That is one aspect of it. I refuse to apologize or withdraw because both the hon. Minister from St. Andrews, and the hon. member for High Park are quoted in Hansard that they would not believe I would make such a remark, nor am I anti-semitic.

As far as somebody else being able to interpret the remark, Mr. Speaker, when I was on city council and a man by the name of Jack Blanc got shot trying to stop a robbery in Metro, council awarded a $5,000 sum to his widow. The same item that awarded that $5,000 suggested setting up a fund to reward other citizens who come to the aid of the police.

At that time, I said it was a dangerous principle, because no citizen ought to take the law into his own hands and go running out onto the street with a gun. I pointed out that I belonged to the General Wingate branch of the Royal Canadian legion, which is a Jewish branch, named after a Jewish general; that I knew Jack Blanc personally; that I was in the colour party at his funeral, and that I made the first substantial contribution to the fund that was set up to look after his widow. But I did not think that it was right for any man to run out into the street and take the law into his own hands and be judge and executioner.

At that time, I was accused by a certain group in a Jewish community of being anti-semitic. I was on radio, Mr. Speaker, on an open-line programme – Larry Solway's programme – where they took me from pillar to post, I would say; where they accused me of being anti-semitic because I was Slovak, and everybody knew the Slovaks were anti-semites.

Now, I did not hear anybody phoning up and saying that is not right. It is a programme of free expression. Let them do it. I also point out there have been many statements made here in this House, Mr. Speaker, about certain groups—in innocence they were maligning lawyers, doctors and other groups. Nobody here has stood up and said, "withdraw", because one of the privileges of being a Canadian is being subject to a parliamentary system where we have certain privileges and if we believe certain remarks, we trust that we are saying the truth, then we are protected and we are privileged.

Now, I did not malign anybody. As I say, I thought I was saying it in a laudatory manner, that they just had the good sense not to blow their money on booze. But that is not the point. Even if I had been the type that would make some kind of a remark that could be misconstrued by somebody, if a person believes that remark to be true, then I say he is privileged to make that remark. In fact, it is his duty to speak that which is true; and it is the duty of the other members of this House to point out that he is wrong.

We have to be careful, Mr. Speaker, that we do not carry this thing too far. A person sent me a little clipping—it is very short:

> Except for time and expense, few, if any, campaigns can match the series of Shell ads. They were an endurance test in more ways than one. To demonstrate platformate, Shell's extra-mileage ingredient, the Ogilvy > and Mather agency set up an endurance contest between cars containing Shell gasoline with their platformate additive and others without. Then they filmed the cars as they raced across the Bonneville salt flats; the platformate cars have always won. The films were two years in the making and cost them an estimated $300,000. Even so —and this is where I charge you to listen, Mr. Speaker:

> one ad in a series had to be junked. Some Negro viewers, led by comedian Dick Gregory, complained that the film showing five white platformate cars out-distancing five black cars was a demeaning insult.

Now, if this is an example of how these things can be carried to extremes, it occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, that if the law touching on libellous literature or anti-semitic literature were enforced, and I had written such a statement, I could have been prosecuted that I was maligning a race. And it bothers me; it bothers me extremely. There is one bright aspect to it.

You know I have a share in a manufacturing company, five of us have an interest in it; I am the only, what you might call "goy"—I am the only non-jew in it. When I went to my service station, there were three people I know in there; they really took over the coals, as well as the hon. Minister of Correctional Services, for having brought this matter to an issue. And just at that time, when I was accused of being anti-semitic on Jack Blanc, as I started to tell you, I was on the radio. And during the Israeli war I was a commentator on an open-line programme, and will tell you I was defending the side of the Jews at the time.

One woman kept on saying how she hated Jews because her husband had been killed by a Russian Jew. And I kept on asking her how she knew that he was a Jew. I am afraid I got rather exasperated and finally I made the remark: "Well, madame, how did you know. Did you ask him to take down his pants and see if he was circumcised?" Well, that got me into a lot of trouble. As a matter of fact, the tape had to be sent to the board of broadcast governors, Mr. Speaker, but the point is, because of that remark I was also accused of being anti-Semitic. So, it is not the first time I have had this accusation made against me.

I guess in politics this is one of the things you have to live with. The truth of the matter is, those people who know me, let them be my judge. As far as the others, Mr. Speaker, I cannot go through life worrying myself sick, being afraid to open my mouth for fear that any statement I make may be misinterpreted by some zealot. Otherwise, all communications would cease; we would cease to be a British democracy; we would cease to be a democracy of any kind. We must have, for certain, freedom of speech. The appalling part about this thing is, Mr. Speaker, that last night my telephone rang; it is an organized attempt to coerce me into making a withdrawal, which I refuse to do because I will not be subject to coercion, any kind of coercion.

I consider myself a just and upright man, and free by birth and by tradition of this country. And I will not be coerced, either by them mobbing up on me on a radio, or making phone calls at home—because I know this is nothing but a lunatic fringe. The majority of the people that I have spoken to said, "We are sorry, we have no quarrels here." But there is a group which has come over and which has suffered. Anything that could be, by the wildest sense of the imagination, "construed" or as the hon. member for Downsview said, "interpreted," or "what might appear," these are the statements he used. When he says "unsavoury interpretation," all I can say is the hon. member is pillaring me or convincing me on Monday night without even having heard what I had to say.

Now, I deem that to be deplorable, but I forgive the man. To me, Mr. Speaker, there are certain types. We have French-Canadians; we have Irish-Canadians; we have Slovak-Canadians; we have Ukrainian-Canadians; we have Jewish-Canadians. On the other hand, we also have Canadian-Irish; Canadian-Slovaks; Canadian-Jews; Canadian-Ukrainians; Canadian-Poles; Canadian-Germans. There is a remarkable difference; the first group are Canadians first and then their religious or ethnic group comes second; they are always Canadians. The second group, they are not Canadians first, but something else.

But what disturbs me here, Mr. Speaker, is that I always felt that we represented Canadians in general, not any particular ethnic or political group, or pressure group or association. I suggest that perhaps there are some in here who put ethnic and religious and other pressure groups before they put their obligation to the general public as Canadian citizens.

Now, I would not hurt anybody; if anybody was in the slightest way disturbed by it, I am sorry.

I am sorry for the least person because you know Christ said, "If you do it unto the least of these, you do it unto me." And the reverse is also true, "If you hurt the least of these, you hurt me." So I would not hurt anybody. But to make a withdrawal and acquiesce in a suggestion that I was guilty of something that I had been fighting all my life, would be giving fuel to the fire of these zealots who would twist any words that are made to suit their own purpose. That I will not permit, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing I find more distasteful than extending this, nevertheless I feel that it is necessary, in no way to speak for my friend, the hon. member for Humber, but simply to say to you, sir, that if there are those in the community who were offended by his remarks, they can accept, I believe, my feeling that he is not anti-Semitic. He has said this very clearly, and if there is any further feeling in this regard I would say this troubles me considerably and it is my duty to remind you, sir, that the hon. member was speaking as an individual, and that we in this party dissociate ourselves from any unintended slur, if such there happened to be.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Sudbury.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of personal privilege. I beg your indulgence, and that of the House, I shall be very brief. On July 2, during the evening session of the House, I made certain remarks in connection with what I alleged to be the effect of alcohol upon the Indian people.

Those remarks were wrong, sir, and there was no justification for them having been made by a person such as myself who has had a fairly lengthy contact with the Indian people. I have been privileged to defend many members of that race on serious criminal charges. I have been engaged by various bands in negotiating important matters concerning them and the remarks I made at that time, sir, at the best were fallacious; at the worst they were an affront to the Indian people.

I have reflected upon them; they have caused me great anxiety. I take the opportunity now, sir, to say to you that I unequivocally withdraw those remarks.

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of personal privilege which is not very serious, I refer to the Globe and Mail of this morning, July 18, story headed, "Plebiscites on Loans Queried by McKeough", and the second paragraph:

> Municipal Affairs Minister Darcy McKeough said in the Legislature he would prefer letting municipalities call a referendum only if they wanted it.

I have checked the transcript of Hansard, sir, and I think, to set the record straight, I would point out that what I said yesterday morning was:

> I would not want to see a vote completely taken away. Perhaps the emphasis should be that there is not a vote unless the Ontario municipal board decides there should be. The emphasis that way, rather than the other way around. And we are looking at exactly those ideas.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, there was a question directed to the Prime Minister yesterday, in the absence of the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart), by the hon. member for High Park, which I would now like to deal with. It is a six-part question, the first of which is:

Was the death of Isaac Teichroeb which occurred on December 28, 1966, reported to the coroner?

The answer: The death of Isaac Teichroeb occurred on December 28, 1966, at Hamilton general hospital as a result of thermal burns to 60 per cent of his body. According to the office of the supervising coroner and those of the chief coroner of Hamilton at that time, the death was not reported to a coroner. It came to the attention of the supervising coroner indirectly on February 21, 1967, and he assigned Dr. D. N. Cow, a coroner in Port Colborne, Ontario, to carry out an investigation and report back to him.

The second question: Was an inquest held into this death?

The answer: No inquest was held.

Third: If not, why not?

The answer: The coroner had no opportunity to view the body of the deceased, nor the scene of the accident, nor was there a police investigation at that time. However, after February 21, 1967, the Port Colborne police, at the request of the coroner, interviewed and took statements from the witnesses to the accident. In addition, the accident had been reported at the time to a steamship inspector of the federal government Department of Transport, who had jurisdiction to investigate the circumstances leading up to this accident. The name of the inspector is Mr. John Spence, 360 St. Paul Street, St. Catharines.

After the coroner had reviewed the police records and conferred with the steamship inspector of the federal Department of Transport on his findings, he concluded that death was due to severe burns as a result of an accidental explosion in a boiler, which resulted from human error and not a mechanical defect. The coroner felt an inquest would serve no useful purpose and he subsequently informed the widow of the deceased, namely, Mrs. Annie Teichroeb, 5 Edgewood Road, St. Catharines, of his findings and conclusions.

Fourth: Was the cause of the death a flash-back explosion in the boiler room of the S.S. Nixon Berry?

The answer: The cause of death, as already mentioned, was thermal burns to 60 per cent of the body. This resulted from a flash back explosion of oil from a boiler aboard a steamship called the S.S. Nixon Berry while moored in the harbour at Port Colborne on December 19, 1966. This vessel was owned by the Scott-Misener Steamship Company. The deceased was first treated at Port Colborne general hospital, but moved to Hamilton general hospital by ambulance the same day because of his severe burns. He died there on December 28, 1966. Two other men were injured by this same explosion; both were treated at Port Colborne hospital, and both survived. The Port Colborne police took statements from these men as to the circumstances leading up to the explosion and copies of these statements were given to the coroner.

Fifth: Prior to the explosion in the boiler, had an oiler been fired for refusing to light that particular boiler?

The answer: We have no information as to whether an oiler was fired or not prior to this explosion. Such information would have to come from the Scott-Misener Steamship Company, or Mr. John Spence, the steamship inspector of the federal Department of Transport.

Sixth: Was Mr. Teichroeb burned by steam a few days before the fatal accident?

The answer is, Mr. Speaker, we have no information on file either in the police report or in the coroner's report as to whether the deceased, Mr. Teichroeb, was burned by steam a few days before the fatal accident.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to remind the members that, due to circumstances beyond our control, the post office here will not be accepting mail from the members addressed outside of government departments. Therefore, you might either make arrangements to take the letters and deliver them yourselves when you are home, or they will be stockpiled in the whip's office, or in the Clerk's office, or Speaker's office. When the postal services commence again, they will be mailed. So, therefore, if the members have important letters that they wish to get there, please do not drop them in the mails because they will not go. You will have to make some other arrangements. Interdepartmental mail—mail to the departments here—or any government branch, government of Ontario branch, can be posted at the post office and will be delivered by the courier service set up by The Department of Public Works and other departments concerned.

Now, I would hope that the members could make alternative arrangements for the important things which have to be dealt with by them from day to day.

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Before the orders of the day, it is a pleasure to report to the House, this morning, that there has been a very substantial reduction in both the number of traffic deaths and fatal accidents that have occurred on roads and highways of Ontario in the first six months of 1968. Indeed, the number of deaths was the lowest for the corresponding period in the last four years. Traffic deaths were down 6.7 per cent in 1968 as compared with 1967, and fatal collisions were down 3.6 per cent. The reductions were even more marked in the month of June when deaths were down by 12.1 per cent and fatal collisions were reduced by 5.3 per cent.

These figures are encouraging and I commend the drivers of Ontario and the visitors to our province who have contributed to these reductions. At the same time, sir, I would like to urge upon all our drivers to protect themselves and other users of the road by making sure that they know the traffic laws, and that they obey them at all times.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 4th order, committee of the whole House, Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ACT

House in committee on Bill 177, An Act to amend The Executive Council Act.

Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 177 reported.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY RETIREMENT ALLOWANCES ACT

House in committee on Bill 178, An Act to amend The Legislative Assembly Retirement Allowances Act.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) could clarify section 3? I have read it several times myself and I cannot understand what it achieves. I do not understand it. What is it trying to do?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Well, Mr. Chairman, a widow can elect all of the privileges available to a member in terms of commuted pensions, once the pension is vested in five years, as it will be with respect to section 1. Then certain privileges become available to a member. A member can then elect to wait until he is 55 years of age and draw a full pension, or he can take a commuted pension, a table for which is set out in the original statute.

A widow in these circumstances may elect all the privileges that accrue to a member excepting, of course, that her allowance will be 50 per cent of what would have accrued to a member.

Mr. Nixon: She could not before.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, we are just broadening her privileges.

Mr. Nixon: Most of these privileges, then, were available to widows. Certainly they were. Were they not up until this time?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, Mr. Chairman, they were not available. The purposes of this section is to ensure that all the privileges that were available, and will be available, to a member are now available to a widow, on the reduced basis.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, there were two occasions I can recall since I have been a member here—one involved the late Albert Wren and the other involved the late Joseph Gould. Bob Herbert probably was a third one, and Elmer Brandon a fourth—where the members had served a considerable period of time but had passed on, unfortunately, and just before they were entitled to their pension. Will this legislation do anything to help their widows and others in the same position?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, no. The best we can do now is reduce the vesting period. Of course, the pension reduces, too. The best we can do is reduce the vesting period of five years rather than 10, but in the new circumstances, if a five-year vesting period has not been reached, then the only benefits are the return of the contributions with interest.

Mr. Singer: Well, I would think the incidents are sufficiently few that perhaps we could consider the principle—as much as I dislike it—of retroactivity. The period of vesting is being reduced to five years. All of those four members, if my memory serves me correctly, had served much more than five years, and I would think benefits for them would be of substantial help. The number is very small and you only have to do it once and, at least in one of those cases, I know of with personal knowledge there was substantial hardship. I think it would—since we are reducing the vesting period from ten years back to five—that very probably there is a method whereby some benefit could accrue to the very few people who find themselves in this position.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Speaking on behalf of myself, and I presume on behalf of Mr. Pritchard, I would think that perhaps the Minister would give consideration to changing the word "widow" to "spouse".

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I cannot speak with any authority here. I think the interpretation of the Act would probably say "widow" or "widower". Let me suggest that if that is not the case, we can attempt to amend the Act, but I think in this instance a widow and a widower would be synonymous. Maybe "spouse" would have been a better word. I must say we had some thought to certain situations that existed in this Legislature, but I think we are all right.

An hon. member: See the trouble you cause us around here.

Sections 3 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 178 reported.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of the whole House rise and report two bills without amendment and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs to report two bills without amendment and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

THIRD READINGS

The following bills were given third reading upon motions:

Bill 177, An Act to amend The Executive Council Act.

Bill 178, An Act to amend The Legislative Retirement Allowances Act.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself in the committee on ways and means.

BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. Speaker: The list which I have indicates that the member for Sandwich-Riverside (Mr. Burr) is the first speaker.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Wentworth.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the remarks that I wish to make during the final days of the session will be very short. I would say that I have very much enjoyed the opportunity to have been in this House and to take part in the very important legislation that has come before us.

Much of what has been said, during the last month both by the press and by a great number of politicians in the area of labour and management relations needs some clarification. So much of what has been said and written about this area has been so worded—whether by carelessness or design is somewhat obscure to me—so as to leave the impression that the unions, and through them the workers, of this province are consistently at fault when a breakdown in labour-management relations takes place.

The impression has been left that the workers of this province are callous and uncaring in their attitude toward the economy of the province and that they very selfishly undermine the future of this province and their fellow residents by unnecessary strike action. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me assure you and through you the residents of this province, that few, if any, workers enjoy going on strike. Few, if any, workers like to deny their families the use of the weekly pay cheque. In fact, very few can afford to go without it and few are oblivious to the fact that money lost during a strike is rarely, if ever, recovered.

Yet most workers will, in order to back up their legitimate request for a fair share of the profits—in order to insure that they receive a wage sufficient to provide a reasonable standard of living—take this somewhat distasteful and self-denying action. And I might hasten to add that on occasion the archaic labour legislation in this province precipitates this action and is, at times, the very tool used by management to deny workers decent working conditions.

Rarely do we read in the press a statement placing the onus of responsibility for any labour dispute on the shoulders of the negotiating committee of management. Rarely is the blame for the labour unrest laid at the feet of uncompromising management. More often than not, the news headlines blare out that workers have gone on strike. Such was the case, not many weeks ago, when a work stoppage occurred in the brewing industry and yet, in actual fact, the blame for 90 per cent of this work stoppage rests solely with management.

It is not often that one could be able to pick up the newspaper and see that 90 per cent of employees are locked out by a management that is not particularly interested in discussing with them the terms over which they will continue their employment. Ninety per cent of those workers who were previously, and are now again, employed by the brewing industry arrived at work quite prepared to take part in the normal routine. Lunch pail in hand, they were ready to do what they were being paid to do. They were prepared to manufacture and to sell to the public the suds, as they are called, that so many people consume during the "pause that refreshes".

Now whether or not one drinks beer is really immaterial and there is a lesson I believe to be learned from what has taken place in the brewing industry.

I might say that I am very satisfied and happy to see them now back to work. The workers were not on strike. They were, at that time, being denied the opportunity to work. They were being what I supposed could be termed victimized by the monopolistic concerns by whom they were employed. They were facing three supposedly competing companies who do not operate within the normal concept of competition.

They were facing three companies who had reached such accord that when one of the companies faced any type of labour dispute or labour discord, the other two—in order not to take advantage of them—decided to close down. These companies, and not the workers, decided that they would deny to the people of Ontario the use of this product—and I might say that there are some who might suggest that denying the use of the product is a desirable thing. I do not know. I am not among them, but there are some who suggest this.

The brewing industry has such a hold on the market that even if competition were to emerge in the form of a new brewing operation, the opportunity for this operation to retail its product is extremely limited. There are few, if any, private concerns who enjoy this government-sponsored position. These companies have a complete stranglehold, not only on the manufacturing but also on the retailing of their product, and they have this by virtue of an Act of this legislation.

Now it is not a particularly healthy situation, because what then occurs is that any other company deciding to enter into this field must of necessity do so with the good will of the existing breweries. It is not possible for another company to enter into this field and because of the legislation it is not possible for them to market their products without marketing through the brewers' retail warehousing outlets. And if past practice is any criteria, there is a definite indication that the brewers' warehouses have charged unrealistic handling charges in order to insure that the monopoly they enjoy will be maintained indefinitely.

Some years ago there was an enquiry chaired by the hon. Mr. Justice McRuer and at that time he agreed, I believe, in part, that the brewing industry was a monopoly but he further agreed that they were not violating The Combines Act as such. But he made a rather interesting statement during it, and I quote:

> If the plan of the organization of the Brewers' Warehousing Company Limited gives to the member brewers an advantage in the Ontario market that is something which is distinctly within the control of the Ontario government, especially in view of the fact that it is declared by statute that every store in the Brewers' Warehousing Company Limited is a government store.

Surely it is in the best interest of the people of this province that any manufacturing concern should be able to manufacture and sell its product here in Ontario? And when by an Act of this government a certain group of people are given a monopoly—or given the opportunity to set up the retailing situation that can deny to others the opportunity to use it or to price it out of their reach this is not a satisfactory way to run a government or to run a province.

What I would suggest ought to be done in that case is that any group manufacturing in this province within the confines of the Acts that govern manufacture of consumer products, ought to be able to retail its product, should be able to sell it through the normal outlets. And this is not the case here.

It is unfortunate that the people of the province must suffer because of the legislation of this government.

It is unfortunate that the government should take such a position that would give to what could be supposedly their friends, a monopoly that would deny others the right to compete.

There is, in actual fact, no competition in the brewing industry. The competition is strictly that of advertising, as I mentioned some time ago in a previous speech. There is no way to convince me that these brewers are in any way competing one with the other. There is never at any time a decision that one company will sell its products cheaper, or that one company will go into actual proper competition.

I feel there are certain ways in which this could be handled and two have been suggested; there are perhaps three others. One way could be the allowing the sale of this product by licenced grocers. Whether or not this is the answer, I am not sure.

Another could be by a system, very similar to that of the LCBO, where the government not only owns, as they presently do, or at least control as they presently do, the outlets, but that they exercise jurisdiction over who will sell where and at what price and what will be the handling charge.

The final one would be to leave it as it is, but for the government to exercise its responsibilities to the people of this province by ensuring that these companies will not band together, as they have done over the past few weeks, to deny to the economy of this province and to deny to those people who were prepared to go to work, the opportunity to earn a reasonable living.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the government will, in the light of what has taken place over the last two or three weeks, review the position of the Brewers' Warehousing Company Limited, and that they will make whatever changes are necessary to ensure that the kind of action that was taken by the brewing industry will not happen again in this province. Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Algoma.

Mr. B. Gilbertson (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this Budget Debate and to disagree with the hon. members of the Opposition who have been so lengthy and loud in their condemnation of the province's Budget for 1968-1969.

I would like to remind the hon. members of the comment on this Budget contained in a lead editorial of the Globe and Mail on March 13, entitled "Painful But Logical":

> No Ontario budget that promises a $105 million tax increase—not to mention healthy hikes in hospital and medicare premiums—will be greeted with cheers. Still, when one admits the need in certain areas for increased government expenditures, and when one finds evidence that spending for lower priorities has been restrained, it must be admitted that the budget presented by Treasurer Charles MacNaughton seems sensible, if at times a painful document.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all members would agree that no Treasurer of this province has ever had to face more difficult or complex problems than those which exist today. I believe he is to be complimented for the Budget which he has laid before us and which provides the basis for another year of steady, sound growth for all sectors of our province's economy.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a few moments on the agricultural sector of our economy. This sector is facing perhaps the greatest challenge of any in the province, and I believe that our farmers need all the encouragement and support which we in this Legislature can provide for them.

I was impressed recently by an address by Mr. Glen Cole, president of the dairy farmers of Canada, who explained in very clear terms the difficulties which face our farmers today.

This 59-year-old dairy farmer from Bewdley, Ontario, probably knows better than most how serious the present problems are, yet he speaks with hope and optimism, because he firmly believes that a better day is coming for all farmers across this country.

Like our own Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart), Mr. Cole is a firm believer in a united approach to Canada's agricultural difficulties. He pointed out that at this time the dairy farmers are the only national commodity group in the country, but he hopes that they will set a pattern for the future for other major commodity groups in the industry.

Mr. Cole suggested that any farmer should get the same satisfaction from his work as a skilled mechanic. But many farmers today are not only unable to get this basic satisfaction, they also lack a reasonable return on their capital investment and labour.

Many farmers today have a higher capital investment than the average small and medium sized businessman. Farmers are so short of labour, because of competitive difficulty, that a farmer with $100,000 invested in his operation must work all day in the field himself.

The seriousness of the farm income problem is reflected in the increasing difficulty in getting young men with a knowledge of farming to take up this business as their life work. I think that we should agree with Mr. Cole's claim that agriculture has traded muscle for machinery and electricity to a greater extent than any other industry, and, as a result, agriculture is leading the other segments of the Canadian economy in productivity improvement.

Despite these advances, however, many of our farmers continue to operate only through a system of shared labour. A complicating factor that Mr. Cole pointed out was the fact that so many urban Canadians are unable to appreciate just how significantly the farm problem has changed. They fail to understand that transient labour is no longer available.

Many of our economic experts are not particularly sympathetic or helpful either. It is all very well for them to emphasize the need for efficiency to meet world competition, but they ignore the fact that our farmers must often contend with adverse climatic conditions and a high-cost economy. New Zealand can produce dairy products more cheaply because, in that country, farmers can count on pasture for eleven months of the year, and virtually no feed or stable problems.

By the same token Mr. Cole asked why we do not import our clothes from Hong Kong and our shoes from Czechoslovakia, or our machinery from eastern Europe. I feel that the points which this farmer has brought up are very valid indeed, and agree with him that there is a need for more communication among all segments of the agriculture industry in Canada, and between the producers and general public.

Here in Ontario, Mr. Speaker, we are fortunate in having a successful farmer as our Minister of Agriculture and Food. I think that it is obvious from the results of the election last October 17 that the farmers of Ontario agree with me. I would like to mention one or two of the most important projects which have been initiated by our present Minister, and which are of great significance to the agriculture of this province.

I think the establishment of the farm income committee and the studies which have been initiated by this group will prove to be of immense value to the industry before the life of this parliament has expired. At the same time, we are fully aware that ultimate solutions of this problem will depend upon the development of a national agriculture policy, which we on the government side of the House will continue to advocate until it becomes a fact. I believe the establishment of a pool quota on March 1, 1968, for Ontario milk producers is a major step towards the solution. I commend the Ontario milk marketing board and the producers for developing this policy.

As a result, farmers who are unable to find a market for their fluid milk and have no hope of obtaining the top price for the produce, will now be able to share in the fluid milk market regardless of the location of their farms. This plan came into effect on March 1, 1968, having been tried out in northern Ontario by the Ontario milk marketing board. The establishment of the board will ensure equal pay for quality milk for all dairy producers. This was not possible under the former two price system.

Another feature of this plan is that industrial milk producers may enter the pool as soon as they are able to pass government inspection and have proven that they can produce milk of the required quality. I know that some producers of Channel Island milk are not too happy with the system. They are requesting that their milk be bought and paid on the end use of their milk and that the increase from their milk be returned to them rather than to the pool. I think it is important for them to realize that before the milk marketing board came to a decision it commissioned an independent study to bring back recommendations on the marketing of Channel Island milk under pooling in Ontario.

Many of the recommendations of that report are implemented through the group one pool plan in quota policy. One of the recommendations of that report was that there should not be a separate price pool for Channel Island milk. However, the board made concessions to shippers of Channel Island breeds milk outside the recommendations of the committee report. Quotas for Channel Island breeds milk producers have been set on a different basis to other pool participants. Qualified CIB shippers have made their base period updated to recognize their increases in sales effort and the quotas have been set at 100 per cent for base milk, rather than the lower level of 89 which is the case for all other pool participants in southern Ontario. These concessions were made in view of the financial contribution that the CIB shippers have made to promote and expand the marketing of fluid milk in Ontario.

Another proposal which has met with wide acceptance in my constituency is an amendment to The Community Centres Act. This new grant system will provide 25 per cent of the cost of a community hall, skating arena, outdoor skating rink or athletic arena, with a maximum grant of $10,000. In the case of a swimming pool, indoor or outdoor, the grant will be 25 per cent of the cost with a maximum grant of $15,000. If the grant is to be used for building, accommodations, community halls, or skating arenas, it will be to the extent of 25 per cent of the cost with a maximum of $20,000. In the case of a combined community hall and swimming pool the grant will be 25 per cent of the cost to a miximum of $25,000.

Another amendment will provide a means whereby municipalities may band together to provide a community centre with each municipality eligible to receive grants. The combined grants will be limited to a maximum of 50 per cent of the costs of the facilities. I think that these amendments clearly indicate the importance with which our government views the local community as a social, business, educational and recreational centre. By increasing the allowable grants towards the provision of these facilities, the government is not only assisting the local communities to meet the rising costs of labour and materials, but is encouraging our residents, young and old, to participate in community activities. It is yet another example of this government's concern for the welfare of all our people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to just get a little closer to home. Perhaps you might call it a little personal. I would like to speak about my riding and the economy of my area. We in northwestern Ontario depend a lot on the tourist industry from all parts of Canada and the U.S.A.

In the Algoma area we have a lot of people from south of the border who live on the Canadian side of the St. Marys River about six months of the year. They have their summer homes and of course they pay the same taxes as our regular residents, such as residential school tax, road tax, gas tax. We are happy to have them and we feel they are an asset to our area. The Americans come over to this country and invest in various enterprises, such as lumber, mining, tourism just to mention a few.

It seems to me that they are more venturesome than we are and in many cases they are very generous. I would like to relate some of the good things they have done in our community in St. Joseph's Island area, Mr. Speaker. Our good friends from south of the border have been criticized many times for coming over and exploiting our good land over her, but in our local area we certainly cannot say that.

Many of our American summer residents when they become too old to come to the north to enjoy our summers, have given their homes to the community. In one instance, a wealthy American family donated the hospital to St. Joseph's Island. We have had two libraries donated—a children's library and an adult library. We also have had a school built to replace an old one-room school, plus a community hall. They have also equipped our hospital. In another instance an elderly couple donated their summer home to our local church.

These generous donations have been an asset and a great contribution to our particular area and I would not wonder, Mr. Speaker, that this happens perhaps in many other cases in Ontario. And I would want to commend our good friends from south of the border that come over and are so generous, and I feel that their great assistance is a boon to our economy.

I would now like to take a minute or two more, Mr. Speaker, to remind the hon. members here of a few of the things that are needed in our particular area. I would certainly like to mention our St. Joseph's Island bridge and put it on record. It is only a little span of 900 feet and not having this bridge is affecting our economy.

We think of the great Mackinaw bridge that is only about 50 miles away from us, that lets the traffic come from the southern part of Michigan—Detroit and all those larger cities—only five hours from the central part of Michigan up to our area. We have the international bridge at Sault Ste. Marie.

We get a great flow of traffic in the summertime—on the weekends all we have got is a long line-up of cars waiting to get across the ferry. If you cannot get out of line, you have to sit there and wait.

I think, Mr. Speaker, through you to the hon. members here in the House, it is only reasonable and economically feasible that we should hurry this project along. We have been promised this bridge, and I believe it is coming, but I would urge that this project be accelerated, so we will see some results before very long.

When I go home to my riding my constituents are continually after me, and ask me when we are going to see some visible results. "We know we are getting the bridge, but when are we going to see some visible results? So I tell them that the bridge is coming.

I am out on a limb, and I have confidence in this government that, if you accomplish so many things over the years, they are certainly able to do this. I am looking forward to when we will get the bridge at St. Joseph's Island.

Also there are many other projects in the north. We have a highway coming through from Hornepayne to White River—it is going to help out that particular area. And we have now a road that is almost completed from Highway 101 to Dalton.

Blind River, I understand, is going to get a shot in the arm to help their economy and I feel that there are brighter days ahead for Algoma. I am looking for the support of this government.

My people elected me to come down here to be their representative in the House, and I am telling hon. members this morning that we need their assistance.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Speaker, I understand that you, sir, have had the same sort of request. For some years we have just heard about a bridge to solve certain problems in your own riding. I do not know whether people gain most by electing a member of the government, or a member of the Opposition, as far as the public works are concerned.

My friend who has just spoken talked about the needs of a farmer. He is familiar with agriculture and with the problems of the farmer. I would point out to him that, in his own bailiwick, in his own farm, if he ever owned a farm, he would recognize that the horse that jumps the fence gets the attention.

As long as the horses are docile and stay in the stall, or the pasture, or the corral, you do not worry about them. But when the horse starts to jump, then you look at it and you say: "What is wrong? What is the trouble here?" And this often happens in politics.

As long as a riding can be counted upon to elect a government member, then government says, "Well, why should we waste money there. These people are satisfied, they are voting for us. We will look at some of the areas where the dissatisfaction is being recorded by an election, by Xs and the ballot."

So I give my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Gilbertson) this little bit of advice to cogitate upon and to think over and to take back to his people—suggest to them that maybe, after the next election, if they jump the fence, they might get results. But I suppose that is too much to hope for. I also offer the same advice to the hon. Speaker of the day.

Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to enter this debate, the time is getting pretty late. But a few days ago I had representation from some of the citizens in my riding and an adjacent riding asking that I would present, in a public way, a petition which they had drawn up and which they had signed. I said, "Well, I will do that."

The purpose of the Budget debate, of course, is for any citizens who have a grievance to present those grievances to the Crown before the moneys are voted. These people have a right to be heard and so I am speaking on their behalf today.

Back in June, on June 14, as a matter of fact, we had a debate in this House centred on Ontario housing and the setting of rents in the Ontario housing units. It was out of all that debate that this petition arose.

The people in Ontario housing in my riding, and throughout the city, I think, are grateful to this Legislature for what has been done for them, in making housing available. We have entered into the programme of Ontario housing because of a failure of private enterprise in this province to give the people of the province, particularly those with certain problems, basic shelter.

I do not need to go into this whole matter again today, because we have gone over it time after time. But those of us who feel responsibility here do get a lot of reaction from people in our ridings.

One of the biggest problems, I think, that many of our families face is the problem of the landlord who refuses to house a family with more than one child, or a maximum of two children. So the family with two or three children, whose lease expires, hunts for a home and that family is told, "Because of the number of children in your family we are not going to have you in our apartment complex."

Then, of course, there is also the problem of the widow, or the deserted wife, or the wife whose husband may have had some trouble. I have a case right now which Ontario housing is looking at very carefully —a family who was moving from one basement apartment to another basement apartment last Friday. Unfortunately the husband had been in trouble with the law and in this case he had been the receiver of stolen goods and he was on probation.

Another crime was committed in the general area, and the police went to look for the chap who was on probation. And, unfortunately, they went to the new apartment to which the family had not yet moved. The result was that that landlord said: "If you are going to have police around, you are not coming in here." Since no lease was signed, the door was closed. And so these people had to move out. The husband was taken into custody; the wife with two children was left with no place to go. Now this is a crisis which the Ontario housing is today grappling with. But my point is that since the private sector has failed to meet the needs of people like this, the Ontario housing was set up to try to grapple with these kinds of situations. And Ontario housing was not intended to be a profit-making organization. The private entreprenеur will build his apartment complex; he will determine what his cost was; and then what his economic rent is; and he will say to people "If you want to come in, fine, pay this rent or stay away."

Ontario housing has a different approach. It is the approach of need, and in that kind of an approach the profit motive plays no part. Certainly, Ontario housing tries to make its operation at least self-liquidating as far as possible, but the self-liquidating factor is a minor one, in the face of human need.

So we have our geared-to-income policies, and we try to assess what people's incomes are, and then gear rent to that, in many cases.

Now, in the debate, in May, in this House, it was pointed out to the Minister, and it has been pointed out to him before, that there are certain inequities here, that the net taxable income ought to be a better criterion than gross income for these people. The wage-earner with the large family still has to pay on his gross income, whereas the other income-earner with a smaller family and less responsibilities may be better off financially because of the way the rents are set. There has been a growing feeling that it ought to be the net taxable income upon which rents are based, and this feeling was expressed.

The feeling was also expressed here, and has been time after time, that overtime work should not count in the setting of rents. Because a man may have a certain amount of overtime, by the time that catches up with him in the following year, he may be back on his original income, or indeed may be unemployed for a temporary period. But he is paying his rent on the larger income. Also, it acts as a deterrent factor. In many cases, if a regular ongoing bit of overtime is offered, and it may be offered for some weeks, a person finds that the overtime may put him in the new rent-income bracket and he says "I am not going to be financially any better off. I had better turn down the offer of overtime," and therefore the industrial life is handicapped to that extent.

Mr. Speaker, when this matter was raised, some enterprising people and in the riding to the west, got together and said, "This is a good idea." The Minister at that time said he would look into this matter. These people felt they would strengthen the hands of those who are advocating these changes and let the Minister know how they felt about the matter by signing a petition in this field. The petition is addressed to Mr. E. Clow, chairman, Ontario housing corporation, 188 University Avenue, Toronto 1, Ontario, and says this:

> We, the undersigned tenants in Ontario housing corporation developments, respectfully submit that the method for setting rents should be reviewed, with consideration given to the following suggestions:
> 1. The net taxable income be used as a basis for determining rent, rather than gross pay.
> 2. That a man works overtime to make ends meet, not be penalized for his extra efforts.

This petition, signed by approximately 800 people, is here, and I want to present it to the Minister who is not in his seat. Perhaps we can see that it is delivered to the Minister for his consideration. I am sure that he will appreciate the effort of these people in presenting their point of view to him, and in backing up the endeavour to have these changes made in the method for setting rents in the Ontario housing corporation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this consideration.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): Today I want to speak on a matter that has been on my mind for the greater part of the session, and I think the phrase which sums it all up is "Our Double-Decker Society." It seems that we are settling down to an acceptance of two separate levels of existence for the bulk of our population, not counting the small percentage in the upper income brackets.

Because the situation has only recently begun to settle down into a pattern, figures are hard to come by, but I am sure I can make my point from our common experience and observation of this fact shaping up under our very eyes, at least in the majority of our constituencies.

The first average level of existence is that group that the HOME scheme is aimed at, the people earning between $8,000 and $12,000 a year. This group, perhaps, will reach figures approaching a third of Ontario's population in the years immediately ahead. These are the people who live in the suburbs, who have, wherever possible, individual homes standing in their own lots, nicely landscaped. Their refrigerators are full of good food. They have not yet learned that consumption of itself does not bring happiness or peace of mind, and so they are good consumers, the manufacturers' darling and the people who maintain the gross provincial product on its upward spiral. Each weekend they take to the roads in their automobiles which are rarely more than three years old and, of late, they are seen with their tent trailers and power boats heading for the crowded provincial parks within 150 miles of the southern metropolitan area.

These people have a variety of ways of staying where they are in relation to others in the pyramid of material success. Most of them have completed high school, and they are going to try to get their children through college, or at least through community college or vocational training or some form of higher education at least two years longer than their own. They will perpetuate their position in this way. For the immediate present, they have a variety of ways of keeping ahead of the game financially and, for many, the method is through collective bargaining procedures which have become institutionalized to a degree.

Typical of the sophistication of this group of workers is the statement of protest in regard to provincial Budget changes forwarded to MPPs on March 28, by the united electrical, radio and machine workers. I will not quote from this document, but merely observe that it is a professional job which lobbies most effectively on behalf of this particular group or salary-level of workers. This kind of help gives such people a head-start over less organized members of the community, so that they are able to maintain their differential fairly easily.

When parity of wage or salary is achieved in an industry which spans the border, without corresponding parity in productivity, a number of things happen. The situation is more acute, the more depressed the general standard of living happens to be in the area where the branch plant is located. Thus, in Quebec, serious social dislocation, and upward and downward mobility were observed among former neighbours and friends who had been closely-knit in the community of St. Thérèse, following the GM parity award. There was a differential of as much as $2 an hour between men doing the same job at GM and at Sicard, the snow-plough people, just across the Laurentian Autoroute, less than half a mile away. Firms like Coronation Foods and Simon Cigar, which had located in St. Thérèse in the belief that tax incentives and lower labour costs would bring them higher returns on volume items, found that they had difficulty in attracting and holding workers, in the face of the magnet, GM. Everyone wanted to work for GM, and those who couldn't make it were relegated to a different stratum of society by those who did, and kept down. That's the important point. Denied upward mobility into the newly appreciated level, they became the newly underprivileged in a relative sense in St. Thérèse, and what was once a stable community is now boiling with a ferment that is only more acute than that in, say, Oshawa or St. Catharines because the original living standard was lower to begin with. One could find similar extreme examples in Nova Scotia and so on, and to make my point I have reached outside the province so as not to hurt the local pride of any particular Ontario community.

Now let us look at some of the provisions of the GM agreement to see how this group of workers is considering its advantage over the other layer of the population. Forty-seven days of strike, involving some 25,000 workers produced the following results. The list is not exhaustive:

Five pay increases totalling about $1.24 an hour for production workers and $1.68 for tradesmen. This would mean production workers will earn $3.65 an hour and tradesmen $5.04 an hour before the contract expiry date in 1970. Incidentally, by that time, stationary engineers, or boilermen as we used to call them, of the top grades in the GM plants, will be earning more than $12,500 a year, which is more than many assistant Deputy Ministers now earn in the Ontario civil service, and more than a Minister himself gets—in addition to his MPP's indemnity—for his added departmental responsibilities!

The first increase will be an immediate 20-cent hourly raise for all employees, retroactive to November 6, 1967. Another 30-cent increase for skilled workers is also retroactive to November 6, 1967.

Cost-of-living increases of no less than three cents an hour and no more than eight cents an hour are provided for in the agreement on an annual basis, once in November, 1968, and again in November, 1969.

There is an "improvement factor" wage increase for all employees in both the second and third years of the agreement. This would range from nine to fifteen cents.

Twenty-six cents of the 31 cents cost-of-living allowance has been transferred to base wage rates. The remaining five cents will be continued as the cost-of-living factor for the first year of the agreement.

The new formula for computing the cost-of-living allowance assures at least four cents of new money during the life of the new agreement, and could add as much as 14 cents increase.

And now let us look at the status provisions, the fringe benefits which keep highly organized workers such as the members of the UAW from slipping on the totem pole: One additional paid holiday a year; increased pension benefits; improved disability and survivor benefits; a revised drug prescription plan; increased amounts and longer periods for supplemental unemployment benefits.

George Burt, UAW's Canadian director said, and I quote from the Wednesday, March 27, 1968 Canadian Press report:

> GM workers in Canada are now assured of getting either a full year's work or a full year's guaranteed income. Most GM Canada workers will have a full year's guarantee of 95 per cent of take home pay—minus only $7.50 weekly in job-related benefits—if laid off for that length of time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what we have here is a guaranteed annual income for a significant segment of the work force that falls into this category I have described. And as my colleague, the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Braithwaite), pointed out on May 21, during the debate on the estimates of The Department of Social and Family Services, the president of Ford, Arjay Miller, endorses the guaranteed annual income concept, as does the chairman of Xerox, Joseph C. Wilson. They are all concerned to keep consumption up so we get a 95 per cent wage guarantee, laid off or not, for a highly organized, and growing group of people; the people with the real security in these changing times. They can go with the tide if the tide favours them, and they can drop anchor and ride out unfavourable tides and currents when they have to. They just cannot lose.

Now, listen to the extension of this idea still further, as dealt with by Laurence E. Coward, senior vice-president of the consulting accountancy firm William M. Mercer, speaking in a panel discussion at the Ontario division of the CMA this May. Canadian business, he told the group, has a continuing obligation to its old employees, even after they have stopped working.

> So far, only the united auto workers has made a major issue of those pensions already being paid. It has won major improvements for these pensioners, Coward said approvingly. This is a major problem that more and more companies will have to face. The attitude that the company has no moral obligation to a pensioner once he has ceased to work is getting harder and harder to maintain. I am sure that more and more manufacturers will be forced to grant retroactive increases. If your company is providing the employees with an inadequate pension package, it is no use trying to do a snow job on behalf of the company because it just won't go over.

That quotation is from the Toronto Daily Star of May 3, 1968.

And then George Ball, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, drives the economic axe even deeper into the timber of our nationhood by asking, in his new book, "The Discipline of Power,"

> I wonder for example, if the Canadian people will be prepared indefinitely to accept in return for the psychic satisfaction of maintaining separate national and political identity, a per-capita income less than three-quarters of ours?

Ball is all for parity, but he is again addressing his appeal to this particular stratum of our society; not the very rich, but the people on the upper deck of our double-decker bus.

The mix does change a little from year to year. For example, according to DBS figures, rent, interest and miscellaneous investment income rose nearly 13 per cent in 1967. Wages and salaries showed an average 9 per cent rise. Farmers' incomes fell 23 per cent. Employees in the service industries won larger raises—12 per cent average—than those in manufacturing and construction—six per cent. Wages paid by public utilities rose 15.5 per cent, by transportation companies, 12 per cent, and by business and personal services, 13 per cent. Provincial payrolls went up 20 per cent; municipal payrolls, 12 per cent; federal government payrolls, 10½ per cent.

But this might be likened to the surface layer of the water of the sea, which mixes down to a depth of about a hundred feet, but which never mixes with the water below that level. The people on the top deck of the bus stay that way, as the postal workers are doing now, by calling periodic strikes without regard to the well being of Canada as a whole. Strikes and lockouts in manufacturing industries in 1967 meant a loss of productivity totalling 377,500 man-weeks. Now, the workers themselves were prepared to gamble their earnings loss of $40 million in this lost time, because they rapidly recouped it in what they won at the bargaining table. But Canada as a whole never got back the equivalent of that lost $40 million in increased productivity. And what is more, she never will. That loss is permanent. The times is lost forever.

There is another aspect to this. The Financial Post of April 27, pointed out that the gap in productivity between the U.S. and Canada is 27 per cent, and that in manufacturing has widened from 16.6 per cent to 18.5 per cent. Canada is slipping. The editorial went on to say that this relatively inefficient performance explains in good part why finished goods usually cost more in Canada than they do in the U.S.A., and it explains why less is left over to pay U.S.-style wages and dividends. In these circumstances, it says, the Canadian union guide for wage parity across the board is inflationary and self-defeating. The spread of the parity idea, says Canadian General Electric's president, Herbert J. Smith, would mean a transfer of manufacturing operations and jobs to the country with the greatest productivity, i.e. the U.S.A. So the cost of staying on the top deck is often to sell the rest of Canada, and certainly those on the lower level, short.

Here's another example—the labour cost of a $22,000 house as calculated by the Windsor building trades unions: bricklayer, tile-setter $1,450; carpenter $706; electricians $325; hoisting engineers $120; labourers $200; painters $285; plasterers, cement finishers $344.80; plumbers $143.20; sheet metal workers $250. Total labour: $3,824.00.

These construction costs are up by 13.7 per cent when compared to 10 years ago. When added to increased land costs of 41.4 per cent and increased mortgage carrying charges of 34.8 per cent, these figures go to keep individuals and classes afloat, at the incredible cost of forcing up the cost of a three-bedroom house—including all interest charges over 25 years—from $20,733 to $42,078; more than double.

I'll repeat those total figures: A $12,000 house in 1957, with 25 year interest at 6 per cent came to $20,733. In 1967, the same three-bedroom house cost $21,500 cash, or with the maximum first mortgage over 25 years at 8.5 per cent, cost $42,078—an unbelievable figure. Incidentally, the minimum down payment in 1957 was $1,200 and in 1967 $3,500.

Now the HOME scheme cannot beat this numbers game, except perhaps by its gimmick with leasehold land and then only to an insignificant degree. So homes are sky-high, and they can only go to top-level passengers on this double-decker income bus, which further stratifies society into two levels. No wonder when you're up there on that top deck you will do anything not to come down if you can avoid it.

The high and increasing cost of government—of which we shall hear much more as the fall approaches and the time comes either to split the tax cake or bake a still bigger one—is also a factor in forcing up the upper-deck salaries. Cities and towns have boosted municipal taxes to the limit, and now they too will go to the well for more money, filling every tax field that someone else vacates. And, high as taxes are, budgetary deficits are proof that governments have not hitherto dared to demand from the taxpayer the full cost of their spiralling outlays.

