouldst thou disturb me in my miseries, with thy inquiries after me?

* * * *

For these two months I have not been able to lift a pen. My constitution and frame were, ab origine, blasted with a deep incurable taint of hypochondria, which poisons my existence. Of late a number of domestic vexations, and some pecuniary share in the ruin of these cursed times—losses which, though trifling, were yet what I could ill bear—have so irritated me that my feelings at times could not be envied by a reprobate spirit listening to the sentence that dooms it to perdition.

Are you deep in the language of consolation? I have exhausted in reflection every topic of comfort. A heart at ease would have been charmed with my sentiments and reasonings; but as to myself, I was like Judas Iscariot preaching the gospel; he might melt and mould the hearts of those around him, but his own kept its native incorrigibility.

Still there are two great pillars that bear us up, amid the wreck of misfortune and misery. The ONE is composed of the different modifications of a certain noble, stubborn something in man, known by the names of courage, fortitude, magnanimity. The OTHER is made up of those feelings and sentiments which, however the sceptic may deny them, or the enthusiast disfigure them, are yet, I am convinced, original and component parts of the human soul; those senses of the mind—if I may be allowed the expression—which connect us with, and link us to, those awful obscure realities—an all-powerful, and equally beneficent God; and a world to come, beyond death and the grave. The first gives the nerve of combat, while a ray of hope beams on the field: the her children healthy and her husband happy.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [Burns, on several occasions, recalled both his letters and verses when on reflection he thought he had been too communicative and confiding. It is to be regretted that rhymes overwarm, and letters too open and out-spoken, should have found their way to the world.]

last pours the balm of comfort into the wounds which time can never cure.*

I do not remember, my dear Cunningham, that you and I ever talked on the subject of religion at all. I know some who laugh at it, as the trick of the crafty FEW, to lead the undiscerning MANY; or at the most as an uncertain obscurity, which mankind can never know any thing of, and with which they are fools if they give themselves much to do. Nor would I quarrel with a man for his irreligion, any more than I would for his want of a musical ear. I would regret that he was shut out from what, to me and to others, were such superlative sources of enjoyment. It is in this point of view, and for this reason, that I will deeply imbue the mind of every child of mine with religion. If my son should happen to be a man of feeling, sentiment, and taste, I shall thus add largely to his enjoyments. Let me flatter myself that this sweet little fellow, who is just now running about my desk, will be a man of a melting, ardent, glowing heart; and an imagination, delighted with the painter, and rapt with the poet. Let me figure him wandering out in a sweet evening, to inhale the balmy gales, and enjoy the growing luxuriance of the spring; himself the while in the blooming youth of life. He looks abroad on all nature, and through nature up to nature's God. His soul, by swift, delighting degrees, is rapt above this sublunary sphere until he can be silent no longer, and bursts out into the glorious enthusiasm of Thomson—

“These, as they change, Almighty Father, these Are but the varied God.—The rolling year
Is full of thee;”—

and so on, in all the spirit and ardour of that charming hymn. These are no ideal pleasures, they are real delights; and I ask, what of the delights among the sons of men are superior, not to say equal, to them? And they have this precious, vast addition—that conscious virtue stamps them for her own; and lays hold on them to bring herself into the presence of a witnessing, judging, and approving God. R. B.

No. CCLI.

TO THE EARL OF GLENCAIRN.

May, 1794.

MY LORD:

WHEN you cast your eye on the name at the bottom of this letter, and on the title-page of

* [The religious enthusiasm of Burns was reasonable and practical; he was no believer in the efficacy of faith without works, and regarded all claims to devotion which were not founded on the charities of life with suspicion. That he had his moments of doubt and fear is true; he had too much knowledge to be presumptuous.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [The original of the above letter is in the possession of the Honourable Mrs. Holland, of Poyning's. From a memorandum on the back, it appears to have been written in May, 1794.]

the book I do myself the honour to send your lordship, a more pleasurable feeling than my vanity tells me that it must be a name not entirely unknown to you. The generous patronage of your late illustrious brother found me in the lowest obscurity: he introduced my rustic muse to the partiality of my country; and to him I owe all. My sense of his goodness, and the anguish of my soul at losing my truly noble protector and friend, I have endeavoured to express in a poem to his memory, which I have now published. This edition is just from the press; and in my gratitude to the dead, and my respect for the living (fame belies you, my lord, if you possess not the same dignity of man which was your noble brother's characteristic feature), I had destined a copy for the Earl of Glencairn. I learnt just now that you are in town:—allow me to present it you.

I know, my lord, such is the vile, venal contagion which pervades the world of letters, that professions of respect from an author, particularly from a poet, to a lord, are more than suspicious. I claim my by-past conduct, and my feelings at this moment, as exceptions to the too just conclusion. Exalted as are the honours of your lordship's name, and unnoted as is the obscurity of mine; with the uprightness of an honest man, I come before your lordship, with an offering, however humble—'tis all I have to give—of my grateful respect; and to beg of you, my lord,—'tis all I have to ask of you—that you will do me the honour to accept of it.†

I have the honour to be,

R. B.

No. CCLII.

TO DAVID MACCULLOCH, Esq.‡

MY DEAR SIR, Dumfries, 21st June, 1794.

My long projected journey through your country is at last fixed: and on Wednesday next, if you have nothing of more importance to do, take a saunter down to Gatehouse about two or three o'clock, I shall be happy to take a draught of M'Kune's best with you. Collector Syme will be at Glens about that time, and will meet us about dish-of-tea hour. Syme goes also to Kerroughtree, and let me remind you of your kind promise to accompany me there; I will need all the friends I can muster, for I am indeed ill at ease whenever I approach your honourables and right honourables.

Yours, sincerely, R. B.§

‡ [Now deceased. A sister of this gentleman became the wife of Mr. Thomas Scott, brother of Sir Walter Scott, Bart.]

§ [The endorsement on the back of the original letter shows what is felt about Burns in far distant lands.

“Given to me by David M'Culloch, Penang, 1801.

A. FRASER.”

“Received 15th December, 1823, in Calcutta, from Captain Fraser's widow by me, Thomas Rankine.”

“Transmitted to Archibald Hastie, Esq., London; March 27th, 1824, from Bombay.”]

No. CCLIII.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Castle Douglas, 25th June, 1794.

HERE, in a solitary inn, in a solitary village, am I set by myself, to amuse my brooding fancy as I may.—Solitary confinement, you know, is Howard's favourite idea of reclaiming sinners; so let me consider by what fatality it happens that I have so long been so exceeding sinful as to neglect the correspondence of the most valued friend I have on earth. To tell you that I have been in poor health will not be excuse enough, though it is true. I am afraid that I am about to suffer for the follies of my youth. My medical friends threaten me with a flying gout; but I trust they are mistaken.

I am just going to trouble your critical patience with the first sketch of a stanza I have been framing as I passed along the road. The subject is Liberty: you know, my honoured friend, how dear the theme is to me. I design it as an irregular ode for General Washington's birth-day. After having mentioned the degeneracy of other kingdoms, I come to Scotland thus:

* [The stature of Wallace is asserted by all his historians to have been remarkably large, and his strength extraordinary. Hollinshed says, he was "a young gentleman of so huge a stature and notable strength of body, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and of such hardiness in attempting all manner of exploits, that his match was not any where lightly to be found." The Minstrel describes him thus:

*Wallace statur off gretnes and of hycht,
Was jugyt thus, be discretion off rycht,
That saw him, baith in dissembl¹ and weid; ²
Nyne quarters³ large he was, in length, indeid:
Thryd part in schuldrys braid was he,
Rycht semly, strong, and lusty, for to see:
Bowand⁴ bron haryt, on brow and breis lycht;
Clear aspre⁵ eyne, like to the diamonds brycht;
Under the chin, on the left side, was seyne
Be hurt a wain; his colour was sanguine;
Wounds he had, in many divers place;
But fair, and weil kept was his face.*

There is an anecdote in confirmation of the uncommon strength ascribed to Wallace, related by Hector Boeis. It is curious, as it affords an example of longevity, not unsimilar to that of the Irish Countess of Desmond, who attained to a still more advanced age.

The date is 1430. At that time James I. was in Perth, and perhaps having heard Henry the Minstrel recite some of Wallace's exploits, he found his curiosity excited to visit a noble lady of great age, who was able to inform him of many ancient matters.

She lived in the Castle of Kinnoul, on the opposite side of the river, and was probably a widow of one of the Lords of Erskine, a branch of whose family continued to be denominated from the barony of Kinnoul, till about the year 1440.

"In consequence of her extreme old age, she had lost her sight; but all her other senses were entire, and her body was yet firm and lively. She had seen Sir William Wallace, and King Robert Bruce, and frequently told particulars concerning them.

"The king, who entertained a love and veneration for greatness, resolved to visit the old lady, that he might hear her describe the manners and strength of the two heroes, who were admired in his time, as they now are in ours. He

¹ Undress. ² Dressed. ³ Six feet nine inches.
⁴ Curled. ⁵ Sharp.

"Thee, Caledonia, thy wild heaths among,
Thee, fam'd for martial deed and sacred song,
To thee I turn with swimming eyes;
Where is that soul of Freedom fled?
Immingled with the mighty dead!
Beneath the hallow'd turf where Wallace lies!
Hear it not, Wallace, in thy bed of death!
Ye babbling winds in silence sweep,
Disturb not ye the hero's sleep."

with the additions of

"That arm which, nerv'd with thundering fate, Brav'd usurpation's boldest daring!*"
One quench'd in darkness, like the sinking star,
And one the palsied arm of tottering, powerless age."

See Fragment on LIBERTY, page 317.

You will probably have another scrawl from me in a stage or two. R. B.

No. CCCLV.

TO MR. JAMES JOHNSON.

MY DEAR FRIEND, Dumfries, 1794.

You should have heard from me long ago; but over and above some vexatious share in the therefore sent a message, acquainting her that he intended to visit her the next day.

"She received the message gratefully, and gave immediate orders to her handmaids to prepare every thing for his reception in the best manner; particularly that they should display her pieces of tapestry, some of which were uncommonly rich and beautiful.

"All her servants became busily employed, for their work was in some degree unusual, as she had not for a long time been accustomed to receive princely visitors.

"The next day, when told that the king was approaching, she went down into the hall of her Castle, dressed with as much elegance and finery as her old age, and the fashion of the time, would permit; attended by a train of matrons, many of whom were her own descendants; of which number, some appeared much more altered and disguised by age than she herself was.

"One of her matrons having informed her that the king was entering the hall, she arose from her seat and advanced to meet him so easily and gracefully that he doubted of her being wholly blind. At his desire she embraced and kissed him.

"Her attendant assured him she was wholly blind, but that from long custom she had acquired these easy movements.

"He took her by the hand and sat down, desiring her to sit on the seat next to him. And then, in a long conference, he interrogated her about ancient matters.

"He was much delighted with her conversation: among other things, he asked her to tell him what sort of a man Sir William Wallace was. What was his personal figure? What his courage? and with what degree of strength he was endowed?—He put the same questions to her concerning King Robert Bruce.

"Robert," said she, "was a man beautiful, and of a fine appearance. His strength was so great that he could easily have overcome any mortal man of his time. But in so far as he excelled other men, he was excelled by Wallace, both in stature and in bodily strength: for in wrestling Wallace could have overcome two such men as Robert was."

"The king made some enquiries concerning his own immediate parents, and his other ancestors; and having heard her relate many things, he returned to Perth well pleased with the visit he had made."—BOETH. HIST. l. xvii.

This lady could not have been less than one hundred and thirty years old at the time mentioned. The Countess of Desmond alluded to was one hundred and forty at the period of her death. — ROBERTSON'S HISTORY OF RENFREWSHIRE.]

pecuniary losses of these accursed times, I have all this winter been plagued with low spirits and blue devils, so that I have almost hung my harp on the willow trees.

I am just now busy correcting a new edition of my poems, and this, with my ordinary business, finds me in full employment.

I send you by my friend, Mr. Wallace, forty-one songs for your fifth volume; if we cannot finish in any other way, what would you think of Scots words to some beautiful Irish airs? In the mean time, at your leisure, give a copy of the Museum to my worthy friend, Mr. Peter Hill, Bookseller, to bind for me, interleaved with blank leaves, exactly as he did the Laird of Glenriddel's, that I may insert every anecdote I can learn, together with my own criticisms and remarks on the songs. A copy of this kind I shall leave with you, the editor, to publish at some after period, by way of making the Museum a book famous to the end of time, and you renowned for ever.*

I have got a Highland Dirk, for which I have great veneration; and it once was the dirk of Lord Balmerino. It fell into bad hands, who stripped it of the silver mounting, as well as the knife and fork. I have some thoughts of sending it to your care, to get it mounted anew.

Thank you for the copies of my Volunteer Ballad.—Our friend Clarke has done indeed well! 'tis chaste and beautiful. I have not met with any thing that has pleased me so much. You know I am no Connoisseur: but that I am an Amateur—will be allowed me.

R. B.

 No. CCLV.

TO PETER MILLER, JUN., ESQ.

OF DALSWINTON.

Dumfries, Nov. 1794.

DEAR SIR:

YOUR offer is indeed truly generous, and most sincerely do I thank you for it; but, in my present situation, I find that I dare not accept it. You well know my political sentiments; and were I an insular individual, unconnected with a wife and family of children, with the most fervid enthusiasm I would have volunteered my services: I then could and would have despised all consequences that might have ensued.

My prospect in the Excise is something; at least, it is, encumbered as I am with the welfare, the very existence, of near half-a-score of helpless individuals, what I dare not sport with.

In the mean time, they are most welcome to my Ode; only, let them insert it as a thing they have met with by accident and unknown to me.—Nay, if Mr. Perry, whose honour, after your character of him I cannot doubt; if he will give me an address and channel by which any thing will come safe from those spies with which he may be certain that his correspondence is beset, I will now and then send him a bagatelle that I may write. In the present hurry of Europe, nothing but news and politics will be regarded; but against the days of peace, which Heaven send soon, my little assistance may perhaps fill up an idle column of a newspaper. I have long had it in my head to try my hand in the way of little prose essays, which I propose sending into the world through the medium of some newspaper; and should these be worth his while, to these Mr. Perry shall be welcome; and all my reward shall be his treating me with his paper, which, by the bye, to any body who has the least relish for wit, is a high treat indeed. †

With the most grateful esteem, I am ever,

Dear Sir,

R. B.

 No. CCLVI.

TO MR. SAMUEL CLARKE, JUN.

DUMFRIES.

Sunday Morning.

DEAR SIR:

I WAS, I know, drunk last night, but I am sober this morning. From the expressions Capt. — made use of to me, had I had nobody's welfare to care for but my own, we should certainly have come, according to the manners of the world, to the necessity of murdering one another about the business. The words were such as generally, I believe, end in a brace of pistols; but I am still pleased to think that I did not ruin the peace and welfare of a wife and a family of children in a drunken squabble. Farther you know that the report of certain political opinions being mine has already once before brought me to the brink of destruction. I dread lest last night's business may be misrepresented in the same way.—You, their sympathy for his misfortunes, and in their regret that his talents were nearly lost to the world of Letters, these gentlemen agreed on the plan of settling him in London. To accomplish this most desirable object, Mr. Perry, very spiritedly, made the Poet a handsome offer of an annual stipend for the exercise of his talents in his newspaper. Burns's reasons for refusing this offer are stated in the present letter.—CROMEK.]

* ["Burns's anxiety with regard to the correctness of his writings was very great. Being questioned as to his mode of composition, he replied, 'All my poetry is the effect of easy composition, but of laborious correction.'"]—CROMEK.]

† ["In a conversation with his friend Mr. Perry, (the proprietor of 'The Morning Chronicle,') Mr. Miller represented to that gentleman the insufficiency of Burns's salary to answer the imperious demands of a numerous family. In

I beg, will take care to prevent it. I tax your wish for Mr. Burns's welfare with the task of waiting, as soon as possible, on every gentleman who was present, and state this to him, and, as you please, shew him this letter. What, after all, was the obnoxious toast? "May our success in the present war be equal to the justice of our cause"—a toast that the most outrageous frenzy of loyalty cannot object to. I request and beg that this morning you will wait on the parties present at the foolish dispute. I shall only add that I am truly sorry that a man who stood so high in my estimation as Mr. ———, should use me in the manner in which I conceive he has done.

R. B.

 No. CCLVII.

TO MRS. RIDDEL.

SUPPOSES HIMSELF TO BE WRITING FROM THE DEAD TO THE LIVING.

MADAM :

Dumfries, 1795.

I DARE say that this is the first epistle you ever received from this nether world. I write you from the regions of Hell, amid the horrors of the damned. The time and manner of my leaving your earth I do not exactly know, as I took my departure in the heat of a fever of intoxication, contracted at your too hospitable mansion; but, on my arrival here, I was fairly tried, and sentenced to endure the purgatorial tortures of this infernal confine for the space of ninety-nine years, eleven months, and twenty-nine days, and all on account of the impropriety of my conduct yesternight under your roof. Here am I, laid on a bed of pitiless furze, with my aching head reclined on a pillow of ever-piercing thorn, while an infernal tormentor, wrinkled, and old, and cruel, his name I think is Recollection, with a whip of scorpions, forbids peace or rest to approach me, and keeps anguish eternally awake. Still, Madam, if I could in any measure be reinstated in the good opinion of the fair circle whom my conduct last night so much injured, I think it would be an alleviation to my torments. For this reason I trouble you with this letter. To the men of the company I will make no apology.—Your husband, who insisted on my drinking more than I chose, has no right to blame me; and the other gentlemen were partakers of my guilt.

* [In the song alluded to, there are some fine verses.

"And now your banks and bonnie braes
But waken sad remembrance' smart:
The very shades I held most dear
Now strike fresh anguish to my heart:
Deserted bower! where are they now?
Ah! where the garlands that I wove
With faithful care—each morn to deck
The altars of ungrateful love?"

But to you, Madam, I have to apologize. Your good opinion I valued as one of the greatest acquisitions I had made on earth, and I was truly a beast to forfeit it. There was a Miss I——, too, a woman of fine sense, gentle and unassuming manners—do make, on my part, a miserable d-mned wretch's best apology to her. A Mrs. G——, a charming woman, did me the honour to be prejudiced in my favour; this makes me hope that I have not outraged her beyond all forgiveness.—To all the other ladies please present my humblest contrition for my conduct, and my petition for their gracious pardon. O all ye powers of decency and decorum! whisper to them that my errors, though great, were involuntary—that an intoxicated man is the vilest of beasts—that it was not in my nature to be brutal to any one—that to be rude to a woman, when in my senses, was impossible with me—but—

* * * *

Regret! Remorse! Shame! ye three hell-hounds that ever dog my steps and bay at my heels, spare me! spare me!

Forgive the offences, and pity the perdition of, Madam, your humble slave,

R. B.

 No. CCLVIII.

TO MRS. RIDDEL.

MR. BURNS's compliments to Mrs. Riddel—is much obliged to her for her polite attention in sending him the book. Owing to Mr. B. being at present acting as supervisor of excise, a department that occupies his every hour of the day, he has not that time to spare which is necessary for any belle-lettre pursuit; but, as he will, in a week or two, again return to his wonted leisure, he will then pay that attention to Mrs. R.'s beautiful song, "To thee, loved Nith"—which it so well deserves.* When "Anacharsis' Travels" come to hand, which Mrs. Riddel mentioned as her gift to the public library, Mr. B. will feel honoured by the indulgence of a perusal of them before presentation: it is a book he has never yet seen, and the regulations of the library allow too little leisure for deliberate reading.

Friday Evening.

P. S. Mr. Burns will be much obliged to Mrs. Riddel if she will favour him with a

The flowers of spring how gay they bloom'd
When last with him I wandered here,
The flowers of spring are past away
For wintry horrors dark and drear.
Yon osier'd stream, by whose lone banks
My songs have lulled him oft to rest,
Is now in icy fetters lock'd—
Cold as my false love's frozen breast.;"

perusal of any of her poetical pieces which he may not have seen.

Dumfries—1795.

No. CCLIX.

TO MISS FONTENELLE,

Dumfries, 1795.

MADAM,

IN such a bad world as our's, those who add to the scanty sum of our pleasures are positively our benefactors. To you, Madam, on our humble Dumfries boards, I have been more indebted for entertainment than ever I was in prouder theatres. Your charms as a woman would ensure applause to the most indifferent actress, and your theatrical talents would ensure admiration to the plainest figure. This, Madam, is not the unmeaning or insidious compliment of the frivolous or interested; I pay it from the same honest impulse that the sublime of nature excites my admiration, or her beauties give me delight.

Will the foregoing lines* be of any service to you in your approaching benefit night? If they will I shall be prouder of my muse than ever. They are nearly extempore: I know they have no great merit; but though they should add but little to the entertainment of the evening, they give me the happiness of an opportunity to declare how much I have the honour to be, &c.

R. B.

No. CCLX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

15th December, 1795.

MY DEAR FRIEND,

AS I am in a complete Decemberish humour, gloomy, sullen, stupid, as even the Deity of Dulness herself could wish, I shall not draw out a heavy letter with a number of heavier apologies for my late silence. Only one I shall mention, because I know you will sympathize in it: these four months, a sweet little girl, my youngest child, has been so ill that every day, a week, or less, threatened to terminate her existence. There had much need be many pleasures annexed to the states of husband and father, for, God knows, they have many peculiar cares. I cannot describe to you the anxious, sleepless hours these ties frequently give me. I see a train of helpless little folks; me and my exertions all their stay: and on what a brittle thread does the life of man hang! If I am nipt off at the command of fate! even in all the vigour of manhood as I am—such things happen every day—Gracious God! what would become of my little flock! 'Tis here that I envy your people of fortune.—A father on his death-bed, taking an everlasting leave of his children, has indeed woe enough; but the man of competent fortune leaves his sons and daughters independency and friends; while I—but I shall run distracted if I think any longer on the subject!

To leave talking of the matter so gravely, I shall sing with the old Scots ballad—

“O that I had ne'er been married,
I would never had nae care;
Now I've gotten wife and bairns,
They cry crowdie evermair.

Crowdie ance; crowdie twice;
Crowdie three times in a day;
An ye crowdie ony mair,
Ye'll crowdie a' my meal away.”—

* * * * *

December, 24th.

We have had a brilliant theatre here this season; only, as all other business does, it experiences a stagnation of trade from the epidemical complaint of the country, want of cash. I mentioned our theatre merely to lug in an occasional Address which I wrote for the benefit-night of one of the actresses, and which is as follows—

ADDRESS,

SPOKEN BY MISS FONTENELLE ON HER BENEFIT-NIGHT,
DEC. 4, 1795, AT THE THEATRE, DUMFRIES.

“Still anxious to secure your partial favour, &c.”

(Vide p. 320.)

25th, Christmas Morning.

This, my much-loved friend, is a morning of wishes; accept mine—so heaven hear me as they are sincere!—that blessings may attend your steps, and affliction know you not! In the charming words of my favourite author, “The Man of Feeling,” “May the Great Spirit bear up the weight of thy grey hairs, and blunt the arrow that brings them rest!”

Now that I talk of authors, how do you like Cowper? Is not the “Task” a glorious poem?† The religion of the “Task,” bating a few scraps of Calvinistic divinity, is the religion of God and Nature; the religion that exalts, that the frequency of the praise it appears that the English bard was a great favourite. This precious volume was after the death of the poet placed in the library at Dunlop; but the family carrying it with them one winter to Edinburgh, it was unfortunately destroyed by fire, along with other volumes which had been in the hands of Burns, and which attested equally his feelings and his taste.—CUNNINGHAM.]

3 B

* [Vide “Address spoken by Miss Fontenelle,” page 320.]

† [Burns generally carried Cowper's “Task” in his pocket, and took it out when he found himself in a lonely road, or in a brew-house where he had to wait sometimes to “gauge the browst.” The copy which he used was one lent to him by Mrs. Dunlop; he enriched the margins with notes, critical and commendatory, and from the number of the marks and ennobles man. Were not you to send me your "Zeluco," in return for mine? Tell me how you like my marks and notes through the book. I would not give a farthing for a book, unless I were at liberty to blot it with my criticisms.

I have lately collected, for a friend's perusal, all my letters; I mean those which I first sketched, in a rough draught, and afterwards wrote out fair. On looking over some old musty papers, which, from time to time, I had parcelled by, as trash that were scarce worth preserving, and which yet at the same time I did not care to destroy; I discovered many of these rude sketches, and have written, and am writing them out, in a bound MS. for my friend's library. As I wrote always to you the rhapsody of the moment, I cannot find a single scroll to you, except one, about the commencement of our acquaintance. If there were any possible conveyance, I would send you a perusal of my book.

R. B.

No. CCLXI.

TO MR. ALEXANDER FINDLATER,*

SUPERVISOR OF EXCISE, DUMFRIES.

SIR,

ENCLOSED are the two schemes. I would not have troubled you with the collector's one, but for suspicion lest it be not right. Mr. Erskine promised me to make it right, if you will have the goodness to show him how. As I have no copy of the scheme for myself, and the alterations being very considerable from what it was formerly, I hope that I shall have access to this scheme I send you, when I come to face up my new books. So much for schemes.—And that no scheme to betray a FRIEND, or mislead a STRANGER; to seduce a YOUNG GIRL, or rob a HEN-ROOST; to subvert LIBERTY, or bribe an EXCISEMAN; to disturb the GENERAL ASSEMBLY, or annoy a GOSSIPING; to overthrow the credit of ORTHODOXY, or the authority of OLD SONGS; to oppose your wishes, or frustrate my hopes—MAY PROSPER—is the sincere wish and prayer of

R. B.

No. CCLXII.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE.†

Dumfries, 1795.

SIR,

You will see by your subscribers' list that I have been about nine months of that number.

I am sorry to inform you that in that time seven or eight of your papers either have never been sent me, or else have never reached me. To be deprived of any one number of the first newspaper in Great Britain for information, ability, and independence, is what I can ill brook and bear; but to be deprived of that most admirable oration of the Marquis of Lansdowne, when he made the great, though ineffectual, attempt (in the language of the poet, I fear too true,) "to save a SINKING STATE"—this was a loss that I neither can nor will forgive you.—That paper, Sir, never reached me; but I demand it of you. I am a BRITON; and must be interested in the cause of LIBERTY:—I am a MAN; and the RIGHTS of HUMAN NATURE cannot be indifferent to me. However, do not let me mislead you: I am not a man in that situation of life which, as your subscriber, can be of any consequence to you, in the eyes of those to whom SITUATION OF LIFE ALONE is the criterion of MAN.—I am but a plain tradesman, in this distant, obscure country town: but that humble domicile in which I shelter my wife and children is the CASTELLUM of a BRITON; and that scanty, hard-earned income which supports them is as truly my property as the most magnificent fortune of the most PUISSANT MEMBER of your HOUSE of NOBLES.

These, Sir, are my sentiments; and to them I subscribe my name: and, were I a man of ability and consequence enough to address the PUBLIC, with that name should they appear.‡

I am, &c.

* [This gentleman died at Glasgow, on the 4th of December, 1839, at the advanced age of eighty-five.]

† [James Perry, editor and proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, was one of the most intelligent and enterprising of British Journalists. He considered himself to be a sound old Whig, and by his satiric sallies and sharp scrutiny of public men and motives, was as a thistle and a thorn to the Tories for a full quarter of a century. He was one of the first in giving interest and importance to which it has maintained, and more than maintained, since. Perry was a native of Aberdeen; he was social and friendly, and held fast by his integrity during very trying and changeful times.—CUNNINGHAM.]

"The folio of four pages,"

‡ ["This letter," says Cromek, "owes its origin to the following circumstance. A neighbour of the Poet, at Dumfries, called on him and complained that he had been greatly disappointed in the irregular delivery of the Paper of the Morning Chronicle. Burns asked, 'Why do not you write to the Editors of the Paper?' 'Good God, Sir, can I presume to write to the learned Editors of a Newspaper?'—'Well, if you are afraid of writing to the Editors of a Newspaper, I am not; and, if you think proper, I'll draw up a sketch of a letter which you may copy.'

Burns tore a leaf from his excise book, and instantly produced the sketch which I have transcribed, and which is here printed. The poor man thanked him, and took the letter home. However, that caution which the watchfulness of his enemies had taught him to exercise prompted him to the prudence of begging a friend to wait on the person for whom it was written, and request the favour to have it returned. This request was complied with, and the paper never appeared in print."—CROMEK.]

No. CCLXIII.

TO COLONEL W. DUNBAR.*

I AM not gone to Elysium, most noble Colonel, but am still here in this sub-lunary world, serving my God by propagating his image, and honouring my king by begetting him loyal subjects. Many happy returns of the season await my friend! May the thorns of care never beset his path! May peace be an inmate of his bosom, and rapture a frequent visitor of his soul! May the blood-hounds of misfortune never trace his steps, nor the screech-owl of sorrow alarm his dwelling! May enjoyment tell thy hours, and pleasure number thy days, thou friend of the Bard! Blessed be he that blesteth thee, and cursed be he that curseth thee!

R. B.

No. CCLXIV.

TO MR. HERON,

OF HERON.†

Dumfries, 1795.

SIR:

I ENCLOSE you some copies of a couple of political ballads; one of which, I believe, you have never seen.‡ Would to Heaven I could make you master of as many votes in the Stewartry—but—

"Who does the utmost that he can Does well, acts nobly—angels could no more."

In order to bring my humble efforts to bear with more effect on the foe, I have privately printed a good many copies of both ballads, and have sent them among friends all about the country.

To pillory on Parnassus the rank reprobation of character, the utter dereliction of all principle, in a profligate junto which has not only outraged virtue, but violated common decency; which, spurning even hypocrisy as paltry iniquity below their daring;—to unmask their flagitiousness to the broadest day—to deliver such over to their merited fate—is surely not merely innocent, but laudable; is not only propriety, but virtue. You have already, as your auxiliary, the sober detestation of mankind on the heads of your opponents; and I swear by the lyre of Thalia to muster on your side all the votaries of honest laughter, and fair, candid ridicule!

* [William Dunbar was one of the Edinburgh friends of the Poet; and Colonel of the Crochallan Fencibles—a Club of choice spirits, whose motto was wit and wine.]

† [He is sometimes styled "Heron of Kerroughtree," but properly as above.]

‡ [For these ballads, which related to Mr. Heron's contest

I am extremely obliged to you for your kind mention of my interests in a letter which Mr. Syme shewed me. At present, my situation in life must be in a great measure stationary, at least for two or three years. The statement is this—I am on the supervisor's list, and, as we come on there by precedence, in two or three years I shall be at the head of that list, and be appointed of course. Then, a FRIEND might be of service to me in getting me into a place of the kingdom which I would like. A supervisor's income varies from about a hundred and twenty to two hundred a year; but the business is an incessant drudgery, and would be nearly a complete bar to every species of literary pursuit. The moment I am appointed supervisor, in the common routine, I may be nominated on the collector's list; and this is always a business purely of political patronage. A collectorship varies much, from better than two hundred a year, to near a thousand. They also come forward by precedence on the list; and have, besides a handsome income, a life of complete leisure. A life of literary leisure, with a decent competency, is the summit of my wishes. It would be the prudish affectation of silly pride in me to say that I do not need, or would not be indebted to, a political friend; at the same time, Sir, I by no means lay my affairs before you thus to hook my dependent situation on your benevolence. If, in my progress of life, an opening should occur where the good offices of a gentleman of your public character and political consequence might bring me forward, I shall petition your goodness with the same frankness as I now do myself the honour to subscribe myself,

R. B.‡

No. CCLXV.

TO MRS. DUNLOP,

IN LONDON.

Dumfries, 20th December, 1795.

I HAVE been prodigiously disappointed in this London journey of yours. In the first place, when your last to me reached Dumfries, I was in the country, and did not return until too late to answer your letter; in the next place, I thought you would certainly take this route; and now I know not what is become of you, or whether this may reach you at all.—God grant that this may find you and yours in for the representation of the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright,—see pages 321-4.]

‡ [Part of this letter was printed by Currie; the whole was published in the Reliques by Cromek. Patrick Heron died, as all his friends would desire to die—in bed, at peace with himself, and with mankind.]

prospering health and good spirits! Do let me hear from you the soonest possible.

As I hope to get a frank from my friend, Captain Miller, I shall every leisure hour take up the pen, and gossip away whatever comes first, prose or poetry, sermon or song.—In this last article I have abounded of late. I have often mentioned to you a superb publication of Scottish Songs, which is making its appearance in your great metropolis, and where I have the honour to preside over the Scottish verse, as no less a personage than Peter Pindar does over the English.

December 29th.

Since I began this letter, I have been appointed to act in the capacity of supervisor here, and I assure you, what with the load of business, and what with that business being new to me, I could scarcely have commanded ten minutes to have spoken to you, had you been in town, much less to have written you an epistle. This appointment is only temporary, and during the illness of the present incumbent; but I look forward to an early period when I shall be appointed in full form: a consummation devoutly to be wished! My political sins seem to be forgiven me.

This is the season (New-year's-day is now my date) of wishing; and mine are most fervently offered up for you! May life to you be a positive blessing while it lasts, for your own sake; and that it may yet be greatly prolonged is my wish for my own sake, and for the sake of the rest of your friends! What a transient business is life! Very lately I was a boy; but t'other day I was a young man; and already I begin to feel the rigid fibre and stiffening joints of old age coming fast o'er my frame. With all my follies of youth, and, I fear, a few vices of manhood, still I congratulate myself on having had in early days religion strongly impressed on my mind. I have nothing to say to any one as to which sect he belongs to, or what creed he believes: but I look on the man who is firmly persuaded of infinite wisdom and goodness, superintending and directing every circumstance that can happen in his lot—I felicitate such a man as having a solid foundation for his mental enjoyment; a firm prop and sure stay in the hour of difficulty, trouble, and distress; and a never-failing anchor of hope, when he looks beyond the grave.

January 12th.

You will have seen our worthy and ingenious friend, the Doctor, long ere this. I hope he is well, and beg to be remembered to him. I have just been reading over again, I dare say for the hundred and fiftieth time, his View of Society and Manners; and still I read it with delight. His humour is perfectly original—it is neither the humour of Addison, nor Swift, nor Sterne, nor of anybody but Dr. Moore.—By the bye, you have deprived me of Zeluco; remember that, when you are disposed to rake up the sins of my neglect from among the ashes of my laziness.

He has paid me a pretty compliment, by quoting me in his last publication.*

R. B.

* * * * *

No. CCLXVI.

ADDRESS OF THE SCOTCH DISTILLERS

TO THE

RIGHT HON. WILLIAM PITT.

SIR,

WHILE pursy burgesses crowd your gate, sweating under the weight of heavy addresses, permit us, the quondam distillers in that part of Great Britain called Scotland, to approach you, not with venal approbation, but with fraternal condolence; not as what you are just now, or for some time have been; but as what, in all probability, you will shortly be.—We shall have the merit of not deserting our friends in the day of their calamity, and you will have the satisfaction of perusing at least one honest address. You are well acquainted with the dissection of human nature; nor do you need the assistance of a fellow-creature's bosom to inform you that man is always a selfish, often a perfidious, being.—This assertion, however the hasty conclusions of superficial observation may doubt of it, or the raw inexperience of youth may deny it, those who make the fatal experiment we have done will feel.—You are a statesman, and consequently are not ignorant of the traffic of these corporation compliments.—The little great man who drives the borough to market, and the very great man who buys the borough in that market, they two do the whole business; and, you well know, they, likewise, have their price. With that sullen disdain which you can so well assume, rise, illustrious Sir, and spurn these hireling efforts of venal stupidity. At best they are the compliments of a man's friends on the morning of his execution: they take a decent farewell; resign you to your fate; and hurry away from your approaching hour.

If fame say true, and omens be not very much mistaken, you are about to make your exit from that world where the sun of gladness gilds the paths of prosperous men: permit us,

* [The novel entitled "Edward."] great Sir, with the sympathy of fellow-feeling, to hail your passage to the realms of ruin.

Whether the sentiment proceed from the selfishness or cowardice of mankind is immaterial; but to point out to a child of misfortune those who are still more unhappy is to give him some degree of positive enjoyment. In this light, Sir, our downfall may be again useful to you:—Though not exactly in the same way, it is not perhaps the first time it has gratified your feelings. It is true, the triumph of your evil star is exceedingly despicable.—At an age when others are the votaries of pleasure, or underlings in business, you had attained the highest wish of a British Statesman; and with the ordinary date of human life, what a prospect was before you! Deeply rooted in Royal Favour, you overshadowed the land. The birds of passage, which follow ministerial sunshine through every clime of political faith and manners, flocked to your branches; and the beasts of the field (the lordly possessors of hills and valleys), crowded under your shade. "But behold a watcher, a holy One, came down from heaven, and cried aloud, and said thus: Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches; shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit; let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches!" A blow from an unthought-of quarter, one of those terrible accidents which peculiarly mark the hand of Omnipotence, overset your career, and laid all your fancied honours in the dust. But turn your eyes, Sir, to the tragic scenes of our fate.—An ancient nation that for many ages had gallantly maintained the unequal struggle for independence with her much more powerful neighbour, at last agrees to an union which should ever after make them one people. In consideration of certain circumstances, it was covenanted that the former should enjoy a stipulated alleviation in her share of the public burdens, particularly in that branch of the revenue called the Excise. This just privilege has of late given great umbrage to some interested, powerful individuals of the more potent part of the empire, and they have spared no wicked pains, under insidious pretéxts, to subvert what they dared not openly to attack, from the dread which they yet entertained of the spirit of their ancient enemies.

In this conspiracy we fell; nor did we alone suffer—our country was deeply wounded. A number of (we will say) respectable individuals, largely engaged in trade, where we were not only useful, but absolutely necessary, to our country in her dearest interests; we, with all that was near and dear to us, were sacrificed without remorse, to the infernal deity of political expediency! We fell to gratify the wishes of dark envy, and the views of unprincipled ambition! Your foes, Sir, were avowed; were too brave to take an ungenerous advantage; you fell in the face of day.—On the contrary, our enemies, to complete our overthrow, contrived to make their guilt appear the villany of a nation.—Your downfall only drags with you your private friends and partisans: in our misery are more or less involved the most numerous and most valuable part of the community—all those who immediately depend on the cultivation of the soil, from the landlord of a province down to his lowest hind.

Allow us, Sir, yet farther, just to hint at another rich vein of comfort in the dreary regions of adversity;—the gratulations of an approving conscience. In a certain great assembly, of which you are a distinguished member, panegyrics on your private virtues have so often wounded your delicacy that we shall not distress you with any thing on the subject. There is, however, one part of your public conduct which our feelings will not permit us to pass in silence; our gratitude must trespass on your modesty; we mean, worthy Sir, your whole behaviour to the Scots Distillers.—In evil hours, when obtrusive recollection presses bitterly on the sense, let that, Sir, come like a healing angel, and speak the peace to your soul which the world can neither give nor take away.

We have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your sympathizing fellow-sufferers,
And grateful humble Servants,

JOHN BARLEYCORN—Præses.*

—◆—
No. CCLXVII

TO THE

HON. THE PROVOST, BAILIES, AND TOWN COUNCIL OF DUMFRIES.

GENTLEMEN,

THE literary taste and liberal spirit of your good town has so ably filled the various departments of your schools as to make it a very great object for a parent to have his children educated in them. Still, to me, a stranger, has the memory of the late Lord Melville escaped without reproach. When the copyright of Burns's works was debated in the House of Lords, in 1812, Earl Grey dwelt upon the sinfulness of having neglected such a genius, and assigned to Lord Melville a greater share in starving him than some of his lordship's friends seemed to relish.—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [This ironical Address was found among the Papers of the Poet. In evil hours, when obtrusive recollections pressed bitterly on the sense, perhaps the remembrance of having aided in crushing the great and glorious spirit of Burns came with no healing on its wings across the mind of Pitt. The success of Napoleon avenged the sufferings of the bard: nor with my large family, and very stinted income, to give my young ones that education I wish, at the high school fees which a stranger pays, will bear hard upon me.

Some years ago your good town did me the honour of making me an honorary Burgess.—Will you allow me to request that this mark of distinction may extend so far as to put me on a footing of a real freeman of the town, in the schools?

If you are so very kind as to grant my request, it will certainly be a constant incentive to me to strain every nerve where I can officially serve you; and will, if possible, increase that grateful respect with which I have the honour to be,

Gentlemen,
Your devoted humble Servant,
R. B.*

No. CCLXVIII.

TO MRS. RIDDEL.

Dumfries, 20th January, 1796.

I CANNOT express my gratitude to you for allowing me a longer perusal of "Anarcharis." In fact, I never met with a book that bewitched me so much; and I, as a member of the library, must warmly feel the obligation you have laid us under. Indeed, to me, the obligation is stronger than to any other individual of our society; as "Anarcharis" is an indispensable desideratum to a son of the muses.

The health you wished me in your morning's card, is, I think, flown from me for ever. I have not been able to leave my bed to-day till about an hour ago. These wickedly unlucky advertisements I lent (I did wrong) to a friend, and I am ill able to go in quest of him.

The muses have not quite forsaken me. The following detached stanzas I intend to interweave in some disastrous tale of a shepherd.

R. B.

No. CCLXIX.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Dumfries, 31st January, 1796.

THESE many months you have been two packets in my debt—what sin of ignorance I have committed against so highly valued a friend I am utterly at a loss to guess.† Alas! Madam, ill can I afford, at this time, to be deprived of any of the small remnant of my pleasures. I have lately drunk deep of the cup of affliction. The autumn robbed me of my only daughter and darling child, and that at a distance too,‡ and so rapidly, as to put it out of my power to pay the last duties to her. I had scarcely begun to recover from that shock when I became myself the victim of a most severe rheumatic fever, and long the die spun doubtful; until, after many weeks of a sick bed, it seems to have turned up life, and I am beginning to crawl across my room, and once indeed have been before my own door in the street.

"When pleasure fascinates the mental sight,
Affliction purifies the visual ray,
Religion hails the drear, the untried night,
And shuts, for ever shuts! life's doubtful day."

R. B.

No. CCLXX.

TO MRS. RIDDEL,

WHO HAD DESIRED HIM TO GO TO THE BIRTH-DAY ASSEMBLY ON THAT DAY TO SHEW HIS LOYALTY.

Dumfries, 4th June, 1796.

I AM in such miserable health as to be utterly incapable of shewing my loyalty in any way. Racked as I am with rheumatism, I meet every face with a greeting, like that of Balak to Balaam—"Come, curse me, Jacob; and come, defy me, Israel!" So say I—Come, curse me that east wind; and come, defy me the north! Would you have me in such circumstances copy you out a love-song?

I may perhaps see you on Saturday, but I will not be at the ball.—Why should I? "man delights not me, nor woman either!" Can you supply me with the song, "Let us all be unhappy together?"—do if you can, and oblige le pauvre miserable,§

R. B.

* [The Provost and Bailies complied at once with the humble request of the Poet; he was induced to make it through the persuasions of James Gray and Thomas White, Masters of the Grammar School of Dumfries. These were not ordinary men; the "Sabbath among the Mountains," and the "Cona," of the former, show much poetic feeling, while the mathematical discoveries of the latter give him a station among the followers of science. Gray, an accomplished scholar, ardent and enthusiastic, died in the East Indies; White, equally ardent and impetuous, remained at home. Their memories are still held in grateful remembrance on the Banks of Nith.—CUNNINGHAM.]

† [It seems all but certain that Mrs. Dunlop regarded the poet with some little displeasure during the evening of his days. His political sins and convivial delinquencies were likely the cause of this: it is however doubtful whether or not she knew of his sinking condition. That the bright career of Burns was so soon to terminate in the darkness of death seems never to have crossed the mind of friend or foe till he returned from the Brow a dying man.—CUNNINGHAM.]

‡ [The child died at Mauchline.]

§ [This is the last letter which Burns addressed to the beautiful and accomplished Mrs. Riddel. In addition to the composition of a very admirable memoir of the poet, that lady bestowed herself much in rousing his friends both in Scotland and England to raise a monument at Dumfries to his memory. She subscribed largely herself; she induced others to do the same, and she corresponded with both Banks and Flaxman on the subject of designs. The following letters will suffice to show the reader that Mrs. Riddel had forgiven the bard for all his lampoons, and was earnest in doing his memory honour.]

No. CCLXXI.

TO MR. CLARKE,

SCHOOLMASTER, FORFAR.

Dumfries, 26th June, 1796.

MY DEAR CLARKE :

STILL, still the victim of affliction! Were you to see the emaciated figure who now holds the pen to you, you would not know your old friend. Whether I shall ever get about again, is only known to Him, the Great Unknown, whose creature I am. Alas, Clarke! I begin to fear the worst. As to my individual self, I am tranquil, and would despise myself if I were not; but Burns's poor widow, and half-a-dozen of his dear little ones—helpless orphans!—there I am weak as a woman's tear. Enough of this! 'Tis half of my disease.

I duly received your last, enclosing the note. It came extremely in time, and I am much obliged by your punctuality. Again I must request you to do me the same kindness. Be so very good as, by return of post, to enclose me another note. I trust you can do it without inconvenience, and it will seriously oblige me. If I must go, I shall leave a few friends behind me, whom I shall regret while consciousness remains. I know I shall live in their remembrance. Adieu, dear Clarke. That I shall ever see you again is, I am afraid, highly improbable.*

R. B.

“Richmond, 20th May, 1799.”

“SIR,

“In answer to yours of the 10th of last month, I will trouble you with a few lines on the subject of the bard's monument, having corresponded with several persons (Dr. Currie, &c.) respecting it, whose judgment is very far preferable to mine, and we all agree that the first thing to be done is to collect what money can be got for that purpose, in which we will all do what service we can, as soon as the posthumous works are published; but those who are at all saddled with that business must get it off their hands before they commence another undertaking. Perhaps an application, or at any rate the consulting with Mr. Flaxman on the subject of the design, &c., might answer better from and with persons he is already acquainted with, and more heads than one should be called in counsel on the occasion. If, therefore, you or the other gentlemen concerned in this project think it proper, I will talk it over with Mr. Flaxman and some other artists, friends of his, whom I know, and Mr. F. can then let you know his ideas on the subject. The monument should be characteristic of him to whom it is raised, and the artist must somehow be made acquainted with him and his works, which it is possible he may not be at present. The inscription should be first rate. I think either Roscoe or Dr. Darwin would contribute their talents for the purpose, and it could not be given into better hands. I have no names to add to your list; but whenever that for the posthumous works is closed, I will set to work in earnest. Pray remember me to Mr. Syme when you see him, from whom, I know not why, I never hear now.

“I am, Sir,

“Your humble servant,

“MARIA RIDDEL.”

No. CCLXXII.

TO MR. JAMES JOHNSON.

EDINBURGH.

Dumfries, 4th July, 1796.

How are you, my dear friend, and how comes on your fifth volume? You may probably think that for some time past I have neglected you and your work; but, alas! the hand of pain, and sorrow, and care, has these many months lain heavy on me! Personal and domestic affliction have almost entirely banished that alacrity and life with which I used to woo the rural muse of Scotia.

* * * * *

You are a good, worthy, honest fellow, and have a good right to live in this world—because you deserve it. Many a merry meeting this publication has given us, and possibly it may give us more, though, alas! I fear it. This protracting, slow, consuming illness which hangs over me, will, I doubt much, my ever dear friend, arrest my sun before he has well reached his middle career, and will turn over the poet to far more important concerns than studying the brilliancy of wit, or the pathos of sentiment! However, hope is the cordial of the human heart, and I endeavour to cherish it as well as I can.

Let me hear from you as soon as convenient.—Your work is a great one; and now that it is finished, I see, if we were to begin again, two or three things that might be mended; yet

Of the merits of the designs it is difficult to judge without the drawings: Mrs. Riddel admired two, of which she gives the following description. “The first, which I think the handsomest, is a shrine enclosing a very beautiful female figure bending over a sort of sarcophagus, which is partly covered by drapery. This is really very elegant and classical, but it is expensive. The second design is a female figure, likewise very elegant, on a pedestal; with the addition of an attribute, either of these might be taken for Coila, whom Burns delighted to personify as his guardian genius.” These designs were by Flaxman; they seem not to have pleased the friends of the poet in the vale of Nith; the intention of a monument was abandoned till a later day, when it was successfully revived by William Grierson, in Dumfries, and the late Alexander Key, Esq. in London. It would have been as well had the sculpture equalled the elegance of the architectural shrine which encloses it; that this is the opinion of others well qualified to judge, the following passage of a letter from one of our greatest living poets will abundantly show.

“Last summer I visited Staffa, Iona, and part of the Western Highlands, and returned through your town of Dumfries, having for the first time passed through Burns's country. It gave me much pleasure to see Kilmarnock, Mauchline, Mossiel Farm, the Ayr, which we crossed where the winds his way most romantically through rocks and woods; and to have a sight of Irwin and Lugar, which nobody sung till he named them in immortal verse. The banks of the Nith I had seen before, and was glad to renew my acquaintance with them. By the bye, what a sorry piece of sculpture is Burns's monument in Dumfries churchyard—monstrous in conception and clumsy in execution! It is a disgrace to the memory of the poet.”—CUNNINGHAM.]

* [The above affecting letter first appeared in Chambers' Edition of the Poet's Works, Edinburgh, 1839.]

I will venture to prophesy that to future ages your publication will be the text-book and standard of Scottish song and music.

I am ashamed to ask another favour of you, because you have been so very good already; but my wife has a very particular friend of hers, a young lady who sings well, to whom she wishes to present the "Scots Musical Museum." If you have a spare copy, will you be so obliging as to send it by the very first fly, as I am anxious to have it soon.*

Yours ever, R. B.

No. CCLXXIII.

TO MR. CUNNINGHAM.

Brow, Sea-bathing quarters, 7th July, 1796.

MY DEAR CUNNINGHAM,

I RECEIVED yours here this moment, and am indeed highly flattered with the approbation of the literary circle you mention; a literary circle inferior to none in the two kingdoms. Alas! my friend, I fear the voice of the bard will soon be heard among you no more! For these eight or ten months I have been ailing, sometimes bedfast, and sometimes not; but these last three months I have been tortured with an excruciating rheumatism, which has reduced me to nearly the last stage. You actually would not know me if you saw me.—Pale, emaciated, and so feeble as occasionally to need help from my chair—my spirits fled!—but I can no more on the subject—only the medical folks tell me that my last and only chance is bathing and country quarters, and riding.—The deuce of the matter is this; when an Exciseman is off duty, his salary is reduced to £35 instead of £50.—What way, in the name of thrift, shall I maintain myself, and keep a horse in country quarters—with a wife and five children at home, on £35? I mention this, because I had intended to beg your utmost interest, and that of all the friends you can muster, to move our Commissioners of Excise to grant me the full salary; I dare say you know them all personally. If they do not grant it me, I must lay my account with an exit truly en poëte—if I die not of disease, I must perish with hunger.†

I have sent you one of the songs; the other my memory does not serve me with, and I have no copy here; but I shall be at home soon,

* ["In this humble and delicate manner did poor Burns ask for a copy of a work of which he was principally the founder, and to which he had contributed, gratuitously, not less than 184 original, altered, and collected songs! The editor has seen 180 transcribed by his own hand for the 'Museum.'"]—CROMEK.]

† [It is truly painful to mention—and with indignation we record it—that the poet's humble request of the continuance of his full salary was not granted! "The Commis-

when I will send it you.—Apropos to being at home, Mrs. Burns threatens, in a week or two, to add one more to my paternal charge, which, if of the right gender, I intend shall be introduced to the world by the respectable designation of Alexander Cunningham Burns. My last was James Glencairn, so you can have no objection to the company of nobility. Farewell. R. B.

No. CCLXXIV

TO MR. GILBERT BURNS.

10th July, 1796.

DEAR BROTHER,

IT will be no very pleasing news to you to be told that I am dangerously ill, and not likely to get better. An inveterate rheumatism has reduced me to such a state of debility, and my appetite is so totally gone, that I can scarcely stand on my legs. I have been a week at sea-bathing, and I will continue there, or in a friend's house in the country, all the summer. God keep my wife and children: if I am taken from their head, they will be poor indeed. I have contracted one or two serious debts, partly from my illness these many months, partly from too much thoughtlessness as to expense when I came to town, that will cut in too much on the little I leave them in your hands. Remember me to my mother.

Yours, R. B.

No. CCLXXV.

TO MRS. BURNS.

Brow, †Thursday.

MY DEAREST LOVE:

I DELAYED writing until I could tell you what effect sea-bathing was likely to produce. It would be injustice to deny that it has eased my pains, and I think has strengthened me; but my appetite is still extremely bad. No flesh nor fish can I swallow: porridge and milk are the only thing I can taste. I am very happy to hear, by Miss Jess Lewars, that you are all well. My very best and kindest compliments to her, and to all the children. I will see you on Sunday.

Your affectionate husband,
R. B.

sioners," says Currie, "were guilty of no such weakness." To be merciful was no part of their duty.]

‡ [One evening during Burns's stay at the Brow, he was visited by two young ladies who lived in the neighbourhood and who sympathized in his sufferings. During their stay, the sun setting on the western hills, threw a strong light upon him through the window: a child perceived this, and proceeded to draw the curtain. "Let me look at the sun, my love," said the sinking poet; "it will be long before he will shine for me again!"]

No. CCLXXVI.

TO MRS. DUNLOP.

Brow, Saturday, 12th July, 1796.

MADAM:

I HAVE written you so often, without receiving any answer, that I would not trouble you again, but for the circumstances in which I am. An illness which has long hung about me, in all probability will speedily send me beyond that bourne whence no traveller returns. Your friendship, with which for many years you honoured me, was a friendship dearest to my soul. Your conversation, and especially your correspondence, were at once highly entertaining and instructive. With what pleasure did I use to break up the seal! The remembrance yet adds one pulse more to my poor palpitating heart. Farewell!!!*

R. B.

No. CCLXXVII.

TO MR. JAMES BURNES,

WRITER, MONTROSE.

Dumfries, 12th July.

MY DEAR COUSIN:

WHEN you offered me money assistance, little did I think I should want it so soon. A rascal of a haberdasher, to whom I owe a considerable bill, taking it into his head that I am dying, has commenced a process against me, and will infallibly put my emaciated body into jail. Will you be so good as to accommodate me, and that by return of post, with ten pounds? O, James! did you know the pride of my heart, you would feel doubly for me! Alas! I am not used to beg! The worst of it is, my health was coming about finely; you know, and my physician assured me, that melancholy and low spirits are half my disease: guess, then, my horrors since this business began. If I had it settled, I would be, I think, quite well in a manner. How shall I use the language to you, O do not disappoint me! but strong necessity's curst command.

I have been thinking over and over my brother's affairs, and I fear I must cut him up;—but on this I will correspond at another time, particularly as I shall [require] your advice.

Forgive me for once more mentioning by return of post;—save me from the horrors of a jail!

My compliments to my friend James, and to all the rest. I do not know what I have written. The subject is so horrible, I dare not look it over again. Farewell.†

R. B.

* [“Burns had, however, the pleasure,” says Currie, “of receiving a satisfactory explanation of his friend’s silence, and an assurance of the continuance of her friendship to his widow and children; an assurance that has been amply fulfilled. It is probable that the greater part of her letters to him were destroyed by our bard about the time that this last was written. He did not foresee that his own letters to her were to appear in print, nor conceive the disappointment that will be felt that a few of this excellent lady’s epistles have not served to enrich and adorn the collection. The above letter is supposed to be the last production of Robert Burns, who died on the 21st of the month, nine days afterwards.”—CURRIE.

There are, however, others of a date still later.]

† [James Burnes sent his cousin ten pounds the moment he received his letter, though he could ill spare the money, and concealed his kindness from the world, till, on reading the life and letters of the poet, he was constrained, in support of his own good name, to conceal it no longer. I was informed by my friend, Dr. Burnes, that his grandfather, now in his eighty-fourth year, was touched by the dubious way in which I had left the subject in the poet’s life, and felt that he was liable to the imputation of coldness of heart.—In a matter of such delicacy, I could not ask the family, and accordingly had left it as I found it, without comment or remark. The following letters will make all as clear as day, and right my venerable friend in a matter respecting which he cannot be but anxious:—ALLAN CUNNINGHAM.

TO MR. BURNES, MONTROSE.

“SIR:—

“AT the desire of Mrs. Burns, I have to acquaint you with the melancholy and much regretted event of your friend’s death. He expired on the morning of the 21st, about five o’clock. The situation of the unfortunate Mrs. Burns and her charming boys your feeling heart can easily paint. It is, however, much to her consolation that a few of his friends, particularly Mr. John Syme, collector of the stamps, and Dr. William Maxwell, both gentlemen of the first respectability and connections, have stepped forward with their assistance and advice; and I think there can be no doubt but that a very handsome provision will be raised for the widow and family. The former of these gentlemen has written to most of the Edinburgh professors with whom either he or Mr. Burns were acquainted, and to several other particular friends. You will easily excuse your not having sooner an answer to your very kind letter, with an acknowledgment of the contents, for, at the time it was received, Mr. Burns was totally unable either to write or dictate a letter, and Mrs. Burns wished to defer answering it till she saw what turn affairs took.

“I am, with much respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

Dumfries, 23rd July, 1796.

“JOHN LEWARS.”

TO MRS. ROBERT BURNS, DUMFRIES.

“MY DEAR COUSIN:—

“IT was with much concern I received the melancholy news of the death of your husband. Little did I expect, when I had the pleasure of seeing you and him, that a change so sudden would have happened.

“I sincerely sympathize with you in your affliction, and will be very ready to do any thing in my power to alleviate it.

“I am sensible that the education of his family was the object nearest to my cousin’s heart, and I hope you will make it your study to follow up his wish by carefully attending to that object, so far as may be possible for you; or, if you think of parting with your son, Robert, and will allow me to take charge of him, I will endeavour to discharge towards him the duty of a father, and educate him with my own sons.

“I am happy to hear that something is to be done for you and the family; but as that may take some time to carry it into effect, I beg you will accept of the enclosed five pounds to supply your present necessities.

“My friend mentioned to me that any little thing he had was in the hands of his brother Gilbert, and that the payment of it, at present, would be hard upon him; I have therefore to entreat that, so far as your circumstances will permit, you will use lenity in settling with him.

No. CCLXXVIII.

TO JAMES GRACIE, Esq.

Brow, Wednesday Morning, 16th July, 1796.

MY DEAR SIR,
It would [be] doing high injustice to this place not to acknowledge that my rheumatism

* [The admirers of Burns owe this letter to the kindness of Mr. Finlayson, merchant in Kirkcudbright. James Gracie, to whom it is addressed, was at that time a banker in Dumfries: he wrote, on being told that Burns longed to be

"I have farther to request that you will offer my best thanks to Mr. Lewars for his very friendly letter to me on this melancholy event, with my sincere wishes that such a warm heart as his may never want a friend.

"I shall be glad to hear of your welfare, and your resolution in regard to your son, and I remain, dear cousin, your affectionate friend,

"Montrose, 29th July, 1796." "JAMES BURNES."

TO Mr. BURNES, MONTROSE.

"DEAR SIR:

"I WAS duly favoured with your letter of the 29th July.—Your goodness is such as to render it wholly out of my power to make any suitable acknowledgment, or to express what I feel for so much kindness.

"With regard to my son Robert, I cannot as yet determine; the gentlemen here (particularly Dr. Maxwell and Mr. Syme, who have so much interested themselves for me and the family) do not wish that I should come to any resolution as to parting with any of them, and I own my own feelings rather incline me to keep them with me. I think they will be a comfort to me, and my most agreeable companions; but should any of them ever leave me, you, Sir, would be, of all others, the gentleman under whose charge I should wish to see any of them, and I am perfectly sensible of your very obliging offer.

"Since Mr. Lewars wrote you, I have got a young son, who, as well as myself, is doing well.

"What you mention about my brother, Mr. Gilbert Burns, is what accords with my own opinion, and every respect shall be paid to your advice. I am, dear Sir, with the greatest respect and regard, your very much obliged friend,

"JEAN BURNS."