The debt of federal and provincial governments alone now exceeds $1,400 for every man, woman and child in this country. It must be serviced by taxes. These taxes, as we all know, are levied somewhat unevenly, and the pressure for salary maintenance to offset direct-deduction taxation at the level I am talking about is continuous and awesome. When a person discovers that 11 cents of every tax dollar he is levied is needed to meet the annual interest on debt before a cent is earmarked to retire the existing principle, then he is going to turn a deaf ear to calls upon him for personal restraint. The result is that the inflationary spiral zooms ever upward, carrying the upper-deck passengers with it. No wonder the present Ontario budget is geared to an annual income of $8,500 to $10,000!

Some independent figures I have researched show that in Metro Toronto it takes an annual gross income of $6,376 to maintain a typical family at a modest standard of living. On a 40-hour week, this means the head of the family must earn a minimum of $3.06 per hour. I have a 1962 figure here made by the council of economic advisers in the U.S.A. Family of four—$3,955, six years ago. Today the same family's modest but adequate income, according to a parallel study from the bureau of labour statistics, should be $5,000, nearly 25 per cent more.

My latest figure for average earnings in manufacturing in Ontario is an annual income of $5,400. People in this bracket are scrambling to get on to the top deck of the bus. They will fight with increasing pressure to maintain their material standards.

But now let me turn to the people on the bottom deck and ask: What are we going to do about them? Because I believe that there is a terrible social danger in this two-layer society, where a large segment of the people can protect themselves and an almost equally large segment cannot. Let me read this editorial into the record. It comes from the Sarnia Observer of January 13, 1968, under the headline

PROFIT AMID MISERY

Canada, with the second highest standard of living in the world, still has some leaky spots. Like the United States, the national abundance is far from universal. Like the United States there is a tendency for at least some of the affluent to batten on the less fortunate. Toronto's board of control was approached by four mothers of the city to declare their homes unfit for living because of extreme cold and rats.

Chilliness is laid to the fact that the gas company shut off the gas in May, 1966. Company spokesmen say no request for turning it on had been made by the landlord since. Rats moving in with the families is attributed to the fact that even the 30 and 40 degree temperatures of the living rooms and bedrooms are more comfortable than the cellars where the rodents usually make their homes.

To survive the present cold snap one mother sleeps in her clothes on a front room couch and watches television—imagine the poor having television—in the afternoon wearing a winter coat and gloves. There is some help forthcoming. One woman with four children—who reports killing five rats in little more then a week—receives $260 a month in mother's and family allowances.

Keeping herself and four children in clothes, food and raiment should not be beyond the powers of a person who can exercise caution in buying. But the hurdle there is the landlord who charges her, she says, $140 a month for her rat-infested warren. For that rent the man who owns the place does not even provide heat. He is probably little concerned should the mother and her brood walk out on him. There are other unfortunates waiting to be charged $140 rentals for quarters worth a fraction of the sum.

What could hit where it hurts—in the pocketbook—would be the board of control heeding the complaints of people who would seem to know what they are talking about and have his shoddy accommodations declared unfit for human habitation. What can be done about it? That is hard to say. The poor we will always have with us. And with the poor are always those who will profit from their misfortunes.

What do we do about this apathy that strikes people who are really beat? They get an old TV for a few dollars, and they sit in front of it, transfixed, according to the popular image of the indolent poor. Yet we all know that the numbness of despair can take away all drive, because there is no hope. Every day a walk in the street carries its ironic overtones. Here are others who are doing well, seemingly by good fortune as much as by honest effort. Of course, from the outside that is the state of poverty we can expect a good deal of distortion of the perceptions in these matters. But there is still enough truth in the observations of the poor—that the others prosper while they do not—to cause them to throw in the towel.

I have had a fair amount of experience in and around my own constituency with professional social workers at several levels of government. The one thing I cannot abide is to be taken into a room and in answer to my simple question: "What are you doing by way of motivation for these people?" To be told, "We have this scheme going here—a hundred miles away—this project here—at Lakehead University or wherever—and this matching grant."

I am talking about the Canada Manpower Plan. They have different schemes to elevate workers through higher education, to get them into the employment field. But many of these schemes can only be found in the city of Toronto. As far as Port Arthur is concerned, many of the subjects that should be taught in this school cannot be taught at a local level.

Then when I ask, "Yes, but what about phase one, the immediate programme for here and now, at this time, in this building, for these people who, initially at least, are scared to move out of the neighbourhood because of their fears, fantasies and previous experiences? What are you doing for them?" I am all too often told, "Nothing." And so the poverty goes on, because a multi-million dollar effort, at various levels of government and endeavour, is not zeroing in on its proper objectives and targets, but is playing pie in the sky with fanciful schemes that look well on charts and in annual reports.

I will not be content until all these people who are trapped by apathy are motivated to climb the ladder to the upper deck. I have several firm proposals to put forward.

First of all, I'd like every member present to read Hansard for May 21, pages 3,129 through 3,138, and ask himself or herself, "What is my personal approach to welfare, and to the various schemes that are mistakenly lumped under the general title of guaranteed annual income?" I know myself that my idea of such a scheme is not quite the same as that of my colleague from Etobicoke. But I know that his is not the same as that of Arjay Miller of Ford, or Milton Friedman of Barry Goldwater's economic staff, and so on.

But I do know this, that despite the vast disparity of our ideas on this concept we all share one common belief: That there is somewhere in guaranteed annual income the vast saving that will be gained by taking the paperwork and investigatory manpower out of welfare, and putting all the welfare workers to work, not as Dick Tracys, but as educators in that first and vital sense of head starters, or motivators—or as the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) put it rather inelegantly but forcefully only yesterday in The Department of Mines' estimates debate: "People who get you off your fanny."

I support a concept of guaranteed annual income—a floor concept—that takes away the snooping, and makes every visit by a welfare worker to a home a positive experience, rewarding to those visited, inspiring even, giving hope. At present, so many of these visits are just for bookkeeping and statistical purposes. But people, even the most hopeless of them, are more than mere statistics. They are living souls who deserve to be encouraged and taught to help themselves. The first stage in any bootstrap operation must come from a knowledgeable friend. It doesn't take much to renew hope, provided that the right relationship is established at the start, and the absence of a means test or needs test is perhaps the first breakthrough in human relations that is needed to get an indigent person back on his feet.

Now, once a person is starting to get back on his own two feet, I want to see the means for recognition of individual ability come back. It seems to me that collective bargaining has taken all the sense out of individual pride in workmanship and an honest day's work well done, because the way we have it now, it does not differentiate between the man who does an honest day's work and the man who coasts along.

I am one of those who will be looking forward eagerly to the report of Mr. Justice Ivan Rand on the whole issue of unions, and I see from the Premier (Mr. Robarts) that we can hope to have this report in about 8 weeks. I want to take this report and use it to initiate some new thinking into the relationship of the individual worker and the monolithic pressure of the unions which is a movement, I think, that has gone too far in creating special pressure groups. If the report suggests that things are now too entrenched to allow us to revert to more sensible relationships between employers and employees, then I think that we have to counter by setting up the machinery of group participation in the democratic process.

It may well be that the NDP strength that in the past has been owed to organized labour will be more than counterbalanced by the strength that will accrue to other political parties by the group organization of those who presently have no collective voice. And I see this as perhaps the next stage in the evolving of democracy. I think that events will force us into group participation over the entire range of political activity. Among the new forms of political organization will be Action Canada, the new Canadian peace corps type of activity in which unpaid volunteers will move into the poor and underprivileged sector of our society on a voluntary basis. The formation of Action Canada is a clear warning to paid social workers to change their tactics, to forget their enumeration and statistical role, and to get on with their bootstrap starter role.

I ask this simple question. If Action Canada succeeds, how can the province then assert its right to exclusive jurisdiction in the welfare field? Occupancy of a field of interest should be like farming. There ought to be a moral obligation to farm on a farm, or to do something about the lot of the poor if you claim jurisdiction over welfare. You cannot just sit on the field. Action Canada, the new youth movement of socially conscious young people, will make nonsense of this BNA distinction, unless the province immediately changes tack on its welfare effort.

One thing I want to see the province do to retain its initiative is to put books into poor people's homes on a massive scale. I have read the Hall report, and I am familiar with how education is changing, becoming more child-centred and discovery-oriented. But what I see are vast sums being spent on resource-centre libraries, from which the children are bussed away far too early in the day for the resource to be used with any degree of efficiency. I agree with the discovery approach—in fact, so much so, that of the $1 billion a year we now put into education, I would like to see as much as $50 million going into book purchases, not in centralized school libraries which are closed for most of the time but, instead, into the actual homes of the people.

In my plan, every family below an agreed income level, say, $5,000 a year, would get a free set of encyclopedia books, and thereafter the price would be covered by a graduated subsidy. I would negotiate, as the province, for a massive printing of existing encyclopedias—the World Book, Chambers, Groliers and so on—so that there would be no suggestion that the contents were coloured by the size of the order. I am talking $50 million, and I would hope that with a printing this size, split perhaps 3 ways between the major producers of encyclopedias, we could get the cost of a set down from the present $200 to $50. I would then have supplementary resource centre libraries in the schools. I appreciate that there is some danger of uniformity creeping in here, but I think that mass education on the scale of a UNESCO operation is the first priority to raise our underprivileged people up. And if the price of that elevation is a degree of uniformity to begin with, then it is inevitable. The alternative of leaving them to stew in their poverty is far worse, and of far worse social consequence for all of us, than is the suggestion of danger through uniformity, because we have too many of the identical text around. And I should add that educational television ought to be used to supplement and explain basic ideas that would help people move ahead.

This transition period might last for 10 years. I don't think it would be a permanent feature of our Canadian life. I think we can get rid of the poor people's complex once and for all, by a massive infusion of spirit starting right now.

To sum up then:

1. I am against vested interest privilege in one highly-organized set of workers keeping everybody else down. I think that, since we probably are too late to make significant inroads into the privileged power of organized labour, we have to organize the unorganized and to enter into a massive phase of group action for democracy

2. I am in favour of a floor concept, guaranteed annual income to free welfare workers for an educational role, and to take the indignity out of being on the bottom deck of the bus.

3. I want all welfare workers to be educators, bootstrap operators or head-starters. If they cannot do this new job, then get out, and let the unpaid workers of Action Canada move into the field with the obvious consequences for political realignment in the constitutional field. No one should occupy a field who doesn't till it.

4. I want a UNESCO type "education-aid-through-encyclopedias" programme to be put into effect, at least one-twentieth of our total educational budget. And I want this programme to be backed up by educational television that everyone can receive on ordinary channels, with the oldest of sets. The poor cannot afford UHF convertors. They have to take their education on second-hand TV sets and on the channels that are there already.

5. I see the report of the select committee now studying the Smith report, and the federal-provincial tax-sharing conference in the fall, as being the two key factors in the constitutional and political realignment that will make these reforms possible.

Mr. Speaker, Canada cannot afford its present double-decker society. I want to see an equal chance and fair share for everyone, and privilege for none. Only in that way can we make unity meaningful and Canada great.

Mr. R. D. Kennedy (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this warm summer day, I reflect on another summer day 25 years ago. August 17 next is a great milestone in the history of this province.

I would like to speak for a moment on the history, perhaps the present, and look into the future for a few minutes today, with the indulgence of the House.

On that day 25 years ago, the Progressive Conservative government of the hon. George A. Drew came to power. Now in the elections held a fortnight earlier—hon. members remember it, the voters of Ontario a fortnight earlier had indicated very clearly that they could tolerate the Liberal government no longer. Now they were not that enthusiastic, they were cautiously prepared to give the Progressive Conservative party a chance to sort out the administrative mess, to re-establish a working relationship with Ottawa and to get the province moving forward again.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Pity they did not do it.

Mr. Kennedy: This is what they said, as as Jack Cahill wrote in the Toronto Daily Star on February 14 of this year; here is what he said:

> Relations between Ontario and Ottawa had thus reached, in Hepburn's time, a deep low, creating a crisis in confederation more angry than the current comparatively dignified rifts caused by Quebec's revolution.

The Ontario Liberal Party was also disastrously bankrupt and so devoid of imagination that most of its members agreed with Hepburn—

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview) Why does the hon. member use the past tense there?

Mr. Kennedy: I am quoting Mr. Cahill, talk to him.

With its budget of about $100 million and population of 3.7 million, had apparently reached a plateau of development on which it would probably remain forever.

I end the quote for the comfort of the members of the Opposition.

Under these circumstances the first budget of the new Progressive Conservative government must have come as a pleasant and refreshing challenge to the people of Ontario. On March 16, 1944, the Provincial Treasurer, the hon. Leslie Frost, summed up the Tory government's plan with these prophetic words:

In planning this budget, the government has had in mind not only the immediate needs of our people. It has constantly kept in view the great task of rehabilitating our service men and women and the work of planning and development at the termination of this struggle.

For the fine old province of Ontario there will be a great future; for our soldiers, sailors and airmen there will be a fit place for heroes to live in.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That is by Lloyd George.

Mr. Kennedy: That is what he said, and I quote:

We are building, not only for these times, we are planning for a greater population, for industrial expansion, for prosperous farms and for happy and healthy people. We are laying the sure foundation for a greater and stronger Ontario.

It was a wartime budget, Mr. Speaker, and by today's standard could be called almost minute. It forecast gross expenditures of $115 million. The major departmental expenditures were: Highways, $16.8 million; education, $15.7 million—quite a contrast; Health, 12.6 million; and Public Welfare, $11.7 million.

By way of comparison we have this year voted, in the form of grants to school boards, an amount almost five times the entire 1944 Budget. Or we could say that this year's appropriation under The Family Benefits Act is only $5 million less than the total expenditures of 24 years ago.

I think myself, Mr. Speaker, that broadly speaking, if you control the Budget, you control everything. We used to say this on the school board and I think it is applicable. But nevertheless, the quality of government is not determined only by the size of its expenditures. Good government is measurable in terms of the goals and objectives it establishes; the policies and programmes it initiates; and finally, of course, the results it achieves. That is the proof of the pudding.

Based on these criteria, the wisdom and soundness of the planning behind the 1944 and subsequent Budgets of that era has been proven beyond question. They did, indeed, form the sure foundation for the 25 years of progress which have followed and which we have enjoyed, and this is progress equalled by few other jurisdictions in the world.

I will again quote the Toronto Daily Star of February 14, 1968:

—reflect the prosperity which Hepburn, his followers and most of the long parade of politicians to pass through Queen's Park gloomy corridors since Confederation, could not even imagine.

And these are the fiscal statistics to which he is referring.

The population has grown from 3.7 million to over 7 million and this growth continues at twice the national rate. Our labour force has expanded to almost 3 million jobs. The average per capita income has jumped from $700 to $2,624 in 1967, while the gross provincial product increased to nearly $25 billion. Now per capita is man, woman, and child, Mr. Speaker, so this is no small amount.

Ontario's outstanding record of progress since 1943 is a reflection of the dedication, energy and ability of all its citizens to the task of building a greater province and nation, and I think we only need to ravel over this province to see that this is indeed true. You see signs of industry in all areas of the province and progress.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): What about up north?

Mr. Kennedy: I have been up north, too. It is a reflection of the consistently high standard of leadership provided by the hon.

George Drew, the hon. Leslie Frost, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts). It is a reflection of their dedication to Canada, for each of them rejected the narrow provincialism which had been followed by leaders of lesser stature. Instead, Mr. Speaker, these men led us, as we are being led today, along the path of co-operation and conciliation in our relations with the federal government.

It is a reflection of an economic philosophy which successfully inspires and unites the energies, initiatives and skills of our people, and these ensure continued growth and prosperity.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, Ontario's progress must be a measure, or a reflection, of our form of government and of the important contribution made throughout these years by both of the Opposition parties in this Legislature. No government does it alone, and I pay tribute to the Opposition parties—not too much—but I would like them to know that I recognize that they are here, and I sincerely hope they remain there and make their contribution.

Despite this, Mr. Speaker—in spite of these amazing results which have been achieved, including one of the world's highest standards of living—there is greater dissatisfaction throughout Ontario today than ever before. This feeling of unease is not confined to our province, but is, in fact, world-wide. Now Fortune magazine states that it has arisen in this decade—a product of such factors as the impact of technology; the revolution of rising expectations—and I would like to refer to that later; the increasing number of broken homes, Mr. Speaker; new cultural modes which deride every traditional virtue and glorify all that is perverse and subversive, and finally, the decline of religion. This is the quote from Fortune.

I would like to discuss briefly the particular aspect of this problem most closely related to economics, namely, "The Revolution of Rising Expectations." In this July issue of Fortune magazine, Irving Kristol defines this revolution as follows:

> There is nothing more frustrating than to expect the impossible as a matter of right, and yet such expectations are by now second nature to a large part of humanity.
> To see something on TV is to feel entitled to it. To be promised something by a politician is to feel immediately deprived of it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Kennedy: I am quoting Fortune, and, if you read it, you would know:

> What is called the "Revolution of Rising Expectations" has reached such gross dimensions that men take it as an insult when they are asked to be reasonable in their desires and demands. The reasonable is what they expect to obtain automatically. The unreasonable is what they look to government to provide by special ingenious efforts.
> Through its own credulity, or cynicism or both, modern government does feel compelled to promise, not only the effort, but the success of the effort. But when people are determinedly unreasonable, all promises eventually fail, and coercion of one kind or another is inevitable. In nation after nation such coercion is being desperately relied on.
> Because the U.S. is so rich and productive, our society has so far been able, better than any other, to placate the revolution of expectation. Nevertheless, there is a rising irritability, impatience, distemper and mistrust. Each individual in every organized group, whether racial, professional, economic, seeing no justification for self-discipline, and indeed, holding the very idea of self-discipline in a kind of contempt, calls for ever greater discipline to be exercised against the rest. Self-government, the basic principle of the republic, is inexorably being eroded in favour of self-seeking, self-indulging and just plain aggressive selfishness.
> This may be the inevitable consequence of affluence, with its emphasis on material goods, or it may be the inevitable consequence of democracy, with its egalitarian dynamic, but it is what is happening. Already, an entire generation exists which simply cannot believe that American school textbooks used to extol self-denial as a virtue.

I think that most members would agree that Kristol's words apply with almost equal validity to the situation in Canada and Ontario. This revolution of rising expectations is but one of the factors threatening to upset the established order on which our society is based. It is an important factor, and it must be controlled and contained if our province is to continue its growth and development. In achieving this control, legislative people at all levels have a critically important part to play, both as individuals and as members of Legislatures, councils, or their particular party.

In respect of this upsetting of established society, I would just like to mention—because I have noticed and listened to the debates throughout the course of this session – an example of socialistic irresponsibility that we have had in the session, an attitude even of inconsistency; it is in Hansard, and you can read it, too. Mr. Speaker, this occurred during the debate on the private member's resolution on citizenship training proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. J. R. Smith). This resolution from Hamilton Mountain called upon The Department of Education to initiate a course of studies designed to produce better citizens and to develop a healthy sense of national pride and purpose in our youth. I cannot see anything wrong with that, and neither can the official Opposition. The proposal was strongly endorsed by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt) who spoke for the official Opposition. However, it was bitterly attacked by two socialist spokesmen. One was the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Lewis). He said that this kind of resolution was of very little substance. The other socialist critic—and I was surprised by this —was the member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman).

He seemed to feel that it was much more important for our youth to develop critical faculties and rising expectations than a sense of civic responsibility. He said:

> You have a world in which the whole question of democracy is being questioned, and surely that is what our school system must be doing, continuing that questioning. Not just "shoring up" and convincing young people that they have privileges and they have obligations alone.
> One of their privileges and obligations is to criticize the system, and we would surely want to encourage the schools to do that. We want to teach young people to understand themselves and the system in which they live; to see the injustices in our system, to see the squalor in our cities, and ask the question "Why, in an affluent society?"

He went on to say:

> Surely we do not want a citizenship course which is going to teach them to revere Canadian citizenship.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Finish the quote.

Mr. Kennedy: That is the end of it; look to Hansard on February 26.

Mr. Pitman: That is out of context.

Mr. Kennedy: That is not out of context, the hon. member said that!

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Kennedy: I give the hon. member the quote. He said it, I did not. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that most responsible members in this House would not support teaching that encourages defiance of authority, or discredit of our Canadian citizenship.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): He did not say that.

Mr. Kennedy: No. I am saying that.

Mr. J. Renwick: The member for Peterborough did not say that.

Mr. Kennedy: Read Hansard for February 26, it is right out of the book.

Mr. Young: It was wrong then.

Mr. Kennedy: If it was wrong, then he could have corrected it. In fact, this attitude could very well foster subversion, and I would suggest—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Kennedy: I would suggest that the hon. member look up the definition of subversion in the dictionary.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this might be a suitable time for the member to carry on after lunch?

Mr. Kennedy: Okay, but we must not forget where we left off.

It being 12:30 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peel South.

Mr. R. D. Kennedy (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, prior to the lunch recess, I was making some observations on some earlier remarks by various members. For specific members, the point I would like to—I am not just sure where I finished speaking; in fact I am not sure I did finish. I think some of the Opposition were speaking at the time. I will try and pick that up.

We had the remarks from the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) as recorded in Hansard:

> Surely we do not want a citizenship course which is going to teach them how to revere their Canadian citizenship.

And this was in reference to the school programme. I mentioned such an attitude as this, if pursued to its ultimate, could result in subversion and this brought forth some observation and comment. I gave considerable thought to that word, and I looked it up in the dictionary, and perhaps I might make reference to Oxford's definition. It says:

> Overturn, upset, affect; effect destruction or overthrow of religion, monarchy, the constitution, principles, morality.

So there is quite a wide range of definitions and we will put our interpretation on it, the Opposition and the NDP can put theirs; and I am sure the people of Ontario will put their own.

An hon. member: Sock it to 'em!

Mr. Speaker: Order! The member for Peterborough has a point of order.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): I am sure the hon. member would not wish to mislead the House. The use of the term "subversion" is his own. I do not think he will find the term "subversion" in the speech on which he is commenting.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peel South has the floor.

Mr. Kennedy: I did not hear those comments.

Mr. Pitman: There is no talk of subversion in that speech. The hon. member is using the term "subversion".

Mr. Kennedy: Yes.

Mr. Pitman: Good! I wanted to make sure the hon. member made that very clear.

Mr. Kennedy: But there is a rather interesting point here, Mr. Speaker. The remarks of these two spokesmen were directly contrary to the views expressed by their leader, the hon. member for York South (Mr. MacDonald).

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Kennedy: Yes, they were. He said, in summing up the Throne Speech, that it does not reflect the sense of purpose—he was critical of the government and the Throne Speech—and direction which he had hoped this government of Ontario would bring to a Confederation under stress. It has not nurtured the aspirations of a genuine and legitimate Canadian nationalism. So, the leader of the NDP supports Canadian nationalism.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Thanks!

Mr. Kennedy: Well, I am reading from the record. But the point is that there is a great difference of opinion. And is it any wonder that I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a lot of irresponsibility and inconsistency within the NDP which leaves us confused?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Kennedy: However, I want to go on to some other things, Mr. Speaker. I would like to look—these leftists on my right seem to have really got excited over this one!

Now I would like to look for a moment at the impact of this revolution of rising expectations on the government. In the Canada of 1867, fewer than one in 100 Canadians was employed by government—federal, provincial or municipal. Today, the ratio has reached one in eight, and it is still climbing. And this is not so unreasonable because so are the services of government, and it will continue to climb as long as governments provide more services.

Now, I would like to interject here, if I might, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent), over the course of this session, continually, or periodically perhaps is a more accurate word, swipes at the civil service and criticizes their lack of energy and dedication to their task. Now this may be his experience, I do not know. But it certainly is not mine.

An hon. member: What member is that?

Mr. Kennedy: Grey-Bruce.

But in my experience, they are a dedicated group who address themselves to the task with considerable concern for their work and, with many, their service is above and beyond what the hours of work and regulations call for. So I associate myself with the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), who paid tribute to them. With 50,000, certainly they are not going to be of equal stature. I remember reading a magazine article at one time where the comment on the civil service was that, as a group, they were a highly skilled and competent group of people. So, as I say, I join the ranks of those who support the people who conduct the business of the province in accordance with their terms of reference.

To go on: Last year's spending by the three levels of government in this country rose at double the rate of growth in the nation's economy. For the first time in our peacetime history, spending by the public sector accounted for more than one-third of the gross national product. The actual figure was 34.1 per cent. That is Tory humaneness.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse our government's actions to improve its efficiency and to curtail expenditures. The Provincial Treasurer stated on March 12:

> We share the general concern about the pace at which government spending has been growing and apparently will continue to grow. We also are acutely conscious that costs and prices have been outrunning our productivity and that government deficits have contributed to the inflation which is undermining our ability to compete. What is needed to meet these problems is co-ordinated action by all governments. We must establish priorities for government spending as a whole. We must reform the entire spectrum of taxation. Above all, we must agree on a division of tax fields which will enable each government to finance its responsibilities and commitments effectively.

Now I would like to mention very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the question of welfare. In this same issue of Fortune which I mentioned earlier, there is an article entitled, "A Way Out of the Welfare Mess". I believe portions of this article are worth drawing to the attention of the members. It suggests that our primary goal in this field should be to "pull people aboard the economy," that is the phrase used.

The article expresses concern over the extent, the inequality and the numerous methods of welfare in the United States. The programme is complicated by mountains of paperwork and millions of house-to-house calls, involving an administrative overhead which amounts to at least 10 cents for every dollar received by those in need, 10 per cent according to this article.

It states further that in order to stem the rising tide of welfare dependency, the United States must turn its idle people into useful workers.

In another paragraph, it goes on as follows:

> In Fortune's view, the only objective that makes sense is an across-the-board attack on the whole problem of welfare "dependency."
> By now, it is widely accepted that this nation is rich enough to provide a minimum level of subsistence to those who have missed the train of United States economy. This means supplementing the incomes of everyone genuinely in need, through a system that is efficient and dignified and that contains built-in incentives for families to stay together and for the able-bodied to seek work.
> While children's allowances and the negative income tax have their merits, most of the same advantages could be gained by re-vamping the present welfare system. This approach should be tried before more radical change is attempted.

It goes on to say:

> Such a strategy will be self-defeating, however, unless it is coupled with an intensive effort to pull as many as possible aboard the economy.
> To get some of these people into the labour force will require not only financial incentives but education, training and a major expansion of the country's grossly inadequate day-care facilities for children.

> For some, government will also have to provide jobs as employer of last resort.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I endorse programmes of providing incentives and initiatives, as we are attempting to do, in order to get as many people as possible absorbed in meaningful work. In this manner they will maintain their dignity and pride because they will be playing a useful part in the development of our province and in improving the quality of life for all our residents.

Now there are a couple of other developments that are encouraging. On December 20, 1967, Dr. John Deutsch, former chairman of the economic council of Canada was quoted in the Globe and Mail as saying:

> The fact of the matter is that neither our governments, nor our public services generally, are well organized for the careful co-ordination of policies or programmes.

The re-organization of the Treasury, announced in the Budget Speech, into a Department of Finance and Economics and a Department of Revenue is further evidence, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, of the determination of our government to keep abreast of modern requirements and to reduce waste and promote efficiency in our public sector.

In the same speech, Dr. Deutsch also mentioned the need for decentralizing skills and resources to regional and local levels. Here again, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that Ontario is leading the way. All members of this House were delighted and pleased to learn from the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), during his estimates, that he intends to decentralize many of the present responsibilities of the department of the newly established larger units of school administration.

This is a radical, refreshing and responsible approach, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, to the problem of government as we enter our second century. I feel certain that the example set by The Department of Education can and will be emulated by others in the near future.

So, Mr. Speaker, after 25 years of progress, I think we can assert that Ontario has a great future. There is no plateau, as was suggested earlier in my remarks, in connection with a former government, no stagnation is in sight. We can still assert that our leadership is of the same outstanding calibre. Mr. Speaker, the economic philosophy of our party, I feel, offers the brightest hope of fulfilling the legitimate and reasonable expectations of our people.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, on two or three occasions I was—

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, are we going to follow the list that we agreed upon?

Mr. Bukator: May I just take one minute to put the record straight?

Mr. Gisborn: That is sufficient reason for replacing another member, I assume.

Mr. Bukator: May I just take one minute to set the record straight? I was asked this morning to speak in fourth place. I bowed out for another gentleman. I was informed that I would speak after the member for Peel South. I am on my feet, I would be happy to bow to—

Mr. Speaker: The member is quite correct. Before the luncheon period, the member who should have been speaking next for the New Democratic Party was not here. The deputy party leader advised me he would be in at 2 o'clock this afternoon but the member for Niagara Falls had been asked to fill in before the noon hour, if we ran out of time for the speech of the member for Peel South. Therefore, I think it would be only right that the member for Niagara Falls should have the opportunity now of making his address to the House because he was ready and willing to carry on before lunch time.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into the argument. I just want to correct the impression I got from your remarks. My note was simply that the member for Sandwich-Riverside (Mr. Burr) was not able to be here and, therefore, was going to take the place of the member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans) when that point arose on the list.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that is quite correct.

Mr. J. Renwick: When I informed you that the member for Sandwich-Riverside expected to be here at 2 o'clock, it was just so that he would take his place in order when the time came.

Mr. Speaker: I acknowledge the correctness of the member's remarks but I would point out that I have had an amended list. I have had two or three amendments to the amended list and I am pointing out that the member for Niagara Falls was kind enough, when time was running short before the noon hour, to come in. He came in and took his seat and was ready to proceed if it had been necessary to have another address at that time.

It is up to the party whips to arrange these lists, but I would think that out of recognition for the member's courtesy before lunch, he might readily be given that place, but if he wishes to waive that right of priority to which I think he is entitled, I have no objection to a member from the New Democratic Party now speaking, but I have no indication as to who that member might be in view of the change in the lists given to me.

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Speaker, the whips have been working very closely together, and we agreed that when one member stepped out and was replaced by another member of his own party, that that member would revert to that position. The member for Welland South (Mr. Haggerty) took the place of the member for Niagara Falls. I then reversed the names, and the member for Niagara Falls now is seven or eight down the list.

Mr. Bukator: Being a hot day, I will be no better prepared seven or eight spots from now than I am now. As you see I have my speech before me, well prepared. I am a very peaceful man, and on this occasion I would submit to another member. I am happy to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for—

Mr. Gisborn: Mr. Speaker, the notes he has before him tells him who the member is.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member for Eglinton has something to add to this discussion.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): I would just like to say, Mr. Speaker, knowing the member for Niagara Falls is a very reasonable member, I realize that he would, of course, yield the floor to the New Democratic member next. Now perhaps I can accept some of the responsibility and the blame for not giving you a modified, up-to-date version of the new list. In this hot weather, it is very difficult to get all members here when required, and what is stated by the members of the New Democratic Party, at the present time, is correct, and I will give you an up-to-date list in just a moment or two.

Mr. Speaker: It is very unseemly and unfortunate that there should be such a discussion over such a matter, and I would say to the member for Hamilton East that the whips may decide and may work things out among themselves very well, but the conduct of the order of speakers in this House rests with the chair, and unless the chair is advised by the whips, I do not think the responsibility rests on the chief government whip any more than on any of the other whips. Unless the Speaker is advised of the order and the changes, it is quite impossible for him to do other than try to bear with the members, and that was my viewpoint with respect to the member for Niagara Falls.

The matter having been now settled, I would hope that the whips—and not just the chief government whip—would see that the chair receives some indication as to how the matters are to proceed because not only have there been substitutions, there have been changes in the orders on the list that has been given to me. So now, I am most anxious to have this debate go on and everyone have an opportunity to make their speech in the proper order but if I do not know what it is, I cannot possibly pick the right member when he stands to his feet.

The member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman), I presume, is the next speaker. Before the member for Peterborough proceeds, might I ask the whips, so that we will know who is the next speaker and will at least go two speeches without being in difficulty, will the next one be the member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon)?

I will be very pleased now not to interrupt any further. The member for Peterborough.

Mr. Pitman: First may I state my appreciation to the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) for giving me the floor. May I begin my contribution by answering some of the comments that were made by the member for Peel South (Mr. Kennedy) this morning and early this afternoon?

First, I would like to congratulate him on his concession that the role of the Opposition parties in this House has been an important one over the past few months. I would like to say, personally, that this has been a most satisfying session. I would like to join the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor) in saying this. It has been valuable, it has been useful, it has been fruitful and productive; and I would suggest to you that I think the official Opposition and the New Democratic Party has played its role in making that session productive and fruitful. I think it is important that the members of the government particularly recognize the role that the Opposition does and should play. Yesterday afternoon, during the estimates of the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence), a comment was made, not quite genuinely I am sure, that delays were taking place until the session was over and until the Ministers would have time to get back to their work. And the impression was left—and it was refuted effectively I think, by the member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick)—that this Legislature is not a peripheral aspect of government, it is a central aspect of government.

The Opposition's role is to be here, to criticize, to examine and to play its role in creating the kind of democracy which both government and Opposition have an interest in maintaining in this House. Now, although it may seem to government members that on occasion we do very little in adding to the governmental activities in this sense, I think we do play a very effective role. And I think it is important that we remember that those areas in the world which we regard as undemocratic are not so because they do not have elections. There are very few jurisdictions in the world in which elections do not take place. The main difference between the democracy which we enjoy here in Canada and the western world, and those jurisdictions whcih we regard as undemocratic, is the fact that there is not an organized Opposition in the halls of the Legislatures of those countries.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pitman: That is the main difference.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): We agree with that. There is nothing new in that.

Mr. Pitman: Well I agree I am very glad to hear the Minister of Correctional Services admit this.

An hon. member: Did anybody say no?

Mr. Pitman: No, indeed. I am not suggesting that anybody has said no, but very, very often there has been a degree of impatience expressed. Perhaps not so much by the front benches as by the back benches of the government. Now, I just want to make this point clear in regard to what has gone on in this session. There have been, for example, comments from the government benches that this session has gone on too long, that it is being stretched out. Yet I think if you look at the amount of time which we have spent here in this Legislature, from the middle of February to the middle of July, it is not a long time to be carrying on the public business of this province. Indeed, if the session had begun at the usual time, the middle of January, we would have been out of here by the end of June, which would not, I think, have been an inappropriate period of time to be spending on the millions of dollars which are spent by this government in carrying on the public business of this province. And I think that this point simply needs to be made, and particularly in view of the comments which the member for Peel South gave me the opportunity of commenting on.

The rest of his comments, I must say, could not be regarded with quite the same enthusiasm. I can assure him that this will not be another period of self-renunciation. I do not intend to withdraw any of the statements which I made in that early speech in the session. In fact I think it was the first speech I made in the session. But I do think, and I do suggest to the member for Peel South that one of the most effective aspects of debate in this House is to expose real differences of opinion. And I suggest that the distortions which were brought forward this morning in regard to my comments on that date do not really expose the difference of opinion; rather they distort what was said. But I would like to continue the paragraph which the member for Peel South took the liberty of quoting, along with other parts of that speech.

It will begin:

> Surely we do not want a citizenship course which is going to teach them how to revere Canadian citizenship.

I checked my dictionary during the noon hour, and although this was an unprepared speech, Mr. Speaker, I did choose my word very carefully in this case. I did not say we should not "respect". I said we should not "revere". And what does "revere" mean? It means "regard as sacred or exalted". And I suggest to you that no man-made form of government should be regarded as sacred or exalted in any context in any country in this world. May I go on? What I did say was this:

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Pitman: Why not? I would be very glad to deal with that point right now. As long as there are people who do not have homes, as long as there are emotionally disturbed children who cannot receive treatment, as long as there are men in this province who do not have jobs, as long as there are people who are not getting equal opportunity for education, as long, indeed, as there is injustice in this province, as long as it appears that organized crime walks hand in hand with authority, then there is no reason to exalt the citizenship of any jurisdiction, because to exalt is to accept, and I do not accept that as a necessary part of a society. I would suggest as well—and I think I speak for my colleagues in that regard as well.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Hear, hear!

Mr. Pitman: To exalt is to accept; I do not accept that; I do not accept that it has to be. I think we are moving towards a reformation of those things. As well as that, I would suggest—and here I think that the member did finally agree—that the use of the term "subversion" was his own. When he suggested that I was counselling subversion, I think that this was a complete distortion.

Mr. R. D. Kennedy (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. That is not what I said. I said it could lead to that. I did not suggest that the hon. member was introducing that.

Mr. Pitman: I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if my words on that day lead to subversion, it is a turn of mind which believes that to criticize anything is to agree to subversion; it is to question; it is to be a revolutionary, and I suggest that that is not an appropriate frame of mind for the 1960's. But I would like to finish this particular paragraph and then I would like to go on with it.

This sentence follows the one which was quoted by the member for Peel South:

> What they want—and I am speaking of young people—to know is, how do you make a democracy live up to its word? Let us create sensitive, committed, concerned young people; then I think we can stop worrying about whether they will be good citizens. How do you stimulate a deep sense of national pride?

This is what we were talking about on that afternoon. A national pride with which I am entirely in agreement, but a real national pride. How do we do this? I turn again to my point:

> You create critical minds and you stimulate them.

So I would suggest that the comments of the member for Peel South not only distort but are somewhat unfair in that context.

Today I would like to deal with a matter which I think deserves some attention before this Legislature closes. During this session of the Legislature one of the most important documents, I think, which this province has seen, came before it. I am referring of course, to the report on the aims and objectives of education in the province of Ontario—what has become known more commonly as the Hall-Dennis report.

I do not hesitate to bring before this government, during this Budget debate, what I believe to be the implications of this report on the total budget of this province in the coming year and in future years.

During the Budget Speech, the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), indicated a high priority which this government has accorded to education. Here I quote:

> Of all our activities, education must be given the highest priority. Education is our principal tool for increasing the productive capacity of the economy, for creating a better society and for providing the opportunity to every citizen to develop to his fullest potential.

Now I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, if the Provincial Treasurer had placed those in the opposite order and talked about the human potential first and a better society and then, a more productive economy, he would have virtually expressed the philosophy of the Hall-Dennis report.

I wish to suggest on this occasion, that if for no other reason, the Hall-Dennis report is a very good reason for recognizing the importance of the complete change in the taxation policy and the fiscal policies of this provincial government.

We have already seen the extent to which, just in the past two or three years, education has put tremendous demands upon the resources of this province. I could mention only two or three developments which I am sure hon. members would recognize as making these demands.

First of course, the development of 19 colleges of applied arts and technology. Some of these colleges already have facilities, because they are essentially renamed institutes of trade and technology, which existed before. But in other cases it means new buildings, new campuses; in some cases it may very well mean residential accommodation. It will certainly mean a tremendous expenditure in facilities and, in equipment, to say nothing, of course, of human resources—of teachers, professors, and so on.

A second development is the decision of this government to give a high priority to the recommendations of the McLeod report. In this report it is suggested that the whole development of teacher education should take place not in teachers' colleges, as they now exist, but should come within the purview of the 15 provincial universities. Here again, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, it will mean a great cost to the province. It means new buildings, new facilities—a whole complex of costly development which will bear hard upon the revenues of the province.

A third major development, of course, is Bill 44, which we passed in this session just a few days ago. We are creating larger units of educational administration. It is, I think, completely wrong to believe that in so doing we are going to cut down the cost of education. There may be one or two areas where, because of criss-crossing bus routes, because of the misuse of human resources and personnel, there may be a saving. But I would suggest that, in total, you will find a massive demand for expenditure, particularly in the rural areas of this province. It will not cut down the cost in any sense whatsoever.

You will soon find the areas which will now be contiguous to larger centres will be demanding kindergartens; demanding French in lower grades in school; demanding guidance services; demanding a whole series of services which, at present, are found probably in only one or two or three of the most sophisticated urban centres in this province. These demands will come hard and fast, and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this will place a tremendous burden upon the local municipality.

Of course, the Minister in his comments suggested that, with a wider base and more stable municipal tax resources, it might be possible to expect municipalities to bear more effectively educational loads. But I am sure the Minister would not wish to indicate to this House that the province will be, in any way, able to throw a greater responsibility on local resources. Because, surely, every member in this House is conscious of the feelings of each municipality—that they can no longer bear the degree of expenditure at the municipal level which they have for educational costs at the present time.

To suggest that you can take the budgets of larger centres and spread them over a rural area is absolutely hopeless, as we can see. Even the municipality of Toronto, which surely has the greatest degree of opportunity to tap the widest sources of revenue, is unable to carry out its responsibility in some important areas in the educational system.

So I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that as things stand now, the priorities that have already been given to education will make tremendous demands upon this province.

If I might point to the Hall-Dennis report itself, there is some thought in some cases that the costs will not rise to any great extent, and I think once again this is a misconception and one which this province would do well to dispel immediately. There are some areas where there will not be greater costs, for example removing grade 13; although the costs will perhaps be passed on to the university level that will not be an added cost.

The ending of the lock-step system of grades—the fact that a young person will be able to be in a school and can be in grade 9, or 10 or 11, be taking courses at various levels—courses he wishes to take rather than those that are stipulated by departmental decree—these will not be extra costs.

The fact that the whole educational system will be an exploration instead of the regurgitating of facts for examination purposes, and the whole re-organization of disciplines as suggested by the report will not be an added cost. Obviously, the giving of greater initiative to students and the end of corporate punishment does not represent greater cost.

The extended use of school facilities to the municipality will indeed, I would suggest, be a means of reducing costs in other areas. But surely, Mr. Speaker, it is wrong to suggest that in total there will be a reduction, because once one gets into the meat of the Hall-Dennis report one realizes the extent to which this bill becomes a greater and greater burden upon the taxpayers of this province.

First, a system such as suggested by the Hall-Dennis report demands smaller classes, it demands more teachers, it demands better trained teachers, it demands a whole complex for the retraining of teachers, allowing teachers to take time off, and be relieved of their work, to go back for this kind of retraining for two or three months. You cannot retrain a teacher for this kind of an educational system on a Saturday morning and we must as a province accept this idea of professional development within the educational system.

It demands a whole expansion and a greater sophistication of educational facilities. It demands an expansion of our health and psychological services which are associated with schools—and this is a costly item, as every school board has realized when it has launched into this particular area.

The call for pre-school classes—all members of the Opposition, I think, and some of the government members have been calling for this—in order to give every young person equal opportunity for educational experience, in bringing young people up to a certain level before they reach kindergarten in order to get the greatest benefit from their educational experience.

The whole expanding of subject areas and the use of other people like musicians and artists and actors in the schools is a costly expenditure as one soon realizes. The development of different language studies other than French will be a costly effort. The development of experimental schools in order to keep our educational system moving with society will cost a great deal. The area of special education for disturbed children, and children who are physically handicapped, deaf, blind, which will be placed on the local scene—they will all be a greater expense to the province. The emphasis on field trips, on education outside the classroom, and other occasions—costs for buses, and the trips —all these have to be accounted for.

The province has to accept the fact that more and more of the budget of the province will become involved in education, and it will increase. As soon as the Hall-Dennis report is considered—and I hope that this will be soon—and the various recommendations approved, I think that we will have to accept an increased education cost as the nature of the future of the province.

Yesterday or the day before I said that there are two areas where a massive expansion will occur in the costs of government. One was the cost of education, and the other urban affairs and urban renewal. I hope that there will also be some areas where we will see a reduction in expenses. I am sure that the Minister of Correctional Services would be happy to see his budget reduced in terms of fewer jails due to a lack of need for them. One would hope that this educational system might create this kind of situation. So I am not suggesting that expansion is inevitable in every area, but education and urban affairs are going to occasion a demand on the expansion of the budget of this province.

I now come to what I consider my major point, and one which we have made again and again on this side, and this is recommended by the Hall-Dennis report, No. 257:

> To give urgent and immediate attention to a search for new ways of financing that will eliminate the residential property tax as a source of support for education, and that will ensure quality and equality without loss to local prerogative.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That is our platform!

Mr. Pitman: We have suggested that we must bring up the cost to the province to the point where it is paying 80 per cent of the cost of education. At the same time, we must turn to the federal government and somehow force recognition on the part of the federal authorities that the main areas of activity in this country over the next 20 years will be in the areas of education and urban affairs, and to recognize that the tax sources must be distributed in order to take into account that simple fact.

As well as that, of course, there must be recognition of the need for an equitable tax system. I would suggest that we are well on the way. We have a committee dealing with the Smith report, and I would hope that very soon there will be a recognition of the recommendations of the Carter report at the federal level. There are sources of taxation that we have not tapped, and there is an inequitable tax system now which is grossly unfair to a great many people in this country.

We cannot expect people to accept their social responsibilities in this country unless they are sure that they have a fair tax being imposed upon them. People are not so outraged by high tax as they are by unfair taxes. I would suggest to the members of the House that this is the case today. There is the feeling that there is unfair taxation on the part of the middle income salary earner, and certainly the property owner feels that he is unfairly taxed.

Thirdly, we just must, within our province, and this is tied in closely to the taxation system, re-organize to have a meaningful system of regional government where taxation can be made worthwhile. Now, in just a moment, I will suggest to the government that it is a worthwhile project, and that it is important that we look at the Hall-Dennis report, because I think that it does provide a blueprint for the future of education in the province. It is a breakthrough.

Now, I am not saying that there is anything that is essentially new in the Hall-Dennis report, but it is because of the comprehensiveness of all these recommendations that there is something new and exciting about the way in which they are integrated, and combined, and in which you create, as a result, a whole new perspective and aura, in which an educational system can resolve itself.

I would say that over the past number of years, we have not had an educational philosophy in this province. We really did not know what the educational philosophy was in the schools that were operating under the aegis of The Department of Education. I suggest that this report exposes, in what I would call the ad hoc kind of philosophy on which I am afraid most of our actions have been depended. It has been reflected in the belief that we are really producing people who will work in our society. That is certainly part of it. I would suggest that this is peripheral, rather than central.

I would suggest that the Hall-Dennis emphasis on individual development, and upon the individual educational experience and the development of the fullest potential of the individual, is the philosophy that we must turn to at the present time. Now, I said that we had been working on an ad hoc basis. This is largely because of where we have put our money, and strangely enough, not so much where this government has put its money, but where the federal government decided to put its money.

I can remember in 1960, when the legislation came down from Ottawa entitled, The Vocational Training Act, and millions of dollars were poured into the provincial system, there was no one who made any philosophical decision as to the effect this would have on the educational experience of the children of the province. If you went to the federal government, all they said was, "All we do is to hand money to the municipal authority". If you went to the provincial authority, they said, "We have nothing to do with it, all we do is to approve the buildings which have been financed by the federal government, and requested by the municipality". And, if you went to municipalities, they were not very sure essentially what it was all about but they did know that they were getting a great deal of money for nothing.

As a result of this, there was a complete re-orientation of our education system, and this spilled out, not just in more vocational courses, but ended up in a streaming system, and the Hall-Dennis report suggested that this is inappropriate in the 1960's and should be, and now is being, dispensed with in some schools in our province. It had its effect also in the guidance courses, where you had these terrible charts in each office, you know the ones, "If you stay in school long enough, you can earn $25,000 a year!"