"Dumfries, 3rd August, 1796."

THE WIFE OF THE POET.

"I THINK Mrs. Burns had been pretty. In 1804 I was accustomed to sit in the seat next to her in the old church of

^a [Shortly after her husband's death, Mrs. Burns had a very remarkable dream, which she sometimes spoke of to her more intimate female friends as a circumstance not only most vividly imprinted on the memory, but more prominently placed before the eye of the mind, than anything that ever occurred to her during her waking moments. And it was to this effect—that the poet, or rather his spirit, withdrew her curtains, and, after gazing wistfully and solemnly, said "that he had been permitted to take a last look of his widow and the child he had never before seen." The bare mention of such a circumstance may, to many, appear abundantly idle; and we of course merely allude to it as an impression rootedly entwined with our departed friend's memory, who was by no means a superstitious woman.]

^b [Robert Burns, Jun., is the reputed author of the following song:—

HAE ye seen, in the calm dewy morning,
The red-breast wild warbling sea clear;
Or the low-dwelling, snow-breasted gowan,
Surcharg'd wi' mild e'enin's soft tear?
O, then ye hae seen my dear lassie,
The lassie I lo'e best of a';
But far frae the hame o' my lassie,
I'm monie a lang mile awa.

Her hair is the wing o' the blackbird,
Her eye is the eye o' the dove, have derived great benefits from it already; but, alas! my loss of appetite still continues. I shall not need your kind offer this week, and I return to town the beginning of next week, it not being a tide week. I am detaining a man in a burning hurry. So, God bless you.*

R. B.

home, that he would, if he pleased, bring him back in a post-chaise—a kind and delicate way of expressing his regard. It was now felt by all it seems, but a few, that the poet was not only dying, but dying in the deepest poverty.]

Dumfries, and though always a brunette, she was then smartly dressed, had fine eyes, and looked very well. She had several woovers at that time, according to report. Some seven or eight years afterwards, I had a chance of a few weeks of intimate and daily acquaintance with her in Edinburgh, and scarcely ever met a woman, either high or low, who improved as much on acquaintance. She had a great deal of good sense and good nature."—Hogg.

The following more detailed account of this interesting woman appeared in the Dumfries Courier at the time of her death; and bears internal marks of being from the eloquent pen of Mr. M'Diarmid:—

"To the poet, Jean Armour bore a family of five sons and four daughters. The whole of the latter died in early life, and were interred in the cemetery of their maternal grandfather in Mauchline churchyard. Of the sons two died very young, viz., Francis Wallace and Maxwell Burns,—the last of whom was a posthumous child, born the very day his father was buried.^a Of the said family of nine, three sons alone survive:—Robert, the eldest,^b a retired officer of the Accountant-General's Department, Stamp-office, London, now in Dumfries; and William and James Glencairn Burns, Captains in the Hon. the East India Company's Service.

"The term of Mrs. Burns' widowhood extended to thirty-eight years—in itself rather an unusual circumstance,—and, in July, 1796, when the bereavement occurred, she was but little beyond the age at which the majority of females marry. But she had too much respect for the memory of her husband, and regard for his children, to think of changing her name, although she might have done so more than once, with advantage; and was even careful to secure on lease, and repair and embellish, as soon as she could afford it, the decent though modest mansion in which he died. And here, for more than thirty years, she was visited by thousands on thousands of strangers, from the peer down to itinerant sonnet-teers,—a class of persons to whom she never refused an audience, or dismissed unrewarded. Occasionally, during the summer months, she was a good deal annoyed; but she bore all in patience, and although naturally fond of quiet, seemed to consider her house as open to visitors, and its mistress, in some degree, the property of the public.^c But the atten-

Her lips are the ripe blushing rose-bud,

Her bosom's the palace of love.

Tho' green be thy banks, O sweet Clutha!

Thy beauties ne'er charm me awa;

Forgive me, ye maidens o' sweet Clutha!

My heart is wi' her that's awa.

O love, tho'rt a dear fleeting pleasure,

The sweetest we mortals here know;

But soon is thy heaven, bright beaming,

O'ercast with the darkness of wo.

As the moon, on the oft-changing ocean,

Delights the lone mariner's eye,

Till red rush the storms of the desert,

And dark billows tumble on high.]

^c [The following little anecdote was some years ago told by Mrs. Burns, with great good humour, to a friend of ours, from whom we had it shortly after. A little ragged boy, selling ballads, called at a house near Mrs. Burns's dwelling in Dumfries, and inquired where Mrs. Burns lived. On her house being pointed out to him, "Ah," said he to the person who had given him the direction, "I would like to see her." "Well," was the reply, "go there and ask to sell your ballads, and you will see her." "But I dinna like," said he; "I think shame to gang there." Struck with the anxiety of the boy, and his diffidence, he was taken to Mrs. Burns's house, and put into the kitchen, where the servant began to

No. CCLXXIX.

TO JAMES ARMOUR,*

MASON, MAUCHLINE.

Dumfries, 18th July, 1796.

MY DEAR SIR,

Do, for heaven's sake, send Mrs. Armour here immediately. My wife is hourly expecting to be put to bed. Good God! what a situation for her to be in, poor girl, without a friend! I returned from sea-bathing quarters to-day, and my medical friends would almost persuade me that I am better, but I think and feel that my strength is so gone that the disorder will prove fatal to me.†

Your son-in-law,

R. B.

* [The father of Mrs. Burns.]

† [This is the last of all the compositions of the great poet of Scotland, being written only three days before his death. The original was long preserved in the family of the Armour of Mauchline, and was given into the keeping of Captain James Glencairn Burns on his most urgent entreaty. It is tions of strangers neither turned her head, nor were ever alluded to in the spirit of boasting; and had it not been for a female friend who accompanied her on one occasion to the King's Arms Inn, to meet, by invitation, the Marchioness of Hastings, no one would have known that that excellent lady directed the present Marquis, who was then a boy, to present Mrs. Burns with a glass of wine, and at the same time remarked, that 'he should consider himself very highly honoured, and cherish the recollection of having met the poet's widow, as long as he lived.' Hers, in short, was one of those well-balanced minds that cling instinctively to propriety and a medium in all things; and such as knew the deceased, earliest and latest, were unconscious of any change in her demeanour and habits, excepting, perhaps, greater attention to dress, and more refinement of manner, insensibly acquired by frequent intercourse with families of the first respectability. In her tastes she was frugal, simple, and pure; and delighted in music, pictures, and flowers. In spring and summer it was impossible to pass her windows without being struck with the beauty of the floral treasures they contained; and if extravagant in any thing, it was in the article of roots and plants of the finest sorts. Fond of the society of young people, she mingled as long as able in their innocent pleasures, and cheerfully filled for them the cup 'which cheers but not inebriates.' Although neither a sentimentalist nor a 'blue stocking,' she was a clever woman, possessed of great shrewdness, discriminated character admirably, and frequently made very pithy remarks; and were this the proper place for such a detail, proofs of what is stated might easily be adduced.

"When young, she must have been a handsome, comely woman, if not indeed a beauty, when the poet saw her for the first time on a bleach-green at Mauchline, engaged, like Peggy and Jenny, at Habbie's Howe. Her limbs were cast in the finest mould; and, up to middle l', her jet-black eyes were clear and sparkling, her carriage easy, and her step light. The writer of the present sketch never saw Mrs. Burns dance, nor heard her sing; but he has learnt from others that she moved with great grace on the floor, and chaunted her 'wood-notes wild' in a style but rarely equalled by unprofessional singers. Her voice was a brilliant treble, and in singing 'Coolen,' 'I gaed a waeft' gate yestreen,' and other songs, she rose without effort as high as B natural. In ballad poetry her taste was good, and range of reading rather extensive. Her memory, too, was strong, and she could quote when she chose at considerable length, and with great aptitalk with him about buying some of his ballads. Mrs. Burns being informed of the circumstance, came into the kitchen, when, to the amusement of the good old lady, the following dialogue took place:—Mrs. B. "And so you wish to see Mrs. Burns?" Boy, (anxiously), "O ay, I would like to see now in India, and may he who so worthily holds it be as fortunate as he is kind-hearted.—CUNNINGHAM, 1834.

This fervent wish has been accomplished. The Captain has now returned a Major, and has retired from the Hon. East India Company's Service with an independent fortune. J. C. 1840.]

tude. Of these powers the bard was so well aware that he read to her almost every piece he composed, and was not ashamed to own that he had profited by her judgment. In fact, none save relations, neighbours, and friends, could form a proper estimate of the character of Mrs. Burns. In the presence of strangers she was shy and silent, and required to be drawn out, or, as some would say, shown off to advantage, by persons who possessed her confidence, and knew her intimately.

"On Saturday, 22nd March, 1834, she was seized with paralysis for the fourth time during the last few years; and, although perfectly conscious of her situation, and the presence of friends, became deprived, before she could be removed to bed, of the faculty of speech, and, a day or two thereafter, of the sense of hearing. Still she lay wonderfully calm and composed, and, in the opinion of her medical attendant, suffered from weakness rather than from pain. Frequently she gazed with the greatest earnestness on her granddaughter, Sarah; and it was easy to read what was passing within, from the tears that filled her aged eyes, and trickled down her cheeks. To another individual she directed looks so eager and full of meaning as to impress him with the idea that she had some dying request to make, and deeply regretted that it was too late; for, even if her salvation had depended on the exertion, she was unfortunately incapacitated from uttering a syllable, guiding a pen, or even making an intelligible sign. The mind, in her case, survived the body; and this, perhaps, was the only painful circumstance attending her death-bed,—considering how admirable her conduct had always been, her general health so sound, her span protracted beyond the common lot, her character for prudence and piety so well established, and her situation in life every way so comfortable. On the night of Tuesday, or morning of Wednesday, a fifth shock, unperceived by the attendants, deprived Mrs. Burns of mental consciousness; and from that time till late in the evening, when she died, her situation was exactly that of a breathing corpse.—Thus passed away all that remained of 'bonny Jean,'—the relic of a man whose fame is as wide as the world itself, and the venerated heroine of many a lay which bid fair to live in the memories of the people of Scotland, and of thousands far removed from its shores, as long as the language in which they are written is spoken or understood. She was born at Mauchline in February, 1765, and had thus entered the seventieth year of her age.]

her." Mrs. B. "Well, you see her now—I am Mrs. Burns." Boy, (looking utterly amazed), "Touts, you're jokin' me." Mrs. B. "Why do you think I am jokin' you?" Boy, (with great simplicity), "Because Burns speaks about his bonny Jean!"

COMMON-PLACE BOOKS.

FIRST COMMON-PLACE BOOK,

BEGUN IN APRIL, 1783.

TO ROBERT RIDDEL, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR :

IN rummaging over some old papers, I lighted on a MS. of my early years, in which I had determined to write myself out ; as I was placed by fortune among a class of men to whom my ideas would have been nonsense. I had meant that the book should have lain by me, in the fond hope that some time or other, even after I was no more, my thoughts would fall into the hands of somebody capable of appreciating their value. It sets off thus :—

“OBSERVATIONS,* HINTS, SONGS, SCRAPS OF POETRY, &c., by ROBERT BURNES, —a man who had little art in making money, and still less in keeping it ; but was, however, a man of some sense, a great deal of honesty, and unbounded good-will to every creature, rational and irrational.—As he was but little indebted to scholastic education, and bred at a plough-tail, his performances must be strongly tinctured with his unpolished, rustic way of life ; but as I believe they are really his own, it may be some entertainment to a curious observer of human nature to see how a ploughman thinks and feels under the pressure of love, ambition, anxiety, grief, with the like cares and passions, which, however diversified by the modes and manners of life, operate pretty much alike, I believe, on all the species.”

“There are numbers in the world who do not want sense to make a figure, so much as an opinion of their own abilities, to put them upon recording their observations, and allowing them the same importance which they do to those which appear in print.”—SHENSTONE.

“Pleasing, when youth is long expired, to trace
The forms our pencil, or our pen, design’d !
Such was our youthful air, and shape, and face,
Such the soft image of our youthful mind.”—Ibid.

April, 1783.

Notwithstanding all that has been said against love, respecting the folly and weakness it leads a young inexperienced mind into ; still I think it in a great measure deserves the highest encomiums that have been passed upon it.

* [Some of these “Observations” were published by Currie in the Poet’s Correspondence ; Cromek properly ventured to print the whole.—“It has been the chief object,” he observes, “in making this collection (The Reliques), not to omit any thing which might illustrate the character and feelings of the Bard at different periods of his life. Robert Riddel, the gentleman to whom he communicated the “Ob-

If any thing on earth deserves the name of rapture or transport, it is the feelings of green eighteen in the company of the mistress of his heart, when she repays him with an equal return of affection.

August.

There is certainly some connexion between love, and music, and poetry ; and, therefore, I have always thought it a fine touch of nature, that passage in a modern love-composition :

“As towards her cot he jogg’d along,
Her name was frequent in his song.”

For my own part, I never had the least thought or inclination of turning poet till I got once heartily in love, and then rhyme and song were, in a manner, the spontaneous language of my heart. The following composition was the first of my performances, and done at an early period of life, when my heart glowed with honest warm simplicity ; unacquainted and uncorrupted with the ways of a wicked world. The performance is, indeed, very puerile and silly ; but I am always pleased with it, as it recalls to my mind those happy days when my heart was yet honest, and my tongue was sincere. The subject of it was a young girl who really deserved all the praises I have bestowed on her. I not only had this opinion of her then—but I actually think so still, now that the spell is long since broken, and the enchantment at an end.

O once I lov’d a bonnie lass, &c.†

REMORSE.

September.

I entirely agree with that judicious philosopher, Mr. Smith, in his excellent Theory of Moral Sentiments, that remorse is the most painful sentiment that can embitter the human bosom. Any ordinary pitch of fortitude may bear up tolerably well under those calamities, in the procurement of which we ourselves have had no hand ; but when our own follies or servations,” was one of those steady friends whom his genius obtained for him. For his eye he wrote those remarks on Scottish song, given elsewhere, [page 518] and, indeed, on all occasions shewed how much he loved his worth, his taste, and his learning.]

† [See “My Handsome Nell,” page 339.]

crimes have made us miserable and wretched, to bear up with manly firmness, and at the same time to have a proper penitential sense of our misconduct, is a glorious effort of self-command.

March, 1784.

I have often observed, in the course of my experience of human life, that every man, even the worst, has something good about him;—though very often nothing else than a happy temperament of constitution inclining him to this or that virtue. For this reason, no man can say in what degree any other person, besides himself, can be, with strict justice, called wicked. Let any of the strictest character for regularity of conduct among us examine impartially how many vices he has never been guilty of, not from any care or vigilance, but for want of opportunity, or some accidental circumstance intervening; how many of the weaknesses of mankind he has escaped because he was out of the line of such temptation; and what often, if not always, weighs more than all the rest, how much he is indebted to the world's good opinion, because the world does not know all: I say, any man who can thus think will scan the failings, nay, the faults and crimes, of mankind around him with a brother's eye.

I have often courted the acquaintance of that part of mankind commonly known by the ordinary phrase of blackguards, sometimes farther than was consistent with the safety of my character; those who, by thoughtless prodigality or headstrong passions, have been driven to ruin. Though disgraced by follies, nay, sometimes stained with guilt, I have yet found among them, in not a few instances, some of the noblest virtues, magnanimity, generosity, disinterested friendship, and even modesty.

Shenstone finely observes, that love-verses, written without any real passion, are the most nauseous of all conceits; and I have often thought that no man can be a proper critic of love-composition, except he himself, in one or more instances, have been a warm votary of this passion. As I have been all along a miserable dupe to love, and have been led into a thousand weaknesses and follies by it, for that reason I put the more confidence in my critical skill, in distinguishing foppery and conceit from real passion and nature. Whether the following song will stand the test, I will not pretend to say, because it is my own; only I can say it was, at the time, genuine from the heart:—

Behind yon hills where Lugar flows, &c.*

* [See the song "My Nannie, O," page 347.]

March, 1784.

There was a certain period of my life that my spirit was broken by repeated losses and disasters, which threatened, and indeed effected, the utter ruin of my fortune. My body, too, was attacked by that most dreadful distemper, a hypochondria, or confirmed melancholy. In this wretched state, the recollection of which makes me yet shudder, I hung my harp on the willow trees, except in some lucid intervals, in one of which I composed the following:—

O thou Great Being! what thou art, &c.†

April.

The following song is a wild rhapsody, miserably deficient in versification; but, as the sentiments are the genuine feelings of my heart, for that reason I have a particular pleasure in conning it over.

My father was a farmer—upon the Carrick border, O, &c.‡

April.

I think the whole species of young men may be naturally enough divided into two grand classes, which I shall call the grave and the merry; though, by-the-bye, these terms do not, with propriety enough, express my ideas. The grave I shall cast into the usual division of those who are goaded on by the love of money, and those whose darling wish is to make a figure in the world. The merry are the men of pleasure of all denominations; the jovial lads, who have too much fire and spirit to have any settled rule of action; but, without much deliberation, follow the strong impulses of nature: the thoughtless, the careless, the indolent—in particular he who, with a happy sweetness of natural temper, and a cheerful vacancy of thought, steals through life—generally, indeed, in poverty and obscurity; but poverty and obscurity are only evils to him who can sit gravely down, and make a repining comparison between his own situation and that of others; and lastly, to grace the quorum, such are, generally, those whose heads are capable of all the towerings of genius, and whose hearts are warmed with all the delicacy of feeling.

August.

The foregoing was to have been an elaborate dissertation on the various species of men; but as I cannot please myself in the arrangement of my ideas, I must wait till farther experience and nicer observation throw more light on the subject.—In the mean time, I shall set down the following fragment, which, as it is the

† [See "Prayer under the pressure of violent Anguish," page 233.]

‡ [See page 341.]

genuine language of my heart, will enable any body to determine which of the classes I belong to:—

There's nought but care on ev'ry han',
In ev'ry hour that passes, O, &c.*

As the grand end of human life is to cultivate an intercourse with that BEING to whom we owe life, with every enjoyment that renders life delightful; and to maintain an integrative conduct towards our fellow-creatures; that so, by forming piety and virtue into habit, we may be fit members for that society of the pious and the good, which reason and revelation teach us to expect beyond the grave, I do not see that the turn of mind, and pursuits of such an one as the above verses describe—one who spends the hours and thoughts which the vocations of the day can spare, with Ossian, Shakspeare, Thomson, Shenstone, Sterne, &c.; or, as the maggot takes him, a gun, a fiddle, or a song to make or mend; and at all times some heart's-dear bonnie lass in view—I say I do not see that the turn of mind and pursuits of such an one are in the least more inimical to the sacred interests of piety and virtue than the even lawful bustling and straining after the world's riches and honours: and I do not see but he may gain heaven as well—which, by the bye, is no mean consideration—who steals through the vale of life, amusing himself with every little flower that fortune throws in his way, as he who, straining straight forward, and perhaps spattering all about him, gains some of life's little eminences, where, after all, he can only see and be seen a little more conspicuously than what, in the pride of his heart, he is apt to term the poor indolent devil he has left behind him.

August.

A Prayer, when fainting fits, and other alarming symptoms of a pleurisy or some other dangerous disorder, which indeed still threatens me, first put nature on the alarm:—

O thou unknown, Almighty Cause
Of all my hope and fear! &c. †

* [See song "Green grow the Rashes, O," page 349.]

† [See "A Prayer under the prospect of Death," p. 238.]

‡ ["There is no doubt that if Burns at any time really laboured under this infirmity, he was successful in inquiring into its causes, and also in his efforts to amend it. When he was, at a later period of life, introduced into the superior circles of society, he did not then appear as a cypher; nor did he, by any violation of the dictates of common sense, give any occasion, even to those who were superciliously disposed, to look upon him with contempt. On the contrary, he was conscious of his own moral and intellectual worth, and never abated an inch of his just claims to due consideration."—CROMEK.]

"The following extract of a letter," says Cromek, "from his great and good biographer (Currie), who was an excellent judge of human character, bears an honourable testimony to the habitual firmness, decision, and independence of his

EGOTISMS FROM MY OWN SENSATIONS.

May.

I don't well know what is the reason of it, but some how or other, though I am, when I have a mind, pretty generally beloved, yet I never could get the art of commanding respect. I—I imagine it is owing to my being deficient in what Sterne calls "that understrapping virtue of discretion."—I am so apt to a lapsus lingue that I sometimes think the character of a certain great man I have read of somewhere is very much apropos to myself—that he was a compound of great talents and great folly.—N.B. To try if I can discover the causes of this wretched infirmity, and, if possible, to mend it.

August.

However I am pleased with the works of our Scottish poets, particularly the excellent Ramsay, and the still more excellent Fergusson, yet I am hurt to see other places of Scotland, their towns, rivers, woods, haughs, &c., immortalized in such celebrated performances, while my dear native country, the ancient bailieries of Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham, famous both in ancient and modern times for a gallant and warlike race of inhabitants; a country where civil, and particularly religious, liberty have ever found their first support, and their last asylum; a country, the birth-place of many famous philosophers, soldiers, and statesmen, and the scene of many important events recorded in Scottish history, particularly a great many of the actions of the glorious WALLACE, the SAVIOUR of his country; yet, we have never had one Scotch poet of any eminence, to make the fertile banks of Irvine, the romantic woodlands and sequestered scenes on Ayr, and the heathy mountainous source and winding sweep of DOON, emulate Tay, Forth, Ettrick, Tweed, &c. This is a complaint I would gladly remedy, but, alas! I am far unequal to the task, both in native genius and education. § Obscure I am, and obscure I must be, though no young poet, nor young soldier's heart ever beat more fondly for fame than mine—mind, which constitute the only solid basis of respectability:

—Burns was a very singular man in the strength and variety of his faculties. I saw him, and once only, in the year 1792. We conversed together for about an hour in the street of Dumfries, and engaged in some very animated conversation. We differed in our sentiments sufficiently to be rather vehemently engaged—and this interview gave me a more lively as well as forcible impression of his talents than any part of his writings. He was a great orator—an original and very versatile genius."']

§ ["This kind of feeling," says Cromek, "appears to have animated the Poet's bosom, at a very early period of his life." In a poetical epistle, addressed to the "Gude Wife of Wauchope House," he alludes to the sensations of his early days in the following tender strain of sentiment:—

I mind it weel, in early date, &c.

See page 272.]

"And if there is no other scene of being
Where my insatiate wish may have its fill,—
This something at my heart that heaves for room,
My best, my dearest part, was made in vain."

September.

There is a great irregularity in the old Scottish songs, a redundancy of syllables with respect to the exactness of accent and measure that the English poetry requires, but which glides in, most melodiously, with the respective tunes to which they are set. For instance, the fine old song of "The Mill, Mill, O," to give it a plain, prosaic reading, it halts prodigiously out of measure; on the other hand, the song set to the same tune in Bremner's collection of Scotch songs, which begins "To Fanny fair could I impart," &c. it is most exact measure, and yet, let them both be sung before a real critic, one above the biases of prejudice, but a thorough judge of nature,—how flat and spiritless will the last appear, how trite, and lamely methodical, compared with the wild-warbling cadence, the heart-moving melody of the first!—This is particularly the case with all those airs which end with a hypermetrical syllable. There is a degree of wild irregularity in many of the compositions and fragments which are daily sung to them by my compeers, the common people—a certain happy arrangement of old Scotch syllables, and yet, very frequently, nothing, nor even like rhyme, a sameness of jingle, at the ends of the lines. This has made me sometimes imagine that, perhaps, it might be possible for a Scotch poet, with a nice judicious ear, to set compositions to many of our most favourite airs, particularly that class of them mentioned above, independent of rhyme altogether.

There is a noble sublimity, a heart-melting tenderness, in some of our ancient ballads, which shew them to be the work of a masterly hand: and it has often given me many a heart-ache to reflect that such glorious old bards—bards who very probably owed all their talents to native genius, yet have described the exploits of heroes, the pangs of disappointment, and the meltings of love, with such fine strokes of nature—that their very names (O how mortifying to a bard's vanity!) are now "buried among the wreck of things which were."

O ye illustrious names unknown! who could feel so strongly and describe so well: the last, the meanest of the muses' train—one who, though far inferior to your flights, yet eyes your path, and with trembling wing would sometimes soar after you—a poor rustic bard unknown, pays this sympathetic pang to your memory! Some of you tell us, with all the charms of verse, that you have been unfortunate in the world—unfortunate in love: he, too, has felt the loss of his little fortune, the loss of friends, and, worse than all, the loss of the woman he adored. Like you, all his consolation was his muse: she taught him in rustic measures to complain. Happy could he have done it with your strength of imagination and flow of verse! May the turf lie lightly on your bones! and may you now enjoy that solace and rest which this world rarely gives to the heart tuned to all the feelings of poesy and love!

September.

There is a fragment in imitation of an old Scotch song, well known among the countryingle sides.—I cannot tell the name, neither of the song nor the tune, but they are in fine unison with one another.—By the way, these old Scottish airs are so nobly sentimental that when one would compose to them, to "south the tune," as our Scotch phrase is, over and over, is the readiest way to catch the inspiration, and raise the bard into that glorious enthusiasm so strongly characteristic of our old Scottish poetry. I shall here set down one verse of the piece mentioned above, both to mark the song and tune I mean, and likewise as a debt I owe to the author, as the repeating of that verse has lighted up my flame a thousand times:—

When clouds in skies do come together
To hide the brightness of the sun,
There will surely be some pleasant weather
When a' their storms are past and gone.*

October, 1785.

If ever any young man, in the vestibule of the world, chance to throw his eye over these pages, let him pay a warm attention to the following observations, as I assure him they are the fruit of a poor devil's dear-bought experience.—I have literally, like that great poet and great gallant, and by consequence, that great fool, Solomon, "turned my eyes to behold madness and folly." Nay, I have, with all the ardour of a lively, fanciful, and whimsical imagination, accompanied with a warm, feeling, poetic heart, shaken hands with their intoxicating friendship.

In the first place, let my pupil, as he tenders his own peace, keep up a regular, warm intercourse with the Deity.

R. B.

[Here the manuscript closes abruptly.]

* Alluding to the misfortunes he feelingly laments before this verse. [This is the author's note.]

SECOND COMMON PLACE BOOK,*

BEGUN IN EDINBURGH, APRIL, 1787.

As I have seen a good deal of human life in Edinburgh, a great many characters which are new, to one bred up in the shades of life as I have been, I am determined to take down my remarks on the spot. Gray observes in a letter to Mr. Palgrave, that "half a word fixed upon, or near the spot, is worth a cart-load of recollection."

I don't know how it is with the world in general, but, with me, making my remarks is by no means a solitary pleasure. I want some one to laugh with me, some one to be grave with me, some one to please me and help my discrimination with his or her own remark; and at times, no doubt, to admire my acuteness and penetration.

The world are so busied with selfish pursuits, ambition, vanity, interest, or pleasure, that very few think it worth their while to make any observation on what passes around them, except where that observation is a sucker, or branch of the darling plant they are rearing in their fancy. Nor am I sure, notwithstanding all the sentimental flights of novel-writers, and the sage philosophy of moralists, whether we are capable of so intimate and cordial a coalition of friendship, as that one man may pour out his bosom, his every thought and floating fancy, his very inmost soul, with unreserved confidence to another, without hazard of losing part of that respect which man deserves from man; or, from the unavoidable imperfections attending human nature, of one day repenting his confidence.

For these reasons, I am determined to make these pages my confidant. I will sketch every character that any way strikes me, to the best of my power, with unshrinking justice. I will insert anecdotes and take down remarks, in the old law phrase, without feud or favour. Where

I hit on any thing clever, my own applause will in some measure feast my vanity; and, begging Patroclus' and Achates' pardon, I think a lock and key a security at least equal to the bosom of any friend whatever.

My own private story likewise, my love-adventures, my rambles; the frowns and smiles of fortune on my bardship; my poems and fragments that must never see the light, shall be occasionally inserted.—In short, never did four shillings purchase so much friendship, since confidence went first to market, or honesty was set up to sale.

To these seemingly invidious, but too just, ideas of human friendship I would cheerfully make one exception—the connexion between two persons of different sexes, when their interests are united and absorbed by the tie of love—

"When thought meets thought, ere from the lips it part,
And each warm wish springs mutual from the heart."

There, confidence, confidence that exalts them the more in one another's opinion, that endears them the more to each other's hearts, unreservedly "reigns and revels." But this is not my lot, and, in my situation, if I am wise (which by the bye I have no great chance of being), my fate should be cast with the Psalmist's sparrow, "to watch alone on the house-tops."—Oh, the pity!

I have heard and read a good deal of philosophy, benevolence, and greatness of soul: and when rounded with the flourish of declamatory periods, or poured in the mellifluence of Parnassian measure, they have a tolerable effect

Edinburgh society—his tact and talent for making them cannot be questioned.

"Burns entered into several parties of this description, with the usual vehemence of his character. His generous affections, his ardent eloquence, his brilliant and daring imagination, fitted him to be the idol of such associations; and accustoming himself to conversation of unlimited range, and to festive indulgences that scorned restraint, he gradually lost some portion of his relish for the more pure, but less poignant, pleasures to be found in the circles of taste, elegance, and literature. The sudden alteration in his habits of life operated on him physically as well as morally. The humble fare of an Ayr-shire peasant he had exchanged for the luxuries of the Scottish metropolis, and the effects of this change on his ardent constitution could not be inconsiderable. But whatever influence might be produced on his conduct, his excellent understanding suffered no corresponding debasement. He estimated his friends and associates of every description at their proper value, and appreciated his own conduct with a precision that might give scope to much curious and melancholy reflection. He saw his danger, and at times formed resolutions to guard against it; but he had embarked on the tide of dissipation, and was borne along its stream."

The fragments printed in the former editions of the Poet's works are merely the first draughts of certain passages in the letters to Clarinda, which we have given entire at the end of the volume.]

* [The above memoranda formed a part of the rough materials out of which Burns composed a more extended and elaborate journal, commenced in the spring of the year 1787, in which he recorded his observations on men and manners, literary anecdotes, scraps of verse, favourite passages from his letters, and not a little searching criticism. Of that valuable volume, nothing it is believed now exists, save the fragments contained in the following pages. Cromek announces its probable fate in these words:—"On his arrival in Edinburgh, Burns took lodgings with a Mrs. Carfrae, in the Lawn-market, where a person, a carpenter, then working at Leith, often called to see him. This man, in the latter part of the year 1787, or beginning of 1788, enlisted into the Company of Artificers then raising to go to Gibraltar. Just before he set off he got access to Burns's room, in his absence, and stole the book, which contained a faithful record of every thing interesting that happened to him at Edinburgh, with characteristic sketches of the different literary gentlemen to whom he had been introduced. He was written to repeatedly to restore the book, a clasped quarto, but in vain. He had even the audacity to acknowledge the theft, but he refused to part with the journal. It is supposed that he died in the year 1798, as he has not been heard of since."]

Of the value of the work we have thus, I fear, lost, some estimate may be formed from what Currie says of the opportunities which Burns enjoyed of making observations on on a musical ear; but when all these high-sounding professions are compared with the very act and deed, as it is usually performed, I do not think there is any thing in, or belonging to, human nature so badly disproportionate. In fact, were it not for a very few of our kind, among whom an honoured friend of mine—whom to you, Sir, I will not name—in a distinguished instance, the very existence of magnanimity, generosity, and all their kindred virtues, would be as much a question with metaphysicians as the existence of witchcrafts.

The whining cant of love, except in real passion, and by a masterly hand, is to me as insufferable as the preaching cant of old father Smeaton, whig-minister at Kilmaurs. Darts, flames, cupids, loves, graces, and all that farrago, are just a Mauchline . . . ,—a senseless rabble.

I glory in being a Poet, and I want to be thought a wise man. I would fondly be generous, and I wish to be rich. After all, I am afraid I am a lost subject. "Some folk hae a hantle o' fauts, and I'm but a ne'er-do-weel." To close this melancholy reflection, I shall just add a piece of devotion commonly known in Carrick by the title of the wabster's grace—

Some say we're thieves, and e'en sae are we!
Some say we lie, and e'en sae do we!
Gude forgi'e us! and I hope sae will he!
Up!—and to your looms, lads!

I have lately been much mortified with contemplating an unlucky imperfection in the very framing and construction of my soul; namely, a blundering inaccuracy of her olfactory organs in hitting the scent of craft or design in my fellow-creatures. I do not mean any compliment to my ingenuousness, or to hint that the defect is in consequence of the unsuspecting simplicity of conscious truth and honour. I take it to be, in some way or other, an imperfection in the mental sight; or, metaphor apart, some modification of dulness. In two or three small instances, lately, I have been most shamefully out.

An old man's dying, except he has been a very benevolent character, or in some particular situation of life that the welfare of the poor or the helpless depended on him, I think an event of the most trifling moment to the world. Man is naturally a kind, benevolent animal; but he is dropt into such a needy situation here in this vexatious world, and has such a whoreson, hungry, growling, multiplying pack of necessities, appetites, passions, and desires about him, ready to devour him for want of other food, that, in fact, he must lay aside his cares for others that he may look properly to himself.

Poets, of all mankind, feel most forcibly the powers of beauty. If they are really poets of Nature's making, their feelings must be finer, and their taste more delicate than those of most of the world. In the cheerful bloom of spring, or the pensive mildness of autumn; the grandeur of summer, or the hoary majesty of winter,—the poet feels a charm unknown to the rest of his species. Even the sight of a fine flower, or the company of a fine woman (by far the finest part of God's works below), have sensations for the poetic heart that the herd of mankind are strangers to.

What pleasure is in the power of the fortunate and happy, by their notice and patronage, to brighten the countenance and glad the heart of depressed worth! I am not so angry with mankind for their deaf economy of the purse. The goods of this world cannot be divided without being lessened; but why be a niggard of that which bestows bliss on a fellow-creature, yet takes nothing from our own means of enjoyment? We wrap up ourselves in the cloak of our own better fortune, and turn away our eyes, lest the wants and woes of our brother-mortals should disturb the selfish apathy of our souls!

I have every possible reverence for the much-talked-of world beyond the grave; and I wish that which piety believes, and virtue deserves, may be all matter-of-fact.

Strong pride of reasoning, with a little affection of singularity, may mislead the best of hearts. I, likewise, in the pride of despising old women's stories, ventured in "the daring path Spinosa trod;" but experience of the weakness, not the strength, of human powers, made me glad to grasp at revealed religion.

THE POETS

ASSIGNMENT OF HIS WORKS.

[THE admirers of Burns are indebted to the kindness of Gilbert M'Nab, Esq. of Ayr, for the following important document, which throws light both on the actions and feelings of the poet during a period when "hungry ruin had him in the wind."]

KNOW all men by these presents that I, Robert Burns of Mossgiel: whereas I intend to leave Scotland and go abroad, and having acknowledged myself the father of a child named Elizabeth, begot upon Elizabeth Paton in Largieside: and whereas Gilbert Burns in Mossgiel, my brother, has become bound, and hereby binds and obliges himself to aliment, clothe and educate my said natural child in a suitable manner as if she were his own, in case her mother choose to part with her, and that until she arrive at the age of fifteen years. Therefore, and to enable the said Gilbert Burns to make good his said engagement, wit ye me to have assigned, disposed, conveyed, and made over to, and in favour of, the said Gilbert Burns, his heirs, executors, and assignees, who are always to be bound in like manner with himself, all and sundry goods, gear, corn, cattle, horses, milt, sheep, household furniture, and all other moveable effects of whatever kind that I shall leave behind me on my departure from this Kingdom, after allowing for my part of the conjunct debts due by the said Gilbert Burns and me as joint tacksmen of the farm of Mossgiel. And particularly, without prejudice of the foresaid generality, the profits that may arise from the publication of my poems presently in the press. And also, I hereby dispone and convey to him in trust for behoof of my said natural daughter, the copy-right of said poems in so far as I can dispose of the same by law, after she arrives at the above age of fifteen years complete. Surrogating and substituting the said Gilbert Burns my brother and his foresaids in my full right, title, room and place of the whole premises, with power to him to intromit with, and dispose upon the same at pleasure, and in general to do every other thing in the premises that I could have done myself before granting hereof, but always with and under the conditions before expressed. And I oblige myself to warrant this disposition and assignation from my own proper fact and deed allenary. Consenting to the registration hereof in the books of Council and Session, or any other Judges' books competent, therein to remain for preservation, and constitute Procurars, &c. In witness whereof I have written and signed these presents, consisting of this and the preceding page, on stamped paper, with my own hand, at the Mossgiel, the twenty-second day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six years.

(Signed) ROBERT BURNS.

Upon the twenty-fourth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six years, I, William Chalmer, Notary Publick, past to the Mercat Cross of Ayr head Burgh of the Sheriffdome thereof, and thereat I made due and lawful intimation of the foregoing disposition and assignation to his Majesties lieges, that they might not pretend ignorance thereof, by reading the same over in presence of a number of people assembled. Whereupon William Crooks, writer, in Ayr, as attorney for the before designed Gilbert Burns, protested that the same was lawfully intimated, and asked and took instruments in my hands. These things were done betwixt the hours of ten and eleven forenoon, before and in presence of William M'Cubbin, and William Eaton, apprentices to the Sheriff Clerk of Ayr, witnesses to the premises.

(Signed) WILLIAM CHALMER, N. P.

WILLIAM M'CUBBIN, Witness.

WILLIAM EATON, Witness.

LETTERS TO CLARINDA.

TO THE PUBLIC.

THE following letters, with the exception of one only, were written by ROBERT BURNS before his marriage. They are printed verbatim from the originals, and where any of them are torn, which unfortunately is the case with two or three, the deficiencies are marked by asterisks.

The lady to whom they are addressed seems to have encouraged a friendly correspondence with the Poet, whose fascinating powers of mind must necessarily have produced, on her part, esteem, and admiration.

Yet, although he was forbidden to indulge the more tender affections of the heart, it was natural to expect, from the strong sensibility and delicate feelings of the Bard, that, in his correspondence with a young and amiable woman, love must be a principal theme.

As these letters, on perusal, will be found to possess every mark of the strong and vigorous mind of Burns, they will, in no degree, diminish that celebrity he has so justly merited by his epistolary compositions.

No. I.*

Thursday Evening.

MADAM,

I HAD set no small store by my tea-drinking to-night, and have not often been so disappointed. Saturday evening I shall embrace the opportunity with the greatest pleasure. I leave this town this day se'ennight, and, probably for a couple of twelvemonths; but must ever regret that I so lately got an acquaintance I shall ever highly esteem, and in whose welfare I shall ever be warmly interested.

Our worthy common friend, in her usual pleasant way, rallied me a good deal on my new acquaintance, and in the humour of her ideas I wrote some lines, which I enclose you, as I think they have a good deal of poetic merit; and Miss —— tells me you are not only a critic, but a poetess. Fiction, you know, is the native region of poetry; and I hope you will pardon my vanity in sending you the bagatelle as a tolerable off-hand jeu-d'esprit. I have several poetic trifles, which I shall gladly leave with Miss ——, or you, if they were worth house room; as there are scarcely two people on earth by whom it would mortify me more to be forgotten, though at the distance of nine-score miles.—I am, Madam, with the highest respect, your very humble Servant,

* * *

No. II.†

Saturday Evening.

I CAN say with truth, Madam, that I never met with a person in my life whom I more anxiously wished to meet again than yourself. To-night I was to have had that very great pleasure; I was intoxicated with the idea, but an unlucky fall from a coach has so bruised one of my knees that I can't stir my leg; so if I don't see you again, I shall not rest in my grave for chagrin. I was vexed to the soul I had not seen you sooner; I determined to cultivate your friendship with the enthusiasm of religion; but thus has Fortune ever served me. I cannot bear the idea of leaving Edinburgh without seeing you. I know not how to account for it—I am strangely taken with some people, nor am I often mistaken. You are a stranger to me; but I am an odd being; some yet unnamed feelings, things, not principles, but better than whims, carry me farther than boasted reason ever did a philosopher.—Farewell! every happiness be yours!

* [This is generally printed as No. II. of the letters, while in fact it should be No. I. Its date must have been the 6th Dec. 1787. He was to have drunk tea that day, but was disappointed by the lady who afterwards asked him for Saturday, on which day the accident to his leg happened.—MOTHERWELL.]

† [The date of this letter must have been the 8th Dec. 1787. Burns met with his accident on that day. Vide his letter to Miss Chalmers, in which he alludes to that unlucky occurrence.—Ibid.]

No. III.

Friday Evening, 22d Dec., 1787.

I BEG your pardon, my dear "Clarinda," for the fragment scrawl I sent you yesterday.* I really do not know what I wrote. A gentleman, for whose character, abilities, and critical knowledge, I have the highest veneration, called in just as I had begun the second sentence, and I would not make the porter wait. I read to my much-respected friend several of my own bagatelles, and, among others, your lines, which I had copied out. He began some criticisms on them as on the other pieces, when I informed him they were the work of a young lady in this town, which, I assure you, made him stare. My learned friend seriously protested that he did not believe any young woman in Edinburgh was capable of such lines: and if you know any thing of Professor Gregory, you will neither doubt of his abilities nor his sincerity. I do love you, if possible, still better for having so fine a taste and turn for poesy. I have again gone wrong in my usual unguarded way, but you may erase the word, and put esteem, respect, or any other tame Dutch expression you please in its place. I believe there is no holding converse, nor carrying on correspondence, with an amiable woman, much less a gloriously amiable fine woman, without some mixture of that delicious passion, whose most devoted slave I have more than once had the honour of being.—But why be hurt or offended on that account? Can no honest man have a prepossession for a fine woman, but he must run his head against an intrigue? Take a little of the tender witchcraft of love, and add to it the generous, the honourable sentiments of manly friendship: and I know but one more delightful morsel, which few, few in any rank ever taste. Such a composition is like adding cream to strawberries; it not only gives the fruit a more elegant richness, but has a peculiar deliciousness of its own.

I enclose you a few lines I composed on a late melancholy occasion. I will not give above five or six copies of it at all, and I would be hurt if any friend should give any copies without my consent.

You cannot imagine, Clarinda (I like the idea of Arcadian names in a commerce of this kind), how much store I have set by the hopes of your future friendship. I do not know if you have a just idea of my character, but I wish you to see me as I am. I am, as most people of my trade are, a strange Will-o'-Wisp being; the victim, too frequently, of much imprudence and many follies. My great constituent elements are pride and passion. The first I have endeavoured to humanize into integrity and honour; the last makes me a devotee to the warmest degree of enthusiasm, in love, religion, or friendship—either of them, or all together, as I happen to be inspired. 'Tis true, I never saw you but once; but how much acquaintance did I form with you in that once! Do not think I flatter you, or have a design upon you, Clarinda; I have too much pride for the one, and too little cold contrivance for the other; but of all God's creatures I ever could approach in the beaten way of my acquaintance, you struck me with the deepest, the strongest, the most permanent impression. I say, the most permanent, because I know myself well, and how far I can promise either in my prepossessions or powers. Why are you unhappy? And why are so many of our fellow-creatures, unworthy to belong to the same species with you, blest with all they can wish? You have a hand all benevolent to give—Why were you denied the pleasure? You have a heart formed—gloriously formed—for all the most refined luxuries of love: Why was that heart ever wrong? O Clarinda! shall we not meet in a state, some yet unknown state of being, where the lavish hand of plenty shall minister to the highest wish of benevolence; and where the chill north-wind of prudence shall never blow over the flowery fields of enjoyment? If we do not, man was made in vain! I deserved most of the unhappy hours that have lingered over my head; they were the wages of my labour: but what unprovoked demon, malignant as hell, stole upon the confidence of untrusting busy Fate, and dashed your cup of life with undeserved sorrow?

Let me know how long your stay will be out of town; I shall count the hours till you inform me of your return. Cursed etiquette forbids your seeing me just now; and so soon as I can walk I must bid Edinburgh adieu. Lord, why was I born to see misery which I cannot relieve, and to meet with friends whom I cannot enjoy? I look back with the pang of unavailing avarice on my loss in not knowing you sooner: all last winter, these three months past, what luxury of intercourse have I not lost! Perhaps, though, 'twas better for my peace. You see I am either above, or incapable of, dissimulation. I believe it is want of that particular genius. I despise design, because I want

* [This does not appear. It probably talked of love, and called forth the verses beginning, "Talk not of love," and to which she must have signed Clarinda, from its being marked as a quotation.—MOTHERWELL.]

either coolness or wisdom to be capable of it. I am interrupted.—Adieu! my dear Clarinda!

SYLVANDER.

No. IV.*

You are right, my dear Clarinda: a friendly correspondence goes for nothing, except one writes his or her undisguised sentiments. Yours please me for their intrinsic merit, as well as because they are yours, which, I assure you, is to me a high recommendation. Your religious sentiments, Madam, I revere. If you have, on some suspicious evidence, from some lying oracle, learned that I despise or ridicule so sacredly important a matter as real religion, you have, my Clarinda, much misconstrued your friend.—“I am not mad, most noble Festus!” Have you ever met a perfect character? Do we not sometimes rather exchange faults than get rid of them? For instance, I am perhaps tired with, and shocked at, a life too much the prey of giddy inconsistencies and thoughtless follies; by degrees I grow sober, prudent, and stately pious—I say stately, because the most unaffected devotion is not at all inconsistent with my first character—I join the world in congratulating myself on the happy change. But let me pry more narrowly into this affair. Have I, at bottom, any thing of a secret pride in these endowments and emendations? Have I nothing of a presbyterian sourness, an hypocritical severity, when I survey my less regular neighbours? In a word, have I missed all those nameless and numberless modifications of indistinct selfishness, which are so near our own eyes that we can scarcely bring them within the sphere of our vision, and which the known spotless cambric of our character hides from the ordinary observer?

My definition of worth is short; truth and humanity respecting our fellow-creatures; reverence and humility in the presence of that Being, my Creator and Preserver, and who, I have every reason to believe, will one day be my Judge. The first part of my definition is the creature of unbiassed instinct; the last is the child of after reflection. Where I found these two essentials, I would gently note, and slightly mention, any attendant flaws—flaws, the marks, the consequences, of human nature.

I can easily enter into the sublime pleasures that your strong imagination and keen sensibility must derive from religion, particularly if a little in the shade of misfortune: but I own I cannot, without a marked grudge, see Heaven totally engross so amiable, so charming, a woman as my friend Clarinda; and should be very well pleased at a circumstance that would put it in the power of somebody (happy somebody!) to divide her attention, with all the delicacy and tenderness of an earthly attachment.

You will not easily persuade me that you have not a grammatical knowledge of the English language. So far from being inaccurate, you are elegant beyond any woman of my acquaintance, except one, whom I wish you knew.

Your last verses to me have so delighted me that I have got an excellent old Scots air that suits the measure, and you shall see them in print in the Scots Musical Museum, a work publishing by a friend of mine in this town. I want four stanzas; you gave me but three, and one of them alluded to an expression in my former letter; so I have taken your first two verses, with a slight alteration in the second, and have added a third; but you must help me to a fourth. Here they are: the latter half of the first stanza would have been worthy of Sappho; I am in raptures with it.

Talk not of Love, it gives me pain,
For Love has been my foe;
He bound me with an iron chain,
And sunk me deep in woe.

But Friendship's pure and lasting joys
My heart was formed to prove;
There, welcome, win, and wear the prize,
But never talk of love.

Your friendship much can make me blest,
O why that bliss destroy!
[only]
Why urge the odious one request,
[will]
You know I must deny.

The alteration in the second stanza is no improvement, but there was a slight inaccuracy in your rhyme. The third I only offer to your choice, and have left two words for your determination. The air is ‘The banks of Spey,’ and is most beautiful.

To-morrow evening I intend taking a chair, and paying a visit at Park Place to a much-valued old friend. If I could be sure of finding you at home (and I will send one of the chairmen to call), I would spend from five to six o'clock with you, as I go past. I cannot do more at this time, as I have something on my hand that hurries me much. I propose giving you the first call, my old friend the second, and Miss ——— as I return home. Do not break any engagement for me, as I will spend another evening with you, at any rate, before I leave town.

* [This letter appears to have been written about the 1st of January 1788, and probably the order in which it is now inserted is correct.—MOTHERWELL.]

Do not tell me that you are pleased when your friends inform you of your faults. I am ignorant what they are; but I am sure they must be such evanescent trifles, compared with your personal and mental accomplishments, that I would despise the ungenerous narrow soul who would notice any shadow of imperfections you may seem to have, any other way than in the most delicate agreeable raillery. Coarse minds are not aware how much they injure the keenly feeling tie of bosom-friendship, when, in their foolish officiousness, they mention what nobody cares for recollecting. People of nice sensibility and generous minds have a certain intrinsic dignity that fires at being trifled with, or lowered, or even too nearly approached.

You need make no apology for long letters: I am even with you. Many happy new years to you, charming Clarinda! I can't dissemble, were it to shun perdition. He who sees you as I have done, and does not love you, deserves to be damn'd for his stupidity! He who loves you, and would injure you, deserves to be doubly damn'd for his villany! Adieu.

SYLVANDER.

P.S. What would you think of this for a fourth stanza?

Your thought, if love must harbour there,
Conceal it in that thought,
Nor cause me from my bosom tear
The very friend I sought.

No. V.

Monday Evening, 11 o'clock, 21st January.

WHY have I not heard from you, Clarinda? To-day I expected it; and before supper, when a letter to me was announced, my heart danced with rapture: but behold, 'twas some fool who had taken it into his head to turn poet, and made me an offering of the first-fruits of his nonsense. "It is not poetry, but prose run mad." Did I ever repeat to you an epigram I made on a Mr. Elphinstone, who has given a translation of Martial, a famous Latin poet?—The poetry of Elphinstone can only equal his prose notes. I was sitting in the shop of a merchant of my acquaintance, waiting somebody; he put Elphinstone into my hand, and asked my opinion of it; I begged leave to write it on a blank leaf, which I did.

TO MR. ELPHINSTONE, &c.

O thou, whom poesy abhors!
Whom prose has turned out of doors!
Heard'st thou that groan? proceed no further;
'Twas laurel'd Martial roaring Murther!

I am determined to see you, if at all possible, on Saturday evening. Next week I must sing

The night is my departing night,
The morn's the day I maun awa;
There's neither friend nor foe o' mine,
But wishes that I were awa!
What I has done for lack o' wit,
I never, never can reca';
I hope ye're a' my friends as yet,
Guid night, and joy be wi' you a'!

If I could see you sooner, I would be so much the happier; but I would not purchase the dearest gratification on earth, if it must be at your expense in worldly censure, far less inward peace!

I shall certainly be ashamed of thus scrawling whole sheets of incoherence. The only unity (a sad word with poets and critics!) in my ideas is CLARINDA. There my heart "reigns and revels."

"What art thou, Love? whence are those charms,
That thus thou bear'st an universal rule?
For thee the soldier quits his arms,
The king turns slave, the wise man fool.
In vain we chase thee from the field,
And with cool thoughts resist thy yoke;
Next tide of blood, alas! we yield;
And all those high resolves are broke!"

I like to have quotations for every occasion. They give one's ideas so pat, and save one the trouble of finding expression adequate to one's feelings. I think it is one of the greatest pleasures, attending a poetic genius, that we can give our woes, cares, joys, loves, &c., an embodied form in verse, which to me is ever immediate ease. Goldsmith says finely of his Muse—

"Thou source of all my bliss and all my wo,
Thou found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so."

My limb has been so well to-day that I have gone up and down stairs often without my staff. To-morrow I hope to walk once again on my own legs to dinner. It is only next street—Adieu.

SYLVANDER.

No. VI.

Saturday Noon, 26th January.

SOME days, some nights, nay, some hours, like the "ten righteous persons in Sodom," save the rest of the vapid, tiresome, miserable months and years of life. One of these hours, my dear Clarinda bless'd me with yesternight.

—"One well spent hour,
In such a tender circumstance for friends,
Is better than an age of common time!"

THOMSON.

My favourite feature in Milton's Satan is his manly fortitude in supporting what cannot be remedied—in short, the wild broken fragments of a noble exalted mind in ruins. I meant no more by saying he was a favourite hero of mine.

I mentioned to you my letter to Dr. Moore, giving an account of my life: it is truth, every word of it; and will give you the just idea of a man whom you have honoured with your friendship. I am afraid you will hardly be able to make sense of so torn a piece.—Your verses I shall muse on deliciously, as I gaze on your image in my mind's eye, in my heart's core; they will be in time enough for a week to come. I am truly happy your head-ache is better.—O, how can pain or evil be so daringly, unfeelingly, cruelly savage as to wound so noble a mind, so lovely a form!

My little fellow is all my name-sake.—Write me soon. My every, strongest good wishes attend you, Clarinda!

SYLVANDER.

I know not what I have written—I am pestered with people around me.

No. VII.

Sunday Night, 27th January.

THE impertinence of fools has joined with a return of an old indisposition, to make me good for nothing to-day. The paper has lain before me all this evening, to write to my dear Clarinda, but—

“Fools rush'd on fools, as waves succeed to waves.”

I cursed them in my soul; they sacrilegiously disturbed my meditations on her who holds my heart. What a creature is man! A little alarm last night and to-day, that I am mortal, has made such a revolution on my spirits! There is no philosophy, no divinity, comes half so home to the mind. I have no idea of courage that braves heaven. 'Tis the wild ravings of an imaginary hero in bedlam.

I can no more, Clarinda; I can scarcely hold up my head; but I am happy you do not know it, you would be so uneasy.

SYLVANDER.

Monday Morning, 28th January.

I am, my lovely friend, much better this morning on the whole; but I have a horrid languor on my spirits.

“Sick of the world, and all its joys,
My soul in pining sadness mourns;
Dark scenes of woe my mind employs,
The past and present in their turns.”

Have you ever met with a saying of the great, and likewise good, Mr. Locke, author of the famous Essay on the Human Understanding? He wrote a letter to a friend, directing it “not to be delivered till after my decease:” it ended thus—“I know you loved me when living, and will preserve my memory now I am dead. All the use to be made of it is that this life affords no solid satisfaction, but in the consciousness of having done well, and the hopes of another life. Adieu! I leave my best wishes with you.

J. LOCKE.”

Clarinda, may I reckon on your friendship for life? I think I may. Thou Almighty Preserver of men! thy friendship, which hitherto I have too much neglected, to secure it shall, all the future days and nights of my life, be my steady care! The idea of my Clarinda follows—

“Hide it, my heart, within that close disguise,
Where, mix'd with God's, her lov'd idea lies.”

But I fear that inconstancy, the consequent imperfection of human weakness. Shall I meet with a friendship that defies years of absence, and the chances and changes of fortune? Perhaps “such things are;” *one honest man I have great hopes from that way: but who, except a romance writer, would think on a love that could promise for life, in spite of distance, absence, chance, and change; and that, too, with slender hopes of fruition? For my own part, I can say to myself in both requisitions, “Thou art the man!” I dare, in cool resolve I dare, declare myself that friend, and that lover. If womankind is capable of such things, Clarinda is. I trust that she is; and feel I shall be miserable if she is not. There is not one virtue which gives worth, nor one sentiment which does honour to the sex, that she does not possess, superior to any woman I ever saw: her exalted mind, aided a little, perhaps, by her situation, is, I think, capable of that nobly-romantic love-enthusiasm.

May I see you on Wednesday evening, my dear angel? The next Wednesday again will, I conjecture, be a hated day to us both. I tremble for censorious remark, for your sake; but in extraordinary cases, may not usual and useful precaution be a little dispensed with? Three evenings, three swift-winged evenings, with pinions of down, are all the past; I dare not calculate the future. I shall call at Miss —'s to-morrow evening; 'twill be a farewell call.

I have written out my last sheet of paper, so I am reduced to my last half-sheet. What a strange mysterious faculty is that thing called imagination! We have no ideas almost at all of another world; but I have often amused myself with visionary schemes of what happiness might be enjoyed by small alterations—alterations that we can fully enter into, in this present state of existence. For instance, suppose you and I, just as we are at present; the same reasoning powers, sentiments, and even desires; the same fond curiosity for knowledge and remarking observation in our minds; and imagine our bodies free from pain and the necessary supplies for the wants of nature at all times, and easily within our reach: imagine further, that we were set free from the laws of gravitation, which bind us to this globe, and could at pleasure fly, without inconvenience, through all the yet un conjectured bounds of creation, what a life of bliss would we lead, in our mutual pursuit of virtue and knowledge, and our mutual enjoyment of friendship and love!

* [Alluding to Captain Brown.]

I see you laughing at my fairy fancies, and calling me a voluptuous Mahometan; but I am certain I would be a happy creature, beyond any thing we call bliss here below; nay, it would be a paradise congenial to you too. Don't you see us, hand in hand, or rather, my arm about your lovely waist, making our remarks on Sirius, the nearest of the fixed stars; or surveying a comet, flaming innocuous by us, as we just now would mark the passing pomp of a travelling monarch; or in a shady bowyer of Mercury or Venus, dedicating the hour to love, in mutual converse, relying honour, and revelling endearment, whilst the most exalted strains of poesy and harmony would be the ready spontaneous language of our souls! Devotion is the favourite employment of your heart; so is it of mine: what incentives then to, and powers for, reverence, gratitude, faith, and hope, in all the fervours of adoration and praise to that Being, whose unsearchable wisdom, power, and goodness, so pervaded, so inspired, every sense and feeling!—By this time, I dare say, you will be blessing the neglect of the maid that leaves me destitute of paper!

SYLVANDER.

No. VIII.*

Tuesday Night.

I AM delighted, charming Clarinda, with your honest enthusiasm for religion. Those of either sex, but particularly the female, who are lukewarm in that most important of all things, "O my soul, come not thou into their secrets!"—I feel myself deeply interested in your good opinion, and will lay before you the outlines of my belief. He, who is our Author and Preserver, and will one day be our Judge, must be (not for his sake in the way of duty, but from the native impulse of our hearts) the object of our reverential awe and grateful adoration: He is Almighty and all-bounteous, we are weak and dependent; hence prayer and every other sort of devotion.—"He is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to everlasting life;" consequently it must be in every one's power to embrace his offer of "everlasting life;" otherwise he could not, in justice, condemn those who did not. A mind pervaded, actuated, and governed by purity, truth, and charity, though it does not merit heaven, yet is an absolutely necessary pre-requisite, without which heaven can neither be obtained nor enjoyed; and, by divine promise, such a mind shall never fail of attaining "everlasting life:" hence the impure, the deceiving, and the uncharitable, extrude themselves from eternal bliss, by their unfitness for enjoying it. The Supreme Being has put the immediate administration of all this, for wise and good ends known to himself, into the hands of Jesus Christ, a great personage, whose relation to him we cannot comprehend, but whose relation to us is a guide and Saviour; and who, except for our own obstinacy and misconduct, will bring us all, through various ways, and by various means, to bliss at last.

These are my tenets, my lovely friend; and which, I think, cannot be well disputed. My creed is pretty nearly expressed in the last clause of Jamie Dean's grace, an honest weaver in Ayr-shire; "Lord, grant that we may lead a guid life! for a guid life maks a guid end, at least it helps weel!"

I am flattered by the entertainment you tell me you have found in my packet. You see me as I have been, you know me as I am, and may guess at what I am likely to be. I too may say, "Talk not of love," &c., for indeed he has "plunged me deep in woe!" Not that I ever saw a woman who pleased unexceptionably, as my Clarinda elegantly says, "In the companion, the friend, and the mistress." One indeed I could except—One, before passion threw its mists over my discernment, I knew the first of women! Her name is indelibly written in my heart's core—but I dare not look in on it—a degree of agony would be the consequence. Oh! thou perfidious, cruel, mischief-making demon, who presidest over that frantic passion—thou mayest, thou dost, poison my peace, but thou shalt not taint my honour—I would not, for a single moment, give an asylum to the most distant imagination that would shadow the faintest outline of a selfish gratification, at the expense of her whose happiness is twisted with the threads of my existence.—May she be as happy as she deserves! And if my tenderest, faithfullest friendship can add to her bliss, I shall at least have one solid mine of enjoyment in my bosom! Don't guess at these ravings!

I watched at our front window to-day, but was disappointed. It has been a day of disappointments. I am just risen from a two hours' bout after supper, with silly or sordid souls, who could relish nothing in common with me but the Port.—One—'Tis now "witching time of night;" and whatever is out of joint in the foregoing scrawl, impute it to enchantments and spells; for I can't look over it, but will seal it up directly, as I don't care for tomorrow's criticisms on it.

* [This appears to have been written on the 8th or 15th of January.]

You are by this time fast asleep, Clarinda; may good angels attend and guard you as constantly and faithfully as my good wishes do!

"Beauty, which, whether waking or asleep, Shot forth peculiar graces."

John Milton, I wish thy soul better rest than I expect on my pillow to-night! O for a little of the cart-horse part of human nature! Good night, my dearest Clarinda!

SYLVANDER.

No. IX.

Thursday Noon, 10th or 17th January.

I AM certain I saw you, Clarinda; but you don't lodge to the proper story for a poet's lodging—

"Where speculation roosted near the sky,"

I could almost have thrown myself over for very vexation. Why didn't you look higher? It has spoiled my peace for this day. To be so near my charming Clarinda; to miss her look when it was searching for me—I am sure the soul is capable of disease, for mine has convulsed itself into an inflammatory fever.

You have converted me, Clarinda. (I shall love that name while I live: there is heavenly music in it.) Booth and Amelia I know well.* Your sentiments on that subject, as they are on every subject, are just and noble. "To be feelingly alive to kindness, and to unkindness," is a charming female character.

What I said in my last letter, the powers of fuddling sociality only know for me. By yours, I understand my good star has been partly in my horizon, when I got wild in my reveries. Had that evil planet, which has almost all my life shed its baleful rays on my devoted head, been, as usual, in my zenith, I had certainly blabbed something that would have pointed out to you the dear object of my tenderest friendship, and, in spite of me, something more. Had that fatal information escaped me, and it was merely chance, or kind stars, that it did not, I had been undone! You would never have written me, except perhaps once more! O, I could curse circumstances, and the coarse tie of human laws, which keep fast what common sense would loose, and which bars that happiness itself cannot give—happiness which otherwise Love and Honour would warrant! But hold—I shall make no more "hair breadth 'scapes."

My friendship, Clarinda, is a life-rent business. My likings are both strong and eternal. I told you I had but one male friend: I have but two female. I should have a third, but she is surrounded by the blandishments of flattery and courtship.  I register in my heart's core—* * * *. Miss N— can tell how divine she is. She is worthy of a place in the same bosom with my Clarinda. That is the highest compliment I can pay her.

Farewell, Clarinda! Remember

SYLVANDER.

No. X.

Saturday Morning, 12th or 19th January.

YOUR thoughts on religion, Clarinda, shall be welcome. You may perhaps distrust me, when I say 'tis also my favourite topic; but mine is the religion of the bosom. I hate the very idea of a controversial divinity; as I firmly believe that every honest upright man, of whatever sect, will be accepted of the Deity. If your verses, as you seem to hint, contain censure, except you want an occasion to break with me, don't send them. I have a little infirmity in my disposition, that where I fondly love, or highly esteem, I cannot bear reproach.

"Reverence thyself" is a sacred maxim, and I wish to cherish it. I think I told you Lord Bolingbroke's saying to Swift—"Adieu, dear Swift, with all thy faults I love thee entirely; make an effort to love me with all mine." A glorious sentiment, and without which there can be no friendship! I do highly, very highly esteem you indeed, Clarinda—you merit it all! Perhaps, too, I scorn dissimulation! I could fondly love you: judge then, what a maddening sting your reproach would be. "O! I have sins to Heaven, but none to you!"—With what pleasure would I meet you to-day, but I cannot walk to meet the fly. I hope to be able to see you on foot, about the middle of next week.

I am interrupted—perhaps you are not sorry for it, you will tell me—but I wont anticipate blame. O Clarinda! did you know how dear to me is your look of kindness, your smile of approbation! you would not, either in prose or verse, risk a censorious remark.

"Curst be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe!"

SYLVANDER.

* See Fieldina's novel of Amelia.]

No. XI.

Tuesday Morning, 29th January.

I CANNOT go out to-day, my dearest Clarinda, without sending you half a line, by way of a sin-offering; but, believe me, 'twas the sin of ignorance. Could you think that I intended to hurt you by any thing I said yesternight? Nature has been too kind to you for your happiness, your delicacy, your sensibility.—O why should such glorious qualifications be the fruitful source of woe! You have “murdered sleep” to me last night. I went to bed, impressed with an idea that you were unhappy: and every start I closed my eyes, busy Fancy painted you in such scenes of romantic misery that I would almost be persuaded you were not well this morning.

—————“If I unwittingly have offended, Impute it not.”

—————“But while we live,
But one short hour, perhaps, between us two
Let there be peace.”

If Mary is not gone by the time this reaches you, give her my best compliments. She is a charming girl, and highly worthy of the noblest love.

I send you a poem to read, till I call on you this night, which will be about nine. I wish I could procure some potent spell, some fairy charm that would protect from injury, or restore to rest that bosom-chord, “tremblingly alive all o'er,” on which hangs your peace of mind. I thought, vainly, I fear, thought that the devotion of love—love strong as even you can feel—love guarded, invulnerably guarded, by all the purity of virtue, and all the pride of honour; I thought such a love would make you happy—will I be mistaken? I can no more for hurry * * * *

No. XII.

Sunday Morning, 3d February.

I HAVE just been before the throne of my God, Clarinda; according to my association of ideas, my sentiments of love and friendship, I next devote myself to you. Yesterday night I was happy—happiness “that the world cannot give.”—I kindle at the recollection; but it is a flame where innocence looks smiling on, and honour stands by a sacred guard.—Your heart, your fondest wishes, your dearest thoughts, these are yours to bestow: your person is unapproachable by the laws of your country; and he loves not as I do who would make you miserable.

You are an angel, Clarinda; you are surely no mortal that “the earth owns.”—To kiss your hand, to live on your smile, is to me far more exquisite bliss than the dearest favours that the fairest of the sex, yourself excepted, can bestow.

Sunday Evening.

You are the constant companion of my thoughts. How wretched is the condition of one who is haunted with conscious guilt, and trembling under the idea of dreaded vengeance! and what a placid calm, what a charming secret enjoyment it gives, to bosom the kind feelings of friendship, and the fond throes of love! Out upon the tempest of anger, the acrimonious gall of fretful impatience, the sullen frost of louring resentment, or the corroding poison of withered envy! They eat up the immortal part of man! If they spent their fury only on the unfortunate objects of them, it would be something in their favour; but these miserable passions, like traitor Iscariot, betray their lord and master.

Thou Almighty Author of peace, and goodness, and love! do thou give me the social heart that kindly tastes of every man's cup!—Is it a draught of joy?—warm and open my heart to share it with cordial unenvying rejoicing! Is it the bitter potion of sorrow?—melt my heart with sincerely sympathetic woe! Above all, do thou give me the manly mind, that resolutely exemplifies in life and manners those sentiments which I would wish to be thought to possess! The friend of my soul—there, may I never deviate from the firmest fidelity and most active kindness! Clarinda, the dear object of my fondest love; there, may the most sacred inviolate honour, the most faithful kindling constancy, ever watch and animate my every thought and imagination!

Did you ever meet with the following lines spoken of Religion, your darling topic?

“’Tis this, my friend, that streaks our morning bright!

’Tis this that gilds the horrors of our night;

When wealth forsakes us, and when friends are few,

When friends are faithless, or when foes pursue;

’Tis this that wards the blow, or stills the smart,

Disarms affliction, or repels its dart;

Within the breast bids purest rapture rise,

Bids smiling Conscience spread her cloudless skies.”

I met with these verses very early in life, and was so delighted with them that I have them by me, copied at school.

Good night and sound rest, my dearest Clarinda!

SYLVANDER.

No. XIII.*

I was on the way, my Love, to meet you, (I never do things by halves) when I got your card. M—— goes out of town to-morrow morning to see a brother of his who is newly arrived from —— . I am determined that he and I shall call on you together; so, look you, lest I should never see to-morrow, we will call on you to-night; —— and you may put off tea till about seven; at which time, in the Galloway phrase, ‘an the beast be to the fore, an the branks bide hale,’ expect the humblest of your humble servants, and his dearest friend. We propose staying only half an hour, ‘for ought we ken.’ I could suffer the lash of misery eleven months in the year, were the twelfth to be composed of hours like yesternight. You are the soul of my enjoyment: all else is of the stuff and stocks of stones.

* [This letter must have been written early in February.]

SYLVANDER.

No. XIV.

Thursday Morning, 7th February.

“Unlavish Wisdom never works in vain.”

I HAVE been tasking my reason, Clarinda, why a woman who for native genius, poignant wit, strength of mind, generous sincerity of soul, and the sweetest female tenderness, is without a peer, and whose personal charms have few, very, very few parallels among her sex; why, or how she should fall to the blessed lot of a poor hairum scairum poet, whom Fortune had kept for her particular use, to wreak her temper on whenever she was in ill humour. One time I conjectured that, as Fortune is the most capricious jade ever known, she may have taken, not a fit of remorse, but a paroxysm of whim, to raise the poor devil out of the mire, where he had so often and so conveniently served her as a stepping stone, and given him the most glorious boon she ever had in her gift, merely for the maggot’s sake, to see how his fool head and his fool heart will bear it. At other times I was vain enough to think that Nature, who has a great deal to say with Fortune, had given the coquettish goddess some such hint as, “Here is a paragon of female excellence, whose equal, in all my former compositions, I never was lucky enough to hit on, and despair of ever doing so again; you have cast her rather in the shades of life; there is a certain Poet of my making; among your frolics it would not be amiss to attach him to this master-piece of my hand, to give her that immortality among mankind which no woman of any age ever more deserved, and which few rhymesters of this age are better able to confer.”

Evening, 9 o’clock.

I AM here, absolutely unfit to finish my letter—pretty hearty after a bowl, which has been constantly plied since dinner till this moment. I have been with Mr. Schetki, the musician, and he has set it* finely.—I have no distinct ideas of any thing, but that I have drunk your health twice to-night, and that you are all my soul holds dear in this world.

SYLVANDER.

No. XV.

Saturday Morning, 9th February.

THERE is no time, my Clarinda, when the conscious thrilling chords of Love and Friendship give such delight as in the pensive hours of what our favourite, Thomson, calls ‘Philosophic Melancholy.’ The sportive insects who bask in the sunshine of prosperity; or the worms that luxuriant crawl amid their ample wealth of earth—they need no Clarinda: they would despise Sylvander—if they durst. The family of Misfortune, a numerous groupe of brothers and sisters! they need a resting-place to their souls: unnoticed, often condemned by the world; in some degree, perhaps, condemned by themselves, they feel the full enjoyment of ardent love, delicate tender endearments, mutual esteem, and mutual reliance.

In this light I have often admired religion. In proportion as we are wrung with grief, or distracted with anxiety, the ideas of a compassionate Deity, an Almighty Protector, are doubly dear.

“’Tis this, my Friend, that streaks our morning bright;
’Tis this that gilds the horrors of our night.”

I have been this morning taking a peep through, as Young finely says, ‘the dark postern of time long elaps’d;’ and, you will easily guess, ’twas a rueful prospect. What a tissue of thoughtlessness, weakness, and folly! My life reminded me of a ruined temple; what strength, what proportion in some parts! what unsightly gaps, what prostrate ruins in others! I kneeled down before the Father of mercies, and said, “Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son!”—I rose, eased and strengthened. I despise the superstition of a fanatic, but I love the religion of a man. “The future,” said I to myself, “is still before me;” there let me

——— ‘On reason build resolve,
That column of true majesty in man!’

“I have difficulties many to encounter,” said I; “but they are not absolutely insuperable: and where is firmness of mind shewn but in exertion? mere declamation is bombastic rant.” Besides, wherever I am, or in whatever situation I may be—

* [“Clarinda, mistress of my soul,” &c. —See page 270.]

'Tis nought to me:
 Since God is ever present, ever felt,
 In the void waste as in the city full;
 And where He vital breathes, there must be joy!"

Saturday Night—half after Ten.

What luxury of bliss I was enjoying this time yesternight! My ever-dearest Clarinda, you have stolen away my soul: but you have refined, you have exalted it: you have given it a stronger sense of virtue, and a stronger relish for piety.—Clarinda, first of your sex, if ever I am the veriest wretch on earth to forget you; if ever your lovely image is effaced from my soul,

"May I be lost, no eye to weep my end;
 And find no earth that's base enough to bury me!"

What trifling silliness is the childish fondness of the every-day children of the world! 'tis the unmeaning toying of the younglings of the fields and forests: but where Sentiment and Fancy unite their sweets; where Taste and Delicacy refine; where Wit adds the flavour, and Goodness gives strength and spirit to all, what a delicious draught is the hour of tender endearment!—Beauty and Grace, in the arms of Truth and Honour, in all the luxury of mutual love.

Clarinda, have you ever seen the picture realized? Not in all its very richest colouring.

Last night, Clarinda, but for one slight shade, was the glorious picture—

—Innocence

Look'd gaily smiling on; while rosy Pleasure
 Hid young Desire amid her flowery wreath,
 And pour'd her cup luxuriant; mantling high,
 The sparkling heavenly vintage, Love and Bliss!

Clarinda, when a poet and poetess of Nature's making, two of Nature's noblest productions! when they drink together of the same cup of Love and Bliss—attempt not, ye coarser stuff of human nature, profanely to measure enjoyment ye never can know!—Good night, my dear Clarinda!

SYLVANDER.

No. XVI.

About 10th February.

MY EVER DEAREST CLARINDA,

I MAKE a numerous dinner party wait me while I read yours, and write this. Do not require that I should cease to love you, to adore you in my soul—'tis to me impossible—your peace and happiness are to me dearer than my soul—name the terms on which you wish to see me, to correspond with me, and you have them—I must love, pine, mourn, and adore in secret—this you must not deny me—you will ever be to me—

"Dear as the light that visits these sad eyes,
 Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart!"

I have not patience to read the puritanic scrawl.—Vile sophistry!—Ye heavens! thou God of nature! thou Redeemer of mankind! ye look down with approving eyes on a passion inspired by the purest flame, and guarded by truth, delicacy, and honour; but the half-inch soul of an unfeeling, cold-blooded, pitiful presbyterian bigot cannot forgive any thing above his dungeon bosom and foggy head.

Farewell; I'll be with you to-morrow evening—and be at rest in your mind—I will be yours in the way you think most to your happiness! I dare not proceed—I love, and will love you, and will with joyous confidence approach the throne of the almighty Judge of men, with your dear idea, and will despise the scum of sentiment, and the mist of sophistry.

SYLVANDER.

No. XVII.

Tuesday Evening, 12th Feb.

THAT you have faults, my Clarinda, I never doubted; but I knew not where they existed, and Saturday night made me more in the dark than ever. O Clarinda! why will you wound my soul, by hinting that last night must have lessened my opinion of you? True, I was "behind the scenes with you;" but what did I see? A bosom glowing with honour and benevolence; a mind ennobled by genius, informed and refined by education and reflection, and exalted by native religion, genuine as in the climes of heaven; a heart formed for all the glorious meltings of friendship, love, and pity. These I saw.—I saw the noblest immortal soul creation ever showed me.

I looked long, my dear Clarinda, for your letter; and am vexed that you are complaining. I have not caught you so far wrong as in your idea, that the commerce you have with one friend hurts you, if you cannot tell every tittle of it to another. Why have so injurious a suspicion of a good God, Clarinda, as to think that Friendship and Love, on the sacred inviolate principles of Truth, Honour, and Religion, can be any thing else than an object of His divine approbation?

I have mentioned, in some of my former scrawls, Saturday evening next. Do allow me to wait on you that evening. Oh, my angel! how soon must we part! and when can we meet again! I looked forward on the horrid interval with tearful eyes! What have I lost by not knowing you sooner! I fear, I fear my acquaintance with you is too short to make that lasting impression on your heart I could wish.

SYLVANDER.

No. XVIII.

"I AM distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan!" I have suffered, Clarinda, from your letter. My soul was in arms at the sad perusal; I dreaded that I had acted wrong. If I have robbed you of a friend, God forgive me! But, Clarinda, be comforted: let us raise the tone of our feelings a little higher and bolder. A fellow-creature who leaves us, who spurns us without just cause, though once our bosom friend—up with a little honest pride—let him go! How shall I comfort you, who am the cause of the injury? Can I wish that I had never seen you? that we had never met? No! I never will. But have I thrown you friendless?—there is almost distraction in that thought.

Father of mercies! against Thee often have I sinned; through Thy grace I will endeavour to do so no more! She who, Thou knowest, is dearer to me than myself, pour Thou the balm of peace into her past wounds, and hedge her about with Thy peculiar care, all her future days and nights! Strengthen her tender noble mind, firmly to suffer, and magnanimously to bear! Make me worthy of that friendship she honours me with. May my attachment to her be pure as devotion, and lasting as immortal life! O Almighty Goodness, hear me! Be to her at all times, particularly in the hour of distress or trial, a Friend and Comforter, a Guide and Guard.

"How are Thy servants blest, O Lord,
How sure is their defence!
Eternal Wisdom is their guide,
Their help, Omnipotence!"

Forgive me, Clarinda, the injury I have done you! To-night I shall be with you; as indeed I shall be ill at ease till I see you.

SYLVANDER.

No. XIX.

Two o'clock.

I JUST now received your first letter of yesterday, by the careless negligence of the penny-post. Clarinda, matters are grown very serious with us; then seriously hear me, and hear me, Heaven—I met you, my dear * * * *, by far the first of woman kind, at least to me; I esteemed, I loved you at first sight; the longer I am acquainted with you, the more innate amiableness and worth I discover in you.—You have suffered a loss, I confess, for my sake: but if the firmest, steadiest, warmest friendship; if every endeavour to be worthy of your friendship; if a love, strong as the ties of nature, and holy as the duties of religion—if all these can make any thing like a compensation for the evil I have occasioned you, if they be worth your acceptance, or can in the least add to your enjoyments—so help Sylvander, ye Powers above, in his hour of need, as he freely gives these all to Clarinda!

I esteem you, I love you as a friend; I admire you, I love you as a woman, beyond any one in all the circle of creation; I know I shall continue to esteem you, to love you, to pray for you, nay, to pray for myself for your sake.

Expect me at eight—And believe me to be ever, my dearest Madam, yours most entirely,

SYLVANDER.

No. XX.

February 14th, 1788.

WHEN matters, my love, are desperate, we must put on a desperate face—

—"On reason build resolve,
That column of true majesty in man."

Or, as the same author finely says in another place—

—"Let thy soul spring up,
And lay strong hold for help on him that made thee."

I am yours, Clarinda, for life. Never be discouraged at all this. Look forward; in a few weeks I shall be somewhere or other out of the possibility of seeing you: till then, I shall write you often, but visit you seldom. Your fame, your welfare, your happiness, are dearer to me than any gratification whatever. Be comforted, my love! the present moment is the worst: the lenient hand of Time is daily and hourly either lightening the burden, or making us insensible to the weight. None of these friends, I mean Mr. ——— and the other gentleman, can hurt your worldly support, and for their friendship, in a little time you will learn to be easy, and, by and by, to be happy without it. A decent means of livelihood in the world, an approving God, a peaceful conscience, and one firm trusty friend—can any body that has these be said to be unhappy? These are yours.

To-morrow evening I shall be with you about eight; probably for the last time till I return to Edinburgh. In the meantime, should any of these two unlucky friends question you respecting me, whether I am the man, I do not think they are entitled to any information. As to their jealousy and spying, I despise them.—Adieu, my dearest Madam!

SYLVANDER.

No. XXI.

GLASGOW, Monday Evening, 9 o'clock, 17th Feb. 1788.

THE attraction of love, I find, is in an inverse proportion to the attraction of the Newtonian philosophy. In the system of Sir Isaac, the nearer objects are to one another the stronger is the attractive force; in my system, every mile-stone that marked my progress from Clarinda awakened a keener pang of attachment to her.

How do you feel, my love? Is your heart ill at ease? I fear it.—God forbid that these persecutors should harass that peace which is more precious to me than my own. Be assured I shall ever think of you, muse on you, and, in my moments of devotion, pray for you. The hour that you are not in all my thoughts—“be that hour darkness! let the shadows of death cover it! let it not be numbered in the hours of the day!”

—“When I forget the darling theme,
Be my tongue mute! my fancy paint no more!
And, dead to joy, forget my heart to beat!”

I have just met with my old friend, the ship captain; guess my pleasure—To meet you could alone have given me more. My brother William, too, the young saddler, has come to Glasgow to meet me; and here are we three spending the evening.

I arrived here too late to write by post; but I'll wrap half a dozen sheets of blank paper together, and send it by the fly, under the name of a parcel. You shall hear from me next post town. I would write you a long letter, but for the present circumstance of my friend.

Adieu, my Clarinda! I am just going to propose your health by way of grace-drink.

SYLVANDER.

—◆—
No. XXII.

CUMNOCK, 2nd March, 1788.

I HOPE, and am certain, that my generous Clarinda will not think my silence, for now a long week,* has been in any degree owing to my forgetfulness. I have been tossed about through the country ever since I wrote you; and am here, returning from Dumfries-shire, at an inn, the post-office of the place, with just so long time as my horse eats his corn, to write you. I have been hurried with business and dissipation almost equal to the insidious decree of the Persian monarch's mandate, when he forbade asking petition of God or man for forty days. Had the venerable prophet been as strong as I, he had not broken the decree, at least not thrice a-day.

I am thinking my farming scheme will yet hold. A worthy intelligent farmer, my father's friend and my own, has been with me on the spot: he thinks the bargain practicable. I am myself, on a more serious review of the lands,

[* The letter about the 23d of February seems to be wanting.]

much better pleased with them. I won't mention this in writing to any body but you and ———. Don't accuse me of being fickle: I have the two plans of life before me, and I wish to adopt the one most likely to procure me independence. I shall be in Edinburgh next week. I long to see you: your image is omnipresent to me; nay, I am convinced I would soon idolatrise it most seriously; so much do absence and memory improve the medium through which one sees the much-loved object. To-night, at the sacred hour of eight, I expect to meet you—at the Throne of Grace. I hope, as I go home to night, to find a letter from you at the post-office in Mauchline. I have just once seen that dear hand since I left Edinburgh—a letter indeed which much affected me. Tell me, first of womankind! will my warmest attachment, my sincerest friendship, my correspondence, will they be any compensation for the sacrifices you make for my sake! If they will, they are yours. If I settle on the farm I propose, I am just a day and a half's ride from Edinburgh. We will meet—don't you say, “perhaps too often!”

Farewell, my fair, my charming Poetess! May all good things ever attend you! I am ever, my dearest Madam, yours,

SYLVANDER.

—◆—
No. XXIII.

MOSSGIEL, 7th March, 1788.

CLARINDA, I have been so stung with your reproach for unkindness, a sin so unlike me, a sin I detest more than a breach of the whole Decalogue, fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth articles excepted, that I believe I shall not rest in my grave about it, if I die before I see you. You have often allowed me the head to judge, and the heart to feel, the influence of female excellence. Was it not blasphemy, then, against your own charms, and against my feelings, to suppose that a short fortnight could abate my passion? You, my Love, may have your cares and anxieties to disturb you, but they are the usual recurrences of life; your future views are fixed, and your mind in a settled routine. Could not you, my ever dearest Madam, make a little allowance for a man, after long absence, paying a short visit to a country full of friends, relations, and early intimates? Cannot you guess, my Clarinda, what thoughts, what cares, what anxious forebodings, hopes and fears, must crowd the breast of the man of keen sensibility, when no less is on the tapis than his aim, his employment, his very existence, through future life?

Now that, not my apology, but my defence, is made, I feel my soul respire more easily. I know you will go along with me in my justification—would to Heaven you could in my adoption too! I mean an adoption beneath the stars—an adoption where I might revel in the immediate beams of

“She, the bright sun of all her sex.”

I would not have you, my dear Madam, so much hurt at Miss _____’s coldness. ’Tis placing yourself below her, an honour she by no means deserves. We ought, when we wish to be economists in happiness—we ought, in the first place, to fix the standard of our own character; and when, on full examination, we know where we stand, and how much ground we occupy, let us contend for it as property: and those who seem to doubt, or deny us what is justly ours, let us either pity their prejudices, or despise their judgment. I know, my dear, you will say this is self-conceit; but I call it self-knowledge. The one is the overweening opinion of a fool, who fancies himself to be what he wishes himself to be thought; the other is the honest justice that a man of sense, who has thoroughly examined the subject, owes to himself. Without this standard, this column in our own mind, we are perpetually at the mercy of the petulance, the mistakes, the prejudices, nay, the very weakness and wickedness of our fellow-creatures.

I urge this, my dear, both to confirm myself in the doctrine, which, I assure you, I sometimes need; and because I know that this causes you often much disquiet.—To return to Miss _____: she is most certainly a worthy soul, and equalled by very, very few, in goodness of heart. But can she boast more goodness of heart than Clarinda? Not even prejudice will dare to say so. For penetration and discernment, Clarinda sees far beyond her: to wit, Miss _____ dare make no pretence; to Clarinda’s wit, scarcely any of her sex dare make pretence. Personal charms, it would be ridiculous to run the parallel. And for conduct in life, Miss _____ was never called out, either much to do or to suffer; Clarinda has been both; and has performed her part where Miss _____ would have sunk at the bare idea.

Away, then, with these disquietudes! Let us pray with the honest weaver of Killbarchan—“Lord, send us a guid conceit o’ oursel!” Or, in the words of the auld sang,

“Who does me disdain, I can scorn them again,
And I’ll never mind any such foes.”

There is an error in the commerce of intimacy

* * * * *
* * * way of exchange, have not an equivalent to give us; and, what is still worse, have no idea of the value of our goods,

Happy is our lot, indeed, when we meet with an honest merchant, who is qualified to deal with us on our own terms; but that is a rarity. With almost every body we must pocket our pearls, less or more, and learn, in the old Scotch phrase—“To gie sic like as we get.” For this reason one should try to erect a kind of bank or store-house in one’s own mind; or, as the Psalmist says, ‘We should commune with our own hearts, and be still.’ This is exactly *

* * * * *

◆
No. XXIV.*

I own myself guilty, Clarinda; I should have written you last week; but when you recollect, my dearest Madam, that yours of this night’s post is only the third I have got from you, and that this is the fifth or sixth I have sent to you, you will not reproach me, with a good grace, for unkindness. I have always some kind of idea, not to sit down to write a letter, except I have ’time and possession of my faculties so as to do some justice to my letter; which at present is rarely my situation. For instance, yesterday I dined at a friend’s at some distance; and the savage hospitality of this country spent me the most part of the night over the nauseous potion in the bowl: this day—sick—head-ache—low spirit—miserable—fasting, except for a draught of water or small beer: now eight o’clock at night—only able to crawl ten minutes’ walk into Mauchline to wait the post, in the pleasurable hope of hearing from the mistress of my soul.

But, trust with all this! When I sit down to write to you, all is harmony and peace. A hundred times a-day do I figure you, before your taper, your book, or work laid aside, as I get within the room. How happy have I been! and how little of that scantling portion of time, called the life of man, is sacred to happiness! I could moralize to-night like a death’s head.—

“O what is life, that thoughtless wish of all!
A drop of honey in a draught of gall.”

Nothing astonishes me more, when a little sickness clogs the wheels of life, than the thoughtless career we run in the hour of health. “None saith, where is God, my Maker, that giveth songs in the night; who teacheth us more knowledge than the beasts of the field, and more understanding than the fowls of the air.”

Give me, my Maker, to remember thee!
Give me to act up to the dignity of my nature!
Give me to feel “another’s woe;” and continue with me that dear-lov’d friend that feels with mine!

* [This letter must have been written after his short visit to Edinburgh, when he concluded the bargain with Mr. Miller on the 13th March. He seems to have avoided seeing Clarinda on this occasion. Its date is probably about the 18th of March, 1788.]

The dignified and dignifying consciousness of an honest man, and the well-grounded trust in approving Heaven, are two most substantial sources of happiness.

* * * *

SYLVANDER.

No. XXV.*

1793.

BEFORE you ask me why I have not written you, first let me be informed of you how I shall write you? "In friendship," you say; and I have many a time taken up my pen to try an epistle of friendship to you; but it will not do: 'tis like Jove grasping a pop-gun, after having wielded his thunder. When I take up the pen, recollection ruins me. Ah! my ever dearest Clarinda! Clarinda!—what a host of memory's tenderest offspring crowd on my fancy at that sound! But I must not indulge that subject—you have forbid it.

I am extremely happy to learn that your precious health is re-established, and that you are once more fit to enjoy that satisfaction in existence, which health alone can give us. My old friend has indeed been kind to you. Tell him, that I envy him the power of serving you. I had a letter from him a while ago, but it was so dry, so distant, so like a card to one of his clients, that I could scarcely bear to read it, and have not yet answered it. He is a good honest fellow; and can write a friendly letter, which would do equal honour to his head and his heart; as a whole sheaf of his letters I have by me will witness: and though Fame does not blow her trumpet at my approach now, as she did then, when he first honoured me with his friendship, yet I am as proud as ever; and when I am laid in my grave, I wish to be stretched at my full length, that I may occupy every inch of ground which I have a right to.

* [This letter was written after the Poet's marriage.]

† [The following recent account of Clarinda, written in Feb. 1837, appears in a note, to the Memoir of Lord Craig, in "Kay's Edinburgh Portraits," and will be read with interest by all admirers of the Poet:—"It may, perhaps, be worthy of notice that Lord Craig was cousin-german of Mrs. M'Lehose, the celebrated Clarinda of Burns, who is still living in Edinburgh, and was left an annuity by his Lordship. She is now nearly eighty years of age, but enjoys excellent health. We found her sitting in the parlour, with some papers on the table. Her appearance at first betrayed a little of that languor and apathy which attend age and solitude; but the moment she comprehended the object of our visit, her countenance, which even yet retains the lineaments of what Clarinda may be supposed to have been, became animated and intelligent. 'That,' said she, rising up and pointing to an engraving over the mantel-piece, 'is a

You would laugh were you to see me where I am just now!—would to heaven you were here to laugh with me! though I am afraid that crying would be our first employment. Here am I set, a solitary hermit, in the solitary room of a solitary inn, with a solitary bottle of wine by me—as grave and as stupid as an owl—but, like that owl, still faithful to my old song. In confirmation of which, my dear Mrs. Mack, here is your good health! may the hand-waled benisons o' Heaven bless your bonnie face; and the wretch wha skellies at your weelfare, may the auld tinkler deil get him to clout his rotten heart! Amen.

You must know, my dearest Madam, that these now many years, wherever I am, in whatever company, when a married lady is called on as a toast, I constantly give you; but as your name has never passed my lips, even to my most intimate friend, I give you by the name of Mrs. Mack. This is so well known among my acquaintances that when my married lady is called for, the toast-master will say—"O, we need not ask him who it is—here's Mrs. Mack!" I have also, among my convivial friends, set on foot a round of toasts, which I call a round of Arcadian Shepherdesses; that is, a round of favourite ladies, under female names celebrated in ancient song; and then, you are my Clarinda. So, my lovely Clarinda, I devote this glass of wine to a most ardent wish for your happiness!

In vain would Prudence, with decorous sneer,
Point out a cens'ring world, and bid me fear;
Above that world on wings of love I rise,
I know its worst, and can that worst despise.
"Wrong'd, injur'd, shunn'd, unpitied, unredrest,
The mock'd quotation of the scorner's jest,"
Let Prudence' direst bodements on me fall,
Clarinda, rich reward! o'erpass them all! †

I have been rhyming a little of late, but I do not know if they are worth postage.—Tell me

* * * *

SYLVANDER.

likeness of my relative (Lord Craig) about whom you have been inquiring. He was the best friend I ever had! After a little conversation about his Lordship, she directed our attention to a picture of Burns, by Horsburgh, after Taylor, on the opposite wall of the apartment. 'You well know who that is—it was presented to me by Constable and Co., for having simply declared what I knew to be true, that the likeness was good.' We spoke of the correspondence betwixt the Poet and Clarinda, at which she smiled, and pleasantly remarked on the great change which the lapse of so many years had produced on her personal appearance. Indeed, any observation respecting Burns seemed to afford her pleasure; and she laughed at a little anecdote we told of him, which she had never before heard.

"Having prolonged our intrusion to the limits of courtesy, and conversed on various topics, we took leave of the venerable lady, highly gratified by the interview." †]

A D D E N D A.

Epitaph on W —.

REST gently, turf, upon his breast,
His chicken heart's so tender;
But rear huge castles on his head,
His skull will prop them under.

Poetical Epistle to Burns,

BY THE

REV. JOHN SKINNER.

THE following verses were addressed to the Poet by the author of the popular song of Tullochgorum; and, it is hoped, they will be considered as an acceptable addition to this unique publication. In the Poet's own words, he looked upon them as the best poetical compliment he ever received.*

O! HAPPY hour for ever mair,
That led my Chill up Cha'mers'† stair,
And gae him, what he values sair,
Sae braw a skance
Of Ayr-shire's dainty Poet there,
By lucky chance.

Waes my auld heart I was na wi' you,
Tho' worth your while I cou'd na gie you,
But sin' I had na hap to see you
Whan ye was North,
I'm bauld to send my service to you
Hyne o'er the Forth.

Sae proud 's I am that ye hae heard
O' my attempts to be a Bard,
And thinks my muse nae that ill far'd
Seil o' your face!
I wad na wiss for mair reward
Than your good grace.

Your bonnie bookie, line by line
I've read, and think it freely fine;
Indeed, I darena ca't divine,
As others might;
For that, ye ken, frae pen like mine,
Wad no be right.

But, by my sang, I dinna wonner,
That your admirers, mony hunner,
Let gowkit flieps pretend to scunner
And tak' offence;
Ye've naething said that looks like blunnet
To fowks o' sense.

Your pawky "Dream" has humour in't,
I never saw the like in print;
The birth-day Laurit durst na mint
As ye hae done;
And yet there's nae a single hint
Can be mista'en.

Your "Mailie," and your guid "Auld Mare,"
And "Hallow-even's" funny cheer;
There's nane that's read them, far or near,
But reezes Robie,
And thinks them as diverting gear
As Yorick's Tobie.

But, O! the weel tauld "Cotter's Night"
Is what gies me the maist delight:
A piece sae finish'd, and sae tight,
There's nane o's a'
Cou'd preachment-timmer cleaner dight
In kirk nor ha'.

But what need this or that to name?
It's own'd by a' there's no a theme
Ye tak' in hand, but's a' the same,
And nae ane o' them
But weel may challenge a' the fame
That we can gi' them.

For me, I heartily allow you
The wald o' praise sae justly due you:
And but a Plowman! Sall I true you?
Gin it be sae,
A miracle I will avow you,
Deny't wha may.

What recks a leash o' classic lair,
Thro' seven years, and some guide mair;
Whan plowman-lad, wi' nature bare
Sae far surpasses
A' we can do wi' study sair
To climb Parnassus.

* [See his letter to the Rev. John Skinner, page 632.]

† [The Printer of the Aberdeen Journal, in whose house Mr. Skinner first saw Burns's Poems.]

But, thanks to praise, ye're i' your prime,
 And may chant on this lang lang time ;
 For, let me tell you, 'tware a crime
 To haud your tongue,
 Wi' sic a knack's ye hae at rhyme,
 And you sae young.

Ye ken it's nae for ane like me
 To be sae droll as ye can be :
 But ony help that I can gie,
 Tho't be but sma',
 Your least command, I'se let you see,
 Sall gar me draw.

An hour or twa, by hook or crook,
 And may be three, some orrow owk
 That I can spare frae haly buik,
 (For that's my hobby,)
 I'll steal awa' to some by-neuk,
 And crack wi' Robie.

Wad ye but only crack again,
 Just what ye like, in ony strain,
 I'll tak' it kind ; for, to be plain,
 I do expect it ;
 And, mair than that, I'll no be fain
 Gin ye neglect it.

To LINSHART, gin my hame ye spier,
 Whare I hae heftt near fifty year,
 'Twill come in course, ye need na fear ;
 The pairt's weel ken't ;
 And postage, be it cheap or dear,
 I'll pay content.

Now, after a', hae me exqueez'd
 For wishing nae to be refeez'd ;
 I dinna covet to be reez'd
 For this fiel lilt ;
 But fiel or wise, gin ye be pleas'd,
 Ye're welcome fill't.

Sae, canty Plowman, fare ye weel ;
 Lord bless ye lang wi' hae and heil,
 And keep you aye the honest chiel
 That ye hae been ;
 Syne lift you to a better biel
 Whan this is dane !

POSTSCRIPT.

This auld Scots muse I've courted lang,
 And spar'd nae pains to win her ;
 Dowff tho' I be in rustic sang,
 I'm no a late beginner.

But now auld age taks dowie turns,
 Yet troth, as I'm a sinner,
 I'll aye be fond o' ROBIE BURNS,
 While I can sign
 JOHN SKINNER.

Linshart, Sept. 25th, 1787.

Verses

ON THE DEATH OF BURNS.

BY

Mrs. GRANT, OF LAGGAN.

WHAT adverse fate awaits the tuneful train !
 Has OTWAY died, and SPENSER liv'd in vain ?
 In vain has COLLINS, Fancy's pensive child,
 Pour'd his lone plaint by Arun's windings wild ?
 And SAVAGE, on Misfortune's bosom bred,
 Bar'd to the howling storm his houseless head ?
 Who gentle SHENSTONE's fate can hear un-
 mov'd,
 By virtue, elegance, and genius lov'd ?
 Yet, pensive wand'ring o'er his native plain,
 His plaints confess'd he lov'd the Muse in vain ;
 Chill Penury invades his favourite bower,
 Blasts every scene, and withers every flower ;
 His warning Muse to Prudence turn'd her strain, [vain ;
 But Prudence sung to thoughtlss bards in Still restless Fancy drives them headlong on,
 With dreams of wealth, and friends, and laurels won—
 On Ruin's brink they sleep, and wake undone. }

And see where Caledonia's Genius mourns,
 And plants the holly round the grave of
 BURNS :
 But late its " polish'd leaves and berries red
 Play'd graceful round the rural Poet's head,"
 And, while with manly force and native fire
 He wak'd the genuine Caledonian lyre,
 Tweed's severing flood exulting heard her tell,
 Not Roman wreaths the holly could excel ;
 Not Tiber's stream along Campania's plain,
 More pleas'd convey'd the gay Horatian strain ;
 Than bonny Doon, or fairy-haunted Ayr,
 That wont his rustic melody to share,
 Resound along their banks the pleasing theme,
 Sweet as their murmurs, copious as their stream ;
 And RAMSAY, once the Horace of the north,
 Who charm'd with various strains the listening
 Forth,
 Bequeath'd to him the shrewd peculiar art
 To Satire nameless graces to impart,
 To wield her weapons with such sportive ease
 That, while they wound, they dazzle and they please.

But when he sung to the attentive plain,
The humble virtues of the Patriarch swain,
His evening worship, and his social meal,
And all a parent's pious heart can feel ;
To genuine worth we bow submissive down,
And wish the cotter's lowly shed our own ;
With fond regard our native land we view ;
Its cluster'd hamlets, and its mountains blue,
Our " virtuous populace," a nobler boast
Than all the wealth of either India's coast.
Yet while our hearts with admiration burn,
Too soon we learn that " man was made to mourn."

The independent wish, the taste refin'd,
The energies of the superior mind,
And Feeling's generous pangs, and Fancy's glow,

And all that liberal Nature could bestow,
To him profusely given, yet given in vain ;
Misfortune aids and points the stings of pain.

How blest, when wand'ring by his native
Ayr, [care ;
He " woo'd the willing muse," unknown to
But when fond admiration spread his name,
A candidate for fortune and for fame,
In evil hour he left the tranquil shade,
Where Youth and Love with Hope and Fancy
play'd ;

Yet rainbow-colours gild the novel scene,
Deceitful fortune sweetly smil'd like JEAN ;
Now courted oft by the licentious gay,
With them through devious paths behold him
stray.

The opening rose conceals the latent thorn,
Convivial hours prolong'd awake the morn ;
Even Reason's sacred power is drown'd in wine,

And Genius lays her wreath on Folly's shrine.
Too sure, alas ! the world's unfeeling train
Corrupt the simple manners of the swain ;
The blushing Muse indignant scorns his lays,
And Fortune frowns, and honest Fame decays ;
Till low on earth he lays his sorrowing head,
And sinks untimely 'midst the vulgar dead.

Yet while for him, belov'd, admir'd, in vain,
Thus fond Regret pours forth her plaintive strain ; [hearse,

While Fancy, Feeling, Taste, their griefs re-
And deck with artless tears his mournful hearse,

See Cunning, Dullness, Ignorance, and Pride,
Exulting o'er his grave, in triumph ride ;
And boast " though Genius, Humour, Wit, agree,"

Cold selfish Prudence far excels the three ; [go,
Nor think, while grovelling on the earth they
How few can mount so high to fall so low.

Thus Vandals, Goths, and Huns exulting come,
T' insult the ruins of majestic Rome ;
But ye who honour Genius—sacred beam !
From holy light a bright ethereal gleam,

Ye whom his happier verse has taught to glow,
Now to his ashes pay the debt you owe—
Draw Pity's veil o'er his concluding scene,
And let the stream of bounty flow for JEAN.

The mourning matron and her infant train,
Will own you did not love the Muse in vain ;
While sympathy with liberal hand appears,
To aid the orphans' wants, and dry the widow's tears.

◆

Song

FOR THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH-
DAY OF ROBERT BURNS.

Written for the " CALEDONIAN SOCIETY," London, 1840,
BY ANDREW PARK.

Brave Scotland—Freedom's throne on Earth !
A bumper to thy glory !
This day thy matchless Bard had birth,
So fam'd in song and story !
Where'er thy mountain-sons may stray,
Thou'st thrown thy magic round them,
And on this ever-hallow'd day
In kindred love hast bound them.

He nobly walk'd behind his plough,
And gaz'd entranc'd on nature ;
While genius grac'd his lofty brow,
And play'd in every feature !
For then, inspir'd by glowing songs,
Of " Bruce," or " Highland Mary,"
The minstrel-birds, in joyous throngs,
Around their Bard would tarry !

But wae's my heart ! he sings nae mair
In strains o' joy or sorrow ;
Though on the bonny banks o' Ayr,
His spirit smiles each morrow !
And Scotia's muse—enthron'd on high—
The great, the gentle-hearted !
Sits with the tear-drop in her eye,
And mourns her Bard departed !

O sacred land of gallant men !
Of maidens unassuming !
Who dwell obscure by loch and glen,
Where still the thistle's blooming ;
How well has Burns rehears'd your praise,
Among your cloud-capt mountains,
In never-dying, tuneful lays,
Pure as your native fountains !

Then fill the sparkling goblet high,
And let no discord stain it ;
Let joy illumine each manly eye,
While to the dregs we drain it !
To Burns ! to Burns ! the King of Song !
Whose lyre shall charm all ages !
Mirth, wisdom, love, and satire strong,
Adorn his deathless pages !

THE

BROAD SWORDS OF OLD SCOTLAND.

BY

J. G. Lockhart, Esq.

Air—The Roast beef of Old England.

Now there's peace on the shore and there's calm on the sea,
 Fill a glass to the heroes whose swords kept us free,
 Right descendants of WALLACE, MONTROSE and DUNDEE.
 O, the broad swords of Old Scotland,
 O, the old Scottish broad swords.

Old SIR RALPH ABERCROMBY, the good and the brave,—
 Let him flee from our board, let him sleep with the slave,
 Whose libation falls slow as we honour his grave.
 O, the broad swords, &c.

Tho' he died not, like him, amid Victory's roar,
 Tho' disaster and gloom wove his shroud on the shore,
 Not the less we remember the spirit of MOORE.
 O, the broad swords, &c.

Yea, a place with the fallen the living shall claim,
 We'll entwine in one wreath every glorious name,
 The GORDON, the RAMSAY, the HOPE, and the GRAHAM.
 O, the broad swords, &c.

Count the rocks of the Spey, count the groves of the Forth,
 Count the stars in the clear cloudless sky of the North,
 Then go blazen their numbers, their names, and their worth.
 O, the broad swords, &c.

The highest in splendour, the humblest in place,
 Stand united in honour as kindred in race,
 For the private is brother in blood to his Grace.
 O, the broad swords, &c.

Even a Huntley will joy that a bumper hath flow'd
 To himself, and the lowest e'er crimson'd the sod,
 When he drew by his side for his king and his God,
 The broad sword of Old Scotland.
 O, the old Scottish broad swords.

Then sacred to all and to each let it be ;
 Fill a glass to the heroes whose swords kept us free,
 Right descendants of WALLACE, MONTROSE and DUNDEE.
 O, the broad swords, &c.*

* The above truly national and heart-stirring song, which is here given as a companion to the noble Ode of "SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLEED," was composed for the Mess of the (Edinburgh) Mid-Lothian Yeomanry Cavalry, about the year 1822: Mr. Thomson's attention being called to it, he was delighted on hearing it sung by the late Mr. Peter Hill, of Edinburgh, and requested, and got permission, to publish it in his collection of "Scottish Melodies,"—that splendid work to which Burns contributed so many of his best songs.

GLOSSARY.

THE explanation of Scottish words by Burns in his brief, but valuable, glossary annexed to the earlier editions of his poems, is now extended to words and phrases contained in his songs and other posthumous pieces. All his definitions have been scrupulously retained, and to these have been added such illustrations from poetic and proverbial lore as cannot fail being acceptable even to readers intimate with the varied dialect of the north. The Scottish dialect, with which the English language of much of our verse is sprinkled, sometimes defies even description: these expressive northern words were only adopted because the language of the south, though rich to overflowing, had nothing to offer as an equivalent. This is peculiarly the case with Burns: his works abound with words, and phrases, and allusions, which can neither be translated nor explained in their native spirit and force.

Yet some have thought it strange that Burns should be as popular in the south as in the north: this is not at all wondered at by those who are familiar with the very varied and forcible dialects of the English provinces. The truth is that the Scottish language is essentially Saxon, coloured a little with the Celtic, and as such is as well, perhaps better, understood in one half of the English counties than the scholastic language of Johnson and Gibbon.

Burns introduces his Glossary with these directions. "The ch and gh have always the guttural sound. The sound of the English diphthong oo is commonly spelled ou. The French u, a sound which often occurs in the Scottish language, is marked oo, or ui. The a, in genuine Scottish words, except when forming a diphthong, or followed by an e mute after a single consonant, sounds generally like the broad English a in wall. The Scottish diphthong ae always, and ea very often, sound like the French e masculine. The Scottish diphthong ey sounds like the Latin ei."

A

A'. All.
Aback. "And puts a' nature in a jovial mood." Ramsay.
 Away, aloof, back-wards.
Abeigh. At a shy distance.
 "Gaur'd puir Duncan stan' abeigh." Burns.
Aboon. Above, up.
 "Aboon the town upon the southwart side."
Blind Harry.
Abread. Abroad, in sight, to publish.
 "An' spread your beauties a' abroad." Burns.
Abreed. In breadth.
Adle. Putrid water.
Ae. One.
 "Ae man's meat's anither man's poison."
Scots Proverb.
Aff. Off.
Aff-loof. Off-hand, extempore, without premeditation.
 To shoot aff-loof is to shoot without a rest.
 "E'en wi' a canty tale he'd tell aff-loof."
Ramsay.
Afore. Before.
 "Better be afore at a burial than ahin
 at a bridal." Scots Saying.
Aft. Aften. Oft. Often.
 "An' pried it aft, as ye may trow." Macneil.
 "Atten I have young sportive gilpies seen."
Ramsay.
Agley. Off the right line, wrong, awry.
 "The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
 Gang aft agley." Burns.
Aiblins. Perhaps.
 "The man may aiblins tyne a stot," Montgomery.
Ain. Own.
 "This is no my ain house,
 I ken by the biggin' o't." Scots Song.
Airn. Iron, a tool of that metal, a mason's chisel.
 "Thraw me thro' my airs, quo' the gude Gordon,
 They cost the town o' Dumfries fu' dear."
Old Ballad.
Airles. Earnest money.
Airl-penny. A silver penny given as airles or hiring money.
 "Your proffer o' luv'es an' airl-pennie." Burns.

Agee. On one side.
 "Whilk pensylie he wears a thought agee." Ramsay.
Airt. Quarter of the heaven, point of the compass.
 "And under what airt of the heaven so high."
G. Douglas.
Aith. An oath.
 "He swore the great aith bodily." Wyntoun.
Aits. Oats.
 "Where aits are fine an' said by kind."
Scottish Song.
Aiver. An old horse.
 "Suppose I were ane auld yaud aiver." Dunbar.
Aizle. A hot cinder, an ember of wood.
 "She noticed na an aizle brunt
 Her braw new worsed apron." Burns.
Alake. Alas.
 "O dool and alake!" an exclamation of sorrow.
Alane. Alone.
 "And hald his heritage hir alane." Wyntoun.
Akwart. Awkward, athwart.
 "As he glaid by akwart he couth him ta."
Blind Harry.
Amaist. Almost.
 "A midge is as big as a mountain a' but amaist."
Scots Saying.
Amang. Among.
 "I met four chaps yon birks amang." Boswell.
An'. And, if.
 "And o', quo' he, an' I were as free." King Jas. V.
Ane. Ance. One. Once.
 "But gif it war ane or twa." Barbour.
Anent. Over-against, concerning, about.
Anither. Another.
 "Nature made her what she is,
 And never made anither." Burns.
Ase. Ashes of wood, remains of a hearth fire.
 "Remember that thou art but ase." Dunbar.
Asklent. Asquint, askant.
Asteer. Abroad, stirring in a lively manner.
 "My mither she's a scauldin' jaud,
 Hauds a' the house aster." Old Song.
Aqueesh. Between.
 "Aqueesh twa queans I kenna how to look."
Scottish Rhym.

- Athout.* Athwart.
Attour. Moreover, beyond, besides.
 "Attour the king shall remain in keeping."
Pitscottie.
Aught. Possession, as "in a' my aught," in all my possession.
 "I hae the Bible, an' there's no a better book in a' yere aught."
Scots Saying.
Auld. Old.
Auld-farran'. Auld farrant, sagacious, prudent, cunning.
 "These people right auld-farran' will be laith."
Ramsay.
Auld lang syne. Olden time, days of other years.
Ava. At all.
 "She neither kent spinning nor carding, Nor brewing nor baking ava."
Ross.
Awa. Away, begone.
 "Awa, quo' she, the diel's owre grit wi' you."
Ramsay.
Awfu'. Awful.
 "An awfu' scythe out owre ae shouther."
Burns.
Auld-shoon. Old shoes, literally; a discarded lover, metaphorically.
 "Ye may tell the coof that gets her, That he gets but my auld shoon."
Scots Song.
Aumos. Gift to a beggar; thus described in an old song: "A handfu' o' meal, a pickle o' grotts, Cauld parritch, or herring-bree."
Scots Song.
Aumos-dish. A beggar's dish in which the amos is received.
 "An' she held up her greedy gab, Just like an amos-dish."
Burns.
Awn. } The beard of barley, oats, &c.
Awnie. } Bearded.
 "And aits set up their awnie horn."
Burns.
Ayent. Beyond.
 "The auld wife ayont the fire, She died for lack o' sneeshing."
Ross.
- B
- Ba'.* Ball.
 "She saw three bonnie boys playing at the ba'."
Scots Song.
Backets. Ash-boards, as pieces of backet for removing ashes.
Backlins. Comin', coming back, returning.
 "And backlins frae the bull to shift."
A. Scott.
Back-yett. Private gate.
 "An' thro' the back-yett, an' let naebody see."
Old Song.
Baide. Endured, did stay.
 "But teuchley doure it baide an' unco' bang."
Burns.
Baggie. The belly.
 "Hae, there's a ripp to thy auld baggie."
Burns.
Bainie. Having large bones, stout.
Bairn. A child.
 "As glad thythings unto my child and bairn."
G. Douglas.
Bairn-time. A family of children, a brood.
Baith. Both.
 "Baith sceptre, sword, crown, and ring."
Wyntown.
Ballets, ballants. Ballads.
 "An' it were about Robin Hood, or some o' Davie Lyndsay's ballants."
Scott.
Ban. To swear.
 "Our lass Bess may curse and ban."
Old Song.
Bane. Bone.
 "What's bred in the bane's ill to come out o' the flesh."
Scots Proverb.
Bang. To beat, to strive, to excel.
 "E'en ony rose her cheeks did bang."
Davidson.
Bannock. Flat, round, soft cake.
 "Bannocks o' bear-meal, bannocks o' barley."
Old Song.
Bardie. Diminutive of bard.
 "He was your bardie monie a year."
Burns.
Bere-fit. Bare-footed.
 "The lasses skelpin bare-fit thrang."
Burns.
Barley-bree. Barley-broo, liquor of barley, malt-liquor.
- Barmie.* Of, or like, barm, yeasty.
 "Quhilk boils your barmy brain."
Montgomery.
Batch. A crew, a gang.
 "A batch o' wabster lads."
Galt.
Batts. Batts.
 "The bleiring batts an' benschaw."
Polwart.
Baukie-bird. The bat.
 "Or wavering like the baukie-bird."
Burns.
Baudrons. A cat.
 "And whyles a voice on baudrons cried."
Old Ballad.
Bauld. Bold.
 "My een are bauld an' dwell on a place."
Scots Song.
Bawk. A piece of unploughed land among corn.
Baws'nt. Having a white stripe down the face.
 "And sauld your crummock and her baws'nt quey."
Ramsay.
Be. To let be, to give over, to cease.
 "He's aye woo wooing, and he'll never let me be."
Scots Song.
Beets. Beets.
 "What maks yere master wear beets, man?— Because he has nae sheen."
Aberdeen Saying.
Bear. Barley.
Bearded-bear. Barley with its bristly head.
 "Among the bearded barley."
Scots Song.
Beastie. Diminute of beast.
 "Wee sleekit, cowrin', timorous beastie."
Burns.
Beet, beek. To add fuel to a fire, to bask.
 "An' beek the house baith but an' ben."
Ramsay.
Beld. Bald.
 "An' tho' his brow be beld aboon."
Burns.
Belyve. By and by, presently, quickly.
 "Belyve Eneas membris schuke for cauld."
G. Douglas.
Ben. Into the spence or parlour.
 "Spredand fra thauk to thauk, baith but and ben."
G. Douglas.
Benmost-bore. The remotest hole, the innermost recess.
 "And seek the benmost-bore."
Burns.
Bethankit. Grace after meat.
 "The auld gudeman just like to rive Bethankit hums."
Burns.
Beuk. A book.
Bicker. A kind of wooden dish, a short rapid race.
 "And bang'd about the nectar bicker."
Evergreen.
Bickering. Careering, hurrying with quarrelsome intent.
 "In glittering show and the once bickering stream."
Davidson.
Birnie. Birnie ground is where thick heath has been burnt, leaving the birns, or unconsumed stalks, standing up sharp and stubley.
Dumfries-shire.
Bie, or bield. Shelter, a sheltered place, the sunny nook of a wood.
 "Better a wee bush than nae bield."
Scots Pron.
Bien. Wealthy, plentiful.
 "And thou in berne and byre so bene and big."
Henryson.
Big, Biggit. To build—built.
 "They biggit a house on yon burn brae."
Old Song.
Biggin'. Building, a house.
 "I hae house a biggin'."
Old Song.
 "By some auld houlet-haunted biggin'."
Burns.
Bill. A bull.
 "An' like a bill among the kye."
Ramsay.
Billie. A brother, a young fellow, a companion.
 "Now fear ye na my billie, quo' he."
Old Ballad.
Bing. A heap of grain, potatoes, &c.
 "Quhen they depulye the mekil bing of quhete."
G. Douglas.
Birdie-cocks. Young cocks, still belonging to the brood.
 "And our guid wife's wee birdie-cocks."
Burns.
Birk. Birch.
 "Among the birks sae blythe an' gay."
T. Cunningham.
Birkie. A clever, a forward conceited fellow.
 "Spoke like yoursel', auld birkie never fear."
Ramsay.
Birken-shaw. Birchen-wood shaw, a small wood.
Birring. The noise of partridges when they rise.
 "Ane gret staff sloung berrand with fellounne wight."
Gaw. Douglas.

- Birses. Bristles.
"The rough birsis on the bried and criest." Gaw. Douglas.
- Bit. Crisis, nick of time, place.
"Just as I was coming up the bit I saw a man afore me." Scott.
- Bizz. A bustle, to buzz.
"An' singe wi' hair-devouring bizz." Fergusson.
- Black's the grun'. As black as the ground.
"Nae wonder he's as black's the grun'." Burns.
- Blastic. A shrivelled dwarf, a term of contempt, full of mischief.
"An' how the blastic's did behave." Train.
- Blastit. Blasted.
- Blate. Bashful, sheepish.
"We Phenicianis nane sae blate breistis has." Douglas.
- Blather. Bladder.
- Blaud. A flat piece of anything, to slap.
"He was like to ding the pulpit in blauds." Melville.
- Blaudin'-shower. A heavy driving rain; a blauding signifies a beating.
"For blaudin' o' the tailor sae." Cock.
- Blaw. To blow, to boast; "blaw i' my lug," to flatter.
"Keep your temper sweetly, an' neither brag nor blaw." Duff.
- Bleerit. Bedimmed, eyes hurt with weeping.
- Bleer't and blin'. Bleered and blind.
- Bleer my een. Dim my eyes.
"I bleer my een wi' greetin'." Old Song.
- Bleezing, bleeze. Blazing, flame.
"An' o' bleached birns pat on a canty bleeze." Ramsay.
- Blellum. Idle talking fellow.
"A blethern', blust'ring, drunken blellum." Burns.
- Blether. } To talk idly; talking idly.
Bleth'rin'. }
- "For an' they winna haud their blether." Hamilton.
- Blink. A little while, a smiling look, to look kindly, to shine by fits.
"Blink owre the burn, sweet Betty." Old Song.
- Blinker. A term of contempt, it means too a lively engaging girl.
- Blinkin'. Smirking, smiling with the eyes, looking lovingly.
"She is a bonnie lassie wi' a blythe blinking ee." Old Song.
- Blirt and blearie. Out-burst of grief, with wet eyes.
"The lassie lost her silken snood,
Which cost her many a blirt and blearie." Old Song.
- Blue-gown. One of those beggars who get annually, on the king's birth-day, a blue cloak or gown with a badge.
- Bluid. Blood.
- Blunkie. Snivelling.
- Blype. A shred, a large piece.
"Till skin in blypes cam haulrin'." Burns.
- Bobbit. The obeisance made by a lady.
"O when she cam ben she bobbit fu' low." Old Song.
- Bock, bocked. To vomit, to gush intermittently, gushed.
"He gat it owre
"Without a host, a bock, or glow'r." Cleland.
- Bodle. A copper coin of the value of two pennies Scots, or one third of an English penny.
"I was na worth a single bodle." Scots Song.
- Bogie. A small morass.
- Bogles. Spirits, hobgoblins.
- Bonnie, or bonny. Handsome, beautiful.
"She's a very bonnie lassie, an' you be she." Old Song.
- Bonnock. A kind of thick cake of bread, a small jannock or loaf made of oatmeal. See hannock.
- Boord. A board.
"The Letter-gae o' holy rhyme sat up at our boord head." Ramsay.
- Bore. A hole in a wall, a cranny.
"An' into holes and bores thaim hid." Burel.
- Boortree. The shrub elder, planted much of old in hedges of barn-yards and gardens.
"An' suglin through the boortrees comin'." Burns.
- Boost. Behoved, must needs, wilfulness.
- Botch, blotch. An angry tumour.
- Bousing. Drinking, making merry with liquor.
- Bouk, bouk. Body.
"I wadna gie his wee finger for your hale bouk." Scots Saying.
- Bow-kail. Cabbage.
- Bow-hought. Out-knee'd, crooked at the knee joint. We say bow-beaked of a hawk.
"A short hought man, but fu' o' pride." Ramsay.
- Bowl, bowl. Bended, crooked.
"A runt was like a sow tail, sae bowt that night." Burns.
- Brachens. Fern.
"It's either the tod or the bracken bush." Scots Proverb.
- Brae. A declivity, a precipice, the slope of a hill.
"Twa men I saw ayont yon brae." Ross.
- Braid. Broad.
- Braik. "The king has written a braid letter." Old Ballad.
- Braik. An instrument for rough-dressing flax, a kind of harrow.
"A braik for hemp that she may rub." Watson.
- Brainge. To run rashly forward, to churn violently.
"She gied the kirn an angry brainge an' spoilt the butter." Scots Saying.
- Braing't. "The horse brainget," plunged and fretted in the harness.
- Brak. Broke, became insolvent.
"He brak wi' the fou' hand"—spoken of a dishonest debtor.
- Branks. A kind of wooden curb for horses
"Gif the beast be to the fore and the branks bide hale."
- Brankie. Gaudy.
- "Whare hac ye been sae brankie o'." Scots Song.
- Brash. A sudden illness.
"A brash, a slight fit of sickness." Sinclair.
- Brats. Coarse clothes, rags, &c.
"He desires no more in the world but a bit and a brat." Scots Saying.
- Brattle. A short race, hurry, fury.
"Giff our twa herds come brattling down the brae." Ramsay.
- Braw. Fine, handsome.
"Braw, braw lads on Yarrow braes." Old Song.
- Brawlys, or brawlie. Very well, finely, heartily, bravely.
"I win but six-pennie a' the day lang,
An' I spent at night fu' brawlie." Old Song.
- Braxies. Diseased sheep,
"While moorland herds like gude fat braxies." Burns.
- Breastie. Diminutive of breast.
- Breastit. Did spring up or forward; the act of mounting a horse.
"She breasts the billows," men say of a ship when she has a fair wind.
- Brechame. A horse-collar.
"Ane brechame and two brochis fyne." Bannatyne Poems.
- Breckan. Fern.
- Breef. An invulnerable or irresistible spell.
"The breef was out; 'twas him it doomed
The mermaid's face to see." Finlay.
- Breeks. Breeches.
- Brent. Bright, clear; "a brent brow," a brow high and smooth.
"For his blyth browis brent and athir ane." G. Douglas.
- Brewin'. Brewing, gathering.
"He saw mischief a brewin'." Burns.
- Bree, brie. Juice, liquid.
"An' plyed their cutties at the smervy bree." Ramsay.
- Brig. A bridge.
"Brig o' Balgounie, black be yere fa'." Scots Saying.
- Brunstane. Brimstone.
"He stole his whig-spunks tipt wi' brunstane." Jacobite Reliques.
- Brisket. The breast, the bosom.
"White legs an' briskets bare." Morison.
- Brither. A brother.
"My brither Jock an' anither gentleman." Scots Saying.
- Brook. A badger.
"When ye have done tak hame the brok." Bannatyne.
- Brogue. A hum, a trick.
"And played on man a cursed brogue." Burns.
- Broo. Broth, liquid, water.
"What's no i' the bag will be i' the broo," said the Highlander when he dirked the haggis.