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to you that this is a gross distortion of the purpose of education. For the first time, we have the opportunity to create a system of education based on what I would hope to be a philosophy which would receive the acceptance of everyone in this House.

I think, as well, it does not regard society in realistic terms. I do not think that it is unreal in that it is reaching for some kind of paradise.

It is real in the sense that it recognizes that certain young people do not have equal opportunity for education, because of their background, and there is the suggestion that the education, and here I quote from the report:

> Shall take all who respond to its call out of their poverty, out of the slums and despair.

It is sometimes surprising to find a report that accepts the fact that there are slums and people in despair in the province of opportunity:

> That will spur the talented to find heights of achievement and provide each child with the experience of success, and give mobility to the crippled, eliminate the dark road of the blind, provide solace to the disordered mind, and peace to the emotionally disturbed.

This is a realism that recognizes that the role of the educational system is essentially in the creation of a viable individual and recognizes, in its realism, what we have now, which are inflexible programmes. And here I quote:

> Inflexible programmes, outdated curricula, unrealistic regulations, regimented organization, mistaken aims, alienated students, frustrated teachers, irate parents, and concerned educators.

As well, it recognized the realism of the human predicament that we have in this country in relation to French-English relations, but I will not go into that.

In closing, what kind of society does the Hall-Dennis report attempt to relate it all to? First, and this, I think, is its greatest glory, it does not try to relate itself to the present society but to the kind of society that we are striving for. We are looking ahead, and the Hall-Dennis report recognizes the existence of a leisure society, which we will have by the time the young people are grown up who are now entering our education system. And for that reason, it suggests a great many subjects which are given short shrift in our education system in the past.

Mr. Sopha: Such as ballet.

Mr. Pitman: Yes, indeed, such as ballet!

It recognizes, as well, that it is a fast changing society, and that the most that an educational system can do today is to prepare a flexible young person who can change his views, and his vocation. It recognizes also that a young person will probably work at many jobs and will be trained, and retrained, and retrained, and that there is very little point in spending our efforts in the early years and trying to produce a person to fit a slot in a particular job. It recognizes, as well, a society in which I think the whole concept of competition is subverted by the concept of co-operation.

It recognizes a society in which young people will have to co-operate with each other—and this is the area, I am afraid, where most of the flak has arisen because many industrialists see a great problem arising as to what will happen to these young people as they come through their schools, where they have freedom of choice and freedom of expression, and have to fit into the kind of regimented society which we have in many areas today in this province, and indeed, in this country—where they will have to be a cog in an industrial machine. I think the recognition that the educational system has a revolutionary role in trying to change society, and trying to make it less dehumanized, depersonalized, is I think the other great achievement of this particular report.

Its effect on society, I think, will be to make it a more compassionate society where young people of Ontario will be concerned about Biafra and other parts of the world. As well, it will produce able, intelligent people who will be productive, because they will be human beings in the fullest sense of the word. Besides that, of course, you will produce—and what better way could you use your resources—a happier, fulfilled citizenry.

I think, if I might place the views of this group before this House, we stand foursquare in support of the kinds of views that are expressed by this report and we ask first that you get on with it and second that you reorganize the resources of this province to pay for it.

Mr. Reilly: Most members of this Legislature are familiar with my resolution on the order paper regarding compulsory unionism. Since private members' debates have been discontinued, I have decided to record my views on this subject as part of the Budget debate.

Some members of the New Democratic Party defend compulsory unionism by maintaining that members of other professions are denied to the right to work unless they join an organization. They have stated that lawyers and doctors cannot practice unless they join their associations and that teachers must join an organization before they are allowed to teach. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is a decided difference. Members of the legal profession are disciplined by the law society of Upper Canada. A committee of the society supervises the accounting of trusts managed by lawyers. These spot checks are carried out by chartered accountants who are retained by the law society. This society establishes ethical standards for the profession, supervises all advertising done by the lawyers, and sets out a tariff schedule for court work. In other words, bar fees paid to the law society each year are paid to help ensure professional conduct and to maintain standards which are in the interests of the public.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Eglinton would not want to be incorrect in a statement which he made, but the law society of Upper Canada does not establish any tariffs of fees for the lawyers in this province.

Mr. Reilly: I am delighted, of course, to hear the interjection by the hon. member for Riverdale, a man for whom I have the greatest respect.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That was written by a ghost writer who is not a lawyer.

Mr. Reilly: On the contrary—the hon. member for Sudbury may be interested in knowing that I did the personal research and I have no one to blame except myself if it is inaccurate. Perhaps the law society could be considered more appropriately as a licensing agency. It is not mandatory for a lawyer to join the Canadian bar association. It is a voluntary association of individual lawyers.

Regarding medical practice by doctors, it can be said that the two main bodies in the medical profession are similar to the legal profession. One is the Ontario college of physicians and surgeons and the other is the Ontario medical association. The Ontario college of physicians and surgeons is primarily a licensing and disciplinary body. This body certifies, and could decertify a doctor for malpractice. A yearly fee must be paid into the college by all doctors. Once again, this policing of the profession is done in the interests of the general public. It is not necessary for a doctor to join the Ontario medical association—it is stricly a voluntary association.

I am prepared to admit that the situation regarding teachers in the province of Ontario is somewhat different. All qualified teachers—and as a matter of fact I discussed this with my good friend the hon. member for Peterborough—as defined in The Teacher Profession Act of the province of Ontario, who are under contract or at least have an agreement with a board of education, are required to be members of the Ontario teachers' federation.

As I understand it, only supply or casual teachers who teach less than 20 days per year are exempt from membership in the OTF. Fees are deducted by the various boards of education arbitrarily and the only teachers who are exempted from membership in the Ontario federation of teachers are those who specifically asked to be exempted when The Teacher Profession Act was passed in 1944. Candidly, I am of the opinion that it should not be necessary for a teacher to join an organization in order to teach. In my opinion, once a person is fully qualified to teach and has been properly and officially certified he should be able to teach without joining an organization or should be free to join an organization of his own choice. It must be pointed out, however, that these professional groups do not officially engage in financing or promoting political parties.

It is also argued by New Democratic members and union leaders that the majority rule should govern. Indeed, a union may properly use the majority rule principle to arrive at decisions. But this should be done to conduct its internal business. It has no right to interfere with the constitutional rights of workers outside its membership. What logic is there to saying that because non-members cannot represent themselves, they must also forfeit their right to choose whether or not to belong to a specific union?

To say, as the defenders of compulsory unionism do, that the Canadian bill of rights does not intend to have the minority destroy the rights of the majority is nonsense in this context. The intention of constitutional rights is indeed to protect the minorities against the claims of the majority. It is often the only defence they have. The minority is always outnumbered, and if basic freedoms can be granted or withheld by the power of majority vote, we could very easily slip into the dictatorship of the majority. The assumption underlying the view of majority right espoused by the proponents of compulsory unionism is that truth and right are determined by the largest numbers.

It should be realized that in a true democracy the majority's civil rights and liberties are no greater than those of the minority. Both groups should enjoy equality before the law. This question of equality is a vital one. It lies at the core of justice and liberty. And so, to allow the majority to trample under foot the constitutional rights by denying the minority its freedom of expression, is to destroy the free way of life.

In this connection it is relevant to quote from the first book of the Royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. The commission's observation contains much food for thought, particularly for the power-hungry majorities. It goes on to say that:

> A majority does not abdicate when it resolves to take a minority into consideration; it remains the majority, with the advantages its situation implies, while at the same time demonstrating its humanity.

It goes on to say:

> This is political wisdom too. The history of countries with more than one language and culture shows how often rigid attitudes held by majorities have made common life difficult, if not impossible. The use of force, in any circumstances, results in either revolt or submission. Besides, for the majority to hold back from acts within its power or to allow events it would be able to prevent, out of respect for the minority, is not a product of weakness but a step forward in civilization.

At this time, it might be of some interest to review what is generally known as the Rand formula, a system which provides for compulsory check-off of union dues from all employees in the unit. A strike of the employees of the Ford Motor Company at Windsor, called by the UAW-CIO in September, 1945, terminated the following December when the union accepted the joint plan of settlement of the Dominion and Ontario governments. The principal provisions of the plan of settlement called for arbitration by a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada of points which could not be settled by collective bargaining negotiations.

As you recall, Mr. Justice I. C. Rand was named arbitrator and rendered his award in Ottawa on January 29, 1946. His award denied the union shop which had been asked by the union, but provided for a new form of union security—the compulsory check-off of union dues from the wages of all workers under the agreement, whether union members or not.

Now concerning the compulsory check-off, Justice Rand stated that the employees as a whole become the beneficiaries of union action. Then he went on also, and, when speaking about the terms of the award, said this:

> I should perhaps add that I do not for a moment suggest that this is a device of general applicability. Its object is primarily to enable the union to function properly. In other cases it might defeat that object by lessening the necessity for self-development. In dealing with each labour situation, we must pay regard to its special features and circumstances.

In other words, the Rand formula was designed for the particular set of circumstances surrounding the Ford case and is not necessarily applicable to all circumstances. This does not reflect the attitude of the member for Hamilton East (Mr. Gisborn).

It was enlightening for me to read a statement attributed to him in the Hamilton Spectator of June 7, when he was addressing the Hamilton and district labour council:

> You all know the battle we had to get union security, Mr. Gisborn said. It is the lifeblood of the union movement. If we change this, we return to the law of the jungle.

If there ever was a law of the jungle it is now.

It seems strange to me that the hon. member for Hamilton East would admit that unionism would die unless workers were compelled to join unions. Is it because the NDP would find it difficult to finance its election campaigns if it could not depend on services and moneys extracted on the compulsory check-off basis? Surely the member for Hamilton East must realize that there is a radical difference in the labour situation of today, than of 25 years ago.

Perhaps 25 or 30 years ago it was necessary to build union strength when the worker was at the mercy of some ruthless corporations. Now it appears that the worker is at the mercy of the union officials. Either the employee agrees to support the union or he loses his job.

In the same Hamilton Spectator of June 7, I was also amazed to read that the labour council endorsed a motion the Premier (Mr. Robarts) and Labour Minister (Mr. Bales) be asked to declare their position on Reilly's resolution and, if it is not government policy, to remove it from the official order paper.

What kind of stand is this? Is this a stand supported by the New Democrats? Would they deny a member of this Legislature the right to put a resolution on the order paper under the private members' hour? Is this the kind of freedom about which they glibly talk? If so, I would refer them to Abraham Lincoln who said: "Those who deny freedom to others, deserve it not for themselves". And to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said: "Freedom breeds loyalty. Coercion always was the mother of rebellion".

Another well-known public figure, Lord Soper, the eminent Methodist, when he was speaking over channel 9 TV in Toronto, said: "The worst evil in our times is the evil of force".

When Dr. Paul G. Schrotenboer, general secretary of the Reformed Ecumenical synod, was speaking to the annual meeting of the CJL foundation in Toronto, he said:

> There is freedom and justice for all in labour in principle, if not in practice, provided one has the freedom of conscience to join the union which has the exclusive bargaining rights at the shop where he works. He is not free to work there unless he joins the union and pays the union dues. He is free to join and work, or not to join and leave. But the fringe freedom he retains only underscores the injustice of the arrangement.
> Compulsory unionism and the compulsory deduction of union fees from the worker's wages mean an abridgment of the civil rights of those citizens who cannot with clear conscience join what is said to be a neutral, but is essentially a non-Christian union. This is a curtailment of a labourer's right to work. He is free to work if he sheds himself of his differences and dissent, but that is precisely the injustice of the arrangement for his fellow citizens who, although he is no better as a citizen, no more law-abiding, no more loyal to the country, no more industrious in work, does not have to leave his religious convictions at the door of the union shop.

In other words, he says you are free to join or not join—you are free to work or to starve. As was said by Shylock in the Merchant of Venice, "You take my house, when you do take the prop that doth sustain my house; you take my life, when you do take the means whereby I live".

In our free society, the free signifies the God-given right of every citizen freely to seek and retain the gainful employment which he desires, unfettered by the imposition of unreasonable or discriminatory conditions. Expression was given to this concept by Mr. Justice Douglas in Borsky vs. The Board of Regents, on page 472, as follows:

> The right to work I had assumed was the most precious liberty that man possesses. Man has indeed as much right to work as he has to live, to be free, to own property.
> The American ideal was stated by Emerson in his essay on politics, "A man has a right to be employed, to be trusted, to be loved, to be revered".
> It does many men little good to stay alive and free and propertied, if they cannot work. To work means to eat. It also means to live. For many it would be better to work in jail, than to sit idle on the curb.

Similarly, another American court has held that the freedom to associate of necessity means as well freedom not to associate. In the case concerning the refusal of Jehovah's Witnesses to salute the flag, it was explicitly acknowledged that freedom of speech carries with it the freedom to remain silent.

Many arguments have been put forward in favour of compulsory unionism but none has justified the serious abrogation of civil and fundamental rights which it involves. It cannot be justified as a form of taxation for the support of a properly constituted bargaining agent, because taxation is a sovereign power which may be exercised only by government, not by a political party or any other kind of private association. The right of the individual to be represented by the trade union of his choice is taken away by the majority vote of his fellow employees. Having been compelled to surrender this right, he should certainly not be compelled to surrender his other constitutional rights. The principle of a majority rule should not be used as an excuse for the denial of fundamental rights, which are inviolate.

Many trade unions support directly and indirectly the New Democratic Party which is committed to socialism. For example, the united steelworkers of America was a moving force behind the New Democratic Party and a founding-member of that party. To require an employee, whose political convictions are opposed to the New Democratic Party, to support the steelworkers, is political discrimination. There is admittedly a right of employees—

Mr. J. Renwick: On a point of order. Again I hate to interrupt the member but I know he would not want to be incorrect in what he says. There is no obligation on any member of any trade union in this country, which is affiliated with the New Democratic Party, to contribute one red cent to the New Democratic Party, should he choose not to do so.

Mr. Reilly: I realize the point of order and I realize how fallacious it is. I will prove, I think, to the hon. member for Riverdale—who has an open mind and is a very able person—that if an individual has a right to withdraw or to walk out, he does so with a lot of embarrassment and humiliation, and I will prove it to him.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: I will prove it to the hon. members if they give me time.

There is admittedly a right of employees to join a trade union which subscribes to certain political principles, but there is equally a right not to join and not to so subscribe.

The recent case of the Bergsmas—the two people in Hamilton who were refused Canadian citizenship because of their avowed atheism—illustrates this point. The argument in favour of admitting them to citizenship has been that freedom of religion is part of the Canadian constitution and that this freedom includes the right to be an atheist. The argument, therefore, is that in refusing citizenship to these people, the citizenship court is practising discrimination. Surely the principle of religious and political freedom applies equally to workers who affirm, as does the bill of rights: "That the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God"; and to workers who choose not to support secular trade unions and which may subscribe to political principles inconsistent with their own. The government protection promised to the Bergsmas should surely also be extended to citizens of strong Christian conviction.

In a submission to the Royal commission inquiry into labour disputes, headed by the hon. Ivan C. Rand, LL.D, the Christian labour association of Canada said:

> In this country we are raised from birth in the tradition that it is right and proper for people to march to the sound of different drums, compelled by the respective convictions honestly arrived at . . . The tradition is accepted in the areas of politics, church affiliation, and virtually all other areas of activity. We see no reason why the objective should be different when men and women go to work.

Further in their presentation they said:

> Our society secures to everyone the right to adhere to a religion of his choice and to hold a self-determined political creed.

It is surely for the individual to decide whether a particular matter engages his religious convictions and if in good faith, he determines that in all conscience he cannot support a particular association or contribute part of his wages to a particular political party, then one might hope the Canadian labour movement is large enough and mature enough to respect his dissent. In any event, as stated, we believe that materialism and secularism are as much a religion as Christianity and if the former can be freely practised, surely equal rights can be extended to those who wish to practise the latter.

It is surely not yet un-Canadian or undemocratic to disagree with the NDP! An employee might strongly disagree with the NDP-socialist view of the world, of man and of society. In every context other than that of the trade unions, it is possible to withhold financial support from a private organization which does not share one's conviction.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: If you do not want to hold your shares of corporations you sell them. There is no compulsion for you to hold them.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Reilly: What public good is promoted by the employee being compelled through dues to the union, to contribute money towards the establishment of a social order that may be the very antithesis of what he believes in? And yet, so long as political expenditures remain part of the general disbursements of the union, and so long as the union's staff and machinery are placed at the disposal of the NDP during election campaigns, and so long as the compulsory check-off is condoned by the law of the land, this disregard of political freedom will be allowed to continue. I do not disagree with the trade union contributing money to a political party. It may have every justification for doing so, providing its own funds were voluntarily donated by persons with full knowledge of its activities.

According to the Toronto Daily Star of June 22, 1968, this is precisely what local 767 of the Canadian union of public employees did. Here is part of the article—

> UNIONISTS DESERT NDP TO SUPPORT TORONTO LIBERALS
> A Canadian union local yesterday deserted the New Democratic Party and voted to "support and directly affiliate with the Liberal Party of Canada."
> At a special meeting, an estimated 180 members overwhelmingly passed a resolution that the local "fully support and endorse" the Liberal Party in the federal election and that after the election the local union should "seek out ways and means to directly affiliate with the Liberal Party."
> The resolution specified that when affiliation occurs, a portion of union members' dues would go to the Liberal Party "only if the member so signifies, and in writing" —a formula that local president Don Roach described as "opting in, not opting out".
> Roach said that when other unions voted to support the New Democratic Party, any member who disagreed had to opt out— "That is, he has to single himself out and take a perhaps unpopular stand. With us, the member has to single himself out as being willing to pay," he said.

Now my good friend, the hon. member from the back row in the Hamilton area said that there are so few of them. I did not intend to read this into the records but I will just give you an idea of what happens.

This is regarding an affiliation of local 171 of the international association of machinists and aero space workers. Maybe, I should just read the summation to you. It said:

"This affiliation of lodge 171—"

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Read it all.

Mr. Reilly: Would the hon. member like to hear it all? If it is not too warm for hon. members, with the permission of the House, with complete concurrence, I will read it all:

Local 171, international association of machinists and aero space workers, represents almost 600 hourly-paid workers at Fleet Manufacturing Limited in Fort Erie.

In 1967, local 171 defeated a motion to affiliate with the New Democratic Party. At the general meeting of local 171 in March, 1968, a similar motion was passed.

The special representative of grand lodge IMAW, privately called two special meetings of the executive committee and shop stewards of local 171. To the first of these meetings, known opponents of the NDP were not invited. At the second special meeting, all officers, committee men and stewards were ordered by the special representatives to solicit and bring to the general meeting at least 10 members who were sure to vote in favour of the NDP affiliation. Several shop stewards, committee men, and even the president of local 171 subsequently resigned.

At the March general meeting, although not previously posted or announced except at the private special meetings of officers, a guest speaker from the Ontario federation of labour was introduced. The executive officers, and the special representatives spoke in support of the NDP affiliation, well in excess of the 20 minute limit imposed by article E, section 3, of the union constitution, for subjects on political economy.

After two or three members spoke from the floor in opposition to the motion, the chair ruled other members out of order when they attempted to speak on the motion.

When a committeeman called for the "division of the House", the chair ordered immediate cessation of debate and called for a standing vote.

The recording secretary audibly counted the affirmative votes, concluding "59, 60, 61, 70". When challenged from the floor, the recording secretary with unauthorized assistance declared 61 votes in favour. The recording secretary then silently counted the negative votes, and adjourned the meeting. Their chair immediately declared the motion carried—

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): How did the secretary adjourn the meeting?

Mr. Reilly: The report goes on:

The chair immediately declared the motion carried and adjourned the meeting, in spite of loud protests that the negative votes should be recounted. No opportunity was given for further discussion, motions of appeal or further voting.

Directly after the March general meeting, a petition was signed by more than 25 per cent of the members, calling for a special meeting of lodge 171, for the purpose of rescinding the affiliation with the NDP. After several days delay, during which the financial secretary did not provide the proper forms for members wishing to "opt out" of contributing part of their union dues to the NDP, and refused to accept those personally committed and those that were personally submitted, the executive called a special meeting, but did not post the purpose of it.

At the special meeting, the motion to rescind lodge 171 affiliation with the NDP was ruled out of order even before it was seconded. During prolonged debate repeated attempts to make the motion were all ruled out of order and as were many speakers in its favour, usually by the special representative who often pre-empted the authority of the chair. The special meeting was adjourned with nothing accomplished.

Before the April general meeting the president of lodge 171 resigned. At the April general meeting, with the vice-president in the chair, the financial secretary's report included mention of a cheque in the amount of $25 to the NDP. On the grounds that all cheques of $25 or over must be approved by a vote of a membership, the members voted against approval of the financial secretary's report. During the debate the financial secretary said he had based the amount of the contribution on a probable 500 members, of a total membership of less than 600. The special representative supported him saying that "only a lousy minority" was causing all the trouble.

At the April general meeting a notice of motion was made and seconded that lodge 171 should disaffiliate with the NDP. The chair ruled the motion out of order. The mover challenged the chair. The acting president vacated the chair for purpose of debate naming as vice-chairman, a committee man who was not in order of succession for the post. He in turn, ruled the motion out of order and was himself ruled out of order from the floor. After debates between the chairman and the mover, the members voted against the decision of the chair and in favour of the notice of the motion. The special representative immediately adjourned the meeting on the grounds of violation of the constitution.

When the financial secretary continued to refuse applications to "opt out" of supporting the NDP, a properly worded petition was circulated, and was signed by 328 members, of a membership now well under 600. The financial secretary refused to accept it, declaring it illegal, and said the proper forms were now available and could be signed at the union office on company property during lunch breaks. More than 400 members—rumoured almost 500—walked to the union office to "opt out" before the executive obtained a letter from the company requesting discontinuance of this procedure.

Now at the May general meeting, after the minutes of the April meeting were adopted with some revisions, the mover of a notice of motion to disaffiliate with the NDP at the April meeting, made the motion and was seconded. The chair ruled it out of order. During brief debate in which it was ordered—it was pointed out that the chair had been overruled on this ruling, the mover was ordered to sit down, and finally ordered from the meeting.

When he moved adjournment of the meeting, it was seconded, and the chair repeatedly refused to entertain the motion to adjourn, more than half the members present walked out of the meeting. The remainder proceeded to nominate a new vice-president and elected delegates to the grand lodge convention and the basic school.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. members for the New Democratic Party talk about the option of opting in or opting out, it is quite obvious the things that happen in union activity which they themselves would not dare condone. I am quite sure—

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Where is this document?

Mr. Reilly: I am quite sure that the members in the NDP would not condone action such as I have reported here.

Mr. Pilkey: Where is that document?

Mr. Reilly: This was sent to a member of the Ontario legislative assembly here in Queen's Park and dated here as of May 18, 1968. I have it here if any of the members want to see me personally, regarding it.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Reilly: I had started to say that when local 767 decided to affiliate with the Liberal Party, it afforded the worker an opportunity to "opt in" and did not require him to "opt out", creating personal embarrassment and humiliation.

In any event, surely the moral duty to pay union dues must be coupled with the right to pay such dues to the union of his own choosing. The employee, in recognition of his good faith and of the fact that his dissent is based on principle rather than financial profit, should at least be allowed to pay an amount equivalent to union dues to charity. It is somewhat surprising that the unions which rely on compulsion in order to gain members strongly resent compulsory arbitration by government even when such intervention is necessary to safeguard the health and welfare of the population.

This was demonstrated in British Columbia during discussion of Bill 33. The hon. L. R. Peterson, the Minister of Labour for British Columbia, when speaking on Bill 33—a new Act providing for a form of compulsory arbitration in labour disputes detrimental to the public interest and welfare—said:

> When a majority of employees, in a unit appropriate for collective bargaining, belong to a union, we compel the remaining employees to submit to the provisions of the collective agreement signed on their behalf by the union. Section 8 of the present Labour Relations Act states that nothing in the Act shall be construed to preclude the parties to a collective agreement from inserting into the collective agreement a provision requiring, as a condition of employment, membership of a specific trade union.
> This restriction, fought for by labour leaders for many years, empowers labour and management to deprive a man of the right to work. How can this type of compulsion be a desirable, indeed a fundamental, part of labour's policy when the kind of compulsion I recommend, applied after the full course of collective bargaining has been run, be so hateful?

This is what Peterson asks, how can this be so hateful?

> Where is the consistency? How can compulsion be all right when labour wants, it and all wrong when the people as a whole want it?

Just as soon as government attempts to introduce compulsory arbitration legislation—even during important disputes where national interests are at stake—the union bosses cry "foul", stating that government intervention is restriction of freedom and interference with the collective bargaining process.

Union officials do not seem to understand that government has a specific duty to make sure that various groups in society, including unions, do not infringe upon the welfare, safety, health, and economic stability of individuals and the nation.

Stoppage of garbage collection in the city of Toronto during hot summer months is an example. The lack of this essential service could rapidly become a health hazard in a large city. The government has a duty to step in to make sure that these services continue uninterrupted in order to protect the citizens.

Mr. Pilkey: We have a duty to make sure they get a decent economic standard of living too.

Mr. Reilly: In my opinion the same is true when strikes threaten to cripple our nation's economy. Government intervention may have been warranted in the recent seaway strike to make sure that another precedent was not set for unwarranted, nationwide wage demands, which could have resulted in further inflation.

Under the Pearson formula of two or three years ago, wages went sky-high after the settlement with the seaway workers. At that time, I warned this Legislature that excessive increases amounting to 30 per cent become a challenge to every union leader in this country to match. It should be realized by all that excessive increases have a detrimental effect upon the economy of this nation as a whole.

A column in the Financial Times of Canada, dated June 24, 1968, states:

> Nothing is more essential to Canada's prosperity than exports; nothing so damages our export trade as the constant disruption of shipping.
> In the past few years, this nation has seen more strikes of dockworkers, ship pilots, railway workers, seamen and seaway workers than any other country in the world.

Mr. Pilkey: What has the hon. member got against workers?

Mr. Reilly: It goes on:

> For Canada, a country built on transportation, and for Canadian exports, which live by transportation, this is close to tragic.

The hon. member for Oshawa said: "What have I against workers?"

Mr. Pilkey: Yes, what has the hon. member got against workers?

Mr. Reilly: The truth of the matter is no one in this House is more pro-labour than I am. I am against ruthless actions of union bosses. The Financial Times concluded:

> Some better way must be found to cope with labour problems in such an essential service. The American seaway workers have their wages and benefits set by a formula tied to the average United States wage scale. There may be the seeds of a plan for Canada in this approach.

At this point, I also wish to make a comment or two in connection with collective bargaining in general. Bargaining is really a detestable word. It is like dealing on the marketplace, whereas it should be: joint consultation. Often the collective relation is still based on bluff, threat, deceit and aggressiveness, the spirit of ruthless power, instead of a sense of responsibility and of having a common calling. Our efforts must be directed towards replacing the practice of might with a system of right.

In my opinion, the decision by an independent arbitrator is always preferable to the dictated ruling of the strongest. I believe that it would be advisable to have the dispute between the federal government and the postal employees' unions resolved by a highly competent, thoroughly impartial arbitrator. Such a peaceful and fair method would not only benefit the parties directly concerned but also the public at large and the national welfare as well.

Most of you, I guess, saw the article in the Globe and Mail earlier this week—on Tuesday, July 16:

> THE HOSTAGES ARE ANGRY
> So long as Canadians increase their wages more rapidly than they increase their productivity, they will suffer from inflation. This has been the burden of many messages from such authorities as the economic council of Canada and Louis Rasminsky, governor of the Bank of Canada.

The article goes on to say:

> In the first place, moderate as the settlement may seem in comparison with the last seaway settlement or the recent wave of settlements, it is still inflationary.

In the second place, the loss to the public was very much larger than any possible gains for the 1,200 workers involved. One Ottawa source guessed the Canadian loss at $20 million. For some small businesses it could mean bankruptcy; for hundreds of thousands of others varying degrees of loss. It put into question the seaway itself. Shipowners distrust a seaway in which their ships may be trapped by a strike.

What we had was a 23-day strike which gained the strikers very little and cost the Canadian people a lot. Twelve hundred seaway workers used 20 million Canadians as a lever. Later this week—

And he is referring to today.

—it seems probable that 24,000 postal workers will do the same. Every time a national public service goes on strike, a comparative handful of workers holds as hostages the 20 million and the 20 million people in Canada are sick of it.

The present labour legislation grants almost unlimited power to union leaders over thousands of Canadian workers who have little or no freedom to dissent. The only choice for them is "join or starve".

Robert N. Thompson, MP, in a recent article in The Guide, the official publication of CLAC, said:

Certainly when a person's God-given right to work and when the freedoms of religion and of association are at issue, no Canadian should be denied the right to a hearing and to representation. The essence of democracy is that all men have equality of opportunity also before the bar of justice.

The steelworkers' fanatic view that all workers either support as a condition of their employment or lose their jobs, is an obvious violation of the Christian principles upon which Canada is founded. Compulsory union support is a terrible form of discrimination that should never be condoned in a nation whose sons have so often and so valiantly fought for freedom throughout the world.

Compulsory unionism violates the Canadian bill of rights and anti-discrimination laws, as well as the United Nations' universal declaration of human rights, which specifically states that "No one may be compelled to belong to an association"—article 20, subsection 2—and that "Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions and to protection against unemployment"—article 23, subsection 1.

Bob Thompson concludes his article in The Guide by saying:

If the freedoms of association and religion mean anything at all in our land, they should at least include the freedom to support the organization of one's free choice. The federal and provincial governments should, once and for all, abolish every form of compulsory unionism, for it is nothing more than a modern form of slavery.

Now, my good friend said something about the CSAO, what is compulsory about the CSAO? Some 65 per cent of the employees belong to the CSAO voluntarily and others do not have to contribute, there is no force whatsoever with the civil service workers. Let me me tell you something about Donald R. Richberg. Who is he? I thought you would ask me. He is a lifetime fighter for the legitimate rights of labour. In his book entitled "Labour Union Monopoly" he has a section called "Compulsory unionism: the new slavery." Have the workers changed? I will read the hon. members some of his excerpts, and if they like I will send over the copy, with my compliments. Here are some excerpts from it: On pages 114 and 115, here is what Donald R. Richberg says:

But today, union labour leaders are demanding that a new variety of "yellow dog contract" be legalized. This is called a union shop agreement. Under such an agreement the employer forces every old and new employee to be a member, pay dues, and submit to the discipline of one particular union, or else lose his job. The union may be a good or bad union. It may be loyal to the workers and to the government; or it may be a communist-controlled union, disloyal to both.

On pages 115 and 116, he says:

It is hard to understand how labour unions, which have developed, as voluntary organizations of self-help, to free labour from any oppressions of employer power, can justify their present programme of using the employer's control of jobs to force men into unions to which they do not wish to belong.

This is what Richberg says. On page 117, he says:

Many of the strongest friends of organized labour have pointed out on many occasions that the strength of unionism in voluntary organizations would be greatly weakened by converting them into compulsory, monopolistic organizations which, if legally permitted, will inevitably require detailed regulation by government which would otherwise be unnecessary.

And, Mr. Speaker, I know that my good friend, the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) does not share the viewpoints of all the members for the group. Certainly he would not deny people the right to work.

To continue the quotation on pages 118 and 119:

Those who espouse compulsory unionism are essentially adopting the communist theory that there should be only one party to which everyone should give allegiance and support. Inside the party there may be disagreements, but no one is permitted to go outside and support an opposition movement.

The claim of democratic majority rule by compulsory unionism is a pure fraud. Our democratic theory of majority rule is based on the preservation of minority rights and minority opposition and the possibility of shifting the majority power. But when the workers are required to join and support a union regardless of their desire to oppose it, the whole democratic basis of majority rule disappears.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I sat and listened to the hon. member for Peterborough without interjections. Even though I disagreed with him I thought in fairness I should listen to him, and if he disagrees with Donald Richberg it is his right to do so, but I am saying once again that Donald Richberg on pages 121-122 said:

What the unions really mean is that they want the power of discipline over all employees, particularly so that they will all strike, or otherwise support the union officials in whatever position they may take, which is antagonistic to management. The fact is that the increased power of discipline given to union officials by compulsory unionism is all contrary to the interest of both the employer and the free worker.

On pages 123-124, he says:

The agreement for a union closed shop is now called a "union security" agreement. This very designation is a confession that it is not the worker who is made more secure by union closed-shop agreements. In fact, he is made utterly dependent upon a tyrannical control of his livelihood, exercised jointly by the employer and the union. Only the union itself—that is, the union officialdom—is made more "secure" by such agreements. These closed-shop contracts, these "one-party" monopolies, make it practically impossible for dissenters, even for a substantial majority in the union, successfully to oppose the dictatorial control of a well-entrenched machine of labour bosses.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): When is the hon. member having his next breakfast meeting? I would like to attend.

Mr. Reilly: Well, the member is most welcome, and we would be delighted to have him. I will meet for breakfast at any time with my good friend.

Mr. Stokes: Will I be permitted to speak?

Mr. Reilly: I am always looking for converts and I welcome the hon. member. To continue quoting Mr. Richberg:

In practical result, the union closed-shop agreement destroys the fundamental principle of self-organization and collective bargaining which, during the twentieth century, friends and organizers of free labour have been establishing firmly in public opinion, public policy, and public law.

The last paragraph from Donald R. Richberg's book sums it up this way, on page 126:

The outstanding labour unions of the United States are making a mockery out of collective bargaining and destroying the essential freedom of labour by their campaign to establish compulsory unionism which should not be lawful under a free government or tolerated by a free people.

Yesterday in this House, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent), stood up and asked a question of the Prime Minister: Would the Premier indicate if he is aware that a large majority of union members are afraid of bodily injury or even their lives, if they complain or object to union policy? The members will remember it.

Mr. Pitman: I remember also the Premier's answer.

Mr. Reilly: And would the Premier advise if he is aware of many of these unions being controlled by United States union officials so that the rank-and-file union members in Ontario have little or no control?

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Does the hon. member stand at the factory gates up in Eglinton?

Mr. Reilly: Is any member of the New Democratic Party familiar with this article that appeared in a Washington paper, by the associated press, dated June 25, 1968. It said—and it answers the question that the hon. member for Grey-Bruce asked in this House yesterday:

> UNITED STATES ESTABLISHES LABOUR-RACKETS UNIT
> The justice department has formed a new unit to investigate all organized crime and racketeering involvement in the nation's labour unions.

Mr. J. Renwick: Is the hon. member charging this about Canadian unions?

Mr. Reilly: I would answer the hon. member, from the New Democratic Party, for Riverdale, who is asking me what date this is: It is June 26, 1968. I am answering him right now—"United States Establishes Labour Rackets Unit."

Mr. J. Renwick: I was asking about the book, the date of the book.

Mr. Peacock: Why does the hon. member not tell us the date of the book?

Mr. Reilly: The book is here, and I will be glad to answer the question for the members and give them all particulars on it. But do not get away from the important point that is before us right now. To continue quoting the article:

> Although the unit was formed several months ago, its existence was kept quiet until Fred M. Vinson, assistant Attorney General in charge of the department's criminal division, discussed it in Congressional testimony.
> Mr. Vinson said that the impetus to start the new unit was given in a report last year by the President's commission on law enforcement and administration of justice, which warned of organized crime involvement in labour unions.
> The commission reported: "Control of labour supply and infiltration of labour unions by organized crime prevent unionization of some industries, provide opportunities for stealing from union funds and extorting money by threats of possible labour strife, and provide funds from the enormous union pension and welfare systems for business ventures controlled by organized criminals."

In answer to the question put before us yesterday, it shows what has been necessary to it as a guide—

Mr. Pilkey: Mr. Speaker, a point of order, please. I wonder if the member is implying —could I ask through you—

Mr. Sopha: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Pilkey: All right. I want to ask a question on a point of order, and if the member does not want to answer it he does not have to. I am just asking the member, is he relating this rackets committee to the Canadian trade unions? That is all I am asking.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. You are asking the member a question. If he wants to reply he can do so.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, he knows as a union representative, that a point of order is not asking a question of a member. This is no point of order. Well, if he does not know he should know. However, I have no objection to the question. I would be glad to answer his question.

Mr. Pilkey: The question is: Is the member implying that this government ought to set up a rackets committee in this Legislature to investigate wrongdoings in the trade union movement here in the province of Ontario? That is my question, because there is implication on the—

Mr. Speaker: You have asked your question, let him make an answer.

Mr. Reilly: I welcome his question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce asked of the Premier of Ontario:

> Would the Premier indicate if he is aware that a large majority of union members are afraid of bodily injury or even their lives if they complain or object to union policy?

In answer to that I bring to the attention of this House, Mr. Speaker, that an article by the associated press in Washington says that the United States had established a labour rackets unit. That is what I brought to the attention of the members of this House.

Now, what I have been pointing out, Mr. Speaker, is that not only is it often mandatory for Canadian workers to belong to an NDP-supporting union, but it is also difficult and embarrassing for them not to pay contributions to the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Pilkey: The member has still not answered my question.

Mr. Reilly: It would be interesting—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Reilly: Apparently the members themselves are not familiar with the rules, and if it is necessary—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Mr. Reilly: I will put it in sequence and answer his question for him. Of course, Mr. Speaker, he may not have liked the way I have answered the question for him—

Mr. Speaker: The member has answered it the way he wanted to answer it.

Mr. J. Renwick: We would still like an answer.

Mr. Reilly: It would be interesting to know how much money and manpower the NDP received during 1967 and 1968, two of our busier election years. Newspapers report that unions are pouring more money and manpower than ever before into the NDP's election campaign. According to party officials about 40 per cent of NDP financial support comes from unions. In view of the secular unions' widespread practice of forcing workers to pay union dues as a condition of their employment, it is not irrelevant to ask whether Canadian workers still enjoy political freedom.

Mr. Peacock: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think there is a point of order when a member is making a speech. You can ask a question if you want to ask a question.

Mr. Peacock: No, I am making a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and it is this: that although I was listening carefully I did not hear the hon. member end the quotation from the newspaper. He continued reading into his own text, remarks which I am sure he did not find in a newspaper report about the extent of financing for the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Reilly: I am delighted with the interest and concern that is shown by so many members of the New Democratic Party. It is very encouraging to have a good audience when a person is speaking on a subject in which so many people are interested. Everything I have said here I have documented and I will be glad to give hon. members all reports in connection with it.

Since large sums of money are spent in support of the NDP—dollars extracted from workers by means of coercion and intimidation—freedom of political expression has really become a farce. All benefit, therefore, all should join. This reason is a popular one in the arsenals of the proponents of the union shop, Mr. Speaker. And they argue that the union performs many services for all the employees in the bargaining unit and that it is therefore simply a matter of fair play that everyone carry his share of the burden. Those who refuse to do their share are considered to be ungrateful and irresponsible and denounced as free-loaders.

Looked at superficially, this argument seems to be reasonable enough, but a closer look will show it to be failing at a number of crucial points. The unions demanded the right to represent all employees in the bargaining unit, giving them added power and influence, but depriving non-members of their right to represent themselves. This does not necessarily give the unions the further right also to deprive these workers of their freedom to belong or not to belong to the union. The assumption that unions always benefit the workers is decidedly not true. It is not even true that the only yardstick applied is the one of material advantage, for some unions have been known to conclude contracts victimizing the workers. However, it is probably safe to assume that such unions form the exception. Nevertheless, their existence disproves the assumption that unions always benefit the workers even if the only criterion used is a materialistic one.

But, even when considering that the vast majority of unions have contributed to the improvement of wages and working conditions, the question must be asked whether this performance may become the sole criterion for joining unions. May of those who refuse to join the secular unions are not free-riders. They are forced-riders, forced to be represented by a union that they cannot endorse. Such persons are not irresponsible. Many of them have suffered much including the loss of their jobs for their convictions. It is ridiculous to call them ungrateful, it is not their fault that they cannot endorse a certain union. Nor is it their fault that they cannot be represented by the union of their choice.

Jesuit Father Pridgeon, principal of the Catholic workers college of Oxford University, said:

> Let the unions remember that the right to work comes from God, not from them. Man is born to work and he has an inviolable fundamental right to work, and to the means to work. The right was not created by trade unions.

And along the same vein, John F. Kennedy, the former President of the United States said:

> The rights of man come not from the generosity of the state, but from the hand of God.

An hon. member: He has one of the biggest supporters of trade unions in the United States!

Mr. Reilly: Some labour leaders who piously claim to have the workers' interest at heart, make it tough for him to survive as a free Canadian.

Well, I would hope that God is on the side of all of us and every member in this House.

Despite public announcements that they are dedicated to the cause of freedom of association, labour officials often trample freedom under foot, their blows against liberty are even organized under the banner of liberty. They abuse their freedom of association by denying that same freedom to others. It is no secret that scores of Christian workers have dearly suffered at the hands of a ruthless elite of that modern machine called organized labour. These Canadian women and men stood up for what they believe to be right. They refused to buckle under, to submit to the iron yoke of secularism and materialism. They were callously pushed out of their jobs for exercising their freedom of religion in adopting the Christian way.

Mr. Pilkey: The good Lord drove the money lenders out of the temple, remember?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Reilly: More than a year ago—let me remind the hon. member for Oshawa—Michael Scanlon, William McPhee, William Thomas and Leslie Robinson, led a breakaway from the united brotherhood of carpenters and joiners of America. They failed, but the price of failure is high. The four Toronto men were found guilty and in typical "brotherhood" fashion, the carpenters sentenced these men to banishment from union office for life, fined them $1,500 each, and banned them from attending union meetings for ten years. And of what were these men guilty? Oh yes, they were guilty of exercising their legal right of freedom of association. Employment for them becomes very insecure.

This scandalous conduct is by no means something that happened in a former age. It is happening today at a time when we are supposed to be mature and when we are supposed to be coming of age. Worse yet, this persecution takes place right under the eyes of government officials who are called to administer justice and who are obliged to protect every citizen, and who shout from the roof tops about the equality of opportunity. It must be very obvious to government and to society that there is a radical difference in the labour situation today. Many changes have taken place over the past 25 years. The worker is now at the mercy of the union officials.

A section of the human rights code reads that,

> No trade union shall exclude from membership or expel or suspend any person or member, or discriminate against any person or member, because of race, creed, colour, nationality, ancestry or place of origin.

This should be amended to include that no trade union shall exclude from membership, or expel or suspend because of support or non-support of any trade union. Foster M. Russell, publisher of the Cobourg Sentinel Star, writes that:

> The human rights code is an admirable and commendable code. But it is not true that every person is free, and equal in dignity and rights in the province of Ontario. There are glaring transgressions in at least two instances where human dignity is involved: This is the right to work, and the right to work for the union of one's choice.

Mr. Foster Russell has written to the director of the Ontario human rights commission on this subject, stating,

> We are troubled because the OHRC has not provided a directive in the code as to the right to work. There are Canadian citizens who suffer the indignities of the closed shop.
> You, Mr. Hill, and your commission, should add a chapter to your code which will uphold the right to work. We hope that you will see fit to declare that any citizen of any colour, any creed, any nationality or origin will have the right to work, if he be qualified for the job opportunity, and that he will not have to join a union or pay union dues in order to secure employment.

Harold Greer, in a feature article which appeared on May 2, 1968, in the Brantford Expositor, said:

> The conditions of 1948 have long disappeared; today, in unionized employment, the closed union shop is the rule and the Rand formula is the exception. Many unions have also intensified their political activity since the formation of the New Democratic Party, and support the NDP both through monthly five-cent deductions from members' dues and, more significantly, through large donations at election time.
> There can be little doubt today that the employee who is opposed to trade unionism, or who does not support the NDP, can be placed in an invidious position—so much so that if a bill of rights is written into the constitution, The Ontario Labour Relations Act would probably be found to be unconstitutional.

Did you see the headline in the Globe and Mail last month, on Wednesday, June 5? It is almost—to use a word of the member for Peterborough—incredible that this would happen in the year 1968. It reads:

> WORKER LOSES JOB AFTER REFUSING TO JOIN UNION
> Etobicoke: John Spekkers, 42, was fired by the Wheatley Manufacturing Company Limited yesterday because he refused to join the united auto workers union. The company's manager, Mr. Rigo said, "I'm sorry John, there is nothing that I can do."
> Mr. Rigo said later that the union insisted on every employee being a member and signing a pledge card requiring to pledge absolute loyalty and allegiance to the UAW.

Where was the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. M. Renwick) when this article appeared in the press? She seemed to be so concerned about the rights of people to find housing accommodation.

Members of this House will recall that the hon. member for Scarborough Centre spoke in this House during the estimates of The Department of Trade and Development on behalf of some constituents whose leases were not being renewed. "Where do they turn to?" she rhetorically enquired. Is she equally concerned about a man whose job is taken away from him? Where is her sympathy for the person who is thrown out of a job and denied the right to work? Is she now looking for employment for him? Does she believe in this type of dismissal? I am sure that she does not. She seems to be a kind and understanding sort of person. I am sure that she does not believe that Canadian men and women should be denied the right of employment.

Today, when we are living in a society where men do not see eye to eye in regard to social and political problems, should we not provide freedom of expression? How much longer are we as a government going to deny the people the freedom to work? Are we going to deprive the worker of his inalienable right, his God-given right of employment?

Dismissal of employees is not the wish of the union worker, nor is it the wish of the non-union worker. Dismissal of employees is the ruthless action of the union bosses who cruelly dictate terms to employees. Get in line, or get out!—that is their line. And what does the New Democratic Party member for Oshawa think of this action? Does he enjoy Canadian men and women being deprived of the right to work? He was complaining in this House about the loss of Canadian control in business, and American domination. Believe me, if there is anything under foreign control, it is the Canadian unions that are dominated by the internationals with their head offices in the United States. Is the hon. member for Oshawa prepared to tell his UAW local to quit taking instructions and directions from United States UAW's? I doubt that the hon. member would be willing to quit taking directives from the United States, because between 1961 and 1966 the UAW international treasurer, without consulting the Canadian membership, sent cheques totalling more than $120,000 to the New Democratic Party, and I have the evidence here to prove it. I said that between 1961 and 1966 the UAW's international treasurer, without consulting the Canadian membership, sent cheques totalling more than $120,000 and to be exact, $120,400.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: Hon. members are interested in John Crispo, I think, over there? As John Crispo, author of "International Unionism," stated in chapter 6, page 225:

> Of the 70 international unions listed . . . 58 give the international union final power to approve locally authorized strikes. The main exception to this general requirement is provided by those constitutions which > permit local unions to engage in strike action on their own final authority but stipulate that in such cases no financial support will be forthcoming from international headquarters.

Now do hon. members doubt John Crispo? Perhaps the hon. member for Oshawa will tell us why Canadian worker John Spekkers, who for Christian reasons refused to join the UAW should be fired?