- Brose. A kind of pottage made by pouring boiling water or broth on oatmeal, which is stirred while the liquor is poured.
- Broose. A race at country weddings; he who first reaches the bridegroom's house on returning from church wins the broose.
- Browst. Ale, as much malt liquor as is brewed at a time. "Ye drink o' yere ain browst," ye suffer for your own mischief.
- Burgh. A burgh. "A royal burgh," a royal borough.
- Bruilzie. A broil, combustion. "For drinking, an' dancing, an' bruilzies." Ross.
- Brunt. Did burn, burnt.
- Brust. "Turn out the brunt side o' my shin." Ramsay.
To burst, burst.
"The fiery sparkes brusting from his een."
G. Douglas.
- Buchan-bullers. The boiling of the sea among the rocks on the coast of Buchan.
- Buckskin. An inhabitant of Virginia.
- Buff our beef. Thrash us soundly, give us a beating behind and before.
- Bught. A pen.
- Bughtin-time. The time of collecting the sheep in the pens to be milked.
- Buirldy. Stout made, broad built.
"He's mair buirldy i' the back than i' the brain."
Scots Saying.
- Bum-clock. The humming beetle, that flies in the summer evenings.
"The bum-clock humm'd wi' lazy drone." Burns.
- Bummin'. Humming as bees, buzzing.
"The cucking of cuckoos, the bumbling of bees."
Urquhart.
- Bummle, bummler. To blunder—a drone, an idle fellow, one whose noise is greater than his work.
"The loudest bummler's no the best bee."
Scots Saying.
- Bunker. A window seat.
"Ithers frae aff the bunkers sank,
Wi' een like collops scored." Ramsay.
- Burdies. Diminutive of birds.
- Bure. Did bear.
- Burn, burnie. Water, a rivulet, a small stream which is heard as it runs.
"A flowrie brae by which a burnie trotted."
Scots Song.
- Burnewin'. Burn the wind, a blacksmith.
The bellows blow wind into the fire—hence burn the wind.
- Burr-thistle. The thistle of Scotland.
"The rough burr-thistle spreading wide." Burns.
- Buskie, buskit, busks. Bushy, dressed, dresses.
"A bonnie bride is soon busket." Scots Proverb.
- Buskit-nest. An ornamented residence.
- Buss. Shelter.
- Bustle. A bustle, to bustle.
- But, bot. Without.
- But and ben. The country kitchen and parlour.
"Mony blenkis ben our the but fall far sittis."
Dunbar.
- By himself. Lunatic, distracted, beside himself.
- Byke. A bee here, a wild bee nest.
"In herrying o' a bee byke I hae got a stang."
Old Song.
- Byre. A cow-house, a sheep-pen.
"He ettled the bairn in at the breast;
The bolt flew owre the byre." King James I.
- C
- Ca', ca't. { To call, to name, to drive.
"Ca' the yowes to the knowes." Scots Song.
Called, driven, calved.
"While new ca't kye rowte at the stake."
Burns.
- Cudger. A carrier.
"Here ride cudgers, creels and a'." Nursery Song.
- Cadie, or Caddie. A person, a young fellow, a public messenger.
"Where will I get a little foot page?
Where will I get a caddie?" Old Song.
- Caff. Chaff.
"King's caff is better than other folks corn."
Scots Proverb.
- Caird. A tinker, a maker of horn spoons, and teller of fortunes.
"Hegh, sirs, what cairds an' tinklers." Fergusson.
- Cairn. A loose heap of stones, a rustic monument.
"I will add a stone to your cairn." Scots Saying.
- Calf-ward. A small enclosure for calves.
- Calimanco. A certain kind of cotton cloth worn by ladies.
"Her wat o' calimanco." Forbes.
- Callan. A boy.
"Far-famed and celebrated Allan, Renowned Ramsay, cantie callan." Hamilton.
- Caller. Fresh, stank, refreshing.
"The callour air penetrative and pure."
G. Douglas.
- Callet. A loose woman, a follower of a camp.
"Here's to ragged brats and callets." Burns.
- Cannie. Gentle, mild, dexterous.
"Ca' cannie lad, yere but the new-come cooper."
Scots Saying.
- Cannilie. Dexterously, gently.
"She wad a reined in as cannilie as a cadger's pony."
Scott.
- Cantie, or Canty. Cheerful, merry.
"I'll be mair canty wi't, an' neer cry dool."
Ramsay.
- Cantraip. A charm, a spell.
"— "a witch that for sma' price
Can cast her cantraips and gie me advice."
Ramsay.
- Cap-stane. Cope-stone, topmost stone of the building.
"Has laid the cap-stane o' them a'." A. Wilson.
- Car. A rustic cart with or without wheels.
"Tumbler-cars, so called to distinguish them from trail-cars, both of which were in common use."
Lockhart.
- Carl, Carle. An old man.
"A pawkie auld carle cam' owre the lea."
K. James V.
- Careerin'. Moving cheerfully.
- Carl-hemp. The male stalk of hemp, easily known by its superior strength and stature, and being without seed.
"Thou stank o' carle-hemp in man." Burns.
- Carlin. A stout old woman.
"Carlin, will your docht'er marry?" Scots Song.
- Cartes. Cards.
- Castock. The stalk of a cabbage.
"An there will be lang-caie and castocks."
Scots Song.
- Caudron. A cauldron.
"Gar tell the lady o' the place
I'm come to clout her caudron." Scots Song.
- Cauk and keel. Chalk and red clay.
"Wi' cauk an' keel I win my bread."
King James V.
- Caud. Cold.
"Caud winter is awa', my luvy." Scots Song.
- Caup. A wooden drinking vessel, a cup.
"We drank out o' luggies, noggies, goans, caups, bickers, quaighs, an' stoups."
Scots Story.
- Cave. A hen-coop.
"Croose as a cock in his ain cave." Mayne.
- Cesses. Taxes.
- Chanter. A part of a bagpipe, the drone.
"From their loud chanters down and sweep."
Scott.
- Chap. A person, a fellow.
"I met four chaps yon birks amang." Boswell.
- Chaup. A stroke, a blow.
"Wad neither chaup nor ca'." Gil Morrice.
- Cheek for chow. Close and united, brotherly, side by side.
"Gang cheek for chow whare'er we stray."
Macaulay.
- Cheekit. Cheeked.
"An' twa red cheekit apples." Burns.
- Cheep. A chirp, to chirp.
"I wad rather hear the lark sing than the mouse cheep."
Scots Saying.
- Chiel, or cheal. A young fellow.
"The chiels may a' knit up themselves for me."
Ramsay.
- Chimla, or Chintie. A fire-grate, fire-place.
"And ilka chimla o' the house." Jamieson.
- Chimla-lug. The fire-side.
"Ben to the chimla-lug." Burns.
- Chirps. Cries of a young bird.

- Chittering. Shivering, trembling.
 "To let the chittering infant in." Ramsay.
- Chockin'. Choking.
- Chow. To chew; a quid of tobacco.
 "He took aff his bannet and spat in his chow." Old Song.
- Chuckie. A brood hen.
 "Wi' hook an' line he baited chuckie." Pennycaik.
- Chuffie. Fat-faced.
 "How Bessie Fretocks chuffie cheekit wean." Ramsay.
- Clachan. A small village about a church, a hamlet.
 "The first time that he met with me
 Was at a clachan in the west." Watson.
- Claise, or claes. Clothes.
 "Quhill that my claes grew threadbare on my back." Scots Rhyme.
- Claithe, claitthing. Cloth, clothing.
 "Ane tailyour can nocht make ane garment
 but of claithe." Hamilton.
- Clapper-claps. The clapper of a mill; it is now silenced.
 "When clack, clack, clack, he heard a mill." Ramsay.
- Clap-clack. Clapper of a mill.
 "Whisky gill like clap o' mill,
 Inspired his tongue wi' endless clatter." Ramsay.
- Clartie. Dirty, filthy.
 "With clarty silk about their tails." Maitland.
- Clarkit. Wrote.
 "Twa lines o' Davie Lyndsay wad ding a' he ever clarkit." Scott.
- Clash. An idle tale, the story of the day.
 "The auld wives were making game,
 An' roun' the clash did ca' man." Scots Song.
- Clatter. To tell idle stories, an idle story.
 "Some plays the fule and all out clatters." Dunbar.
- Clautht. Snatched at, laid hold of.
 "Auld Satan clautht him by the spaul." Jacobite Reliques.
- Claut, clauted. To clean, to scrape, scraped.
 "May it do nae gude to him who clauts it out o' the widow's house." Wilson.
- Clavers. Idle stories.
- Clavers and havers. Agreeable nonsense, to talk foolishly.
 "They frae a skelf began to claver." Morison.
- Claw. To scratch.
 "An' claw owre soon an auld man's pow." Picken.
- Cleekin. A brood of chickens, or ducks.
 "Scared frae its minnie an' the cleekin." Burns.
- Cleed, cleads. To clothe, clothes.
 "And leaves to cleed the lichen bowers." Fergusson.
- Cleek, cleekit. Hook, snatch; having caught.
 "Syne up their leglins cleek." Ramsay.
- Clegs. The gad flies.
 "Of flies, grasshoppers, hornets, clegs, an' clocks." Hudson.
- Clinkin'. "Jerking, Clinking down," sitting down hastily.
- Clinkum-bell. The church bell; he who rings it; a sort of beadle.
 "Auld Clinkum at the inner port cries three times Robin." Burns.
- Clips. Wool-shears.
 "A bonnier fleece ne'er crossed the clips." Burns.
- Clishmaclaver. Idle conversation.
 "It's no right o' you, sir, to keep me clishma-claverin'." Galt.
- Clock, clocking. To hatch, a beetle; hatching.
 "Ye're sae keen o' clockin' ye'll die on the eggs." Scots Proverb.
- Cloot. The hoof of a cow, sheep, &c.
 "When a hundred sheep rin how many cloots clatter." Scots Saying.
- Clootie. A familiar name for the Devil.
 "Auld Satan, Hornie, Nick, or Clootie." Burns.
- Clour. A bump, or swelling, after a blow.
 "Tho' mony had cloured pows." Ramsay.
- Cloutin'. Repairing with cloth.
- Cluds.
 "The flaes they flew awa in cluds." Old Song.
- Clunk. The sound in setting down an empty bottle.
 "And made the bottle clunk
 To their health that night." Burns.
- Coarin'. Wheedling.
- Coble. A fishing-boat.
 "A litel kobil there they met." Wyntown.
- Cockernony. A lock of hair tied up on a girl's head, a cap.
- Cod. A pillow.
 "Twa heads may lie on ae cod, and nacboby ken where the luck lies." Scots Proverb.
- Coft. Bought.
 "He that all mankind coft frae care." Wyntown.
- Cog, and Coggie. A wooden dish.
 "I wadna gie my three-girred cog
 For a' the queans in Bogie." Old Song.
- Coila. From Kyle, a district in Ayr-shire, so called, saith tradition, from Coil, or Coilus, a Pictish Monarch.
- Collie. A general, and sometimes a particular name for country curs.
 "Or hounded collie owre the mossy bent." Ramsay.
- Collie-shangie. A quarrel among dogs, an Irish row.
 "The collyshangy raise to sic a height." Ross.
- Commaun. Command.
 "I told them I had seen the day they had nae sic commaun." Scots Song.
- Convoeyed. Accompanied lovingly.
 "A Kelso convoeye—a stride an' a half owre
 the door-stane." Scots Proverb.
- Cool'd in her linsens. Cool'd in her death-shift.
 "Blessed be the day that she cooled in her linsens." Burns.
- Cood. The cud.
- Coof. A blockhead, a ninny.
 "The rest seem coofs compar'd wi' my dear Pate." Ramsay.
- Cookit. Appeared and disappeared by fits.
 "All close under the cloud of night thou cookit." Kennedy.
- Cooser, coosser. A stallion.
 "Ye ken a fey man an' a coosser fears na the dcil." Scott.
- Coost. Did cast.
 "We coost the cavels us amang." Old Ballad.
- Coot. The ancle, a species of water-fowl.
 "Stand there and cool ye're coots." Scots Say.
- Corbies. A species of the crow, blood crows.
- Cootie. A wooden kitchen dish, rough-legged; also those fowls whose legs are clad with feathers are said to be cootie.
 "Spairges about the brunstane cootie." Burns.
- Core. Corps, party, clan.
 "He was the king o' a' the core." Burns.
- Corn't. Fed with oats.
 "Thei were better cornyt than they were former." Acts James II.
- Cotter. The inhabitant of a cot-house, or cottage.
 "A cotter is kept for each plough on the farm." Sinclair.
- Couthie. Kind, loving.
 "Fu' weel they can ding dool away Wi' comrades couthie." Fergusson.
- Cove. A cave.
 "King Constantine was ta'en and brought to ane cove." Bellenden.
- Cowe. To terrify, to keep under, to lop; a fright, a branch of furze, broom, &c.
 "Ye wad gar me trow my head's cowed, though there's no a hair wrang on't yet." Scots Proverb.
- Cowp. To barter, to tumble over.
 "I mon run fast in drede I get a cowp." Lyndsay.
- Cowp the cran. To tumble a full bucket or basket.
- Cowpitt. Tumbled.
 "First coupit up his heels, so that his head went down." Knox.
- Cowrin'. Covering-
- Cowte. A colt.
 "Mony a ragged cowte's been known
 To make a noble aiver." Burns.
- Cozie, cozily. Snug, snugly.
 "To keep you cozie in a hoord." Ramsay.
- Crabbit. Crabbed, fretful.
- Crack, crackin'. Conversation, to converse, to boast; conversing.
 "When ye hae done it's time to crack." Montgomery.
- Craft, or croft. A field near a house, in old husbandry.
 "The carle he came owre the craft." Old Song.
- Craig, craigie. Neck.
 "He stretched out his craig to the sword." Pitcottie.

THE WORKS OF BURNS.

- Craiks. Cries or calls incessantly, a species of bird, the corn-rail.
 "That geese and gaisling cryis and craikis."
Polworth.
- Crambo-clink, or crambo-jingle. Rhymes, doggerl vers.
- Crank. The noise of an ungreased wheel—metaphorically inharmonious verse.
- Crankous. Fretful, captious.
 "This while she's been in crankous mood." Burns.
- Cranreuch. The hoar-frost, called in Nithsdale "frost-rhyme."
 "No frost, excepting some cranreuch, or small frost."
- Crap. A crop, to crop.
 "That sword it crapped the bonniest flower."
Old Song.
- Craw. A crow of a cock, a rook.
 "As the auld cock craws the young ane learns."
Scots Proverb.
- Creel. A basket, to have one's wits in a creel, to be craz'd, to be fascinated.
 "Here come cadgers, creels an' a'."
Nursery Rhyme.
- Creeshie. Greasy.
 "I ken by his greischy mou,
 He has been at ane feast." Lyndsay.
- Creuks. A disease of horses.
 "She had the cleeks, the cauld, the creuks."
Old Song.
- Crood, or Croud. To coo as a dove.
 "Where hae ye been a' day,
 My wee wee crooding dow."
Old Ballad.
- Croon, Crooning. A hollow and continued moan; to make a noise like the continued roar of a bull; to hum a tune; humming.
- Crouchie. Crook-backed.
 "He swore 'twas hilihin Jean Macraw,
 Or crouchie Merran Humphie." Burns.
- Crouse. Cheerful, courageous.
 "They crouse that crouse last."
Scots Proverb.
- Crousy. Cheerfully, courageously.
- Crowdie. A composition of oatmeal, boiled water and butter; sometimes made from the broth of beef, mutton, &c.
- Crowdie time. Breakfast time.
 "Crowdie aince, crowdie twice,
 Crowdie three times in a day."
Old Song.
- Crowlin'. Crawling, a deformed creeping thing.
- Crummie's nicks. Marks on the horns of a cow.
 "My crummie is ane useful cow."
Scots Song.
- Crummock, Crummet. A cow with crooked horns.
 "Spying an unco crummet beast."
Davidson.
- Crump, crumpin'. Hard and brittle, spoken of bread; frozen snow yielding to the foot.
 "Lest his crumpin' tread should her untimely rouse."
Davidson.
- Crunt. A blow on the head with a cudgel.
 "Though I had got a fell crunt ahint the haffet."
Scots Story.
- Cuddle. To clasp and caress.
 "She cuddled in wi' Johnnie."
Ramsay.
- Cuif. A blockhead, a ninny.
- Cummock. A short staff with a crooked head.
 "To tremble under fortune's cummock."
Burns.
- Cummock driddle. Walk slowly, leaning on a staff with a crooked head.
- Curch. A covering for the head, a kerchief.
 "A soudely courche o'er head and neck let fall."
Blind Harry.
- Curchie. A curtsey, female obeisance.
 "An' wi' a curchie low did stoop."
Burns.
- Curler. A player at a game on the ice, practised in Scotland, called curling.
 "To curl on the ice does greatly please."
Penneckuik.
- Curlie. Curled, whose hair falls naturally in ringlets.
 "Green curlie kale."
Scots Story.
- Curling. A well-known game on the ice.
 "As cauld's a curling stane."
Scots Saying.
 "He was playing at curling with Riddel of Staining."
Fountainhall.
- Curmurring. Murmuring, a slight rumbling noise.
- Curpin. The crupper, the rump.
 "And were I a man I'd gar their curpins crack."
Hamilton.
- Curple. The rear.
- Cushat. The dove, or wood-pigeon.
 "The cushat croods, the corbie cries."
Montgomery.
- Cutty. Short, a spoon broken in the middle.
 "He gae to me a cuttie knife."
Old Ballad.
- Cutty Stool, or Creepie Chair. The seat of shame, stool of repentance.
 "The cutty stool is a kind of pillory in the church."
Sinclair.

D

- Daddie. A father.
 "Her daddie forbad, her minnie forbad."
Scots Song.
- Daffin'. Merriment, foolishness.
- Daft. "Quhat kind of daffin' is this all day." Lyndsay.
 Merry, giddy, foolish; Daft-buckie, mad fish.
 "Thou art the daftest fule that evir I saw."
Lyndsay.
- Daimen. Rare, now and then; daimen icker, an ear of corn occasionally.
 "Paste and Yule, and daimen times."
Scots Saying.
- Dainty. Pleasant, good-humoured, agreeable, rare.
 "A dainty whistle, with a pleasant sound."
Ramsay.
- Dales. Plains, valleys.
- Dandered. Wandered.
 "Nae mair through flowery howes I'll dander."
Ramsay.
- Darklins. Darkling, without light.
 "An' darklin grub this earthly hole." Burns.
- Daud. To thrash, to abuse. Daudin-showers, rain urged by wind.
 "Then took his bonnet to the bent,
 And daudit of the glar."
Ramsay.
- Daur. To dare; Daut, dared; Daurna, dare not.
 "Ye daur weel but ye downa."
Scots Saying.
- Daurg, or Daurk. A day's labour.
 "He never wrought a gude darg that began grumbling."
Scots Proverb.
- Davoc. Diminutive of Davie, as Davie is of David.
- Dawd. A large piece.
 "Raw dauds make fat lads." Scots Saying.
 "A dawd o' a bannock, or fadge to prie."
Old Ballad.
- Dawin'. Dawning of the day.
 "Be this the dawin' gan at morn wax rede."
Gavin Douglas.
- Dawtit, Dawtet. Fondled, caressed.
 "Or has some dauted wedder broke his leg."
Ramsay.
- Dearies. Diminutive of dears, sweethearts.
 "I'll rowe thee owre the lea rig, my ain kind dearie O."
Old Song.
- Dearthfu'. Dear, expensive.
 "Wi' bitter dearthfu' wines to mell." Burns.
- Deave. To deafen.
 "Wha tear their lungs and deave your ears."
Ramsay.
- Deil-ma-care. No matter, for all that.
- Deleerit. Delirious.
 "And lived and died deleerit."
Burns.
- Describe. To describe, to perceive.
 "How pleased he was I scarcely can describe."
Hamilton.
- Deuks. Ducks.
 "Mony a time he wad slip to see me wi' a brace o' wild deuks on his pouch, when my gudeman was at Falkirk tryste."
Scott.
- Dight. To wipe, to clean corn from chaff.
 "They canna dight their tears now, sae fast as they fa'."
Old Song.
- Ding. To worst, to push, to surpass, to excel.
 "Ye may ding the deil into a wife, but ye'll never ding him out o' her."
Scots Proverb.
- Dink. Nent, lady-like.
 "A dink damsel makes aften a dirty wife."
Scots Proverb.
- Dinna. Do not.
 "Dinna be chappit back, or cast down wi' the first rough answer."
Scott.
- Dirl. A slight tremulous stroke or pain, a tremulous motion.
 "Gart Lawrie's heart-strings dirl."
Ramsay.

Distain. Stain.
"May coward shame distain his name." Burns.

Dizzen, or diz'n. A dozen.
"Man's twal' is no sae gude as the deil's dizzen."
Scots Proverb.

Dochter. Daughter.
"He repudat Agasia, the king of Britonin dochter."
Bellenden.

Doited. Stupified, silly from age.
"Full doited was his head."
Dunbar.

Dolt. Stupified, crazed; also a fool.

Donsie. Unlucky, affectedly neat and trim, pettish.
"For fear o' donsie whirl into the stream."
Davidson.

Doodle. To dandle.
"I have an auld wife to my mither, Will doodle it on her knee."
Scots Song.

Dool. Sorrow; to sing dool, to lament, to mourn.
"O dool for the order, sent our lads to the border."
Scots Song.

Doo, doos. A dove, doves, pigeons.
"Thou wee wee crouding doo." Nursery Song.

Dorty. Saucy, nice.
"Your well-seen love, and dorty Jenny's pride."
Ramsay.

Douce, or douse. Sober, wise, prudent.
"I've given a douse advice and plain."
Ramsay.

Doucely. Soberly, prudently.
"So ye may doucelly fill a throne."
Burns.

Dought. Was or were able.
"And never dought a doit afford."
Ramsay.

Doup. Bottom.
"But a' the skaith that chanced indeed Was only on their doups."
Ramsay.

Doup-skelper. One that strikes the tail.
"And dirl the bairns's doups and loofs."
Scots Poem.

Dour and din. Sullen and sallow.
"He had a wife was dour and din."
Burns.

Douse. Sober, wise, prudent.
"O ye douse pepill descend from Dardanus."
G. Douglas.

Douser. More prudent.
"A doucer man never brak world's bread."
Scots Saying.

Dow. Am, or are, able, can.
"Though he dow not to leid a tyke."
Dunbar.

Dowff. Pitiless, wanting force.
"Void of curage, and dowff as ony stane."
G. Douglas.

Dowie. Worn with grief, fatigue, &c., half asleep.
"The dowie tones and lays lamentabil."
G. Douglas.

Downa. Am, or are, not able, cannot.
"But downa do's come owre me now."
Burns.

Doyleft. Wearied, exhausted, stupid.
"Sair doyleft wi' driving o' his hirsel hame."
T. Cunningham.

Dozen. Stupified, the effects of age, to dozen, to benumb.
"The birds of clay Dozen in silence on the bending spray."
Fergusson.

Drab. A young female beggar; to spot, to stain.
"She drabbed them owre wi' a black tade's blude."
Scots Song.

Drap, drapping. A drop, to drop; dropping.
"She's a drap o' my dearest blude."
Scots Saying.

Draunting. Drawing, speaking with a sectarian tone.
"He drinks wi' Clavers and draunts wi' Cameron."
Scots Saying.

Dreep. To ooze, to drop.
"And ruish me out an' laid me down to dreep."
Ross.

Dreigh. Tedious, long about it, lingering.
"A dreigh drink is better than a dry sermon."
Scots Saying.

Dribble. Drizzling, trickling, slaver.
"An' dribbles o' drink coming through the draff."
Scots Song.

Driddle. The motion of one who tries to dance but moves the middle only.
"Who used at trystes an' fairs to driddle."
Burns.

Drift. A drove, a flight of fowls, snow moved by the wind.
"Better an even down snaw than a driving drift."
Scots Proverb.

Droddum. The breech.
"Wad dress yere droddum."
Burns.

Drone. Part of a bagpipe, the chanter.

Droop-rump'l't. That droops at the crupper.
"The sma' droop-rump'l't hunter cattle."
Burns.

Droukit. Wet.
"All droukit and forewrocht."
G. Douglas.

Drouth. Thirst, drought.
"The balmy dewe thro' burning drouth he dries."
King James VI.

Drucken. Drunken.
"Some drucken, wi' drouth do burn."
Harst Rig.

Drumlie, drumly. Muddy.
"Drumly of mude and skaldand as it were wode."
G. Douglas.

Drummock, or Drammock. Meal and water mixed, raw.
"For to refresh my stomach, I was received and fed with drammock."
Watson's Collection.

Drun. Pet, sour humour.
"And Mallie nae doubt took the drunt."
Burns.

Dub. A small pond, a hollow filled with rain water.
"There lay a deuk-dub at my daddie's door."
Old Song.

Duds, duddie. Rags, clothes; ragged.
"A hair-brained wee ane wagging a' wi' duds."
Ross.

Dung-Dang. Worsted, pushed, stricken.
"Jenny dang the weaver."
Old Song.

Dunted. Throbbled, beaten.
"He dunted the kist and the boards did flee."
Old Song.

Dush, dunsh. To push or butt as a ram.
"The uno brute much dunching freed."
Davidson.

Dusht. Overcome with superstitious fear, to drop down suddenly, pushed by a ram, &c.
"Down duscht he in dede thro' all forloist."
Gawin Douglas.

Dyvor. Bankrupt, or about to become one.
"A dyvor buys your butter, woo' and cheese, But or the day of payment breaks and flees."
Ramsay.

E

E'e. The eye.
"And the blythe blinks in her e'e."
Old Song.

Een. The eyes, the evening.
"A winding sheet drawn o'er my een."
Old Song.

E'ebree. The eyebrow.
"Her bonnie e'ebree's a holy arch."
Scots Song.

E'enin'. The evening.

Eerie. Frighted, haunted, dreading spirits.
"Gloomy, gloomy was the night, And eerie was the way."
Old Ballad.

Eild. Old age.
"Ane hundreth maidens had she young and eild."
Gawin Douglas.

Elbuck. The elbow.
"Hab fidg'd and leugh, his elbuck clew."
Ramsay.

Eldritch. Ghastly, frightful, elvish.

En'. End.
"O haste ye an' come to our gate en'."
Scots Song.

Enbrugh. Edinburgh.
"As I came in by Enbrugh town."
Old Song.

Enough. Enough.
"But thei war glad enough."
Dunbar.

Especial. Especially.

Ether-stone. Stone formed by adders, an adder bead.

Ettle. To try, attempt, aim.
"If I but ettle at a sang."
Ramsay.

Eydent. Diligent.
"Them that's slack in gude are eydent in ill."
Scots Saying.

F

Fa', Fa's. Fall, lot, to fall, fate; does fall.
"Brig of Balgonie, black be your fa'."
Scots Saying.

Fa' that. To enjoy, to try, to inherit.
"How Marstig's daughter I may fa'."
Jamieson.

Faddom't. Fathomed, measured with the extended arms.

Faes. Foes.
"Now my dear lad maun face his faes."
Mayne.

Faem. Foam of the sea.
"Amang the white sea faem."
Scots Ballad.

- Faiket. Forgiven or excused, abated, a demand.
"I'll no faik a farden o' my right." Gall.
- Fainness. Gladness, overcome with joy.
- Fairin'. Fairing, a present brought from a fair.
"He'll gie him his fairin' I'll be caution for't." Scott.
- Fallow. Fellow.
"It is full fair to be fallow and feir." Scots Poem.
- Fand. Did find.
"For a while their dwelling good they fand." Hudson.
- Farl. A cake of bread; third part of a cake.
"O'er a weel tostit girdle farl." Fergusson.
- Fash, fash't. Trouble, care, to trouble, to care for, troubled.
"They're fenyiet freens that canna be fash't." Scots Proverb.
- Fasheous. Troublesome.
- Fasten e'en. Fasten's even.
- Faught. Fight.
"Man is a sodger and life is a faught." Burns.
- Faugh. A single furrow, out of lea, fallow.
"Farmers faugh gars lairds laugh." Scots Proverb.
- Fauld, faulding. A fold for sheep, to fold; folding.
"Will ye ca' in by our town as ye gang to the fauld." Scots Song.
- Faut. Fault.
"Wha will own he did the faut." Burns.
- Fawson't. Decent, seemly.
- Feal. Loyal, stedfast; a field, smooth.
"Farewell my leal, feal friend." Scott.
- Fearfu'. Fearful, frightful.
- Feur't. Affrighted.
- Feat. Neat, spruce, clever.
"The naturally neat will aye be feat." Scots Saying.
- Fecht, Fechtin'. To fight, fighting.
"Then up gat fechtin' Jamie Fleck." Burns.
- Feck. Number, quantity.
"My words they were na many feck." Scots Song.
- Fecket. An under waistcoat.
- Feckfu'. Large, brawny, stout.
"Till mony a ieckfull chiel that day was slain." Hamilton.
- Feckless. Puny, weak, silly.
"Breathless and feckless there she sits her down." Ross.
- Feckly. Mostly, weakly.
"Three carts and twa are feckly new." Burns.
- Feg. A fig.
- Fegs. Faith, an exclamation.
"By my fegs
Ye've set auld Scots on her legs." Beattie.
- Feide. Feud, enmity.
"Quhar Wilyham micht be bettir frae their feide." Blind Harry.
- Fell. Keen, biting; the flesh immediately under the skin; a field pretty level, or the side or top of a hill.
- Felly. Relentless.
"Fortune's felly spite." Burns.
- Fend. To make a shift, to contrive to live.
"For poortith I might make a fen." Burns.
- Ferlie, or ferley. To wonder, a wonder, a term of contempt.
"Nane ferlies mair than fulis." Montgomery.
- Fetch, fetch't. To pull by fits; pulled intermittently.
- Fey. Strange; one marked for death, predestined.
"The folk was fey that he before him fand." Blind Harry.
- Fidge. To fidget, fidgetting.
"No ane gies e'er a fidge or fyke." Macaulay.
- Fidgin'-fain. Ticked with pleasure.
"I'm fidging-fain to see you." Scots Song.
- Fiel. Soft, smooth.
- Fient. Fiend, a petty oath.
"Fient a crum o' thee she fa's." Old Song.
- Fien-ma-care. The devil may care.
"I'm the deil, quo he, fien ma' care, quo I." Scots Story.
- Fier, fiere. Sound, healthy; a brother, a friend.
"There's Jenny comely, fier and tight." A. Douglas.
- Fisste. To make a rustling noise, to fidget, bustle, fuss.
"The oddest fike and fisste that e'er was seen." Ross.
- Fit. Foot.
"O think that eild wi' wylie fit." Fergusson.
- Fittie-lan. The nearer horse of the hindmost pair in the plough.
- Fizz. To make a hissing noise, fuss, disturbance.
"What fizzes in the mou' winna feed the wame." Scots Saying.
- Flaffen. The motion of rags in the wind; of wings.
"There was rustlin' o' silks an' flaffin' o' feathers." Scots Story.
- Flainen. Flannel.
- Flang. Threw with violence.
- Fleech, fleechin'. To supplicate in a flattering manner; supplicating.
"At fairs or at preaching, nae wooing, nae fleeching." Old Song.
- Fleesh. A fleece.
"As fox in ane lambes fleesch feinge I my cheir." Dunbar.
- Fleg. A kick, a random blow, a fight.
"Syne at the lown a fearful fleg let fle." Hamilton.
- Flether. { To decoy by fair words.
"Aye flether away; since I'll no do wi' foul play, try me wi fair." Scots Saying.
- Flethrin, fletthers. Flattering—smooth wheedling words.
- Fley. To scare, to frighten.
"Them that's ill fleyed are seldom sair hurt." Scots Proverb.
- Flichter, flichtering. To flutter as young nestlings do when their dam approaches; fluttering.
"I trow my heart was flichtering faim." Scots Song.
- Flinders. Shreds, broken pieces.
"Into a thousand flinders flew." Scott.
- Flingin-tree. A piece of timber hung by way of partition between two horses in a stable; a flail.
- Flisk, flisky, fliskit. To fret at the yoke, fretted.
"But never ane will be sae daft as tent auld Johnnies flisky dame." Hogg.
- "Fasheous fools are easiest flisket." Scots Proverb.
- Flitter. To vibrate like the wings of small birds.
"She's a bad sither that's ay in a flitter." Scots Proverb.
- Flittering. Fluttering, vibrating, moving tremulously from place to place."
- Flunkie. A servant in livery.
"So funky braw when drest in Maister's claive." Fergusson.
- Flyte, flyting. Scold; scolding.
"Quha cannot hold their peace are free to flyte." Gavin Douglas.
- Foord A ford.
"I aye roose the foord as I ride it." Scots Proverb.
- Forbears. Forefathers.
"There our forbearis in their credillis lay." Gavin Douglas.
- Forbye. Besides.
"Forbye the ghaist, the green room does na vent weel in a high wind." Scott.
- Forfairn. Distressed, worn out, jaded, forlorn, destitute.
"So sadly forfairn were we." Ross.
- Forfoughten, foughthen. Troubled, fatigued.
"Or gif I was forfochten faynt." King James.
- Forgather. To meet, to encounter with.
"Fools are fond o' a' they foregather wi'." Scots Proverb.
- Forgie. To forgive.
"It's easier to forgie'e than forget." Scots Prov.
- Forinawed. Worn out.
- Forjesket. Forjaded, forjesket, forinawed." Scots Rhymes.
- "Jaded with fatigue.
"Forejided, forfoughten an' forjesket." Scots Saying.
- Fother. Fodder.
- Fou'. Full, drunk.
"I persave him well fou'." Lyndsay.
- Fouth. Plenty, enough, or more than enough.
"Thy copious fouth or plenitude." G. Douglas.
- Fow. A measure, a bushel: also a pitchfork.
"Some fork low but ye fow owre the mou'." Scots Saying.
- Frae. From.
"Far far frae me and Logan braes." Mayne.
- Freath. Froth; the frothing of ale in the tankard.
"O rare to see thee fize and freath." Burns.

Frien'. Friend.
 "A firm frien' may be found in the fremit."
Scots Saying.

Frosty-calcker. The heels and front of a horse-shoe, turned sharply up for riding on an icy road.

Fu'. Full.
 "I'm no just fou, but I'm gayle yet."
Old Song.

Fud. The scut or tail of the hare, coney, &c.
 "An' scarcely left to co'er their fuds."
Burns.

Fuff, fuff'l. To blow intermittently; did blow.
 "The breath o' a fause frien's waur nor the fuff o' a weasel."
Scots Proverb.

Fu-hant. Full-handed; said of one well to live in the world.
 "He canna fail fair that breaks wi' the fu' han'."
Scots Proverb.

Funnie. Full of merriment.
 "When hc has his grog aboard he's so d—d funny wi' his cranks and his jests."
Scott.

Fur. A furrow.

Fur-ahin. The hindmost horse on the right hand when ploughing.
 "My fur-ahin's a wordy beast."
Burns.

Furder. Further, succeed.
 "Weel, my babie, may ye furder."
Scots Song.

Furn. A form, a bench.

Fyke. Trifling cares, to be in a fuss about trifles.
 "And made the carles strangely fidge and fyke."
Hamilton.

Fyle, fyl't. To soil, to dirty; soiled.
 "Her face wad' fyle the Logan water."
Burns.

G

Gab. The mouth, to speak boldly or pertly.
 "I'll thrav my gab and gloom."
Ramsay.

Gaberlunzie. Wallet-man, or tinker.
 "She's aff wi' the gaberlunzie man."
King James V.

Gadsman. Plough-boy, the boy that drives the horses in the plough.

Gae. To go; gaed, went; gane, or gaen, gone; gaun, going.
 "Fy gae rub her owre wi' strae."
Scots Song.

Gaet, or gate. Way, manner, road.
 "I'll ne'er advise my niece sae grey a gate."
Ramsay.

Gairs. Parts of a lady's gown.
 "My lady's gown there's gairs upon't."
Burns.

Gang. To go, to walk.
 "Full tenderlie till thou beyond to gang."
Dunbar.

Gangrel. A wandering person.
 "An' like a gangrel on to graep."
Dunbar.

Gar. To make, to force to; gar't, forced to.
 "Fye gar ride and fye gar rin."
K. James V.

Garten. A garter.
 "Bot of ane auld red gartane."
Scots Poem.

Gash, gashing. Wise, sagacious, talkative, to converse; conversing.
 "The cheering supper gars them glibly gash."
Fergusson.

Gatty. Failing in body.
 "She's grown gattie that was ance a dautie."
Scots Saying.

Gaucy. Jolly, large, plump.
 "When pacing wi' a gawey air."
Fergusson.

Gaud and gad. A rod or goad.
 "A red het gad o' airn."
Old Ballad.

Gaudsman. One who drives the horses at the plough.
 "A gadsman ane, a thresher t'other."
Burns.

Gawn. Going.
 "She's gaun gear, gaun gear."
Scots Saying.

Gawnted. Yawned, longed.
 "When he list gaunt or blaw the fyre is bet."
G. Douglas.

Gawky, gawkie. Half-witted, foolish, romping; a thoughtless person and something weak.
 "Wert thou a giglet gawky like the lave."
Ramsay.

Gaylies, gaylie. Pretty well.
 "I'm no that fou' but I'm gaylie yet."
Scots Song.

Gear. Riches, goods of any kind.
 "Which made the laird take up more gear."
Watson.

Geck. To toss the head in wantonness or scorn.
 "She gecks at me and says I smell o' tar."
Ramsay.

Ged. A pike.
 "Ged of that ilk had three geds, or pykis argent."
Mackenzie.

Gentles. Great folks.
 "Here ride gentles, spurs an' a'."
Nursery Rhymes.

Genty. Elegant.
 "Her waist and feet's fu' genty."
Ramsay.

Geordie. George, a guinea, called Geordie from the head of King George.
 "And they hae slain Sir Charlie Hay,
 An' laid the wyte on Geordie."
Old Ballad

Get and geat. A child, a young one.
 "Then Cupid, that ill-deedy get."
Ramsay.

Ghaist ghaistis. A ghost.
 "All is but gaistis and elrische fantasayes."
G. Douglas.

Gie. To give; gied, gave; gien, given.
 "Gie her a kiss an' let her gae."
Scots Song.

Giftie. Diminutive of gift.
 "Wad but some power the giftie gie us."
Burns.

Giglets. Laughing maidens, playful girls.
 "But what if some young giglet on the green."
Ramsay.

Gillie, gillock. Diminutive of gill.
 "He gangs frae the jilt to the jillock."
Scots Saying.

Gilpey. A half-grown, half-informed boy or girl, a romping lad, a hoyden.
 "A gilpey that had seen the faught."
Ramsay.

Gimmer. An ewe two years old, a contemptuous term for a woman.
 "The mim-mou'd gimmers them misca'd."
Galloway.

Gin. If, against.
 "Gin a body meet a body coming thro' the rye."
Scots Song.

Gipsey. A young girl.
 "Gypsey, a young girl, a term of reproach."
Sibbald.

Girdle. A round iron plate on which oat-cake is fired.
 "Or Culross girdles on it hammer."
Meston.

Girn, girning. To grin, to twist the features in rage, agony, &c.; grinning.
 "At hame to girn, and whinge, and pine."
Fergusson.

Gizz. A perriwig, the face.
 "Set up a frightfu' gizz."
Tarras.

Glaikit. Inattentive, foolish.
 "Quhattane ane glaikit fule am I."
Scottish Chronicles

Glaive. A sword.
 "O wae be to the hand whilk drew na' the glaive."
Scots Song.

Glaizie. Glittering, smooth, like glass.
 "I've seen thee dapplit, sleek an' glazie."
Burns.

Glaumed. Grasped, snatched at eagerly.
 "Few get what they glaum at."
Scots Prov.

Girran. A pouterie girran, a little vigorous animal; a horse rather old, but yet active when heated.

Gled. A hawk.
 "And by them cam the greedy gled."
Scots Proverb.

Gleg. Sharp, ready.
 "To Berwick Law make gleg retreat."
Fergusson.

Glen. Dale, deep valley.

Gleib, Glieb o' lan'. A portion of ground. The ground belonging to a manse is called "the glieb," or portion.

Gley. A squirt, to squirt; a-gley, off at a side, wrong.
 "Sum scornit him, sum gleyd carl called him thair."
Blind Harry.

Gleyde. An old horse.
 "Ane crukit gleyd fell owre ane heugh."
Bannatyne.

Glib-gabbit. That speaks smoothly and readily.
 "An' that glib-gabbit Highland baron."
Burns.

Glint, Glintin'. To peep, peeping.
 "The sun was glinting owre the scene."
Mayne.

Glinted by. Went brightly past.
 "It was nae sae ye glinted by."
Burns.

Gloamin'. The twilight.
 "At e'en in the gloamin' nae swankies are roamin'."
Scots Song.

- Gloamin shot.* Twilight, musing; a shot in the twilight.
 "A gloamin shot it was, I trow." Burns.
- Glow'r.* To stare, to look; a stare, a look.
 "He girn't, he glow'r'd." Dunbar.
- Glowrin'.* Around, looking suspiciously, gazing.
 "My mither's ay glowran owre me." Ramsay.
- Glum.* Displeas'd.
 "Glum fowks no easily guid'd." Scots Proverb.
- Gor-cocks.* The red game, red cock, or moor-cock.
 "Some show a gliff o' the gowk, but yere aye
 "govan." Scots Proverb.
- Goavan.* Walking as if blind, or without an aim.
 "The flower of the daisy, dandelion, hawkweed, &c.
 "Where the gowan heads hang pearly." Scots Song.
- Gowany.* Covered with daisies.
 "Sweeter than gowany glens, or new mown hay." Ramsay.
- Gowd.* Gold.
 "And gowd among her hair." Scots Song.
- Gowl.* To howl.
 "The ravening pack are gowling led." Davidson.
- Gowf.* A fool; the game of golf, to strike, as the bat does the ball at golf.
 "A gowf at Yule will no be bright at Beltane." Scots Proverb.
- Gowk.* Term of contempt, a cuckoo.
 "The gowk, the gornaw, and the gled." Dunbar.
 "Daft gowk leave off that silly whinging way." Ramsay.
- Grane, or grain.* A groan, to groan; graining, groaning.
 "He graned like ony ghaist." King James I.
- Grained and gawnted.* Groaned and yawned.
- Graup.* A pronged instrument for cleaning cowhouses.
 "The graip he for a harrow tak's." Burns.
- Graith.* Accoutrements, furniture, dress, gear.
 "The irne graith, the werkmen and the wrichtis." Douglas.
- Grannie.* Grandmother.
 "The gladness which dwells in their auld grannie's e'e." Scots Song.
- Grape.* To grope; grapit, groped.
 "Quhilk ye shall see and grape." Lyndsay.
- Grat.* Wept, shed tears.
- Great, grit.* Intimate, familiar.
 "Awa, awa, the deil's owre grit wi' you." Ramsay.
- Gree.* To agree; to bear the gree, to be decidedly victor; gree't, agreed.
 "Allan bears
 The gree himself, and the green laurel wears." Ross.
- Green-graff.* Green grave.
 "They howkit his graff in the Dukit Kirk-yard." Scots Song.
- Greet.* To shed tears, to weep; greetin', weeping.
 "For sorrowe he 'gan grete." Sir Tristrem.
- Grey-neck-quill.* A quill unfit for a pen.
 "He's frae the tap o' the wing, but yere a grey-neck-quill." Scots Proverb.
- Grien.* Longing, desire.
 "And folk wad threep that she did grien." Ramsay.
- Grieves.* Stewards.
 "A gude grieve is better than an ill worker." Scots Proverb.
- Grippit.* Scized, caught.
 "And they hae grippit Hughie Graham." Old Bal.
- Groanin-maut.* Drink for the cummers at a lying in.
 "Wha will buy my groanin maut." Burns.
- Groat.* To get the whistle of one's groat; to play a losing game, to feel the consequences of one's folly.
 "Thy gruesome grips were never scaithly." Hogg.
- Grozet.* A gooseberry.
 "He lap at me like a cock at a grozet." Scots Saying.
- Grumph.* A grunt, to grunt.
 "What can ye get of a sow but a grumph." Scots Proverb.
- Grumphie, grumphin.* A sow; the snorting of an angry pig.
 "Better speak bauldly out than aye be grumphing." Scots Proverb.
- Grun'.* Ground.
 "He's sometimes in the air, but ye're aye on the grun'." Scots Saying.
- Grunstone.* A grindstone.
 "Be to the poor like ony whunstone,
 An' haud their noses to the grunstone." Burns.
- Gruntle.* The phiz, the snout, a grunting noise.
 "The gruntill of Santt Antonis sow." Lyndsay.
- Grunzie.* A mouth which pokes out like that of a pig; the face, the countenance.
 "Dights her grunzie wi' a hushion." Burns.
- Grushie.* Thick, of thriving growth.
 "Ye're a' grease, but I'm only grushie." Scots Saying.
- Gude, guid, guids.* The Supreme being, good, goods.
 "Let us choose five of this guid companye." Blind Harry.
- Gude auld-has-been.* Was once excellent.
 "My lan' afore's a gnid-auld-has-been." Burns.
- Guid mornin'.* Good morrow.
 "Guid mornin' maist blythely the auld carle said." Scots Song.
- Guid e'en.* Good evening.
 "Wi' mony guid e'ens an' guid days to me." K. James V.
- Guidfather and Guidmother.* Father-in-law, and Mother-in-law.
 "Caratak fled to his gude moder Cartumandia." Bellenden.
- Guidman and Guidwife.* The master and mistress of the house; young guidman, a man newly married.
 "The auld guid man that thou talks of." Scots Song.
- Gully, or gullie.* A large knife.
 "Yon gullie is nae mows." Ramsay.
- Gulravage.* Joyous mischief.
 "Watty's was a walloping gulravage." Galt.
- Gumlie.* Muddy.
 "What's this that I see jaupin gumlie?" Tarras.
- Gumption.* Discernment, knowledge, talent.
 "They're but unlearned clerks,
 And want the gumption." Hamilton.
- Gusty, gustfu'.* Tasteful.
 "O withered bent wi' gustfu' hungry bite." Davidson.
- Gut-scraper.* A fiddler.
 "As weel as puir gut-scraper." Burns.
- Gutcher.* Grand sire.
 "Ye might be my gutcher." Macniell.

H

- Ha'.* Hall.
 "Stately stept he east the ha'," Scots Ballad.
- Ha' Bible.* The great bible that lies in the hall.
 "The big ha' bible, ance his father's pride." Burns.
- Haddin'.* House, home, dwelling-place, a possession.
 "Tho' her hauding be but sma'," Train.
- Hae, ha'en.* To have, to accept; laven.
 "He's no sae deaf; he hears when they say
 hae." Scots Proverb.
- Haet, fient haet.* A petty oath of negation; nothing.
 "Diel haet has she but the gowm she gangs in." Scots Saying.
- Haffet.* The temple, the side of the head.
 "Clinkand about his haffets with ane din." Douglas.
- Haffins.* Nearly half, partly, not fully grown.
 "While Jenny haffins is afraid to speak." Burns.
- Hag.* A gulf in mosses and moors, moss ground.
 "His honour was wi' the folk who were getting down the dark hag." Scott.
- Haggis.* A kind of pudding, boiled in the stomach of a cow or sheep.
 "As thou wad for a haggis, hungry gled." Dunbar.
- Hain.* To spare, to save, to lay out at interest.
 "Jump't in, swam o'er, and hain'd his plack." Ramsay.
- Hain'd.* Spared; hain'd gear, hoarded money.
 "Hain'd gear helps well." Scots Proverb.

- Hairst. Harvest.
"In hairst at the shearing." Scots Song.
- Haith. A petty oath.
"Haith Allan hath bright rays." A. Nicol.
- Haivers. Nonsense, speaking without thought.
"Some hae hauris o' sense, but yere aye haivering."
Scots Proverb.
- Hal', or hald. An abiding place.
"Ane gousty hald within laithlie to see."
G. Douglas.
- Hale, or hail. Whole, tight, healthy.
"Weyll rewlytt off tong, right hail of contenance."
Blind Harry.
- Hallan. A particular partition wall in a cottage, or more properly a seat of turf at the outside.
"Hab got a kent stood by the hallan."
Ramsay.
- Hallowmass. Hallow eve, the 31st of October.
"When hallowmass is come and gane."
Scots Song.
- Haly. Holy; "haly-pool," holy well with healing qualities.
"Thir Rappys war gude haly men." Wyntown.
- Hame. Home.
"Hame is ay hame be it ever sae hamely."
Scots Proverb.
- Hammered. The noise of feet like the din of hammers.
"He in the parlour hammered." Burns.
- Han' or Hawn', Han's breed. Hand; hand's breadth.
"A limpin leg a han's breed shorter." Burns.
- Hanks. Thread as it comes from the measuring reel, quantities, &c.
"Her hair in hanks o' gowden thread."
Scots Song.
- Hansel-throne. Throne when first occupied by a king.
"To hansel a new coat is to put a coin in the pocket."
- Hap. An outer garment, mantle, plaid, &c; to wrap, to cover, to hap.
"I'll make a hap for my Johnny Faa." Scots Song.
- Harigals. Heart, liver, and lights of an animal.
"He that never eats flesh thinks harigals a feast."
Scots Proverb.
- Hap-shackled. When a fore and hind foot of a ram are fastened together to prevent leaping, he is said to be hap-shackled. A wife is called "the kirk's hap-shackle."
- Happer. A hopper, the hopper of a mill.
"An' heaped high the happer." Scots Song.
- Hap-step-an'-loup. Hop—step—and leap.
"The best gie whiles a jump, but yere aye at hap-step-an'-loup."
Scots Saying.
- Harkit. Harkened.
"Had I to guid advice but harkit." Burns.
- Harn. A very coarse linen.
"As coarse as Nancie's harn sark—three threads out o' the pund." Scots Saying.
- Hash. A fellow who knows not how to dress nor act with propriety.
"I canna thole the clash
Of this impertinent old hash." Ramsay.
- Hastit. Hastened.
"He hastit to his end like the moth to the caunle."
Scots Proverb.
- Haud. To hold.
"Some can steek their neive, but ye hae nae haud o' yere han'."
Scots Proverb.
- Haughs. Low lying, rich lands, valleys.
"Amid the haughs and every lusty vale."
G. Douglas.
- Haur. To drag, to pull violently.
"Achilles haurlet Hector's body thrys."
G. Douglas.
- Haurlin'. Tearing off, pulling roughly.
"He haurled auld luckie out o' her bed."
Scots Song.
- Haver-meal. Oatmeal.
"Whare gat ye that haver-meal bannock."
Scots Song.
- Haveril. A half-witted person, half-witted, one who habitually talks in a foolish or incoherent manner.
"Ye've learned to crack sae crouse, ye haveril Scot."
Fergusson.
- Havins. Good manners, decorum, good sense.
"For me to speer wad nae gude havins been."
Ross.
- Hawkie. A cow, properly one with a white face.
"Whan han' for nieve the hawkies stan'." Picken.
- Heapit. Hcaped.
"Some strake the measure o' justice, but ye giet heath." Scots Proverb.
- Healsome. Healthful, wholesome.
"As healsome as the waal o' Spa, an' unco' blate." Ramsay.
- Hearse. Hoarse.
"Alas! my roupit muse is hearse." Burns.
- Heather. Heath.
"As fire to heather set." Scots Ballad.
- Hech. Oh, strange, an exclamation during heavy work.
"The silliest strake has the loudest hech."
Scots Proverb.
- Hecht. Promised, to foretell something that is to be got or given, foretold, the thing foretold, offered.
"And thai may hecht als to fulfill." Barbour.
- Heckle. A board in which are fixed a number of sharp steel prongs upright for dressing hemp, flax, &c.
"I'd climb a hill o' heckie teeth
For luv o' thee, my lady O." Scots Song.
- Hee balou. Words used to soothe a child.
"Hee balou, my sweet wee Donald." Burns.
- Heels-owre-gowdie. Topsy turvy, turned the bottom upwards.
"I couped Mungo's ale
Clean heels o'er head, when it was ripe an' stale."
Ross.
- Heeze. To elevate, to rise, to lift.
"Towart the lift wi' mony a heeze and hale."
G. Douglas.
- Hellim. The rudder or helm
"An' did our hellim thrav, man." Burns.
- Herd. To tend flocks, one who tends flocks.
"When they were able now to herd the ewes."
Ross.
- Herry. To plunder; most properly to plunder birds' nests.
"And herryt them in sic manner." Barbour.
- Herryment. Plundering, devastation.
"Ha'es nae herryment." Scots Proverb.
- Hersel', hirsel'. Herself; a flock of sheep, also a herd of cattle of any sort.
"Ae scabbit sheep will scau' the hale hirsel'."
Scots Proverb.
- Hessel. So many cattle as one person can attend.
Het. Hot, heated.
"Strike iron while it's het, if ye'd have it to wald."
Ramsay.
- Heugh. A crag, a ravine; coal heugh, a coal pit; lowin heugh, a blazing pit.
"Sae hich up in the heugh." Montgomery.
- Hilch, hichin'. To halt, halting.
"He swore 'twas hichin' Jean Macraw." Burns.
- Himsel'. Himself.
Hiney. Honey.
"For though thy hair were hanks o' gowd,
And thy lips o' drappi' hinnie." Scots Song.
- Hing. To hang.
"Gar hing him, hang him, high upon a tree."
Scots Song.
- Hirple. To walk crazily, to walk lamely, to creep.
"He, tired and weary, hirpled down the brae."
Ross.
- Histie. Dry, chapt, barren.
"With hirstis harsh of waggand windil strays."
G. Douglas.
- Hitch. A loop, make a knot.
Hizzie. Hussy, a young girl.
"A braw bouncing hizzie O." Scots Song.
- Hoddin. The motion of a husbandman riding on a cart-horse.
"Gaed hoddin by their cotters." Burns.
- Hoddin-grey. Woollen cloth of a coarse quality made by mingling one black fleece with a dozen white ones.
"Maun with the shepherds stay
And tauk what God will send in hoddin grey."
Ramsay.
- Hoggie. A two-year old sheep.
"An unco' tyke lap owre the dyke,
An' maist has killed my hoggie." Burns.
- Hog-score. A distance line in curling drawn across the rink. When a stone fails to cross it, a cry is raised of "A hog, a hog," and it is removed.
- Hog-shouther. A kind of horse play by justling with the shoulder; to justle.
"Hog-shouther, jundie stretch an' strive."
Burns.
- Hoodie-craw. A blood crow, corbie.
"The huddit craws cried varrok, varrok."

- Hool. Outer skin or case, a nutshell, pea husk.
"I thought my heart had coupit frae its hool."
Ross.
- Hoolie. Slowly, leisurely.
"Oh! that my wife wad drink hoolie and fairly."
Scots Song.
- Hoord. A hoard, to hoard.
"He hid a bodle and thought it a hoard."
Scots Saying.
- Hoordit. Hoarded.
"It's owre weel hoordit that canna be fayn."
Scots Proverb.
- Horn. A spoon made of horn.
"Ram horns a-piece, an' hae done wi't."
Tinker's Grace.
- Hornie. One of the many names of the devil.
"Auld Horpie, Satan, Nick, or Cloutie."
Burns.
- Host, or hoast, hostin'. To cough; coughing.
- Hotch'd. Hitched, turned topsy-turvy, blended, mixed.
"Gude help ye to a hotch, for ye'll never get a coach."
Scots Proverb.
- Houghmagandie. Loose behaviour, fornication.
"An' my mony a job that day begun
May end in houghmagandie."
Burns.
- Housie. Diminutive of house.
"Thy wee bit house too in ruin."
Burns.
- Hove, hoved. To heave, to swell.
"The whole body is hoved like a loaf."
Hogg—Highland Society Trans.
- Howdie. A midwife.
"How Mungo's mare stood still and swat wi' fright,
When he brought cast the howdie under night."
Ramsay.
- Howe. Hollow, a hollow or dell.
"Every hight has a how behind it."
Scots Prov.
- Howebackit. Sunk in the back, spoken of a horse.
"Ye'll ne'er grow howbackit bearing yere frien's."
Scots Proverb.
- Howff. A house of resort, a hiding-place.
"Frac ilka favourite howff and beid."
Fergusson.
- Howk. To dig.
"Be there gowd where he's to beek,
He'll howk it out o' brimstone smeeke."
Scots Poem.
- Howkit. Digged.
"They howkit his graff in the Duket's kirkyard."
Old Ballad.
- Howkin'. Digging deep.
- Howlet. An owl.
"He kens nae a mavis frae a madge howlet."
Scots Proverb.
- Hoy, hoy's. To urge, urged.
"They hoy'd him out o' Lauderdale, Fiddle an' a' thegither."
Scots Song.
- Hoysel. A pull upwards. Hoysel a creel, to raise a basket; hence "hoisting creels."
- Hoyte. To amble crazily.
- Hughoc. Diminutive of Hughie, as Hughie is of Hugh.
- Hums and hankers. Mumbles, and seeks to do what he cannot perform.
- Hunkers. Kneeling, and falling back on the hams.
"A hunker doddie" on the ice, is to be pushed along in that posture.
- Hurcheon. A hedgehog.
"Owre a hill o' heckle teeth,
An' down a vale o' hurcheon hides."
Old Rhyme.
- Hurdies. The loins, the crupper.
"Gaired a' their hurdies wallop."
Ramsay.
- Hushion, or hoshen. A cushion, also an old stocking with the foot, or sole of the foot, worn out.
"And sewed his saul up in a hoshen."
T. Cunningham.
- Huchyalled. To move with a hilch.
"They mounted him high on a huchyalled horse."
Scots Rhyme.
- I
- Icker. An ear of corn.
"A daimen icker in a thrave."
Burns.
- Ieroe. A great grandchild.
- Ik, or ilka. Each, every.
- Ill-willie. Ill-natured, malicious, nigardly.
"An ill-willy cow should have short horns."
Scots Proverb.
- Ingie. Genius, ingenuity.
"For beautie, sweetness, modestie, ingine."
Drummond.
- Ingle. Fire, fire-place.
"And some the haly ingle with them bare."
G. Douglas.
- Ingle-low. Light from the fire, flame from the hearth.
"A bleezing ingle and a clean hearth stane."
Ramsay.
- I rede ye. I advise ye, I warn ye.
"I rede ye, gude people, beware o' me."
Scots Song.
- I'se. I shall, or will.
"But gin't be sae, Sir, I'se be judg'd by you."
Ross.
- Ither. Other, one another.
"The dell's bairns are aye fain o' ither."
Scots Saying.
- J
- Jad. Jade; also a familiar term among country folks for a giddy young girl.
"Conscience, quo' I, ye thowless jad."
Burns.
- Jauk. To dally, to trifle.
"Get up, my muse, ye lazy jauker."
Fisher.
- Jauner. Talking, and not always to the purpose.
"You teaze me jaunering ay of faith."
Falls of Clyde.
- Jaup. A jerk of water, to jerk, as agitated water.
"Is by the jaup of fluids couerit quite."
G. Douglas.
- Jaw. Coarse rallery, to pour out, to shut, to jerk as water.
"Quhilk as thou seis with mony jaup and jaw."
G. Douglas.
- Jillet. A jilt, a giddy girl.
"A jillet brak his heart at last."
Burns.
- Jimp. To jump, slender in the waist, handsome.
"And wha will lace my middle jimp."
Old Ballad.
- Jink. To dodge, to turn a corner; a sudden turning, a corner.
- Jink an' diddle. Moving to music, motion of a fiddler's elbow.
Starting here and there with a tremulous movement.
- Jinker. That turns quickly, a gay sprightly girl.
- Jinkin'. "Contend wi' thriftless mates or jinkers."
Ramsay.
Dodging, the quick motion of the bow on the fiddle.
"To dance wi' her where jinkin' fiddles play."
A. Scott.
- Jirt. A jerk, the emission of water, to squirt.
Thus the poet says of fortune:
"She's gien me many a jirt an' fleg."
Burns.
- Jocteleg. A kind of knife.
"There's thretty pennies, gang and buy me a jocteleg."
Jamieson.
- Jouk. To stoop, to bow the head, to conceal.
"And joukit under the spere."
G. Douglas.
- Jow, to jow. The swinging motion and pealing sound of a large bell.
"The bells they jow'd and run."
Old Ballad.
- Jundie. To juggle, a push with the elbow.
"If a man's gaun down the brae ilka ene gies him a jundie."
Scots Proverb.
- K
- Kae. A daw.
"Bark like ane dog, and kekil like ane kae."
Lyndsay.
- Kail. Colewort, a kind of broth.
"There's cauld kail in Aberdeen."
Scots Song.
- Kailrunt. The stem of a colewort.
"Fient haet o't wad hae pierced the heart
O' a kail-runt."
Burns.
- Kain. Fowls, &c., paid as rent by a farmer.
"Tho' they should dcarly pay the kain."
Fergusson.
- Kebars. Rafters.
"As it had been ane kebir or ane spar."
G. Douglas.
- Kebbuck. A cheese.
"They'll stou the kebbuck to the heel."
Fergusson.

- Keckle. Joyous cry; to cackle as a hen.
"Coup her under a creel and put the keckling off her." Scots Saying.
- Keek. A keek, to peep.
"Keek into the draw-well, Janet, Janet." Ramsay.
- Kelpies. A sort of mischievous water-spirit, said to haunt fords and ferries at night, especially in storms.
"Gin kelpie be nae there." Old Ballad.
- Ken. To know, ken'd, or ken't, knew, known.
"Ken ye whare cleckie Murray's gane." Jacobite Reliques.
- Kennin. A small matter.
"Gif o' this world a kennin maer,
Some get than me." Nicol.
- Kenspeckle. Well known.
- Ket, ketty. Matted, a fleece of wool.
"The soil is said to be ketty when bound together with quickgrass." Jamieson.
- Kiaugh. Carking, anxiety; to be in a flutter.
"Sae laughing and kiaughing,
Ye fain wad follow me." Scots Song.
- Kilt. To truss up the clothes.
"I'll kilt my coats aboon my knee." Scots Song.
- Kimmer. A young girl, a gossip.
"My kimmer an' I lay down to sleep." Scots Song.
- Kin'. Kindred, kind.
"Began to reckon kin' and rent." Scott.
- King's-hood. A certain part of the entrails of an ox.
"Deil mak his king's-hood in a spleuchan." Burns.
- Kintra, kintrie. Country; Kintra-cooser, country stallion.
"Keep the kintrie, bonnie lassie." Scots Song.
- Kirn. The harvest supper, a churn.
"He reserved several handfuls of the fairest corn for the harvest kirn." Scots Story.
- Kirsen. To christen, to baptize.
"The morning dew had kirsen'd the young flowers." Scots Story.
- Kist. Chest, a shop counter.
"He dunted the kist, an' the boards did fee." Scots Song.
- Kitchen. Anything that eats with bread, to serve for soup, gravy.
"Better hae a louse i' the pot than nae kitchen." Scots Proverb.
- Kith. Kindred.
- Kittle. To tickle, ticklish.
"Or dreed a kittle cast." Ramsay.
- Kittling. A young cat.
- Kintle, kintleing, or kuittle. To cuddle, cuddling, fondling.
"Sat kuittling wi' the maiden kimmer." Scots Story.
- Knaggie. Like knags, or points of rocks.
"She said, wher's my necklace? I've hung it, quo' he, on a knag." Scots Presb. Elog.
- Knap. To strike or break.
- Knappin-hammer. A hammer for breaking stones.
- Knurl. Dwarf.
- Knurlin. Crooked but strong, knotty.
"A knurlin's ay a wurlin." Scots Saying.
- Knowe. A small round hillock, a knoll.
"Ca' the yowes to the knowes." Scots Song.
- Kye. Cows.
"Tydy kye lowis valis by them rennis." G. Douglas.
- Kyte. The belly.
"Mony a weary day, but ne'er a fou kyte." Scots Song.
- Kythe. To discover, to show one's self.
"His craftes gan he kythe." Sir Tristrem.
- L
- Labour. Thrash.
"And aften labour them completely." Burns.
- Laddie. Diminutive of lad.
"I lo'e ne'er a laddie but ane." Scots Song.
- Laggen. The angle between the side and the bottom of a wooden dish.
"And coost a laggen-gird myself." Ramsay.
- Laigh. Low.
"Thai ewyn laich with the erde has made." Wyntown.
- Lairing, lairie. Wading, and sinking in snow, mud, &c., mire.
"Carried me through the dub an' the lairie." Scots Song.
- Laith. Loath, impure.
"Sic fishin to neglect they will be laith." Lyndsay.
- Laithfu'. Bashful, sheepish, abstemious.
"A landward lad is ay laithfu'." Scots Prov.
- Lallans. Scottish dialect, Lowlands.
"And scorned to own that Lalland sangs they knew." A. Wilson.
- Lambie. Diminutive of lamb.
"For 'tweesh twa hillocks the poor lambie lies." Russ.
- Lammas moon. Harvest moon.
"Light's heartsome, quo' the thief to the lammas moon." Scots Proverb.
- Lan'. Land, estate.
"I wad gie a' my lands an' rents,
I had that lady within my stents." Scots Ballad.
- Lan'-afore. Foremost horse in the plough.
"My lan'-afore's a wordy beast." Burns.
- Lan'-ahin'. Hindmost horse in the plough.
"My lan'-ahin's a weel gaun fillie." Burns.
- Lane, lanely. Lone; my lane, thy lane, &c., myself alone; lonely.
"Lang hae I lain, my luvie, lanely and eerie." Scots Song.
- Lang. Long; to think lang, to long, to weary.
"He lede a lang tyme of his life." Wyntown.
- Lap. Did leap.
"He lap quhill he lay on his lendis." King James I.
- Late and air. Late and early
"They plague me air and late." Scots Song.
- Lave. The rest, the remainder, the others.
"And the lave syne, that dede war thar." Barbour.
- Laverock. The lark.
"An' the lift has faun an' smooed the laverocks." Scots Saying.
- Lawin'. Shot, reckoning, bill
- Lawlan'. Lowland.
"The lawlan' lads think they are fine." Scots Song.
- Lay my dead. Attribute my death.
"Should she refuse I'll lay my dead
To her twa e'en o' bonnic blue." Burns.
- Lea-rig. Grassy ridge.
- Leal. Loyal, true, faithful.
"Yere a lad baith true and leal,
The priest-cat ye winna steal." Scots Rhyme.
- Lear. Learning, lore.
- Lee-lang. Live-long.
"A' the lee-lang night I dim my een wi' weeping." Scots Song.
- Leesome luvie. Happy gladsome love.
"The tender heart o' leesome luvie." Burns.
- Leeze me. A phrase of congratulatory endearment; I am happy in thee, or proud of thee.
"Leeze me on liquor, my toddin dow." Old Song.
- Leister. A three-pronged and barbed dart for striking fish.
"He could not conceive why a man should be put in fetters for leistering a salmon." Cal. Mer.
- Leugh. Did laugh.
"The lodes on the tothir side for liking they leugh." Gawan and Gok.
- Leuk. A look, to look.
"He leukit east, he leukit west." Scots Ballads.
- Libbet. Castrated.
"Gif libbet Italy be singing." Burns.
- Lick, licket. Beat, thrashen.
"To lend his loving wife a lounderin lick." Ramsay.
- Lift. Sky, firmament.
"High in the lift full glaidie he gan behald." G. Douglas.
- Lightly, lightly. Sneeringly, to sneer at, to undervalue.
"His lychtly scorn he shall repent fu' sair." Blind Harry.

- Lilt.* A ballad, a tune, to sing.
"And Rosie liltis sweetly the 'milking the ewes.'" Ramsay.
- Limmer.* A kept mistress, a strumpet.
"Syne gart the limmers tak their heels." Scots Ballad.
- Limpit.* A kind of shell fish.
Limp't. Lumped, hobbled.
"Them wha gae jumping awa aften come limpin back." Scots Saying.
- Link.* To trip along; linkin', tripping along.
"Linkin' o'er the lea." Old Song.
- Linn.* A waterfall, a cascade.
"Sen owe the linn it came." Montgomery.
- Lint.* Flax; lint i' the bell, flax in flower.
"Now Bessie's hair's like a lint tap." Ramsay.
- Lint-white.* A linnet, flaxen.
"She liltis like ony lint-white." Scots Saying.
- Loan.* The place of milking.
"And muckle kye stand routing i' the loans." Ramsay.
- Loaning.* Lane.
"But now there's a moaning in ilka green loaning." Old Song.
- Loof, looves.* The palms of the hands.
"Wi' weel spread looves an' lang wry faces" Burns.
- Loot.* Did let.
"Loot a' his duddies fa'." James V.
- Losh-man!* Rustic exclamation modified from Lord man.
"Them that cry losh, fain wad cry Lord." Scots Saying.
- Loun.* A fellow, a ragamuffin, a woman of easy virtue.
"Quod I loun thou leis." G. Douglas.
- Loup.* Jump, leap, startled with pain.
"A loup rycht lychtly maid he than." Barbour.
- Louper-like.* Lan-louper, a stranger of a suspected character.
"A horse couper and a lan-louper." Scots Rhyme.
- Lowe, lowin'.* A flame; flaming; lowin-drouth, burning desire for drink.
"Then low or rek sall it discover." Barbour.
"A smith's hause is aye lowin." Scots Prov.
- Lowrie.* Abbreviation of Lawrence.
"Then Lowrie as anc' youn lap." K. James.
- Loose.* To loose.
"They may bide in her window till Beltane ere I loose them." Scott.
- Lug.* The ear, a handle.
"Ye canna mak a silk purse o' a sow's lug." Scots Proverb.
- Lug of the law.* At the judgment seat.
"Ye live at the lug of the law." Scots Prov.
- Lugget.* Having a handle.
"Ye've a lang nose, an' yet yere cut lugget." Scots Proverb.
- Luggie.* A small wooden dish with a handle.
"Wi' green horn spoons beech luggies mingle." Ramsay.
- Lum.* The chimney; lum-head, chimney top.
"An' clouds o' reek frae lum-heads do appear." Ross.
- Lunch.* A large piece of cheese, meat, &c.
"They may dunch that gie the lunch." Scots Proverb.
- Lunt, lunting.* A column of smoke, to smoke, to walk quickly; smoking.
"Auld Simon sat luntin' his cuttie." A. Scott.
- Lyart.* Of a mixed colour, grey.
"The bandsters are runkled, lyart, and grey." Scots Song.
- M
- Mae, mair, maist, maistly.* More, most, almost, mostly.
"And break my pipe an' never whistle mair." Ramsay.
- Maggot's-meat.* Food for the worms.
"Wha I wish were maggot's meat." Burns.
- Mahoun.* Satan.
"Gramercy, tailor, said Mahoun." Dunbar.
- Mailen.* A farm.
"To take ane mailen that grit lawbour requyris." Maitland.
- Mak'.* To make; makin', making.
"Gif e'er I hear ought o' your makin' mair." Kennedy.
- Mally.* Molly, Mary.
"Mally's meek, Mally's sweet, Mally's modest and discreet." Scots Song.
- Mang.* Among.
"Mang men, wae's heart, we aften find." Fergusson.
- Manse.* The house of the parish minister is called "the manse."
- Manteele.* A mantle.
"Mae than the diel wear a black manteele." Scots Proverb.
- Mark.* Marks. This and several other nouns, which, in English, require an s to form the plural, are, in Scotch, like the words sheep, deer, the same in both numbers.
- Mark, merk.* A Scottish coin, value thirteen shillings and fourpence.
- Marled.* Party coloured.
"They delight to wear marled clothes." Monypenny.
- Mar's year.* The year 1715. Called Mar's year from the Rebellion of Erskine, Earl of Mar.
- Martial chuck.* The soldier's camp-comrade, female companion.
"When up arose the martial chuck." Burns.
- Mashlum.* Mixed corn.
"Nae man shall presume to grind wheat, maisloch, or rye, with hand." Statutes.
- Mask.* To mash, as malt, &c., to infuse.
"They grind the malt over small in the milln that it will not run when it is masked."
- Maskin-pat.* Tea-pot.
"Then up they gat the maskin-pat." Burns.
- Maukin.* A hare.
"There's mair maidens than maukins." Scots Proverb.
- Maun, mauna.* Must, must not.
"My mother says I mauna." Scots Song.
- Maut.* Malt.
"I hae brewed a forpet o' maut." Scots Song.
- Mavis.* The thrush.
"The mavis frae the new-bloom'd thorn." Fergusson.
- Maw, mawin'.* To mow; mowing; maun, mowed; maw d, mowed.
"In simmer I maw'd my meadow." Scots Song.
- Mawn.* A small basket without a handle.
"We'll cover him wi' a mawn, o'." Scots Song.
- Meere.* A mare.
"The auld man's meere's dead." Old Song.
- Meikle.* Much.
- Melancholious.* Mournful.
"Come join the melancholious croon, O' Robin's reed." Burns.
- Melder.* Corn or grain of any kind, sent to the mill to be ground.
"Our simmer melder niest was milled." Morison.
- Mell.* To be intimate, to meddle; also a mallet for pounding barley in a stone trough.
"But Diomedè mells aye wi' thee." Scots Poem.
- Meloie.* To soil with meal.
"Nor melvie his braw clathing." Burns.
- Men'.* To mend.
"Ye may en' him, but ye'll never men' him." Scots Proverb.
- Mense.* Good manners, decorum.
"Thair manhead and thair mense." Priests of Peblis.
- Menseless.* Ill bred, rude, impudent.
"As menseless as a tinkler's messan." Scots Saying.
- Merle.* The black-bird.
"Sic mirth the mavis and the merle couth mae." Henryson.
- Messin.* A small dog.
"He is our mekill to be your messoun." Dunbar.
- Midden.* A dunghill.
"Come lyk a sow out of a mydding." Dunbar.

Midden-hole. A gutter at the bottom of a dunghill.
 "Beyond was the dungstead, with a pond of putrid water, termed the midden dub, into which the juices of the dung were collected." Agricultural Survey.

Middin-creels. Dung-baskets, panniers in which horses carry manure.
 "Her waly neeves like midden creels." Burns.

Milkin-shiel. A place where cows or ewes are brought to be milked.
 "It's a sma' sheal that gies nae shelter." Scots Proverb.

Mim. Prim, affectedly meek.
 "As ony lamb as modest and as mim." Ross.

Mim-mou'd. Gentle-mouthed.
 "A mim-mou'd cat is na guid mouser." Scots Proverb.

Min'. To remember; mind, remembrance.
 "O dinna ye min' Lord Gregorie." Old Ballad.

Minawae. Minuet.
 "She moves him in a minawae." Scots Rhyme.

Mind't. Mind it, resolved, intending, remembered.

Minnie. Mother, dam.
 "Sin' that I was born of my minnie." Evergreen.

Mirk, mirkest. Dark, darkest.

Misca'. To abuse, to call names; miscad', abused.
 "And Russel sair misca'd her." Burns.

Mischanter. Accident.
 "Did sic a mishap and mischanter befa' me." Ross.

Mislear'd. Mischievous, unmannerly.
 "Nor maun she be mislear'd." Fergusson.

Misteuk. Mistook.
 "He misteuk
 His neibor's pouch for his ain plaid neck." Scots Poem.

Mither. Mother.
 "Who Jock, an' laughing like to rive,
 What think ye o' my mither?" Ramsay.

Mixtie-maxtie. Confusedly mixed, mish-mash.
 "Yon mixtie-maxtie, queer hotch-potch." Burns.

Moistify, moistified. To moisten, to soak; moistened, soaked.
 "Some are gay drouthy, but ye're aye moistified." Scots Saying.

Mons-meg. A large piece of ordnance, composed of iron bars welded together and then hooped.
 "Oh willawins! Mons-meg for you." Fergusson.

Mools. Earth.
 ——"have seen the cauld-rife mools on thine." Ramsay.

Mony, or Monie. Many.
 "Sure nature herried mony a tree." Fergusson.

Moop. To nibble as a sheep.
 "The parings of their brede to moop up soon." G. Douglas.

Moorlan'. Of, or belonging to, moors.
 "The wale o' our maidens is moorlan' Meg." Scots Song.

Morn. The next day, to-morrow.
 "The fies the fidler to morne." G. Douglas.

Mou'. The mouth.
 "Wha thraw their mou's and tak the dorts." Fergusson.

Moudiewort. A mole.
 "Ane may like to be luv'd, but wha wad mool in wi' a moudiewort?" Scots Saying.

Mousie. Diminutive of mouse.
 "But mousie thou art no thy lane." Burns.

Muckle, or mickle. Great, big, much.
 "There's mickle guid love in bonds and bags." Ramsay.

Muses-stank. Muses-rill, a stank, slow flowing water.
 "And fand ane stank that flowed from ane well." G. Douglas.

Musie. Diminutive of muse.
 "My musie tir'd wi' mony a sonnet." Burns.

Muslin-kail. Broth, composed simply of water, shelled barley, and greens—thin poor broth.
 "Penny-wheep's guid enough for muslin-kale." Scots Proverb.

Matchkin. An English pint.
 "The mutchkin-stoup it hauds but dribs,
 Sae bring us in the tappit-hen." Ramsay.

Mysel'. Myself.
 "I winna blaw about mysel'." Burns.

N

Na, or nae. No, nor, not any.
 "That on a manner nicht accord." Barbour.

Naething, or naithing. Nothing.
 "He had naething for to despend." Barbour.

Naig. A horse, a nag.
 "On a' the Nith there's nae sic smith
 For shoeing outhar naig or gelding." Scots Rhyme.

Nane. None.
 "Thus I declare the nane uncertaine thing." G. Douglas.

Nappy. Ale, to be tipsy.
 "And when that the carles grew nappy." Old Ballad.

Neglekit. Neglected.
 "But then to see how ye're neglekit." Burns.

Neibor, or neebor. A neighbour.
 "An' ye sinsyne the neebors roun',
 They jeer me air and late." Scots Song.

Neuk. Nook.
 "The sun frae the east neuk o' Fife." Ramsay.

Niest. Next.
 "A meaner phanton neist wi' meikle dread." Ramsay.

Nieve, nief. The fist.
 "Hard on the left nief was the scharp stele hede." G. Douglas.

Nievefu'. Handful.
 "A nievefu' o' meal or a gowpen o' groats." Old Ballad.

Niffer. An exchange, to exchange, barter.
 "He's fond o' barter that niffers wi' mild Nick." Scots Saying.

Niger. A negro.
 "That made Canaan a niger." Burns.

Nine-tailed cat. A hanguan's whip.
 "But haud ye re nine-tailed cat a wee." Burns.

Nit. A nut.
 "Ye're owre fair o' flesh to live upon deaf nits." Scots Saying.

Norland. Of, or belonging to, the north.
 "Was like the norlan' blast." Scots Ballad.

Notic't. Noticed.
 "Them wha stand on a knowe's sure to be notic't." Scots Saying.

Nowte. Black cattle.
 "Als bestiall as horse and nowte within." Blind Harry.

O

O'. Of.
 "I'm Willie o' the Wastle." Scots Rhyme.

Ochels. The name of mountains in Scotland.

O'ergang. Overbearingness, to treat with indignity, literally to tread.
 "For fear that truth should clean o'ergang them." Penncaik.

O'erlay. An upper cravat.
 "He faulds his owrelay down his breast wi' care." Ramsay.

O haith! O faith! An oath.

Ony, or Onie. Any.

Or. Is often used for ere, before.
 "Wittal were scant or August cou'd appear." Blind Harry.

Orra-duddies. Superfluous rags, old clothes.
 "To drink their orra-duddies." Burns.

O't. Of it.
 "Jock will make a bridal o't." Scots Song.

Ourie. Drooping, shivering.
 "The ourie cattle hang their heads." Nicol.

Oursel, oursels. Ourselves.
 "There's nae sel sae dear as our ain sel." Scots Proverb.

Outlers. Outlyers; cattle unhoused.
 "The deil, or else an outlier quey,
 Gat up an' gae a croon." Burns.

Ower, owre. Over, too.
 "Owre the water to Charlie." Scots Song.

Owre-hip. Striking with a fore-hammer by bringing it with a swing over the hip; a way of fetching a blow with the hammer over the arm.
 "Brings hard owre hip wi' sturdy wheel,
 The strang forehammer." Burns.

- Owsen.* Oxen.
"I hae three gude owsen ganging in a pleuch."
Scots Song.
- Oxtered.* Carried or supported under the arm.
"The priest he was oxtered, the clerk he was carried."
Scots Song.
- P
- Pack.* Intimate, familiar; twelve stone of wool.
"An' pack an' thick as tods could be."
Nicol.
- Paidle, paidlen.* To walk with difficulty, as if in water.
"He's but a paidlen bodie O."
Old Song.
- Painch.* Paunch.
"Pakand thair painch like Epicureans."
Scots Poem.
- Partrick.* A partridge.
"An' partricks scraichan loud at een."
Burns.
- Pang.* To cram.
"As fou's the house could pang."
Ramsay.
- Parishen.* Parish.
Parle. Courtship.
"A tocher's nae word in a true lover's parle."
Burns.
- Parritch.* Oatmeal pudding, a well-known Scotch dish.
"Frae the milk coggie or the parritch caup."
Fergusson.
- Pat.* Did put, a pot.
"Fier pat my heart in sic a flocht."
Buret.
- Pattle, or pettle.* A small spade to clean the plough.
"I wad be laith to rin and chase thee,
W' murdering pettle."
Burns.
- Paughty.* Proud, haughty.
"And pauchtie pride rycht sair I do detest."
Scots Poems.
- Pauky, pawkie.* Cunning, sly.
"A pauky auld carle cam o'er the lea."
King James V.
- Pay't.* Paid, beat.
"He's easily payt that's payt w' paiks."
Scots Proverb.
- Peat-reek.* The smoke of burning turf, a bitter exhalation, whisky.
"W' peat-reek my head was light."
Duff.
- Pech, pechin'.* To fetch the breath shortly, as in an asthma, respiring with difficulty.
"Begood to pech and limp behind."
Mayne.
- Pechan.* The crop, the stomach.
"He puts in a bad purse that puts it in his pechan."
Scots Proverb.
- Pet.* A domesticated sheep, &c., a favourite.
"The Deil's pet lambs lo'e Claverus lads."
Scots Saying.
- Pettle.* To cherish.
"An' pettle ye up a dainty lamb."
Scots Song.
- Philabeg, or phillbegs.* The kilt; short petticoats worn by Highlanders.
"W' his philabeg and tartan plaid."
Scots Song.
- Phraise.* Fair speeches, flattery, to flatter.
"They need na mak sae great a phraise."
Skinner.
- Pibroch.* A martial air.
"Heardst but the pibroch answering brave,
To many a target clanking round."
Scott.
- Pickle.* A small quantity, one grain of corn.
"O gin my love were a pickle o' wheat."
Scots Song.
- Pigmy-scraper.* Little fiddler; a term of contempt for a bad player.
"A pigmy-scraper w' his fiddle."
Burns.
- Pint-stoup.* A two-quart measure.
"Some can stan' the sword better than the pint stoup."
Scots Proverb.
- Pine.* Pain, uneasiness.
"In meikle dule and pine O."
Scots Song.
- Pingle.* A small pan for warming children's sops.
"Ye want a pingle lassie weel and guid."
Scots Poem.
- Pit.* To put.
Placad. A public proclamation, to publish publicly.
Pluck. An old Scotch coin, the third part of an English penny.
"He'll no mak his pluck a bawbee."
Scots Prov.
- Plackless.* Pennyless, without money.
"The case is clear my pouch is plackless."
Turras.
- Plaidie.* Diminutive of plaid.
"Come under my plaidie and sit down beside me."
Mucneill.
- Platie.* Diminutive of plate.
"Whyles owre the wee bit cup and platie."
Burns.
- Plew, or pleugh.* A plough.
"At mornin when frae pleugh or fauld I come."
Fergusson.
- Pliskie.* A trick.
"Their lugs in onie rackless pliskie."
Nicol.
- Plumrose.* Primrose.
"The plumrose and the snawdrap
Are the flowers that's dear to me."
Scots Song.
- Pock.* A meal-bag.
"Then she took up the meal pocks,
And flang them owre the wa'."
K. Jas. V.
- Poind.* To seize on cattle, or take the goods as the laws of Scotland allow, for rent, &c.
"To pryk and poynd bathe to and fra'."
Wynntown.
- Poortith.* Poverty.
"But poortith Peggy is the worst of a'."
Ramsay.
- Posie.* A nosegay, a garland.
"I'll tie this posie round w' the silken bands
o' love."
Burns.
- Pou, pou'd, pou't.* To pull, pulled.
"When Samson pou'd to ground the great pillar."
Blind Harry.
- Pouk.* To pluck.
"And ay as they at the auld carlin plaid pouk."
Scots Song.
- Poussie.* A hare or cat.
"And morning poussie whidding seen."
Burns.
- Pouse.* To pluck with the hand.
"Pride prinks her pow for the deil to pouse."
Scots Proverb.
- Pout.* A polt, a chick.
"O' woodcocks, teals, moor-powts, an' plivers."
Ramsay.
- Pouthery, pouter, or powther.* Fiery, active, like powder; gun-powder.
"Mounted on a pouthery pownie."
Scots Saying.
- Pow.* The head, the skull.
"Abiet my pow was bald and bare."
Ramsay.
- Pownie.* A little horse, a pony.
"He'll gang mad on a horse wha's proud on a pownie."
Scots Saying.
- Preclair.* Super-eminent.
"More pleasand and preclair."
A. Scott.
- Preen.* A pin.
"Thousands a year's no worth a preen."
Ramsay.
- Prent.* Printing, print.
"That na prenter presume to prent anie books, ballads sangs."
Acts Marie.
- Prie.* To taste; prie'd, tasted.
"That ye're awa', ae peaceful meal to prie."
Fergusson.
- Prief.* Proof.
"To prief thair horse with jauvelins in thair hands."
G. Douglas.
- Prig.* To cheapen, to dispute; priggin, cheapening.
"I thought by priggin that she might hae spun," &c.
Fergusson.
- Primsie.* Demure, precise.
"A primsie damsel maks a daidlen dame."
Scots Proverb.
- Propone.* To lay down, to propose.
"The poet first proponing his intent."
G. Douglas.
- Pund, pund o' tow.* Pound, pound weight of the refuse of fax.
"But a' that she cou'd mak o' it
Was ae puir pund o' tow."
Scots Song.
- Pyet.* A magpie.
"Thair were pyats, and partricks, and plivers aneu'."
Scots Poem.
- Pyle, a pyle o' caff.* A single grain of chaff.
"The cleanest corn that e'er was dight
May hae some pyles o' chaff in."
Burns.
- Pystle.* Epistle.
"An' penn'd a pretty pystle."
Scots Rhyme.
- Q
- Quat.* Quit.
"Come quat the grup ye tinkler loon."
Scots Song.
- Quak, quakiv'.* Quack, the cry of a duck; to quake, quaking.
"When wi' an eldritch stoor quak, quak."
Burns.

- Quech. A drinking cup made of wood, with two handles.
"Never count the lawin wi' a' toom quech."
Scots Proverb.
- Quey. A cow from one to two years old, a heifer.
"A cannie quey maks a sonsie cow."
Scots Proverb.
- Quines. Queans.
"It will cost the quine a skirling."
Scots Saying.

R

- Ragweed. Herb-ragwort.
"As rank a witch as e'er rade on a ragweed."
Scots Saying.
- Raible. To rattle, nonsense.
"There's plenty o' raible whan drink's on the table."
Scots Saying.
- Rair. To roar.
"Under thy feet the erd did rair and trymbill."
G. Douglas.
- Raize. To madden, to inflame.
"And she ran aff as raised as ony deer."
Ross.
- Ramfleezed. Fatigued, overspread.
"The tapetless ramfleezed hizzie."
Burns.
- Rampin'. Raging.
"The diel he heard the stour o' tongues,
And rampin' came amang us." Old Song.
- Ramstam. Thoughtless, forward.
"The least we'll get if we gang ramstam in upon them."
Scott.
- Randie. A scolding sturdy beggar, a shrew.
"Was Rab the beggar randie."
Old Song.
- Rantin'. Joyous.
"They ca' me the rantin' laddie."
Old Song.
- Raploch. Properly a coarse cloth, but used for coarse.
"Their clais quihik wes of raploch grey."
Lyndsay.
- Rarely. Excellently, very well.
"The sun it raise and better raise,
And ovre the hill lowed rarely." Old Song.
- Rash. A rush; rash-buss, a bush of rushes.
"Beaus the rasche-buss keipis his kow."
Lyndsay.
- Ratton. A rat.
"Thocht rattones ouer them rin, they tak na care."
Lyndsay.
- Raucle. Rash, stout, fearless, reckless.
"O rakel hond to do so foule a mis."
Chaucer.
- Raught. Reached.
"Swith swelleand that morsel raucht had sche."
G. Douglas.
- Raw. A row.
"He driues forth the stampand hors on raw."
G. Douglas.
- Rax, rax'd. To stretch; stretched.
"Begoud to rax and rift."
Ramsay.
- Ream. Cream, to cream.
"Without ream, sugar and bohea."
Ramsay.
- Reamin'. Brimful, frothing.
"He merely ressaus the remand tais."
G. Douglas.
- Reave. Take by force, rove.
"To rieffe that crown that is a great outrage."
Blind Harry.
- Rebute. To repulse, rebuke.
"That I rebutat was and doung abak."
G. Douglas.
- Reck. To heed.
"There's litle to reck, quo' the knave to his neck."
Scots Saying.
- Rede. Counsel, to counsel, to discourse.
"And for I think off him to rede."
Barbour.
- Red-peats. Burning turfs.
"A toom tar-barrel and twa red peats."
Burns.
- Red-wat-shod. Walking in blood over the shoe-tops.
"In tyrants' blood walked red-wat-shod."
Scots Poem.
- Red-wud. Stark mad.
"Some are ony daft, but yere red-wud raving."
Scots Saying.
- Ree. Half drunk, fuddled; a ree yaud, a wild horse.
"Ye love a' ye see, like Rob Roole when he's rce."
Scots Saying.
- Reek, reekin, reekit. Smoke, smoking, smoked, smoky.
"A reekit wee devil looked over the wa'."
Scots Song.
- Reestit. Stood restive; stunted, withered.
"It was a bogilly bit: the horse saw something, and snorted and reestit."
Scots Story.
- Remead. Remedy.
"All makes for the ruin of this isle, and I see yet no means to remied it."
Baillie.
- Reef, rief. Plenty.
- Requite. Required.
"A drap and a bite's a sma' requite."
Scots Saying.
- Rest, restit. To stand restive; stood restive, stunted, withered.
- Restricketed. Restricted.
- Rew. To smile, look affectionately, tenderly.
"Rew on me, true Thomas, she said."
Thomas the Rhymer.
- Rickles. Shocks of corn, stooks.
"A pickle's no mist in a rickle."
Scots Saying.
- Riddle. Instrument for purifying corn.
"The dumb riddle, the coarse riddle, and the fine riddle."
Farmer's Inventory.
- Rief-randies. Men who take the property of others, accompanied by violence and rude words, sturdy beggars.
"Rief-randies, I disown ye."
Burns.
- Rig. A ridge.
"Quhare thou thy riggis telis for to saw."
G. Douglas.
- Rin. To run, to melt; rinnin', running.
"Whare will I get a bonnie boy
My errant for to rin."
Scots Ballad.
- Rink. The course of the stones, a term in curling on ice.
"Be this they wan near to the renkis end."
G. Douglas.
- Rip. A handful of unthreshed corn.
"Hae there's a rip to thy auld baggie."
Burns.
- Ripples. Pains in the back and loins, sounds which usher in death.
"I rede ye beware of the ripples, young man."
Old Song.
- Ripplin-kame. Instrument for dressing flax.
"Lassie, lend me your braw hemp heckle,
"An' I'll lend you my ripplin-kame."
Scots Song.
- Riskit. A noise like the tearing of roots.
"While spretty knowes just raired an' riskit."
Burns.
- Rockin'. A denomination for a friendly visit. In former times young women met with their distaffs during the winter evenings, to sing, and spin, and be merry; these were called "rockings."
- Roke. Distaff.
"The roke and the wee pickle tow."
Scots Song.
- Rood. Stands likewise for the plural, roods.
- Roon. A shred, the selvage of woollen cloth.
"The best o' webs is rough at the roons."
Scots Saying.
- Roose. To praise, to commend.
"Come view the men thou likes to roose."
Ramsay.
- Roun'. Round, in the circle of neighbourhood.
"The king lies down, yet the warl rins roun'."
Scots Saying.
- Roup. A sale by auction.
- Rouplet. Hoarse, as with a cold.
"O may the roup ne'er roost thy weason."
Beattie.
- Routh, routhie. Plenty, plentiful.
"I dinna want a routh o' country fare."
Ramsay.
- Routh o' gear. Plenty of goods.
- Row, row't. To roll, to wrap, to roll as water; rolled, wrapped.
"Rowet at ains with stormes and windis thre."
G. Douglas.
- Rowte, rowtin'. To low, to bellow; lowing.
"Frae fauld's na mair the owsen rowte."
Fergusson.
- Rozet. Rosin.
"Full of roset down bet is the fir tree."
G. Douglas.

- True.* Regret, repent.
Rumble-gumption. Rough common sense.
 "Ye suld hae stayed at hame, and wantit a wife till ye got mair rumble-gumption."
Hogg.
- Run-deils.* Downright devils.
 "Jock's a mislear'd imp, but ye're a run-deil."
Scots Saying.
- Rung.* A cudgel.
 "Quhen rungy's wes laid on riggis."
King James.
- Runt.* The stem of colewort or cabbage.
 "Bairns, when ye are weary digging, ye can pou kale runts."
Scots Saying.
- Runkled.* Wrinkled.
 "A moupin runkled granny."
Ramsay.
- Ruth.* A woman's name, sorrow.
 "I'the book o' truth there's love and ruth."
Scots Saying.
- Ryke.* Reach.
 "Let me ryke up to dight that tear."
Burns.
- S
- Sae.* So.
 "Sae thrang this day."
Fergus'n.
- Saft.* Soft.
 "Saft ease shall teach you to forget."
Old Song.
- Sair.* To serve, a sore; sairie, sorrowful; sairly, sorely; sair't, served.
 "He has a saw for a' sairs."
Scots Proverb.
- Sark.* A shirt.
 "Held on his sark, and tuk his suerd so gud."
Barbour.
- Sarkit.* Provided in shirts.
 "But here half mad, half fed, half sarkit."
Burns.
- Saugh.* Willow.
 "He rules easier wi' a saugh wand than a sharp brand."
Scots Saying.
- Saugh woodies.* Withies, made of willows, now supplanted by ropes and chains.
 "The sonks o' his yaud war tyed wi' saugh widdies."
Scots Story.
- Saul.* Soul.
 "An' lous the saul out of this mortal state."
G. Douglas.
- Saumont.* Salmon.
 "He kens nae a selgh frae a saumont."
Scots Proverb.
- Saunt.* Saint.
 "Ilka name has a saunt, save that aulddest ane sinner."
Scots Proverb.
- Saut, sautit.* Salt, salted.
 "And get their tails weel sautit."
Fergusson.
- Saw, sawin'.* To sow; sowing.
 "In fragil fiesche your feebill sede is saw'n."
Douglas.
- "Hope is sawin while death is mawin."
Scots Proverb.
- Sax.* Six.
 "Sax score o' lambs I sauld them ilka clute."
Ramsay.
- Scaith.* To damage, to injure, injury.
Scaud. To scald.
 "Ye had better get a scaud than a scouther."
Scots Proverb.
- Scauld, scawol.* To scold; a scold.
 "My Eppie's tongue I vow its sweet,
 E'en though she flytes an' scaulds a wee."
Scots Song.
- Scaur.* Apt to be scared; a precipitous bank of earth which the stream has washed red.
 "That chafes against the scaur's red side."
Sir W. Scott.
- Scone.* A kind of bread.
 "The flour skounys were set in by and by."
Douglas.
- Sconner.* A loathing, to loath.
 "We sooner at most parts o' meat."
Cleland.
- Seraich and Scriegh.* To scream, as a hen or partridge.
 "It is time enough to scraigh when ye're strucken."
Scots Proverb.
- Screed.* To tear, a rent; screeding, tearing.
 "Screeding of kerches, crying dool and dair."
Ross.
- Scrieve, scrievien.* To glide softly; gleesomely along, swiftly.
 "And owre the hill gaed scrievien."
Burns.
- Scrimp.* To scant; scrimpet, scanty.
 "There's Johnnie Trams has got a wife,
 That scrims him in his cogie."
Scots Song.
- Scroggie.* Covered with underwood, bushy.
 "Among the braes sae scroggie."
Scouldrey. Fornication.
 "Could sa'r scouldrey out like John."
Ramsay.
- Seed.* Saw, did see.
Seizin'. Seizing.
Sel'. Self; a body's sel', one's self alone.
 "Sel'! sel'! has peopled hell."
Scots Proverb.
- Sell't.* Did sell, sold.
 "He sell't his saul for a cracket sixpence."
Scots Saying.
- Sen', sen't.* To send, sent, or did send.
 "An' then sell't sen' ye to the deil."
Scots Song.
- Servan'.* Servant.
 "Godliness is great gain, but sin keeps mony a servan'."
Scots Saying.
- Settlin'.* Settling; to get a settlin', to be frightened into quietness.
 "She gat a fearfu' settlin'."
Burns.
- Sets, sets off.* Goes away.
Shuchlet-feet. Ill-shaped.
 "Ye shape shoon by your ain shacklet-feet."
Scots Proverb.
- Shair'd.* A shred, a shard.
 "Ye're grown a skrinkie an' a shair'd."
Scots Saying.
- Shangan.* A stick cleft at one end for pulling the tail of a dog, &c., by way of mischief, or to frighten him away.
 "Like collie wi' a shangan."
Davidson.
- Shank-it.* Walk it; shanks, legs.
 "Them that canna ride maun shank it."
Scots Saying.
- Shaul.* Shallow.
 "Shaul water's never smooth."
Scots Proverb.
- Shaver.* A humorous wag, a barber.
 "He was an unco shaver
 For mony a day."
Burns.
- Shavie.* To do an ill turn.
 "I played my filly sic a shavie."
Burns.
- Shaw.* To shew; a small wood in a hollow place.
 "Among the shaws are nuts and haws."
Scots Rhyme.
- Sheen.* Bright, shining.
Sheep-shank. To think one's self nue sheep-shank; to be conceited.
 "He has gowd in the bank, an' he's nae sheep-shank."
Scots Rhyme.
- Sherra-muir.* Sherrif-muir, the famous battle of, 1715.
 "Sherra-muir was but a cock fight till't."
Scots Saying.
- Sheugh.* A ditch, a trench, a sluice.
 "The ciete circulet, and markit be ane seuch [Sheugh]."
G. Douglas.
- Shiel, sheating.* A shed, a shepherd's cottage.
 "Ten miles frae ony town this shealing lies."
Ross.
- Shill.* Shrill.
 "A miller's daughter has a' a shrill voice."
Scots Proverb.
- Shog.* A shock, a push off at one side.
 "Gien earth a shog, and made thy will a law."
Ramsay.
- Shoo.* Ill to please, ill to fit.
 "Then, daughter, ye should na be sae ill to shoo."
Old Song.
- Shool.* A shovel.
 "Let spades an' shoos do what they may,
 Dryfe will hae Dryfesdale Kirk away."
Old Rhyme.
- Shoon.* Shoes.
 "Where can I get a bonny boy
 That will win hose and shoon."
Scots Ballad.
- Shore, snor'd.* To offer, to threaten; offered and threatened.
 "When she disna scaul she shores."
Scots Saying.
- "He shored the dog, an' then he shot at it."
Scots Story.
- Shouther.* The shoulder.
 "Shouther to shouther stands steel an' pouther."
Scots Saying.

- Shot. One traverse of the shuttle from side to side of the web.
"He has nae put in a single shot i' the wab this blessed day." Scots Story.
- Sic. Such.
"Sic like a Robin Hood debates." Fergusson.
- Sicker. Sure, steady.
"Out thourch his ribs a sicker straik he drew." Barbour.
"I mak sicker." Motto of the Kirkpatrick Arms.
- Sidelins. Sideling, slanting.
"For Nory's sake this sideling hint he gae." Ross.
- Silken-snood. A fillet of silk, a token of virginity.
"The lassie lost her silken snood,
Which cost her mony a bliert and bleary." Scots Song.
- Siller. Silver, money, white.
"Her e'en were o' the siller sheen." Fergus.
- Simmer. Summer.
"O' simmer's showery blinks, and winter sour." Fergusson.
- Sin. A son, since.
"There's mirth 'mang the kin when the kimmer cries a sin." Scots Proverb.
- Sin syne. Since then.
"It's no that lang sin syne." Scots Poem.
- Skaith. To damage, to injure, injury.
"And kisses laying a' the wyte
On you if she keep any skaith." Ramsay.
- Skeigh. Proud, nice, saucy, mettled.
"She's skiegh, but she winna skrieigh." Scots Saying.
- Skellum. A noisy, reckless fellow.
"She tauld thee weel thou wert a skellum." Burns.
- Skelp. To strike, to slap; to walk with a smart tripping step, a smart stroke.
"And laid on skelp for skelp." Lyndsay.
- Skelpi-limmer. A technical term in female scolding.
"Ye little skelpi-limmer's face." Burns.
- Skelpin, skelpin. Striking, walking rapidly; literally, striking the ground.
"I cam to a place where there had been some clean skelping." Scott.
"A skelpit bottom breaks nae banes." Scots Saying.
- Skinklin. Thin, gauzy, scaltery, a small portion.
"Squire Pope but busks his skinklin-patches." Burns.
- Skirl, Skirling. To cry, to shriek shrilly, shrieking, crying.
"Sitting skirling on a caul' brae side." Scott.
- Skirl't. Shrieked.
"I skirl't fu' loud, 'Oh! 'vae befa' thee.'" Fergusson.
- Sklent. Slant, to run aslant, to deviate from truth.
"Of drawin' swords sklenting to and fra." Douglas.
- Sklented. Ran, or hit, in an oblique direction.
"The draps sklented off like rain from a wild duck's wing." Scots Saying.
- Skouth. Vent, free action.
"The rain comes skouth when the win's i' the south." Scots Saying.
- Skreigh. A scream, to scream, the first cry uttered by a child.
"For what wad gar her skirl and skreigh some day." Ramsay.
- Skyte. A worthless fellow, to slide rapidly off.
"He's a selfish skyte that cares but for his kyte." Scots Saying.
- Skyrin. Party coloured, the checks of the tartan.
"And a' the skyrin brins o' light." Scots Poem.
- Slae. Sloe.
"Ane buss of bitter slaes." Montgomery.
- Slade. Did slide.
"The wife slade cannie to her bed." Burns.
- Slap. A gate, a breach in the fence.
"He's a sharp tyke that can catch at every slap." Scots Proverb.
- Slaw. Slow.
"The feet are slaw when the head wears snaw." Scots Saying.
- Slee, sleest. Sly, slyest.
"Or Fergusson the bauld and slee." Burns.
- S'eeakit. Sleek, sly.
"He's an auld farrant sleeakit b'odie." Scots Story.
- Sliddery. Slippery.
"He slaid and stammcrit on the sliddry ground." G. Douglas.
- Slip-shod. Smooth shod.
"Slip shod's no for a frozen road." Scots Saying.
- Sloken. Quench, slake.
"To keep the life, but not to sloken thirst." Hudson.
- Slype, slypet. To fall over; fell over, with a slow reluctant motion.
"Till spretty knowes just-raired and risiket,
And slypet owre." Burns.
- Sma'. Small.
"Though my fortune be but sma'." Scots Song.
- Smeddum. Dust, powder, mettle, sense, sagacity.
"Has fowth o' sence an' smeddum in her." Skinner.
- Smiddy. A smithy.
"Sae I joined the smiddy thrang." A. Scott.
- Smirking. Good-natured, winking.
- Smoor, smooered. To smother, smothered.
- Smoutie. "That his hie honour should not smure." Lyndsay.
Smutty, obscene; smoutie phiz, sooty aspect.
"The smoultrie smith, the swart Vulcanus." English Poem.
- Smytrie. A numerous collection of small individuals.
"A smytrie o' wee duddie weans." Burns.
- Snapper. Mistake, stumble.
"He's never out o' ae whipper-snapper till he's into anither."
- Snash. Abuse, Billingsgate, impertinence.
"The tither says I'll hae't, an' that right snash." Morison.
- Snaw, snawie. Snow, to snow, snowy.
"He's ane o' Snaw-ha's bairntime." Scots Saying.
- Snaw-broo. Melted snow.
"The river, swelled wi' snaw-broo, was raging frae bank to brae." Scots Story.
- Sned. To lop, to cut off.
"It is good that God snedde the unfruitful and rotten branches." Boyd.
- Sned-besoms. To cut brooms.
"But I'll sned besoms, thraw saugh woodies Before they want." Burns.
- Sneeshin. Snuff; sneeshing-mill, a snuff-box.
"Or else they are not worth a sneeshin." Meston.
- Snell and snelly. Bitter, biting; snellest, bitterest.
"Not Boreas that sae snelly blaws." Fergusson.
- Snick, or sneck. The latchet of a door.
"Just lilt the sneck, and say peace be here." Scots Advice.
- Snick-drawing. Trick contriving.
"Then you, ye auld snic-drawing dog." Burns.
- Snirt, snirtle. Concealed laughter, to breathe through the nostrils in a displeased manner.
"Now let her snirt and fyke her fill." Herd.
- Snool. One whose spirit is broken with oppressive slavery; to submit tamely, to sneak.
"Our dotard dads, snool'd wi' their wives." Ramsay.
- Snoove. To go smoothly and constantly, to sneak.
"The naigs snooved awa', and the furrow fell owre like a ribbon." Scots Story.
- Snouw, snowkit. To scent or snuff as a dog, scented, snuffed.
"The drink and eke the offerings great and small, Snokis and likis." G. Douglas.
- Sodger. A soldier.
"On town guard sodgers' faces." Fergusson.
- Sonsie. Having sweet engaging looks, lucky, jolly.
"Sousie and cantie and gausie." Old Song.
- Soom. To swim.
"He'll soom wi' the stream, gae contrair wha will."
- Sooth. Truth, a pett' oath.
- Sough. A sound dying on the ear, or a continued sound like the noise of high wind.
- Souk. To suck, to drink long and enduringly.
"And aye she took the tither sook
To drouck the stowrie tow'." Scots Song.
- Souple, Soupled. Flexible, swift; supplid.
"As he rins he grows warm, an' as he grows warm he gets soupled, and then ye canna cast saut on his tail." Scots Saying.
"The eel, fu' souple, wags her tail." Fergus.
- Souther, souther. To solder.
"Ye hae cowpit the southering pan, my lass." Scots Song.

- Sou'zer. A shoemaker.
"Up wi' the souters o' Selkirk." Scots Song.
- Sowens. A dish made of oatmeal; the seeds of oatmeal soured, &c., boiled up till they make an agreeable pudding.
"And sowens and farles and baps." Scots Song.
- Sowp. A spoonful, a small quantity of anything liquid.
"A' ye wha live by sowps o' drink." Burns.
- Soth. To try over a tune with a low whistle.
"The soft soth of the swyre and sound of the streams." Dunbar.
- Spae. To prophecy, to divine.
"For thoeh sho spayit the soith." G. Douglas.
- Spails. Chips, splinters.
"Some strikkit thraw the coist with the spails of tree." G. Douglas.
- Spairge. To clash, to soil, as with mire.
"Spairges about the brunstane cootie." Burns.
- Spates. Swollen streams.
"The burne on spate hurls down the bank." G. Douglas.
- Spaul. A limb.
"Auld Sathan claught him by the spaul." Jacobite Relics.
- Spaviet. Having the spavin.
"Ye winna men' a spaviet horse wi' a braw bridle." S. P.
- Speat, spates. A sweeping torrent after the rain or thaw; sudden floods.
"Unguarded was the hallan gate,
And Whigs poured in like Nith in spate." Jacobite Relics.
- Speel. To climb.
"I hope to speel a higher tree,
"And herry a richer nest." Scots Song.
- Spence. The parlour of a farm house or cottage.
"Intil a spense where victual was plentye." Henryson.
- Spier. To ask, to enquire; spier't, inquired.
"Whare do ye win, gin ane may spier." Fergusson.
- Spinnin-graith. Wheel and roke and lint.
"Then Meg took up the spinning-graith." Burns.
- Splatter. To splutter, a splutter.
"There's an unco' splutter, quo' the sow in the gutter." Scots Saying.
- Spleughan. A tobacco pouch.
"Ilk chiel screwed up his dogskin spleughan." Davidson.
- Splore. A frolic, noise, riot.
"We have had some bits o' splores thegither." Scott.
- Sprachled. Scrambled.
"Came spraughlin in a hurry out." Mactaggart.
- Sprattle. To scramble.
"And making a sprattle for your life." Scott.
- Spreckled. Spotted, speckled.
"The spreckled mavis greets your ear." Fergusson.
- Spring. A quick air in music, a Scottish reel.
"Playand on his harp of Trace sa pleasand springis." Douglas.
- Sprit, spret. A tough-rooted plant, something like rushes, jointed-leaved rush.
"The ground is for the most part covered with sprit." Trans. Highland Society.
- Sprittie. Full of spirits.
"He was lying in a little green spretty hollow." Scots Story.
- Spunk. Fire, mettle, wit, spark.
"Is nocht left in ane spunk." Godly Songs.
- Spunkie. Mettlesome, fiery; will o' the wisp, or ignis fatuus; the devil.
"He'll get a begunkie that lippens to spunkie." Scots Saying.
- Spurtle. A stick used in making oatmeal pudding or porridge, a notable Scottish dish.
"Ane spurtle braid, and ane elwand." Bennatyne Poems.
- Squad. A crew or party, a squadron.
"The same day the council ordered out a squad of the guards." Wodrow.
- Squatter. To flutter in water, as a wild duck, &c.
"Syne squaterit down into the sca." Lyndsay.
- Squattle. To sprawl in the act of hiding.
"Swith in some beggars haffit squattle." Burns.
- Squeel. A scream, a screech, to scream.
"I trow he gaured the kimmers squeel." Scots Song.
- Stacher. To stagger.
"Like a stirk stacharand in the rye." Dunbar.
- Stack. A rick of corn, hay, peats.
"A peat stack at the door to keep a ranting fire." Old Song.
- Staggie. Diminutive of stag.
"An' could hae flown like ony staggie." Burns.
- Staig. A two year old horse.
"Quhiles, thou stall staigs and stirks." G. Douglas.
- Stalwart. Stately, strong, stout.
"Now strong Gyane now stalwart Cloantheus." Douglas.
- Stang. Sting, stung.
"In herrying o' a bee bike I hae got a stang." Scots Song.
- Stan't. To stand; stan't, did stand.
"I canna stan't, I canna stan't; taking my siller is like taking my heart's blude." Scots Story.
- Stane. A stone.
"Sum strack with stingis, sum gadderit stanes." King James.
- Stank. A pool of standing water, slow moving water.
"And fand ane stank that flowit from ane well." Douglas.
- Stap. Stop, stave.
"I'll take a stap out o' your cog." Scots Saying.
- Stark. Stout, potent.
"Stark mighty wines and small wines." Aberdeen Records.
- Startle. To run as cattle stung by the gadfly.
"That gars thee startle." Burns.
- Staukin. Stalking, walking disdainfully, walking without an aim.
"He gangs stauk staukin, and yet he's wide wakin'." Burns.
- Staumrel. A blockhead, half-witted.
"A full stauemel is half a gomerall." Scots Saying.
- Staw. Did steal, to surfeit.
"We'll staw'd wi' them, he'll never spier." Fergusson.
- Stech, stechin. To cram the belly; cramming.
"His father stecht his fortune in his wame." Ramsay.
- "There's meat and drink, and sae stech yoursels well." A Scotch Exhortation.
- Steek. To shut, a stitch.
"Whan thrasher John, sair dung, his barn-door steeks." Fergusson.
- Steer. To molest, to stir.
"Steer her up and haud her gaun." Scots Song.
- Steeve. Firm, compacted.
"As hot as ginger, and as steeve as steel." Robertson.
- Stell. A still.
"Her nainsel does as gude as keep a sma' stell." Scots Story.
- Sten, sten't. To rear as to a horse, to stride, to leap suddenly; reared.
"My heart to my mou gied a sten." Burns.
- Stravagin. Wandering without an aim.
"He has gi'en up a trade and ta'en to stravagin." Scots Saying.
- Stents. Tribute, dues of any kind.
"To tax and stent the hale inhabitants within the Parochin." Acts James VI.
- Stey. Steep; steyt, steepest.
"Set a stout hear to a stey brae." Scots Proverb.
- Stibble. Stubble; stibble rig, the reaper in harvest who takes the lead.
"Shod i' the cradle and barefoot i' the stibble." Scots Proverb.
- Stick-an'-stow. Totally, altogether.
"Which gin I gie you stick-an'-stow." Sheriffs.

- Stilt, stilts. A crutch; to limp, to halt; poles for crossing a river.
"The Dunscore salt lairds stilt the Nith."
Scots Song.
- Stimpart. The eighth part of a Winchester bushel.
"Them that canna get a peck maun pit up wi' a stimpart."
Scots Saying.
- Stirk. A cow or bullock a year old.
"Our stirks and young beists mony ane."
G. Douglas.
- Stock. A plant of colewort, cabbages.
"A body's no broke while they hae a green kale-stock."
Scots Proverb.
- Stockin'. Stocking; throwing the stockin'; when the bride and bridgroom are put into bed, and the candle out, the former throws a stocking at random among the company, and the person whom it falls on is the next that will be married.
- Stook, stooked. A shock of corn, made into shocks.
"And when its a' cut I'll stook it wi' pleasure."
Galloway.
- Stoor. Sounding hollow, strong, and hoarse.
Stot. A young bull, or ox.
"Semin young stottis, that yolk bare neur nane."
Douglas.
- Stound. Sudden pang of the heart.
"So tyl hys heart stounds the pryk of death."
G. Douglas.
- Stoup, or stoup. A kind of high narrow jug or dish with a handle, for holding liquids.
"Freyr Robert sayd, dame, fill ane stoup of ale."
Dunbar.
- Stoure. Dust; more particularly dust in motion; stourie, dusty.
"The strang stovre raise like reek amang them fast."
Blind Harry.
- Stowlins. By stealth.
"And stowlins when there was na thinking."
Nicol.
- Stown. Stolen.
"Aft tymis gear tynt or stowin is gotten agane be conjurers."
Hamilton.
- Stoyte. The walking of a drunken man, stumble.
"He gies mony a stoyte, but never a tumble."
Scots Saying.
- Strack. Did strike.
"He had the same sword in keeping that strak the field o' Flodden."
Pittscottie.
- Strae. Straw; to die a fair strae death, to die in bed.
"And out he drew his gude brown sword
And straket it on the strae."
Old Ballad.
- Straik. To stroke; strait, stroked.
"That straykes thir wenches hedis them to please."
G. Douglas.
- Strappan, strappin'. Tall, handsome, vigorous.
"The English minister proposed to hire a band of strapping Elliots."
Scott.
- Strath. Low alluvial land, a holm.
"A strath is a flat piece of arable land lying along the side or sides of some capital river."
Burt.
- Straight. Straight.
"Hand of woman or of man either will never straight him."
Scott.
- Streek. Stretched, to stretch.
"Nane o't she wyled but forward on did streek."
Ross.
- Striddle. To straddle.
"Lads like to striddle to the soun' o' the fiddle."
Scots Rhyme.
- Stroan. To spout.
"An' stroaned on stanes and hillocks wi' him."
Burns.
- Stroup. The spout.
"O haste ye an' come to our gate an'
And sowther the stroup o' my lady's pan."
Scott.
- Studdie. The anvil.
"Item, three iron studdies and ane cruke studdie."
Inventory.
- Stumpie. Diminutive of stump; a grub pen.
"And down gade stumpie in the ink."
Burns.
- Strunt. Spirituous liquor of any kind; to walk sturdily, to be affronted.
"Gif ony wayward lassie tak' the strunt."
Scots Poem.
- Stuff. Corn or pulse of any kind.
"And snodly cleaned the stuff."
Tarras.
- Sturt. Trouble; to molest.
"To sturt them on the streme fra hand to hand."
Douglas.
- Startin. Frighted.
"When death lifts the curtain its time to be startin'."
Scots Proverb.
- Styme. A glimmer.
"Suppose thou sees her not a styme."
Montgomery.
- Sucker. Sugar.
"An' just a wee drap spiritual burnin'
And gusty sucker."
Burns.
- Sud. Should.
"That you sud musing gae."
Fergusson.
- Sugh, or sough. The continued rushing noise of wind or water.
"Cald blaws the nippin' north wi' angry sugh."
Fergusson.
- Sumph. A pluckless fellow, with little heart or soul.
"Surveys the self-made sumph in proper light."
Ramsay.
- Suthron. Southern, an old name for the English nation.
"A southern there he slew at every stroke."
Blind Harry.
- Sward. Sword.
"Yere a fine swaird, quo the fule to the wheat braird."
Scots Saying.
- Swall'd. Swelled.
"Its a world's pity to see how these rings are pinching the poor creature's swalled fingers."
Scott.
- Swank. Stately, jolly.
"Mair hardy, souple, steeve and swank."
Fergusson.
- Swankie or Swanker. A tight strapping young fellow or girl.
"At en in the gloamin'
Nae swankies are roamin'."
Scots Song.
- Swap. An exchange, to barter.
"I trou we swappit for the warse."
Old Song.
- Swarfed. Swooned.
"The scene dumfounded the wretch, and swarfed him sac that he could not utter a word."
MacToggart.
- Swat, sweatin'. Did sweat, sweating.
"They swat like ponies when they speal
Up braes, or when they gallop."
Ramsay.
- Swatch. A sample.
"A swatch—a pattern, or piece for a sample."
Sinclair.
- Swats. Drink, good ale, new ale or wort.
"Nor kept dow'd tip within her waas
But reamin' swats."
Ramsay.
- Sweer. Lazy, averse; dead-sweer, extremely averse.
"Deferred hopes needna make me dead sweer."
Rutherford.
- Swoor. Swore, did swear.
- Swinge. To beat, to whip.
"Swynget and faught full sturdeley."
Barbour.
- Swinke. To labour hard.
"To swinke and sweat withouten meat or wage."
Henryson.
- Swirl. A curve, an eddying blast or pool, a knot in wood.
"The swelland swirl uphesit us to heauen."
Douglas.
- Swir'lie. Knaggy, full of knots.
"He taks a swirlie auld moss aik,
For some black gruesome carlin."
Burns.
- Swith. Get away.
"Swith roast a hen an' fry some chickens."
Ramsay.
- Swither. To hesitate in choice, an irresolute wavering in choice.
- Syebow. A thick-necked onion.
"Wi' syebows, an' rifarts, and carlins."
Scots Song.
- Syne. Since, ago, then.
"The meal was dear short syne."
Scots Song.