I thought I should make the hon. member for Oshawa aware—because I know he is interested in accuracy—of an interesting poll released by the Canadian institute of public opinion on July, 1967. This poll reveals that a large majority of Canadians do not approve of compulsory membership in unions—and this includes union members. I want to make that very clear, because last time the leader of the NDP questioned its validity with respect to union memberships. It is undeniable, this includes the union members.

A solid majority of Canadians still believe in the open shop. Seven in ten citizens think a trained worker, whether or not he is a union member, should be able to work for anyone willing to hire him. In fact, 67 per cent of union members voted against compulsory membership; not just citizens, but 67 per cent of union members! In answer to the question, "Do you believe that you, as a trained worker, should be able to work for anyone willing to hire you, whether or not you belong to a union?" A total of 71 per cent of the people said, "yes."

This confirms the attitude of hundreds of people throughout Ontario who have written to me from dozens of municipalities. I have received several letters from Barrie, Beamsville, Bowmanville, Brantford, Chatham, London, Oshawa, St. Catharines, Toronto and so on. A man in Orillia wrote to me saying:

> This is a great country and a great province, and I sincerely trust that legislative action will stop this ugly prejudice and discrimination before it has a chance to decay the very foundations of our greatness.

He was writing in support of my resolution that is on the order paper. I received a letter from a student who asked me if actions which bar the right to work are democratic. And he goes on to say that in this country we have the freedom of religion, of speech, as well as freedom of association. Another letter—from a small town northwest of Toronto—said:

> I do strongly object, however, to the fact that people who conscientiously object to membership in certain unions . . . are forced at present to either deny their conscience or be deprived of their work and livelihood. This is an essential conflict with the Canadian bill of rights and with Christian concept of justice as well as with the democratic principle of respect for the individual's freedom of association and for the convictions of the minority.

A minister of the gospel from Grimsby, Ontario, writes to me saying:

> No one should be forced to join a particular union as a condition of employment. Some of the ideologies, methods, principles and practices of certain unions might conflict with one's conception of the Biblical view of work or labour. Surely in our free and democratic society we do not want to force people to support ideas and movements with which on principle they cannot agree.

Members of the men's club of a church in St. Thomas write saying that they fully endorse my resolution and it is their firm belief that no Canadian should be compelled to belong or contribute to an association. At their meetings they have discussed this motion at length and believe that in order to protect the individual's basic rights, legislation must be enacted to safeguard it.

Here is another petition signed by over 50 people in opposition to the closed shop: "Indeed, unions should not coerce or use compulsion on members—it should be voluntary", reads part of their statement.

A note received from Barrie, Ontario, states:

> At the present time we are unemployed because we objected to joining a secular union, not because we begrudge the financial contributions, as we have willingly given an amount equivalent to union dues, to charity all the time the union has been certified for this company. We mention this since some would quickly like to close the issue and suggest that our major objection is the financial contribution to the union.

It goes on to say:

> Why must we be enslaved, why is the personal responsibility to be true to our convictions taken away from us? Firstly without having been given the privilege of reading the constitution of this union, we were expected to sign a contract as a condition for employment. Secondly, through this union we are compelled to support a political party for whose members we do not cast our votes during a federal or provincial election.

Why do the socialist labour movements and the members of its pet political party become so intensely hostile and intolerant when certain of their questionable procedures and their claim upon absolute authority over Canada's labour force is being investigated? Why are they so anxious to obtain conformity? Why must we all be reduced to robots by all-powerful organizations which are associated with a political party whose supposed aim it is, to defend the rights of the individual. And here I have an article from the Cobourg Sentinel Star, entitled,

IT TOOK TWO YEARS FOR THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN CANADA TO REVERSE ITS STAND IN THE RIGHT TO WORK ISSUE

> At the 94th general assembly in Knox College, Toronto, June 12, 1968, the commissioners of the church unanimously voted that in this year, designated human rights year by the United Nations, we affirm the right of all Canadian citizens to work without coercion from any quarters.

The motion was moved by Dr. William Fitch, minister of Toronto's influential Knox Presbyterian church and seconded by Mr. Norman L. Mathews, QC, a prominent Toronto lawyer. The Presbyterian church's unequivocal stand is a confirmation and an enthusiastic endorsement of the position propounded by the United Nations in its universal declaration of human rights which states:

> No one may be compelled to belong to an association and everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work, and to protection against unemployment.

The 94th general assembly clearly rejected the secular union's widespread practice of forcing workers to support them as a condition of employment. Now is the time for other leading religious bodies to uphold man's right to work—one of the greatest rights known to man.

It is too bad the hon. member for Oshawa has to leave because I was going to tell him about what Mr. Raskin has to say, Mr. Speaker. Is he going to leave or is he just going to tune in as Speaker?

An hon. member: They are going to put him to work.

Mr. Reilly: Now as long as the hon. member for Oshawa, who is now the Speaker, does not rule me out of order, all will be well.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I want you to listen to what Mr. Raskin has to say about labour conditions today:

> Historians of American institutions may record this as a period in which the labour movement was innovating itself into the grave.

This shocking prediction comes from the persuasive pen of Mr. A. H. Raskin, who, for many years, was national labour correspondent of the influential New York Times. Mr. Raskin, a friend of organized labour, observed already in 1963 that:

> Labour organization in its present form is being hurled inextricably into obsolescence. The process will be neither swift nor dramatic, but unless the labour movement can arrive at a drastic re-assessment of its function, it appears inevitable.

Mr. Raskin is not alone in his contention that all is not well. Allow me to quote what Mr. Fred Nicoll, the outspoken national vice-president of the Canadian brotherhood of railways, transport and general workers, recently said about the Canadian unions' predicament and challenge.

> The whole area of relations between union leaders and the rank and file should be opened up for thorough debate and discussion. Membership apathy to unions and their operations has become a serious challenge to the movement. If the average member thinks of his union as merely the negotiator of annual contracts and processor of grievances, how can his interest be aroused and maintained in day-by-day activities of his local and his union? If self-interest is his only motivation, how long will he remain loyal to the union in periods of adversity?

Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to notice that a man like Samuel Compers actually supported the principle of voluntarism. He founded the American federation of labour on the bedrock of voluntarism. He believed with his whole soul in personal freedom and democratic government and in the ultimate triumph of voluntary human co-operation over any form of compulsion of dictation. It is also interesting—and particularly interesting to the member for Riverdale, and for the member who is now sitting as our Speaker, to hear the note from David A. Morse, director general of the international labour office. I am sure he will not disagree with him. He said at the opening conference for industrial relations in Toronto in October, 1965:

> But, the need for a new look at collective bargaining goes even further. Its adequacy as an instrument even for dealing with the issues for which it has traditionally been responsible—the fixing of wages and conditions of employment—is being called into question. This issue arises particularly in western Europe where the almost general attainment of full employment has completely changed the conditions in which collective bargaining takes place.
> In some countries, and in some industries, unions have acquired almost unlimited power to push up their members' incomes, and employers, whose bargaining powers have correspondingly declined, tend, in conditions of labour scarcity, to bid up wages and hoard labour in order to maintain a labour force superfluous to their present requirements. Such practices are putting a severe strain on national economies and, by creating strong inflationary pressures, seriously threaten the maintenance of normal growth rates and the social objective that economic growth seeks to achieve.

He goes on to say:

> Trade unions will, in the coming years, have to undergo a complete reappraisal of their role in society. In a sense they have become victims of their own success. There can be no doubt that if living and working conditions have improved so radically in the past few decades, if the great majority of workers today enjoy a standard of living which would have been quite inconceivable 20 or 25 years ago, this is very largely due to the energetic struggles waged by trade unions on behalf of their members.
> But it is precisely because they have fought so hard, and with such success, for the rights and status of the working man, that unions need to widen their functions and role in society. They have achieved a strong bargaining position and they are using it to increase the share of affluence for their members.

Do you know what David Morse says? He says:

> They are no longer defending working people from starvation. Their members are no longer the underdogs of society. The underdogs are the unemployed, the poor, the aged, the oppressed, the under-privileged, who continue to exist in our so-called affluent societies, but whose interests the trade unions in most countries today are not equipped to defend as energetically as they could or should like to, in spite of their long and honourable tradition as spokesmen for the less fortunate.

And finally, David Morse says in the conclusion of his speech:

> A consensus which actually reflects the interests and aspirations of all the forces in society is not a negation of freedom; on the contrary, it can only serve to strengthen the social and economic fabric of a free society. What we need to aim at is not a society in which limitations are placed on freedom of expression and freedom of action, but rather an educated society of responsible men and women capable of looking beyond their own immediate interests to those of the community, and, indeed, those of the world at large; leaders concerned with developing the individual personality and community as a whole. To achieve such a society will call for courage, imagination, new thinking, ability and ingenuity from the leadership of both sides of industry.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, what all these leaders of labour are saying is that the genuine strength of the union should not lie in its captive support, but in the voluntary allegiance of employees who are in agreement with its principles and aims. Man's God-given right to work should be safeguarded and not be subjected to attacks for the benefit of private organizations which spend their funds in support of social and political philosophies with which some workers totally disagree. I believe that all men should enjoy—it would appear that it is necessary to say it and to repeat it in order that some members of this House will get the message—should enjoy equality of opportunity in a democracy and that no Canadian should be discriminated against in his employment.

I believe that compulsory unionism is a form of discrimination. I believe that section 3 of The Labour Relations Act should be obeyed, namely, that every person is free to join a trade union of his own choice. Ontario has been a leader in the field of civil rights and liberties. Our government would do well to consider the provision of article 20 of the United Nations' universal declaration of human rights which Canada has pledged to uphold, of which the Ontario human rights code is a provincial extension, and which states that "no one may be compelled to belong to an association".

Compulsory unionism in any form is entirely unacceptable to freedom-loving Canadians. And, as mentioned previously, the Canadian institute of public opinion, July 22, 1967, revealed that a solid majority of Canadians, over 70 per cent, believes in the open shop, and that 67 per cent of the union members feels the same way.

Mr. Speaker, I subscribe to the thoughts expressed by the executive secretary of the CLAC in a recent article entitled, "The Closed Shop Is Wrong", which appeared in the Kingston Whig-Standard.

> The closed shop is wrong because it deprives the employee of his civil rights and liberties; his freedom to support the trade union of his own choice; his God-given right to gainful employment; his right to give public expression to his basic beliefs; his right to speak freely without fear of reprisal; his right to decide how he will meet his social and political responsibility.
> The closed shop is wrong because it violates the Canadian bill of rights, the United Nations universal declaration of human rights which declares that no one may be compelled to belong to an association.
> The closed shop is wrong because it often forces the employee to promote financially and otherwise, a view and way of life and labour inconsistent with his own; to support a political party and philosophy alien to his own; to participate in activities which he cannot in good conscience endorse; to promise allegiance to principles violating his own; to make an unconditional pledge of union obedience.
> The closed shop is wrong because it infringes on the employee's freedom and right to follow the dictates of his heart; imposes on the employee a labour organization and programme of someone else's choosing; degrades the employee to a captive union supporter; subjects the employee to a dictatorial union rule.

Mr. Speaker, to conclude, I quote the Prime Minister of Ontario on human rights:

> Let us then re-dedicate ourselves to the task of tearing down walls of prejudice wherever they exist, and in their place build bridges of understanding and mutual respect, so that all the members of our multi-national Ontario family may, through full equality of opportunity, give of their best to the economic development, industrial expansion, social advancement and the cultural and spiritual enrichment of our great province.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I use this document as a basis of my talk this afternoon and sometimes after listening to the speeches in the Budget debate I am wondering whether I, as a newcomer, was unaware of the latitude which is allowed in Budget debates. But I have often thought it is a great time in a way to be able to talk about the Budget, many months after it has been brought in. And also, at a time when we had an opportunity to see in much greater detail what the Budget estimate and Budget provisions here will mean in actual dealings and actual results with the people of this province.

The major factor of course, in the Budget estimates, is in the field of education and also in the related fields of health and social and family services and services to people that the province—and only the province—can provide and provide well.

But one of the great problems that I have seen in the estimates and in the bills and legislation that come before this House, has been the rigidity, the cog in the mass machine, that we witness in the way we are providing our people with education; providing them with the social services.

We have regulations that behind which so often we hide instead of using the tools; the resources of the province to deal with people as individuals. In the field of education, we are building tremendous institutions; institutions that are the last word in the architect's eyes, the last word in the eyes of many educators. And yet we have more and more people every day seeking out little independent schools in an old house, on top of a group of stores, where their children can get what they feel is a much better education.

Why do they consider it a better education? It is not because the facilities are better. It is because in those little schools—the Montessori, the French school, or the Thornton school—whatever school it happens to be—there is a one-to-one relationship developed. There is a relationship whereby a student no longer feels absolutely caught in a tunnel or a ditch down which he has got to flow, or be sometimes diverted off to one vocation or another. He is dealt with in an open area with a man who is interested in awakening his interests, in sparking his desire for greater knowledge.

And I am of the opinion, after reading and studying the estimates, listening to the debates, that this province should recognize this need that people are making great sacrifices for. They are paying money they cannot well afford to send their children to these Neil McNeills and other schools, for religious, for language, for many reasons—and we must not think that only through these mass institutions where we put the child, as a cog in a machine, through a mill, we must develop other avenues of spending our education dollar.

We will find that if we study the operation of these schools in many instances their costs of operation are well below ours—per pupil cost—in the public system. And if people are desirous and prepared to spend their dollars we should recognize and give encouragement to them, and we will probably have some interesting new results, new devolpments, in educational methods if we do so. This is one of the great problems of the mass system that we feel we are forced to resort to when we have a large Department of Education with great responsibilities over-centralized. Everybody talks about the efficiency of over-centralization. We lose our efficiency if we are not getting down to the child, to the student, and awakening his interest.

An example was brought to my attention recently in Parry Sound, where I had not realized that a court case had been launched by residents of that area, people who say: "Our children are going to exactly the same school as before, the conditions are no better than they were before; all we are doing is paying twice the taxes we were before they centralized this." They do not see any increase in the personal interest given their children. All they know is that they themselves no longer have an opportunity to express their personal interest as trustees, or in some other method toward the better education of their children.

We have got to get away from the assembly-line treatment. It shows up in The Department of Social and Family Services. Recently I had an opportunity to visit the Villa hospital near Thornhill, which has many youngsters—some in their early 20s—who were in a hospital in Toronto, I think it was Bloorview hospital—but they are now in the Villa in their wheelchairs. And the one thing those youngsters want more than anything else is an opportunity to do something of service; to feel that they can contribute something in their lives, whether it be from a wheelchair or not, to this world. They do not want to be just a charge on the community.

And they put on a performance, which the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) witnessed one night—a performance which was a credit to any group, in their singing, in other things that they were able to do. So these youngsters can contribute. I have seen in mentally-retarded schools, creations and achievements that have come—not from the mass, beautiful educational institutions we have created but only through the interest, that one-to-one interest and dedication of teachers. And it is interesting to note that these smaller units of operation are the ones where the best people like to go. They will sacrifice their wages; they will take a lower salary, to get to a place where they can get a one-to-one relationship and see the students respond and achieve greater degrees of accomplishment than otherwise would be expected from them.

Another field of the province's responsibilities that has disturbed me greatly is that of housing. The major role in getting new housing moving is that of providing the services and getting the municipalities to agree to residential subdivisions which contain perhaps houses assessed well below their ability to carry themselves in the way of services. And recently the role of the Ontario water resources commission was brought to our attention very, very forceably. Many of the members of the House will recall 15 years ago Premier Leslie Frost introduced the Ontario water resources commission with a great fanfare. It was going to be the Ontario "Hydro" of water and sewage. It was going to be the wholesaler, the producer, of the facilities that people need in their homes in the way of water supplies and for the treatment of sewage, not only in their homes but in the industry that they worked in.

And what has happened in those 15 years? We have seen one pipeline built from Lake Huron to London. We also receive every week or two public relations bulletins from the Ontario water resources commission describing small plants or wells that have been drilled, work that has been instituted to clean up the pollution of industry here and there. These are all important in themselves, but none of these projects has been a major project envisioned by Premier Frost when he first introduced and brought forward the legislation for the Ontario water resources commission. These are not the Niagaras, the St. Lawrence projects; these are not the major plants that the Hydro has been producing. We should be seeing major projects of the Ontario water resources commission in this province. They have been restricted to a role of negotiating piecemeal, here and there, little agreements with municipalities.

A very, very demeaning situation occurred a couple of weeks ago, when the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett) announced the approval of a small plant south of Richmond Hill. Now to many of you that will not mean very much because he mentioned the fact that this new small plant would be serving the hospital addition that is required there and a new school. He said it would also be serving 400 acres of land south of Richmond Hill—but restricted only to the 400 acres. Now that 400 acres is owned by people who were represented before the Cabinet by Mr. Hollis Beckett.

And Mr. Beckett's clients have been able to override, in effect, the stated policy of the Ontario water resources commission over the past nine years that they will not permit any more package plants. They have been able to override this stated policy by going to the Cabinet and saying, "We need these houses that they are going to build on this 400 acres of land." No other people that own hundreds of acres of land around there are going to be privileged in this way, because for some reason or another it is felt perhaps that no one wants to build on land around, except on those 400 acres.

But that particular approval of that plant is given solely for the benefit of that developer. This is not sound policy; this is not achieving what we are wanting to do in the way of opening up new housing opportunities, places where developers can go in and build homes around this expanding part of Ontario. We are continuing to do the job piecemeal. And it is putting the role of the Ontario water resources commission in a ridiculous light when they are going to villages and towns within 50 miles of this city and saying: "No, you cannot have a package plant, it is against our policy." Yet, the Cabinet overrides the situation and says: "You can have a plant which will serve the 400 acres owned by the clients represented by Mr. Beckett."

How can we have a strong water resources commission? Where is that great Ontario Hydro, for water and sewers, going when the government takes that policy? This is the type of piecemeal, day-to-day-putting-out-the-fire approach which is wasting our taxpayers' money; because in another ten years it is almost certain that a properly integrated plant for the area will be put in, and by that time the plant that is now being considered for that area and will be constructed soon, will be removed.

Who pays for it? It is not the developer, of course; it is the householder. And he is just wasting his money because the province is failing to deal with the situation in the way that it originally said that it would, and the way that the people would approve it, by giving the OWRC a basis by which it can go forward on an overall integrated provincial plan for providing water and sewage facilities on a planned basis.

They should designate areas where the province desires to have development occur, and then have the OWRC put the plants in, financed by their own bonds guaranteed by the province. In time we will have a bond of OWRC just as acceptable in the marketplace as Ontario Hydro bonds are today, without need of guarantees. But let us get on with the job. Let us not leave it to these small deals with each municipality.

Then, perhaps we can face another problem that is causing supply and demand in housing to be so much out of balance, where demand is far greater than supply, and where each year the price of land goes up, causing people to believe that there is only one way for land value to go, and that is up. Anyone in the House who remembers the 1930's will remember that land prices can go in another direction. They will go down to reasonable levels at such time as we provide the services, atmosphere and conditions where the supply is in excess of the demand. It is not the developers and speculators holding on to land, that is driving prices up. It is because they cannot put the land into development. They are restricted both by lack of services, and the fear of municipalities regarding their own financial position if they allow low-cost residential housing.

Look at Pickering. This is an excellent example of what happens if you do the socially correct, and the right thing for the people in the province today, permitting a lot of residential development to go ahead.

Pickering is in dire financial straits and restricted by the Ontario municipal board because it has overexpanded residentially. And it is because of its tax and financial position that industry hesitates to go in there today. We can deal with that problem by recognizing the need for an adjustment period between the time that residential development goes in and industry goes in.

If we provide a ten-year subsidy to the extent required for that low-cost housing to carry itself, which would decline over a ten-year period and give the municipality time to adjust, then we will see a tremendous change in the attitude of municipal councillors toward applications for development.

Combine that with improved regulations regarding planning requirements, and the implementation of official plans as quickly as possible in the area where the demand for housing is greatest, and thereby enabling the speeding of the process of development, and we will see a big change in the cost of land in this area. By so doing we could easily effect a 33.333 per cent cut in the cost of housing today. I state this because the average cost of a serviced lot in the Toronto area at this time is $12,000. The cost of that lot rightfully should be of the order of $3,000 to $4,000.

People say: "How can you put out a $3,000 or $4,000 lot, when the services required by municipalities cost that much in themselves?" The answer is that they do not need to cost that much.

Many of the demands of municipalities are unreasonable due to the fact that they do not want the residential subdivisions to go forward; they try to hold them back. I am certain that we can bring down the cost of a 50-foot lot in this city a lot closer to $3,000 from $12,000 and thereby reduce in a major way, the cost of a home to the individual.

The role of local government is a point that I stressed in the estimates of The Department of Municipal Affairs, because I see, in local government, the best media whereby people can express their wants. Local government deals with people on a day-to-day basis. It is the reason that I personally, and probably many others in this House, entered political life. It was because you were interested in people and local government, and you found that that was where you were dealing with people every day. And probably you were so frustrated in your dealings with The Department of Municipal Affairs and the province, that you decided to go to provincial governmental levels and try to do something about it.

I think that we should be working hard to do something about it. I think that we should be working to the point where we are giving direction in broad parameters and giving basic wholesale services, and basic subsidy when it is needed, to municipalities, but leaving the decisions and the operations to them.

The other day one of the members mentioned that any municipality, to be visible, had to have a population of 150,000. There is no standard figure that makes the most efficient population size in the province. You cannot standardize these things. In an area like this it should probably be 250,000 or 300,000. But in other parts of the province, it might be 20,000. We have to look at individual situations. Let us not constantly build up and set up standards, let us look at the actual conditions on the ground and work with the people locally to see what they need, and develop what they want.

I am pleased to see in some fields that the government has shown its willingness and desire to work with private business. The Ontario housing corporation's work in its agreements and jobs that it has done with certain private developers in providing housing, and student housing, is a good example of where savings of 20 to 25 per cent have been achieved by the ingenuity of private individuals in developing good low-cost housing for our people. But the big problem with housing, I state again, is that the government of Ontario must provide the services, the financial assistance that is conducive to maximum housing production.

In the Budget debate and in consideration of our own position as Canadians, as to what we owe to this province, there has been much said about big business and how bad it is. I think it would be appropriate that in the light of these, I should read what the president of Studebaker-Worthington Corporation, a major American concern, had to say about his views on the responsibilities of big business. These are what I have found personally to be the case in the predominant number of firms today. He said:

> I am happy to say that throughout the private sector of the economy today, there is a rapidly growing realization that money spent on social improvement not only is good corporate citizenship, but also makes plain, good business sense. The original concept, probably first publicly expounded by Henry Ford, was to lower the cost of the product so that more customers could buy. This business has accomplished, but we are also now beginning to see the wisdom of raising the income of large segments of our population so that they too can become customers.

Industry does have a social conscience, but even if that were not a consideration, we just have to act out of self-interest. Industry cannot indulge in the luxury of letting George do it. There are indeed other Georges, with forces equal to those of industry, and I refer to governments, unions, schools, churches and many others. But while their social obligations may be more obvious none is more dependent upon the socal health and stability for long-range survival, than industry under our free-enterprise system. There could not be a riot or disturbance anywhere in the continent today without disturbing the production and marketing at Ford. Is Ford going to be interested in alleviating the cause of riots? You bet it is! It follows then that the successful manager of today, and most surely for the years ahead must be well trained in the social sciences, as well as in the technical sciences, for he has a host of responsibilities beyond those of production and distribution.

He must see to it that training is provided for the so-called hard-core unemployable because his country cannot afford to waste its human resources. The free enterprise system cannot reach its full potential while there is a segment of the society that does not share its benefits, and through despair, frustration, suspicion, threatens the freedom necessary for our system to survive.

He must participate actively and vigorously in improving his community even if his actions are only from enlightened self-interest.

My point is that industry, particularly large industry, will increasingly act to fulfill social obligations because social stability and the accomplishment of the aims of our society are so closely related to the future growth and prosperity of business itself.

Now the hon. members say this is hogwash, but it is not hogwash. A lot of what we hear in this House and the views that we shout out sometimes in jest and with not too great sincerity, are attitudes and situations of 100 years ago, our attitudes towards unions and our attitudes towards big business. I have seen as much ill will on both sides and good will on both sides. It is not parties, it is people. It is not systems, it is attitudes. Freedom of choice.

One of the greatest thrills I received in the last few months, in fact in a long, long time, was a recent announcement in our local paper, the Markham Economist and Sun, of a group of Ontario scholars—eight of them listed there and three of them were from one family, three of them by the name of Day.

The eldest girl was with her mother and father in Trinidad when unfortunately her father was shot in a riot, or some uprising that suddenly occurred in the street when he was just an innocent bystander. Her mother brought this young daughter home, and later twin girls were born, and she bought a little home in our local village. I am sure that their income during this period has been at a rate far below what most people would consider a subsistence allowance. They lived right beside the railway tracks in a little house. But that home, with its personal interest, with the involvement of the parent who was struggling to provide, with the interest of the community—whatever was inside those girls in hereditary background—has resulted in three Ontario scholarships in one year.

Those girls are all out serving their community in one way or another. They are a tribute to our free enterprise province. We do not want to have a condition arise where we have an increasing feeling on the part of people of this province that the government of this country and of this province is a mother hen, looking after us, seeing that we do not get wet, or whatever happens to be the case.

We want to be in a position where we can be free individuals with the greatest maximum opportunity and choice for all. We want to have the satisfaction from struggling and achieving and then, only then, will the people of this province be worthy of the opportunity that they are given by living here.

Mrs. A. Pritchard (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for a few moments on the economic progress which Ontario made in 1967; then to consider the outlook for 1968 and, finally, to mention briefly some of the most successful initiatives taken by this government to maintain and stimulate the pace of economic growth and development.

Once again last year, the growth in output here in Ontario was well in excess of the national average. The increase was 7.8 per cent to a total provincial output of $24.9 billion, as compared with an increase at the national level of 6.8 per cent. Discounting prices increases, Ontario's real economic growth was 3.7 per cent, again a full percentage point above the national average.

Economically speaking, our province is one-third of Canada. We now account for fourth-fifths of the nation's fully manufactured export goods. Of last year's total increase in Canadian exports, Ontario accounted for some 90 per cent. A major proportion of this growth was in automotive exports to the United States, which last year exceeded $10.25 billion.

During the year 132 major new manufacturing plants opened in Ontario, representing investment in excess of $91 million. A further 262 companies expanded their facilities significantly. Mineral production soared 24.5 per cent to exceed the $1 billion figure for the first time in the province's history. The estimated gross value of farm produce rose by 8 per cent to $1.4 billion. In the total of public and private investment, Ontario out-performed the rest of Canada by 6.8 per cent as compared ot 3.6 per cent. The provincial labour force grew by a figure of 115,000, while 95,000 new jobs were created. Unfortunately unemployment rose from 2.5 per cent to 3.1 per cent, but this compares very favourably with the unemployment figure of 4.7 per cent for the rest of the country.

Throughout 1967 Ontario continued as one of the leading growth areas in Canada, contributing in very large measure to the gains enjoyed in the national economy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to turn for a few minutes to the specific topic of women as candidates in election campaigns. First of all, to give you some background in this regard, we should go back to the 1963 provincial general election. In that campaign, out of 108 seats available, the Conservatives nominated three women, Liberals three women and the NDP eight.

When the ballots were counted, I, unfortunately, was the only woman elected in the campaign and became the first woman ever to sit on the government side of the Legislature in our province's history—and, I might add, only the third woman ever to be elected to the Ontario Legislature.

In the 1967 election, Progressive Conservatives nominated three women, Liberals the same, the NDP nine and one Independent. This was out of a total of 117 seats, so you can see that while there were more seats available the percentage of women candidates overall decreased. Quite frankly, as far as federal elections are concerned, the situation is even worse and I advise the members here to read the Hon. Judy La Marsh.

I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I disagree with and disregard the somewhat historical fallacy that women voters will not support candidates who are female. In many ridings men candidates are in fact more afraid of a woman opponent than a male candidate simply because they believe the women will vote for a woman. Yet the myth has been created that women voters will not vote for women candidates. This is sheer nonsense.

Therefore we have a paradox—that while parties do not select very many women candidates, they rely on women workers in the constituency to get them elected on voting day. It seems to me that if women are capable enough to run a campaign it is only reasonable to expect that they would also make good candidates.

Yet our parties, and here I am referring to all political parties, show too much hesitation in nominating qualified women as candidates in an election campaign. Quite frankly, what happens all too often is that normally when women are nominated they are in ridings which the party is willing to write off as a loss—without a chance of winning.

As an example, an examination of the ridings with women candidates running in the October 17 election campaign—the not unexpected result was that of the three Progressive Conservative women who were nominated ran first, second and third in their respective ridings. All of the three Liberals placed second and the NDP with one notable exception—the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. M. Renwick)—whom I welcomed most cordially—ran third in all of the other eight ridings women contested under their party banner.

I believe that political parties ought to nominate women candidates not only in seats where they consider they have a good chance of winning, but indeed in seats where the party is strong, both in popular terms and in organizational terms. Until parties change their attitude to women in this regard, women will suffer from a great deal of discrimination as far as the electoral processes are concerned. In my view, this is not only a loss to political parties, but indeed to the whole country. It is an accepted fact that women control 80 per cent of the spending power of our nation.

Since women candidates would have special opinions and concerns, particularly in those areas so vital to the well-being of her family—such as rising food costs, housing, clothing and the impact of education on the family budget—more women in politics would have a dramatic effect on government policy.

In addition to this, another complaint that women have is that so few women are appointed to important boards and advisory committees, which would give a more representative view and be in line with the percentage of the female population. It is most important, therefore, that political parties begin to separate reality from fantasy and shake off the old attitudes by increasing in very real terms, the representation of women within their ranks, not just as door-knockers, tea-servers and telephoners in election campaigns, but also in the highest ranks of the party, which, of course, are the candidates in election campaigns.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I emphasize that fundamentally all women are interested in the home and the preservation of the race—an obvious outgrowth of this concern is the necessity for women to take an active interest in all levels of government—to study the terms and conditions under which they and their families live, and, wherever possible, to offer themselves for public office—and strongly support those who do.

Local government is closest to the people and a challenge. Also, there are no impediments in qualifications—a candidate need only to be over 21 years of age, an owner or tenant in the municipality and a British subject—with a nominator and seconder, plus an active campaign.

Mr. Speaker, while on the subject of women, I must admit I was horribly shocked to read in Hansard the statement made by the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans), on Thursday evening, July 11. And I quote —I believe the hon. member was referring to an ombudsman:

> I think that this shows what is really wrong—that, generally speaking, the consumer associations are just a bunch of women. And I say, "just", not to be derogatory, but they are a bunch of ordinary people who get together to discuss the problems that they have personally faced. But they have no way of making forcible, continuous representation.

Mr. Speaker, the organization of the Canadian association of consumers was set up soon after the war, in response to continued demand for the information cards then issued by the wartime prices and trade board on consumer products and prices, the federal government invited the national presidents of all the women's associations in Canada to Ottawa. To name a few—the national council of women; the imperial order daughters of the empire; the young women's Christian association; the Catholic women's league; the Jewish women's association; and the business and professional women's club. From this gathering the consumers' association of Canada was born.

Organization was set up at the municipal, provincial and federal levels. The hon. Ellen Fairclough was the first provincial treasurer and I had the privilege of being the first president of the Hamilton association and let me assure the hon. member for Wentworth that this association has a distinguished background. They had a direct line through their municipal, provincial and federal associations to Ottawa and, believe me, were listened to with great respect.

I will not take the time to enumerate all the improvements and recommendations which were adopted, but I could not permit such a derogatory remark—even if the hon. member feels it was not intended that way—to pass without enlightening the House as to the dedication and ability of one of the foremost women's associations in Canada, and to enumerate just one or two of their important contributions.

Three small items that were accomplished were the standardization of sizes of children's wear to conform to build, rather than by age—and believe me, hon. members, we had a tough time getting any changes made by the manufacturer. The removal of the red-lined cellophane wrapping on bacon—again, it might sound trival but you can now see what you are buying and this was done by the consumers' association. The addition of important vitamins to canned products; the proper and true packaging of products.

While I admit that there is still a long row to hoe, the contribution of this organization is very significant. Not the least of their accomplishments is the leaflet which is put out quarterly giving information, to the membership who subscribe to it, on all aspects of consumer purchasing and current problems which are of such consequence to the housewife of today.

Mr. Speaker, we are without doubt the most affluent of people in the world. The high standard of living which we enjoy—the educational facilities, recreational, medical, and hospital services, all reflect an ever-increasing cost to the consumer and, inevitably, to the taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, it is most regrettable that, due to the ever-increasing cost, the government had to increase Ontario hospital services premiums. As an example, a study of the Hamilton civic hospital costs shows very clearly the problems facing the administration. Wages and salaries comprise approximately 75 per cent of the total operating costs. I quote the actual figures for the most recent years:

1965, 75.4 per cent; 1966, 77.1 per cent; 1967, 73.6 per cent; 1968, 74.8 per cent.

From this information, it can be seen that the bulk of expenditure relates to wages and salaries—because the product is service. Another element involved in hospital cost structure is the increasing sophistication of patient care. Technical advances in the field of medical care are occurring rapidly and dramatically, resulting in an increase both in numbers of personnel to provide new services, as well as the need for more highly technical personnel. This, Mr. Speaker, is a brief résumé of a picture which is relative to all the public services.

1967 was a most memorable centennial year—with Hamilton second to none with its amazing and elegant project—Dundurn Castle. Another great event worthy of record was the miles for millions in Africa march, which started from the city hall at 9:00 a.m. on Saturday, November 4, 1967. Around 17,000 participated and 10,000 completed the walk of 35 miles. The majority of walkers were teenagers and the amount raised was $192,000, the highest I believe in Canada.

The morning was chilly and part of the route was across the beach strip. It was a valiant effort. Mayor Copps finished the walk and I was very proud that my 14-year-old granddaughter was one of the gallant 10,000 — a great achievement.

Mr. Speaker, I am more than gratified to remind this House of McMaster University's great good fortune in acquiring as a gift the Bertrand Russell papers. This extremely important and valuable material cost the university not one penny. It was made available by the generosity of public and private sources, foundations, individuals, alumnae and friends, as well as of Earl Russell himself. Sums ranged from $255,000, the gift of the Atkinson charitable foundation and the $150,000 Canada council grant, down to the smallest individual contribution.

I know that all members of this House would wish to join with me in thanking Earl Russell and all those whose generosity made this acquisition possible—and in congratulating McMaster University on its good fortune in acquiring this great literary treasure.

Mr. Speaker, I compliment the government of Ontario on its ever-increasing housing programme, particularly in the field of the senior citizen. Senior citizens' housing is being continuously improved in Ontario and in Hamilton we have presently underway some 545 units in the Jackson Hess complex and an expected 395 units in the Martinique site.

Just recently I discussed housing in general with the Minister, the Hon. Stanley Randall, who was most considerate and concerned. He agreed with me that a condominium development close to the downtown area would be most suitable to house a group of people needing accommodation within their means and hitherto not considered in the area of economic housing. I refer to the widow and single woman either employed in a low-income position or retired on generally a much lower pension than that enjoyed by her male counterpart, and yet not eligible for pensioners' apartments by reason of the age restriction. Also an increasing number of retired people no longer able to take care of a home and garden with its normal responsibilities.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this group usually can afford to take care of a small apartment but in view of the continuing escalation of rents and the cost of living there emanates a fear of what might happen later. I feel a condominium development would give them peace and security of mind, as they are in a position to buy these units, if necessary with a minimum down-payment, and retain that feeling of independence so vital to their well-being. I would urge this government, through the Minister, to thoroughly investigate and construct such a development in Hamilton.

In closing, it was my privilege this week to attend a seminar of the Hamilton geriatric society formed in 1967 under the chairmanship of Mr. Russell Frost. Dr. J. A. MacDonell, the well-known geriatrician of Deer Lodge hospital, Winnipeg, was the speaker. Mr. Frost in his address gave a detailed report on the plan to create a geriatric service centre based on St. Peter's infirmary. The objective is to provide all possible gradations of care according to the specific and changing needs of the individual.

There will be institutional care for the chronically ill, residential facilities for the aged, with the skills and facilities necessary for such institutional services supplemented by a social and recreational centre. Comprehensive day care will be available to assist in keeping elderly people out in the community in their own environment. The goal is not merely to prolong life but to prolong living by combining these services under one administration and on one campus.

We believe it will be possible to achieve the greatest possible integration and effectiveness. Most of the property needed has already been acquired. The Hamilton city council has promised a $2 million grant. Discussions have been held with the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko), whose department was represented at the meeting, and I pray this government will assist this so-worthwhile endeavour to the utmost.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, in the waning days of the first session of the 28th Legislature, it may be appropriate for me as a new member to give one or two of my impressions of this House.

One impression is the inability of Hansard to indicate the tone of voice and the seriousness or the facetiousness of any individual speaker; and I offer no solution to this. Hansard can hardly insert expressions such as "with tongue in cheek" or "with a twinkle in his eye"; but the trouble arises when a ghost writer, while preparing a typically anti-social speech, comes across a sentence containing a phrase such as "to revere Canadian citizenship" and proceeds to turn it into an out-of-context quotation.

Now no member who heard the speech of the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) on February 26 took exception to what he said or misunderstood what he said about citizenship courses. But almost five months later this phrase about "revering Canadian citizenship" turns up in a government member's speech in an effort to embarrass the hon. member for Peterborough. This results from one of the shortcomings of Hansard.

An early impression of the Legislature—I might say, Mr. Speaker, that these maps were very helpful. We over here have a very close-up view of the Conservative rump and there is only one word to describe it, it is handsome, but as I look across as far as the back benches, my vision becomes somewhat less accurate and my impression somewhat less favourable. I saw early that there was one man who was a "Kerr" and another man who was "Meen", and then there was a man who even admitted that he was a "Gross man"—and I hope Hansard will not make this look too bad, Mr. Speaker. There was one member who was almost "Crass."

Now the backbenchers of this government, you must admit, have their "Price", he comes from St. David. But looking to the Liberal members we find much more respectability. I found a "Knight" and a "Deacon." Of course, we have "Deans", even more respectable, I think, than "Deacon", but they have only member who is really "Good" and only one "Bright Hope"—Breithaupt—in the whole lot of them.

Now, after my maiden speech, Mr. Speaker, the art critic for the Globe and Mail, Arthur Bryden, raised doubts about my poetic ability. I had not realized at the time that what I was saying sounded like poetry. It had no rhyme, it had no rhythm, which I believe is the basic ingredient of poetry, although nowadays that may have gone out of fashion. But I should have risen, I suppose, on a point of privilege because I am afraid that his comments on my poetic ability may have jeopardized my position among the ten immortal poets of Canada and this inspired me to prepare an epic poem, or to start an epic poem, entitled "The 28th Legislature." I should like to dedicate this, Mr. Speaker, to—well I do not see anyone better than yourself. Now, I might explain that this poem was composed by me without any assistance—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Does he get an autographed copy?

Mr. Burr: —and I would like the member for Downsview to realize this. I composed it myself, I wrote it myself, I have even memorized it myself, and I can recite it "no hands." It goes like this:

Winkler with gestures—
Winkler, Winkler, Morningstar,
How I wonder what you are,
Yakabuski up so high,
Dr. Dymond in the air polluted sky.

At that point, Mr. Speaker, I think the House deserted me and has not been around since.

An hon. member: It was the pollution that cut it off.

Mr. Burr: It may have been.

Before I leave the subject of poetry, Mr. Speaker, as a kind of tribute to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon) I should like to recall a poem that was current in 1945 when he was only a high school student, I suppose. But at that time, I believe, his father was the leader of the official Opposition in the 1945 election. The CCF leader was Mr. Jolliffe, and Hon. George Drew was the leader of the Conservative Party; and this little poem went the rounds of London, Ontario. I do not know whether the member for London South (Mr. White) wrote it or just what its origin was. As far as I know it is anonymous but it went like this—the election was in June and the Legislature would be meeing in the fall—

Oh what a Jollification
There will be in the early fall,
If the province says nix on Nixon,
And Drew drew not at all.

The Jollification did not take place, but that is one of the remnants of that election campaign.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on May 2, I attempted to read into the record a report by Dr. George L. Waldbott, of Detroit, Michigan, on the effects of air pollution in the Dunnville, Port Maitland, Cayuga area. This occurred during the estimates of The Department of Health, but after a point of order was raised by the hon. member for London South, I agreed to postpone this report until another occasion, and the hon. member for London South suggested the Budget debate as a suitable occasion. It was my original intention to read the whole report verbatim. Instead I shall attempt to shorten the report. Any hon. member who may wish to have the complete report is welcome to receive one as long as my supply lasts.

The report opens with a customary recital of the author's qualifications and experience. This actually runs to three pages. I shall reduce it drastically, but to me some of the most impressive facts mentioned are the following:

Dr. Waldbott was co-founder and president of the American college of allergists. He was the founder and chief of allergy clinics in four different Detroit hospitals. He is the president of the Michigan branch of the American college of chest surgeons. He is the secretary of the newly-founded international society for fluoride research. He is the chairman of the air pollution committee of the Michigan allergy society. He was the first to report a fatality from the use of penicillin; he was the first to report a lung disease caused by smoking which eventually leads to emphysema and other disorders; in fact he has had published more than 180 articles of original research. Most physicians would be proud to have one such article to their credit. Dr. Waldbott has over 180.

About 13 years ago this work as an allergist and his experience with intolerance to drugs amongst his patients led him to the study of the effects of fluoride on the human body, and consequently he has made urinary analyses for fluoride on more than 300 individuals. He has had analyses done for fluoride in food, in eye cataracts, in bones, and in other organs of the body. In the course of these studies he has compared normal appearing aortas with calcified aortas, normal skin with diseased skin, normal lung tissues with diseased lung tissues.

He has travelled to Florida, Texas, Italy, Switzerland, Sweden, Belgium and Germany in order to observe personally, and to obtain data on fluoride damage to livestock, plant life and humans, and this was the purpose of his visit to Dunnville last September. When the CBC programme "Air of Death" publicized the dangerous situation, a three-man committee was appointed under The Public Inquiries Act. Dr. Waldbott visited Dunnville, or the area, on two occasions—September 13 and November 12, 1967, and he interviewed 18 persons. He had five of these go to Detroit for personal examination. Two of these five were hospitalized in Detroit for laboratory studies and consultations with other specialists.

In his report Dr. Waldbott explains carefully the kinds and degrees of fluorosis in different environments and the wide spectrum of symptoms that make diagnoses so difficult even for one who has considerable experience in the field. Out of consideration for the members I shall skip this part of the report although I realize that I may be doing the doctor an injustice in so doing.

How Dr. Waldbott diagnoses fluorosis in the Dunnville area, however, I shall report almost in full. I am now quoting Dr. Waldbott:

> One of the experts at the enquiry stated that he had never encountered a case of fluorosis, yet he maintained that he could diagnose fluorosis as readily as he could leprosy.

Now may I interject, Mr. Speaker, that he must surely have been referring to dental fluorosis, or mottled enamel, the cause of which was discovered over 30 years ago, and that it is about the only disease that could be subject to instant diagnosis.

> Those who have observed cases of chronic fluoride poisoning cannot share this viewpoint.

There is a parliamentary phrase for you—"cannot share this viewpoint".

> Fluorosis is difficult to diagnose, especially in its early stage. As in most other kinds of chronic poisoning the symptoms are vague and develop slowly and insidiously. Since fluoride can accumulate in and adversely affect any organ, numerous other ailments resemble chronic fluoride poisoning. Objective physical signs are sparse and no specific laboratory tests are available which would pinpoint the diagnosis. Furthermore there is no way of eliminating completely fluoride from food, water and air. Therefore, evaluation on a basis of elimination procedures, as in drug poisoning, is difficult.

Moreover, the medical profesison is constantly being assured that the disease does not exist. Physicians have not as yet been alerted to its manifestations. A recent report by two Mayo clinic physicians—this is in the Journal of Urology of 1966—demonstrates that even an advanced case, with characteristic skeletal changes, constituted what the authors called a "diagnostic riddle" for years before it was correctly diagnosed. It was eventually proven to be due to fluoride in water naturally.

In another classical case of fluorosis, a resident in a natural fluoride Texas area was hospitalized on many occasions. The disease was not diagnosed until after the patient had died of its complications. This is reported in the annals of internal medicine in 1965.

In Spain, Professor Soriano at the University of Barcelona had observed an unusual bone disease amongst alcoholics since 1953. It was not until 1962, nine years later, that he began to consider and eventually prove fluoride as a cause of the disease. After a medical meeting in high-fluoride Lubbock, in Texas, where Dr. Waldbott presented data on chronic fluorosis, X-rays and the records of two cases of chronic fluorosis were presented to him. The diagnosis had baffled their physicians until they were alerted to the disease for the first time at this meeting.

Another dilemma with respect to the diagnosis of fluorosis is the fact that the average physician and nearly all hospitals in Canada and the United States lack facilities to carry out reliable analysis of fluoride—in spite of the fact that fluoride pollutes the air in nearly every industrial city and is now being consumed and imbibed more than ever before.

Thus, says Dr. Waldbott, even some of the most competent physicians have no personal experience with the disease and must accept the dictum and writings of those who deny its existence. When they do consult textbooks they find only limited space devoted to the subject.

The experts whom they consult, like those who appear before the commission, have dealt mainly with statistics and biochemical data. Their personal experience with individual cases is limited or lacking. Those who do encounter chronic fluoride poisoning are either employed by, or received their research grants from, industry. According to their contract agreement with the corporation involved they are not always free to present the available data to the profession if it is contrary to the corporation's interests—this is documented.

Health officials on the other hand must rely on data which industry-sponsored scientists have provided because very little research independent of industry is available in the English language literature. Furthermore, before much knowledge of the disease was available, health authorities in Canada and the United States had committed themselves to the concept that persistent fluoride intake of minute amounts is harmless. Paradoxically they have inaugurated a vigorous campaign to combat air and water pollution but damage by fluoride—one of the most important pollutants—has been given little or no attention in public health literature. This neglect in the literature contributes materially to the difficulties in recognizing chronic fluoride intoxication. In fact, because of this lack of knowledge, two Port Maitland patients who complained of arthritis and colitis were told by their physician, even before they were examined, that this condition is not related to fluoride.

How then can it be determined whether or not fluoride emission near Erco has caused illness?

Dr. Waldbott outlines four steps. First he says that excessive exposure to fluoride by those afflicted must be established. Second, other diseases to which the symptoms can be attributed must be ruled out. Third, the possibility of specific criteria to further pinpoint the disease must be explored. And, fourth, the symptoms among the afflicted persons must agree with what is known about the disease in the medical literature on fluorosis.

Although one must allow for variations from person to person, the characteristic features of the disease must be present among those afflicted. So the first question is,

"Were the afflicted persons execessively exposed to fluoride?"

Dr. Waldbott answers:

> With respect to exposure, no air contaminant other than fluoride etches windows. No other produces the characteristic exostoses on the ribs of cows, the lesions on their legs associated with the typical stance, gait and painful outstretched forelegs. No chemical other than fluoride produces the characteristic fluoride damage to the tips and margins of leaves.

All these features were encountered in the Port Maitland area and were demonstrated in a CBC film.

If data are available to the commission at Cayuga which tend to show, first, that the air in the Dunnville area contained fluoride levels within so-called allowable limits; second, if it shows that bones contain less fluoride than would harm the animals; and, third, that urinary fluoride excretions are within so-called normal limits, then there is urgent need for a careful examination of all available figures and for revision of the standards which have been set up arbitrarily by industry-connected scientists.

Dr. Waldbott says that since cattle have died of fluorosis in this neighbourhood; since herds have been wiped out; since fruit trees have been destroyed; since the afflicted individuals were drinking water containing up to 38 parts per million of fluoride; and since the dust which covers nearly everything in the area contains about 1 per cent fluorine, one must challenge statistics set up by biochemists, who maintain that there is not sufficient fluoride in the air to be significant.

Actually the data on which these scientists depend cannot be accepted without careful examination of each individual figure. The data vary from day to day, from season to season, with different weather conditions, such as wind direction, humidity, rainfall. They vary with the topography of the location and the data vary with the kind of vegetation and growth in the area—with the individual animal, plant, or human, and with many other factors.

Whereas many humans can tolerate relatively large doses of fluoride without apparent ill effects, no two cases react alike. Individual differences in reactions between people are the rule, rather than the exception.

Even for those of us, Mr. Speaker, who are laymen the following examples are of some interest. Dr. Waldbott says:

> I have observed severe shock and a grave condition from a single test dose of as low as 6.8 milligrams. In another individual one milligram of fluoride administered as sodium fluoride, in three glasses of water produced, within ten minutes, abdominal pains so severe that I had to resort to narcotics.

This is the kind of personal experience which can never be brought out in statistical studies. An air trapping device exposed above the surface of the soil does not record the amount of fluoride in the dust which has collected on food and water at the dining table of the afflicted person's home. There has been heavy exposure to fluoride in the Port Maitland area.

The second step suggested by Dr. Waldbott is the elimination of the possibility of other diseases and this is what he says on that score. This is quite brief:

> After three months of extensive studies by some of Canada's most competent specialists, it was admitted before the commission that no diagnosis was made on one of the patients. Neither was the case of another patient adequately diagnosed during his Toronto hospitalization. Recognition of the presence of arthritis, gastritis, colitis, piolitis, or hyperparathyroidism does not suffice to rule out the existence of fluoride intoxication, unless other specific causes for these diseases have been determined. Indeed when a patient exhibits the combination of several diseases as in the Port Maitland cases, physicians usually search for a single underlying cause. No cause was established by the attending physicians in any of the patients.

The third step suggested by Dr. Waldbott is exploring the possibility of specific criteria for fluorosis. And he says:

> There are no specific laboratory or clinical tests which would pinpoint the diagnosis of fluorosis. Serum calcium and phosphorous levels may be above or below normal values. The alkaline phosphatase in the blood is often increased. There may or may not be disturbed kidney, liver, or bone marrow function. Gastro-intestinal X-rays may show evidence of gastritis and spasticity in bowels.
> Fluoride determinations in urine, blood and bones have been used as criteria of fluoride damage to the system. Actually they are of limited value in permitting conclusions concerning the fluoride intake, and of much less value in assessing harm to internal organs by fluoride.
> The fluoride content of urine varies from hour to hour, from day to day. It is dependent on how much fluoride has been absorbed in the gastro-intestinal tract, or eliminated through the bowels, skin and salivary glands. It depends on how much fluoride was stored in the system prior to the time of the tests and on innumerable other factors. For instance—

Well, I shall skip a paragraph or two here, Mr. Speaker.

Fluoride analyses of blood is equally as unreliable in pinpointing damage by fluoride. Dr. Tidey reported on fluoride values in four members of the Warnick family.

This was one of the families in the area, all of who were examined.

All were taken in February at a time when there was much less exposure to fluoride than during mid-summer. Nevertheless Mr. Warnick's blood even then contained 0.7 parts per million, an unusually high value. In five out of 16 cases of advanced crippling fluorosis in India, the blood values range from 0.5 to 0.8 parts per million. Similarly the fluoride content of bones gives no information concerning the fluoride concentrations in any other tissue, and certainly none about damage to internal organs.

The thesis that there cannot be skeletal fluorosis unless bones contain about 7,000 parts of fluoride is no longer tenable in the light of recent observations. Soriano, Singh and Pinet report crippling fluorosis in individuals whose bone fluoride ranged from only 600 to 1,800 parts per million. [These findings, I might say, were made in 1961, 1965 and 1967.]

Probably the most reliable method of pinpointing damage to a certain organ is the analysis for fluoride of tissue of the affected organ. When Sauerbrunn finds in the liver 61 parts per million of fluoride, when Call finds 258 parts per million in the aorta, when Herman finds 181 parts per million in the kidney, the implication made before the committee by Dr. Martin that little fluoride reaches soft tissue is erroneous. If such values were correlated with existing symptoms, they might furnish considerable information concerning damage to fluoride.

Finally, a skin lesion was described in 1967 by two groups of scientists in Italy, which may turn out to be a major criterion of the disease. It consists of a small, round, dry, blue or brown lesion of the size of a dime or quarter, simulating a bruise. It appears suddenly on arms or legs or trunk, and clears up spontaneously in five to ten days. The incidence of this lesion in a population near a fluoride-emitting factory varies with the distance of the factory from the patient's home.

Dr. Waldbott says:

I have seen these lesions repeatedly in patients poisoned by fluoride including the two Port Maitland individuals.

Now, the fourth and final step in the diagnosis: Dr. Waldbott says the findings must be in agreement with what is known about fluorosis in the medical literature, and on this score he says:

In reviewing the medical literature it must be recognized at the outset that with such inorganic fluoride compounds as are present in the Dunnville area the fluorine content determines a toxic action of the compound. In most instances it does not matter what kind of factory emits fluoride compounds, or whether the compound is derived from water, air or food. Furthermore, we are not concerned here with dental and skeletal changes; they are not likely to play a significant role, since the factory has been in operation only for seven years.

In addition to the classical work by Roholm, detailed studies of the disease are at hand, particularly in the Scandinavian countries. Czechoslovakia, Germany, Italy and Belgium—in which manifestations have been described in addition to the well known dental and skeletal changes.

In the United States, skeletal fluorosis has also been reported. Unfortunately, reports in the United States' medical literature are incomplete. They have been interpreted by authors who have had little or no previous personal experience with the disease. Four fatalities, however, have been reported: two from natural fluoride water in Texas, and two from artificially fluoridated water in 1963 and 1965. From an Indian reservation in Arizona, 22 cases of fluorosis were reported—these were in 1965—and surveys on 23 and 21 additional cases are also available. The two Texas patients—

I am trying to shorten this, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I might help the hon. member out, because it is obvious that he is not going to conclude before the dinner hour, and it being now six o'clock, I do leave the chair.

It being 6:00 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, most pertinent to this enquiry is the perusal of a court record of three members of a farmer's family in Troutdale, Oregon, residing near an aluminum factory, which had been in operation only four years. These important cases were not presented to the medical profession. However, the data recorded at the trial suffice to permit conclusions. Windows were etched, vegetation was damaged, and cattle had died because of fluoride emissions.

According to the transcript of the trial, Mr. Paul Martin—this is the instance where the family collected $35,000 damages—Mr. Paul Martin had diarrhea, gastric disturbances, and a distended abdomen. He had arthritic pains in the spine which radiated into the legs so that he could not bend down to tie his shoes. He had a dry cough and shortness of breath, urinary disturbances, and evidence of toxic hepatitis.

His wife, Verla, was afflicted with the same symptoms, the liver function was normal but the kidney function was impaired.

The daughter, Paula, had arthritic pains in the spine, difficulty in breathing, arthritic-like pain and swelling of the ankles, combined with urinary and gastro-intestinal symptoms. She too had hepatitis and a low-thyroid function. This description of the disease again confirms the wide spectrum of symptoms, and, as it will be seen, is identical in every detail with the illness of the Maitland area farmers.

Other cases of "neighbourhood" fluorosis have been published in the medical literature abroad. These were in the medical journal, the British medical publication called the Lancet in 1946. And Dr. Waldbott gives a condensed reproduction of the essential data on eight members of a farmer's family in England, living near a fluoride-emitting ironstone plant. That is presented in table 5. It features gastro-intestinal symptoms, rheumatoid pains in extremities and respiratory difficulties. He then goes on to tell about his own experience with human fluorosis, during which he had occasion to examine more than 100 individuals, at least twenty of whom had extensive tests in consultation with other physicians.

He then lists the two groups of symptoms —the neuro-muscular ones and the gastro-intestinal ones, which I shall not attempt to list. And he says the most striking feature of the disease is extreme progressive exhaustion, with increasing loss of mental acuity, loss of memory, and loss of ability to concentrate. Eventually the patient becomes completely disabled. Some patients manifest irritation of salivary glands which in conjunction with excessive thirst, polydipsia, is often associated with a tendency to chronic tonsilitis and pharyngitis, similar to that seen in sensitivity to iodine.

> Objective findings are: limitation of motion in the spine, decrease of muscular power of the arms and legs, fasciculation of muscles, hyperhydrosis, abdominal distention, tenderness upon palpation of the abdomen, dilation of retinal vessels. The disease is reversible.

Then he gives an account of the various cases that he examined, and I shall not go into the details of these, but they are very instructive for anyone who is interested in this particular disease. He says:

> During my visits on September 13, and November 12, 1967, to Dunnville, I estimated that only four out of 18 persons interviewed were afflicted with fluorosis. Since then, I have learned by examining five patients personally and by processing the findings of all cases, that this estimate was too conservative. Out of 18 persons who complained, 10 were definitely, and seven probably, afflicted with fluorosis. The diagnosis is based on the clinical findings of the disease which are identical with the illness which I reported in three medical journals.

Now, I shall skip the various details of the cases, and come to the recommendations, as to what is to be done about these people.

I shall summarize these. These are his recommendations:

Of the 20 individuals investigated by Dr. Waldbott, 10 were definitely suffering from fluorosis, and several others were suspected of this slowly developing, progressive disease, characterized mainly by arthritic changes, gastro-intenstinal symptoms, and other symptoms now recognized as important features of fluoride poisoning. He lists various recommendations for the afflicted people. The first is that the opportunity should be created to move away from the polluted area. Secondly, all sources of fluoride should be avoided, and third, he recommends certain medication which should be provided to counter the fluoride's effects. He further recommends that laboratory facilities for fluoride analyses should be made available to hospitals and physicians and finally the data of the new clinical research being done on fluorosis and published in many countries should be disseminated to all persons active in the public health field.

Now, his bibliography contains 55 references, and it is interesting to note that 23 of them have been published for the first time in the last four years.

There are several informative graphs and charts in the report, and as I said before, any hon. member who wishes a copy may get one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Dr. Waldbott has spent a good deal of time and money, whereas you and I have spent only an hour or so reading the report. You can imagine the amount of time that went into the preparation of the report, and all the work involved prior to its release. He has spent a great amount of time and money on the research on behalf of the people who live near Erco, in particular, and on behalf of human beings in general.

It is obvious that he intended and desired to present his findings to the commission. It is not my wish to indulge in any recriminations or arguments about why he was eventually not called. Let us merely accept the fact that he has made a contribution to our better understanding of the effects of air pollution in Ontario, and let us profit by his advice.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let us, as members of this Legislature, be grateful for his industry and his interest on our behalf.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): Mr. Speaker, taking part in this debate at this late stage of the session, I might say that one of the topics which interested me most was the discussion during the estimates of The Department of Trade and Development regarding our so-called branch plant economy.

There has been a great deal of criticism from members opposite regarding expansion and growth of United States subsidiaries in our province. This criticism is mainly that we are losing control over our economy as a result of foreign investment and foreign-owned companies. I think, Mr. Speaker, that some of the criticism is justified and some of it is not.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale) Most of it is.

Mr. Kerr: It is justified in that United States subsidiaries are not putting their share into the Canadian market so as to allow Canadians to participate in direction and management. Also, these firms are not training and hiring enough Canadians. United States subsidiaries are taking Canadian equity and the dividends are going to the United States. They are too often copying head office procedure in the United States. They have not recognized, for the most part, that Canada is a different country with a different market and a need to practice different business methods.

There should, therefore, be guidelines and, if necessary, legislation to correct some of these faults. The problems seem to result from the methods and attitudes of the men running the subsidiaries up here.

However, Mr. Speaker, we should not knock our so-called branch plant economy per se. In my opinion, the Watkins report was far too drastic in some of its recommendations.

We can change things without inhibiting and curtailing this important segment of our Ontario industry. The blunt truth is that we, in this province, need this investment because without it we would not have been able to maintain the high employment level we have now.

Unfortunately, we do not have the means nor, apparently, do we have the desires as Canadians to invest in industry in Canada in sufficient amounts to employ all the people available.

We have no precise idea, Mr. Speaker, of what additional Canadian funds are, in fact, available for investment. We do know that Canadians are among the greatest savers in the world. In 1965, for example, national saving in this country was equal to 20 per cent of the gross national product. In the United States in the same year, national saving amounted to only 16.3 per cent of the GNP. By saving 16 per cent of their GNP and not 20 per cent, the Americans released into their economy several billions of dollars. The effect of this should not be underestimated.

As the hon. members know, our province and country is growing very rapidly as an industrial nation and we have, therefore, been able to put approximately 0.5 million people a year that enter the labour market to work. If the policy of investment in Canada that is criticized in the Watkins report had been other than it is, it is pretty clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that we would not have been so fortunate in this regard.

We demand a high standard of living, many of us insist that it should be the same as our wealthy neighbour. In my opinion, the most single important task of the government of Ontario, or any other government, is to do everything reasonable to see that there are jobs for those who want and need them.

The curse of high unemployment would certainly monopolize the time and tongues of the members of this House more than anything else if our eonomy stagnates, slows down or fails to expand to the extent that too many people are out of work.

It is not necessary for me to remind the hon. members the growth of plants in southern Ontario. The automobile industry is a good example. The recent trade agreement between the United States and Canada means that today more people are employed in this industry in Ontario than ever before. More vehicles are being produced here than ever before, and above all there are guidelines and rules by which Canadian participation in the market is assured to a great degree.

The ironical and rather contradictory statements of certain members opposite confuse the picture. On the one hand, the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) and the government is being accused of concentrating their efforts on the proliferation of manufacturing plants to the detriment of the development of our natural resources, and in the next breath they are saying that there should be more of these plants in eastern and northern Ontario.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of the department concerned is making an effort to encourage industry to settle in the areas of the province that need it with some success. However, this is another matter.

As I have said, changes are necessary in our policy regarding foreign subsidiaries in Ontario. Our laws should govern the operation of foreign companies doing business here. Canadian plants, regardless of who has control, should not be governed by some foreign state department. They should not decide what nations the Canadian industry can do business with. I believe that with the rapid development of international trade in the past few years, such laws can be and will be negotiated between the governments to the satisfaction of both.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that head offices in the United States are anxious to be good citizens in the country in which they are doing business, and indeed they have demonstrated in most cases a strong community approach to the problems of hospitals, education and social welfare. In the world of advance technology the costs of research and development are astronomical. Foreign corporations have been a help to the Canadian economy in this regard since they have vast pools of money with which to carry on the advanced research which is required.

However, Mr. Speaker, American businessmen are "horse-traders." The best in the world. They have a tendency to look down —take a rather condescending view of countries that cannot horse-trade and negotiate effectively with them. They tend to run roughshod on those that they can push around. They respect any people or any nation that is frank and lays it on the line. We have not been doing enough of this. We could tell them that we want to do business with them. We need their investment, but not always on their terms. In this way we will assure a greater degree of economic independence, and above all, our own national sovereignty.

I would like to deal, Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes with the Ontario development corporation programme, called equalization of industrial opportunity in Ontario. This is the programme whereby if industry locates in certain designated municipalities it would be eligible for a forgivable loan. The intent and purpose of this programme is commendable, and certainly industry should be encouraged to settle in areas that need this type of assessment and development.

In this way we could help ease congestion, pollution, housing shortage and expanding need for costly services.

However, any programme, Mr. Speaker, that designates certain areas for some sort of preference causes problems. For example, in my riding, which naturally is not a designated area, there are established industries which have expansion plans and which are now considering locating in a designated area in order to qualify for this gift from the province. A town such as Burlington has demonstrated an awareness of the social, economic and political strength of a growing industrial segment, and has prepared for such growth by the expansion of essential services, by having development agencies or departments established to promote and assist industry. Because of the essential dormitory and character of our area, the large residential complex, it is important that we have a reasonable share of industrial assessment. Now however, potential industry may look elsewhere. We do not object to these plants going to northern, eastern or any part of the province that lacks them because of location, because of such things as lack of suitable labour market, transportation facilities, distance from large consumer markets, and so on.

Those areas, regardless of how hard they try, could not attract or interest industry. The government has a duty to assist as it is doing. However, areas in southern, southwestern Ontario have been designated and this results in unfair competition to those municipalities within 20 or 30 miles which are not so designated. Even an existing plant in Burlington, for example, would reconsider plans to add on or expand on a present site and possibly would locate next door. The major advantage of industrial growth is to improve job opportunities and any government programme designed to use public funds to subsidize industry should make funds available to any and all industry which will expand and create new jobs, which is properly located to assure success and solvency.

In short therefore, Mr. Speaker, designation by ODC should be by region, not by municipality. It should be done so that orderly growth of plants in non-designated areas will continue and the costs of production will not be unfairly altered between competing companies located basically in the same region, producing basically the same goods and in municipalities having the same facilities, labour market, transportation costs, in other words, the same characteristics. An interest-free forgivable loan of a couple of million dollars could make a big difference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a few minutes to refer to the report of the enquiry into civil rights, the McRuer report. I wish it was possible just to file these three volumes and take them as read or mark them as exhibits 1, 2 and 3. However, I would like just to refer to some of the recommendations that I feel stand out possibly more than others, although one cannot help agreeing pretty well with the whole report.

I will just read some of these recommendations rather than comment to any length on them. For example, in the chapter dealing with the exercise of power of investigation, one of the recommendations is that arbitrary powers of investigation ought not to be conferred in any statute.

Another chapter dealing with the powers of search and seizure:

> Legislation which is intended to give power to enter, search and seize property, should so state in clear and unambiguous language. Where judicial authority to search and seize is required, the guidelines should be laid down to direct the judicial authority, that is reasonable grounds to believe. Individuals should not be exposed to capricious or vexatious search without recourse to civil courts. Every statute authorizing a right of search should provide that the search be exercised during the day unless otherwise ordered by judicial authority. No power should be given to any tribunal to investigate where it deems it expedient, or to any person to seize property where he deems it expedient.

Chapter dealing with coroner's recommendations:

> A survey should be made to determine how many coroners are required in Ontario and in what areas they should be located. Political considerations ought not to enter into the appointment of coroners. The duties of supervising coroner should be expressly defined by statute and all coroners should be subject to his control. Coroners should be restrained from entering into public debate respecting matters that have been subject of an inquest, but a coroner should not be restricted from advocating changes in the law. A coroner should not have powers to make orders affecting the liberty of the subject, or impose penalties.

Dealing with magistrates, we had quite a lengthy discussion in this House, Mr. Speaker, on some legislation of The Attorney General's Department dealing with magistrates. I will just read one or two of the recommendations:

> All magistrates should be appointed to serve on a full time basis.

For administrative purposes, one magistrate in an area should be designated the senior magistrate.

Only those with qualifications sufficient to command such salary should be appointed to be magistrate.

All magistrates should be qualified lawyers.

All cases in the magistrates courts should be prosecuted by qualified lawyers.

Adequate and proper accommodation should be provided for all magistrates courts, separate and apart from that provided for the administration of police forces.

Magistrates should not be permitted to accept extra-judicial employment for remuneration.

Dealing with juvenile and family courts—I think this first recommendation has already been adopted:

The province should assume the responsibility, financial and otherwise, for the administration of the juvenile and family courts.

The province should be divided into juvenile and family court areas irrespective of municipal boundaries, having regard to the convenience of the public only.

A full time juvenile and family court judge should be appointed in each area.

Juvenile and family court judges should be appointed to that office and that office alone.

Magistrates should not act as juvenile and family court judges.

There should not be power to send a child to industrial training school for breach of a city bylaw or provincial statute.

The term "juvenile delinquent" should be abolished as far as it applies to provincial offences.

Division courts—I will by-pass that.

Bail procedure:

Greater consideration than is now given should be given to the granting of bail on arraignment and its amount.

Where there is little likelihood that the accused will not appear to stand his trial, the requirements of bail should be kept to a minimum.

The Summary Convictions Act should be amended to permit an appeal from all convictions for offences under Ontario statutes upon the mere serving and filing of a notice of appeal, without any sureties for payment of monetary sums or costs.

In those cases where imprisonment is imposed without the option of a fine, provision should be made for release on bail without sureties pending the hearing of an appeal, unless the need for sureties has been demonstrated, and no bond for security for costs should be required.

I noticed in the paper this week, Mr. Speaker, that the new Minister of Justice in the federal government intends to make some substantial changes in the criminal code in regard to bail; long overdue!

Dealing with compensation—victims of crime:

Persons who sustain injury or property damage while engaged in assisting peace officers in arresting any person, or in preserving the peace, should be given a legal right to be compensated by the province.

Persons who sustain injury or property damage while exercising their legal rights to effect an arrest, or preserve the peace, should be given a legal right to compensation by the province.

The wording is a little different in that second one.

Expropriation—I think, Mr. Speaker, I would say that all the recommendations on expropriation in volume 3 of this report should be adopted.

The right of an owner whose property has been expropriated to be paid compensation should be secured in the constitution.

The Legislature should not confer the power of expropriation on any body or person unless it is clear that the power is inescapably necessary in the interest of good government, and that there are adequate controls over its exercise.

There should be a complete review of all the powers of expropriation with a view to determining the necessity of each one, and the adequacy of statutory safeguards controlling their exercise.

There should be adequate notice to expropriate to all persons affected.

I will not deal any more with these recommendations. I am taking probably longer than I should, but there are many more that I could mention.

I would like to just mention here, Mr. Speaker, that I agree with the Attorney General's (Mr. Wishart's) formal statement in regard to wire tapping and the use of electronic devices—

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): He agreed with our position.

Mr. Kerr: Yes, he says they should be basically illegal, and used only by police forces upon application to a superior court. An ex parte order could be made and the hearing should be held in camera.

A word, Mr. Speaker, about county jails. Many of these county jails are most inadequate, certainly by present-day standards; I do not want to call them dungeons because they are basically clean, but they are just inadequate, particularly as far as facilities for segregating first time offenders from people with long criminal records.

I understand that The Department of Correctional Services and the Minister (Mr. Grossman) have definite plans to improve or replace many existing county jails. I am sure he has a plan, top priority, for the county of Halton. We had, Mr. Speaker, a plan for a regional detention centre that was to be built in conjunction with the two counties, Halton and Peel. However, since the province has taken over the cost of the administration of justice and of building these centres there may be some delay. I hope it will not be too long.

In the meantime, I think some facility changes and improvements can be made to the present jail in Milton. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Correctional Services will be able to convince the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. McNaughton) that a regional detention centre should be included in the 1969 Budget.

I just have a little potpourri here. One thing I want to mention, whether the hon. members know it or not, merchant seamen do not have an opportunity to exercise their franchise particularly between April 1 and about December 1. They are denied the right of voting because they are away at sea. For example, there is one merchant seaman in my riding who tells me that he has not voted in the last two federal elections or the last two provincial elections because they were held in that particular time, spring to the fall.

I think that they should be given an opportunity to exercise their franchise. There should be facilities available certainly at Great Lake ports. They should have the same convenience in this regard as our service men. Possibly, a polling booth at a port or on the ship, but they should be given the opportunity to vote.

At least, Mr. Speaker, we can change our provincial laws in this regard.

Now I just want to close, Mr. Speaker, with one last plea for an improvement in GO transit service to Burlington. This is a perennial thing with me and we still only have four trains a day; two in the morning and two back in the evening. Now there is a page boy here who tells me that he is sick and tired of getting up at 6 o'clock in the morning to be here at 10 o'clock.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Give him a ride!

Mr. Kerr: At that hour? But in any event, Mr. Speaker, I hope that before the department has any plans to go north that they go east and west just a little more.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the very outset that the speech made by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) this afternoon really emanated from the dark ages. I would hope, and I say this in all sincerity, that the purpose of many of the things that he called for are really nothing more than an effort to destroy the labour movement in this province.

Let me just make some obseravtions and obviously I have not got all the material in terms of the speech that the hon. member made. I just wish that I had the opportunity to answer every charge that he made on the trade union movement in this province. I do not say this with any sense of egotism, but I could talk from the plant level and being a member of a trade union for well in excess of 25 years. The hon. member for Eglinton speaks as an employer, I suspect very strongly, and not as a worker who comes off the assembly line and who knows—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): He drives a Cadillac.

Mr. Pilkey: He drives a Cadillac, that does not make him—he does not know what really is happening at the plant level. He talks about the right to work and that was a very important statement that he made. The right to work.

Let me analyze, just for a moment, what that really means. The right to work—because that is not a new phrase; this question of the right to work. It was born and given some emphasis in the United States and let me say to the hon. member for Eglinton, through you, Mr. Speaker, that there were a number of states that had right to work laws. Today, in the United States, there are only three states that remain with those right to work laws; Florida, Utah and Alabama.

I want to say to the member that if he gets down there where they have the right to work laws in Alabama, I suspect very strongly he could become a Senator there. On the basis of the speech he made today, he would be recognized as the senator from the state of Alabama.

And what has happened? What has happened in those states that have the right to work laws? Let me tell you what happened. They have the lowest wages of every state in the union and in addition to that, if there is any enslaved labour, that is where it exists; in those states that have the right to work laws. This is what you would be placing on the backs of the workers in this province if you entertained, in terms of legislation, the right to work laws here in the province of Ontario.

I would hope in all sincerity that this is not what the government is trying to bring into Ontario; the question of right to work laws that would enslave the workers in terms of lower wages and in terms of inferior working conditions as they have in the state of Alabama.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: Now also in regard to the right to work, I did not hear anything from the member for Eglinton when, in my city and in a number of other municipalities, the auto pact cost the workers in Oshawa 3,000 jobs. Where was their right to work when the jobs were taken away from them because of legislation that was perpetrated at the federal level? Where was their right to work?

I did not hear from the hon. member for Eglinton about Perfect Circle when all the jobs were eliminated. Did they have the right to work? Where was the Conservative Party when the jobs went to St. Thomas or St. Kitts? Were they standing up and saying that we should pass legislation guaranteeing that they move with those jobs? I did not hear any of it, and I did not hear the hon. member—

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): That is the Liberal policy.

Mr. Pilkey: I do not know whose policy it is, but I did not hear the hon. member in those situations.

I suppose if we had time to do a little research we could find where thousands and thousands of workers in this province were affected by runaway plants, by legislation, and their right to work was denied because of that. And yet this government stood idly by.

I do not know about confusing the issue, but let me say this. If we adopted the resolution that the member for Eglinton put to this House, you would destroy the union, and you would tear out the very fibres that built the trade union movement.

As a matter of fact, you would tear out the guts of the trade union movement in this province and it would reflect on the workers. But I cannot emphasize strongly enough that within the framework of the present trade union movement, in this province, we have made progress.

We have said approximately 18 years ago, and particularly in the UAW, we adopted a slogan that where workers were too old to work, and yet they were too young to die, we need pensions. We said that they ought to have dignity in their declining years of life. And they set out a programme and, in 1950, the Chrysler workers struck for 104 days, they walked the picket lines; there was no question about a membership in the union, or compulsory unionism; there was an objective, and it was a sound social objective. Those workers walked the picket line for 104 days to make sure that it was going to be a funded pension. And they won, they won that struggle.

Out of that struggle came a guaranteed pension of $100 a month. In negotiations after negotiations since that year 1950, the unions have built on this pension until today the workers who are enjoying the pension at least have a measure of security and a measure of dignity. Yet we find this kind of resolution that the member is calling for that would destroy those objectives. What else did we do? What else did the trade union movement do? In terms of medical, hospital, and group insurance—for too long the worker and his family were denied proper medical attention, proper hospital attention, and when he was injured he had no security; he just went off the job. Now we have provided benefits if he gets sick, if he has an accident at least he has some income, that would give him a measure of economic security. And we provided that through collective bargaining, during negotiations. And I want to say to the member, you would destroy that, on the basis of your resolution.

And what have we done in the area of wages? What has the trade union movement done in the area of wages? We have brought them from a very low wage until today at least the worker can get some of the amenities of life. Oh, obviously, they have not reached the Utopian level yet. I do not think they ever will. I think that collective bargaining will go on and on. There is no end to it; there is no exact science in collective bargaining, and so it will perpetuate itself forever and a day in my opinion.

But, at least, the trade union movement, whether it is auto, steel or any other union, has made progress. And on vacation pay, at least the worker now can take his wife out of the kitchen and take her and his family on a vacation. And when there is a holiday, and he is laid off, at least he gets paid for that holiday. And these are important things. This is progress, this is progress. And what did the UAW, the steelworkers and other unions do in terms of the crisis periods, when there was unemployment for long and short periods of time, and there was no income for the worker? The union set out to guarantee him a level of income and they brought in a supplementary unemployment benefit plan, which is not only a godsend to the worker but it is a godsend to the communities that the workers live in, because this also helps the small businessman to keep his business going through those periods of crisis.

We protected them on the cost of living; as cost of living rises, we put formulas into the collective bargaining agreement that says that as the cost of living goes up, then the workers get some protection in that area during periods of rise of the cost of living.

And what else have we done? If nothing more, after the worker has fought and got recognition, this is what it was all about in the very beginning, and great struggles took place in those early days for recognition. And the second thing that they accomplished was the elimination of inhuman working conditions that existed in the plant in those days. Now the employees can go around in an organized plant with dignity and his head is held high. He is an equal with the foreman when he meets him; at least he has got equality when he meets him, at least he has got some equality at the plant level.

Now these things did not come easy, they did not come easy. And the hon. member, if I remember one of his statements this afternoon, said that the union leaders would inflict bodily harm if they opposed union policy. And then he started to read books and everything else. But here are some of the leaders —Walter Reuther and Dick Frankenstein. Look how they are beaten up. Look, here are pictures of people who were beaten up, not by the union boss but by the company goons, by the company goons, that is who beat him up; the Ford serviceman, along with the police in those days.

This is what happened. You talk about bodily harm. These are some of the things that the trade union leaders had to go through in those early days of organization. These are the things that they face. Do you think now they inflict those things on the worker after what they went through?

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member for Oshawa wants to be accurate in his remarks. The only mention that I made in connection with what he refers to—being beaten up—was in connection with a question that was introduced by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) yesterday.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Is the hon. member ever playing it safe now!

Mr. Reilly: Yes, yes. That is the only time that I ever mentioned this. And at that time, as the hon. members of the House will remember, I referred to United States and the labour rackets union, and read from the Washington newspaper. Yes. I know the hon. member wants to be fair and I wanted to make sure that he had the facts.

Mr. Pilkey: Well I would think—I submit, Mr. Speaker, to the member for Eglinton, if he had really supported that position then I feel confident that he would not have injected it during his remarks on the Budget. Now I can only assume that he supported the proposition. But I want to go on.

Mr. Reilly: No, Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a question of order. I suggest to him that no member of this House should impute motives to another.

Mr. Pilkey: Let me say for the hon. member's information, just let me tell him, read just a few of the paragraphs in this document to find out exactly who was receiving the bodily harm. I know of more than just the case that I am going to illustrate here:

> I could not see much of the actual beating because of the servicemen surrounding the victims and their attackers. I heard Frankenstein cry out several times, Walter said. Later, about 35 or 40 men surrounded us and started to beat us up. They picked me up about eight different times and threw me down on my back in the country. While I was on the ground they kicked me in the face, head and other parts of my body. After they kicked me for a while one fellow would say: "All right let him go now." Then they would raise me up, pull my arms behind me and begin to hit me some more. They kicked us again and again.

Mr. Nixon: Terrible, terrible! What was the date?

Mr. Pilkey: Well, I am just illustrating what some of these fellows had to go through, what happened during the birth of trade unions and the trade union movement, particularly the industrial unions. I am not talking about Samuel Gomphers. I mean the hon. member went back 100 years, but I am only going back 30. He went back to that book that came up during the new deal, during Roosevelt's time—

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I know once again the hon. member wants the facts. The book about which he is making mention was printed in 1957. The new deal was 1934.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): We asked the member a half a dozen times to give us the date of that book and he would not do it.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): It was 1957.

Mr. Pilkey: If he is going back, I am going back.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. members were both 35 years out of date.

Mr. Pilkey: Do not worry, I have that down. We will bring that in too.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: Well the hon. member for Eglinton raised them. I think we ought to put in—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order! The member for Oshawa is trying to make his speech, will the members please give him the courtesy of the House.

Mr. Pilkey: I think we ought to put the debate back on its proper perspective.

An hon. member: What does the hon. member think we are?

Mr. Stokes: They do not know what they are talking about.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: I want to read one more paragraph just to give hon. members an illustration of what was going in those days.

> A fellow was leaning over him and pounding him, a tall man in a grey suit and a grey hat was kicking him. Another fellow, he was fat, also was kicking him. They kept hollering "Kill him, kill him". I started pulling them off, I thought it was Mr. Merryweather. I said, "Oh, my God, he was on crutches".

These are some of the things that these people were subject to, and yet the member—

Mr. Nixon: That was the CSU, surely?

Mr. Pilkey: The member raises the question of bodily harm, and indicates, or he says he did not, but nevertheless it was remarks that were made during his speech on the Budget. I can only assume that he supports it and I just want to make my point that this question of bodily harm by the union bosses, I think this is the term that he used, is not correct.

What really has happened over the years is that it has been the leaders that have been subject to bodily harm and not the union members by the union leaders.

Mr. Nixon: Send it to Hal Banks, he will enjoy reading it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: The member asked, "What about the teamsters?" You see, today what really bothered me was that the member for Eglinton just took a full swoop. He did not hit on any one union, he took them all into consideration and just made a wide swoop and took them all in.

Mr. Nixon: The hon. member is doing the same.

Mr. Pilkey: Well, it is the only way that we can reply to the general statement that he made against the trade union movement and in my opinion against the workers in this province.

Now, let me say to the hon. member, again he was reading a lot of quotes from different documents, just let me read a few here. Let us read the one by Ron Haggart, let us just put this one into the record for a moment. It is headed: "Do the Tories Really Want this Tory Bill?" Now, this is the one where the member was talking about the contributions to the New Democratic Party. Let us find out what Mr. Haggart had to say because this gets into the area of human individual rights.

The Friendly Locksmith, who is a Tory member of the Legislature from Eglinton, has been mounting a personal crusade to prohibit trade unions from making contributions to a political party. It is no secret which political party he is talking about, of course, it is the New Democratic Party which by no great miracle of deduction turns out to be one of the political parties Mr. Reilly does not support.

He has really become quite worked up about it. He presented a private member's bill in the Legislature last month, and has been making speeches on the service club circuit about this clear violation of the individual's basic freedom.

I am glad to record Mr. Reilly's conversion to civil liberties and individual rights. Mr. Reilley's concern was not so great as a couple of years ago when he served among the Tory majority on the legislative select committee on consumer credit.

That committee, one of the best that the Tories have mounted at Queen's Park in recent years, came up with a unanimous recommendation that individuals who borrow money from finance companies should be told the cost of their loan, both in dollars and in annual percentage rates.

Well, not quite unanimous. The only member of the committee who did not believe that consumers should be told the cost of their loans as a percentage was Leonard Reilly—

Interjection by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: To continue:

The legislative committee made scores of useful recommendations about outlying wage assignments providing a cooling-off period on door-to-door sales and so on. The only member who dissented against it was Leonard Reilly, who believed a finance company should not be required to disclose the easy payment plan as really 18, 25 or 35 per cent per year.

I think we have got to get this in its proper perspective. If Mr. Reilly really thought about the individual basic freedom he should have supported that resolution at that time; but obviously he did not think it to be worthwhile.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member want an explanation in connection with it?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: Well, I was just going to explain that the hon. member for Oshawa, of course, did not have the opportunity to attend the committee meetings, nor did Ron Haggart; and so Ron Haggart, in his usual way, told one side of the story.

I thought that what the hon. member for Oshawa might like to know is this, that what I indicated to the committee—and the member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick) was a member of the committee, if I remember rightly, the hon. member for London South (Mr. White) was there, several of the members of the House are on the committee. I indicated to them that unless we had everybody revealing the true rate of interest, including federal banks, that we should not compel just one segment of the economy to reveal the true rate of interest.

This is what I explained to the committee, and I said that if we had control of the banks, and the banks were asked under those circumstances to reveal the true rate of interest then all should do it. But we would be taking a step by going ahead at that time and asking that the true cost be shown in dollars. At the time I argued that all of us then should have the right to know what the percentage is if the banks were controlled as well as other agencies.

In other words, I—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Reilly: I am sure that the hon. member for Oshawa wants to know the other side of the picture, not just take one side. I am sure that should somebody read his speech they would want to read my earlier speech to make sure of getting both sides of the picture.

Mr. Pilkey: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the member for Eglinton, I am going to let the record speak for itself. In any event, he did make a comment this afternoon, and he was complaining about the directives of international unions to local unions. He also talked about Samuel Gomphers, and I think he raised something about the AF of L. I do not recall, but I think he did, and pointed out that historically the AF of L in the United States frowned upon its affiliates taking any political action.

I submit that the member for Eglinton should not think Canadian unions should be following those directives. I mean if they are frowning upon us taking political action in Canada, surely he would not support the AF of L, the American position in this regard. Surely he would say that the Canadian union has the freedom to make its own decisions.

Nevertheless, he did say that there was much direction from United States this afternoon—and if I could just quote something he said. He asked if the member for Oshawa was prepared to tell his UAW local to quit taking instructions and directions from the United States UAW. Well, you see, through you, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member, this is an assumption—this is an assumption by the member for Eglinton; no facts.

Now a minute ago he was a little critical of me because I was assuming what his motives were in terms of that resolution. Now let me say he has no tangible proof that the UAW or any other union takes a directive from the United States.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Finance and Commercial Affairs): Have they got any funds from over the border?

Mr. Pilkey: Any funds from over the border? I will not talk about that just at the moment. I will not talk about the funds over the border, because that seems to get into the craw of a lot of people.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: Well, I rise on a question of accuracy. I know that the hon. member has just said that there were no facts. I think the hon. member is perhaps forgetting that I did indicate that Crispo, in his book, told about international unions, and I gave him a specific page and chapter. If he wants to stay with the facts, that is all.

Mr. Pilkey: The facts are that the international unions assist the Canadian unions that are affiliated—they assist. Now do not tell me that the UAW international union is going to come into the General Motors negotiation and tell the Canadian negotiating team what they are going to do. If the hon. member thinks that is a fact he should come down sometime—and I will invite him in so he can listen to them tell us.

Let me tell you it is never going to happen, because if they did start to direct then they would be out the door. They would be out the door if they started to direct. They are there as advisors.

Now they have got to get their point of view across. In addition to that, the international union provides professional people who know about pensions, insurance and other areas. The local unions do not have these kind of professionals. They bring them in, and we need them. We need them there in negotiations because we are confronted across the bargaining table with the giant corporations with their battery of professionals in all these areas—

An hon. member: From the United States.

Mr. Pilkey: That is right—from the United States. Absolutely right. No Canadians. No Canadians, as far as the corporations are concerned.

Now let me say this to the hon. member: The corporations are getting their directives from the United States. And as the American negotiators move in for the corporation, I would like to hear one of the Canadians say anything. I would just like to hear them say anything. They do the negotiating, and the boys from Canada keep quiet on their side of the table. They make no contribution.

This does not happen on the union side. The Canadian workers can make their contributions any time they want, assisted by the American negotiators. They are welcomed into the negotiations because they have a broad knowledge of collective bargaining. In addition to that, they assist us on a professional basis. I want to lay that myth aside once and for all—that the United States unions are directing the Canadian affiliates. Because they are not. They make their own determination, except in one area.

I want to point that one out, because I would hope that the member for Eglinton would support this position. I asked him a couple of times this afternoon and he did not reply. He said that at the local union level they should be able to make the determination to strike a company without any directive from the international union. I think that the right and the authorization to strike should be funnelled through a central body, and they ought to make the determination. You cannot just allow any group which wants to go on strike to go, just like that. They have got to have some authority and there has got to be some justification, for the strike. Unless they can get it passed by the international executive boards of the union, then they cannot go on strike. That is where they get the authorization, and I think that this is a sound position to take.

You just cannot have them going out on strike whenever they want. There has to be some authority, because this just would be a chaotic situation. It is the same as the member pointed out this afternoon that the worker should have a right or the freedom of choice in determining which union he wants to represent him. This is what he said. Now can you imagine everyone in a membership of 12,000 making that determination? We would have a pocket of steelworkers and a pocket of auto workers and a group over here in the carpenters union. This is utterly ridiculous. It just would not work, and what you would do in that kind of a situation—you would stop the wheels of industry in this whole province.

Mr. Reilly: When the hon. member is talking about international control would he explain this to me—"More NDP Support, Canada Programme, Drafted by UAW"? This is by the Windsor Star's labour writer. Would you be good enough to explain to me, then, from the Windsor Star:

> In Atlantic City a comprehensive programme for Canada, dealing with issues ranging from Canada's foreign policies and support for the New Democratic Party to conditions for working mothers, was unanimously adopted by the 2,900 united auto workers attending the union's 21st constitutional convention here.

Would the hon. member explain—if it has nothing to do with it—how they came to be discussing it and setting up a programme here?

Mr. Pilkey: Sure I will explain it, because I was there. I can explain from first-hand knowledge what happens in that kind of situation. Obviously, at the Atlantic City international convention they adopt a Canadian programme. But let me tell the member who adopts it. The Canadians adopt it, and the Canadian caucus met in a separate room, and went over a Canadian programme. There was not an American in the room. Not one.

Mr. Nixon: Why do it in the United States then? Why not do it up here somewhere?

Mr. Pilkey: Because this is the time when they adopt an overall programme for the UAW. There is an overall programme being talked over too. Now obviously the Canadian section of the UAW is somewhat different from the American, so that what we do is take the Canadian section out of the convention for a period of time, and go over the Canadian programme. There is no use going over the Canadian programme with all the American delegates, and I am not too sure they have that much interest. Obviously they are interested, but not to the extent that the Canadians are.

Mr. Nixon: Do they not have a national convention?

Mr. Pilkey: No, we do not have a national convention. The UAW has a quarterly meeting of all of their affiliates and delegates, but this is not a convention.

Mr. Reilly: How many Canadian delegates would be there?

Mr. Pilkey: Approximately 150 to 200.

Mr. Reilly: One hundred and fifty is only five per cent of 2,900.

Mr. Pilkey: What was that again?

Mr. Reilly: Out of the 2,900 delegates present from the United States, about five per cent or 145 Canadian members were present and this was voted by 2,900 members!

Mr. Pilkey: It was not voted by 2,900 members. The 2,900 members do not—

Mr. Reilly: It says: "was unanimously adopted by the 2,900 members," according to the official report.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: Yes, that is right, and that is the point I made earlier, that I am sure that the member for Eglinton does not understand how the union works. I want to say to him that the American delegates did not discuss the Canadian programme. As a matter of fact, I had the hand-book in my hand as late as tonight that was adopted at the Canadian caucus. It was not discussed clause by clause as it was in the Canadian caucus, and they are the ones that adopted the programme, so that in no way are the Americans trying to determine what the Canadian programme is going to be.

Hon. T. L. Wells (Minister without Portfolio): I wonder if he could explain to me then why part of the negotiations became the UAW American, and General Motors wage parity for Canadian workers was one of the issues that was debated in the contract between UAW American and management, since the management is in the United States.

Mr. Pilkey: All right let me explain.

In the area of General Motors, the negotiations on wage parity was not discussed in the United States. Chrysler was, but GM was not discussed in the United Staes and neither were the Ford negotiations. In Chrysler it was discussed on the other side of the river, and then finalized in Canada.

Now, let me say this. The unions of Canada and the international unions, are working together. Had we been a separate union, we could not have broken through against General Motors, Ford, or Chrysler on the question of wage parity. It could only have been done with the assistance of the international union. It was the only way.

What would have happened was that we would have been fighting an American interest strictly with Canadians. I hope that one day we will be able to have a solely Canadian union here in Canada. But as long as we are negotiating with United States interests, and the full force of the United States interest is being implemented in Canada, then we have to have United States international union support. It is the only way that we could go to the bargaining table with any equality.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): On a point of order. In view of the fact that my name was mentioned as being part of the hon. member for Eglinton's speech in regard to my question yesterday, the member has stated that there is no control from the United States in Canada. I disagree highly with him. I know that this is not true, and I would like him to—

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): How does the hon. member know?

Mr. Sargent: I can prove it.

The point of order is that he has made this statement, and he just admitted now that there were international joint agreements. I would like him to tell the House how much money goes from Canada each year to the United States for union purposes.

Mr. Pilkey: I am glad the hon. member brought that up too, because the remark was made earlier tonight, and I want to talk about that. I want to—

Mr. Stokes: If the member wants to know how much money goes south I can tell him—

Mr. Pilkey: I am going to say more about this question of constitutional democracy. It was raised today. What does it really mean? Does it mean equal justice for everyone? I think that it should. It should mean equal justice for everyone, but what is happening in this province? It is a laissez faire attitude, or the government says, "Oh, I am all right Jack."

Yet we have the poor and the weak and those who are neglected, and some of them are even driven to the wall. Yet it is pretty nice to get up and talk about this question of constitutional democracy.

Democracy for who? This is the question. With the crises that are facing the people of this province in terms of housing, is that what we are talking about in terms of democracy? These slogans are all right, but we have got to get down and do something about the questions and issues that the facing us in this province.

I want to also get back to this right to work and I have got another article here, in which the member for Eglinton is quoted, and he claimed that the right-to-work exponents had missed the whole point.

No, this was not the member for Eglinton this was Mr. Archer replying as the president of the Ontario federation of labour.

He said that the member for Eglinton has missed the whole point. He said if we are going to have the right to work—and everyone has got the right, the choice—there is no compulsory unionism. If they don't want to join then they do not have to. If they do not want to pay dues they do not have to.

You see, you have got to turn the coin over. When you do that, along with those rights, goes a lot of other things. We have got to give the rest of the people who want to participate equal protection so that there cannot be just one side of the law.

In other words, do the other individuals have rights? They wouldn't have to go to their place of employment if they didn't want to—should that not be a right? And when they want to leave they just walk out—should that not be a right? Or we would just return to the law of the jungle, as the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Gisborn) described it in his remarks.

They twisted that word around a bit—returning to the jungle. This is what the hon. member for Eglinton would have, he would have us return to the laws of the jungle, because this was happening back in the early days. There were walkouts in the plant. This department would go down, that one would go down, they just walked out of the plant. So what happened?