T

- Tacketts. Broad-headed nails for the heels of shoes.
"Wad hand the Lothians three in tacketts."
Burns.
- Tae. A toe; three-taed; having three prongs.
"Ovre mony masters, quo' the toad to tae harrows, when every tae gie l him a tig."
Scott.

- Tak. To take; takin', taking.
"They tak the horse then by the head."
Scots Song.
- Tamtallan. The name of an old castle or fortress, on the coast of East Lothian.
- Tangle. A sea-weed, used as salad.
"Scraped haddocks, wilks, dulse, and tangle."
Scots Song.
- Tap. The top.
"I'll tak my tap in my lap and rin."
Scott.
- Tapetless. Heedless, foolish.
"That she grew tapetless and swarft therewith."
Ross.
- Targe. Targe them tightly, cross question them severely.
- Tairge. Target.
- Tarrow, tarrow't. To murmur at one's allowance; murmured.
"A tarrowing bairm was never fat."
Scots Proverb.
- Tarry-breeks. A sailor.
"Tarry breeks are toom when tartan trews are fou."
Scots Proverb.
- Tassie. A small measure for liquor.
"Here's my Jean's health in the siller lipt tassie."
Scots Song.
- Tauld, or tald. Told.
"I trow anither tale she tauld."
Scots Song.
- Taupie. A foolish, thoughtless young person.
"Porrige," quoth Hab, "ye senseless taupie."
Ramsay
- Tauted, or Tautie. Matted together (spoken of hair and wool).
"He had an ill faur't tautie face."
Tannahill.
- Tawie. That allows itself peaceably to be handled (spoken of a cow, horse, &c.).
"He fund when a fiel' he was tawie an' tame" Picken.
- Teut. A small quantity.
"And we'll get teats o' woo."
Scots Song.
- Tedding. Spreading after the mower.
- Teethless bawtie. Toothless cur.
"When our dog Bawtie barks, fast to the door I rin."
Scots Song.
- Teethless gab. A mouth wanting the teeth, an expression of scorn.
"While ae gab's teething, anither's growing teethless."
Scots Proverb.
- Ten-hours-bite. A slight feed to the horse while in the yoke in the forenoon.
"Or dealing through among the naigs, Their ten-hours-bite."
Burns.
- Tent. A field pulpit, heed, caution; to take heed.
"Dawnus, son Turnus, in the nynte tak tent."
G. Douglas.
- Tentie. Heedful, cautious.
"Be wyse and tentie in thy governing"
Maitland Poems.
- Tentless. Heedless, careless.
"She that fa's owre a strae 's a tentless taupie."
Scots Proverb.
- Tough. Tough.
"Wi' aureate leuis, and flexibil twistis teuch."
Douglas.
- Thack. Thatch; thack an' rape, clothing and necessaries; alluding to the covering of a corn rick.
"Some grathis first the thack and rufe of tree."
Douglas.
- Thae, thir. These.
- Thairms. Small guts, fiddle strings.
"He that has a wide thairm has never a lang arm."
"For while I kittle hair on thairms."
Burns.
- Thankit. Thanked.
"He first said bethankit an' syne he drank it."
Scots Proverb.
- Thackit. Thatch'd.
"With lede the south yele thekyd alsua."
Wyntown.
- Thegither. Together.
"Gin we be seen thegither in the mirk"
Ross.
- Themsel'. Themselves.
"Them that teut nae thamsel' will tent nae body else."
Scots Proverb.
- Thick. Intimate, familiar.
"Nae twa were ever seen mair thick."
Davidson.
- Thigger. Crowding, make a noise; a secker of alms.
"Thiggers are those who beg in a genteel way."
Mactaggart.
- Thir. These.
"To thir twa wardenys athis swar."
Barbour.
- Thirl, thirled. To thrill, thrilled, vibrated.
"An elbuck dirle will lang play thirl."
Scots Proverb.
- Thole. To suffer, to endure.
"Quhat danger is he suld thole on land and see."
Douglas.
- Thowe. A thaw, to thaw.
"Dighted his face, his handies thow'd."
G. Douglas.
- Thowless. Slack, lazy.
"He was thowless and had in wown."
Wyntown.
- Thrang. Throng, busy, a crowd.
"A thoughtless bodie's aye thrang."
Scots Proverb.
- Thrapple. Throat, windpipe.
"Till thropil and wesand gade in two."
Barbour.
- Thraw. To sprain, to twist, to contradict.
"Thraw the wand while it's green."
Scots Proverb.
- Thrawin'. Twisting, &c.
"Alecto hir thrawin visage did away."
Gavin Douglas.
- Thrawn. Sprained, twisted, contradicted, contradiction.
"Thraw the widdie whan the wood's green."
Scots Proverb.
- Threap. To maintain by dint of assertion.
"Bout once threap when he and I fell out."
Ross.
- Threshin'. Thrashing; threshin'-tree, a flail.
- Threteen. Thirteen.
- Thristle. Thistle.
"Bot thrissil, nettill, brier, and thorne."
Lyndsay.
- Through. To go on with, to make out.
"Hey ca' through ca' through."
Scots Song.
- Throu'ther. Pell-mell, confusedly (through-ither).
"And see throu'ither warpld were that she."
Ross.
- Thrum. Sound of a spinning wheel in motion, the thread remaining at the end of a web.
"He's no gude weaver that leaves lang thrums."
Scots Proverb.
- Thud. To make a loud intermittent noise.
"Throw cluds so, he thuds so."
Montgomery.
- Thummart. Founart, pole-cat.
"May the founart lay his crawin."
Scots Song.
- Thumpit. Thumped.
"When pulpit thumpers did express."
Meston.
- Thysel'. Thyself.
"Mind thysel'—the warld will mind the lave"
Scots Proverb.
- Till't. To it.
"Till't they gade ye see on a brow simmer morning."
Scott.
- Timmer. Timber.
"Timmeris for helmis war the tane."
Barbour.
- Tine, or tyne. To lose; tint, lost; tint the gate, lost the way.
"Micht he do ocht but-tyne him as it was."
Blind Harry.
- Tinkler. A tinker.
"It canna be warse that's no worth a tinkler's curse."
Scots Proverb.
- Tip. A ram.
"Young Colin plodded wi' his strayed tips."
Davidson.
- Tippence. Two-pence, money.
"Wae to him that lippens to others for tippence."
Scots Proverb.
- Tirl, tirlin', tirl't. To make a slight noise, to uncover; uncovering.
"When the wind blows loud and tirls our strae."
"And aff his coat they tirl't by the croun."
Scots Poem.
- Tither. The other.
"An' the tae fat butcher fryed the tither."
Jacobite Relics.

- Tittle, tittlin'. To whisper, to prate idly; whispering.
 "My old and great acquaintances at the court of France tittled in the Queen's ear."
Melvil.
- Tocher. "Here sits a raw o' tittlin jades." Burns.
 Marriage portion; tocher bands, marriage bonds.
 "She need na mind a clochar wha has a rich tocher."
Scots Proverb.
- Tod. A fox. "Tod i' the fauld," fox in the fold.
 "Birds hae their nests, and tods hae their den."
Lyndsay.
- Toddle, toddlin'. To totter, like the walk of a child;—
toddlen-dow, toddlen dove.
 "Toddling burns that smoothly play."
Fergusson.
- Too-fa'. "Too fa' o' the nicht," when twilight darkens into night; a building added, a lean-to.
- Toom. Empty.
 "Of toom dominion on the pleteous main."
Ramsay.
- Toop. A ram.
 "My poor toop lamb, my son an' heir." Burns.
- Toss. A toast.
 "An' a' forbye my bonnie sel',
 The toss o' Ecclefechan."
- Tosie. Warm and ruddy with warmth, good-looking, intoxicating.
 "And brought them wealth of meat and tosie drink."
Hamilton.
- Toun. A hamlet, a farm house.
 "Will ye ca' in by our toun, as ye gae to the faul'."
Scots Song.
- Tout. The blast of a horn or trumpet, to blow a horn or trumpet.
 "O lady, I heard a wee horn tout."
Old Ballad.
- Touzles, touzling. Romping; ruffling the clothes.
 "Whilk touzles a' their tap, and gars them shak wi' fear."
Fergusson.
- Tow. A rope.
 "His tows I find hae been sae fine."
Scots Poem.
- Towmond. A twelvemonth.
 "To this towmond I'se indent." Ramsay.
- Towzie. Rough, shaggy.
 "He's an auld tawtie towzie beast."
Scots Song.
- Toy. A very old fashion of female head-dress.
 "My grannie's joy is her grannie's toy."
Scots Saying.
- Toyte. To totter like old age.
 "He's auld and feckless, an' a' he dow do is to toyte about."
Scots Song.
- Trans. Barrow-trans, the handles of a barrow.
 "We'll batter it wi' a barrow tram."
Dunbar.
- Transmugrifed. Transmigrated, m-tamorphosed.
 "It has undergone a great transmogrification."
Galt.
- Trashtrie. Trash, rubbish.
 "Wi' sauce, ragouts, and such like trashtrie."
Burns.
- Trews. Trousers.
- Trickie. Full of tricks.
 "A trickie chap's easiest tricket."
Scots Saying.
- Trig. Spruce, neat.
 "Full taicht and trig socht blet and to their dammes."
Douglas.
- Trimly. Cleverly, excellently, in a seemly manner.
 "An trimly other tryme conceits."
Scots Poem.
- Trinle, trintle. The wheel of a barrow, to roll.
 "An' my auld mither burnt the trinle."
Burns.
- Trinklin. Tricking.
 "Lyke to the trinklin black stems of pik."
G. Douglas.
- Troggers, troggin. Wandering merchants, goods to truck or dispose of.
 "The second are those called troggers, who carry on a species of traffic."
Sinclair.
- Trow. To believe, to trust to.
 "And gif that ye will trow to me." Barbour.
- Trouth. Truth, a petty oath.
 "And trowth had in swyck fantasie."
Wyntoun.
- Tryste, trysts. To make an appointment; appointments, love meetings, cattle shows.
 "Was at that tryste that ilke day." Wyntoun
- Try't. Tried.
- Tumbler-wheels. The wheels of a kind of low cart.
 "She can digest the wheels o' tumbler cars like Willie Stalker's mare." Scots Saying.
- Tug. Raw hide, of which in old time plough traces were frequently made.
- Tug or tow. Either in leather or rope.
 "As e'er in tug or tow was traced."
Burns.
- Tulzie. A quarrel, to quarrel, to fight.
 "Sevin' sum that the tulzie maid."
K. James
- Twa. Two; twa-fauld, two fold.
 "They made a paction 'tween them twa."
K. James V.
- Twa three. A few.
 "In twa three words I'll gie ye my opinion."
Scots Poem.
- Twad. It would.
- Twal. Twelve; twal pennie worth, a small quantity, a pennyworth.—N. B. One penny English is twelve pence Scotch.
 "In twal year throw his douchty dede."
Barbour.
- Twin. To part.
 "He'll no twin wi' his gear." Old Ballad
- Twistle. Twisting, the art of making a rope.
 "I'll twissle yere thrapple in a jiffy."
Scots Story.
- Tyke. A dog.
 "Thocht he dow not to leid a tyk."
Dunbar.
- Tysday. Tuesday.
 "Saw ye ought o' the rinaway bride
 Should been married on tysday 'teen."
Scots Song.

U

- Unback'd filly. A young mare hitherto unsaddled.
 "But take it like the unbacked filly, Proud o' her speed."
Burns.
- Unco. Strange, uncouth, very, very great, prodigious.
 "Ye've lain in an unco bed, and wi' an unco man."
Scots Song.
- Uncos. News.
 "Sae tell's the uncos that ye've heard o' seen."
Morison.
- Unfauld. Unfold.
 "The news grow caul'd that slow tongues unfauld."
Scots Proverb.
- Unkenn'd. Unknown.
 "An unkenn'd sea has ay an unkenn'd shore."
Scots Proverb.
- Unsicker. Uncertain, wavering, unsecure.
 "Unsicker, unstable, quo' the wave to the cable."
Scots Proverb.
- Unskaited. Undamaged, unhurt.
- Upo'. Upon.
- Unseeting. Unwittingly, unknowing.
- Urchin. A hedge-hog.

V

- Vap'rin. Vapouring.
 "In wrath she was sae vap'rin."
Burns.
- Vauntie. Joyous, delight which cannot contain itself.
 "'Tis daffin to be vauntie."
Old Song.
- Vera. Very.
 "Other fowk are well faured, but ye're no sae vera."
Scots Saying.
- Virle. A ring round a column, &c
 "Of plumb-tree made, with ivory virles round."
Ramsay.
- Vogie. Vain.
 "And vogie that I ca' my ain."
Ross.

W

- Wa'. Wall; wa's, walls.
 "The lady look'd over the castle wa',
 Cried wha maks a' this din?" Scots Ballad.

- Wabster. A weaver.
"Find me ane wabster that is leill." Lyndsay.
- Wad. Would, to bet, a bet, a pledge.
- Wadna. Would not.
"What writer wadna gang as far as He could for bread." Fergusson.
- Wadset. Land on which money is lent; a mortgage.
"An' what's his lairdship; a mere wadset, no worth redeeming."
- Wae. Woe; waefu', sorrowful, wailing.
"It was wae-days wi' Charlie." Scots Song.
- Waefu'-woodie. Hangman's rope.
"But weary-fa' the waefu'-woodie." Burns.
- Waesucks! Wae's me! Alas! O the pity!
"Some that hae least to dree are loudest wi' wae's me!" Scots Proverb.
- Wa'-flower. Wall-flower.
"Ye may fin' the smell ' the wa'-flower for three miles frae the at'ey tap when the win's in the west." Scots Story.
- Waft. Woof; the cross thread that goes from the shuttle through the web.
"True love's the waft o' life, but it whiles comes through a sorrowfu' shuttle." Scots Saying.
- Waifs an' crocks. Stray sheep and old ewes, past breeding.
"And sittin down like sarye crockis." Dunbar.
- Wair. To lay out, to expend.
"Wi' ten pund Scots, on sarkin to ware." Scots Song.
- Wale, wal'd. Choice, to choose; chosen.
"The wale o' our lasses is moorland Mez." Scots Song.
- Walie. Ample, large, jolly, also an interjection of distress.
"O waly, waly, up the bank." Scots Song.
- Wame, wamefu'. The belly; a belly-full.
"A rotten sod across his wame." Hogg.
"Let ne'er a wamefu' be a missing." A. Scott.
- Wanchansie. Unlucky.
"Wi' creels wanchansie heap'd wi' bread." Fergusson.
- Wanrest, wanrestfu'. Restless, unrestful.
"Quo' she, I wis I could your wanrest ken." Ross.
- Wark. Work.
"Rise early to their wark." Fergusson.
- Wark-lume. A tool to work with.
"An' wark she soon that wark-lume quit." Scots Poem.
- Ward's worm. A miser.
"Some ca' him Haud-the-grip, and ithers the Ward's worm." Scots Story.
- Warl' or ward. World.
- Warlock. A wizard; Warlock-knowe, a knoll where warlocks once held tryste.
"Ye'll neither die for 'ere wit, nor be drowned for a warlock." Scots Proverb.
- Warily. Worldly, eager in amassing wealth.
"The wardly race may riches chase." Burns.
- Warran'. A warrant, to warrant.
"Indeed, quo' she, I'se warran'." Scots Song.
- Warsle, warstle, warsl'd, or warstl'd. Wrestle, wrestling, struggling; wrestled.
"Qua with this world dois warsle and stryle." Dunbar.
"We've foughten tough and warsled sair." Scots Song.
- Worst. Worst.
- Wastrie. Prodigality.
"A house in a hastic is downright wastrie." Scots Proverb.
- Wat. Wet; I wat—I wot—I know.
"After their yokin—I wat weel." Fergusson.
- Wat. A man's upper dress; a sort of mantle.
"To make a wat to Johnnie of." Burns.
- Water brose. Brose made of meal and water simply, without the addition of milk, butter, &c.
"Them that likes na water brose, will scunner at cauld steerie." Scots Proverb.
- Wattle. A twig, a wand.
"He cut a wand and gae her a wattlin." Scots Story.
- Wauble. To swing, to reel.
"He's grown sae waufl he scarce can wauble." Scots Saying.
- Waught. Draught.
- Waukin. Waking, watching.
"Yet weel I like to meet her
At the wauking of the fauld." Ramsay.
- Waukit. Thickened as fullers do cloth.
"Done, quo' Pate, and syne his erles Nailed the dysters wauket loof." A. Wilson.
- Waukrife. Not apt to sleep.
"Thou art a gay and kindlie quean,
But thou hast a waukrife minnie." Scots Song.
- Waur, waur't. Worse, worsted.
"And what the waur am I." Old Song.
"Wad aiblins waur't thee at a brattle." Burns.
- Wean. A child.
"Ilka year a dainty wean." Macneill.
- Wearie, or weary. Mony a weary body, many a toilsome person.
- Weary-widdle. Toilsome contest of life.
"This warl's a widdle, as weel as a riddle." Scots Proverb.
- Weason. Weasand, windpipe.
"Weet your weason, or else it will geeson." Scots Saying.
- Weavin' the stocking. To knit stockings. See Stockin'.—Throwing the stocking.
"To ca' the crack an' weave our stockin'." Burns.
- Weeder-clips. Instrument for removing weeds.
"I turned the weeder-clips aside." Burns.
- Wee. Little; wee things, little ones; wee bits, a small matter.
"Oh! wee, wee man, but ye be strang." Scots Ballad.
- Weel. Well; welfare, welfare.
"They're weel guidet that God guides." Scots Proverb.
- Weet. Rain, wetness; to wet.
"Logan water's wide and deep,
And I am laith to weet my feet." Scots Song.
- Weird. Fate.
- We'se. We shall.
"We'se a' be fu' when the corn's i' the mow." Scots Song.
- Wha, whase, wha's. Who, whose, who's.
"Ye wha hae sung o' Hallow fair." Fergusson.
- Whaizle. To wheeze.
"Ye fuif and whaizle, like a hunted weasel." Scots Proverb.
- Whalpit. Whelped.
- Whang. A leathern thong, a piece of cheese, bread, &c.
"Cut frae the new cheese a whang." James V.
- Whare. Where. Whare'er, where'er.
"Whare will our gude-man lie?" Scots Song.
- What reek. Nevertheless.
"And yet what reek he at Quebec." Burns.
- Wheep. To fly nimbly, to jerk; penny-wheep, small beer.
"He hated penny-wheep and water." Scots Rhyme.
- Whid. The motion of a hare running, but not frightened: a lie.
"He'll tell you a whid aboon what he's bid." Scots Saying.
- Whidden. Running as a hare, c^o coney.
"The innert's flittin frae cowe to cowe,
The hare is whidden frae knowe to knowe." Scots Song.
- Whigmaleeries. Whims, fancies, crotchets.
- Whilk. Which.
"Than whilk I trow." Fergusson.
- Whingin'. Crying, complaining, fretting.
"Fears aye pingin and sorrows aye whingin'." Scots Saying.
- Whirligigums. Useless ornaments, trifling appendages.
The capitals which surmount the columns on the new bridge of Ayr.
- Whistle. A whistle, to whistle.
"The shrill sound of a thin sword-blade in the act of striking."

- Whisht. Silence; to hold one's whisht, to be silent.
"Whisht, gude wife, is this a day to be singing your ranting fule sangs in." Scott.
- Whisk; whisket. To sweep—to lash.
"He whisket it cross my lips I trow,
Which makes them baith sae mealy." Scots Song.
- Whiskin' beard. A beard like the whiskers of a cat.
"A whiskin' beard about her mou." Burns.
- Whitter. A hearty draught of liquor.
"He's na fitter while the cog yields a whitter." Scots Saying.
- Whittle. A knife.
"Pits ilk chiel's whittle i' the pye." Fergusson.
- Whunstone. A whinstone.
"Be to the poor like ony whunstone." Burns.
- Whyles. Whiles, sometimes.
- Wi'. With.
"How 's a wi' ye, my sonsie dame." Scots Song.
- Wick. To strike a stone in an oblique direction—a term in curling.
"Guard this in wick, else its a' day with the dinner and drink." Directions in Curling.
- Wicker. Willow (the smaller sort).
- Widdifu. Twisted like a withy—one who merits hanging.
"Vain widdifu out of thy wit gane wild." Dunbar.
- Wiel. A small whirlpool.
"An' in the wiel she will drown me." Old Ballad.
- Wife-wifkie. A diminutive, or endearing name, for wife.
"There was a wee bit wifkie, and she gaed to the fair." Geddes.
- Wight. Stout—enduring.
"A nobell knight,
Stout and manly, bauld and wycht." Wyntown.
- Willgart-glower. A bewildered, dismayed stare.
"Whiles wandering, whiles dandering,
Like royd and willyart rais." Burel.
- Wimple, wimpler. To meander—meandered—to enfold.
"Wimplit and busket in ane bluidy bend." G. Douglas.
- Wimplin'. Waving—meandering;
"Where wimpling waters make their way." Ramsay.
- Win', win't, wind. To wind, to winnow; winded, as a bottom of yarn.
"Weel win corn should be housed ere the morn." Scots Proverb.
- Win, wons. Live, dwells.
"Where do ye win, gin ane may speer." Fergusson.
- Winnin'-thread. Putting thread into hanks.
"Prudence should be winning when thrift is spinning." Scots Saying.
- Winna. Will not.
"In troth i winna steer ye." Scots Song.
- Winnock. A window.
"May gain a place in Fame's high winnock." Tannahill.
- Winsome. Hearty, vaunted, gay.
"Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow." Hamilton.
- Wintle. A staggering motion; to stagger, to reel.
"He'll wintle in a widdle as sure as I'm i' the body." Scots Saying.
- Wiss. To wish.
"There was nae need o' her to wis to pit me daft." Galt.
- Withouten. Without.
- Wizened. Hide-bound, dried, shrunk.
"He's wizened, but gere geisond." That is, he is dry, but you are drier.
- Winze. A curse, or imprecation.
"He loot a winze and drew a straik." Burns.
- Wonner. A wonder, a contemptuous appellation.
"Some are unlo'esome enough, but ye're a warl's wonner."
- Woo'. Wool.
"Simmer it is coming in an we'll get teats o' woo'." Scots Song.
- Woo. To court, to make love to.
"Wooling at her, pu'in' at her." Scots Song.
- Woodie. A rope; more properly, one of withs or willows.
"He was missed by the water, but caught by the woodie." Scots Proverb.
- Woover-babs. The garter knitted below the knee with a couple of loops.
- Wordy. Worthy.
"He's weel wordy o' her, or the best o' a' her kin." Scots Song.
- Worsel. Worsted.
"Her brow new worsel apron." Burns.
- Wow. An exclamation of pleasure or wonder.
- Wrack. To tease, to vex.
"I'll tease him an' wrack him until I heart break him." Burns.
- Wud. Wild, mad; wud-mad, distracted.
"Ance wud, and aye waur." Scots Proverb.
- Wumble. A wamble.
"To do sic a darke is like boring wi' a fipless wumble." Scots Saying.
- Wraith. A spirit, a ghost, an apparition exactly like a living person, whose appearance is said to forebode the person's approaching death; also wrath.
"And in her sleep loud wraith in every place." Douglas.
- Wrang. Wrong, to wrong.
"With rycht or wrang it hav wald thae." Barbour.
- Wreeth. A drifted heap of snow.
"Ance she lay a week or langer,
Underneath a wreeth o' snaw." Skinner.
- Wyle. To beguile.
- Wyliecoat. A flannel vest.
"The bride in wylie coat sae braw,
Sat on her nether en." Ramsay.
- Wyle. Blame, to blame.
"Had I the wyle she bade me." Scots Song.

Y

- Ye. This pronoun is frequently used for thou.
- Year. Is used both for singular and plural years.
- Yearlings. Born in the same year, coevals.
"Near yearlins wi' the sun your God." Ramsay.
- Yeans. Longs much.
"He's aye in a yearn, yearn, or a girn, girn." Scots Saying.
- Yell. Barren, that gives no milk.
"A yell sow was never gude to grices." Scots Proverb.
- Yerk, Yerkit. To lash, to jerk, jerked, lashed.
"If I canna sew, quoth Wat, I can yerk." Scott.
- Yestreen. Yesternight.
"Yestreen I saw the new moon
Wi' the auld moon in her arm." Scots Ballad.
- Yett. A gate; such as is usually at the entrance into a farm-yard, or field.
"Thai wist not well at what yett he ingaid." Blind Hawry.
- Yeuks. Itches.
"I'll gar ye scart where it disna yeuk." Scots Saying.
- Yill. Ale.
"Aye blithely, sir, an' drink his health too,
when the yills gude." Scott.
- Yin. One.
"Happy we've been, yin and a'." Burns.
- Yird, yirred. Earth, earthed; buried.
"Into great pitts eardet were." Barbour.
- Yokin'. Yoking.
"Or haud the yokin' o' a plough." Jacobite Relics.
- Yont, ayont. Beyond.
"The auld wife ayont the fire." Ross.
- Yirr. Lively.
"You yirr and yowl, you bark, but dare na bite." Scots Saying.
- Yowe. An ewe.
- Yowie. Diminutive of Yowe.
"The ewie an' the crookit horn,
Sic a ewie ne'er was born." S'vinner.
- Yule. Christmas.
"And held bis yhule in Aberdeen." Wyntown.

POETICAL INDEX
TO THE
POEMS, BALLADS AND SONGS,

IN THE ALPHABETICAL ORDER OF THE FIRST LINES.

A	PAGE	PAGE
		O FOR ANE-AN'-TWENTY.
		An' O! for ane-and-twenty, Tam 403
		EPPIE ADAIR.
Accept the gift a friend sincere 245		An' O, my Eppie, my jewel, my Eppie! 389
		THE ROSE BUD.
FAREWELL TO ST. JAMES'S LODGE.		A rose bud by my early walk 373
Adieu! a heart warm fond adieu! 354		ON THE KIRK OF LAMINGTON.
		As cauld a wind as ever blew 332
LINES AT KENMORE.		DOWN THE BURN.
Admiring Nature in her wildest grace 277		As down the burn they took their way 473
WINDING NITH.		ON A HEN-PECK'D SQUIRE.
Adown winding Nith I did wander 468		As Father Adam first was fooled. 339
THE LOTHIAN LASSIE.		BONNIE PEG.
Ae day a braw wooer came down the lang glen 509		As I came in by our gate end 357
		A VISION.
TO JOHN RANKINE.		As I stood by yon roofless tower 313
Ae day, as Death, that gruesome carle 319		CA' THE EWES.
AE FOND KISS.		As I gaed down the water side 386
Ae fond kiss, and then we sever 401		THE MERRY PLOUGHMAN.
		As I was a wand'ring ae morning in Spring 405
MENIE.		AS I WAS A WAND'RING.
Again rejoicing nature sees 354		As I was a wand'ring ae midsummer e'ening 405
VERSES TO MISS LOGAN.		O, MALLY'S MEEK.
Again the silent wheels of time 268		As I was walking up the street 439
AULD FARMER'S SALUTATION.		ON LOVELY DAVIES.
A guid new-year I wish thee, Maggie! 175		Ask why God made the gem so small 332
CHLORIS.		DEATH OF POOR MAILIE.
Ah, Chloris! since it may na be 422		As Mailie and her lambs tgether 166
O, AN' YE WERE DEAD, GUIDMAN.		ON THE WOODS OF DRUMLANRIG.
A Highland lad my love was born 181		As on the banks o' wand'ring Nith 294
A CHARACTER.		TAM THE CHAPMAN.
A little, upright, pert, tart, tripping wight 312		As Tam the chapman on a day 327
TRAGIC FRAGMENT.		ON BACON.
All devil as I am, a damned wretch 318		At Brownhill we always get dainty good cheer 328
ODE TO RUIN.		LADY ONLIE.
All hail! inexorable lord! 237		A' the lads o' Thornie bank 413
HERE'S HIS HEALTH IN WATER.		EPISTLE TO CREECH.
Altho' my back be at the wa' 428		Auld chuckie Reekie's sair distrest 273
MONTGOMERY'S PEGGY.		EPISTLE TO JAMES TAIT.
Altho' my bed were in yon muir 343		Auld comrade dear, and brither sinner 248
AMANG THE TREES.		AWA', WHIGS.
Amang the trees where humming bees 429		Awa', Whigs, awa' 386
LINES AT THE FALL OF FYERS.		HEY FOR A LASS WI' A TOCHER.
Among the heathy hills and rugged woods 277		Awa' wi' your witchcraft o' beauty's alarms 510
GLOOMY DECEMBER.		ON A SCOTCH BARD.
Ance mair I hail thee, thou gloomy December 428		A' ye wha live by sowps o' drink 244
EPITAPH ON A FRIEND.
An honest man here lies at rest 327
ANNA.
Anna, thy charms my bosom fire 426

	PAGE
B
Bannoeks o' bear meal	427
TO MISS CRUIKSHANKS.
Beautcoust rose-bud, young and gay	249
TO CLARINDA.
Before I saw Clarinda's face	271
MY NANNIE, O.
Behind yon hills, where Lugar flows	347
BONNY TWEEDSIDE.
Behold, my love, how green the groves	491
BEHOLD THE HOUR.
Behold the hour the boat arrive	472
ON A NOISY POLEMIC.
Below thir stanes lie Jamie's banes	328
CRAIGIE-BURN-WOOD.
Beyond thee dearie, beyond thee dearie	395
ON A COUNTRY LAIRD.
Bless the Redeemer, Cardones	336
TO JOHN M ^c MURDO, ESQ.
Blest be M ^c Murdo to his latest day!	287
BLYTHE WAS SHE.
Blythe, blythe, and merry was she	372
BLYTHE HAE I BEEN.
Blythe hae I been on yon hill	461
BIRKS OF ABERFELDY.
Bonny lassie, will ye go?	361
BONNIE WEE THING.
Bonny wee thing, cannie wee thing	400
GALLA WATER.
Braw, braw lads of Galla water	364
ON LORD GALLOWAY.
Bright ran thy line, O Galloway	336
WINTER OF LIFE.
But lately seen in gladsome green	437
ON JESSY'S RECOVERY.
But rarely seen since Nature's birth	338
BY ALLAN STREAM.
By Allan stream I chane'd to rove	467
THERE'LL NEVER BE PEACE.
By yon castle wa', at the close of the day	397
C
CA' THE YOWES TO THE KNOWES.
Ca' the yowes to the knowes	386 and 485
CHLORIS ILL.
Can I cease to care?	503
MY KATIE.
Canst thou leave me thus, my Katie?	496
BONNIE PEG-A-RAMSAY.
Cauld is the e'ening blast	439
ON MISS BURNS.
Cease, ye prudes, your envious railing	331
TO CLARINDA.
Clarinda, mistress of my soul	270
ON HARRY ERSKINE.
Collected Harry stood a wee	77
CHARLIE.
Come boat me o'er, come row me o'er	373
COME LET ME TAKE THEE.
Come, let me take thee to my breast	469
COME REDE ME, DAME.
Come rede me, dame, come tell me, dame	395
COMING THRO' THE RYE.
Coming thro' the rye, poor body	419

	PAGE
CONTENTED WI' LITTLE.
Contented wi' little, and eartie wi' mair	496
TO MART.
Could aught of song declare my pains	437
ON FERGUSSON.
Curse on ungrateful man, that can be pleas'd	271
THE HEN-PECK'D HUSBAND.
Curst be the man, the poorest wretch in life	331
D
TO THE STAR.
Dear Peter, dear Peter	338
TO JAMES SMITH.
Dear Smith, the sleest, paukie thief	203
DELUDED SWAIN.
Deluded swain, the pleasure	479
DEAN OF FACULTY.
Dire was the hate at old Harlaw	269
DUMFRIES VOLUNTEERS.
Does haughty Gaul invasion threat?	436
THE BRAES O' CUPAR.
Donald Brodie met a lass	413
DUNCAN GRAY.
Duncan Gray cam here to woo	449
ODE TO MRS. OSWALD.
Dweller in yon dungeon dark	283
E
ON A SUICIDE.
Earth'd up here lies an imp of hell	337
ADDRESS TO EDINBURGH.
Edina! Scotia's darling seat!	261
DEDICATION TO GAVIN HAMILTON.
Expect na, Sir, in this narration	216
F
TO CLARINDA.
Fair empress of the Poet's soul	270
DEVON BANKS.
Fairest maid on Devon banks	513
TO A HAGGIS.
Fair fa' your honest, sonsie face	176
TO MISS AINSLIE.
Fair maid ye need not take the hint	53
DELIA, AN ODE.
Fair the face of Orient day	287
SUCH A PARCEL OF ROGUES.
Fareweel to a' our Scottish fame	411
TO MR. KENNEDY.
Farewell, dear friend, may good luck hit you	327
FAREWELL OLD SCOTIA.
Farewell old Scotia's bleak domains	245
SONG OF WAR.
Farewell thou fair day, thou green earth, and ye skies	414
ELIZA.
Farewell thou stream that winding flows	493
MACPHERSON'S FAREWELL.
Farewell, ye dungeons dark and strong	361
A MOTHER'S LAMENT.
Fate gave the word, the arrow sped	280
THE TOAST—(JESSY LEWARS).
Fill me with the rosy wine	337
TO GRAHAM OF FINTRAY.
Fintray, my stay in wordly strife	297
WHISTLE O'ER THE LAVE O'T.
First when Maggy was my care	342

	PAGE		PAGE
AFTON WATER.		JUMPIN' JOHN.
Flow gently, sweet Afton! among thy green braes	415	Her daddie forbad, her minnie forbad	365
ELEGY ON 1788.		JOHNNY PEEP.
For lords or kings I dinna mourn	282	Here am I, Johnny Peep	331
FORLORN MY LOVE.		HAPPY FRIENDSHIP.
Forlorn my love, no comfort near	508	Here around the ingle bleezing	392
CARRON SIDE.		WANDERING WILLIE.
Frae the friends and land I love	394	Here awa', there awa', Wandering Willie	454
AN INVITATION.		ON GABRIEL RICHARDSON.
Friday first's the day appointed	335	Here brewer Gabriel's fire's extinct	336
TO MR. MITCHELL.		ON MR. BURTON.
Friend of the Poet, tried, and leal	324	Here cursing, swearing Burton lies	333
ELIZA.		BANKS OF CREE.
From thee, Eliza, I must go	353	Here is the glen, and here's the bower	483
ESOPUS TO MARIA.		AN HONEST FRIEND.
From those drear solitudes and frowsy cells	315	Here's a bottle and an honest friend!	338
HERON BALLADS.—(II.)		ANE I LO'E DEAR.
Fy, let's a' to Kircudbright	322	Here's a health to ane I lo'e dear	512
		A HEALTH TO THEM THAT'S AWA'.
		Here's a health to them that's awa'	435
G		LAGGAN BURN.
GUIDWIFE COUNT THE LAWIN'.		Here's to thy health, my bonny lass	431
Gane is the day, and mirk's the night	396	HOLY WILLIE.
LASS O' ECCLEFECHAN.		Here Holy Willie's sair worn clay	193
Gat ye me, O gat ye me	421	ON THE MARQUIS.
TAM SAMSON (PER CONTRA).		Here lies a mock Marquis whose titles were shamm'd ..	335
Go, fame, an' canter like a filly	230	ON THE POET'S DAUGHTER.
BONNIE MARY.		Here lies a rose, a budding rose	336
Go fetch to me a pint o' wine	379	ON JOHN BUSHBY.
ON LIBERTY.		Here lies John Bushby, honest man	337
Grant me, indulgent Heaven, that I may live	334	JOHN DOVE.
GREEN GROW THE RASHES.		Here lies Johnny Pidgeon	328
Green grow the rashes, O!	349	MARIA RIDDEL.
ADAM A——'S PRAYER.		Here lies now a prey to insulting neglect	315
Gude pity me, because I'm little	195	GRIZEL GRIM.
WE'RE A' NODDIN.		Here lies wi' death auld Grizel Grim	333
Guid e'en to you, kimmer	346	ON A SCHOOLMASTER.
A DREAM.		Here lie Willie Michie's banes	331
Guid morning to your majesty!	254	ON A RULING ELDER.
TO J. LAPRAIK—(III.)		Here Souter Hood in death does sleep	328
Guid speed an' furdur to you, Johnny	221	ON STIRLING PALACE.
		Here Stuarts once in glory reigned	330
H		TO MISS GRAHAM.
HAD I A CAVE.		Here, where the Scottish muse immortal lives	318
Had I a cave on some wild distant shore	467	HER FLOWING LOCKS.
HAD I THE WYTE.		Her flowing locks the raven's wing	350
Had I the wyte, had I the wyte	419	LINES TO JOHN RANKINE.
ON PASTORAL POETRY.		He who of Rankine sang lies stiff and dead	337
Hail, Poesie! thou nymph reserv'd	316	THE DUSTY MILLER.
TO MAJOR LOGAN.		Hcy the dusty Miller	367
Hail! thairm-inspiring, rattlin' Willie!	268	ROBERT BRUCE.
TAM SAMSON'S ELEGY.		His royal visage seam'd with many a scar	318
Has auld Kirmarnock seen the deil?	230	ON W. CRUIKSHANKS.
TO A LOUSE.		Honest Will's to Heaven gane	332
Ha! whare ye gaun, ye crowlin' ferlie!	241	ON THE SEAS AND FAR AWA'.
MAXWELL OF TERRAUGHTY.		How can my poor heart be glad	464
Health to the Maxwell's vet'ran chief!	313	MONODY ON MARIA RIDDEL.
TREE OF LIBERTY.		How cold is that bosom which folly once fir'd	314
Heard ye o' the tree of France	292	HOW CRUEL THE PARENTS.
ON CAPTAIN GROSE.		How cruel are the parents	504
Hear! Land o' Cakes an' brither Scots	299	LANG AND DREARY.
ON A CELEBRATED LAWYER.		How lang and dreary is the night	371 and 469
He clench'd his pamphlets in his fist	77	DEVON BANKS.
HEE BALOU.		How pleasant the banks of the clear winding Devon ..	363
Hee balou! my sweet wee Donald	427	ON OLD Q——.
		How shall I sing Drumlanrie's Grace	291

	PAGE
FRAGMENT TO FOX.
How wisdom and folly meet, mix, and unite	283
MY SPOUSE NANCY.
Husband, husband, cease your strife	481
A KISS.
Humid seal of soft affections	326

I

SECOND EPISTLE TO DAVIE.
I'in three times doubly o'er your debtor	171
FOR A' THAT, AND A' THAT.
I am a bard of no regard	183
TO JOHN RANKINE.
I am a keeper of the law	243
SOLDIER'S JOY.
I am a son of Mars, who have been in many wars	180
I'M O'ER YOUNG TO MARRY YET.
I am my Mammie's ae bairn	360
THE WEARY PUND O' TOW.
I bought my wife a stane o' lint	402
TO CLARINDA.
I burn, I burn, as when thro' ripen'd corn	271
GRAHAM OF FINTRAY—(IV.)
I call no goddess to inspire my strains	312
THE CARDIN O'T.
I coft a stane o' haslock woo'	422
THOU ART SAE FAIR.
I do confess thou art sae fair	398
WHERE FLOWERS WERE SPRINGING.
I dream'd I lay where flow'rs were springing	340
ON A SCOLD.
If you rattle along like your mistress's tongue	334
THE BLUE-EYED LASS.
I gaed a waefu' gate yestreen	393
EPISTLE TO WM. SIMPSON.
I gat your letter, winsome Willie	219
A WIFE O' MY AIN.
I hae a wife o' my ain	403
TO GAVIN HAMILTON.
I hold it, sir, my bounden duty	251
TO A FRIEND.
I lang hae thought, my youthfu' friend	240
BONNY JEAN.
I'll aye ca' in by yon town	424
BONNIE PEGGY ALISON.
I'll kiss thee yet, yet	349
JOYFUL WIDOWER.
I married with a scolding wife	359
THE BRAES O' CUPAR.
I met a lass, a bonny lass	413
TO MRS. SCOTT OF WAUCHOPE.
I mind it weel, in early date	272
ON A WINDOW AT DUMFRIES.
I murder hate, by field or flood	335
THENIEL MENZIE'S BONNY MARY.
In coming by the brig o' Dye	368
THE WOUNDED HARE.
Inhuman man ! curse on thy barb'rous art	284
BELLES OF MAUCLINE.
In Mauchline there dwells six proper young belles	351
INNOCENCE.
Innocence looks gaily smiling on	336
CRED OF POVERTY.
In politics if thou wouldst mix	334
ON ANDREW TURNER.
In se'enteen hunder and forty-nine	331

	PAGE
COUNTRIE LASSIE.
In simmer when the hay was mawr	407
TO HUGH PARKER.
In this strange land, this uncouth clime	282
A TOAST.
Instead of a song, boys, I'll give you a toast	334
PRUDENCE.
In vaia would prudence, with her decent sneer	71
ON A LAP-DOG.
In wood and wild ye warbling throng	336
SOLDIER LADDIE.
I once was a maid, tho' I cannot tell when	181
THE WHISTLE.
I sing of a whistle, a whistle of worth	307
A BARD'S EPITAPH.
Is there a whim-inspired fool	256
MY KATY.
Is this thy plighted, fond regard?	496
FOR A' THAT AND A' THAT.
Is there for honest poverty	499
BONNY JEAN.
It is na, Jean, thy bonnie face	399
THE FAREWELL.
It was a' for our rightfu' king	431
CHARMING CHLOE.
It was the charming month of May	492
THE RIGS O' BARLEY.
It was upon a Lammas night	343

J

JAMIE.
Jamie, come try me	379
JENNY M'CRAW.
Jenny M'Craw, she has ta'en to the heather	431
THE PARTING KISS.
Jockey's ta'en the parting kiss	413
JOHN ANDERSON, MY JO.
John Anderson, my jo, John	385

K

ON MRS. KEMBLE.
Kemble, thou cur'st my unbelief	333
CAPTAIN GROSE.
Ken ye ought o' Captain Grose?	300
THE ORDINATION.
Kilmarnock wabsters fidge and claw	200
TO ONE WHO HAD SENT A NEWSPAPER.
Kind sir, I've read your paper through	290
ON ROBERT AIKEN.
Know thou, O stranger to the fame	327

L

ON A MAUCLINE WAG.
Lament him, Mauchline husbands a'	328
POOR MAILLIE'S ELEGY.
Lament in rhyme, lament in prose	167
HEY, TUTTI TAITI.
Landlady, count the lawin'	370
THE DISCREET HINT.
Lass, when your mither is frae hame	292
THE LINT WHITE LOCKS.
Lassie wi' the lint white locks	492
A BRAW WOOLER.
Last May a braw woooler cam down the lang glen	508

	PAGE		PAGE
POSTSCRIPT TO AUTHOR'S CRY AND PRAYER.		MY LADY'S GOWN.
Let half-starved slaves in warmer skies.....	223	My lady's gown there's gairs upon't.....	426
TO ROBERT GRAHAM, ESQ.—(III.)		BRUAR WATER.
Late crippled of an arm and now a leg.....	311	My lord, I know your noble ear.....	275
WHISTLE O'ER THE LAVE O'T.		MY LOVE.
Let me ryke up to dight that liar.....	182	My love she's but a lassie yet.....	379
LAURA.		THE COTTER'S SATURDAY NIGHT.
Let me wander where I will.....	481	My lov'd, my honour'd, much respected friend.....	233
NATURE'S LAW.		POSTSCRIPT TO W. SIMPSON.
Let other heroes boast their scars.....	252	My memory's no worth a preen.....	220
SCOTCH DRINK.		MY PEGGY'S FACE.
Let other poets raise a fracas.....	224	My Peggy's face, my Peggy's form.....	428
WOMAN.
Let not woman e'er complain.....	489	N
ON MISS BURNET.		THE HIGHLAND LASSIE.
Life ne'er exulted in so rich a prize.....	308	Nae gentle dames, though e'er sae fair.....	344
ON A COXCOME.		CURE FOR ALL CARE.
Light lay the earth on Billy's breast.....	329	No churchman am I for to rail and to write.....	352
REPLY TO HAMILTON OF GLADSMUIR.		TO JOHN SYME, ESQ.
Like Æsop's lion, Burns says, sore I feel.....	60	No more of your guests, be they titled or not.....	333
ON DUNDAS OF ARNISTON.		ON ROBERT RIDDEL, ESQ.
Lone on the bleak hills the straying flocks.....	267	No more, ye warblers of the wood—no more.....	317
BEELZEBUB.		'ON FERGUSSON.
Long life, my lord, and health be yours.....	305	No sculptur'd marble here, nor pompous lay.....	613
CHLORIS ILL.		PROLOGUE—DUMFRIES.
Long, long the night.....	503	No song nor dance I bring from yon great city.....	287
GRACE.		CASSILIS' BANKS.
Lord, we thank, an' thee adore.....	338	Now bank an' brae are claid'd in green.....	426
JEANNIE'S BOSOM.		O VAT YE WHA'S IN YON TOWN.
Louis, what reck I by thee.....	419	Now haply down yon gay green shaw.....	424
HIGHLAND ROVER.		MY NANNIE'S AWA.'
Loud blaw the frosty breezes.....	366	Now in her green mantle blythe nature arrays.....	499
M		ON A FAVORITE CHILD.
YONDER POMP.		Now health forsakes that angel face.....	316
Mark yonder pomp of costly fashion.....	504	TO MR. KENNEDY.
DR. MAXWELL.		Now, Kennedy, if foot or horse.....	325
Maxwell, if merit here you crave.....	486	LAMENT OF MARY.
ROARING OCEAN.		Now Nature hangs her mantle green.....	306
Musing on the roaring ocean.....	372	LASSIE WI' THE LINT WHITE LOCKS.
THE ROSLIN LANDLADY.		Now nature cleeds the flowery lea.....	492
My blessings on you, sonsy wife.....	332	ELEGY ON ROBERT RUISSEAUX.
A MOTHER TO HER INFANT.		Now Robin lies in his last lair.....	247
My blessin's upon thy sweet wee lippie.....	334	DAINTY DAVIE.
CLOUT THE CAUDRON.		Now rosy May comes in wi' flowers.....	409
My bonny lass, I work in brass.....	182	SPRING.
CHLORIS.		Now Spring has clad the grove in green.....	506
My Chloris, mark how green the groves.....	491	PEGGY.
THE TOOTH-ACHE.		Now westlan' winds and slaught'ring guns.....	345
My curse upon thy venom'd stang.....	283	LORD GALLOWAY.
PLEASURE.		No Stewart art thou, Galloway.....	336
My bottle is my holy-pool.....	335	O
MY FATHER WAS A FARMER.		THE TWA HERDS.
My father was a farmer upon the Carrick border, O....	341	O! a' ye pious godly folks.....	190
MY HARRY.		MY WIFE SHE DANG ME.
My Harry was a gallant gay.....	375	O aye my wife, she dang me.....	432
TO THE WEAVER'S GIN YE GO.		YON ROSY BRIER.
My heart was ance as blythe as free.....	346	O bonny was yon rosy brier.....	50
COLONEL DE FEYSTER.		BATTLE OF SHERRA-MUIR.
My honoured Colonel, deep I feel.....	325	O cam ye here the fight to shun.....	390
TAM GLEN.		LABOUR LEA.
My heart is a breaking, dear Tittie!.....	394	O can ye labour lea, young man.....	382
FOR THE SAKE OF SOMEBODY.		SONG BY GAVIN TURNBULL.
My heart is sair—I dare na tell.....	422	O condescend, dear charming maid.....	480
MY HEART'S IN THE HIGHLANDS.		TO J. M'CURDO, ESQ.
My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here....	384	O! could I give thee India's wealth.....	287

	PAGE
ON A HEN-PECK'D SQUIRE.
O death! had'st thou but spar'd his life	329
ON MATTHEW HENDERSON.
O death! thou tyrant fell and bloody	293
LAMENT FOR MARY.
O'er the mist-shrouded cliffs of the lone mountain straying	388
REMORSE.
Of all the num'rous ills that hurt our peace	256
OF A' THE AIRTS.
Of a' the airts the wind can blaw	381
THE TOAD EATER.
Of lordly acquaintance you boast	134
LASS OF ECCLEFECHAN.
O gat ye me, O gat ye me	421
BROSE AND BUTTER.
O gie my love brose, brose	387
GUID ALE.
O guid ale comes, and guid ale goes	381
O GIN MY LOVE.
O gin my love were yon red rose	462
TO JOHN GOUDIE.
O Goudie! terror of the Whigs	215
TO JOHN SYME.
O, had the malt thy strength of mind	333
ON MISS SCOTT.
Oh! had each Scot of ancient times	329
THE BONNIE LAD THAT'S FAR AWA'.
O, how can I be blythe and glad	397
LOVELY DAVIES.
O how shall I unskilfu' try	402
THE HIGHLAND WIDOW.
Oh! I am come to the low countrie	438
LORD GREGORY.—SECOND VERSION.
Oh! open the door, some pity to show	454
ON A FAVOURITE CHILD.
Oh, sweet be thy sleep, in the land of the grave	320
KENMURE.
O Kenmure's on and awa', Willie!	403
MEG O' THE MILL.
O ken ye what Meg o' the Mill has gotten	436 and 457
LET ME IN THIS AE NIGHT.
O lassie, art thou sleeping yet	501
LADY MARY ANN.
O Lady Mary Ann looks o'er the castle wa'	410
LAY THY LOOF IN MINE.
O lay thy loof in mine, lassie	434
ON MRS. R——'S BIRTH-DAY.
Old Winter with his frosty beard	317
MAUCHLINE BELLES.
O leave novels, ye Mauchline belles	351
BESS AND HER SPINNING-WHEEL.
O leeze me on my spinning-wheel	406
MY WEE THING.
O leeze me, on my wee thing	448
LOGAN BRAES.
O Logan, sweetly didst thou glide	461
POLLY STEWART.
O lovely Polly Stewart!	425
THE POSIE.
O luvie will venture in	406
MALLY.
O Mally's meek, Mally's sweet	439
MARY MORISON.
O Mary, at thy window be	453
MIRK NIGHT O' DECEMBER.
O May, thy morn was ne'er sae sweet	425

	PAGE
THE RUINED MAID.
O meikle do I rue, fause love	290
MY TOCHER'S THE JEWEL.
O meikle thinks my luvie o' my beauty	396
O MERRY HAE I BEEN.
O merry hae I been teething a heckle	387
LORD GREGORY.
O mirk, mirk is this midnight hour	453
THE CAPTAIN'S LADY.
O mount and go	381
A RED, RED ROSE.
O my luvie's like a red, red rose	418
BLOOMING NELLY.
On a bank of flowers, in a summer day	378
TO AN OLD SWEETHEART.
Once fondly lov'd, and now remember'd dear	267
CESSNOCK BANKS.
On Cessnock banks there lives a lass	355
a lassie dwells	356
A FRAGMENT.
One night as I did wander	348
ON A HEN-PECK'D SQUIRE.
One Queen Artemisia, as old stories tell	329
MY HANDSOME NELL.
O, once I lov'd a bonny lass	339
O PHILLY.
O Philly, happy be that day	495
POORTITH CAULD.
O poortith cauld and restless love	450
DEPENDENCY.
Oppress'd with grief, oppress'd with care	232
LUCKLESS FORTUNE.
O raging fortune's withering blast	340
ROARING WILLIE.
O rattlin', roarin' Willie	374
TO J. RANKINE.
O rough, rude, ready-witted Rankine	242
KIRK'S ALARM.
Orthodox, orthodox	187
SAE FAR AWA'.
O sad and heavy should I part	423
BONNY LESLEY.
O saw ye bonny Lesley	446
MY PHELY.
O saw ye my dear, my Phely?	488
EPPIE M'NAB.
O saw ye my dearie, my Eppie M'Nab?	399
THE WOOD-LARK.
O stay, sweet warbling wood-lark, stay	502
O STEER HER UP.
O steer her up and haud her gaun	432
O TELL NA ME.
O tell na me o' wind and rain	501
CROWDIE.
O that I had ne'er been married	345
THIS IS NO MY AIN LASSIE.
O this is no my ain lassie	506
A PRAYER.
O Thou dread Power, who reign'st above	251
A PRAYER.
O Thou great Being! what Thou art	238
A GRACE.
O Thou in whom we live and move	338
A LAMENT.
O thou pale orb that silent shines	231
PSALM XC.
O Thou, the first, the greatest Friend	237

	PAGE		PAGE
A PRAYER.		TO WM. TYTLER, ESQ.
O Thou unknown, Almighty cause.....	233	Revered Defender of beauteous Stuart.....	278
HOLY WILLIE'S PRAYER.		THE CALF.
O Thou! wha in the Heavens dost dwell.....	192	Right, sir, your text I'll prove it true.....	202
ADDRESS TO THE DIEL.		ROBIN.
O thou, whatever title suit thee.....	172	Robin shure in hairst.....	348
GRACE.		S
O Thou, who kindly dost provide.....	332	TO THE OWL.
ON MARTIAL'S EPIGRAMS.		Sad bird of night, what sorrow calls thee forth.....	260
O thou, whom poesy abhors!.....	331	ON JOHN M ^c LEOD, ESQ.
O, TIBBIE.		Sad thy tale, thou idle page.....	267
O Tibbie, I hae seen the day.....	341	SHE LO'ES ME BEST O' A'.
OUT OVER THE FORTH.		Sac flaxen were her ringlets.....	485
Out over the Forth I look to the north.....	420	ON JESSY LEWARS.
AWA, WHIGS, AWA!		Say, sages, what's the charm on earth.....	397
Our thrissles flourish'd fresh and fair.....	386	THE WALLACE ODE.
WAT YE WHA'S IN YON TOWN.		Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled.....	471—476
O wat ye wha's in yon town.....	424	ON THE EXCISE.
MORAG.		Searching auld wive's barrels.....	332
O wat ye wha that lo'es me.....	433	JOLLY MORTALS, FILL YOUR GLASSES.
MY MINNIE DID.		See! the smoking bowl before us.....	183
O wat ye what my minnie did.....	430	ON SENSIBILITY.
PARNASSUS' HILL.		Sensibility, how charming.....	319
O, were I on Parnassus' hill!.....	383	MY WIFE'S A WINSOME WEE THING.
O, WERE MY LOVE.		She is a winsome wee thing.....	445
O, were my love yon lilac fair.....	383	SHE'S FAIR AND FAUSE.
WERT THOU IN THE CAULD BLAST.		She's fair and fause that causes my smart.....	417
O wert thou in the cauld blast.....	433	AULD LANG SYNE.
WHA IS SHE THAT LO'ES ME.		Should auld acquaintance be forgot.....	474
O wha is she that lo'es me.....	433	ON WILLIAM SMELLIE.
RANTIN' DOG THE DADDIE O'T.		Shrewd Willie Smellie to Crochallan came.....	329
O wha my babie clouts will buy?.....	345	ON WAT.
ST. STEPHEN'S.		Sic a reptile was Wat.....	332
O wha will to St. Stephen's House.....	435	SIMMER.
BONNIE DUNDEE.		Simmer's a pleasant time.....	377
O whare did ye get that hauer meal bannock?.....	359	THE THRUSH.
MY COLLIER LADDIE.		Sing on, sweet thrush, upon the leafless bough.....	316
O whare live ye, my bonnie lass?.....	404	THE INVENTORY.
WHISTLE AN' I'LL COME TO YE, MY LAD.		Sir, as your mandate did request.....	194
O whistle an' I'll come to ye, my lad.....	360 and 468	TO MR. M ^c ADAM.
TIBBIE DUNBAR.		Sir, o'er a gill I gat your card.....	252
O wilt thou go wi' me, sweet Tibbie Dunbar.....	375	AULD SIR SIMON.
WILLIE BREW'D A PECK O' MAUT.		Sir Wisdom's a fool when he's fou'.....	181
O Willie brew'd a peck o' maut.....	391	THE LOVER TO HIS MISTRESS.
WHY SHOULD I REPINE.		Sleep'st thou, or wak'st thou, fairest creature.....	490
O why the deuce should I repine.....	348	EVAN BANKS
THE UNCO GUID.		Slow spreads the gloom my soul desires.....	389
O ye wha are sae guid yoursel'.....	228	DEATH AND DR. HORNBOOK.
ON THE AUTHOR'S FATHER.		Some books are lies frae end to end.....	185
O ye whose cheek the tear of pity stains.....	326	SELKIRK GRACE.
P		Some hae meat and canna eat.....	336
ON PEG NICHOLSON.		TO LORD GALLOWAY.
Peg Nicholson was a good bay mare.....	293	Spare me thy vengeance, Galloway.....	330
MARY!		STAY, MY CHARMER.
Powers celestial! whose protection.....	356	Stay, my charmer, can you leave me?.....	364
R		STAY, MY WILLIE.
THE REPROOF.		Stay, my Willie—yet believe me.....	498
Rash mortal, and slanderous poet, thy name.....	330	ADDRESS—(MISS FONTENELLE).
RAVING WINDS.		Still anxious to secure your partial favor.....	320
Raving winds around her blowing.....	371	ON CAPTAIN HENDERSON.
ON W——.		Stop, passenger! my story's brief.....	294
Rest gently, turf, upon his breast.....	772	ON W——.
		Stop, thief! dame Nature cried to Death.....	333
		BONNY CASTLE GORDON.
		Streams that glide in orient plains.....	375