I will tell you what happened. They formed laws, and they called it The Labour Relations Act. Within the Act there are certain things that the corporations can do and cannot do, and there are certain things that the unions can do and they cannot do, and so they put this on a kind of an orderly basis.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Good government, eh?

Mr. Pilkey: Well, good government or not, this is what they did. But the member for Eglinton wants to destroy all that so that we put this on a disorderly basis again and we go back to where we were 30 years ago and we have this kind of a chaotic situation that prevailed at that time. This is really what the member is talking about.

He got on the question today about wages, and he said that the wages and the fringe benefits—I do not know if he used that term —but he said that they are inflationary, the unions are becoming too powerful and they are creating inflation in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Reilly: The member might be interested in what was said. I do not think the hon. member wants to misquote me, and I do not think the hon. members in the House—including the hon. member for Sudbury East who puts in an interjection "Oh-oh,"—I do not think he wants to misquote me.

I said to him at the time and to this House that excessive increases—and I was referring to 30 per cent increase. I know the hon. member wants to be factual.

Mr. Pilkey: I recall that the member talked about the question of inflation today. Now in what context, and I suspect that is what he was talking about. In that context, how else would we get inflation if he did not blame it on wages? He went back to talk about the seaway this afternoon, so do not say he did not raise the question of inflation, because he did. But you see, this is really an old cry of the management, they continually cry about inflation to deny the workers their equity, while the heads of the corporations in this province and in this country and the United States do not really worry about inflation. You see, when the president of General Motors Corporation gets $250,000—a quarter of a million dollars—in wages and a half a million in stock, that is not inflationary!

Or when one of the heads of corporations here in the province of Ontario earns $75,000, $100,000 or $200,000, that is not inflationary. But let the worker go after 10, 15 or 25 cents an hour, it becomes inflationary all of a sudden. This is the kind of double standard that exists and the hon. member for Eglinton is espousing the line that management have been screaming across this province since the 1950's.

I want to say that in this whole area of increased benefits, in terms of wages and fringe benefits and working conditions, we attempt to fight inflation just as much as anyone else. We are opposed to inflation. As a matter of fact many of our wage increases are supported on the basis of the corporation's ability to pay within the productivity level, and the member for Eglinton talked about that today. He talked about the question of productivity, and we proved without a shadow of a doubt that the Canadian auto industry could pay wage parity because of the productivity levels here in the province of Ontario and this was supported by Ron Todgam, the president of the Chrysler Corporation.

Now I just want to illustrate for the hon. member for Eglinton's information what some people think about the unions. Let me read you a letter:

> I want to thank you and the union for all the wonderful things you do for me. I am happy that you gave me a higher pay and I live in a better house and my children went to a better school, and I thank you for all of these things. But most important of all, brother Reuther, for 18 years I worked in Kelsey-Hayes foundry before the union and for 18 years they called me "dumb polack" and when the union came along they called me brother, and that is important.

That is more important than all of the wage gains and every cent that we have gained in terms of fringe benefits and at last we put some dignity in the plants and that they call each other brother. It is important that we make that kind of progress.

Let me say to the hon. member for Eglinton, if your resolution on compulsory unionism, and all of those things that you enunciate today, if that comes into being as part of legislation in this province, then you will have destroyed everything that has been fought for, in terms of wages, fringe benefits and the right for one another to be called brother. You will have destroyed that very thing, if your legislation is ever implemented here in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Reilly: Would the hon. member like to answer another question for me?

Mr. Pilkey: Now I want to—

Mr. Reilly: Would the hon. member like to answer another question for me, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. member: He is ignoring you.

Mr. Reilly: Well I wondered if it was brotherhood on their part when a man like Walter Speckers, at 42 years of age, was fired because of Christian reasons? Is this brotherhood?

Mr. Stokes: Let him go to another plant.

Mr. Pilkey: Let me say this. You see the labour movement was really built from a very humble beginning, and one of the things that they were able to negotiate, along with these wages and fringe benefits, was the question of union security.

Really, if the trade union movement is going to make progress, then they have got to do it within the framework of union security because it is part of the union and you see there again, you would destroy that by saying that the individual has a right. He does not have to join, he does not have to pay his way. He can be a beneficiary of what the union does, but he does not have to pay his way. He does not have to participate but let somebody else do the job for him.

Now maybe there are things that do not sit right with you. Surely, the question of the progress they make economically; surely, the question of one person calling the other brother; surely, those things can transcend your problem. Surely they can transcend that. As we make that kind of progress, some people are going to be hurt in this process and as they are hurt by the corporations. But you just cannot take every one of those things into consideration. If you are going to—

Mr. Reilly: Does the member approve of Canadian workers being fired because they do not join a union?

Mr. Pilkey: That is right. It is the only way we can operate. It is, I approve.

Mr. Stokes: Certainly we approve of it.

Mr. Reilly: The members approve of depriving Canadian men and women of the right to work.

Mr. Pilkey: I approve of union security and the agreement is a very lengthy thing and the corporations recognize it. Though they have not accepted the trade union movement yet, they have recognized them and it does serve a function within the great industrial complex.

Mr. Sargent: What utter nonsense is this?

Mr. Pilkey: Well, they do. They serve a function within the great industrial complex that I would not want management to take on. I do not think they would want to take it on in its entirety.

Now there was another question that was raised by some of the members. What about the—

Mr. Sargent: How many brothers has the member got then?

Mr. Pilkey: I do not know what the member is talking about.

Mr. Sargent: I am talking about the fear complex.

Mr. Stokes: Just ignore him.

Mr. Pilkey: There is none. I want to talk in a few minutes about that fear complex, but I want to talk first of all about the finances.

I want to talk about the finances because there is a misconception here as the union dues come into the union coffers and in particular, international unions, somebody has got a big money bag there, with a black coat and one of those shields over their eyes, and they are slipping across the border with it.

Let me tell you that is not exactly how it happens. Let me tell you what is happening inside the UAW as an illustration. Let me tell you what is happening inside—and these statements are for the perusal of every member of our union: A complete breakdown of the finances in every way. In every way the finances are checked by a certified auditor and checked by union auditors as well. But United States government securities, held by the international union as of February 29, 1968, was $28 million. Canadian government securities were $10 million. Now is that money running across the river?

In other words, of government securities, 25 per cent of their money that is invested in government securities is invested in Canada, and I will tell you where that is invested in a moment too. We have got less than 10 per cent of the membership, and 25 per cent of the funds are invested in Canada. Now let me go a little further. The total assets of the union is $94 million.

In other words, we have got less than 10 per cent of the membership, but more than 10 per cent of its assets are invested in Canada, and this is where the Canadian union dues are. You know everybody thought they were sitting over there.

Now, let me tell you where some of that money is, because I happen to know where some of it is. I know that two years ago, as an illustration, UAW international union bought $400,000 of debentures of the city of Oshawa. There are many municipalities in this province of Ontario that the UAW have debentures for. Do the members know why they are investing their money there? Because they think it should be invested in terms of social progress; on sidewalks, on sewers, on roads and this is where their money should be.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pilkey: They are not concerned about putting it into the money market where they could get a higher percentage rate. They put it into the things that make for social progress and that is where their money is.

Mr. Reilly: I wonder if the hon. member for Oshawa—

Mr. Pilkey: This is a fact.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I wonder—

Mr. Pilkey: It is in municipal bonds. Are they getting the same interest they could get on some mortgages?

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Oshawa could tell me if he thinks they should invest their money in homes for people instead of expensive gambling joints? For instance, Caesar's Place in Las Vegas, and motels in Dallas, Texas, and so on. Is this where some of the money is?

Mr. Pilkey: I do not know what the member is talking about and I think he should be more specific. But if he is talking about—

Mr. Reilly: Let us be specific. Who owns Caesar's Place in Las Vegas?

Mr. Pilkey: I asked, why does the member not be specific? I do not even know what he is talking about. Let me say this. The UAW has no money in Las Vegas. The united steelworkers have no money in Las Vegas. I am positive the united packing houses have none. So, I do not know who the member is talking about. If there is one union that has an investment, if he is talking about the teamsters union, he usually gets back to them. If there is one union that is making those kind of investments do not tar them all with the same brush. Do not put it on them all. I am telling him what the UAW are doing with their money, because many of them—

Mr. Sargent: The hon. member is in a rut.

Mr. Pilkey: I am in no rut.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Pilkey: You know the thing that bothers the member for Grey-Bruce is that we are exploding some of these myths that have been going around in his head and he does not like it. He does not like it because he is learning something here, you see, and getting a little of the truth. He is getting a little of the truth and he does not like that.

He should have been here this afternoon and heard the member for Eglinton and then he could have decided, really what to accept. Now if he fell on that side then—

Mr. Sargent: The hon. member has no corner on unions.

Mr. Pilkey: I suspect that he is where he would fall anyways, and I know what he is looking for.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Pilkey: Well, let me say in addition to the moneys being spent for items of social progress by the international union—

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit—

Mr. Pilkey: Sure, go ahead.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Thanks very much. I have heard a lot of the debate on both sides and I must say that most of it is rehashed stuff that I have heard before.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): It has not been said in this Legislature for many years.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Correct. But there is one point running through it that I would like to be clear on. That is, that fundamentally is the—

Mr. Stokes: The hon. member asked for a question. Is he going to get up and make a speech?

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Yes, this is the question. Is the member for Eglinton desirous of abolishing the Rand formula, and is the member for Oshawa desirous of supporting the Rand formula? Could I ask them each to answer yes or not.

Mr. Pilkey: I cannot answer for the member for Eglinton, but this afternoon he said to abolish it. I support the Rand formula and I go beyond the Rand formula.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: Well, I wonder if the hon. member for Eglinton would let me know whether he supports the Rand formula or not?

Mr. Reilly: I am sorry the hon. member was not here. I am not going to infringe on the member speaking here now but—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Reilly: I think it is quite obvious where I stand in connection with it and I made it very clear. I am surprised that the member for Carleton East did not know. I made it very clear that as far as the Rand formula is concerned and a closed shop, I am definitely opposed.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence: That is a good answer.

Mr. Pilkey: Let me say this, that in addition to the moneys that I said was left in Canada, I can tell members what the local unions do. All the union dues that the member for Eglinton is talking about are not directed to the New Democratic Party, and it is not flushed across to the United States—

Mr. Sargent: The member is half an hour over his time now.

Mr. Pilkey: The union makes contributions to every hospital programme that goes on in this province, or nearly. They make a contribution to the hospital programmes. No dollar a week. The steelworkers and the UAW because they saw a social need, have put medical centres in the Soo and one in St. Catharines because of a social need for their members. They built a medical centre. We make contributions to the Red Feather. We support recreation centres and we support scholarships. There are all kinds of scholarships across this province supported by unions to further education.

We promote minor sports and adult sports, and in all of these areas the trade union movement is playing an active role. And they will continue to play an active role as long as they are a viable unit on the same standards that they have today, and not to be destroyed on the proposed resolutions by the member for Eglinton.

Now, I want to point out some of the democracies that prevail inside the trade union movement and particularly the UAW that I am more familiar with.

To give the members of my union the ultimate in terms of appeal and protection within the democratic framework of our union, we brought together interested outstanding citizens in Canada and the United States and we formed what is known as a review board. If any member feels that he has been treated unjustly, then he can appeal to this independent body and have his case reviewed.

We set this up because, obviously, within a union and with the complexities that exist, there is going to be some mistakes. It is not a perfect organization anymore than the corporations are perfect organizations. We make mistakes, and we are not infallible in any way. We make mistakes. But our motives are correct. Our fight is for social progress, and if somebody gets hurt in that struggle, then I say that they have a place to appeal to.

I want to also say that we do a fairly good education job in telling the members of our union what their rights are. There is all kinds of literature that is available and distributed to the member, urging him to participate at the local union level. There is no threat of bodily harm if you disagree with a policy.

I was a rank-and-file member in my union for 15 years and nobody stopped me and nobody threatened me if I got up on the floor of the membership meeting and disagreed with the leadership. I could disagree whenever I wanted to disagree, with policy of a union. I think within the framework of the disagreements that take place, this is how we make progress.

We put out, as I say, all kinds of literature on how they elect their local union grievance committee. They are elected, they are not appointed. They elect their bargaining committee; not appointed, elected by the rank and file and they have to give account of their stewardship every two years.

They elect their union officers; they elect their convention delegates by democratic procedure; they run their own local union; they get regular financial reports every month; the local union gets its financial reports through the secretary-treasurer. And under the UAW constitution he has a right to go in and look at the books, he can go in and open the books if he wants to; if he does not believe what is given out, he can go into the office and ask to see the books and have them opened; that is his constitutional right inside our union.

An hon. member: You cannot do that in a corporation.

Mr. Pilkey: Oh I guess you could not—a shareholder could not do it. In our union you can. And it is the local union who decides the positions and programmes of what is going to happen. And then he has a right to appeal. I pointed this out. He has a right to appeal a decision; and it goes on to say:

> You may not always agree with a decision made on your grievance in the shop or in the union, and you have a right to appeal these decisions. Your appeal must follow the rules laid down in article 32 of the UAW constitution, which provides the ultimate in democratic procedure and membership protection.

And it does. It gives you that protection. You have the right to appeal. And it explains how you get the protection. Then it goes on to say the final step are two alternatives unique in the labour movement—you can appeal to the constitutional convention delegate or you can appeal to the UAW public review board comprised of outstanding civic leaders. And the members elect their own director, they have a decision in the bargaining goal, and all of these things are the democratic procedures of our union.

Now I want to also point out that the contributions that are made to the New Democratic Party—unfortunately I have not got time to peruse this document that I happened to get today on lodge 717 IAM, but I am going to have a look at it. I got the other side of the story here, but I have not had a chance to examine it, but I just want to tell the member for Eglinton that I have it.

The New Democratic Party does get moneys from the trade unions. There is no secret about that. And there is no secret about how much. I pointed this out before. We have put out a document listing the contributions to the New Democratic Party. It is on the public record who is making the contributions. There is nothing hidden. Now, I would wish that the two old-line parties would put out the same kind of document. Let us find out where they are getting their money.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pilkey: Let us find out where they are getting their resources and whether—

Mr. Reilly: I will be glad to answer that for the—

Mr. Pilkey: Well, not the hon. member as an individual—his whole organization. Where are they getting their resources?

Mr. Reilly: I will be glad to answer that for the hon. member if he wants me to.

Mr. Pilkey: Why do they not put it out in printed form and let the people of this province know where their resources come from? As a matter of fact, why do they not adopt the resolution of the New Democratic Party and legislate in that area, and everybody will have to put it out? I mean, we have called for legislation in this area, but I do not recall the Conservative or the Liberal Party supporting that type of legislation. We have nothing to fear in this area; we are prepared to reveal where our money comes from.

Mr. Sargent: It is going to come.

Mr. Pilkey: So is Christmas, but it is a little way off.

Mr. Sargent: What will the hon. member have to talk about then?

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Pilkey: I think this is the answer that is needed as far as political contributions are concerned. Let us have them all revealed. As a matter of fact, if I could get back to Mr. Ron Haggart's column, I would just like to read the last paragraph and see what he has to say. He said:

> Leonard Reilly's bill should be passed in the Ontario Legislature. Statistics then would be available to show how many nickels a month went to the Liberals and Conservatives to match the figures now available from the NDP. The embarassment to the other two parties would be acute. Mr. Reilly's own party would be the last to take advantage of the freedom he claims to seek.

And I think that I agree with that. I think they would be. I suspect there would not be any legislation. If it does go through, there is going to be some embarrassment to the Conservative Party on the number of nickels they get from the trade union movement versus what the New Democratic Party gets. I do not worry too much about that type of legislation because I do not think that they are going to pass it anyway. I would hope that, in some small way, we destroyed the myth that the trade union movement is controlled in the United States with complete directive. This is not a fact. I hope we have exploded the myth that all the money is channelled through the United States and that is where the Canadian funds are. That is not true either.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): All the pension funds are.

Mr. Pilkey: Pension funds are controlled in most of the industrial unions by the corporations and not by the trade union movement. Very little has been controlled by them. Pension funds are in Canada as well.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: That is nonsense!

Mr. Stokes: It is not nonsense!

Mr. Pilkey: That is true. That is a fact. As a matter of fact, if the member really wanted to know; it would be very interesting to know where Canadian pension funds are in Canada. I suspect that General Motors have theirs with the Royal Trust Company in Canada. I hope that they did not send it to the United States. But, nevertheless, that is money controlled by the corporation. It is on a funded basis. We would not know exactly where it is. It could be in the United States, but if it is there, then the corporations have placed it there, because they are controlling the funds. The only guarantee we have is that we say the plans must be funded properly—so that there is a guarantee that the resources are there.

Now I hope that in a small way we have exploded all those myths, and I want to conclude by saying that if we pass—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the member is rising on a point of order—the member for Oshawa has the floor—the member for Grey-Bruce is asking whether or not a question is permitted.

Mr. Pilkey: If we pass right-to-work laws in this province the same as they have in the three states that I talked about, Alabama, Florida and Utah, the only three that are left, then I think that in the interest of the workers of this province the government would be destroying, as I said earlier, the very foundation that was built brick by brick, and with a lot of sweat, and struggle, and in some cases with bodily harm. In some cases men were killed in the fight that took place for economic and social justice, and I would urge upon this government to consider very, very carefully any action that they may take in this area.

I think that the trade union movement has been good for Ontario in terms of the living standards that they have provided. They have done this with some disruption in the economy at times, but we seem to have the ability to bounce back from those critical stages, and we go forward again. This is what it is all about, and I think we can continue to make progress. But the trade union movement has to be a viable, strong, unified movement. It just has to be if it is going to make this kind of progress and the workers are going to get their equity from the giant corporations of this province.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: That is hardly an unprejudiced voice.

Mr. Pilkey: Well it may be hardly an unprejudiced voice, but nevertheless I think that I have had just a little more experience.

Mr. J. Renwick: And a lot of facts, too.

Mr. Pilkey: I do not know if you would say that I had a lot of vested interest, but I have got a vested interest in brotherhood.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Brotherhood?

Mr. Pilkey: Yes. That is right and I have got a vested interest.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: Well, I do not know.

Mr. Speaker: Order please! There should be no discussion across the floor of the House. Any member wishing to speak will address the chair. Interjections are out of order unless the person wishing to speak will get permission from the chair.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Point of order.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think the hon. member has made a good speech, but he has talked about a model union all night, and we have other unions. I admire the union he has talked about, they are a great union.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! The member does not have a point of order.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The point of order is that the hon. member is suggesting that we are not all capable of brotherhood.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Oshawa.

Mr. Pilkey: I said earlier that—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: It sounds like female discrimination.

Mr. Pilkey: Well I do not know anything about female discrimination. The trade union movement has put some dignity into the plants, and we have provided dignity for the older workers in this province so that they can retire and enjoy themselves in the declining years of their lives. This progress has been made more so since we have had union security clauses in the agreements. It may have created some hardship on a few people who, in all good conscience, do not think that they want to belong to the union, but nevertheless, these are the rules and this is how we have made the progress that we have made in the province of Ontario. And a lot of this progress has been made in spite of governments of the day.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Pilkey: That may be so, but a lot of it has been made in spite of governments of the day. As a matter of fact, if we go back to the early beginning, they were opposed to having the CIO in Canada at all or in the province of Ontario. So that—

Mr. J. Renwick: They have been the government—

Mr. Pilkey: So we have put a considerable democracy inside of the trade union movement. The members have their rights and they have their constitutions that they abide by, but if we get these right-to-work laws, and the elimination of union security, then there is just going to be a black day for many workers in this province.

I would hope that the remarks that were made today about brutality; about injustice; the rackets; the undemocratic procedures; are not accepted by the majority of the government members. I would hope not because, as I said, I think that would be a black day in the province of Ontario, for the labour movement.

With the democratic procedures we have at the government level and in the trade union movement, as a strong viable group, we are going to make further progress in this Ontario of ours that we can all be proud of.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I did not realize there was a storm in the air. I thought it was just the heat. Here we are, I had a long speech prepared, although not quite as long as the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Pilkey).

I thought I might reminisce for a little while, because I am here the longest of any member. I sat at the feet of Mitchell Hepburn, George Drew, Gordon Conant, Harry Nixon and Tom Kennedy—then, of course, hon. members know the rest. I thought, as some of them were speaking, of a story that was told by, perhaps, the most brilliant man I suppose who graced this assembly—that is, he had the most brilliant mind at any rate—the person of A. MacLeod, former member for Bellwoods. He told this story in the House—it happened to be when Colonel Kennedy was taking over the Premiership of the province. He said—now this change reminds me of something—he said we had Mr. Drew who could be bitter and vehement, and he said he reminds me of an old stage play, "Arsenic and Old Lace". Now, he said, we have had arsenic, now we have old lace. Well, we have had arsenic this evening; and we have old lace right now.

Hon. members know this is the Budget debate. I did not intend to be on the Budget debate at all. I was going to speak on Monday evening on the report of the liquor licence board and the liquor control board of Ontario, but I got euchred. And, of course, I moved the adjournment of the House, and having had a speech all prepared for that occasion and being partially Scottish, I did not want to waste it. So I said I will tie it in with the Budget, and make a Budget speech, and so we are going to tie this speech on or in with the $5 million given to the alcoholism and drug addiction foundation.

My contribution to this debate will be in no way political and certainly will not be partisan, and I do not think it will be controversial. I am not one who thinks that all the good ideas emanate from this side of the House. The other night I heard many, many excellent suggestions from members of all parties in the debate.

I would like to say that I have learned a great deal. I have received many good suggestions from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon), member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), Downsview (Mr. Singer), member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick), and Yorkview (Mr Young), and York South (Mr. MacDonald), and I could go on—Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), and also from my old friend who is my closest neighbour, member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent).

I agree with the hon. leader of the Opposition when he advocates a more definite educational programme as far as alcoholism is concerned. But, I am sure he is aware that the alcoholism and drug addiction foundation has a very excellent up-to-date programme along that line. The foundation not only goes into the schools, but furnishes the teaching profession with a complete line of booklets suitable for teenagers, and the member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. B. Newman) will bear that out. They may not use them always, but they are there.

It also produces a radio programme, a television programme, supplies literature and speakers for meetings of service clubs, fraternal organizations, church groups and home and school organizations. In fact, our educational booklets and programme is being studied and imitated by other jurisdictions all over this continent and beyond it as well.

However, this is a problem, so complex and so serious, that every member should be willing to share his views and offer his suggestions and perhaps possible solutions. We are willing to experiment and try any reasonable suggestion, and I would ask those on the other side of the House:

What have we done that we should not have done? What have we left undone, that we should have done in this field?

There was a hint, the other night, that the chairman of the LLBO and the LCBO were interested only in selling the product, not in controlling the sale. Anyone who knows his honour Judge Robb, or has had any dealings with Mr. Shepherd, know all too well that both these estimable gentlemen have given freely of their time and their great talents to the betterment of conditions in the industry, and, in particular, to this problem of alcoholism. No one could be more co-operative and no one is more interested in moderation and in trying to help the unfortunate men and women who are alcoholics than these two men.

We come to the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) who has indicated, time and time again, his concern about this problem. Not just as a problem of law-enforcement, he is concerned about it as a social problem, a moral problem, as a welfare problem and a health problem and he has said time after time, that we must come to grips with it. The very fact that this government has placed $5.5 million in the estimates for the Alcoholism and Drug Addiction Foundation's work is concrete evidence of his concern.

Now, when the foundation came before the committee on government commissions, they were asked this question: "Have you sufficient money? Does the government give you sufficient money to carry out your programmes." And if you will remember, they said: "We have been given sufficient. We may need more next year but for the time being we have been given sufficient."

I am not going to debate the where or how of the sale of liquor but I want to talk about the results of over-indulgence. In spite of criticism, and much criticism has been offered, great and significant developments have been made in this field since 1949. As members know, Canada's first official programme got underway in 1949, with the passing of Bill 173 in this honourable House, establishing the alcoholism research foundation—since re-named the alcoholism and drug addiction foundation.

Over-indulgence in alcohol has been a problem in our world for 5,000 years, ever since the days of ancient Babylon. It was a problem in the pioneer days of Ontario and it is a constant wonder to me that we have accomplished so much in 19 short years.

The whole picture has changed since 1949. In 1949 we looked upon it as a moral problem and the cure was punishment: Send the offender to the common jail. No one thought of it as health problem. Now we recognize it for what it is, a disease, and we have come to grips with it. And again I repeat, I am surprised, not at the little we have accomplished, but at what has been accomplished or achieved in such a short time. The stigma is gone, just as it has gone as far as the mentally-ill patient is concerned. Once we faced up to reality, things began happening, and our provincial alcoholism and drug addiction foundation is the envy of every jurisdiction on this continent. Dr. Archibald, the head of it, is in constant demand as a speaker and consultant all over America, and I say to you that this man is deserving of our everlasting gratitude for a job well done.

Our genial Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) has also not only shown his interest but he is a driving force behind this efficient organization.

Now we have the Provincial Secretary (Mr. Welch), a new man. A young man. A young man of ability and drive and he too is trying to add his bit to the work of this foundation.

We are fortunate indeed to have men of this calibre in Canada and in our province. Again I say and I say it with all the emphasis at my command, and, I repeat, the wonder is not that we have accomplished so little, but that the foundation and related agencies, the Salvation Army, alcoholics anonymous and all the other agencies have achieved so much in such a short time. Nineteen years is a very short time when we think of this problem that has plagued man and his world for countless ages.

The rewards in this field of service are perhaps not so evident to the casual onlooker, but to see a reunited family, a happy and contented human being, a man or woman who before treatment and therapy was a liability but now is an asset to the community, is a reward of unbelievable value.

Now I want you to think for a moment of the size of this public health problem. Sometimes figures are pretty unconvincing things, but let us compare some figures. We have 1,200 TB patients in this province. That is away down. You know, we made a breakthrough as far as the cure of TB is concerned, 20 years ago; there are 2,000 outpatients receiving some sort of drug therapy and there are 100,000 alcoholics. We have more alcoholics than we have cancer, TB, and polio cases combined. Looking at it that way, perhaps we can see this problem in its proper dimension.

What about our public welfare department? How many of its cases have an alcoholic connotation? Ask the family courts and all other social agencies what proportion of their caseload has an alcoholic incidence.

All of us pay taxes, they are darn high, too, and our taxes support the police departments, the courts, the jails, the mental hospitals, the reformatories, the penitentiaries, the children's aid, the welfare agencies. These agencies draw their largest clientele from those having alcoholic problems. Their maintenance costs countless tax dollars, but all of this money is down the drain. Not one cent goes towards the solution of the alcoholic problem.

Does it not make sense, therefore, the best possible sense, this is what my friend, the member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Bukator) was saying, to invest a few dollars on services, educational programmes and facilities designed to reduce the size of this problem? That is why you were asked to vote $5.5 million to this work.

We have 100,000 alcoholics in this province, but that is only a small part of the story. The individual alcoholic does not suffer alone. His family suffers, his employer suffers, the community suffers, the province suffers.

So this is everybody's business and it transcends party politics.

What does it mean to be an alcoholic? In short, an alcoholic is a man or woman who drinks to excess, and cannot help drinking. A person for whom alcohol has become a regular addition to his diet every day.

We know, and all agree, that alcoholism can cause, and does cause, a lot of trouble. About $200 million worth of trouble every year in Canada alone; that is what it costs.

The alcoholism and drug addiction foundation is the evidence and mark of our concern for these unfortunate people. Alcohol is not only the leading factor in traffic deaths, but is more common than all other factors put together.

Alcohol makes people do irrational things. It robs them of their judgment and often lets them kill themselves as well as others. Not only does it cause heartbreak and trouble, but it tends to drag all society down.

But, there is one thing that stands out today as one of the most terrible effects of over-indulgence. That is the accident and death rate on the highways, caused by people who mix driving and drinking. Many surveys of fatal automobile accidents reveal that drinking is a contributing cause, more often than not. Some surveys in the United States reveal that over 60 per cent of those responsible for fatal accidents had been drinking. Here in Ontario we know that between 40 and 50 per cent of fatal accidents could be traced to over-drinking.

We have made some strides, for example, even though the number who drink in this province has increased by a sizeable proportion, the incidence of alcoholism has not increased since 1961. This is a remarkable achievement when we are told that in almost every other jurisdiction in America the opposite is true.

Between 60 and 65 per cent of people over 21 years of age drink in this province—a large percentage. These people drink for various reasons and most of them can handle it. But, the alcoholic drinks because he cannot help himself. To 98 per cent of those who indulge, alcohol is no problem. They can take it or leave it alone.

However, to about two per cent, drinking has become enough of a problem to interfere with happy, healthy and normal living. These people are sick! They are victims of an illness that requires medical, psychiatric and social help. And this is not an isolated or limited problem. It is not confined to a few families or even a community. All social groups are affected. Putting the alcoholic in jail is not the answer. He needs treatment just as any other sick person.

At the present moment—and this is something I advocated away back—a new 100-bed hospital is taking shape on the west campus of the University of Toronto and we have clinics in most of the larger cities of Ontario. Several half-way houses have been established to assist the alcoholic to make the transfer back from the institution to normal living.

Now as I said before, the incidence of alcoholism has not increased in the past few years. We have held the line but that is all. We have hopes that in the years ahead we shall not only hold the line, but turn it back.

This problem can be solved. We will not solve it in a decade or in 20 years or a generation, but we are making substantial progress and that is encouraging.

In closing, I would like to express the thanks of all who are working in this field, to the newspapers and other news media and I would like to express my thanks to the members of this House for their invaluable assistance. Most of the daily and weekly newspapers have had articles on alcoholism and drug addiction during the past year. These news media have rendered a great public service in focusing attention on this problem.

They are trying, as we all are, to make Ontario a place in which to stand and to grow.

I would also be very ungrateful indeed if I did not express through you, sir, my personal appreciation to the hon. members on all sides of the House for their continuing interest in this problem and their unfailing kindness to me on so many, many occasions when I happened to be in their local constituencies.

They tell us that the age of miracles is past but miracles do happen. Men and women have been restored to normal and happy living and through the foundation, your interest and support, you have helped make this happen.

Ontario, the most important province in Canada, possesses many blessings; industry, resources, opportunities, educational institutions, we have all these things as the member for Niagara Falls says: "in this glorious land," but, our greatest asset is our people. Anything that destroys the physical, moral and mental fitness of people is bad, for the land, and for all of us. Alcoholism affects all three. It interferes with the physical, moral and mental fitness of people and, therefore, I plead for your continued support, sympathy and cooperation as we try to find a solution to this age-old problem. I have made my speech for the year and I thank you for your attention, and I want your cooperation in the year ahead of us.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have waited all day to make my small contribution to this debate, and I sat here watching the members come in and go out. I have prepared absolutely nothing, I thought that I would speak to them, as my good friend who just finished speaking, off the cuff, and doing a bit of reminiscing. I have heard debates in this House that made me proud of the people who spoke, and I have heard others who lowered the dignity of this House just a few notches.

I am reminded of an old friend of mine who said that the politician's life is like the stock market. People are constantly appraising an individual in public life. One day your stock goes up a few points, and when you make some sort of speech that does not appeal to anyone, or some of your friends, and your stock goes down a bit, and I think that it is true. Hon. members are appraised by their efforts in the House.

I have made my better speeches at home before a mirror when I was shaving, and in my hotel room I have prepared many wonderful speeches, and gone through the gestures, and thumped the desk, because that was what I was instructed to do. I find here tonight that I could make an exceptionally good speech similar to the one that I have made in the hotel before a mirror, because I would be talking to myself, I am almost doing that here tonight. I am speaking to eight or nine members of the government, and I thought that I would at least get involved in the debate of labour and management. I thought with the member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) and the member for Oshawa (Mr. Pilkey) here, I would make a small contribution to those two hon. members, but they are gone also.

I have found that one of the reasons that we get on our feet and speak in this House is for home consumption. You try to get the people at home to say, "What a good job George did for us", if I should send them a copy of Hansard. I thought that I would talk about the parks commission for at least 15 or 20 minutes, and I find that the chairman of the parks commission is not here.

Well it is nice to see the member for Eglinton back.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Well, I know that he will permit me the odd physical function, I am sorry that I had to leave the House though!

Mr. Bukator: Well, now that the member mentions it, he does look much better!

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Did you get that for Hansard, please?

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Speaker, due to the absence of so many members I do not want to take up the time of the House, however, I have many things that I would like to talk about. I do believe that in just three or four months we will be back in here again, and I will probably be a lot better prepared then than I am now so I am going to make you all very happy because I am going to finish my speech now. Thank you very much for listening.

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to speak on what is my first Budget debate, I do not have too much to reminisce on. However, I do have a few points that I would like to bring out, particularly in view of what has been said here today in the heat of debate.

One of the things that I wanted to clarify was the statement made by our Liberal friends regarding the "goon tactics behaviour" of the seamen's international union and Hal Banks. Just to set the record straight, Hal Banks was probably the only immigrant with a criminal record who was permitted to enter the country by the Liberal government at that time, to break another union. He was very successful in his task, but like Topsy, he sort of grew, only in a more vicious manner. Eventually, the employers in the maritime industries started to complain about him. Of course, the Liberals in the Ottawa Government then did not particularly care and did not want to do much, because Hal, with what he knew, would be an embarrassment when they put the pressure on him.

Now, it was only after the Canadian labour congress, and the labour movement threatened to close the seaway that there was action taken against Hal Banks. I want to stress this, that it was the labour movement that went out to police itself, to clean itself up, and not the particular government. In fact they allowed Mr. Banks to escape and said that they could not find him, so a local reporter went down to show them where Hal was. I was rather shocked to hear the talk this afternoon about justice, liberty, the free way of life, and all the other clichés that you could tie together. In light of the headlines that were brought out at this time, I think the member should be reminded of those headlines that he did not bring out. There is a headline in the editorial page in the Toronto Daily Star, today, and I am going to read this because this is the way that the member wants the trade union movement, and the people who work in the province to go.

The headline is:

DEATH IS THE PRICE

> You never saw the rooming house on Granby street, where three little girls, as innocent as babies, were hacked to death, with their mother. But when you head north to the cottage this weekend, or loll on the lawn in Don Mills, or run a sail up on the lake, it might not be a bad idea to think about it.
> It was the kind of house that no city should have. Heaving floors, filthy rooms, smelling from buck-a-bottle wine, and it was the kind of neighbourhood for people to go wild, with financial pressure, and frustration. Nine months ago, a man, just a few doors down, drove a knife into his wife eleven times. Andy Anderson knew it, he lived next door to the little girls. When he carried them away with blankets over their heads, Anderson was asked what he thought about it all, he said:
> "I have never seen such a Jesus-rotten neighbourhood as this in my life." This is rich smug Toronto.

Now we had a demonstration of that particular philosophy this afternoon from the member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly).

I would also like to comment on some of the remarks made by the member for Quinte (Mr. Potter) last Monday. His remarks implied —or he said rather—that the session was rather boring and the members are appealing to the local press and the electorate.

I would like to point out to that member that we would hardly accept the government's programme if it was a sermon from the mount. We intend to question it; to examine it and offer our own proposals as to how this province should be run.

We are not impressed with the know-it-all paternalistic attitude of this particular government. For the member and his government, after listening to the debates this afternoon, I suggest that they open their eyes and their ears to the intellectual clamour that is going on in the surrounding world and accept the fact that we live in the 20th century.

We intend to continue to appeal through the press to the electorate. This is an educational process, the people are entitled to know where the political parties stand.

After all, they will be called upon to pass judgment in the next four or five years. This, of course, is the democratic process and if the member does not like it I suggest he take into consideration Harry Truman's saying: "If you do not like the heat in the kitchen you should get out of it."

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Pretty hot now, I will tell the member that.

Mr. Makarchuk: There is no doubt in my mind that at times there is more smoke than light on the proceedings in this House, and at times it may be boring to be reminded time and time again that the McRuer report has three copies; at times it might be infuriating when you have to listen to the anti-union biogtry. But I should remind myself in this process of give and take I see that things do get done.

Of course, on many occasions, Mr. Speaker, the legislation passed here is not to our liking, nor is the government moving with the speed one would expect it to move in the 20th century. But I suggest that this is not because of the system of government, but the nature of that government. Seeing that we will not change the nature of the individuals sitting opposite—the few that are sitting opposite tonight—then we will change the individuals.

I also feel, Mr. Speaker, as has been expounded here before, that we should have two sittings a year, one in the fall and the other in winter running into spring. This would provide time for the members to bring critical analysis and suggestions to the legislation that is put before the House, and it would also eliminate the current method of getting legislation through the process of attrition. I also think it would result in more civilized hours of work.

Moving to other things, Mr. Speaker, and taking in account the hot summers, overcrowded living conditions, the air pollution and many of the other undesirable features of our existence, I believe that this government should proceed with haste to establish a series of government-operated camps for children.

If we can provide money for horse racing, Mr. Speaker, we certainly can provide money to establish camps where the youth of our cities and towns can be taken out of the hot concrete jungles into fresh air, green grass, the unpolluted water and nourishing food that can be provided in summer camps. The time to spend at the camp may not be for all summer, but two weeks is something that we can certainly provide for our disadvantaged youth.

The camps can be built in provincial parks. They would provide ready-made employment for thousands of university and high school students during the summer months, and would also provide a respite to the parents of these children.

Summer camps are not new. Children of affluent parents are in a position to enjoy them. It is a matter of extending the same particular privilege to our underprivileged children. The lakes and forests and rivers of this province can, and should be enjoyed by all people.

There is another of great concern to me, Mr. Speaker. Earlier in the session, I put a resolution on the order paper, asking that immediate measures be taken to clean up the Grand River.

For my friends who are not aware of where the Grand flows—possibly the members for northern Ontario—I will explain the river is 180 miles long. It flows through or near such centres as Kitchener, Breslau, Waterloo, Preston, Galt, Paris, Brantford, Caledonia, Cayuga, Dunnville and terminates at Port Maitland.

Within 25 miles of the Grand there is a population of over 1 million people who are caught in what I call a recreation squeeze.

To escape to the north we have to cope with the problem of people from the Metro Toronto area who are also escaping to the north. To the south of us we have Lake Erie now taking on a slimy green appearance. As a result, for the people in this area, recreational possibilities are becoming more limited while the population continues to expand.

The only large recreational possibility available in the area is the Grand River and, of course, as are most of the other rivers in southern Ontario, it is polluted and cannot be used for recreational purposes.

There are other reasons why action should be taken on the Grand. A considerable amount of work has been done building dams on tributaries to the river. This year, the Grand River conservation authority has a budget of over $5 million to build more dams and control flooding. A considerable amount of study has gone into tracing the sources of pollution on the Grand. We know where it comes from.

Some efforts are being made to control pollution on the Grand, but with the increasing industrialization and urbanization the race is being lost. Here is a statement made by James S. Bauer, chairman of the Grand River conservation authority, and he says:

> The Grand River will become nothing but a sewer in five or six years if five large dams are not built to provide enough water for dilution.

At one time, Mr. Speaker, boats were able to navigate up the Grand River to Brantford. The navigation can be revived. The Ontario government has made a study of the possibility of navigating up the Grand, and they feel that a canal in the Grand would create a potential of 5,000 tourist boaters a year and an economic activity of about $4 million after a few years of construction.

To build these dams and canals it appears to me, according to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett), that the Ontario government is prepared to go ahead, but the federal government is the stumbling block in this matter. Seeing that our Liberal friends are sort of gloating about the fact that they have somebody to talk to in Ottawa, perhaps they can start talking to their friends in Ottawa and we can start building dams on the Grand and canals too.

However, Mr. Speaker, in the matter of pollution control, this is a field where the provincial government can and should take immediate action. A crash programme of pollution control in the Grand will show the people of this province that this government is prepared and willing to stand and turn the tide of rising water pollution.

It would be an example to the people of Ontario, Canada and North America that for once, on this continent, human beings have looked at their environment and decided, at least in respect of the Grand River, that not only will we stop polluting our natural environment, but we will correct the mistakes of the past.

This action would open up the area to fishing, swimming, boating, sailing. It would provide something for all those people who live in these little towns where recreational facilities are limited. It would also demonstrate that we have started building a society where the joy does not only come from clipping a coupon, but also from being able to cast a fishing line into a clear river.

One final matter, Mr. Speaker, I was going to bring this up on the liquor debate, but I am not sure whether the liquor debate is going to go on or not. This matter is regarding the discriminatory application of liquor regulations against veterans' service clubs such as the legion, the army, navy and air-force club, the ex-imperial club and others.

For reasons unknown to me or anybody else that I have asked, the board feels that these veterans' clubs could serve beer but not liquor. It seems to me to be an extension of the theory that the Indians cannot hold their liquor theory which was advocated earlier, but repudiated today by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha). Only in this case, Mr. Speaker, the liquor board feels that the veterans and their friends cannot hold their liquor.

As a result, veterans' clubs are denied the right to serve liquor, except when they have a banquet permit, and then again there is a rather illogical situation. Of course, the same rules do not apply to country clubs, and here you have an indiaction that there is one liquor control law for the less affluent and another one for the affluent.

It seems ridiculous that a veteran's wife, who does not like beer and would prefer something else, cannot have the privilege of enjoying a cold Collins, but must swill beer because the liquor board believes liquor is only for the country club set.

It is about time the board stopped this stupid practice of discriminating against veterans' clubs or any other clubs. As long as they meet the requirements and they have a desire to have a liquor licence, then they should be permitted the same privileges that are now only extended to clubs attended by the affluent members of our society.

Once again I wish to stress it is time the board moved into the 20th century. You will find responsible people in all walks of life, not just in the country clubs. So it is about time we removed this cloud of hypocrisy that hangs suspended over anything associated with the liquor control board.

In Stratford, Mr. Speaker, one of the plays this year is by Molière. It is called Tartuffe, and its theme is the hypocrisy of this particular character in the play. Well, Mr. Speaker, after watching that play I came away with the conclusion that Tartuffe is not dead. He is running the liquor control board of Ontario.

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise tonight to take part in this Budget debate. There are two or three items I would like to discuss very briefly. The first one deals with the proposal of The Department of Mines to remove the mining recorder's office from Fort Frances, Ontario. Now, this is the proposal or recommendation of the select committee on mining of 1966. There is an interesting sidelight here in that W. G. Noden, the member who preceded me in this House, was on that committee. One of the recommendations of that committee was that the number of mining recording offices be cut down from, I believe it was, 12 to eight.

There have been two reasons given for the removal of this office, one, the small number of licences sold from the office, and secondly, the lack of a resident geologist. I would like to propose some reasons to this House, to the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) and to the Premier of the province (Mr. Robarts)—

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): He is not even in the House.

Mr. T. P. Reid: —a number of reasons why this office should be left in Fort Frances. Of the total cost or expense to the province, total expenditures of The Department of Mines, is $4,838,000. Now, we are told that this office in Fort Frances is a great expense to the province, but here we have the annual report of The Department of Mines and the title of it is: "Through the Billion Dollar Barrier".

In the last year, the mining industry in Ontario has contributed over a billion dollars of cash to this province, so that the cost of one small office in a small town such as Fort Frances is really negligible. The revenue from the mining tax from 1960 to 1966 has averaged from 1 to 2.3 per cent of the provincial net ordinary expenditures. The select committee on mining on page 53 states:

> The Department of Mines has been a substantial revenue producer for the Provincial Treasury for many years.

The budget of the mining lands branch, one of the sections within The Department of Mines, is $496,000, which includes mining recording branches. This is 0.01 per cent of total provincial expenditures. On the other hand, the revenue gained to the province from recording of mining claims in the last year was $487,362.45. Miscellaneous added to that was $19,509.22, for a total of $506,-871.67. So the total budget of the recording branches of this department is negligible in the overall picture.

The Minister said in reply to the member for Port Arthur, who raised the subject on behalf of myself and the people of northwestern Ontario, that the present revenue of the Fort Frances office was equal to the expenditures for that same office. As hon. members can see by looking at page 114 of the annual report on mining, the revenue is equal to the expenditure.

Now, it is a strange thing that we are spending a great deal of money on public relations in this department and at the same time we are closing down some of the small offices in these small towns. I suggest that if you are trying to promote the image of mining and the image of The Department of Mines, that one of the ways this could be done is to let those offices remain where they are.

I would like to provide some positive reasons why these branches should be left where they are. First of all, I would like the government to consider the matter of geography, the long distances that prospectors and those who have business with the mining recording offices are now going to have to travel. From Fort Frances to Kenora it is a distance of some 140 miles over a not-too-good road. For anyone who has to make this journey this entails at least one full day, and the subsequent loss of time and income.

I might add at this point that if there was a direct connecting link between Highways 11 and 71 the people around the Ignace area would be able to reach Fort Frances within a shorter time than they would take otherwise and the number of claims and licences issued from Fort Frances would be greater.

I might say also at this time that the mining concentration in the Rainy River district alone pays for this mining office. The revenues derived from the mines at Atikokan alone would keep this office running for a great deal of time. I might point out to the Minister that he made the point that the number of miner licences issued from the Fort Frances office was down and was a very small number. But I would point out to the Minister that this is not a criterion for keeping the mining office open.

Firstly, veteran prospectors, those who have been in the business or in the game, if you like, for some time, do not purchase their licences in a district in which they are going to operate. They like to keep their movements and their activities secret, so that other prospectors will not know where they are and what they are doing. There is a great deal of competition in this field. Subsequently, a great many of them buy their licences, especially from Toronto, and not in the district in which they are active.

It is a further fact that all mining companies must purchase their licences from Toronto rather than the district in which they are working. This again would detract from the number of licences that would normally be issued from the Fort Frances office. A further fact concomitant with that one is that a prospector attached to a company—and this means the majority of prospectors today—have companies purchase their licences for them. Again these licences are purchased in Toronto, again cutting down on the number of licences purchased in the Fort Frances area. Therefore, the number of licences purchased at this actual office should be no criterion and does not accurately affect mining and prospecting activity in this particular area.

Now in his remarks, the Minister asked for some cogent reason why this office or offices should be left where they are. Now I would suggest to the House that those of us in the smaller communities of the north are in a very different position than the large urban centres in the province. First of all, a government recording office or any service in a small town can play a very integral part in the economy of that particular town. With the mining recording office in Fort Frances, this obviously attracted and brings prospectors and those interested in mining activities into the Fort Frances area.

In that area, they purchase their supplies, their entertainment, and they usually stay overnight, and all this adds to the economy of a small town, and the effect economically in total is great. I would ask that the Minister keep this in mind when he looks for cogent reasons for leaving the office where it is. I would further like to suggest that the government review its philosophy of service to the people, especially those in this area. The philosophy of the present government seems to be that revenues equal or exceed expenditure. In this case, at the moment, revenues do exceed expenditures. The office is, in effect, making money.

But even if the office was losing money, which it is not, I would suggest that the policy of service to the people of this area should be kept in mind, that the possible over-expenditure would be little in regard to the service that this office could render to the people of Fort Frances, Rainy River and Atikokan, and the district.