	PAGE
CRAIGIE-BURN-WOOD.
Sweet closes the evening on Craigie-burn-wood	995
ANOTHER VERSION.
Sweet fa's the eve on Craigieburn	500
SWEETEST MAY.
Sweetest May, let love inspire thee	348
ON A POSTHUMOUS CHILD.
Sweet flow'ret, pledge o' meikle love.....	249
MISS FONTENELLE.
Sweet naiveté of feature	321

T

JESSY LEWARS.
Talk not to me of savages.....	337
TAM SAMSON.
Tam Samson's weel-worn clay here lies	230
THE PARSON'S LOOKS.
That there is falsehood in his looks	334
THE DEUKS DANG O'ER MY DADDIE.
The bairns got out wi' an unco shout	416
THE EAGLE.
The black-headed eagle.....	338
THE BLUDE RED ROSE.
The blude red rose at Yule may blaw.....	373
THE HIGHLAND LADDIE.
The bonniest lad that e'er I saw.....	426
THE BRAES O' BALLOCHMYLE.
The Catrine woods were yellow seen	387
CATS LIKE KITCHEN.
The cats like kitchen.....	347
THE COOPER O' CUDDIE
The cooper o' Cuddie cam here awa'.....	421
THE BLISSFUL DAY.
The day returns, my bosom burns	378
THE EXCISEMAN
The De'il cam fiddling thro' the town	416
ON CAPTAIN GROSE.
The Devil got notice that Grose was a dying	332
LIBERTY.
Thee, Caledonia, thy wild heaths among	317
TO A GENTLEMAN OFFENDED.
The friend whom wild from wisdom's way	320
THE BANKS OF AYR.
The gloomy night is gath'ring fast.....	358
OLD WISDOM.
The grey-beard, old Wisdom, may boast of his treasures	335
HUNTING SONG.
The heather was blooming, the meadows were mawn ..	351
THE LEA-RIG.
The hunter lo'es the morning sun	444
CALEDONIA.
Their groves o' sweet myrtle let foreign lands reckon ..	503
THE INVITATION.
The king's most humble servant, I	334
ELECTION BALLAD.
The laddies by the banks of Nith	297
ON SIR JAMES HUNTER BLAIR.
The lamp of day with ill-presaging glare.....	281
THE LAST BRAW BRIDAL.
The last braw bridal that I was at	431
THE LAZY MIST.
The lazy mist hangs from the brow of the hill	380
THE LASS OF INVERNESS.
The lovely lass of Inverness	417

	PAGE
FIRST PSALM.
The man in life wherever plac'd.....	236
NITHSDALE'S WELCOME HIAME.
The noble Maxwells and the powers	405
THE PLOUGHMAN.
The ploughman he's a bonny lad	369
ON GAVIN HAMILTON.
The poor man weeps—here Gavin sleeps.....	327
THE PIPER.
There came a piper out o' Fife	431
AULD ROB MORRIS.
There's auld Rob Morris that wons in yon glen.....	449
NEIL GOW'S LAMENT.
There's a youth in this city, it were a great pity	384
GALLA WATER.
There's braw braw lads on Yarrow braes	451
ON A GOBLET.
There's death in the cup, sac beware!	333
NEWS, LASSES, NEWS.
There's news, lasses, news	360
THE CARLE OF KELLY-BURN.
There liv'd a carle on Kelly-burn braes	412
KATHERINE JAFFRAY.
There liv'd a lass in yonder dale	354
DUNCAN DAVISON.
There was a lass, they ca'd her Meg.....	367
A BONNY LASS.
There was a bonnie lass, and a bonnie bonnie lass.....	439
ROBIN.
There was a lad was born in Kyle	350
BONNIE JEAN.
There was a lass and she was fair	463
SCROGGAM.
There was a wife womn'd in Cockpen	359
CALEDONIA.
There was once a day, but old Time then was young ..	434
FIVE CARLINS.
There were five carlins in the south	295
JOHN BARLEYCORN.
There were three kings into the east	342
BRIGS OF AYR.
The simple bard, rough at the rustic plough	264
THE CHEVALIER'S LAMENT.
The small birds rejoice in the green leaves returning ..	414
BONNY BELL.
The smiling Spring comes in rejoicing	415
THE LEAGUE AND COVENANT.
The solemn League and Covenant	134
THE VISION.
The sun had clos'd the winter day.....	205
THE TAILOR.
The tailor fell thro' the bed, mormling an' a'	376
THE TEARS I SHED.
The tears I shed must ever fall	579
THE BANKS OF NITH.
The Thames flows proudly to the sea.....	393
TITHER MORN.
The tither morn, when I forlorn	401
THE WEARY PUND O' TOW.
The weary pund, the weary pund	402
LAMENT FOR GLENCAIRN.
The wind blew hollow frae the hills	309
THE WINTER IT IS PAST.
The winter it is past, and the simmer's come at last....	419
WINTER.
The wintry west extends his blast	166

	PAGE
STRATHALLAN'S LAMENT.
Thickest night, o'erhang my dwelling!.....	364
LOVELY NANCY.
Thine am I, my faithful fair	480
TO JESSY LEVARS.
Thine be the volumes, Jessy fair.....	325
NEW YEAR'S DAY.
This day, Time winds the exhausted chain	289
ON LORD DAER.
This wot ye all whom it concerns	262
MY JEAN.
Tho' cruel fate should bid us part	350
TO MY BED.
Thou bed, in which I first began	293
TO MRS. C.
Thou flattering mark of friendship bind	325
FICKLE FORTUNE.
Though fickle fortune has deceived me	318
FOR A' THAT.
Though women's minds, like winter winds	371
JAMIE.
Thou hast left me ever, Jamie!	474
TO MARY IN HEAVEN.
Thou ling'ring star with less'ning ray	388
INDEPENDENCE.
Thou of an independent mind	321
THE NIGHTINGALE.
Thou sweetest minstrel of the grove	480
TO AN ILLEGITIMATE CHILD.
Thou's welcome, wean! mischanter fa' me	243
FRIAR'S CARSE HERMITAGE.
Thou whom chance may hither lead	278-9
SIR JOHN WHITEFOORD.
Thou, who thy honour as thy God rever'st	310
BOOK-WORMS.
Through and through the inspired leaves	134
TO CHLORIS.
'Tis friendship's pledge, my young, fair friend	321
TO RIDDEL.
To Riddel, much lamented man	334
LOV'D NITH.
To thee, lov'd Nith, thy gladsome plains.....	427
YOUNG JESSIE.
True-hearted was he, the sad swain o' the Yarrow	455
FAIR ELIZA.
Turn again, thou fair Eliza	408
THE LASS O' BALLOCHMYLE.
'Twas even—the dewy fields were green	357
THE TWA DOGS.
'Twas in that place o' Scotland's isle	257
HERON BALLADS. (IV.)
'Twas in the seventeen hundred year	324
HER BONNIE BLUE E'E.
'Twas na her bonnie blue ee was my ruin	504
THE VOWELS.
'Twas where the birch and sounding thong are ply'd ..	318
U
UP IN THE MORNING EARLY.
Up in the morning's no for me	365
THE HOLY FAIR.
Upon a simmer Sunday morn	195
HALLOWE'EN.
Upon that night, when fairies light	209
THE CARLES O' DYSART.
Up wi' the Carles o' Dysart.....	416

	PAGE
W
WAE IS MY HEART.
Wae is my heart, and the tear's in my o'e	439
WRITTEN ON A BANK NOTE.
Wae worth thy power, thou cursed leaf.....	254
ON HIS HORSE BEING IMPOUNDED.
Was e'er puir poet sae befitted	327
DUNCAN GRAY.
Weary fa' you, Duncan Gray	369
CARRON.
We cam' na here to view your warks.....	329
THE MOUNTAIN DAISY.
Wee, modest, crimson-tipped flower	239
TO A MOUSE.
Wee sleekit, cow'rin, tim'rous beastie	223
WILLIE GRAY.
Wee Willie Gray, and his leather wallet	381
MY BOWER DOOR.
Wha is that at my bower door?	399
BATTLE O' KILLIECRANKIE.
Whare hae ye been sae braw, lad?	393
TO A TAILOR.
What ails ye now, ye lousy b—h.....	253
WHAT CAN A YOUNG LASSIE DO?
What can a young lassie, what shall a young lassie	400
ON SEEING LORD GALLOWAY'S SEAT.
What dost thou in that mansion fair?	336
SCOTS PROLOGUE.
What needs this din about the toun o' Lon'on	288
FROM A TAILOR.
What waefu' news is this I hear	253
MY HOGGIE.
What will I do gin my hoggie die?	365
HERON BALLADS. (III.)
Wha will buy my troggin	323
A WINTER NIGHT.
When biting Boreas, fell and doure	177
PROLOGUE—WOODS.
When by a gen'rous public's kind acclaim	272
TAM O' SHANTER.
When chapman billies leave the street	300
MAN WAS MADE TO MOURN.
When chill November's surly blast	213
HIGHLAND WELCOME.
When death's dark stream I ferry o'er	329
SHELAH O'NEIL.
When first I began for to sigh and to woo her	367
MAUHLIN LADY.
When first I came to Stewart Kyle.....	344
COCK UP YOUR BEAVER.
When first my brave Johnnie lad	396
THE AMERICAN WAR.
When Guildford good our pilot stood	268
THE HAPPY DAYS.
When I think on the happy days	345
THE LASS THAT MADE THE BED TO ME.
When Januar' wind was blawing cauld	422
JOLLY BEGGARS.
When lyart leaves bestrew the yird	179
TO ROBERT GRAHAM, ESQ.—(I.)
When Nature her great master-piece design'd	280
MY AIN KIND DEARIE, O.
When o'er the hill the eastern star	444

	PAGE
ROSY MAY.
When rosy May comes in wi' flowers	377
THE POOR AND HONEST SODGER.
When wild war's deadly blast was blawn	456
FAIR JENNY.
Where are the joys I have met in the morning	478
WINTER'S STORMS.
When, braving angry winter's storms	374
THE GALLANT WEAVER.
Where Cart rins rowin' to the sea	416
TO THE REV. JOHN M ^C MATH.
While at the stook the shearers cow'r	222
TO J. LAPRAIK. (I.)
While briars and woodbins budding green	215
THE RIGHTS OF WOMAN.
While Europe's eye is fix'd on mighty things	314
PHILLIS THE FAIR.
While larks with little wing	466
TO J. LAPRAIK. (II.)
While new-ca'd kye rowte at the stake	218
SHADE OF THOMSON.
While virgin Spring by Eden's flood	310
EPISTLE TO DAVIDE. (I.)
While winds frae aff Ben Lomond blaw	168
ON INCIVILITY, AT INVERARY.
Whoe'er he be that sojourns here	331
ON WEE JOHNNY.
Whoe'er thou art, O reader, know	327
HERMIT OF ABERFFROY
Whoe'er thou art these lines now read	275
HERON BALLADS. (I.)
Whom will you send to London town	321
ON DEATH.
Why am I loth to leave this earthly scene	238
TO CHLORIS.
Why, why, tell thy lover	510
WATER FOWL.
Why, ye tenants of the lake	276
WILLIE CHALMERS.
Wi' braw new branks in meikle pride	250
WILLIE WASTLE.
Willie Wastle dwalt on Tweed	410
MARY CAMPBELL.
Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary	445
MY DEARIE.
Wilt thou be my dearie?	482
TO JOHN TAYLOR.
With Pegasus upon a day	306
TO DR. BLACKLOCK.
'Vow, but your letter made me vauntie!	285

Y

	PAGE
BANKS O' DOON.—SECOND VERSION.
Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon	409
HIGHLAND MARY.
Ye banks and braes and streams around	416
BANKS O' DOON.—FIRST VERSION.
Ye flowery banks o' bonny Doon	409
BONNIE ANN.
Ye gallants bright, I rede ye right	377
YE HAE LIEN A' WRANG.
Ye hae lien a' wrang, lassie	371
LINCLUDEN CASTLE.
Ye holy walls, that still sublime	291
ON A NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.
Ye hypocrites! are these your pranks?	335
AUTHOR'S CRY AND PRAYER.
Ye Irish lords, ye knights and squires	226
YE JACOBITES.
Ye Jacobites by name, give an ear	408
ON W. NICOL.
Ye maggots, feast on Willie's brain	620
ON EXCISEMEN.
Ye men of wit and wealth, why all this sneering	335
SONS OF OLD KILLIE.
Ye sons of old Killie, assembled by Willie	353
GOWDEN LOCKS OF ANNA.
Yestreen I had a pint o' wine	430
LOYAL NATIVES.
Ye true loyal natives, attend to my song	337
YOUNG JAMIE.
Young Jamie, pride of a' the plain	420
YOUNG JOCKEY.
Young Jockey was the blythest lad	391
YOUNG PEGGY.
Young Peggy blooms our bonniest lass	352
DAMON AND SYLVIA.
Yon wand'ring rill, that marks the hill	361
WILD MOSSY MOUNTAINS.
Yon wild mossy mountains, sae lofty and wide	298
WELCOME TO DUMOURIER.
You're welcome to despots, Dumourier	438
ON WILLIE STEWART.
You're welcome, Willie Stewart	134
TO CAPTAIN RIDDEL.
Your news and review, sir, I've read through and through, sir	280
ANSWER TO AN INVITATION.
Yours this moment I unseal	334

GENERAL INDEX.

A

Abbotsford, Towers of, 56
 Aberdeen, called by the Poet, a lazy town, 68
 Aberfeldy, Birks of, described in rhyme, 65—Song of, 361
 Abergeldie, Birks of, Ancient song of, 361
 A bottle and an honest friend, 338
 Absence, a song, by Dr. Blacklock, 560
 Adair, Dr., his Excursion with the Poet, 61-2
 Adam A——'s Prayer, 195
 Ae day a braw wooer cam down the lang glen, Song of, note 509
 Ae fond kiss, and then we sever, Song of, 401
 Afton Water, Banks of, 37—Song of, 415
 Ah, Chloris, Song of, 422
 Aiken, Andrew, his friendship for Burns, and the Maybole youth, 9—Epistle to, 241
 Aiken, Robert, always welcome, 21—his eloquence, 193—Dedication of the Cotter's Saturday Night to, 233—letters to, 595-7—epitaph on, 327
 Aikin's, Dr., his Collection of Songs read by Burns with delight, 42—Professor Wilson's reply to, n. 407
 Ainslie, Hugh, Verses on the anniversary of Burns, by, 159
 Ainslie, Miss, elegant compliment paid to, 53, 57
 Ainslie, Robert, his intimacy with Burns, 41—his Border Tour with the Poet, 53—description of his family,—his sober tea-drinking, and charming stroll with the bard, 69—humorous Epistle to, 621, 627—letters to, 635, 645, 651-2-3, 668, 677, 682, 711, 725—his testimony in favour of the Poet, n. 725—notice of, by James Hogg, n. 726
 Airds, Laird of, in Galloway, 532—Song in honour of his daughter, 533
 Ale, The Poet's praise of, n. 665
 Alexander, Miss, of Ballochmyle, her scene with the Poet, 38, 601—her family, 357, n.—letter to, 601
 Alison, Bonnie Peggie, Remarks on, 72—song of, 349
 Alison, Rev. Arch., Letter to, 703—his Essays on Taste, n. 703
 Allan, David, his picture of "John Anderson, my jo," 466—"The Cotter's Saturday Night," 482-3—a man of very great genius, 722—Notice of, by Allan Cunningham, n. 723
 Allan Stream, By, Song of, 467
 —Water, Song of, 534
 Allardyce, Miss Jane, of Pittenween, heroine of the song, "What can a young lassie do wi' an auld man," n. 400
 Alloway Mill, Burns's first school, 3
 —Kirk, description of, n. 301
 —Three Witch stories relating to, 715-16

Alwrick Castle, Burns at, 57
 Among the trees, where humming bees, Song of, 429
 A man's a man for a' that, n. 500
 American War, Disapproval of the, by Burns, 50
 American War, a Fragment, 268
 Anderson, Dr. James, Editor of "The Bee," Letter to, 697
 Anderson, Miss, the heroine of "The Lass of Patie's Mill," 528
 Anna, thy charms my bosom fire, 426
 —of the golden locks, 430
 Annan-dale, Bess of, 295
 —River, a beautiful stream, 468
 Annie, one of the Poet's heroines, 12
 —Where will bonnie, lie? n. 502
 —Ramsay's version, 577
 Argyle, Duke of, his song of "Ban-nocks o' Barley," n. 427—Anecdotes of, at Sheriff-muir, 580
 Armour, Jean, her first acquaintance with Burns, 24-5—the Poet's attachment to her, 31—courtship with her, 33—her application to the "gallant weaver," ib.—her affecting scene with Burns, 35—her family court his society, 59—her intimacy with Burns renewed, 60—her re-marriage, 78-9, and n. 645—"The Mauchline lady" of the song, 344—song in allusion to her father's treatment, 397—song in honour of, 424
 Armour, James, Mauchline, his anger towards his daughter, 33—letter to, 747
 As I cam down by yon castle wa', 578—As I was a wand ring ae midsummer e'enin', 405
 Athol, Duke and Duchess of, Visit to, at Blair, 65—their attention to the Poet, 66, 629
 Auld and new light factions, 220
 —chuckie Reekie, 273
 —Daddie, Burns's Parish Pastor, 666, n.
 —Guid-man, Wit and humour of the, 496
 —lang syne, recommended as a lyric of other days, 86,—ancient version, 474, 475—English version of, 574
 —Mare Maggie, The auld Farmer's address to, 175
 —Rev. Mr., his dissolution of Burns's marriage, n. 666
 —Robin Gray, Song of, 569
 Austin, Dr., his song, "For lack of gold," 555
 Autumn, the Poet's propitious season for verse, 107
 Awa', Whigs, awa'! Song of, 386
 Aye waukin' O, Song of, 377
 Ayr, the native county of Burns, 1
 —Brigs of, a poem, 264
 —Charter of, n. 206
 —The auld and new Brigs of, n. 264
 Aytoun, Sir Robert, Song by, 398

B

Bachelor's Club, Rules and regulations of, 145—of Mauchline, 192
 Bacon, the landlord at Brownhill, 287—epigram on, 328
 Baillie, Miss Lesley, her visit to the Poet, 103—song in honour of, 446—the Poet almost in love with her, 717
 Baillie, Miss, "Lady Grizell," her pathetic ballad of, 114—fragment of a song, 551
 Baillie, The Misses, elegant compliment to, 654
 Baird, Rev. G., Letter to and from, 704 and n.—solicits help in aiding the family of Michael Bruce, ib.
 Ballads, the ancient, noble sublimity of, 15
 Ballantyne, John, "The Brigs of Ayr" inscribed to him, 264—notice of, 603, n.—letters to, 596, 603-5-6, 610
 Ballochmyle, Lass of, Song of, 357—notice of, n.
 —Braes of, 357—Song of, 387
 Ballochmyle, Kirkoswald, Residence at, 7
 Bank-note, Lines written on a, 254
 Banks of Ayr, The bonnie, Song of, 358—circumstances under which it was composed, 43, 358
 Banks of Cree, Song of, 483
 —of the Devon, Song of, 368
 —of Doon, Songs of, 409
 —of Forth, Song of, 541
 —of Nith, Song of, 393
 Bank-Vennel, Dumfries, the residence of the Poet, 118
 Bannockburn, Burns at, 64, 628
 —Heroic address of Bruce at, 471-6
 Bannocks of Barley, Song of, 427—ancient version of, n. ib.
 Barksinning, seat of Lord Glenlee, n. 206
 —Mill, scene at, 214
 Beattie, Dr., Saying of, 443—his Essay on Music, 451-2—his additional verse to Meikle's song, 535
 Bed, my Verses to, 293
 Beds of sweet roses, Song of, 520
 Belzebub, Address of, 305
 Beggar's Saturday Night, 27
 Behold the hour, the boat arrive, 472
 Benson, Miss, Letter to, 723
 Bess and her spinning-wheel, Song of, 406
 —Sonsie, smirking, dear-bought, 18
 —the Gawkie, Song of, 519
 Beugo, the engraver, Letter to, 658
 Bide ye yet, beautiful song of, 547
 'Bigger, Misses, the daughters of the Pastor of Ballochmyle, 7
 Birks of Aberfeldy, Song of, 361
 —Abergeldie, n. 361
 Black-honnet, a church elder or deacon, 196
 Blacklock, Dr., his letter to Dr. Lawrie, 39 and 602 n.—songs by 550-5-7, 560, 562-6-8, 571—letter to, 663—Epistle to and from, 285, 286—notice of, ib.

- Blacksmith, Letter from a, in illustration of a scene in the "Holy Fair," 199
- Blair, Dr. Hugh, his critical scene with the Poet, 50—Burns's blunder at his table, ib.—Remarks on the Doctor's advice, 53. 77—Letter to and from, 616
- Blair, Nelly, the heroine of "Handsome Nell," 340
- Blair of Athole, Visit to, 65
- Sir James Hunter, On the death of, 281
- Blaithrie o't, The, Song of, 550
- Blane, John, his account of the Poet's attachment to Miss Armour, 31—his description of the stable loft in which many of Burns's finest poems were composed, ib.—his recollection of the incident of "The Mouse," 224
- Bilthescum bridal, The, Song of, 538
- Bloomfield, the Poet, his letter to the Earl of Buchan, respecting Burns, n. 721
- Blue-eyed lass, Song of, 393
- Blue-gown, Notice of, n. 242
- Blythe, blythe and merry was she, Song of, 372
- Blythe has I been on yon hill, 461
- Bonnie Ann, Beware of, Song of, 377
- Bell, Song of, 415
- Brucket Lassie, Song of, 540
- Castle Gordon, Song of, 375
- Jean (M'Murdo), Song in honour of, 463
- Lad, that's far awa', Song of, 397
- Lesley, Songs in honour of, 446. 461
- Peg-a-Ramsay, Song of, 439
- wee thing, cannie wee thing, 400
- Borlur Tour, Burns's, 53. 57
- Boswell, James, of Auchinleck, n. 226
- Bowmaker, Dr., notice of, 53
- Braving angry winter's storm, Song of, 374
- Breadalbane, Earl of, President of the Highland Society, Address to, 305 6
- Bridal, The last braw, a Fragment, 431
- o't, The, Song of, 571
- Brigs of Ayr, a picture of old times and new, 48—poem of, 264
- Brodie, Donald, met a lass, Song of, 413
- Broughty Castle, a fine ruin on the banks of the Tay, 68
- Brow, the Poet's residence at, 122
- Brown, Agnes, the mother of Burns, 1
- her rectitude of heart, 4—her joy on her son's return to Moss-giel, 58—her death, 143
- Brown, Gilbert, the Poet's maternal grandfather, 6
- Brown, Richard, Irvine, Burns's friendship for him, 16—Letters to, 639. 642. 644-5-7. 675. 683
- Brown, Samuel, the Poet's maternal uncle, notice of, 6—letter to, 675
- Brownhill, Inn at, a favourite resting-place, 287
- Bruar Water, Humble petition of, 66. 275
- Bruce, Michael, Contemplated new edition of his Poems, 704, and n.
- Bruce, Robert, Grave of, 62—Popular story of, 96—Drama of, 104—Ancestors of, n. 209—portrait of, 318—Address at Bannockburn, 471-6
- Bruce, Mrs., of Clackmannan, Visit to, 62—her toast after dinner, ib.
- Bryce, David, Letters to, 34. 596. 599
- Brydges, Sir Egerton, his interview with the Poet, 84—his opinion of "Tam o' Shanter," 95
- Brydone, the traveller, his reception of Burns, 54
- Buchan Bullers, The, Account of, 298
- Buchan, Earl of, his invitation to the Poet, 46. 99. 310. n.—Letters to and from, 610. 709 and n. 730—Burns's Address to him, 108
- Buchanites, The, Notice of, 520. 594
- Burn, Blink o'er the, sweet Bettie, 533
- The Minstrel, Song of, 564-5
- R., Architect, his account for erecting the headstone over the grave of Fergusson, 713
- Burness, James, the Poet's cousin, Letters to, 590. 593-4. 600. 670—Dying request to, 745—his kindness, ib. n.—his letter to the Poet's widow, n. 745
- Burness, William, the father of Burns, 1. 588 n.—his fine example, 2—his farm unproductive, 10—his illness and death, 11, 593—picture of his household in the "Cotter's Saturday Night," 30—passage in the "Minstrel" applied to him, 43—his Epitaph, 326—the Poet's letter to, 588
- Burnet, The fair, 13. 48—Poetical compliment to, 261—do. in prose, 69. 605— anecdote of, n. 261—elegy on, 308. 703
- Burns, Captain William Nicol, the Poet's son, the possessor of his father's picture by Nasmyth, 610, n.
- Burns, Elizabeth, his illegitimate daughter, 243
- Burns, Fanny, the Poet's cousin, praise of, 670 and n.
- Burns, Gilbert, 2—Murdoch's description of him, 9—his touching allusion to the Poet, 10—his account of his brother's particular jealousy, 13—notice of, 143—his letter on Education, 146—his account of poor Mailie, 167—of the Epistle to Davie, 170—Letters to and from, 629. 667, n. 687. 744—Lockhart's remarks on his correspondence, 630—the Poet declines becoming security for him on a large scale, 644
- Burns, Miss, The celebrated, Lines written under her picture, 331—Notice of, 690 and n.
- Burns, Mrs., Song composed in compliment to her, during the honeymoon, 86—her description of the terrible brushing given by the Poet to one of his songs, 98—her recollections of "Tam o' Shanter," 305—Song in honour of, 403—Letters to and from, 744. 746, n.—Notice of, ib. n.—her remarkable dream, ib. n.— anecdote of, ib. n.—her illness and death, 747, n.
- BURNS, ROBERT, His Birth and Parentage, 1
- Education, 2
- Secret school of study, 4
- His first love, 5
- His residence at Kirkoswald, 6
- At Ballochneil, 7
- Boyish conceit, his Maybole friend, 8
- His Fair fillette, ib.
- His preceptor, Murdoch, 9
- He complains of wanting an aim, ib.
- His situation and feelings described in a letter to his father, 10
- Death of his father, 11
- His early verses, 12
- His best season for devotion, 13
- F's mode of composition, 14
- His passions, ib.
- As an observing farmer, 15
- His friendship for Richard Brown, 16
- His farm at Moss-giel, 17
- His Mauchline club, 18
- His Address to his Illegitimate Child, ib.
- His desire for distinction, 19
- His drunken rants, ib.
- His satiric attacks, 20
- His person and manners, 21
- His early companions, 22
- He alters his name, 23
- His epistolary style, 24
- His Address to the Deil, 25
- Halloween, ib.
- Death and Dr. Hornbook, 26
- Scotch drink, 26
- Jolly Beggars, ib.
- Mountain Daisy, 27
- Man was made to mourn, 28
- His vision, ib.
- Cotter's Saturday Night, 29
- His Highland Mary, 30
- His Bonny Jean, 31
- His farming establishment, 32
- Courtship with Jean Armour, 33
- His daughter Elizabeth, 34
- His indignation against Armour, 596
- Affecting anecdote, 35
- First appearance of his Poems, 36
- His friendship for Mrs. Dunlop, 37
- Scene with Miss Alexander, 38
- His journey to Edinburgh, 39
- His first appearance there, 40
- His manners, character, and conduct, 41
- His intimacy with Dugald Stewart, 42
- His habits of sobriety, ib.
- His conversational powers, 43
- Richmond's recollections of him, 44
- Sir Walter Scott's ditto, 45
- His high and dangerous elevation, 46
- His Address to the Noblemen and Gentlemen of Scotland, 47
- Appearance of the second Edition of his poems, 48
- Profits of, 614 and n. 667
- Anecdotes, 49
- A critical scene, 50
- Edinburgh lawyers, 51
- Reception of his poetry, 52
- His Border Tour, 53
- A love adventure, 54
- Visit to Dryburgh Abbey, 55
- His journal, 56
- His jaunt to England, 57
- His return to Moss-giel, 58
- His first Highland Tour, 59
- His Highland jinks, 60
- Burning of his marriage lines, 61
- Second Highland Tour, ib.
- Visit to Harvieston, 62
- His friendship for Charlotte Hamilton, 63
- Third and last Highland Tour, 63. 630
- Visit to Bannockburn, 64
- the Duke of Athole, 65
- Mrs. Rose, of Kilravock, 67
- the Duke of Gordon, ib.
- His renewed visit to Edinburgh, 69
- Dangerous accident, ib.
- Intimacy with Clarinda, 70
- Contributes to "The Museum," 71
- His ode to Prince Charles, 73
- Erects a monument to Fergusson, ib.
- His accounts with Creech, 74 and 647
- His pride, 75
- Excise appointment, ib.
- Sketches of character, 76
- Lord Glencairn and Dr. Blair, 77
- His marriage, 78. 651-6-8
- Removal to Ellisland, 79
- He wants of prudence, 80
- He rebuilds his dwelling-house, 81
- Reflections on his marriage, ib.
- His increasing cares, 83
- Sketch by Sir Egerton Brydges, 84
- His appeal in favour of the House of Stuart, 85
- Picture of his mind and feelings in 1789, 87
- His favourite walks, 88
- His management of a Parochial Library, 89
- His appointment to an Excise Division, 90
- Anecdotes, ib.
- His "Wounded Hare," 91
- His "Mary in Heaven," 92
- His Perambulations, 93
- His "Tam o' Shanter," 94
- His "Whistle," 96

BURNS (Continued)
 Adventure with Ramsay of Ochertyre, 96
 His song of "Ae fond kiss," 97
 His "Lament for Glencairn," 98
 — Queen Mary, 99
 Visited by two Englishmen, 100
 His final visit to Edinburgh, ib.
 Anecdotes of, ib.
 His heroic War Song, 101
 His removal to Dumfries, 102
 His intercourse with George Thomson, 103
 His "Vision of Liberty," 104
 His defence against the Board of Excise, 105
 His Indiscretions, 106
 His Nithsdale Beauties, 107
 Galloway adventure, 108
 His Election ballads, 109
 His wit, 111
 His "Lass of Craigie-burn-wood," 112
 His Chloris, 113
 His jealousy of men of rank, 114
 His dislike of soldiers, 115
 His cutting irony to Nicol, 116
 His monody on Maria Riddell, 117
 His removal to Mill-hill-brae, 118
 His grief for the death of Glendinning, 119
 His meeting with Mrs. Hyslop, 120
 His illness, 121
 His residence at Brow, 122
 Affecting interview with Mrs. Riddell, 123
 His dying request to Thomson, 124
 His return from Brow, 125
 His Death, 126
 His interment, ib.
 Personal character, by a Lady, 127
 — strength, 130
 His demeanour to ladies, 131
 Political heresies, 132
 Anecdotes of, ib.
 Modes of study and habits, 133
 Anecdotes of, 134
 As a Poet, 135
 His Nationality, 136
 His best poems, 137
 His excellence, by T. Carlyle, 138
 — by Byron, 139
 His Lyrics, 140
 His want of chivalry, 141
 His Prose, 142
 His widow and children, ib.
 His brother Gilbert, 143
 Poem to his memory, 144
 Appendix to His LIFE, 145
 Remarks on the last three years of his life, by Gray, 149
 Phenological Development of, 151
 His Cranium, 152
 Telford's poem addressed to, 154
 Roscoe's do., 156
 Campbell's do., 157
 Wordsworth to his sons, 158
 Coleridge's Lines, ib.
 Montgomery's do., ib.
 The Ettrick Shepherd's do., 159
 On his anniversary, by Hugh Ainslie, ib.
 Verses to his memory by Halleck, 160
 — by Mercer, 161
 — by Mrs. Richardson, ib.
 — by E. Rushton, 162
 Sonnet to his Shade by Charlotte Smith, 163
 Verses by T. H., ib.
 His anniversary, by D. Vedder, ib.
 His Preface to the First Edition of his Poems, 164
 Dedication to the Second Edition, 165
 His POEMS, 166—326
 His verses to a Scotch bard, 244
 — written under violent grief,

245

BURNS (Continued)
 His Farewell, ib.
 His Elegy, 247
 His Epitaph, 256
 His Monument in Alloway Kirk-yard, n. 302
 Lines on his horse being impounded, 327
 His Postscripts, 228
 EPIGRAMS, &c., 326—338
 Epitaph on his daughter, 336
 SONGS AND BALLADS, 339—439
 His Lament, "My Mary's no more," 388
 His Punch-bowl, 392
 Songs, and Correspondence with G. Thomson, 440—517
 Remarks on Scottish Song, 518—580
 Ayr-shire Ballads, 581-4
 General Correspondence, 585—747
 Poems in memory of, 514
 His letter to Tytler of Woodhouselee, 581
 His complimentary letter to Mrs. Graham, of Fintray, 587
 His favourite Authors, 589
 Utopian thoughts, 614
 Profits of his authorship, ib. n.
 His letter to a Lady—allusion to her piano-forte, 620
 His sore warfare in this world, 621
 His celebrated letter to Dr. Moore, 622
 Declines becoming security for Gilbert on a large scale, 644
 Circumstances which led to a permanent union with his Jean, 645, n.
 Anecdote of, at Glasgow, 647, n.
 Miers's profile of, 653 and n.
 His Observations on Scottish Songs, 473
 Thanks to George Thomson for Allan's picture, 505
 His Preface to the second volume of "The Museum," 547
 His additional stanzas to the pathetic ballad of "Hughie Graham," 576
 His amended story of "As I cam down by yon castle wa'!" 578
 His elegant compliment to the Misses Bailey, 654
 His filial and fraternal claims, 655 and n.
 Anecdote of Mrs. Miller, touching one of his songs, 657
 His criticism on the Address to Lochlomond, a poem, 660-1
 Recollections of, by Mr. Tenant, of Ayr, n. 665
 His belief in the immortality of the soul, 666
 His thoughts turned on the Drama, 693
 His national prejudices, ib.
 His supporters, 707
 His gratitude to the noble house of Glencairn, 710
 Compliment of Colonel Fullerton to his general talents, 711, n.
 His interest in the fate of the lovely Miss Davies, 712
 His ironical epistle to Nicol for sending him good advice, 714
 His three Witch stories, relating to Alloway Kirk, 715-16
 His favourite quotations from Thomson's Dramas, 720
 His delight at receiving a family piece of the descendants of Sir William Wallace, 722
 His description of his armorial bearings and seal, ib.
 His celebrated defence of his political conduct, in his letter to Erskine of Mar, 724
 SPUNKIE, his tutelary genius, 725
 His anxiety respecting his fame, 732

BURNS (Continued)
 His ironical Address to Pitt, in the cause of the Scotch Distillers, 740
 His letter to the Dumfries magistrates, relative to the education of his sons, 742
 His Monument, Maria Riddell's exertions to procure, 742-3, n.
 Anecdote of, whilst at Brow, 744
 His Common-place Books, 748—753, n.
 Assignment of his Works, 754
 Burns, Robert, jun., the eldest son of the Poet, Song by, 746, n.
 Burns, William, the brother of the Poet, Letter to, 673—notice of, 696 and n.—his death, n. ib.
 —Burnside, Rev. Mr., and Mrs., 58
 Burton, Epitaph on, 333
 Bushby, John, of Tinwald Downs, Satire against, 111—Lamentation of, 324—Epitaph on, 337 and n.
 Byron, Lord, his opinion of the Poet, 136—contrasted with Burns, 139—his opinion of "Tam o' Shanter," 304

C

Cæsar, one of the heroes in the "Twa Dogs," 257
 Caledonia, Brave, Song of, 434. 503
 Caledonian Hunt, their patronage of Burns, 40. 603—the Poet's address to them, 47—Dedication to, 165
 Calf, The, Poem of, 202
 Campbell, Mary, Burns's Highland Mary, story of, 30. 398—Songs addressed to, 385. 445
 Campbell, Lords Frederick and Islay, 227 and n.
 Campbell, Thomas, his Ode to the memory of Burns, 157—praise of his writings, 206—of "Tam o' Shanter," 304
 Campbells, The, Loudoun branch of, described in "The Vision," 207
 Can I cease to care? Song of, 503
 Candlish, James, Letters to and from, 612. 619 and n.—his superabundant modesty, 654
 Canongate, Kirk Session of, Sederunt, 613
 Captain's Lady, The, Song of, 381
 Captive Ribband, a song generally attributed to Burns, 570
 Cardin o't, The, Song of, 422
 Carfrae, Rev. P., Letter to and from, 671, n.
 Carfrae, Mrs., Burns's landlady in Edinburgh, 40
 Carlisle, City of, Visit to, 57. 327
 Carlyle, Thomas, his character of the Poet, 138—Criticism by, 168. 175-8. 339
 Carrick Coast, a famous smuggling place, 6
 Carron Foundry, Burns at the gates of, 59. 61
 Carron Sidc, The air of, 394-5
 — Works at Stirling, Lines on being refused admittance to, 329
 Cassilis, Earl of, his lady carried off by Sir John Faw, 559
 Cassilis Downan's dance, 209
 Cassilis Banks, Song of, 426
 Castle Cawdor, Visit to, where Macbeth murdered Duncan, 66
 Ca' the yowes to the knowes, Songs of, 386. 485
 Catrine, The woods of, 37—Seat of Dugald Stewart, n. 206
 Cauld kail in Aberdeen, Song of, 554
 Caudron, Clout the, Song of, 182
 Cease, cease, my dear friend, to explore, Song of, 568
 Cessnock Banks, Heroine of, 30—Song of, 355—improved version, 356
 Chalmers, Margaret, "The fairest maid

- on Devon banks," her winning graces, 73—Songs in honour of, 428. 513—her destruction of the Poet's letters, n. 630—her personal charms, 641—Burns's Letters to, 63. 630-1-5-6-7. 642-7-8-9. 658
- Chalmers, Willie, Poem of, 250
- William, Ayr, Letter to, 604
- Chambers, her account of the Poet's early life, 6—his description of Poosie Nancy's club, 179—of the aumous dish, 180—his anecdotes of Nanse Tinnock, 227, n.—his notice of Creech, 273, n.—his description of Alloway Kirk, n. 301—his ridicule of the Scotch metaphysicians, n. 703
- Character, a, Sketch of, 312
- Charles Edward, Prince, celebration of his birth-day, 73—Songs in honour of, 366. 414—his heroic adventures, 409
- Charles II., Amour of, 423. 560—his character for wit and libertinism, 567
- Chatham, Earl of, Auld Bosconnock, 227
- Cherrytrees, Lady, and her daughter, Anecdotes of, 470. 579
- Chevalier's, Lament, Song of, 414
- Child, a favourite, On the illness of, 316
- On the death of, 320
- Chisholm, Bishop of Dunblane, Anecdote of, 521
- Chloe, The youthful charming, 492
- Chloris, Burns's visit to, 113. 491—Verses to, 321—Songs in honour of, 422. 485. 490. 491. 503-7-8. 510
- Chronicle, Moring, Letter to the Editor of, 738
- Clarinda, Burns's acquaintance with, 70 and n. 640—the Poet's farewell to, 97—Songs inspired by, 401. 425. 428. 472. 480. 499—Verses to, 270-1—Notice of, n. ib.—extract from Burns's letter to, respecting his autobiography, 627, n.—letter to M——n, contained in the Correspondence, 634—the Poet's letters to, under the signature of Sylvander, 755 to 768—her song of "Love and Friendship," 757—Recent account of, 768, n.
- Clarke, J., Edinburgh, Letter to, 716
- of Moffat, Schoolmaster, persecution of, 708
- Clarke, Samuel, jun., Dumfries, Letter to, 735
- Clarke, Schoolmaster, Forfar, Letter to, 743
- Clarke, Stephen, Anecdotes of, 409. 493—Songs composed at his request, 428. 488—odd note of, 465
- Clarkson, Dr., his anecdote of Burns, n. 274
- Clergy, The, far above either the Poet's praise or censure! 654
- Clergyman, A Covenantant, Anecdote of, 558
- Clout the Cauldron, Ancient song of, 521
- Cochrane, Jane, heroine of the "Collier Laddie," 405 n.
- Cock up your beaver, Song of, 396
- Celia, Fair, Allan Ramsay's song of, 378
- Coil, Auld King, 257
- Coila, the old, inspiring, dearest nymph of the Poet, 107. 458. 469
- Coilus, King of the Picts, n. 206
- Coldstream Bridge, Scene at, 53
- Colean, Cove of, a noted cavern, 209
- Coleridge, S. T., his lines on Burns, 158
- Collier Laddie, The, Song of, 404—Ancient version of, n. ib.
- Collier's "Bonnie lassie," Song of, 536
- Come, let me take thee to my breast, Song of, 469
- Come, rede me, dame, Song of, 395
- Coming thro' the braes o' Cupar, 413—rye, Song of, 419
- Comyn's Castle, Description of, n. 394
- Conjugal love, not adapted for poesy, 492
- Conjugal state, scale of good wifeship, 718
- Constable, Lady Winifred Maxwell, Letters to, 685. 699—her present of a valuable snuff-box to the Poet, 99 and n. 306—notice of her family, n. 700
- Cooper, The, o' Cuddie, Song of, 421
- Cope, Johnnie, Satirical song of, 508
- Coquet Island, visited by, 57
- Cordwainer's March, air of, 435
- Corn rigs are bonnie, Song of, 546
- Cottages, Smoking, Burns's delight in, 236
- Cotter's Saturday Night, —stanza on love—passage which suggested it, 14—origin of, 29—the poem of, 233
- Country Lassie, The, Song of, 407
- Cowper, the Poet, the pains he took to understand Burns, 219—"The Task," a glorious poem, 319, n.—his translation of Homer's famous "Cestus of Venus," 707, n.
- Coxcomb, a noted, Epitaph on, 329
- Craig, Miss, her attention to the Poet while in a dying state, 123
- Craigdarroch, Laird of, a man of worth, 654
- Craigie-burn-wood, Song of, 395. 500
- Craik, Miss, Letter to, and notice of, 726 and n.
- Cranston, Miss, her song of genius, "The tears I shed must ever fall," 578
- Crawford of Doonside, 2
- Achnames, Notice of, 531
- his song of "Tweedside," 532—"Allan Water," 534—"The Bush about Traquhair," 541—"My dearie, if thou die," 543
- Crawford, William, his song of "Down the Burn, Davie," 538
- Cree, Banks of, Song of, 483
- Creech, Wm., the Publisher, notice of, 40—his story, illustrative of drunkenness in Scotland, 51—a keen frosty letter to him, 73—his reply, 649—epistle to, 273—letters to, 274. 676
- Crochepole Linn, Visit to, 63
- Crochallan Fencibles, their hoarf in the Anchor close, 44
- Cromek, H., his remark on an expression of the Poet, 523—Murdoch's letter to, n. 696
- Cromleck's Lilt, affecting ballad of, 542
- Cruikshanks, Miss, Lines to, 249—song in honour of, 374
- Cruikshanks, William, Edinburgh, the Poet's visit to, 69—epitaph on, 332—letters to, 620. 644. 655—notice of, 675 and n.
- Culoden Moor, Visit to, 67
- Culzean Castle, Curious tapestry in, 550
- Cunningham, Alexander, the friend of the Poet, 44—his unfortunate story, 107. 467—song addressed to him, 506—his faithless fair one, 517—remedy for a certain species of indigestion, 654—Letters to and from, 691-2. n. 697. 701 and n. 706-8. 717. 722. 732. and 744
- Cunningham, the Player, Anecdotes and Notice of, 530
- Cunningham, Allan, his LIFE OF THE POET, 1 to 142—his first meeting with Burns, 80—his verses in honour of the Poet, 144—his additional verses to an old song, 544
- Cunningham, Lady Elizabeth, Letters to, 310. 709
- Cumberland, Duke of, Song by Smolter, on the infamous depredations of, 551
- Cupid's Whirligig, Passage from, 349
- Cure for all care, Song of, 352
- Curling, Game of, described, 205, n.
- Currie, Dr., his defence of "The Lass of Ballochmyle," 38—his criticism on "The Twa Dogs," 260—his eulogium on ancient song, 158—his remarks on the Poet's Letters, 587-8, n. 662—his interview with the Poet, 770, n.
- Currie, John, Carse-mill, Notice of, 665 and n.

D

- Dae, Lord, Burns's introduction to, 37—lines on meeting with, 262
- Dalrymple of Orangefield, 44. 603—Letters to, 635
- Dalrymple, Dr. William, Anecdote of, n. 188. 191
- Dalswinton, Lands of, 58
- Dalzell, Alexander, Finlayston, Letter to, 706 and n.
- Danon and Sylvia, Song of, 361
- Daunton me, To, Song of, 373
- Ancient Jacobite song of, 373, and 560
- Davies, The charming, lovely, Lines on, 97. 332. 401-2.—Letters to, 664. 711—her unhappy story, 711, n.—verses on her unfortunate attachment, ib.
- Davie, Dainty, Song of, 469—remarks on, 579
- Day, returns, my bosom burns, Song of, 378
- Dean of Faculty, a ballad, 269
- Death and Dr. Hornbock, described, 25
- Poem of, 125
- Death and dying Words of Poor Mailie, 14.—origin of, 23—Poem of, 166
- Death of a favourite Child, On the, 320
- Death, Song of, a heroic Ode, 414
- December, Gloomy, Song of, 428
- Dedication, Poetical, to Gavin Hamilton, 246
- Deil, The, Burns's Address to, 25
- Deil's, awa' wi' th' Exciseman, Song of, 417
- Delany, Captain, his cruel treatment of Miss Davies, 711, n.
- Delia, an Ode, 287
- Deluded Swain, the pleasure, Song of, 479
- Democracy of Burns, 104
- Demure, George, of Dunnichen, a true-blue Scot, 227
- De Peyster, Colonel, Verses to, 121. 325
- Despondency, an Ode, 232
- Deuks, dang o'er my Daddie, Song of, 416
- Devon Banks, Fairest Maid of, 63
- Song of, 368. 513
- Dewar, Jessie, Anecdote of, 517
- Discreet hint, The, 292
- Divinity, Polemical, 190
- Dogs, The Twa, a Poem, 257
- Don, Lady Harriet, an unpublished letter to, 93—Notice of, 727, n.
- Donald and Flora, fine ballad of, by Hector Macneil, 569
- Donald Brodie met a Lass, Song of, 413
- Donocht-head, Praise of, 489
- Song of, ib. n.
- Doon, Auld Brig of, n. 303
- Petition of, n. 304
- Doon, Banks of, Song of, 409—found to be a defamatory libel! 611
- Douglas, Dr., of Jamaica, to whose Estate Burns was appointed overseer, 38 and 599
- Douglas, Tragedy of, taken from "The Morrice," 563

Dove, John, Mauchline, Epitaph on, 328
 Dowie's, Johnnie, tavern, 44
 Down the Burn, Davie, Alteration in, 406, 473
 ——— Original song of, 537
 Dow's, John, Public-house, frequented by the Poet, 27
 Dramatic Interlude, A favourite, in the south-west parts of Scotland, 558 Dream, The, Song of, 340
 ——— Poem of, 254
 ——— Author's Defence of, 43
 Drumlanrig Woods, On the destruction of, 290—visit to, 674
 Drummond, Jean, of Megginch, the heroine of the Song "For lack of gold," 555
 Dryburgh Abbey, Ruins of, 55
 Duan, a term of Ossian, n. 205
 Dudgeon, the Poet, Burns's opinion of, 53—his song, 533
 Dumbarton Drums, Song of, 554
 Dumblane, Battle of, Anecdote of the Duke of Argyll at, 550
 Dumfries, Burns's removal to, 102
 ——— folks, quite charmed with, 58
 Dumfries Magistrates, The Poet's letter to, relative to the education of his sons, 741 and n. 742
 Dumfries Theatre, Prologue spoken at, 257—Scots ditto, 283
 Dumfries Volunteers, their appearance, 115—Song of, 436
 Dumfries-shire Whigs, a remedy for their indigestion, 653
 Dumourier, General, Welcome to, 438
 Dunbar, Sweet Tibbie, Song of, 375—additional stanzas, ib.
 Dunbar, William, Esq., W. S., Edinburgh, Song in honour of, 374—Letters to, 612, 648, 688, 700, 730—remedy for his indigestion, 654—Notice of, 675, and n. 700
 Duncan Gray, notice of, 104—Song of 369—ancient version, ib. n.—second version, 449—air of, 553
 Duncan Davison, Song of, 367
 ——— Dr. Robert, Dundonald, notice of, n. 190
 ——— William, Letter to Crawford Tait, recommending, 695
 Dundas, Lord President, Burns's Lamentation on his death, 49—Elegy, 267
 Dundee, stone of the gallant lord, 65
 ——— Viscount, Anecdotes of, 393
 ——— Bonnie, Song of, 350—ancient version, 359, n.
 Dunfermline Abbey, Visit to, 62
 Dunlop, Miss Rachael, her painting of Coila, 208, 259
 Dunlop, Mrs., of Dunlop, her friendship for Burns, 37—her admiration of "The Cotter's Saturday Night," ib.
 ——— her present to the Poet on his marriage, 79—verses on the birth of her Grandchild, 249—her extraordinary history, n. ib.—New-year's-day, A sketch of her fire-side, 289—notice of, n. 598—the Poet's letters to, 593, 606, 614, 616, 641, 646, 649, 650, 651, 665-6-7, 660-2-4-6, 670-4-8, 680-4-8, 693-7-9, 702-7, 712, 716, 719, 721, 734-7-9, 742, and 745.
 Dysart, the Carles o', Up wi', 416

E

Eagle, The black-headed, a fragment, 338
 Eagle, The black, song by Dr. Fordyce, 567
 Earnest cry and prayer, The Author's, described, 26—poem of, 226
 Ecclefechan, The Lass of, Song of, 421

Ecclefechan, wicked little Village of, 502
 Echo, Lap-dog, named, Epitaph on a, 336
 Edinburgh, Burns's first appearance in, 40
 ——— Address to, 48, 261
 ——— Gentry, their neglect of Fergusson, 220
 ——— Lawyers of, 51
 ——— Literati of, their patronage of Burns, 77
 ——— Tavern life in, 51
 ——— Theatre, Burns's opinion of, 109
 ——— Lines on, by Sir Walter Scott, 262
 ——— Flowers of, Song of, 523
 Education of the Peasantry of Scotland, 3—by Gilbert Burns, 146
 Eglinton, Earl of, his patronage of Burns, 40—letter to, 605
 Egotisms, The Poet's, from his own sensations, 750
 Elder, a celebrated Ruling, Epitaph on, 328
 Election ballads, 109, 295-0, 321-4
 Elegy on the year 1788, 282
 Elgin Cathedral, the noblest in Scotland, Visit to, 67
 Eliza, Burns's, notice of, 30, and 591, n.—letters to, 501-3
 Eliza, Song of, 533
 ——— Fair, Song of, 408
 Elizabeth, Burns's illegitimate daughter, 34, 243
 Elliott, Dr., a climate-beaten veteran in the medical line, 55
 Elliott, General, Lord Heathfield, his defence of Gibraltar, n. 180
 Ellisland, its beautiful situation, 79—the Poet's Farm at, 647, 688 and n.—social communications at, 658
 Elphinstone's Translations of Martial, Epigram on, 331, 758
 Ennuil, best antidote against, in rainy weather, 659
 Epigrams, epitaphs, &c. 326—338
 Epitaph on a Friend, 327
 ——— on W——, 333—do, 769
 ——— on one nick-named "The Marquis," 335
 Eppie Adair, Song of, 389
 ——— Mc'Nab, Song of, 399
 Errol, Lord, his notice of Burns, 56
 Erskine, Hon. A., his postscript, 452—his declining health, 463
 Erskine, Hon. Henry, a patron of Burns, 44—his portrait, 77—his celebrated whiskey cause, n. 225
 Erskine, Lady, of Kinnoul, her conversation with James I., relative to Sir William Wallace, 734, n.
 Erskine, Lord, a spunkie Nor'land billic, 227
 Erskine of Mar, manly and eloquent letter to, 124, 724
 Esther, a remarkable woman for reciting poetry, 55
 Ettrick Shepherd, his story illustrative of drunkenness in Scotland, 50—his verses in memory of Burns, 159—his illustration of the word "Spairges," 172—his praise of "the Holy Fair," 199—his additional verse of "Peggy," 522
 Evan Banks, Song of, 389
 Ewe-bughts, Marion, beauties of the song, 445, 544
 Ewie wi' the crooked Horn, 574
 Excise, The, Burns's Commission in, 75—his appointment to, 90-3—Inquisition of the Board, 104—lines on being appointed to, 332—letter of instructions, 725, n.—lines on being censured by, n. ib.
 Excise Commissioners, their refusal to grant the Poet his full salary while dying, 744 and n.

Excisemen, Lines on, ridiculing, 335
 Extempore lines, pinned to a Lady's Coach, 334

F

Faa, Johnny, the Gypsy Laddie, popular tale of, 559
 Fairest of the fair, Dr. Percy's song of, 529
 Falconer, Author of the "Shipwreck," notice of, 689 and n.
 Farewell, The Poet's, 245
 ——— to the Brethren of Tarbolton Lodge, 354
 Farewell, The, song of, 431—ancient version of, n. 432
 Farewell thou stream that winding flows, 493
 Farmer's, Auld, Address to his mare, 32, 175
 Fee him, father, Tune of, 474
 Fergusson, of Doonholm, 2
 ——— Sir Adam, of Kilkerran, 227
 ——— Alexander, Esq., of Craigharrow, champion for the "Whistle," 308
 Fergusson, Mrs., of Craigharrow, A Mother's Lament, composed for, 208 and n.
 Fergusson, Dr. Adam, a patron of Burns, 44
 Fergusson, the Poet, his "Farmer's Ingle," the poem which started the idea of "The Cotter's Saturday Night," 29, n. 233—"Caller Water," the model of "Scotch Drink," 236—Burns at his lowly grave, 40—the model of Burns, 45—memorial to, 73
 613—his stanzas of "Leith Races," 109—Verses written under his portrait, 271—his song of "My ain kind dearie, O," 536—his "Young Damon," 558—eulogium of, 679, n.—his head-stone, 612—letters respecting it, 612-13 and n. 713—inscription on the stone, 613
 Ferintosh, a synonyme for whiskey, n. 225
 Fête Champêtre, The, Song of, 435
 Fiddler, The, Song of, 182
 Fife, and a' the lands about it, 550
 Findlater, Alexander, Collector of Excise, his testimony of the Poet, 105—his eulogy on the Board of Excise, 725, n.—letter to, 738
 Fisher, William, the Mauchline Elder, n. 189—the hero of "Holy Willie's Prayer," 193
 Five Carlins, The, 109—ballad of, 295
 Fleming, Agnes, one of the maidens of Kyle, Burns's Nannie, 30, 347
 Flowing locks, Her, Song of, 350
 Folly, Lines on, 335
 Fontenelle, Miss, "The Rights of Woman," address spoken by, 314—letters to, 314, 737—Address spoken by, on her benefit night, 320—Lines on seeing her in a favourite character, 321
 For a' that, and a' that, Songs of, 183, 371, 499
 Forbes, of Colulden, his celebrated Whiskey cause, n. 225
 Fordyce, Dr., his song of "The Black Eagle," 567
 Forlorn, my love, no comfort near, Song of, 508
 Forth, Banks of, Song of, 541
 For the sake of somebody, Song of, 422
 Fortune, Fickle, 318
 ——— Luckless, Song of, 340
 Fox, Rt. Hon. C. J., Sketch inscribed to, 283—Additional lines, 284
 Frae the friends and lands I love, Song of, 394
 Fragments of Songs, 348, 350

France, Revolution in, allusions to, 483-4
 Franklin, Benjamin, his style not re-lished by the Poet, 42
 Fraser, Thomas, the hautboy player, 460, 521
 Frederick, of Prussia, his taste in painting, 486
 Freedom, Lines on, 334
 Friar's-Carse, Family of, friendship for, 85—contest for "The Whistle" at, 96
 Friar's Carse Hermitage, Lines written in, 273-9
 Friend, honest, A bottle and an, 338
 Friendship, Happy, Song of, 393
 Frugality! Apostrophe to, 673
 Fullarton, Colonel, described in "The Vision," 206—letter to, 710—notice of, 711, n.
 Fuseli, the painter, Anecdote of, 233
 Fye, gae rub her o'er wi' strae, Song of, 524
 Fyers, Fall of, near Loch-ness, Lines written at, 277

G

Gaberlunzie Man, Song by Jas. V., 566
 Galla Water, Song of, 364—second version, 451—ancient version, ib.
 Galloway, Drunken wife of, Song of, 562
 Galloway, Earl of, Satirical squibs against, 111, 336
 Galloway Tam, Song of, 577
 Gard'ner, The, wi' his piddle, Song of, 377
 Gardeners, The, march of, 378
 Garrick, David, his scurvy treatment of poor Cunningham the Player, 531
 Geddes, Bishop, Letter to, 669—notice of, ib., n.
 Geddes, Jenny, the Poet's mare, 59—notice of the old woman, of that name, 618—an adventure with, 60
 Gentle swain, Specimen of the song, 529
 Geordie's Byre, Muckin' o', Song of, 546
 George III., Poetical compliment to, 254
 George IV., Burns's prophecy respecting him, while Prince of Wales, 483, 255
 Gibraltar, Siege of, n. 180
 Gibson, Agnes, the alias of Poosie Nansie, 27
 Gibson, Janet, the Racer Jess of "The Holy Fair," 196
 Gilchrist, of Stamford, his interesting communication to Sir Egerton Brydges, respecting "Tam o' Shanter," 716 n.
 Gil Morice, The plaintive ballad of, observations on, 563
 Gin ye meet a bonnie lassie, Song of, 524
 Girvan, River, horridly prosaic name of, 445
 Glenae, Auld, Tune of, 553
 Glencairn, Countess of, Letter to, 727
 ——— Earl of, his patronage, 39, 40, 75, 706, n.—letters to, 610, 636, 733—his strictures, 49—the Poet's gratitude to him, 77, 710—Lament on his death, 90, 309—notice of his family, n., ib.
 Glencoe, Massacre of, Song on, 545
 Glendinning, Death of, 119—Effect on the mind of the Poet, ib.—Epitaph on a suicide of that name, 337
 Globe Tavern, Dumfries, Burns's howff, 120—Verses written at, 335
 Glover, Jean, her song of "O'er the moor," 573
 Go fetch to me a pint of wine, Song of, 379—ancient version, 380
 Gold, For lack of, Song by Dr. Austin, 555

Gordon, Castle, Bonny, Song of, 375
 Gordon, Duchess of, her patronage of Burns, 40, 47—her opinion of the Poet, 41, 45—Duke and Duchess's kind reception of the Poet, 67
 Gordon, Duke of, his song of "Cauld kail in Aberdeen," 554
 Goudie of Kilmarnock, Epistle to, 20, 215
 Gow, Neii, Description of, in prose and verse, 65
 Grace before dinner, 332
 Grace, The Selkirk, 336
 ——— after dinner, 333
 ——— Another, ib.
 Gracie, James, Esq., Letter to, 746
 Graham, Daft Davie, Anecdote of, 417
 Graham, Miss Jenny, of Dumfries, her beautiful song, "Bide ye yet," notice and anecdote of, 547
 Graham, Hughie, Ballad of, 575
 Graham, Robert, of Fintray, Poem to, 85—Election Ballad to, 110—First Epistle to, 290—Second Epistle to, 297—Third Epistle to, 311, with variations, n.—Fourth Epistle to, 312—letters to, 655, 683—his kind interposition in favour of the Poet, 725, n.
 Graham, Miss, Poetical Address to, 483
 Graham, Mrs., of Fintray, Letters to, 587, 700
 Grahame, Douglas, the original of "Tam o' Shanter," n. 301
 Grahame, James, the Poet, his opinion of the "Letters to Clarinda," 71—his drama of Queen Mary, 289
 Gramachree, Irish song of, 535
 Grant, Mrs., of Laggan, her Verses to the memory of Burns, 770
 Gray's Elegy, Burns's defence of, 49—his observation to Palgrave, 76
 Gray, James, his professional acquaintance with the Poet, 120—his observations on the last three years of the Poet's life, 149—notice of, by Hogg, ib.
 Green grow the Rashes, a tribute to the maidens of Kyle, 30—Song of, 349—ancient version, ib.
 Gregory, Lord, Song of, 453—Wolcot's version, ib.—second version, 454—ancient version, 519
 Gregory, Dr., his criticism on the "Wounded Hare," 285, 669, 675, n.
 Grieve, William, his family circle, 56
 Grim, Grizzel, Epitaph on, 333
 Grose, Captain, his visit to Friar's-Carse, 94—his Peregrinations, 299—notice of, n., ib.—Lines to, 300—epigram on, 332—letters to, 714, 715—his obligations to the Poet, 714, n.
 Guid e'en to you, kimmer, Song of, 346
 Guidwife of Wauchope House, notice of, 55—poetical epistles to and from, 273
 Guidwife, count the lawin', Song of, 596, 576

H

Had I a cave on some wild distant shore, Song of, 467
 Had I the wyte she bade me, Song of, 419
 Haggis, Scotch, Address to, 176.—composition of, n., ib.—one of the most savoury dishes in Scottish cookery, 177—Galt's anecdote of, ib.
 Hall, Sir James, of Douglas, and his lady, 56
 Halleck, of New York, Verses in memory of Burns, 160
 Halloween described, 25, 209, 212—Poem of, 208
 Hamilton, Gavin, the friend of Burns, always welcome, 21—his wit, 189—account of, 190, 603—his offence to the Kirk, n. 193—his wager with the Poet, 202—described in verse, 222—

poetical dedication to, 246—his descent, 247—epistle to, recommending a boy, 251—Nature's Law, a poem, inscribed to, 252—epitaph on, 327—the Poet's letters to, 603-5, 611, 623, 640, 699
 Hamilton, Wm., of Bangour, his song of "The Poor Shepherd," 426, 552—censured by Dr. Johnson, ib.—his song of "Strephon," 537
 ——— James, Grocer, Glasgow, letter to, 676—notice of, n., ib.
 Hamilton, Janet, Specimen of her poetry, 527
 Hamilton, Charlotte, her charms described, 61-3, 73, 368, 629
 Hannibal's Life, the first of two books the Poet took most delight in, 3
 Hanover, House of, 409
 ——— Stem, lines restored, 278
 Happy days, Song of, 343
 ——— Friendship, Song of, 392
 ——— Marriage, song of, by Edward Moore, 527
 Hare, a wounded, Verses on seeing one limp by, 284, and 675—Dr. Gregory's criticism on, 285
 Harrieston, The Poet's visit to, 61
 Hastie, Archibald, Esq., M.P., the worthy possessor of the Poet's marble punch-bowl, 392
 Hastings, Warren, his triumph, 290, n.
 Haugh, Mrs., of Dumfries, her testimony regarding the Poet, 132
 Havannah, Capture of, n. 180
 Hay, Charles, Esq., Advocate, Letter to, 637
 Hay's, John, "Bonnie Lassie," Specimen of, 539
 Hazlitt, William, his criticism on "The Cotter's Saturday Night," 233, n.—"The Twa Dogs," 259
 Hee Balou, Song of, 427
 Helen, Fair, of Kirkconnel, Romantic song of, 465
 Hemans, Mrs., Lines by, n. 234
 Henderson, Captain Matthew, Elegy on, 100, 293.—his Epitaph, 294—notice of, 696, n. 705
 Hen-peck'd Country Squire, a, Epitaph on, 329
 Hen-peck'd Husband, The, Verses on, 331
 Herds, The Twa, poem of, 190
 Here's a health to them that's awa', Song of, 435
 Here's to thy health, my bonnie Lass, 431
 Hermit, The, a poem written in the Wood of Aberfeldy, 275
 Heron, his description of Burns's poems, 36—his opinion of the Poet, 44, 52—of Dr. Blacklock, 236—his death, ib.
 Heron of Kerroughtree, Election ballads, 111, 321-4—letter to, 739
 Heron, Lady Elizabeth, heroine of the "Banks of Cree," 112, 433
 He stole my tender heart away, specimen of the song, 529
 Hey, the Dusty Miller, 367
 ——— for a lass wi' a tocher, 510
 ——— Tuttle Taitie, air of, 370, 471-2, 535-6.—ancient version, ib.
 Hewit, Richard, an amanuensis of Dr. Blacklock, notice of, 520 and n.
 Highland Laddie, The auld, 528
 ——— Lassie, Song of, 344
 ——— Laddie, Bonnie, 426—Loyal song of, 523
 ——— Rover, The Young, 366
 ——— Harry, Song of, 375—ancient version, 376, n.
 ——— Tour, Burns's First, 59—second, 61—third, 63
 ——— high jinks, 60
 ——— Mary, Song of, 103, 446—notice of, 447, n.