I would therefore plead, on behalf of Fort Frances, and all the towns where the recording office is to be moved out, that they be allowed to remain. Now, there are various alternatives before us in this case. Number one, we could leave the office where it is, in Fort Frances and the other areas, and secondly we could place a resident geologist in each of these towns where there is no one there at present. Or we could have a resident geologist travel from Kenora on specific days. If it was properly published, those in the mining business would be aware of this, and could make certain that any information that they wanted, they could get on those designated days.

I have a further alternative, and the least tasteful to me, but that is that the present mining offices be allowed to be phased out slowly, a course of natural attrition. When the present mining recorder retires, then he should not be replaced, and this is a final and least tasteful alternative.

I would like to ask how the government intends to save money by sending the present recorder to Kenora, where there will then be two resident mining recorders when apparently one can handle the job now. In other words, at the present time there is going to be no economic benefit by moving the office to Kenora.

I repeat, I would ask the Minister of Mines, the government, and the Premier in particular to leave the mining recording office where it is in Fort Frances.

There is a second subject that I would like to dwell on very briefly, and that is the necessity for a road between Highways 11 and 71 in northwestern Ontario. I have mentioned this in a number of letters and speeches before, so I shall be brief.

I would reiterate that there is an urgent need for a connecting link between highways 11 and 71, between Ignace and Atikokan. At the present time, it is necessary for those who wish to travel in different parts of the Rainy River district to travel either through the constituency of Thunder Bay, or Kenora to get into a different part of the district. Secondly there is no direct geographical link with the town of Ignace which is now in the Rainy River district, or any of the other larger population centres such as Atikokan, or Fort Frances.

Such a road would open valuable timber land that would assuredly soon be exploited. It would also open a great area for recreation and access to a great number of lakes, and some great fishing and hunting.

Now, I see that the Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Brunelle) is here once again, and I would not like to miss an opportunity to plead with him once more the subject of fishing licences. I would like to congratulate him on the exemption of women on fishing licences.

I would ask, as the Premier is with us, that he and the Minister of Lands and Forests would once again re-examine their position on the fishing licences, and I hope that they will never be put in effect.

I would like to make one more, and probably not the last, request for the exemption of old folks, senior citizens, or people on pensions, whatever you will, from the necessity of the purchase of fishing licences. I have received a number of letters from people on pensions, and old folks who are not able to fish now, or who feel almost betrayed because they are going to have to purchase a licence to fish.

When you are living on a pension of some $105, the $3 fishing licence can be a burden. In closing I would ask once again that the position be reconsidered, especially with regard to the exemption of senior citizens.

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, since I would prefer to speak at some other time, would I be in order to request the adjournment of the House, it being 11:00 of the clock?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Well, we very seldom resist the requests of the distaff side of the Legislature. May I suggest that the hon. member move the adjournment of the debate?

Mrs. M. Renwick moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the House for permission to revert to motions in order that I may move that this House will meet tomorrow at 9:30 a.m. and adjourn at 2:00 p.m.?

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Tomorrow morning, Mr. Speaker, we will deal with remaining estimates of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs, and the estimates of my own department, and the Lieutenant-Governor, and the Provincial Auditor.

An hon. member: Oh, we will have to phone the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha).

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, we had hoped that there might be a change in his approach with the new Lieutenant-Governor and this will remain to be seen.

After that I would like to deal with the second order on the order paper, I think, the report of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario. Then we will get back to the Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11:05 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, JULY 19, 1968

The House met at 9:30 o'clock, a.m.

Mr. Speaker: Later this morning we will have in the west gallery the new Canadian group from Church Street school in Toronto.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

The Minister of Trade and Development.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the debate on the estimates of The Department of Trade and Development, I offered to table correspondence concerning the proposed land transaction among Ontario housing corporation, central mortgage and housing corporation, and Trent Park Developments Limited in the city of Peterborough. Mr. Speaker, I wish to table this correspondence at this time.

In doing so, I would like to refer to the discussion which took place during the course of the debate whereby certain allegations were made concerning a former member of this Legislature, Mr. Keith Brown, to the effect that he was a party to this transaction.

I would like to state categorically that at no time was Mr. Keith Brown involved in discussions or negotiations with Ontario housing corporation. At the time Ontario housing corporation first became aware of the availability of this property, title had already been passed from Mr. Keith Brown to New Orleans Investment Corporation Limited some several months earlier.

Even if the land development staff of Ontario housing corporation had been aware of the earlier interest of Mr. Brown in this property, they would have had no reason to associate his name with that of a member of the Ontario Legislature. It is not the practice of Ontario housing corporation to search title until such time as a decision has been reached to consummate the purchase of a piece of real property. Even were a title search carried out at an earlier date, corporation officials would be placed in an intolerable situation if they were required to track down all previous owners with a view to determining whether at any time they had been elected officials.

From Mr. Keith Brown's point of view, his sale to New Orleans Investment Corporation Limited was a perfectly normal business transaction. To suggest that due to his earlier interest in the land he was improperly involved in a transaction between Ontario housing corporation and another party is wholly unreasonable and completely unwarranted.

As can be seen from the correspondence which I have just tabled, formal communication with the vendor's representatives first began during the latter part of June, 1967. This followed a visit to the offices of Ontario housing corporation by a real estate salesman, a Mr. Hardy, who was employed by New Orleans Investment Corporation Limited. Ontario housing corporation was interested in acquiring additional land holdings in the city of Peterborough, and followed its normal procedures in such cases.

After the site had been inspected by one of the corporation's property officers, on May 26, 1967, steps were taken to secure the land under a conditional offer to sell. This agreement was executed by the vendors on June 30, 1967 and by OHC on July 6, 1967. Subsequently, the corporation asked for an extension of the agreement to October 31, 1967 and this was agreed to, subject to payment of a further deposit of $50,000, which was to be returned if the negotiations were not completed. Subsequently, this deposit was returned in its entirety.

I would again like to make it very clear that this is just one of many transactions which have been considered and for various reasons rejected by OHC. Futhermore, the conditions of purchase which were included in the offer to sell were conditions which are normally included in such agreements by OHC, as at the time of securing the land under agreement, it has no knowledge as to whether or not the necessary federal and provincial authorities, or the approval of the municipality concerned, will be forthcoming.

May I, therefore, conclude and summarize these remarks, Mr. Speaker, by repeating that there was nothing unusual in this transaction and Mr. Keith Brown was not a party to the discussions or negotiations involving the Ontario housing corporation.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Just a coincidence?

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): I wonder if I might be able to make a point of order at this point in view of the fact that I was the person to bring this matter before the Legislature in the first instance. My point of order is this, that at no time did I mention the name of Keith Brown or indicate in any way that he was involved in this transaction. I do not believe that any other member of this political party made that statement. Our concern was entirely with the nature of the transaction. I do not wish to comment on the statement which the Minister made this morning, but I did want to make that point clear, very clear, before this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, the member is quite correct. There were no names mentioned by any member of his party.

Mr. Speaker: Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) a question regarding the jailing of a 16-year-old girl on an 89-cent theft charge and the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the Minister of Correctional Services has the answers to previous questions at this time.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on July 4, the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) asked the following question: "What were the various reasons, other than the one mentioned by the Minister yesterday, for the inmates' disturbance at Burwash this week?"

Mr. Speaker, the other reasons given were complaints about food and complaints about the quality of the movie projector and speaker system in the dormitories and the corridors.

The hon. member also asked me question No. 740 on June 27, I believe it was, about some details regarding an epileptic in the Don jail, whom he named. In view of the fact that this man's name was used in the question, and particularly as the charges against him were subsequently withdrawn, I propose to deal with this matter in a letter to the hon. member.

On May 21, the hon, member for Wentworth (Mr. Deans) referred to a newspaper article regarding conditions at the Halton county jail. I said at that time that I would take the question as notice. I had ordered an investigation into the conditions of the county jail at that time. Since then, inspectors have investigated the staff situation, the housekeeping situation, security, supervision and the facilities generally. The following changes have been effected as a result of that inspection:

1. The governor is presently on sick leave pending retirement effective August 31, 1968, at his own request.

2. One of our inspectors is supervising the operation of the jail pending the appointment of a successor to the governor.

3. Administrative changes have been effected including the reorganization of shift duties.

4. Administrative and standing orders are being revised and rewritten.

5. A new chef has been engaged.

6. Competitions are being held for staff promotions to complete the staff complement.

7. A complete painting programme is being initiated.

8. New corridor tables are being installed.

9. New security screens are being fitted, in consequence of which the large exercise yard will become more secure.

10. Visiting arrangements are being reorganized. Halton county jail was built in 1878 and, as a structure, can never be operated as true correctional unit. The present physical facilities are in good measure responsible for the difficulties.

Staff responsible for running such institutions need to be very dedicated, very conscientious and have great ability if they are to maintain an institution of merely acceptable standards—if one may say they are acceptable.

By and large, the staff of the jails are doing a most praiseworthy job under very difficult conditions. The local changes we have been able to effect in the Halton county jail will I hope contribute to its proper and orderly operation in the future.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Grey-Bruce had a question for the Minister of Trade and Development.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, in this regard, and in view of the fact we are meeting in the mornings, could we arrange to have—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister is not now in his seat, he was a moment ago.

Mr. Sargent: Regarding questions, Mr. Speaker, and meeting in the mornings, we have to have our questions in before 9 o'clock. It is almost impossible to get them in by that time. When could we get our questions in—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): At 2 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: I might say to the member that there were certain questions for today which were placed in the hands of Mr. Speaker last evening.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister a question a few days ago about the jailing of a girl 16 years of age, for the theft of 89 cents, and he was going to investigate it. Can he answer in the House now?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will check this out, but I have not the answer at the moment.

Mr. Sargent: One more thing, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that yesterday morning's paper carried ads showing the products in brewery advertising—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

I do not believe the member has placed a question for this particular period on that point.

Mr. Sargent: It is a matter of public interest.

Mr. Speaker: Well, we have certain other questions and the member realizes the method by which questions may be placed before the orders of the day.

The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy and Resources Management.

What plans has the Minister to assist the 75 employees of the glue factory in Brantford who will be unemployed following the anti-pollution order of the Ontario water resources commission?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this question until I arrived in the House so I will take it as notice.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like a little guidance—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order, please!

I believe the leader of the Opposition has another question; of course the Minister is not here.

Mr. Nixon: He is not here and the question would be directed to him.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I need your guidance because my colleague, the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor), who is engaged elsewhere on the select committee dealing with the Smith report, has a question dated July 17, for the Minister of Education and University Affairs (Mr. Davis). It has been customary to hold the question until the Minister was present, but with the close of the session so near, is it possible that this question could be put to another Minister so that an answer could be obtained before the session is ended?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, in order to assist I will arrange to have any questions that are asked answered prior to the prorogation of the House.

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, then in that case—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They are all here, even though the Minister may not be in his seat. If the question is placed with the Speaker's office, then it is in the Minister's office whether he is here or not.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Wentworth has a question.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Did The Department of Labour refuse to accede to the request of local 203 united glassworkers of America when, on Wednesday, July 17, the glassworkers requested a Labour Department representative to inspect the heat conditions at the Dominion Glass Co. in Hamilton, which were so bad that some of the employees had fainted on the job? If they did, why?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I just received this question before I came into the House and I was in touch with our Hamilton office. A call was received from this company and the inspector is looking into it. But at the moment I have not been able to speak to him. I think perhaps if I could, Mr. Speaker, in view of the imminence of the close of the session, I will get the information and provide it to the hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table answers to questions Nos. 39, 59 and 61 which are on the order paper. (See appendix A, page 6065).

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 7th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. A. W. Downer in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS

(Concluded)

On vote 704:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, under this vote, do we deal with real estate branch and private bailiffs and so on?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Chairman, we had covered the first two items of vote 704 and were at the registration and examination branch, which is the—

Mr. Singer: Real estate and bailiffs and so on?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of things I want to bring to the attention of the committee.

The first matter deals with something coming under the control of the registrar of real estate and business brokers. I have a file of correspondence here, supplied to me by a lawyer who is very incensed about the lack of action that he obtained from that branch. The story very briefly is this.

In the course of his practice he was called upon to act in connection with a purchase of a small business and, as the Minister knows, there are certain proceedings that have to take place and there also are certain statutory provisions that are applicable in cases such as this. Particularly, The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, section 51, is the section that concerned the lawyer and this matter. He felt, and I am not going to go into specific detail, that there had been a breach of this section by the real estate broker involved, and that his client was being prejudiced and the protection intended to be extended by the Act was not being given, and that the real estate broker should be dealt with in the appropriate manner. He wrote a letter to the Toronto real estate board and set out all the details. It is quite a long letter, and I have it here, but I think that the copies for all the correspondence are all in the files of the department.

It is a complaint against Mann and Martel by Mrs. Norma Jordan. There is a letter on the stationery of the department to which I will refer in a moment. In any event, he sent a letter to the Toronto real estate board setting out his complaint in some substantial detail.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Before or after?

Mr. Singer: First! The Toronto real estate board sent him this reply in May of last year:

> This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 22 in regard to your complaint against these agents, regarding the property. A copy of your complaint was forwarded to the agents for their comments and that matter has been referred for further investigation to the ethics committee of the board. We will be in touch with you again when the investigation is complete.

Then twelve days later, another letter comes from the real estate board, and:

> This is to advise you that the ethics committee of the board has completed its investigation into your complaint. Although it is not a policy of the committee to disclose its findings, we do wish to thank you for bringing the matter to our attention. It is only through the interest of non-members that the board is able to help to maintain a high standard of membership.
> Yours very truly—

Now, I know that the Minister is going to say that the real estate board is a voluntary organization and perhaps this is an unusual way of dealing with a complaint, and if he had any control perhaps he might do it in a different way. Well, that is not enough. The Toronto real estate board, a voluntary organization set up within that profession to govern it, listens to complaints, and then says: "Thank you very much, nice of you to bring it to our attention, but we will not tell you what has happened."

All the correspondence is then sent to the Minister's department. I am not going to go through it letter by letter, but the letter dated August 15, 1967, signed by Douglas Crowe, complaints officer of The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, addressed to the same party say this:

> We acknowledge the receipt of your letter of August 10, concerning the (caption) subject. The undersigned has contacted the Toronto real estate board to learn of its findings and to determine what, if any, disciplinary action has been taken. This department will review this matter and take such action as is warranted under the investigation.

This is the paragraph, Mr. Chairman, that just makes me wonder.

> It is not our practice to make public the action we take in such reviews, but you may rest assurred that every effort will be made to ensure compliance within The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act by the registrant concerned. Thank you for your co-operation in this matter.

Well, this is silly, is it not? Here is a practising lawyer, who—with a good sense of responsibility and a desire to protect his client's interest—makes a complaint which he considers legitimate. As I say, I do not think we have to judge whether his complaint is legitimate or not. He sets it out in full detail, and he complains to the real estate board. Granted we have no control at present over the real estate board. They send him a letter saying, thanks, we will not tell you what we will do, but we will look into it.

He is not satisfied with that and comes to the responsible department of the government which has control by the licensing provisions, over the brokers, and they say exactly the same thing as the real estate board did. Thank you, we will not tell you what we did, except that we do think that the Act should be complied with. There is surely something wrong.

I am concerned that, when a seemingly legitimate complaint is brought to the attention of the registrar and the department, a foolish answer such as that comes forward—with all the power of government behind it. Either you say, "Yes, we think that you have a good complaint, and the agent that you complain about has behaved improperly" or "in our opinion he has behaved quite properly." If he has behaved improperly, you say, "we have done certain things, we have suspended him, and taken his license away," or something. Or "in our opinion, the complaint is frivolous and has not sufficient merit behind it for us to act." I think that he is entitled to that.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the proposition put forward by the hon. member. When a complaint is received, and especially when there is a participant involved, it is not a matter of gossip, or direct interest in the matter. In fact, I gather that the person on whose behalf the solicitor was acting, was a party. I agree that he was entitled to information after the department had made whatever investigation was required of the report as to the ultimate disposition. I agree with you, and I will undertake to look into the procedures.

Mr. Singer: If the Minister wants any more detail on this matter, I can show him the copies of the correspondence, but I think that they exist in his files now. The second point in regard to real estate brokers, Mr. Chairman, is that a practice has grown up recently in the unusual real estate market that disturbs me very much. That is the practice of a minority of real estate brokers who buy properties on speculation.

I have seen this happen in my own office on two or three occasions. Rightly or wrongly, the broker has been able to sneak out and meet the obligations at the last minute, but I know that this has happened on the few occasions that I have come into direct contact with it, and I can imagine this happening quite frequently because of the unusual conditions of our market. Properties by and large have been increasing in value.

What happens in a good many cases is that brokers who think they have spotted a good deal will make a deposit and put in offers that are accepted on pieces of property, in the hope that by the time the closing date comes along, they will have found a new purchaser, and made some money down the middle. Now, neither of the cases that I have personally come into contact with have become the subject of a formal complaint, and there are no details available in the Minister's office about it, but it is a practice which unfortunately is spreading, and I would think that some kind of strong statement should be forthcoming to the profession to indicate what the department thinks about it, if it has not already been done. I should think that the department takes a very dim view of this kind of practice.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am familiar with the area of operation to which the reference is made. I must now refer to the question of amendments to this legislation. The other day I discussed the entire position of the department with respect to used cars and real estate, mortgage brokers and so on. Various pieces of legislation are being amended in the light of certain other reports and I would hope that when the House sits in the fall, we will be in a position to introduce legislation.

Now the very point that is raised is one of the crucial points of the entire bill. This to me is the major issue that we have to face, and quite frankly I think that there are two sides of the coin. But the public is entitled to go to a real estate operator and say that they are looking for a type of property and to get the best advice that he can give. But when the broker discovers something that meets the needs—there are occasions—I think he would want me to put it this way—when, instead of conveying that information to his buyer, he has bought it himself. This just puts the whole situation into question. I appreciate this situation. We all want to be fair. There are other areas of our economic activity where people trade in matters on their own account. Is that desirable or not? I am not sure, but this point raised by the hon. member for Downsview leads to a fair amount of dissatisfaction.

Mr. Singer: There are two questions. I am very happy to hear the Minister say there is legislation he hopes to bring in, perhaps in the fall, in regard to this. But two questions obviously arise. The whole question of principal and agent relationship, the trust burdens the agent has. Should he be able to profit without full disclosure? If he comes to the client and the owner and says: "I am going to buy it on my own account—I am prepared to take the risk of making a profit after I have closed the deal with you." And the owner says: "Fine, I am happy." Then, of course, there is no complaint. But if he does this with the idea of making a profit, and perhaps reselling it without even putting up any cash before the deal is closed, then I think there is probably a breach of trust.

Then, of course, there is the other aspect. He does it on spec and he gets caught. Then he goes back to the owner and says: "I am sorry. It fell through. Sue me." Then the trusting owner who has put it in his hands, has no resort other than to go to court in an effort to get his deposit back. Perhaps he can go to your department and say it is time you disciplined this broker in a proper manner.

So as I said, I am pleased that the Minister has said that he has considered this matter, and anticipates there will be legislation on it in the fall.

Now the third point I wanted to deal with —and not at too great length—is the use of private bailiffs.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have been waiting for this—

Mr. Singer: Well, to my mind, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to gild the lily; I think the Minister knows exactly what I am going to say. There is no place in our economy any longer for private bailiffs. I would think that function, whenever it has to be performed, can and should be performed by a public official such as the sheriff. The sheriff has trained people who are responsible—he is a responsible public official—if something goes wrong. Do you still use the inspector of legal offices to check on the performance of the sheriff? All the accounts procedures within the province and so on?

It is an integral government procedure, and if there is something wrong the chances are that you will spot it. Certainly, once you have discovered something you can be expected to, and will, take action; but on private bailiffs the thing has just gone hog-wild.

They are acting at the behest of landlords. Many landlords are taking advantage of the unusual housing situation; they are using private bailiffs improperly to threaten individuals.

The public unfortunately believes that private bailiffs are clothed with some unusual rights; often, that they might be something like police officers, if not police officers which, in fact, they are not. Private bailiffs move in under private warrant, undergoing all of the risks of improper action and so on. But the public is not advised of this. A man knocks on the door of a tenant and says "I am the bailiff," and most often in the mind of a person who is being approached by the private bailiff, this person is equal to a policeman and they give much of the respect that policemen are entitled to to this person who is so often acting illegally.

I have two specific cases, and undoubtedly there are many many more, where these private bailiffs pay no attention to the fee schedule—they tack on another $10 on a $20 bill with the greatest of equanimity. People are concerned about it—they are frightened—they often pay it because they are being threatened with eviction, and how far do you pursue $10 after you have done it? After the deed has gone, how many days do you spend in court or seeking legal advice to pursue $10? It take a pretty determined person to do that. The incidence of seizing goods together with eviction from the premises, joining together the two remedies, is very, very high. As the Minister knows, this is quite illegal; the landlord has one of two remedies he can choose. He has to elect—either he is going to sieze property for arrears or he can evict. But in most cases where the bailiff can do it and does do it, he seizes and evicts at the same time. There are other cases where the bailiff comes in to sieze for arrears of rental of $100 and he takes everything. He takes property in the value of several thousand dollars to force the payment of $100.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going on very much longer; there are many, many instances. The situation is abhorrent to me. I would think it is abhorrent to the Minister, and I would hope that the whole system of private bailiffs be done away with. I just do not think that there is any way of curing this. It is a diseased system—the only cure is to do away with it and to start over. The obvious remedy is to place it in the hands of a public official such as the sheriffs of the various counties.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Can I just comment on that for a moment, Mr. Chairman? There are certain responsibilities and duties which, by law, can be enforced by this operation of what we are calling the area of private bailiffs. But against the examples and the outline that the hon. member has given the House, there can be no question that, whatever those duties and responsibilities they are dealing with, that is not the right way to do it.

At the best they are quasi-legal functionaries, and I think that entire operation should be under the complete judicial process which, it has been pointed out, would be in the area of sheriffs of the courts and the court system, where they fall within the regulatory supervision of the courts themselves.

If we did that we would accomplish what the hon. member has pointed out, that of certain undesirable practices and undesirable positions and the uncertainties that go with them. Our position is, we agree with the proposition being advanced and discussions will be completed, I hope, shortly, so that again we will be able to see what solution we can come up with. But the kind of solution I have in mind is what we have been talking about.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Wentworth.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Chairman, I would like to come back to the matter of licensing used car dealers for the moment, and to suggest to the Minister that perhaps a review ought to be undertaken. A review of all of the used car dealers in this province, because I have good reason to believe that many of them are acting improperly, if not fraudulently.

At the time of the sale of a used car, the dealer is required to fill in or to fill out or to at least indicate on this form that the car is in safe mechanical condition. I have a number of cases which I would like to outline to you where the dealer, though having signed these, obviously did not check the automobile in question. Even when he did in the one case the one part that he did actually check—he did not repair it, and yet he still filled in this certificate that says at the bottom: "I hereby certify that the above described vehicle is in a safe condition to be operated on a highway." Signed by whoever the dealer may be on a certain date. It states quite clearly the points that have to be checked.

The one case that I have is not quite as recent as the other, but I would like to explain what happened in this particular instance. A gentleman purchased an automobile from a used car lot, and he got this certificate that I have been discussing saying that the brakes were in good order.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman, I should point out I welcome these comments and I do not mean to interfere, but there are two aspects that arise with respect to the sale of, say, used cars. One has to do with the business aspect of the transaction, warranties and the nature of the business side of the deal which comes directly under our supervision. Another area, which is equally important, is safety, which comes under The Department of Transport. I point out that this certificate of mechanical fitness is regarded by The Department of Transport as a safety measure; in spite of that, I welcome the member's remarks about the subject.

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do believe they tie in. I agree this is a certificate of safety but the protection of the consumer is very much at stake. If this certificate is fraudulent, then of course the consumer suffers the consequences.

What we have here is the case of a gentleman who purchased an automobile and finds there is something wrong with it when he is testing it out. In this case, he brought to the dealer's attention the fact that the handbrake was not in order. The dealer said, in the usual fashion, "Fear not, we'll fix it," and he did, apparently; it appeared to be repaired.

The gentleman's wife took the car out, pulled on the handbrake and the handle came off in her hand because it was taped in placed. She could not, therefore, use the handbrake. She attempted to put on the automatic brake, it did not work, so she parked the automobile anyway. What happened, of course, was that the automobile rolled down the hill, damaged another car, created all kinds of difficulties for them. In the end their insurance company was forced to pay and their insurance rates went up, all because of the fact that when they brought this fault to the dealer's attention, he did not fix it. They tested it at the time and it appeared to be rigidly repaired, but it was not. And that is fraudulent dealing.

The other case that I have is a very recent case of a young man who purchased an automobile in Kitchener. I should, perhaps, have given it to the member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), perhaps he would have liked to handle it.

He purchased this car on May 5, and this is the actual certificate indicating that everything is in wonderful condition. He took the car out, he paid cash. He took it home on May 6, I believe—I cannot see the date on the thing, but it does not matter.

On May 22 he had to be towed; he had to have a complete new clutch put in; he had to have complete new brakes put on it; the exhaust system was defective; the lights were not working properly; and the windshield wiper was not operating properly, it was stuck on with some kind of adhesive compound and, of course, it just wore right off. They lifted it out and found the little ratchet part was not in operation.

Now, I cannot say that the dealer put the adhesive compound there, I have no idea, but I do suggest that it was not in fit mechanical condition to be sold. This young man is now faced with the prospect of going into court and attempting to claim and recover the damages he lost. He has to try and get all this sum of $150 that he has paid out of his own pocket, in a court of law. This dealer should be dealt with much more severely.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think with all the deficiencies the member has pointed out, adhesive on the windshield wiper, defective muffler, no brakes, and clutch not working very well. I am not siding with the dealer, but surely there is some duty on the purchaser not to accept a piece of paper in lieu of the adhesive tape on the windshield wiper.

Mr. Deans: I did not say adhesive tape, I said adhesive compound.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, compound. But I think the member would have to agree—

Mr. Deans: I agree I am going to suggest this to the Minister, that the reason he found all these things out was because—the clutch, for example—he took the automobile to his own garage. He lived in Hamilton so he had to transport it back. He took it there and this is where all these things were discovered.

Now, it says quite clearly that the brakes are in good condition, yet they were not, they had to be replaced.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He has two things available to him, he has a complaint and he has that certificate from the dealer. He has a good case in law and he should not have any trouble recovering from the dealer on the basis of the warranty. There is more than an implied warranty there.

Mr. Deans: I do not deny for a moment he has a good case in court and perhaps will win. What I am suggesting is I believe this practice goes on, not only in this particular area, but in many, many areas of the province with the majority of used car dealers. I do not believe that they ever check to make sure that things are actually in fit condition.

I think that a quick check through this province, regardless of whether you go to all or just a few of the dealers, will indicate that they are not acting fairly with the consumer. I think it could be stopped quite easily if it were made quite plain to them that they will suffer the consequence of having their licence revoked if it is discovered that one automobile goes off the premises without having been checked fully.

Mr. J. R. Beithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Chairman, I have several comments to raise with respect to The Used Car Dealers Act. First of all, I would refer to some of the earlier questions that I had asked of the Minister concerning the making of so-called regulation. The Minister was most helpful in his answers to me, but there are some areas that I think deserve a bit further development.

It is certainly agreed that any proper regulations as such can only be made by a duly constituted authority, and can only be overturned by a court finding them to be ultra vires. But there are certainly some regulations as well that have been made by an administrator of an Act when on occasion he may not have the actual authority to so make them.

Perhaps three brief examples will suffice. Under The Used Car Dealers Act, there is a certain so-called regulation requiring that no salesman may be employed on a part-time basis. Yet there appears to be no provision for this restriction in the actual regulations, nor is there a definition of the actual term of salesman and what constitutes the category of a salesman.

There is also a so-called regulation which requires that any dealer wishing to enter into the business of buying and selling used motor vehicles must have an office, a lot and a sign. Yet there is no real provision for this authority in the actual regulations that govern the operation of this area.

Thirdly, there was, at one time, a classification called broker registration and it appears that there are no more of these registrations being permitted.

I am wondering if the Minister can inform me as to the authority under which these so-called regulations are made, and whether he will move to insure that they are perhaps re-classified by term in the name of directions or instructions so that the apparent problem no longer exists?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The approach which the hon. member for Kitchener is taking is the opposite approach to that taken by the previous speaker, who has now left the House. I am sorry he is not here to hear this other half of the debate. Frankly, there are matters which are determined as a matter of policy.

The member says there is no authority for them. Well, I am not sure that is accurate either. But there is such a thing as policy. It is another matter whether the policy is right or wrong.

The development of this policy in this branch arose from the constant complaints of part-time salesmen who were part-time when they sold the car, but the other part of the part-time was when they were not available and could not be reached to make good the warranty or the representations which they had made at the time they made the sale.

These things led to many difficulties. I point out that there are some 17,000 used car dealers and salesmen in this province, so that in recognizing the validity of the complaints, and looking to the end where the public interest would be best served—after all that is the only reason why this legislation exists, and why it is in being, to protect the public interest—and it arose through the conduct of that group of irresponsible and unscrupulous people who make it difficult for unsuspecting members of the public.

Similarly, a need for a lot and a garage, and a sign, and so on. Let me rephrase what the hon. member said of the need for an established premise and services facilities sufficient to be what I think are needed if we were to define a dealer.

I think he has got to have facilities. Without them, he is a fly-by-night. There are many situations where friends of service station owners will make a side deal, and you will see a car sitting on an attractive location such as a corner service station lot with a "for sale" sign on it. I must admit that some of those situations are legitimate. Some of them, however—and I would think probably the bulk of them—are not.

It is a deal made to give the appearance of legitimacy, or a bona fide private sale, when in fact the man is operating as a bit of a dealer. In the case of a car purchased from this type of person, when the complaints or defects suddenly develop a week or two weeks later, and the owner goes back to the place where he bought it and there is no salesman, he asks the service station operator about the fellow who sold the car—"You remember, you were there, you filled it with gas"—then the fellow says, "I do not know anything about that. He only rented parking space, and I have not seen him for two weeks. I think he came from some place 200 miles away." And there you are.

This is the problem, and I think that the policy is justified. Once again we find ourselves in a difficult position. The majority of vendors are responsible, decent citizens, but there is a high percentage factor of people who by the very nature of the transaction and the opportunity to conceal the true condition of the vehicle, or at least to give it the appearance of substance and the nature of a vehicle that could run very nicely for a couple of weeks, even though the vendor may know that there is something wrong with it. Then it gives out and the purchaser is a pretty unhappy fellow.

Now the questions of the hon. member were directed to these matters and, he said did not have any authority. Well, they have developed out of the experience of the branch and the situations which have come to their knowledge are being acted upon as a matter of policy. I would not have any comment other than that the point that has been raised is a matter that is being taken into account in the revision of the legislation.

Mr. Breithaupt: I would assure the Minister that I would agree that policies have to be made in order that there is a general code for operation within this industry. The matter that I was most interested in was one perhaps of technicality. In other words, policies are quite distinctly different from regulations, and it might be better to use the word policies rather than a misleading terminology in the word regulations.

This, of course, has a very different connotation. I appreciate the Minister's answer to that point. The Minister had stated earlier in the session that, in order to extend the public protection to the purchase of both new as well as used motor vehicles, he was considering some changes in the name of of The Used Car Dealers Act to something along the lines of The Motor Vehicles Vendor and Salesman Act. I wonder if the Minister intends this legislation for the next term of the House?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We are still in the process, and I am afraid that the ultimate outcome of that will be available when we complete the revision of the legislation.

Mr. Breithaupt: There are certain protections which are given to the consumer under The Used Car Dealers Act. I wonder if the Minister has a comment when he compares these protections with those under section 18-1 of The Consumer Protection Act. In this area, as the hon. members are aware, there is the right to rescind certain executory contracts within two days. It appears to me that this section exists to be applied to the operations of door-to-door salesmen.

However, it may well be that the department is now applying this to any contract where a vendor solicits or negotiates or arranges for the signing of a buyer to an executory contract at a place other than the seller's permanent place of business. That is to say, if a purchaser signs a contract for the purchase of a motor vehicle at a place other than the dealer's permanent place of business and credit is involved—for example, at a finance company office or at the buyer's own home—then it may well be that the contract can be cancelled within two days, and the buyer may return the goods at the expense of the seller, whether it is in saleable condition or not.

I am wondering if the Minister would comment on the view as to whether the protection is sufficient under The Used Car Dealers Act, or whether it is the contention to continue the involvement under The Consumer Protection Act to used car sales.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That matter is apparently being discussed. The question is whether to leave the protective sections under both pieces of legislation or whether to involve this area of business under the one bill. Now, there are some very difficult practical problems that come out of that itinerant seller approach, particularly if there is another vehicle turned in. Some of the examples that have developed have given us a great deal of concern. But the problem invariably arises when a man makes a deal and turns his car in, and he is leaving that night for the prairies or the west coast.

Then, when the difficulties develop 1,500 miles from home, there is a very difficult set of circumstances to try and unravel, let alone the legalities and equities of the situation. It is not an easy matter. We are trying—with the information we have—to develop a set of procedures. Either by legislation or regulation we are trying to meet the situation.

Legislation is not good if it is so complicated that nobody knows what it is all about, much less that it exists. Some of these aspects of legislation that are clear and direct have a great appeal to me, particularly in an area such as you described. These are the problems that face all of us.

I might just add a word without prolonging this: In the type of situation I mentioned as being illustrative of many other similar situations, the dealer is in a very difficult position, too. I mean, let us not forget him. The responsible dealer who wants to honour his contract in a fair manner, can suddenly find himself having to honour something over which he has lost control and so on.

Mr. Breithaupt: Can the Minister tell me how many dealers are registered under The Used Car Dealers Act; and how many of these are classified as brokers?

When was the last broker registration granted? How many salesmen are registered under The Used Car Dealers Act? Are there any persons registered as salesmen to whom the selling of used vehicles could be considered a part-time job?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would like to speak to the question of the broker. There is no such thing as a broker. He is either a used car dealer, or he is nothing. The practice had developed some years ago where a person could get this type of registration, albeit he was only a broker in that sense. So the practice of licensing a so-called broker developed. That policy was changed some considerable time ago, but there was not any named or specific provision.

Now a broker falls exactly into that category of situation of brokering automobiles. Is he a wholesale broker or is he dealing in individual cases under the umbrella of something? Unfortunately, some time ago the branch came to the firm conclusion that this was an undesirable area to continue to recognize, and today a broker would not be licensed as such.

Again, if he wants to qualify, have premises, be in business with something at stake himself and not put himself in the position of a fly-by-night—then he can be a used-car dealer and could operate in the wholesale market if he chose.

Now, registration of dealers in Ontario—3,440 dealers, and 10,775 salesmen, at the end of 1967. The other part had to do with part-time people? Well, I felt that I dealt with this—the part-time policies of this category of difficulty.

Mr. Breithaupt: Thank you, sir, there are a few questions I would like to ask you with respect to surety bonds under The Used Car Dealers Act. How many of the $5,000 dealer bonds have been forfeited up to date? How many of the $1,000 salesman bonds have been forfeited to date? What is the number of claims and the dollar amount involved against each category? How many claims have actually been paid, and the dollar amount in each category?

Mr. Chairman: The Minister has suggested that the member for Kitchener might send the question over, because there is some detail—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Here is a memo which might help us in this matter. In the three and a half years that bonding has been required under the Act, the approximate number of bonds which have been issued: Dealers approximately 5,000 bonds at $5,000 for a total coverage; salesmen approximately 20,000 bonds at $1,000 each.

Now the number of dealers' bonds forfeited in the period of the three years 1965, 1966 and 1967: 17 claims paid, $16,623; claims pending, $7,100; claims pending administrative expenses with respect to claims pending, $137; amount returned to the bonding company, $18,376; and the balance held for claims for return to the bonding company, $42,677. That is the total situation with respect to dealers.

Now for the same three-year period with respect to salesmen: Bonds forfeited, 6; the amount forfeited, $6,000; claims paid, none; administrative expenses with respect to pending claims, $370-odd; the balance held for claims or returns to the bonding company, $5,600.

Mr. Breithaupt: Could I put one suggestion to the Minister in this area of surety bonds? Where a bond forfeiture demand is placed with an insurance company registered under The Guarantee Companies Securities Act, would it not be possible for the government to accept the pledge of the company to pay any claims or expenses arising under the proceedings, instead of requiring the depositing of the amounts of money? The funds would appear to lay dormant and be unproductive for the two-year period, to await substantiation of claims as required by the Act. If the insurance company was able to provide some form of guarantee, I would, perhaps, suggest to the Minister that this might be a way of avoiding the loss of interest or income from that money from the various persons who are placing it with the government.

Finally, in view of the fact that many of the used car dealers are handling a substantial amount of money, has the Minister given any consideration to changing the amounts of the sureties? It would seem that for a very large dealership, or where four or five cars might well be larger than the $5,000 bond required for the dealer, or the $1,000 required for the salesman, these amounts may no longer be sufficient. I am wondering if any thought has been given to reviewing that portion of the Act?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. I have asked for a review with respect to the sufficiency of the face value of the bond in relation to the risks that might be encountered.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on registration examination?

The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, there is a very serious and important matter which I wish to raise at this time.

The legislation of this particular department has left something to be desired as I pointed out on a previous vote. But the errors have been errors of omission on the securities and on insurance, but under this particular vote there is a very serious error of commission which is costing this province untold millions of dollars in investment every year.

I was first alerted to this situation by a letter received by one of the largest real estate brokers in the world. I think that perhaps I might set the stage for my own comments by reading this letter which explains what the problem is to begin with.

Now let me say I am not going to give this broker's name, because he is breaking the law in order to continue to bring funds into this province. Many other brokers are not and those who are following the law strictly and are following this rather unfortunate Act, The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, and keeping the money out of this province, are behaving presumably as the law wishes them to behave—but so much against the public interest.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think in all fairness to the matter, as the responsible Minister, this is one way of presenting this situation. It is quite all right with me, but I certainly think it is totally unfair to the department and our officials to read material without identifying it. Apparently here is a situation where a man is operating illegally and has to accept it, is that the position? I gather this licensed operator is resident in Ontario?

Mr. Shulman: The Minister is misanticipating. This is a registered broker in Ontario. This is from a registered broker in Ontario. If the Minister will just be patient for a few minutes, Mr. Chairman, all will become clear to him.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not accept that remark. Quite frankly, you said you were trying to lay the background; I agree with you—let us lay the background. I think it is as fair for me as it is for you.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, if the Minister will be patient, briefly, I think the problem will become obvious to everyone in this House.

First of all I would like to—

Mr. Chairman: Order, please! I think the Minister has suggested that perhaps the situation and the correspondence and the persons concerned should maybe be identified in order that the officials may deal with the matter. This would be preferable. However, if the member assures the House that he is going to lay the whole matter before us properly, proceed.

Mr. Shulman: I think, Mr. Chairman, you too will understand the situation completely if you will be patient for a few moments.

First I would like to read this letter which was received a few weeks ago and then I will make my comments on it:

Dear Doctor Shulman:

As you know we have our own offices in London and Madrid and representatives in Lisbon, Brussels, Säo Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, San Diego, Beirut, Lausanne, Geneva, La Granja, Frankfurt, Berlin, Hamburg, Paris and Boras.

The people working for us in these places are direct employees, independent brokers, truck companies, bankers, lawyers, industrialists, mutual fund agents, insurance agents, accountants, private rich people, one dentist, one doctor and one travel agent. Quite a variety. All are foreigners. All are getting paid, all trade and real estate in Ontario, even if most of them never come here.

Being foreigners and employed by us to trade in real estate contravenes paragraph 13, page 6 of the Act. We cannot register them here, and since they are not registered, they cannot trade in real estate —see paragraph 47, page 18. Nor can they be paid for their work—same paragraph.

On our sales record we are always omitting them. We do not show them, to avoid any explanations when from time to time our books are inspected by the registrar inspectors. Trade in real estate, according to the Act, section (k), means or includes conduction of negotiations directly or indirectly and further into the transaction. This is exactly what our people outside Canada are doing.

Yet a salesman, according to section 1, page 3, means a person engaged in trade in real estate. We are, because of this outdated Act, running our business on a hide-and-seek basis. Yet The Department of Development and Economics is spending millions a year to get foreign capital here.

We are also spending a lot of money in promoting our province. You saw our April brochure, it cost us $10,000, not to mention advertising in at least 10 countries every week. What do we get from our authorities for this?

We have to hide. Look at the vicious circle. If you trade in real estate you must be a registered salesman or a registered broker, otherwise, you cannot trade nor can you get paid. You can be a registered salesman if you are one year an Ontario resident; a broker if you are a salesman for at least a year registered as a salesman. The Act forbids us to pay commissions to anyone but a registered broker—paragraph 47, page 18.

What about a few million dollars we pay out to different banks for the clients they have supplied us within the last 10 years? You think that we would have any organization at all should we ask the various representatives of the banks to come and live here for a year so they could legally work for us, to leave their practice, their factory, businesses and so on? Baloney!

The Act should give us a free hand to engage anyone abroad, provided we are responsible for the deals made in Ontario. This way we could legally have our own office abroad as any shoemaker can today have theirs.

Sincerely.

Now, it is pretty obvious why I cannot give you the name of this particular broker, Mr. Chairman, but let me explain what the situation is, because as the Act—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I should say to the hon. member that this whole thing involves payment of commissions, as I understand it and, therefore, incorporating these people who are the recipients of payments as such and on the basis of at least, if not in fact, qualifying as being part of the operation in Ontario.

Now, payment of commission to people outside of our jurisdiction involves a practical approach to the problem and to the nature of this whole business area. It is probable that in our amendments in the fall that this payment of commissions to people outside the province with respect to this area of operation will be incorporated in the legislation.

Mr. Shulman: I am glad to hear that, Mr. Chairman, because before making the remarks which I am about to make, I contacted The department of the registrar of real estate and business brokers because, frankly, I found it difficult to believe that this was the situation. But this is the situation. Now what has happened is as follows.

There are some hundreds of millions of dollars of investment money in the Middle East and in Europe which is prepared to go anywhere in the world where it can have a reasonable investment. A lot of it should come to Ontario, but it does not except a small portion illegally, and the reason it does not, is very simple.

The reason it does not is that the brokers and the banks who are responsible for investing that money, most of them are in the large financial centres of Europe, primarily London and Paris—refuse to allow any of those funds into Ontario because of this foolish Act, and this foolish Act does not allow those brokers or those banks to receive the commission on any of these millions of dollars which they invest.

The banks and the brokers over there are not in business except to make money. They are prepared to take a reasonable return, but they cannot get any return legally by allowing any of this money to be invested in Ontario. This, of course, has been going on now for 20 years.

It was not in my field. It was just brought to my attention a few weeks ago and I am delighted to hear the Minister is going to do something about it, because this should be of great importance to the Minister of Trade and Development who is spending a tremendous amount of time and money trying to bring the funds into Ontario, but because of the law, as it now sits, none of this money will come here.

Even if you change your law—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not think it is. I think your informant is wrong in a sense as to the effect of the law. The contract of European managers of money can be made in Zurich, Dusseldorf or wherever it may be, and it could be a legitimate transaction in the place or domicile of the transaction.

I do not see the necessary implication of it being an offence. I have no knowledge. I am interested in the observations of the hon. member about moneys not coming for that reason. I would question that.

Mr. Shulman: Well, let me give you a few examples, Mr. Chairman, just to explain.

There is a great deal of real estate money available from Switzerland. If that real estate money were to come here to Ontario to buy or build apartments, the transaction—the purchase of the land, the purchase of the apartment house as it may be—would have to occur in Ontario. As such, there has to be an Ontario broker playing some part in the transaction.

He will receive the commission. But he may not legally give any portion of that commission to the broker on the other side who is representing the money in Switzerland, and for that reason, Swiss money has practically dried up coming into Ontario.

We had a little of it coming at first and then the brokers became very disillusioned because they just could not get their commissions.

There is one simple obvious type of transaction and type of investment which has dried up because of this Act, and I would like to suggest to the Minister that I have been in touch with—in addition to this department, in addition to this broker who is attempting to contravene the Act—I have been in touch with two financial houses in Zurich before coming to make this particular speech. They confirmed that they have found over past years that they just could not get a commission unless they were prepared to accept money under the table, and being large firms they were not prepared to do that. So they direct their funds to other jurisdictions.

I am glad you are all glad to hear that all these wonderful amendments are coming. Let us hope they come fast and that this particular aspect is cleaned up because this is a very serious matter, possibly as serious as the other matters which we have raised under this particular vote.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further under registration and examination?

The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: I have one other matter which is a minor matter that I would like to mention, Mr. Chairman.

The member for Kitchener mentioned something similar under the—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not think the hon. member would object to me making this comment. When he said earlier that he was going to deal with areas of commission I did not appreciate the full significance of the double-entendre at the time.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Minister, neither did I.

There is a minor matter here, but something similar was brought up by the member for Kitchener in relation to cars. This is in relation to real estate registration.

I received a complaint from a real estate broker in a small area of this province that he was a part-time real estate agent and that he had received a licence from the registrar under The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act allowing him to carry on as a real estate agent. But on his licence it says you may only practise in areas of less than 5,000 population—towns or villages of less than 5,000 population.

Well, he and I together went through this Act and went through the regulations, and there is nothing here that empowers a registrar to make such rules, unless we go to section 6(1) which reads as follows:

> The registrar may grant registration or renewal of registration to an applicant where the proposed registration is not against the public interest, and the registration may be subject to terms and conditions.

And that phrase "subject to terms and conditions" is the phrase that the registrar uses to make this rather odd condition in this and other real estates agents' licences.

I would submit to you, sir, that if there are to be such decisions, they should be in the regulations. I phoned the registrar about this and the lady I spoke to at that time said it is not in the regulations, it is office rules. Well now, I question whether or not the person who made this particular office rule had the right to make such an office rule.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is like operating room procedures.

Mr. Shulman: Perhaps more important and a sort of a stupid side effect of this particular rule. This particular agent who came to see me happened to live in an area of less than 5,000 population, and there was no problem, until unfortunately the little town next door grew a little bit and they amalgamated. Suddenly he was living in a town of 12,000 population. Out of business! Cannot practise any more.

Well, I think the Minister will agree with me that there is a certain injustice in this particular funny office rule, and I should like to ask him that at least until such a rule, if we are to have such a rule, is to be put in the regulations, that he instruct the registrar that this particular office rule, in any case, should be rescinded or at least not enforced because I think it is terribly unfair. Does the Minister agree?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Frankly, yes.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Minister make that change?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. How can a man be penalized by the progress and the advancement of time?

Mr. Shulman: Well, it happens. Will the Minister explain why we have this under-5,000 rule?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: For 30 years the rule has been in effect in this province, and I suppose for 26 or 27 of those 30 years it was reasonable in its application but with this great economic expansion, it falls into the category of one of those things that has to be brought up to date. I will try and improve on the whole situation.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on registration and examination?