Highland Society, Address of Beelzebub to the President, 305
 — Welcome, The, 399
 — Widow's Lament, Song of, 438
 — Character, or Garb of Old Gaul, 564
 — Queen, and King, Specimens of songs, 518
 Highlander, A musical, his statement respecting Gaelic and Highland songs, 467
 Highlander's Prayer at Sheriff-muir, 529
 Highlandman, John, My gallant braw, Song of, 467
 Hill, Peter, Bookseller, Edinburgh, Letters to, 654. 660. 673. 689. 692. 701. 713—notice of, 617, n.
 Hitches, Lieutenant, his "Farewell to his Sweetheart," n. 418
 Hogg, James, his description of drunkenness in Scotland, 51—his anecdote of Burns, 274—his remark on the queer old song of "Duncan Gray," 553, n.—his castigation of Ritson, 556—his anecdote of Sir George Murray, 559
 Hoggie, My, Song of, 365
 Holy Fair, The, notice of, 20—poem of, 195—sternly censured by a clergyman, 49—Dr. Blair's alteration of a word in, 50—illustration of a scene in, 199
 Holy Tuilzie, notice of, 20—Poem of, 190
 Holy Willie's Prayer, notice of, 20.—Poem of, 192.—described by a Mauchline mason, 21—origin of, n. 192—jeu d'esprit relating to, n. 192—epitaph on, 193
 Hood, a gentleman who accompanied the Poet to England, 57
 Hood, Souter, a celebrated ruling elder, epitaph on, 328
 Hooley and fairly, Song of, 562
 Hornbook, Dr., Death and, 185—hero of the poem, n. ib.
 How cruel are the parents, Song of, 504
 How lang and dreary is the night, Song of, 371—second version, 489.
 Hoy, James, Librarian at Gordon Castle, Letters to and from, 68. 631-2-3.—notice of, 633, n.
 Hughie Graham, Patriotic ballad of, with additional stanzas by Burns, 575
 Human life, The grand end of, 750
 Humphrey, James, a noisy polemic, Epitaph on, 328
 Hunter, John, of Bar-mill, the luckless hero of the song, "I had a horse, and I had nae mair," 561
 Hunting song, 351
 Hutchison, Dr. Copland, his recollections of the Poet, 120
 Hypocrisy, To unmask, a favourite pursuit of the Poet, 229
 Hyslop, Mrs., her meeting with Burns, 120

I

Ideal loveliness, in his solitary wanderings, 107
 I do confess thou art sae fair, Song of, 398
 I had a horse, and I had nae mair, Capital comic song of, 561
 I have a wife o' my ain, Song of, 403
 I'll aye ca' in by yon town, 424
 Illness of a Favourite Child, Lines on 316.
 I'm o'er young to marry yet, Song of, 360
 Independence, Altar to, poetical inscription for, 321
 Indigestion, Horrors of, 654
 Innocence, Lines on, 336

Inventory, The, described, 32.—Poem of, 194
 Inverary, Lines on, 60—the Poet's visits to, 331
 Inverleithing, 56
 Inverness, the classical Capital of the Eastern Highlands, stay at, 67
 — "The lovely Lass o'," 417
 Invitation, Poetical reply to an, 334
 — Another, ib.
 — to a Masonic Anniversary, 335
 Irish song of Gramachree, 535
 Irving, Dr., his praise of "The Cotter's Saturday Night," 236

J

Jacobites, Ye, by name, Song of, 408
 James V., a poet, warrior and musician, his song of "The Gaberlunzie Man," 566
 Jamie, come try me, Song of, with variations, 379
 — comes hame, There'll never be peace till, 397
 — Gay, notice of the song of, 524
 — thou hast left me ever, 474
 — Young, pride of a' the plain, Song of, 420
 Jean, Bonnie, Burns's courtship with his, 31—original stanza in honour of, 173—Song of, 350—Songs in praise of, 399. 418. 424
 Jeannie's bosom, Song of, 418
 Jedburgh, Romantic situation of, 54—Magistrates of, present the freedom of the town to Burns, 55
 Jeffrey, Francis, Lord, his praise of "The Holy Fair," &c. 200—"The Mouse," 224—"The Cotter's Saturday Night," 236—his remarks on Burns's Correspondence, 585-8, n.
 Jeffrey, Jean, the "blue-eyed Lass" of the song, 91—notice of her family, 393
 Jenny, Fair, Song of, 478
 — McCraw, a fragment, 431
 Jessie, Young, Song of, 455
 Jessy—Here's a health to ane I lo'e dear, 512
 Jinglang Johnnie, Song of, 523
 Jockey's ta'en the parting kiss, 413
 Jockey, Young, Song of, 391
 — My dear, Song of, 524
 John Anderson, my jo, Song of, 385—additional verses, ib.—ancient version, ib.
 John Barleycorn, Ballad of, 342
 Johnnie's grey breeks, Ancient version of, 526
 John o' Badenyon', Song of, 572
 Johnson, Dr., his interview with Dr. Blacklock, 286—singular anecdote of, 330
 Johnson, James, Publisher of "The Museum," assistance rendered him, 619. 632-3—his terms, 632—letters to, 663-6. 734 and 743.
 Johnson's "Musical Museum," Contributions to, 71. 86—the Poet's preface to the second volume, 647
 Johnston of Westerhall, Sir James, 109
 Johnstone of Hilton, Miss Lucy, Song in honour of, 424
 Jolly Beggars, The, described, 26—criticisms on, 184—Poem of, 179—scene of, n. ib.
 Jolly Mortals, fill your glasses, Song of, 183
 Joyful Widower, The, Song of, 359
 Jumping John, Song of, 365
 Junius, his style, Burns a great admirer of, 42

K

K—, Lord, Anecdote of, 243
 Kate of Aberdeen, Song of, 531
 Katherine Jaffray, Song of, 354
 — Ogie, Air of, 448
 Katy, My, Canst thou leave me thus? 496
 Keith—Marischall, Noble family of, 1
 Kellyburn Braes, The earle of, Song of, 412—additional verses to, 413
 Kemble, Mrs., Lines on, 333
 Ker, a member of the Farmer's Club of Kelseo, 55—accompanies the Poet in his jaunt to England, 57
 Kenmore, Inn at, Lines written over the mantel piece, 65, 277
 Kenmore, Viscount, Song in honour of, 403—his gallantry, 404
 Kennedy, Jean, the "Kirkton Jean" of Burns, 6
 — John, his description of an interview with Burns and Jean Armour, 35—Poetical invitation to, 325.—epitaph on, 327—a farewell to, ib.—letters to, 595, 600
 — Miss of Dalgarroch, 97—affecting anecdote of, 410—letter to, 726
 Key, Jane, heiress of Edinbely, forced by Rob Roy, 582
 Keys, Black, in music, Story of, 493
 Killie, Sons of old, Song of, 353
 Killiecrankie, Battle of, Song of, 393
 Kilmarnock, Description of, 200, n.—Lodge, Masonic, reputation of, 353
 Kilmavock Castle, Wild scenery and grandeur of, 643
 Kinnoul, Lady, her conversation with James I. relative to Wallace and Bruce, 734, n.
 Kirkoswald School, Burns's residence at, 6—great fair, 8—Fair Lass of, 12
 Kirkpatrick, Rev. Mr., Reproof of his sermon against the House of Stuart, 85
 Kirk's alarm, Poem of, 187
 Kirk wad let me be, Old song of, 558
 Kiss, Verses to a, 326
 Knowledge, Diffusion of, a favourite object with Burns, 89
 Kyle, the native district of Burns, 6. 257, n.
 — Rustic damsels of, 12
 — People of, 16
 — Muse of, 28
 — Maidens of, 30

L

Laddie, lie near me, Song of, 566
 Ladyman, a traveller, his interview with the Poet, n. 328
 Lady Mary Ann, Song of, 410
 — Ancient ballad of, (Craighton's groving), 411, n.
 Lady Onlie, honest Lucky, Song of, 413—additional verses, 414
 Lady's Pocket-book, Lines written in, 334
 — tongue, Extempore lines on, 334
 Lament on a friend's amour, 331
 — The, Story of, 232
 — of Mary, Queen of Scots, 306
 — of the Ruined maid, 290
 — The Poet's, when about to leave Scotland, "My Mary's no more!" 388
 Lamington, Kirk of, Lines on, 339
 Landseer, Thomas, his explanatory notes to the "Address to the Deil," 172
 Landlady, count the lawin, Song of, 370

- Lap-dog, named "Echo," Epitaph on, 336
- Lapraik, John, a brother poet, 22, 217
- Burns's epistle to him, 24, 215—his reply, 217—his "Deil's answer," 174
- second epistle to, 218—third epistle to, 221—his song addressed to his "sweet wife," 563
- Lass o' Ballochmyle, Song of, 357—found to be a defamatory libel! 611
- o' Livingston, Song of, 525
- o' Patie's mill, Song of, 527
- that made the bed to me, Song of, 422 and 560
- Lassie wi' the lint white locks, 492
- Last May a braw wooer cam down the lang glen, Song of, 508
- Last time I came o'er the moor, Song of, 526
- Laura, Song of, by G. Turnbull, 481
- Laurie, Rev. Dr., Dr. Blacklock's letter to him respecting the Poet, 39 and 602—Prayer for his family, 251—letter to, 601
- Rev. G., Letters to and from, 608 and n.—notice of, n.
- Miss, compliment paid her, 609
- Law, Faculty of, their clients have much to digest! 654
- Lazy mist, Song of, 380
- Leader-haugs and Yarrow, The old song of, 564
- Lea-rig, Song of, 444
- Ancient version of, n.
- Leith, a delicious ride from, 605
- Lesley, Bonny, Songs in honour of, 446, 461
- Let not woman e'er complain, Song of, 489
- Lewars, Jessie, the friend of the Bard, 118, 122—Lines to, 325—verses to, 337—"The Toast," addressed to, ib.
- epitaph on, ib.—lines on her recovery, 338—song in honour of, 512
- John, his letter to James Burns, communicating the death of the Poet, 745, n.
- Lewie Gordon, Air of, 472
- Song of, 544
- Liberty, a fragment, 317
- Tree of, poem of, 292
- Life and Age of Man, The favourite ballad of, sung by the mother of Burns, 4, 28, 214, 657, the original of "Man is made to mourn"
- Lincluden Abbey, Ruins of, 104, 291—lines on a walk among, 316 and n.—Vision of Liberty, evoked among, 313
- Lindsay, Miss Isabella, the Poet's admiration of her, 54-5
- Rev. Mr., the hero of the ballad of "Maggie Lauder, 200 n.
- Lady Ann of Balcarras, her song of "Auld Robin Gray, 569
- Lines sent to a gentleman whom the Poet had offended, 320
- written in a lady's pocket-book, 334
- pinned to a Lady's coach, ib.
- on the occasion of a Naval Victory, 335
- on Folly, written on a window of the Globe tavern, 335
- Linlithgow, Old Royal Palace of, 64
- Literary Scoldings and Hints, n. 319
- Little, Janet, Letter and poetical epistle from, 680, n.
- Lochlea, farm of, leased by Burns's father, 2, 187
- Lochmond, Address to, criticism on the poem, 660
- Lochmaben, the residence of Robert Bruce, n. 295
- Lochroyan, Lass of, an old ballad, notice of, 452—two stanzas of, 453, 519
- Lockhart, J. G., his defence of the "Lass o' Ballochmyle," 38—interesting letter of Sir Walter Scott to, respecting the Poet, 45—his description of the Poet among the Literati of Edinburgh, 51—of his reconciliation with Jean Armour, 59—his remarks on Bannockburn, 64—on Lord Dundee's stone, 65, n.—on the irascible pedant Nicol, 68—on the Poet's lingering stay in Edinburgh, 70—on his accounts with Creech, 74—on his jealousy of men of high station, 77—on his letters to Mrs. Dunlop, 87—on his perambulations in Dumfriesshire, 93—his anecdotes of the Poet, 100—his remarks on the stately Toryism in Dumfries, 114—his eloquent eulogium on the Poet's works, 144—his history of "The Kirk's Alarm," 189—his remarks on "The Poet's Welcome," 241—on his general Correspondence, 586—on the Letters of Gilbert Burns with the Poet, 630—his national song of "The broad swords of Old Scotland," 772
- George, Merchant, Glasgow, Letter to, 653
- Logan Braes, Song of, 461—Mayne's version, ib.
- Logan, Major, Laird of Afton, stanza to, in "The Kirk's Alarm," 189—poetical epistle to, 263—letter to, 679
- Miss Susan, Verses to, 268
- Lorimer, Jean, "The Lass of Craighburn-wood," her levity, 97—Songs in honour of, 395, 422, 450, 485-8
- Lothian Lassie, The ballad to the tune of, 508-9
- Louner, The, the periodical work which first recommended Burns to public notice, 45, 604
- Louise, The, Poem of, 241—author's defence, 48
- Love adventure, A, 54
- Love, Illicit, 16
- is the cause of my mourning, 549
- Music, and Poetry, their connexion, 748
- Love of Airds, notice of, his song of "Mary's Dream," 532
- Loyal Natives, The true, Lines on, 337
- Luath, one of the heroes of "The Two Dogs," 257
- Luckless Fortune, Song of, 340
- Lumsdale, Harry, the hero of "Highland Harry," 376, n.

M

- M'Adam, Mr., Poetical epistle to, 252
- M'Auley, Mr., Dumbarton, Letter to, 676
- M'Creddie, John, The supposed author of "The Owl," 260
- M'Culloch, David, of Ardwell, his anecdote of Burns, 114—letter to, 733
- M'Diarmid, Mr., his record of the Poet's family, 143
- M'Gill, Rev. Dr., the thunder of the Kirk directed against him, 91, 189—his heretical book! 683
- M'Gregor of Ruara, his Lament, 371
- M'Kenzie, Dr., of Irvine, an early companion of the Poet, 22—letter to, 603
- notice of, ib. n.
- Henry, his patronage of the Poet, 41-5-6—Remarks by, 205—Juvenile compositions of, 563—his compliment to Miss Laurie, 609—letter from, to Burns, 694, n.—the Poet in raptures with his "Mirror," "Lounger," and "Man of Feeling," 694
- M'Kinlay, Rev. Mr., of Kilmarnock, the hero of "The Ordination," 202
- M'Lehose, Mrs. (Clarinda), Lines to, 71
- M'Leod, Miss Isabella, of Rasay, Song of, 371
- M'Leod, John, Esq., Verses on the death of, 267
- M'Math, Rev. John, epistle to, 21--222-3
- M'Millan's "Peggy," Song of, 344, n.
- M'Murdo, Jean, the heroine of the song, "Bonnie Jean," 107
- John, his taste in appreciating the merits of the Poet, 92—verses to, 287—letters to, 677, 696, 728
- Mrs., Drumlanrig, Letter to, 674
- Phillis, another of the Poet's heroines, Song in honour of, 460
- M'Neil, Hector, his fine ballad of "Donald and Flora," 569
- M'Pherson, his translation of Homer's famous "Cestus of Venus," 707, n.
- M'Pherson's Farewell, Song of, 361-2
- Lament, 362—the original song, ib.—notice of, 362, n. 363
- M'Whinnie, Mr., Ayr, Letter to, 595
- Maggie by the banks of Nith, 295
- Lauder, Inquiry respecting, 533
- My, Ancient song of, 532
- Maid, The ruined, her lament, 290
- The, that tends the goats, Song, 372
- Maille, Poor, Death and dying words of, 166
- Elegy of, 167
- Maine, John, author of the "Siller Gun," notice of, 661
- Maimed soldier and his doxy, characters of, in "The Jolly Beggars," 27
- Malcolm, Sir John, Old song of, n. 300
- Man, naturally a kind, benevolent animal, 653
- Man was made to mourn, Poem of, 213—origin of, 214
- Mar, Earl of, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 580
- Maric, The Queen's, Ballad of, 689
- Mark yonder pomp of costly fashion, Song of, 504
- Marquis, The, Epitaph on a person nick-named, 335
- Marriage, On, variance of the Kirk of Scotland, with the civil law, n. 666
- Martin, John, the distinguished painter, 560, n.
- Mary, Song addressed to, 437
- Mary Campbell, Burns's "Highland Mary," notice of, 30, 388, 447
- Mary, Queen of Scots, the room where she was born, 64—Drama of, 289—Lament of, 306
- Mary in Heaven, Lyric of, 92, 388
- Prayer for, 356
- Mary's dream, Lowe's beautiful song of, 533
- Mashlum bannocks, description of, n. 227
- Masonic Anniversary, Invitation to, 335
- Masterlon, Allan, his air of "Strathallan's Lament," 72—a steadfast friend of the Poet, 377
- Ann, the heroine of "Bonnie Ann," 377
- Mauchline, Description of, 195
- Ale and maidens, 27
- Belles, Songs of, 31, 351
- Club, notice of, 18
- Inn-keeper, anecdote of, n. 195
- Jean, Burns's, 28
- Lady, Song of, 344
- Maxwell, Dr., his death-bed scene with the Poet, 125
- Lady Winifred, her present of a valuable snuff-box, 99
- of Terraught, Verses on his birth-day, 313—notice of, n. ib.—his testimony of Burns, 133
- Provost, Lochmaben, Letter to, 685
- Sir David, of Cardoness, Epitaph on, 336

- Maxwells, The noble, Song of, 405
 Maybole youth, Burns's early friend, 6
 —anecdote of, 8—his farewell of the Poet, 9—his friendship slighted, ib. n.
 May eve, or Kate of Aberdeen, Song of, 530
 Mayne, John, his poem of Halloween, 212—his song of "Logan Braes," 461—notice of, 661, n.
 Meg o' the Mill, Song of, 436—second version, 457
 Melville, Lord, his neglect of Burns, n. 66. 741
 Menie, Song of, 354
 Mercer, Andrew, his Ode to the memory of the Poet, 161
 Merry Andrew, character of, in "The Jolly Beggars," 27
 Michie, Willie, Epitaph on, 331
 Mickle, William Julius, Notice of, 533—his memorable ballad, ib.
 Miller, Captain, of Dalswinton, Letter to, 477
 —James, Edinburgh, his air of the "Banks o' Doon," 409
 —Janet, Song in honour of, 482
 —Mrs., Anecdote of, 657
 —of Dalswinton, his reception of the Bard, 58. 82. 604—his agreement with him, 80—letter to, 723—his grief on the death of the Poet, n. ib.
 —Peter, jun., of Dalswinton, Letter to, 735—his sympathy for the Poet, n. ib.
 —Rev. Mr., of Kilmaurs, notice of, n. 197
 —The Dusty, Song of, 367
 Mill-hole-brae, Dumfries, the residence of the Poet, 118
 Mill, mill, O, The, Song of, 552
 Mirk night o' December, Song of, 425
 Mitchell, Collector of Excise, Poem addressed to, 324—letter to Mitchell, Dr. Andrew, Monkton, one of the heroes of "The Kirk's Alarm," Character of, n. 188
 Moffat, Inn at, Lines written there, 332
 Monboddio, Lord, his splendid suppers, notice of, 309, n.
 Monkland Friendly Society, order for books, 674—notice of, ib. n.
 Monody on a lady famed for her caprice, 314
 Montagu, Mrs. Basil, her interview with Burns, 135
 Montgomery, Captain, of Coilsfield, notice of, n. 266—his affair of crim. con., 611
 —Colonel Hugh, Earl of Eglinton, notice of, 296
 —James, his Verses to the memory of Burns, 158
 Montgomery's Peggy, Songs in honour of, 343-5-9. 352
 Montrose, finely situated, handsome town of, Visit to, 68
 —Duke of, the Laird o' Graham, stanza in allusion to, 227
 Moodic, Rev. Mr., of Riccarton, one of the heroes of "The Twa Herds," 191—and "Holy Fair," 196
 Moore, Dr., Letters to and from, 607. 609 and n. 615. 622 (autobiography) 667. 672 and n. 695. 704 and n.—biographical notice of, 607-8, n.
 —Edward, his Song of "Happy marriage," 527
 Moore, Sir John, The heroic, glimpse of the household in which he was born, 609-10 n.
 More, Hannah, Lines on presenting a lady with a work of, 325
 Morehead, or Muirhead, Rev. James, of Urr, his Song of "Bess the Gawkie," 519
 Morison, Mary, Song in honour of, 30. 453
 Morison, the Mauchline Cabinet-maker, Letter to, 659
 Morton, Miss, one of "The Mauchline Belles," her frankness, 31
 Mossiel, Burns's farm of, near Mauchline, 11. 194. 205, n.
 —its situation described, 17. 32
 —The Poet's return to, 58
 Mother's, A Lament, for the death of her son, 280
 Motherwell, his remark on an assertion of the Poet, 519, n.
 Mount Oliphant, farm of, leased by William Burns, 2
 Mountain daisy, The Poem of—how composed, 27—stanzas to, 239
 Mouse, The, poem of, 223—how composed, 27
 Muir, Robert, Kilmarnock, Letters to, 595. 600-2-4. 628. 646—notice of, 595. n. 604, n.
 Murdoch, John, Burns's Preceptor, 3—his excellent instructions, ib.—his description of the Poet and his brother Gilbert, 9—notice of, 589, n.—letters to and from, 589. 695-6, n.
 —Rev. Mr., of MacLennan, specimen of a Song by, 553
 Murray, Euphemia, of Montrose, Song in honour of, 372
 Murray, the gallant Sir George, Anecdote of, 559
 Murray, Sir William, of Ochtertyre, Visit to, 276, n.
 Musical Museum, contributions to, 71
 Musing on the roaring ocean, Song of, 372
 Muthie, its famous caverns, and wild romantic coast, 68
 Mylne, poor, poems of, Burns's advice regarding their publication, 671
 My ain kind dearie, O, 444—Ferguson's song of, 536
 —bonnie Laddie's lang o' growin', ancient Ballad of, 411, n.
 —bonnie Mary, Song of, 379
 —Chloris, mark how green the groves, Song of, 491
 —Collier Laddie, 404—ancient version, n. ib.
 —dearie, if thou die, Song of, 543
 —Father was a farmer, Song of, 341
 —handsome Nell, Song of, 339—The Poet's criticism on, 340
 —Harry was a gallant gay, 375
 —heart was ance as blythe and free, Song of, 346
 —heart's in the Highlands, 384—ancient Song of, ib. n.
 —Highland Lassie, Song of, 344
 —Hoggie, 365—anecdote of, ib.
 —Jean, Ramsay's Song of, 350
 —jo, Janet, Song of, 549
 —lady's gown, there's gairs upon it, Song of, 429
 —love she's but a lassie yet, Song of, with variations, 379
 —Nannie, Song of, 347—ancient version, n. ib.
 —Sodger Laddie, ancient Song of, 576
 —Tocher's the jewel, Song of, 396—remarks on the tune, 576
 —Wife's a winsome wee thing, 445—stanza by Thomson, 448
- N
- Nancy, Luckie, Allan Ramsay's Song of, 580
 —My lovely, Song of, 480
 —My spouse, Song of, 481
 Nancy's Ghost, Song of, 562
 Nannie, a farmer's daughter, one of "The Maidens of Kyle," 30
 —Song in honour of, 399
 —O my, Song of, 347
 Nannie's awa', My, Song of, 499
 Nasmyth's picture of Burns, 45. 610, n.
 National Songs, Heroic, of the Poet, 118. 411. 414. 434. 436. 456. 471
 Nature's Law, Poem of, 252
 Naval Victory, Lines on the occasion of a national thanksgiving for, 385
 Neilson, Mrs., Burns's "Fair Fielette," Peggy Thomson, his passion for, 8
 Nell, My handsome, Song of, 339
 Niven, Blooming, Song of, 378
 New and Old Light Factions, description of, 19
 Newcastle, Burns's dinner in, 57
 Newspaper, Lines to one who had sent a, 299
 New-year's-day, a Sketch, 289
 Nicol, Rev. T., Inverleithing, his song of "Muckin' o' Geordie's byre," 546
 —William, the obstinate son of Latin prose, Anathemas against him, 631
 —William, Master of the High School, Edinburgh, his intimacy with Burns, 44. 52. 62—his Highland Tour with him, 64—his foaming passion at the apparent neglect of Burns, 67—Burns's irony towards him, 116—song in honour of his house-heating, 92. 392—letters to, 617-8. 620. 690. 714
 Neil, Tom, of facetious fame, notice of, 661
 Nightingale, The singing of, 458—song of, 481
 Nith, Banks of, Laddies by, 297—song of, 393
 —Loved, To thee, Song of, 427
 —winding, Adown, 468
 Nithsdale, Burns's appearance in, 79
 —Farmer, condition of, 94
 Nithsdale's welcome home, 405
 Nithside Beauties, Burns's, 107
 Niven, John, the young bedfellow of the Poet at Ballochnie, 7
 Nollekins, the Sculptor, Anecdote of, n. 492
 Northern Lass, Ancient Song of, 350
 Northumberland Maxim, touching the hungry Scotch! 57
 Now Spring has clad the grove in green, 506
- O
- Oatmeal, the staple of a poor Scotsman's life, 588, n.
 Ochtertyre, Hills of, a wild scene among, 276
 O'er the hills and far away, Song of, 397
 O'er the water to Charlie, Song of, 373
 O'er 't the airts the wind can blow, Song of, 381
 Old and New Light Factions, description of, 19
 On a bank of flowers, Song of, 378
 O'Neil, Shelah, Song of, 367
 On the seas and far awa', Song of, 484
 Ordination, The, described, 20—poem of, 200
 Ossian, The Poet an admirer of, 458
 Oswald, Mrs., of Auchencruive, Ode to her memory, 283—notice of, 672
 —Mrs. junr., Song in honour of, 424—notice of, 425
 —the Music Composer, notice of, 519, n.
 Out over the Forth, Song of, 420
 Owl, The, Address to, 260
- SONGS.
- O aye, my wife she dang me, 432—ancient version, n. ib.
 O bonny was yon rosy brier, 507
 O can ye labour lea, young man, 382
 O condescend, dear, charming maid, by Gavin Turnbull, 480

O'er the moor amang the heather, 578
 O for ane-and-twenty, Tam, 403
 O gie my love brose, brose, 387
 O, gin my love were yon red rose, 462
 O, guid ale comes, and guid ale goes, 381
 Oh, ono chrio ! 545
 O, Kenmure's on and awa', Willie, 403
 O. Lady Mary Ann, 410—ancient ballad of (Craighton's growing), 411
 O lay thy loof in mine, lass, 434
 O let me in this ae night, 501—ancient version, ib.
 O, lovely Polly Stewart ! 425
 O luve will venture in, 406—ancient version, n. ib.
 O May, thy morn was ne'er so sweet, 425
 O, Mally's meek, Mally's sweet, 439
 O merry hae I been teething a heckle, 387
 O, my luve's like a red, red rose, 418—ancient version, n. ib.
 O mount and go, mount and make you ready, 381
 O Philly, happy be that day, 495
 O poorth cauld, and restless love, 450
 O saw ye my dear, my Phely ? 489, 432
 O steer her up, and haud her gaun, 432
 O tell na me o' wind and rain, 501
 O this is no my ain lassie, 506
 ——— house, 566
 O Tibbie, I hae seen the day, 341
 O that I had ne'er been married, 345
 O wat ye what my Minnie did, 430
 O were I on Parnassus' hill ! 383
 O were my love yon liair fair, ib.
 O wert thou in the cauld blast, 433
 O wha is she that loses me, ib.
 O where wad bonnie Annie lie ? 577
 O whistle and I'll come to you, my lad, 260—second version, of, 468
 O why the deuce should I repine ? 348
 O Willie brew'd a peck o' maut, 391
 —sequel to do. n. ib.

P

Pannure, Lord, his kindness to the Poet's Widow, 127
 Park, Andrew, his song for the anniversary of the Poet, 771
 Parker, Hugh, Poetical epistle to, 282
 —William, Kilmarnock, his subscription for Burns's Poems, 35
 Parson's looks, The, Epigram on, 334
 Pastoral verse, Examples of, 496
 Paternoster Row Booksellers, Anecdote of, 690, n.
 Patison, Bookseller, Paisley, Letter to, 617
 Paton, Elizabeth, the mother of "Sonnie, smirking, dear-bought Bess," 34, 243, n.
 Peace and Plenty, the deities which the Poet adored, 335
 Peebles, Dr. William, the "Poet Willie" of "The Kirk's Alarm," his centenary sermon, n. 187-8, 197
 Peep, Johnny, Lines by the Poet in the character of, 331
 Peg-a-Ramsay, Bonny, Song of, 439
 Peg, Bonnie, Song of, 367
 Peg Nicholson, a good bay mare, elegy on, 295—death of, 690
 Peggy, M'Millan's, Song of, n. 34
 Peggy, My, Saw ye nae, ancient song of, 522
 Peggy, the sister of a Carrick farmer, and one of the "Maidens of Kyle," 30
 —Montgomery's, Songs in honour of, 343-5-9, 352
 Peggy's face, My, Song of, 428
 Percy, Dr., his song, "Fairest of the fair," the most beautiful ballad in the English language, 520

Perry, of the Morning Chronicle, his sympathy for the Poet, 735 and n.—letter to, and notice of, 738 and n.
 Peyster, De, Colonel, Poem on Life, addressed to, 325
 Phillis the fair, Song of, 466
 Phillips, Ambrose, his translation from Sappho, 534
 Pigny-scraper, The, described, 27, 183
 Pindar, Peter, his very name an acquisition to Thomson's Melodies, 452
 Pinkerton, John, consigned to damnation by Ritson, 487, 569, n.
 Pitt Administration, their neglect of Burns, 131
 —Right Hon. William, n. 227—Address of the Scotch distillers to, 740
 Player's Benefit, a, Letter to a lady in favour of, 729
 Pleasure, a wanton Trout, 335
 Pleyel, the composer, his engagement with Thomson, 442-3—his symphonies, &c., 455, 460
 Poughman, Up wi' the, Song of, 369—ancient version, 370
 —The merry, Lines on, 405
 Poetry, Pastoral, Poem on, 316
 Poet's, The, Welcome to his illegitimate child, 243
 Poets, Lives of the, a rueful narrative, 727
 Poland, the tack of, by whom held, 290 n.
 Polwart on the Green, notice and song of, 548
 Poor and honest sodger, The, song of, 457
 Poor man's porridge, 225
 Poosie Nansie's Club, the scene of "The Jolly Beggars," 27—Chambers's description of, 179, n.
 Pope, Alexander, his translation of Homer's "Cestus of Venus," 707, n.
 Posie, The, Song of, 406—original version, n. 407
 Posthumous Child, a, On the birth of, 249
 Poverty, Eloquent apostrophe to, 701
 —Visions of, 99, 637
 —The creed of, 334
 Prayer, A, for Mary, 356
 —left at Dr. Lawrie's, in the room where the Author slept, 251
 —and Stanzas on the prospect of death, 238
 —under the pressure of violent anguish, 238
 Presbyterian place of worship, poor pipping business ! 64
 —Kirk, Old Light version of, 215
 Pringle, Lueky, the landlady of a tavern in Edinburgh, frequented by Burns and Nicol, 44
 Prudence, I, dwell with Wisdom, 46, 611
 Psalm, the first six verses of the First, 236—ancient version, ib.
 —Nineteenth, 237—ancient version, ib.
 Publishing Poetry, Burns's experience in, 671
 Purdie, Andrew, a relation of Jean Armour, 33

Q

Queen Charlotte, Poetica. compliment to, 255
 —Mary, her four attendants, 689, n.
 Queensberry, Duke of, On the destruction of Drumlanrig woods, the domain of, 290—stanzas on, 291—bitter allusion to, 684, and n.

R

Rab the Ranter, Name of, why adopted by the Poet, 222
 Rabina, Fair, the original of "Fair Eliza," 408
 Rake-helly dogs, Advice to young, unmarried, 677
 Ramsay, Allan, the model of Burns, 45—his song of "Fair Celia," 378—his spirited imitation of the "Socrates" of Horace, 524—his "Lass of Livingston," 525—his song of "The last time I came o'er the moor," 526—his "Lass of Patie's Mill," 527—"O my bonnie Highland Lad," 529—his "Tea-table Miscellany," 531—Collier's "Bonny Lassie," 536—Mary Scott, "The Flower of Yarrow," 537—"Wauking o' the fauld," 545—his "Corn rigs are bonnie," 546—"Polwart on the Green," 548—"My Jo, Janet," 549—"Lucky Nansy," one of the happiest of all his songs, 580—"Bob o' Dumblane," modernized by, ib.
 Ramsay, David, of the "Edinburgh Courant," his bedaubing paragraphs, 654
 —of Oehtertyre, Burns's visit to, 61—adventure with, 96
 Rankine, John, one of the Poet's early companions, 22—epistle to, 242—anecdote of, n. ib.—his odd Dream, 243—verses to, ib.—Farewell lines to, 337
 Rantin' dog, the daddie o't, Song of, 345
 Rattlin', roarin', Willie, Song of, 374—ancient version, ib.
 Raving winds around her blowing, Song of, 371—the original melody of, ib.
 Recruiting Sergeant, an, anecdote of, 682
 Remorse, the most painful sentiment that can embitter the human bosom, 748
 —a Fragment, 256
 Revelations, reading of three verses of chap. vii., Noble enthusiasm inspired by, 588
 Richardson, Gabriel, Epitaph on, 336
 —Mrs. G. G., Lines to the memory of Burns, 161
 Riches, encumbered with care, Song of, 555
 Richmond, John, a Writer's apprentice, with whom the Poet shared his bed, 40—his recollections of him, 44—notice of, n. 594—letters to, 594-9, 621, 665
 Riddel, Capt., of Friar's Carse, his epitaph, 118—his description of the Poet, 130—lines written in his hermitage, 279, 280—verses to, on returning a newspaper, 280—his contest for "The Whistle," 308—sonnet on his death, 317—notice of, ib.—his hospitable table, lines sent to a gentleman whom the Poet had offended at, 320—Song in honour of his marriage, 378—letters to and from, 681-2-5, n. 748
 —Maria, of Woodleigh Park, satirized by Burns, 117—her affecting character with the Poet, 123—her character of the Poet, 127—Monday on, 314—her inscription for a hermitage, ib.—her verses on the fate of the Poet, ib.—her beautiful song, "To thee, lov'd Nith," 736, n.—Æsopus to, 315—notice of, ib.—Improptu on her birth-day, 317—her song of "Stay my Willie," 498—Song in honour of, 501—her introduction to Smellie, 713—letters to and from, 729, 730-1, 742-3, n.
 Rigidly Righteous, The, Address to, 16, 228

Rigs o' Barley, Song of, 343
 Ritson, his Collection of Scottish Songs, 487—his remarks on the air, "Hey, tuttie, tattie," 555—his bantam-cock courage, 569, n.
 Robertson, Captain, of Lude, supposed letter to, 729
 — the historian, his opinion of the Poet, 190
 Robin, lively chant, called, 17. 350
 — Gray, Auld, Song of, 569
 — shure in hairst, Song of, 348
 Rob Roy, Song and notice of, 582
 Rodger, Hugh, the parish schoolmaster of Kirkoswald, notice of, 6—his bigotry, 7—anecdote of, ib.
 Rodney's Victory, in 1782, Toast in honour of, 334
 Ronald, Lord, my son, Stray verse in the ballad of, 578
 Roscoe, William, his ode on the death of Burns, 156
 Rose, Mrs., of Kilravock, visit to, 67—letters to and from, 643
 Rosebud, A, by my early walk, Song of, 373
 — To the, Song of, by one Johnson, a joiner of Belfast, 578
 Roslin Castle, Songs of, 520-1
 — Landlady at, Verses to, 332
 Ross, Alexander, of Lochlea, notice of, by the authoress of "Roy's wife of Aldivalloch," 570—his song of The Bridal o', 571
 — the Poet, his "Scota," the fore-runner of "Coila," 290
 Rothemurche's ruin, beautiful air of, 486
 Roxburgh Castle, Ruins of, visit to, 54
 Ruin, Ode to, 237—when composed, 236
 Ruisseaux, Robert, Elegy on his death, 247
 Rushton, Edward, his Ode to the memory of the Poet, 162
 Russell, Rev. Mr., of Kilmarnock, one of the heroes of the "Twa Herds," 190-1-3, n.—notice of, ib.

S

Sae far awa', Song of, 423
 Sae merry as we twa hae been, Song of, 541
 Samson, Tam, his elegy and epitaph, 230—notice of, 231
 Sanguhar, noted for carpets and hose, n. 296
 Satan, Milton's, his desperate daring, 619
 Saw ye Johnnie coming in? quo' she, Song of, 521
 Scotch Bard, a, Verses on, 244
 — drink, described, 266—Poem of, 224
 Scotch metaphysicians, their doctrines, 703, n.
 —, The, Sarcastic verses against, 396
 Scotland, described, on her mountain throne, 51—drunkenness in, ib.
 — The Tears of, Smollet's song of, 551—disadvantages of the Union with, 412, n.
 Scotsmen, The, dying on a battle field, their Song of Death, 414
 SCOTS WHA HAE WI' WALLACE BLEED, Notice of, 103—Ode of, 471—improved version, 476
 Scott, Mary, the flower of Yarrow, Song and notice of, 537—Traditionary set of, n. ib.
 — Miss Jane, of Ecclefechan, Lines on, 329—notice of, ib. n.
 — Mrs., of Wauchope, notice of, 37. 55—poetical epistles to and from, 272-3
 Scott, Sir Walter, his recollections of Burns, 45—his remark on Bannockburn, 97—his account of the old Beggar, 168, n.—his criticism of The Jolly Beggars, 184—his lines on Edinburgh, 262—his opinion of Tam o' Shanter, 304—his account of Macpherson, 362—his remarks on the Union, n. 412—his notice of Mary Lillias Scott, 531, n. 537—his correction of Burns, 548—"The dowie dens of Yarrow," escaped his notice, 582—his remarks on Burns's Correspondence, 585—on Burns's Scotch letter to Nicol, n. 618

 Scott, Sir William, author of "The blythesome bridal," 539
 Scottish airs, Origin of, difficult to trace, 493
 — Distillers, complaints of, 228
 — Lordlings, conceited dignity of, 114
 — Muses, all Jacobites, 523
 — Nobles, their neglect of Burns, 83
 — Peasantry, Condition of, 424
 — Representatives, The, 26—earnest cry and prayer to, 226
 — Songs, Old, their irregularity, 751
 Scroggum, Ancient song of, improved, 359
 Selkirk, Lord, Burns's visit to, 109—Grace, The, 336
 Semphill, Francis, of Belltrees, notice of his song, 543
 Sensibility, Verses on, 319
 Shanter, the farm of Douglas Graham, whose character is delineated in "Tam o' Shanter," 301, n.
 Sharpe, Charles, of Hoddam, Letter to, 687—notice of the family, 687, n.
 Shaw, David, of Coylton, described, n. 191
 — Dr. Andrew, of Craigie, described, n. 191
 — Sir James, his kindness to the family of the Bard, 127
 Shelah O' Niel, Song of, 367
 Shenstone, the Poet, his cure for ennui, 659—his observation on love verses, 749
 Shepherd, John, Muirkirk, n. 189
 Shepherd's, The Poor, mournful fate, Song of, 552
 — preference, Song of, 571
 Sheriff-muir, Battle of, 390—ancient version of, n. ib.
 She rose and let me in, Song of, 543
 She says she lo'es me best of a', Song of, 485
 She's fair and fause, Song of, 417
 Sic a wife as Willie had, Song of, 410
 Sidmouth, Viscount, his Verses in honour of Burns, 68—his kindness to the Poet's eldest son, 127
 Sillar, David, one of the Poet's early companions, 22—his sketch of the Poet, ib.—Burns's epistle to him, 168—his reply, 170—Burns's second epistle, 171—his visit to Mrs. Stewart of Stair, with the Poet, ib.—his reply to "The Calf," 202
 Simplicity confounded with vulgarity, 443
 Simpson, William, Ochiltree, Epistle to, 219—notice of, 221
 Sinclair, Sir John, Letter to, 686—letter of Robert Riddell, Esq., to, respecting the Poet, 686, n.
 Skinner, Rev. John, of Linshart, his song of "Tune your fiddles," 562—"John o' Badenyon," 572—"Tullochgorum," 573—"Ewie wi' the crooked horn," 574—letters to and from, 682-3, n. 642—his poetical compliment, 769
 Skirving, a farmer near Haddington, anecdote of, 548—his song of "Tranent muir," ib.

Sleep'st thou, or wak'st thou, fairest creature? Song of, 490
 Sloan, Thomas, Letters to and from, 306, n. 709
 Smellie, William, Printer, Lines on, 329—letter to, and notice of, 713, and n.
 Smiling Spring comes in rejoicing, Song of, 415
 Smith, Charlotte, Sonnet to the shade of Burns, 163—notice of her sonnets, 695 and n.
 — James, one of the Poet's early friends, 22—notice of epistle to, 24—his scene with Burns, at Poesie Nannie's, 27—poetical epistle to, 203—epitaph on, 328—notice of, 594 and n.
 — letters to, 599. 618. 649
 — Rev. George, Galston, the hero of Irvine-side, 189 and n. 197
 Smollet, Tobias, his pathetic song of the "Tears of Scotland," 551—his ode to independence, 697
 Sodger, I'll go and be a, Song of, 348
 — The poor and honest, Song of, 456
 Soldier Laddie, The, song of, 181
 — The maimed, described, 27. 180
 Soldiers, Burns's dislike of, 115
 Soldier's joy, The, song of, 189
 Somebody, For the sake of, Song of, 422
 Somerville, Dr., sadly addicted to punning, 54—notice of his family, 55
 — Honest John, modest anecdotes given to him, 664
 Song of Death, Heroic, 101. 414
 Sons of Old Killie, Song of, 353
 Sothëby, his translation of Homer's famous "Cestus of Venus," 707
 Soul's immortality, the Poet's belief in, 666
 Southland, Jennie, Specimen of the song of, 576
 Staig, Jessie, Song in honour of, 455
 Star, London, Letters to the editor, 287. 661—Lines to, 338
 Stay, my Charmer, Song of, 364
 — Willie, yet believe me, Mrs. Riddell's song of, 498
 Stenhouse, William, his correction of Burns, n. 543
 Steven, Rev. James, hero of "The Calf," poem addressed to, 202
 Stewart, Dugald, Professor, his patronage of Burns, 37—his description of his manners, character, and conduct, 41—described in "The Vision," 206, n. 656—letters to, 650. 668—his letter to Alison on the association of ideas, 703, n.
 — of Stair and Afton, Mrs., Burns's first and kindest patroness, 13. 37. 171. 602, n.—a mother's lament for, 280 and n.—songs in honour of, 415. 425—letters to, 602
 — Anna, of Afton, conversation with, 13
 — Willie, Welcome to, 134
 Stirling Castle, Lines on viewing, 59. 330—the reproof on ditto, n. ib.
 St. John, The Divine Apostle, persecution of, 604
 Stobie, a young expectant in the Excise, his kindness to the Poet, 122
 Stock and horn, description of, 497—dissertation on, by Dr. Leyden, n. ib.
 Strange, Sir Robert, Adventure of, 470
 Strathallan, Viscount, his lament, 72. 364
 Strathmore, The flower of, Song in honour of, 372
 Strehphon and Lydia, Mr. Wallace's, Song of, 549
 Struthers, Rev. J., his sequel to "Willie brew'd a peck o' maut," 391, n.
 Stuart, House of, compared, 409
 — Eulogium on the,

Such a parcel of Rogues in a nation,
Song of, 411
Suicide, Epitaph on a, 337
Sunday Afternoons, those precious breathing-times of the working people, 29
Sutherland, the manager of the Dumfries Theatre, Two Prologues spoken by, 287-8—letter to, 288—notice of,
691
Sweetest Mary, Song of, 348
Sweetheart, An old, verses to, 267
Syne, John, of Ryedale, his Galloway legend, 108—his excursion with the Poet, ib.—his story of the sword-cane, 116—lines on refusing to dine with him; 333—ditto with a present of porter, ib.—inscription on a Goblet, ib.—letter to, 731—and notice of, n.
Symon, Auld Sir, Song of, 181

T

Taylor, A, Poetical Epistles to and from,
253
— The, fell through the bed, thimbles an' a', Song of, 376—ancient version of, n. ib.
Tailors, Corporation of, air played by,
376
Tait, Crawford, Esq., Edinburgh, Letter
to, 698
Tait, James, of Glenconner, epistle to,
248—his visit to Dalswinton with the Poet, 645, n. 646
Take your auld cloak about ye, Song of,
556
Tam Glen, Song of, 394
Tam o' Shanter, noble tale of, 94, 300
Traditions of, 95, 305, 715—original
of, n. 301
Tam Samson's Elegy, 230—his epitaph, ib.
Tam the Chapman, Epitaph on, 327
Tarbolton Club, first meeting of, 17—rules and regulations of, 145
— Lodge, fame of, 353—farewell to the brethren, 354
Tarry wu, modern version of, 535
Taylor, Dr., of Norwich, alluded to in the "Epistle to Goudie," 215
— John, of Wanlockhead, verses
to, 306
Taymouth, described in rhyme, 65, 277
Tears, The, I slied must ever fall, Miss
Cranston's song of, 579
Telford, Thomas, his epistle to Burns,
154
Tennant, John, of Ayr, his recollections of the Poet, 665, n.
Tennant of Glenconner, his assistance to the Poet in the choice of a farm, 80—letters to, 665—notice of, n. ib.
Terraughty, Laird of, Maxwell's veteran chief, 117
Terreagle's house, description of, 405
Thaniel Menzie's "Bonny Mary," 72,
368—old version, ib.
There'll never be peace till Jamie's come hame, Song of, 697
There's a youth in this city, Song of,
384
There's nae luck about the house, Song
of, 534
There was a bonnie lass, a sketch, 439
Thomson, George, Autobiographical
notice of, 440—his letters to Burns, 442-513—his taste disputed, 478—pecuniary circumstances of his connexion with the Poet, 514—Burns's engagement with, 103, 442—the Poet's dying request to him, 124, 513
— Peggy, Burns's "Fair flette" of Kirkoswald, 8, 344, n.—Song in honour of, 343
— the Poet, Burns almost inspired sitting in his arm-chair, 54—

address to his shade, 310—coronation of his lust, 708-9, n.—his Dramas, favourite quotations from, 720—his remarks—his glorious enthusiasm, 773
Thou art gane awa', specimen of a modernized version of the song, 579
Thrush, Sonnet on hearing a, 316
Tibbie, one of the "Maidens of Kyle," 30
— I hae seen the day, Song of, 341
— Dunbar, sweet, Song of, 375—
additional verses to, ib.
Tinker, The sturdy, described, 27, 182
Tinnock, Auld, Nanse, Anecdotes of, 227—howf of, ib. n.—her arm-chair,
in which the Poet sat, 640
Tither morn, The, Song of, 401
Toast, The, in honour of Rodney's victory, 33.
To daunton me, Song of, 373—ancient Jacobite Song of, ib.
Todden hame, the first bottle song ever composed, 571
Tooth-ache, Address to the, 117, 283
Tootie, Master, alias Laird M'Gaun, an auld sneek-drawer, 251
Tories, Burns's feelings towards, 109,
297, n.
Torism, Stately, in Dumfries, 114
Tragic Fragment, 318
Tranent-muir, Song of, two stanzas,
548
Traquhair, Bush aboon, Song of, 641
Tree of Liberty, The, Poem of, 292
Troggin, troggery, or hawk's ware,
323 and n.
Tullochroon, the first of songs, 573
Tulzie, Holy, The, Poem of, 190
Turnbull, Gavin, Songs by, 480-1
Turner, Andrew, Epigram on, 331
Turnimspike, excellent song of, 528
Two dogs, The, Poem of, 257
Two herds, The, Poem of, 190
"Twa na her bonnie e'e was my ruin,
Song of, 504
Tweedside, The original Song of, 531
— Crawford's beautiful Ballad
of, 532
Tweed, The banks of, Song of, 520
Tytler, A. F., Esq., his criticism on "Tam o' Shanter," 303, n. 702, n.— letters to and from, 702 and n. 710, n.
—on the "Whistle," and "The Lament for Glencairn," 710, n.
— Balloon, Notice of, 539 and n.
—his song of "The bonnie Brucklet
Lassie," 540—"The Young man's dream," 551
— William, Esq., of Woodhouse-
lee, Poetical Address to, 278—notice of his family, ib. n.—of his anecdotes, 451-2

U

Unco guid, The, Address to, 228
Up and waur them a', Jamie, an Election ballad, 297
Up an' waur them a', Willie, starting verse of the song, 561
Up in the morning early, Song of, 365 —additional verses to, ib.—ancient
song of, 366
Up wi' the carles o' Dysart, Song of,
416

V

Vedder, David, his stanzas for the anniversary of the Poet, 163
Venus, The famous Cestus of, charm of, 707—Homer's description of,—
Translations by Pope, M'Pherson,
Cowper, and Sotheby, 707, n.
Vision of Liberty at Lincluden, magnificent lyric of, 104, 313

Vision of Mirza, The, in "The Spectator," glorious passage in, 666
— The, described, 28—noble
Poem of, 205
Vowels, The, a Tale, 318—characteristic note to, 319
Vulgarity and coarseness confounded with simplicity, 443

W

Wabster's grace, The, 753
Wae is my heart, Song of, 428
Walker, Professor, his sketch of the Poet, 22—his powers in conversation,
43—his anecdotes of the Poet, 50,
250—his entertainment at Atholehouse for Nicol, 65—picture of his two days' visit in November, 1795,
120—critique on the Poet's Correspondence, 586—letters to, and notice
of, 629
— Rev. Robert, Burns's preference for his preaching, 50
— Thomas, Ochiltree, a Tailor,
Epistles to and from, 253
Wallace, Laird of Craigie, "the Chief on Sark," n. 206
— Adam, of Richardton, notice
of, 206, n.
— Sir James Maxwell, notice of,
416, n.
— Sir Thomas, father of Mrs.
Dunlop, notice of, 37
— Robert, of Kelly, the representative of the family of Sir William, 476-7
— Sir William, The History of, one of the first books the Poet took most delight in, 3—his country's saviour, 206—his glorious actions,
220, 476, n.—lines on, 317—his stature,
734, n.—anecdotes of his strength, ib.
— William, of Cairn-hill, his song of "Strephon and Lydia," 549
Waly, waly, up yon bank, Song of, 553
Wandering Willie, Song of, 454
War, hatred of, Lines on the Poet's, 335
Ware-house, The original Song of,
444, n.
Warton, Thomas, his birth-day Ode,
254, n.
Wat, Epitaph on, 332
Waterfowl, Lines on scaring some, in Loch-Turrit, 276
Wauchope-house, The gudewife of,
poetical epistles to and from, 272
Waiking o' the fauld, Ramsay's Song
of, 545
Waukrife minnie, a song attributed to Burns, 573
Weary pund o' tow, The, Song of, 402
—ancient version, n. ib.
Weavers, To the, gin ye go, Song of,
346—their march, 416
Weaver gallant, Song of, 416
Wee Willie Gray, Song of, 381
Were na my heart light, I wad die,
Lady Grisel Baillie's pathetic ballad,
550
Wha is that at my bower door? Song
of, 399
What can a young lassie do wi' an auld man? Song of, 400—ancient version,
ib. n.
When I upon thy bosom lean, Song by Lapraik, 563
Whigs, Burns's feelings towards, 109,
297, n.
Whistle and I'll come to you, my lad,
Song of, 360
Whistle o'er the lave o't, Songs of, 182,
382
Whistle, The, Poem of, 307—the story
of, 96, 308

- Whiteford, Maria, Song in honour of, 387
 — Sir John, Bart., Lines to, 310—letter from, ib. n.—letter to, 637
 Why, why tell thy lover, Song in honour of Chloris, 510
 Widower, The joyful, Song of, 359
 Wife of Whittlecockpen, Specimen of the song, 414
 Williams, Helen Maria, features in her poetry, 609—letters to and from, 638, n. 678-9, n.
 Williamson, Rev. David, his singular amour with the daughter of Lady Cherrytrees, 579
 — the actor, the hero of the epistle of Zesopus to Maria, 315
 William IV., Young Royal Tarry breeks, 255
 Willie brew'd a peck o' maut, Song of, 391—interesting sequel to, n. ib.
 Willie's Mill, the scene of "Death and Doctor Hornbook," 26
 Wilson, Jenny, the old woman whose collection of tales and songs cultivated the latent seeds of poeise in the mind of Burns, 4
 Wilson, John, the hero of "Death and Dr. Hornbook," 25, 185, n.
 — Professor, his character of the Poet, 137—Youthful aspirations, 273—his description of the scenery at the fall of Fyers, 277, n.—his comparison of Melceger with Burns, 407, n.—his reply to Dr. Aiken, ib.—his remarks on Burns's Correspondence, 586
 Wilson, Robert, the "Gallant Weaver," the Poet's jealousy of him, 33
 — Wee Johnnie, the Kilmarnock Printer, 35—he refuses to print a second edition of Burns's Poems, 38—epitaph on, 327—anecdote of, ib.
 Wilt thou be my dearie? Song of, 482
 Winter, a Dirge, 166
 — Night, Poem, of, 177
 — of Life, Song of, 437
 — Season, Propitious to the muse of Burns, 104
 — it is past, Song of, 419
 Wisdom dwelling with Prudence, 46
 Witch-knots, how operated on the fair sex, 173, n.
 Witch stories, Three, relating to Alloway Kirk, 95, 715-16
 Wodrow, Dr. Peter, Notice of, 101, n.
 Wolfe, General, The battle field where he fell, 180, and n.
 Woman, The rights of, an occasional Address, spoken by Miss Fontenelle, 314
 Women's minds, The song of, 371
 Wood, Alexander, Surgeon, one of the noblest of men, 49
 Woodhouselee, Lord, his enjoyment of "Tam o' Shanter," 95
 Woodlark, The, Address to, 502
 Woodleigh, Maria, satirized by Burns, 117, 315, and n.
 Woods, the Player, Prologue spoken by, 272
 Wordsworth, William,—his praise of "The Mountain Daisy," 28 — his Address on visiting the grave of Burns, 158 — his remarks on the poetical character of Burns, 178 — his criticism on Death and Doctor Hornbook, 187 — on the Bard's epitaph, 256 — on "Tam o' Shanter," 303

Y

- Yarrow, The Dowie dens of, Ballad of, 551
 Ye Gods, was Strephon's picture blest, Hamilton of Bangour's Song of, 557
 Ye hae lien a' wrang, lassie, Song of, 371
 Ye Jacobites by name, Song of, 408
 Yester, Lord, his song of "Tweed-side," 531, and n.
 Yon wild mossy mountains, Song of, 398
 York, Duke of, Burns's prophecy respecting him, 48, 255
 Young Damon, Song of, by Fergusson, 538
 — Friend, Epistle to a, 240
 — Hyndhorn, Ballad of, 582 — complete version of, 583-4
 — Jamie, pride of a' the plain, Song of, 420
 — Jessie, Song of, 455
 — Man's dream, The, Song of, by Balloon Tytler, 551
 Young's Night Thoughts, glorious passage in, 81

THE END.

Deacidified using the Bookkeeper process.
Neutralizing agent: Magnesium Oxide
Treatment Date: March 2009

Preservation Technologies

A WORLD LEADER IN COLLECTIONS PRESERVATION
111 Thomson Park Drive
Cranberry Township, PA 16066
(724) 779-2111

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 014 389 838 6