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I have just two very brief points on the matter referred to earlier by the member for Downsview. The first question relates to the Toronto real estate board and similar boards throughout the province of Ontario. It would seem to me, in the experience I had in dealing with the registrar on a question which in any event worked out quite well and I need not refer to it, that it should become perfectly clear that if the government licenses real estate or business brokers, that that real estate or business broker should be entitled to membership automatically in an association such as the Toronto real estate board.

I think the Toronto real estate board performs a very useful function, which indeed the government itself may not be in a position to perform insofar as the quality and standard of the services which is provided to people who are using the service of real estate and business brokers. But it would seem to me that the starting point must be that if a person has been licensed under the laws of the province, that he should be entitled to membership in such an association. Then, so long as he abides by the rulings of that association, entitled to continue as a member of it, subject, of course, to whatever their local rules, internal rules, are as to his continued membership. But I do not think that the government should be in a position where it is licensing people as real estate salesmen or real estate brokers only to find that the standard imposed by the Toronto real estate board, which by and large has a monopoly, is higher.

I agree you can earn a living in Toronto outside the real estate board, but most people who want to engage in that business consider it to be a substantial advantage to them to be a member of the Toronto real estate board. Indeed, if they are not members in some areas it would reflect on them.

I would therefore like the Minister's assurance or undertaking that this particular matter would be dealt with the Toronto real estate board for the purpose of insuring that anyone whom the government licenses is entitled to become a member. Then, of course, his continued membership in that board would depend on his compliance with the internal rules of that association.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am unable to give that assurance. I would want to think this matter over very carefully; we would want to look at the association we are talking about and we would want to see exactly what functions they occupy and what responsibility, if any, public responsibility, has been imposed or delegated to them. If that certain board fell into that category, and after all you are talking about a local board—there is an Ontario real estate board which is the senior body, although the Toronto real estate board is quite important—there would be two possible categories, at least prima facie there would be.

One, it is a voluntary association and the other is one where they perform an official function. If they have an official function and exercise in effect government powers, then I think the proposition would be valid and every licensed operator should be entitled and should have membership in that board. On the other hand, if it is a voluntary situation, and it has relatively few or no offiicial responsibility then, in that latter category, I find it difficult to agree with the proposition.

I could not give a yes or no to the proposition that the hon. member put to me. It was a pretty blunt and direct one, would I give this undertaking to the House. In all honesty I have to say no, but I am still interested and I get the spirit of the proposition. I would like to look into it a little bit and see just where these groups stand viz-à-viz our department and the government and the people in total.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, what I wanted to ask the Minister was to undertake to enter into some kind of discussion about it. He makes the distinction between a voluntary association and one which has some quasi-official status. I make a different distinction. The distinction I make is one between a body which, while voluntary in concept and in appearance, in fact exercises a substantial degree of control over the operations within a particular geographic area, which in the case of the Toronto real estate board verges on a monopoly position. And where, if a person is licensed by the government of the province of Ontario, he should not be excluded from membership in that body which provides a status, provides services and facilities from which otherwise he would be excluded. It is that distinction which is of concern to me.

My one other point, Mr. Chairman, is this question of the bailiff to which the member for Downsview referred. I am glad the Minister is going to look into the matter. We had asked when the department was originally set up, in the debate on that, that The Bailiffs Act be left with the Attorney General on the ground that it was an area in which, strangely enough in our society, a person is allowed to engage in a form of self-help rather than going through legal procedures or to take the law into his own hands.

I just want to say that I totally agree with what the member for Downsview has to say about it. There is no place in our society for this kind of personal agent to be appointed who, under the guise of authority, goes in and carries out certain functions or the enforcement of certain legal rights which the person himself is not prepared to do. I am particularly concerned with the tenant-landlord relationshp, and the right of distress, where I think there is substantial abuse which it is difficult either to prove or persuade people that there is abuse of that kind. Indeed, if the Minister is giving consideration to it, if he is not persuaded that it should be the function of The Attorney General's Department as part of the law enforcement procedure and part of that control, then I think he should seriously consider changing the designation to landlord's agent or personal agent, and eliminating the word bailiff which carries the connotation of an official statute, also eliminating the red seal from the documents which they use.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, as a real estate broker, I happen to be a member of a real estate board. I cannot quite understand what the hon. member who just spoke is leading up to. A man can be quite intelligent and capable of writing his exam and getting his real estate licence to be a broker; that I can understand and I think that it is quite proper that he should have it. But I think that a board who police their own association, such as the real estate board on the Niagara peninsula that I belong to, should have a right to weed out the undesirable brokers. Because a man has lived up to the laws of the country to become a broker does not prove that he would be an asset to the association, any more than the law society would accept every lawyer that comes along. I would not think that they have to. Maybe if he becomes undesirable, they give him a hearing and put him out. I personally do not think that any broker should come into a board unless he meets the rules and requirements of that particular board, or until the directors of that particular board feel that he comes up to the standards, or until his code of ethics are such that they will accept him.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There could be higher standards.

Mr. Bukator: Oh yes, as a matter of fact, when I first got my licence, they would not accept me. I do not think that I was too concerned about it. Time went on, I made my sales, and went about my business. Finally I put in my application, and after review they decided that I would be a good member for that particular board. If I would not have come up to their standards, they would not have had me. I think that you should take a good look at that before you draft legislation that anyone who gets to be a broker will automatically belong to the board.

Mr. Chairman: Item agreed to.

On the cemeteries branch.

Mr. E. R. Good (Waterloo North): Mr. Chairman, on this item, I would first like to comment on the transfer of the cemeteries branch from The Department of Health to The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. I would ask the Minister to explain for my own interest and information why The Cemeteries Act has not been amended to say that the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs rather than the Minister means the Minister of Health; and the department means The Department of Health; and all the plans and regulations should be sent to that department?

According to his lead-off speech, he said that the transfer was approved by order in council. I would be interested to know whether amendments to The Cemeteries Act are required to complete this transfer, and whether they would be forthcoming?

I would certainly like to compliment the government and say that this is a good move, to move the trust funds of the cemetery department—the pre-need insurance fund and the perpetual care fund—from The Department of Health to The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. But I can see no place at all in this department for the remainder of the operation and the carrying out of The Cemeteries Act with these two trust funds under the department of consumer protection.

An hon. member: He is very sharp!

Mr. Good: With the transferring of these two trust funds under consumer affairs, I would also like to suggest that the trust funds under The Prepaid Funeral Service Act should also be transferred from The Attorney General's Department to this department, under the consumer protection. I think that this would be a move in the right direction, and would bring the three trust funds that are involved with prepaid funeral services and prepaid cemetery services and the perpetual care funds of the cemeteries under The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Getting back to the other point, I cannot comprehend how the remainder of the cemetery operation belongs in this branch. I would suggest respectfully that The Department of Municipal Affairs is the department concerned with the operation of cemeteries, as they deal with such matters as zoning and drainage, and lot lines—side yards, boundaries and proximity of graves to residential areas. Coupled with this is the fact that a great many of our cemeteries are operated by municipalities, and you have a direct connection with the municipality.

So, I would also request that you give some consideration to dividing this operation so as to keep the two trust funds under this department, and The Cemeteries Act itself should be administered by The Department of Municipal Affairs.

The three functions, of course, of the overseeing of the Act deal mainly with the approval of plans and regulations and the fee and scale of tariffs, and the studying and setting up of a perpetual care fund. I would be interested to have the Minister explain later at what intervals and by whom the perpetual care funds are inspected, and what procedures are used to insure that they are being held properly and invested in the proper places.

Having served for a number of years on a cemetery board, I must say that I was greatly impressed by the thoroughness of this department in maintaining regulations, and the difficulty there was involved in getting plans approved. I said difficulty, but I meant time involved, which led one to believe that they were doing a thorough operation before they would allow additions to existing cemeteries, or the establishment of new ones, or the change of tariffs. This I find now, though, is prevalent only in larger cities and in the areas of southern Ontario.

It was drawn to my attention some time ago that in other parts of Ontario, a great deal still has to be done to bring our cemeteries up to the standard which is laid down in this Act. In the short time that this cemetery section has been under this new department, they have been busy investigating the complaints of people on Manitoulin Island, that only three cemeteries in that area out of 18 have any official plans. The cemetery perpetual care funds are in operation in only two of the cemeteries, and in general I think that this condition exists in many of the smaller communities across the province.

Consequently, I would hope that this department will begin to expand their operation to include the operations of cemeteries in smaller communities. People should not have to take it upon themselves to complain to this department to bring representatives into this area to investigate the situation where there are no perpetual funds in operation in a cemetery.

People do not know, when they pay for a lot, what is happening to the money. In many instances it perhaps goes into the general operation of the cemetery, and although this section of perpetual care and necessity has been in the Act for a good many years, there are still a good number of cemeteries which do not have it.

Now, I do not think that it should be the intention to create an immediate hardship for many of the smaller cemeteries to try to bring them in line with the Act, but I believe that a system can be worked out, and I would like to just expand this a little further where if this section of the operation is put under The Department of Municipal Affairs.

There are organized municipalities, townships and counties, who along with the other section of the Act, section 50, are responsible for the maintaining of abandoned cemeteries. They could start a systematic survey of all cemeteries in their areas, and report to this department, probably at very little, if any, cost to the department, what the condition of these smaller cemeteries are in the rural areas. Many of them, of course, have been abandoned and are not being used. The Act says that the municipality in which these cemeteries exist can be held responsible for the maintenance of them.

I would also like to ask and have an answer—does this word maintenance include restoration? My experience has been that most municipalities expect some church group or some other outside group to restore the cemetery to a desirable condition and then the municipality will maintain it. I feel that if a system were launched whereby the actual Cemeteries Act was put under the jurisdiction of The Department of Municipal Affairs, through the various reeves of townships in remote areas, and county councillors, a complete survey could be made.

These people, by gentle persuasion, could be shown how their operation could be improved, and eventually in a much shorter period of time they could be brought under the direct operation of The Cemeteries Act. Everyone in those areas, I am sure, would be pleased to see this happen.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The hon. member has raised the question as to why this legislation is in our department. Now, frequently, there are many subject areas in pieces of legislation which involve more than one department of government. And one would try, from government's point of view, to put the legislation in the most appropriate department even though there are other departments which would have an interest, I think that, in the current situation it was determined that on balance, having in mind the business factors involved, with respect to the management and the administration of the cemetery which has been indicated, having to do with what they are doing with maintenance and things of that sort. But, particularly having in mind the aspect of perpetual care funds and so on. But, on balance, it was felt that this was in the area of consumer or financial affairs.

Now, as to having some of these things in the area of The Department of Municipal Affairs, we are able to service this, as I see it, and we have only had this matter since the first of January of this year. I would like the operation to proceed for at least a year and maybe we will be able to come to some conclusions before that time when I can see what is needed. But, already, we have had numerous representations from small cemetery operators, who find it difficult and confusing when they thought that they had to deal with two departments. This view was abroad, that they might have to deal with two departments. I only make that observation in reference to the comments of the hon. member.

Now, as far as educating, is this not what we are really talking about—educating and providing some leadership for the operators of smaller cemeteries or cemeteries in the outlying areas with respect to handling their operations efficiently and effectively? There is a great need for that—of course there is. But you do not go at it with a mallet or a hammer. Because the whole subject area does not lend itself to that. It requires time, it requires education.

I gather from the comments of the member that I think we are on all fours and in agreement on this, the approach to this matter. I think I could simply sum this up by saying that when we come back together the next time, I hope to be able to make a report in this area that would be helpful and reassuring to the House.

Mr. Good: I would just like to comment a little further. This section of the Act regarding the mandatory perpetual care funds on the sale of a lot, I think it is 35 per cent minimum—it used to be anyway—has been in effect for twenty years. On Manitoulin Island, their first inspection was made some 12 to 14 years ago and things are moving very slowly.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They have been in effect since 1955.

Mr. Good: Since 1955; all right, I am sorry, 18 years. I stand corrected.

An hon. member: It is 13 years.

Mr. Good: I am sorry, 13 years.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The year after it came into effect there was an inspection.

Mr. Good: Now, my point is this. The concern is here. Your cemetery department does not have the staff to go out into all the areas of the province to bring in information on these cemeteries so they are just neglected. Nothing is being done about them. My thought is simply this: There are people in these areas, municipal people, county and township people, who could give you this information probably in a day or two. They could get this information to you as to what cemeteries are in these areas, and in what stage of development they are, regarding your Cemeteries Act. And I do not think you have to—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If I might anticipate the hon. member. Having in mind the need which he points out, and the facility with which information could be secured, and the necessary desirable steps taken, we received approval of an increase of six in the complement, to effect exactly what we are both talking about.

Mr. Good: Thank you. Well, my only other point is this, Mr. Chairman. I feel that a lot of this could be done on a local level rather than sending people out from Toronto. I think any reeve in a township in a day could tell you what cemeteries are in his township, who the chairman of the board is, if there is a board, or what cemeteries have been abandoned. I do not think you have to build up a big staff in Toronto to look after these small areas in that regard. That is my other point.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, if The Cemeteries Act is now under this Minister, would the Minister inform me, does he now control the regulations under cremations and relating to cremations?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The answer is "yes", I am informed.

Mr. Shulman: Then, in that case, I would like to raise a matter which I have raised with the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) quite unsuccessfully for some two years, and that has to do with waste of money under cremations.

It can be cleared up with a very simple amendment if the Minister would consider such an amendment. The waste of money is that involved in duplicate investigations. As I mentioned earlier to the Attorney General, every death that requires a cremation has to have a certificate filled out, signed by a coroner. Some 25 per cent of these deaths have already been investigated by a coroner in the routine coroner investigation. The second investigation is unnecessary and completely wasteful. I would like to suggest to the Minister that he bring in an amendment to this Act which states very simply that the requirements for a coroner to sign a cremation form is not necessary if the coroner has already investigated and signed the regular coroner's form. Would the Minister be agreeable to this?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will have a look at that; I will be glad to.

Vote 704 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes the estimates of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I have a statement to make which I would like to read into the record having to do with government insurance. I undertook to make this statement at this time several weeks ago.

The statement is as follows:

The Prime Minister, in his statement to this House on January 11, 1963, provided considerable detail regarding the mechanics of police and government insurance. Generally the same procedure is followed today.

The responsibility for government insurance rests with the committee of the Cabinet. They are assisted by a secretary who maintains the necessary records and receives requests for insurance from the various departments and agencies. In addition the secretary acts as liaison officer with the insurance advisory committee.

The role of the advisory committee has not changed over the years. This committee, composed of knowledgeable people from industry, at the request of the Cabinet committee, investigates and advises on the type, scope and cost of the insurance request. Some policies of insurance have been with named companies for many years. However, when placing a new insurance, all interested companies are asked to quote on the coverage offered.

It is not possible to make a short, all-inclusive statement of government policy regarding what is insured by the industry and where we are, in effect, self-insured, since our policy is necessarily different for each type of insurance required. For example, an entirely different rule must apply when dealing with fire insurance as compared with liability insurance.

With regard to fire insurance the government is self-insured, with the exception of the main Parliament buildings and Osgoode hall. The main Parliament building and its contents are covered in the amount of $12 million, with 36 insurance companies, by subscription. Osgoode hall is covered in the amount of $2,330,000 with seven insurance companies. The premium paid for fire insurance on these buildings is $55,800 for a three-year period.

Automobile legal liability insurance is carried on all government owned vehicles, the insurance property damage plus bodily injury in the amount of $500,000 inclusive for any one accident. Insurance is not carried covering damage to government-owned vehicles. With the exception of the Ontario Provincial Police vehicles, this insurance is administered for all departments and agencies by The Department of Highways.

In 1967, a total of 7,509 vehicles were covered at a premium cost of $167,428. The premium is, of course, based on claims experience. In the past five years, premiums were paid in the amount of $867,800, and the insurance company paid claims in the amount of $621,400 The five-year claims experience averages 71.6 per cent. Now this insurance has been carried for the past 32 years with the Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company, and the commission paid has recently been reduced, I understand, from 10 to 5 per cent.

I urge everyone to hear me at this point. You will recall that I said the five-year claims experience on government vehicles averages 71.6 per cent. So I continue: The insurance carried on the Ontario Provincial Police vehicles is similar to the policy carried on all other government vehicles. The claims experience is also 71.6 per cent and this, of course, seems such an unusual coincidence that the matter has been checked back arithmetically and every other way, and they—both groupings—come to the same insurance percentage factor of 71.6.

In addition to the insurance carried on government-owned vehicles, the province carries PL and PD insurance on employee-owned vehicles operated by the employee on government business. This is in addition to the 50,000 PL and PD insurance required to be carried by the employee prior to being paid mileage rates for the use of their vehicles.

The policy is carried by the province to cover claims in excess of that carried or covered by the employee. This policy is also with the Dominion of Canada General Insurance Company, in the amount of $500,000 inclusive, and the premium in 1967 was $12,624.

Mr. Singer: I bet you have not got 71 per cent on that one.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have not. I do not have that factor. I can get it.

Mr. Singer: That is down to about 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Could be, but it could also be our premiums are still in the right proportion.

The province carries a general liability policy which provides blanket coverage for legal liability as imposed by law arising out of injury to the persons and damage to property in connection with all buildings and premises adjacent thereto. Vested in Her Majesty the Queen in the right of the province of Ontario, by the Ministers of the departments of the government of Ontario, and recreation areas under the jurisdiction of The Department of Lands and Forests with limits of $500,000 inclusive.

At the present time there are a number of small liability policies covering specialized items—for example, radio towers, swimming pools, water craft, and so on. These policies are now being moved into the main general liability policy mentioned above.

There are however, some specialized policies that are of interest. For example: highways and road liability covering liability arising out of the maintenance, construction, repair and resurfacing of the King's highways, and secondary roads assumed by The Department of Highways. This policy was originated in 1937, and has remained with the Pearl Insurance Company for an amount of $500,000 cover, with the premium in 1967 being some $97,932.

Now highways and the GO-transit train involves a policy which is carried by two companies in the amount of $5 million. The premium in 1967 was $85,795. There is a $500,000 deductible clause in this policy.

It is not the intention to take the time in this House providing details of all insurance carried by the province. However, the detail I have provided covers some of the larger policies that I consider necessary to give a picture of the government policy in this regard.

Now in addition to the coverage already mentioned, the province is insured for buildings under construction with respect to The Department of Public Works. Fidelity bonds with respect to government employees. Burglary and robbery coverage with respect to Treasury Department and Department of Transport officials. Ferries and their operation and The Department of Highways.

Aviation coverage with respect to The Department of Lands and Forests and a few miscellaneous items including registered mail, boilers and plate glass.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this statement that the Minister has read that gives me any reason to believe that the government could not do the job more efficiently as a self insurer. I suppose the Minister will say that he was not presenting arguments in his statement—he was merely giving us the facts. But a couple of times during the course of the statement there were expressions that this has gone on for 30 years, 35 years, 37 years and so on.

It seems to me that a corporation that operates a business in the amount of—well there are no totals on this resolution, $3.5 billion a year, certainly—has sufficient assets available to it to be its own insurer, sir. The totals of premiums paid did not emerge from the Minister's statement. I do not know whether he has them or not, but it would seem to me to run to the extent of several million dollars a year in any event when you add up.

Well, certainly more than two. How many? You have the statement there. It is difficult to follow a multi-page statement and come up with an instant figure.

The Minister's guess is $1,250,000. In any event we are spending $1,250,000 a year for insurance premiums. The highest ratio of claims against premiums—or payments by the insurer against the premiums collected—is 71 per cent. Well, is there any reason why the province of Ontario should not save that 30 per cent? It seems to me you have had enough experience. Both the figures in the two highest-paying departments are five-year figures. You have had enough experience there to recognize the insurers have a nice profit on the strength of the government of the province of Ontario's business. And therefore, there is no reason at all why an intelligent plan of establishing an Ontario government insurance fund should not be adopted. It would be my thought that you should put to work immediately a group of your best financial advisors and the people most knowledgeable about insurance who will lay out a programme for you as to how, over a period of three, four, five or six years, you can establish an Ontario government insurance fund.

I would not suggest that you drop all the insurance tomorrow. But I would think within the budgeterial limitations a substantial sum—say $100,000, $200,000 or $500,000 a year—could be set aside for an insurance fund. As that fund builds up, you reduce the amount of privately-placed insurance. There is no reason at all, in my opinion, why we cannot be self insurers—as the federal government is, as the CNR and as are many of the big corporations.

This is an old-fashioned programme. Certain companies have benefitted from it for a long period of years. I am not suggesting that anyone is putting anything over. It is just a long time system that I think has outlived its usefulness in the present context. I would urge upon the government that the province of Ontario become its own insurers and it can effect a substantial saving for the taxpayers and the people of Ontario.

Mr. Shulman: From the figures that have been presented by the hon. Minister, it would appear that the province would have saved some $75,000-odd every year for the past five years at least, if they had not been carrying any insurance—if they had been carrying their own insurance. Sometimes when I stand here, Mr. Chairman, I think I am in Lewis Carroll's wonderland and looking backwards through the keyhole, because we seem to have forgotten the purpose of insurance.

As I understand insurance, it is to spread the risk so that an individual does not have a great financial disaster. And what in the world this government or any other government is doing carrying insurance is beyond me.

I would like to go a lot further than the member for Downsview because as of today we should drop all our insurance because certainly we already have spread the risk among all the people of Ontario. To ask an insurance company, for the sake of giving them $750,000 every year—and for no other purpose as far as I can see—to carry this risk instead of the people of Ontario, is just sheer foolishness. There is no need for any government to carry insurance.

We, as the people of Ontario, would save all this money. It has been proven by the figures just presented by the Minister, we have nothing to gain by continuing it whatsoever. The insurance companies set their rates at a sufficient level so that they can cover the risk, plus make a reasonable profit. Why in the world we are prepared to give them this reasonable profit is beyond me. We do not need them. They are serving no purpose whatsoever. Let me suggest to the Minister that he give a very good second thought to the whole insurance policy because it is so wrong and it is foolishly wrong. There is no sense to it whatsoever.

We go to other jurisdictions. I would be glad to give him examples who would laugh if you said you carried insurance, because they do not carry their insurance because they do not need insurance and we do not need insurance.

Now there are specific cases here, under vote 906—the—

Mr. J. H. White (London South): I bet their costs are higher—

Mr. Shulman: As usual, Mr. Chairman, the member for London South is wrong in his interjections. I would hope that his facts would be correct occasionally. This is incorrect.

Mr. White: It would be a terrific temptation, for a government to give preferential treatment to some.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, for the member to suggests that the costs will be higher when we eliminate a $750,000 insurance company profit every year is just more Lewis Carroll wonderland. It just does not make sense. We can go back to vote 906 where this matter first came up, and which was preferred to be discussed under this vote, where $85,000 was being spent on liability insurance. This is one of the more obvious cases, but as we go down case after case the insurance companies are not foolish. They set their rate on a realistic business and they are selling us a commodity which we do not need. Perhaps this should have been discussed under consumer protection, because the consumers of Ontario, under this particular expenditure, are being taken and once again, in brief—

Mr. White: Why do enormous corporations not self-insure?

Mr. Shulman: Once again in brief, please reconsider. It was a silly mistake made 30 years ago and has been carried on because it was there. It is time we took a second look at it and dropped it in total.

Mr. White: Why do enormous private corporations not self-insure?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would just like to speak to the observations which have been made.

Specifically, I would like to refer to the GO transit and the insurance of railways. Now that is, having in mind the nature of the risk and the assets which are insured, high capital assets—if there was a disaster; a train unit runs into many millions of dollars and the insurance is carried on that basis with respect to railways, I think it is. I just make that comment that to me it is good business.

Some reference has been made to the question of $750,000. I cannot accept that figure. It is an arbitrary figure picked out of the air. My own experience in this matter since I have been concerned with it, is for the past eight or nine months, as the renewals come up we have a close look at them and raise the claims record for a five-year period before. We are coming almost to the end of our study in this matter. I would have to say this, on the aspect of the government, in, say, automobile insurance.

Now we are not talking about the theory of automobile insurance that we have talked about on other occasions. This is another subject matter and we are talking now as the insured, the owners. It is my view that in that type of claim that comes up if it is healthy and a desirable thing to have an outside body or an independent intermediary to be in a position to settle these claims.

The cost, and when we talk about whatever profit figure is or whatever the difference is between the 100 per cent of the premium and the lost ratio would be—I do not want to get into an argument about this—but it would at least be partly, if not all, picked up. It would be to a greater or lesser degree picked up by our own costs of administration. But the greater advantage, and I think this is important, is in having an intermediary supply the service facility of processing and settling these claims.

Mr. Singer: You could still hire independent adjusters.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, we could. What are we doing now, and I hope that in a few months when this study is complete that I am going to be able to say to you that is all we are buying in the market, the service of an independent—

Mr. Singer: That is what we are asking you to do.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: And that is what I am hoping—

Mr. Singer: That is what I asked you to do many years ago.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You did not talk to me. You were not here 10 years ago.

Mr. Singer: If not you, your predecessor.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: However, you are getting off the thing—now that I have come up with a good answer you are jumping. I regard this insurance as being in a most desirable position when we get the premium rates down so that we are buying the service facility, which would be the same thing—maybe in other words—that you are talking about.

Mr. Shulman: I am hearing good answers from the Minister; I am delighted, on this particular vote. But on three minor points he mentioned—the $750,000 which I plucked out of the air—as he said—and perhaps I should explain to him it is not quite plucked out of the air. What was the total figure spent in insurance by this province last year? Approximately.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have not got that figure.

Mr. Shulman: Was it approximately $2 million?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No. I said I thought it was about $1,250,000.

Mr. Shulman: The figures, as I have added them up out of the estimates, came to just under $2 million. If I am wrong, I stand to be corrected but the figure of $750,000 came from the 71.6 per cent lost ratio; the 29 per cent amounts to $740,000 per year so the figure was not quite plucked out of the air—it was plucked out of the figures. I just wanted to mention that to the Minister.

Secondly, in relation to GO transit, we have $500,000 deductible. In other words, if there is an accident the province pays the first $500,000 of damages. Now whether or not this is good business is a matter for some—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is catastrophe insurance. We are talking in figures of the whole train and a train load of cargo or railway going over an embankment where there would be $50 million of claims or such.

Mr. Shulman: We are paying $85,000 a year for that—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is right.

Mr. Shulman: And it will not be too many years before you will have a fund that will be able to carry any catastrophe that comes along, yet instead of giving it to an insurance company you put it in a bank.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The figure I have here is $1,153,187.

Mr. Shulman: Does that cover all insurance paid out by all government departments?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Shulman: Well, that is not so.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It does not include certain special agencies which do not come within my ambit but I will give you the list it does include. Agriculture and Food $1,000 —we will leave out the odd figures—Attorney General's Department, $152,700; Education, $280; Trade and Development, $76,000; Health, $3,000; Highways, $453,000; Labour, $406; Lands and Forests, $26,600; Mines, $6,900; Public Works, including the building projects, $137,600; Correctional Services, $45; Tourism and Information, $3,900; Transport, $21,800; Treasury, $70,700; and water resources commission, $198,000; for a total of $1,153,187.38.

Mr. Shulman: On these particular figures that are presented here, there is a difference of some $330,000 between what the province received in payments under this insurance and what they paid out. So there is $330,000 each year that would be in the coffers, in addition to which the Minister has himself said there are certain items of insurance which do not come under his department. So we are not going to be too far out in my $750,000 figure. We have $330,000 here to start with, and this is money that could sit in the Treasury.

The other matter which the Minister mentioned was the cost of administration. Again I refer him to the handbook put out by his own department showing the profits made by the insurance companies over and above the cost of payments to the insurers, administration, commissions. These insurance companies are making a very substantial profit. Now, admittedly—may I just finish, please?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a comment in these circumstances that the hon. member would want and that is—and I do not want to go into this other than to say this one sentence—that the premiums and the cost of insurance which we buy is on such a favourable basis that I am almost able to say we are buying a service.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, unfortunately the statement made by the Minister and the profit pictures shown by the insurance companies do not quite jibe.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: My statement, as I just said, showed very favourable; a favourable rate.

Mr. Shulman: Agreed! The Minister is buying insurance, probably at a more favourable rate than he or I could buy it as an individual, but the insurance companies are still making a substantial profit as shown by the figures presented by the Minister. I would like to suggest to the Minister that ultimately he should do as he just said a few minutes ago and aim at buying a service. And I would suggest he can buy the service just as cheaply as the insurance company can buy that service, that is, the service of adjustors and investigators.

I see no reason why government should be any more wasteful than insurance companies. At the end of that time, the extra moneys, the profits, will be in the Treasury. I think if the Minister accepts that basic premise; we have no disagreement on this point.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, Mr. Chairman, that concludes the estimates of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. Thank you.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): I am not going to make any preliminary statement.

On vote 1501.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the estimates of The Department of the Prime Minister carry?

The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make some very brief comments about one or two items that I think would be apropos under this particular vote. The Prime Minister has the responsibility for ordering the business of the House, and this may be the last opportunity I will have to make some remarks about that before the end of the session.

I well recall bringing to the attention of the House on a motion for the appointment of committees many months ago the need for some reform in our procedures and rules. I think the government's response was that it was the same old speech. Perhaps it was, and yet I believe this session, more than any other, has proved that we do require the reform of our procedures and our rules to some significant extent.

Without commenting in detail on the session, we did get off to a late start for reasons that are quite understandable. The government's legislation was slow in coming before us, and the Prime Minister has the full responsibility for that, of course, since eventually I would presume he would have to put down some barrier beyond which new legislation would not be available.

I assume he did this since we have not received the legislation on new expropriation procedures and one or two other smaller items that had been predicted.

There has been lengthy debate on many subjects, and in this regard, Mr. Chairman, I feel that we on all sides owe you a great deal of gratitude for the way in which you have conducted our affairs. This, in fact, may be out of order, but if you will permit me to say before you reach for your gavel, I have been very sympathetic to the fact that you have had to pay close attention to all of the points that were raised, whereas not all of us as honourable members have had to follow the debate that closely. You have never been able to predict when some minor point might blossom out into some major point of order, and I think that your knowledge of the rules, which is extensive certainly by now, and your good humour and fairness have served us all very well on all sides of the House.

I have said many times that our procedures here which are ordered, of course, by the Prime Minister, are not as efficient as they should be. I have been thinking about that very carefully over some of the longer sessions, and I have come to the conclusion that while we can improve our efficiency, this must, of course, not be our first goal.

Our goal, of course, is to provide a forum here so that members on all sides can put before the House their views, take part in as full a measure as is possible in the proper discussion of the affairs of the province and particularly the programmes put before us by the administration.

Now, there has been some indication that the Clerk of the House in his continuing responsibilities is undertaking a survey and a review of our rules, bringing them up to date with more recent precedents, many of which are very important, particularly the ones having to do with the rules of sub judice and so on. But I feel quite strongly that these rules and a reformation of them by the Clerk must in no way be accepted by the House unless we have some sort of a committee that has an opportunity to sit down with our experts and see that they apply as we would all wish; that they apply to the business that we must undertake once again within a very few months.

I think the decision that must be accepted on all sides is that we are now ripe for such a review; that we have the expert advice available for us. I have not consulted with the Clerk in the extent to which his review of Mr. A. C. Lewis' book of order has proceeded, but surely it is within range of being completed.

I would hope that a committee of the House, a committee of some breadth, would be called upon by the government, perhaps under the direction of Mr. Speaker himself, to undertake such a review.

The Prime Minister indicated in this House some months ago—I do not remember the specific occasion—that surely he and the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party were the ones who would have the prime responsibility for any review of the rules. As a matter of fact, during this session, there have been two or three occasions, quite useful occasions in my view, where we have been able to make some changes to meet the requirements as they changed.

But I believe that for the long haul this is inadequate; that we must have some kind of a committee that will look to the procedures in the House and bring forward recommendations that we can enact as the rules of the House, so that our deliberations will be more effectively governed in the sessions that lie ahead.

As the Prime Minister has indicated in his comments to the House, he expects on a unilateral basis to make some changes that will make the business more efficient. We are not going to comment on those, of course, until we see what his proposals are. I might make a prediction about them now, but I suppose we might as well wait until that great event comes forward.

But surely, if we are going to move forward with what all of us hope will be an improvement in our system here, it should be by way of some kind of a committee looking into our rules and procedures, that can improve some of these specific things that have given us trouble.

I think personally of the rules governing matters of urgent public importance, which I feel are completely inadequate. The question period has changed during this session considerably. The Prime Minister has indicated that he does not feel that it is too time consuming, and I would agree with him, and yet there is maybe some better approach involving matters without notice before the administration that would improve the situation considerably.

The thing that most of us would agree on, surely, is that our consideration of the estimates can be improved. My views on this are well known. I believe that they should be considered in committee of the House, by which the advisors to the Ministers on matters which do not pertain to policy can express their views without having to speak through the Minister on each occasion.

There are difficulties associated with this, but I would hope that such a committee would not be set up without careful planning, so that it would work in the interest of the House in general, so that information can be made public, and that in the fulfillment of such a committee it would carry out our work more expeditiously. We on this side would support it.

I would not like to take part in a committee which is, in fact, going to restrict the discussion in such a way as is simply applied to efficiency only. I have said this before, and the Prime Minister has a good quote from Churchill that backs it up; this not the most efficient way to deal with the public business. But we believe that it is the best way.

This does not mean that it has to stagnate and that we have to turn to precedents in other jurisdictions, or even in our own deliberations, to back up all we do. Surely, from time to time we can step back in an orderly way—and I would suggest that a committee would be the way to do it—and look at our own procedures and see what can be done to order our business more efficiently, and democratically and better.

I do not want to take up the time of the House in making any objection to the hours of sitting. We all know it has been oppressive. I think that we have done a year's normal work for anyone else in five months' time, and four nights a week for nine weeks is more than we should have to look forward to.

I know that the government is quick to say that when our party had the responsibility that the night sessions were even longer than those we have now. I do not know. I think that we can order our affairs, particularly accepting the proposal by the Premier that we are going to have a fall session, so that we can use a longer period of time more effectively, and use our time more effectively, so that it is not going to be as oppressive as it has been in the last two to three months. One thing is sure, and that is that all sides are prepared to take an orderly review of our procedures so that we can improve them. I do not think that this has to be tremendously time consuming. I think that many of the rules and the leadership and advice available to us could be be undertaken in a few hours, if such a committee should be appointed and we could sit down and take a look at these things.

I would like the Prime Minister's comments on these matters if he is moved to say anything about them. Also, in the first vote, I would appreciate a prediction from the Premier, as to the number of conferences he will be called upon to attend as our chief representative from Ontario, resulting from the Confederation of tomorrow conference. There is a continuing committee of Premiers, in which he must surely be involved, and yet we have heard nothing about that since the conference last December.

Also, what he would predict would be the series of conferences that would lead to a review of our fiscal agreement with the federal government, and with our continuing constitutional responsibilities as far as changes in this regard might be predicted. The federal-provincial conference in February did create another committee and there have been political events intervening which would make communication and plans on this line difficult. But I would appreciate a rundown of the responsibilities of the Premier during the recess.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I only want to make one brief comment at this time on the procedure of the House, and leave the rest for the wind-up speech for this party on the Budget debate.

I would be concerned, with the introduction of the programme budgeting plan, which is a long term plan to revolutionize the presentation of government estimates and programmes to this assembly, that we not, at this point, drastically change the work of the estimates committee of this House and the committee of supply, into some different system which might well have needed to be done, had we been going to continue with the identical system which has been in force for so many years. I think that the most significant thing which is happening, insofar as the conduct of the province's business is concerned, is that work being undertaken by The Department of Treasury in the programme budgeting for the province.

I have had the same sense of frustration that every member of the House has, as to whether, in fact, we are engaged in some form of nit-picking, in questions related to the estimates, which is not terribly appropriate, and yet at the same time, I think that there is a meaningful exchange that does take place from time to time on almost every estimate about some matter of programming and policy.

How you can separate the two aspects under the present system would have been a matter of real concern had we been going to continue with that system. The introduction of the programme planning budgeting system, which I hope will be introduced very soon, requires some caution, and I would just utter a word of caution about changing the committee of supply until we are informed as to how that system will operate.

In the same vein, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I do not think that the introduction of this system is satisfactory, if it is the intention of the government to introduce it to us after it has been fully fashioned. I think that it is most important that either, through a standing committee of this Legislature, or in some way some members of this Legislature can be brought into the planning work which is being done.

For example, I noticed that the Minister announced in his estimates that there had been this original orientation meeting with senior officials. I think that some machinery has got to be fashioned by which some members of this assembly are brought in at the original planning of this programme, so that we can get some suggestion as to its objectives. We all read about the plan, and know that it was developed in The Department of Defence in the United States of America, and spread into some of the departments of government in the United States, and the government of Canada has adopted it.

We have adopted, and yet all of them, excepting The Defence Department of the United States, are in a very rudimentary phase of planning and fashioning of that system. I happen to think that it is probably the most revolutionary activity undertaken by the government at the present time, so far as its impact upon the transaction of government business. With that word of caution, I would hope that when the Prime Minister speaks on his estimates, that he would make some comment about some way in which some members of this assembly could be involved in the thinking and background and planning of that approach to the government business.

I would, on the first vote, simply like to know what the staff of the Prime Minister's office is now. I notice that there is some $31,000 increase, which is mainly under the salary item, and I am not particularly interested in the individual salaries but I would like to know the role and function which each of them performs.

Mr. Chairman: The Prime Minister.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: There are several matters here, Mr. Chairman, as far as the revision of the rules of the House are concerned, and the procedures here, I look upon this as an on-going matter. I do not think it can be finalized at any period of time. A constant revision and review are necessary. This has been the procedure in the past. If you look back over the years that any of us have been here, you will notice changes in procedure that have arisen and have taken place really to meet exigencies of the situations in which we find ourselves at any specific time. I have felt personally that I wanted this session to be complete before these matters were considered. We have a lot of new members in the House.

Some of these matters I would have referred to in my contribution to the Budget debate. I recognize that the leader of the Opposition has spoken in the Budget debate and perhaps he is concerned that he would not have another opportunity to discuss these matters. But I had intended speaking about them there. I wanted this session to be complete so that one would be able to sense the feeling of this House.

It is a new Parliament and this is the first session. As we come to the end of it, we have a good many members here who came in knowing really nothing about the Legislature per se, who have had the benefit of the experience of this session in order to become accustomed to the procedures. Also it has given us an opportunity to assess, perhaps, what is going to be the atmosphere, and the needs for the years that lie ahead. Therefore, I was not greatly interested in introducing any amendments to the procedures during this particular session—I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition that you cannot conduct the affairs of an institution such as this, with efficiency solely in mind, because if we do we will destroy some of the things that we seek to achieve here.

On the other hand, having said that, I think every member of this House must be a little dismayed occasionally at the high degree of repetition that occurs. Who can sit here for this number of months and not be aware of this? This is one of the problems, of course, about establishing a separate committee of the House to deal with estimates. So what do we do? We detach a certain group of members from the House and put them off in a committee room and they consider estimates.

Then, as soon as they are finished, those estimates come back into this House and are immediately re-examined by all those members who have not sat on that particular committee. So inevitably we are going to get the same treatment in this House sitting in committee of the whole, as will prevail in any committee on estimates.

Mr. Nixon: Would you permit a comment on this point?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Nixon: I notice in the procedures committee of the House of Commons, their recommendation would deal with this specific matter. They speak about even dealing with bills in committee. Rather than go through the bills clause by clause, the bills are dealt with by the standing committee. Then the debate in the House takes place on the report of the standing committee. The same thing could very well be done on the report of the estimates committee. They would be reported back en bloc and not necessarily done item by item.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Chairman, this probably is not the place to argue this out because there are so many points to that question. But, this would only work if there were some form of agreement which would be honoured. Frankly, in our discussions to date, I am not able to detect agreement. In other words, the leader of the New Democratic Party has said he cannot see that he could guarantee agreement. I respect this point of view and am not being critical, but I am simply pointing out that, as of now, we cannot detect agreement. This is the problem.

Mr. Nixon: We have not had a chance to thresh out the alternatives.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, there are many alternatives. However, Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have given this matter a lot of thought during the course of this session and I have no objection whatsoever to considering changes to the rules of procedure here. In fact, we have made many changes in the rules over the years without any prodding from the Opposition, simply because we felt that it might be a better way of handling the business of the House. That is how we will approach this. I think the experience of this session will be valuable to us in whatever deliberations there may be in this regard in the future.

We must face the fact that we are going to have to sit more weeks or days or perhaps months during the year, although I believe in 1966 we sat probably as long as we sat in this session—the Clerk informs me some days longer—so that was a very protracted session. In any event, it does not really matter. The point is I do not think we need to constrict or attempt to force long hours of sitting. On the other hand, I must admit that sometimes as I sit here and watch the procedure I have a feeling that this is the only way we are ever going to get finality. I think too, and I will leave it to each individual member who has sat here and listened to the procedure of this House in this session, to think back.

If we do not have a deadline, it will never end. I think this is perhaps just a question of human nature. But it is when we start to force ourselves to get some sort of a deadline that eventually we get action. The talk continues and goes on, and on, and on, unless we can bring it up against some type of deadline. And this perhaps influences the hours of sitting. I would think, as I see the situation now, we should be prepared to come back here in the fall for some short period of time, prior to Christmas, and we might dispose of the Throne debate and deal with some items of legislation. Then we can meet in the new year, and the Budget could then be introduced.

Now, one thing I have noticed in these long periods of sitting in committee of supply and dealing with the estimates is that we have pretty well emasculated the Budget debate, which is traditionally one of the great formal debates of the House. I feel we should try to put the importance of the Budget debate back where it belongs, where matters of policy would be discussed, broad matters of policy, the government's announced policy could be commended and criticized, additional polices and comments could be made.

Mr. Nixon: There is never anybody over there listening to the debate.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, Mr. Chairman, if we did not spend so many long, long hours in the estimates, talking about really minor points of administration, then I think that the Budget debate could once again assume its proper place. I think the Budget debate has fallen into some degree of disrepair. It has become less important than it should be. I would think, in approaching the problem of how we are to deal with the estimates that we must also consider what the position of the Budget debate is and restore it to the position which, in my opinion, it rightfully should occupy in the procedures of this House.

So, perhaps if do meet in the fall we will be able to arrange hours of sitting which will be somewhat less onerous than those we have gone through in this session. Another thing with these very long sessions is that it is difficult to maintain attendance. I have received mail from people saying the attendance in the House is very poor, but I do not think the general public realizes that the members here attend committees in the morning, meet from 2:00 until 6:00, meet again from 8:00 until 11:00 o'clock at night, at least four days a week this session as well as having attended French classes. As far as the government members are concerned, every Minister has very large administrative responsibilities in operating his department. Frankly, it is impossible for all members of this assembly to be in their seats, listening carefully to everything that is said for the entire period of time this House sits.

I sometimes wonder why the general public does not realize just how full the day of the average member of this Legislature is. Simply because a member does not happen to be sitting in his seat on public view does not mean that he is not discharging his duties as a member of the Legislature. He can be in committee; he can be wandering from department to department looking after the affairs of his constituency. He can be dealing with the delegations from his particular part of the country. He can be doing a million things. So if you sit in the press gallery and count up who are sitting in their seats and then say those men are not working, this can be a false conclusion from the situation seen in this House at any moment.

I explain this in individual letters I write to people who communicate with me about attendance in the House. But I take this opportunity to say publicly, that I do not think the people really understand the amount of time individual members spend working on behalf of their constituents, and on behalf of the population at large in the province.

Now, while I am dealing with these procedures, the hon. member for Riverdale is not anxious to proceed quickly with the proposition the hon. leader of the Opposition raised. He says we might go slowly in considering this. Moreover, as far as programme budgeting is concerned, this was explained pretty fully to the standing committee on public accounts last year. Now I realize that is a relatively small committee with what might be termed a rather highly-specialized function. Perhaps in explaining financial matters there does not constitute a complete explanation to the entire body of the House.

I would be very happy—and the Provincial Treasurer has also heard your comments—to make some arrangement for an explanation of these proposals if such is required. As these things change and as new procedures are adopted, inevitably this is going to require adequate presentations here in the House. We would be quite happy to make sure that detailed explanations are given, perhaps some place other than in the Legislature itself so that the procedures the government is following can be understood.

In regards to the comments made respecting the continuing committee of Premiers which was established after the Confederation of tomorrow conference, the sequence of events since last November has been such that the committee has not found it necessary to convene, except that we did have a meeting during the constitutional conference in Ottawa in February, very briefly, more procedural than anything else.

Probably that committee will have some discussion at the Premiers' conference which is being held in Saskatchewan in about two weeks' time. In other words, we will all, I hope, be together at that time, and I have no doubt the function of this continuing committee will be dealt with then. The fact is that after the Confederation of tomorrow conference, the federal government called a constitutional conference and, of course, while these matters were being discussed in that form any need for a reconvening of the Confederation of tomorrow conference was not necessary.

At the moment I cannot say when, in a formal way, the continuing committee of Premiers will meet—that is, in a formal way to carry on the discussions originated at the Confederation of tomorrow conference. As you can see that conference had, I think, a very profound effect upon the subsequent constitutional conference called by the federal government.

In regard to any other conferences, at the moment there are no plans for any of which I am aware. No dates have been set. The Prime Minister of Canada is in the process of organizing his government, and I assume that in the course of time we will have some discussion as to when we will meet again. But as of now there are no dates set for any further federal-provincial conferences, although we know that the need is there and that certainly there will have to be some discussion about this in the relatively near future. At the moment I have nothing to report to the House in that regard.

Mr. Chairman, in answer to the specific question of the hon. member for Riverdale, the increase in the estimates of my department this year covers normal increases in salaries plus additional personnel. At the present moment the main office, which is covered by the first vote, the staff consists of 21 people. I do not know whether you want a more exact breakdown in listing their names.

Mr. J. Renwick: I would like a breakdown as to their role.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Just one moment then. First of all there is Mr. M. McIntyre, who is secretary of the Cabinet and also Deputy Minister of the department. He is the senior executive, or administrative head of both sections of the department, the Cabinet office and the main office.

There are five executive officers—Mr. Farrell, Mr. Hanson, Mr. Kinmond, Mr. Martyn, Mr. Rathbun, and Dr. Reynolds, chief executive officer. The rest of the staff consists of the receptionists, secretaries and stenographers, and Mrs. Beatty, the departmental secretary and accountant.

As far as function is concerned, the executive officers, under the chief executive officer, carry out assigned administrative functions necessary in the office. You might be interested to have a run down on the question of mail. I am not referring here to bulk mail, I am referring to individual letters that need to be dealt with and processed through various departments of government. We will deal with approximately 13,000 individual replies to letters this year. In 1962 the number was about 5,400. Since then it has increased, and as I said we estimate we will deal with a heavy volume this year.

The executive officers handle a good deal of the research and problems arising out of mail when people write asking about specific matters and about specific cases. These have to be traced through the departments involved. Also, executive officers from my own department act as secretaries and serve the chairmen on various interdepartmental and Cabinet committees in order that we may have constant liaison with these committees. They interview people. I do not think I could estimate how many individuals walk into the reception office in a week.

We need people to interview individuals who come to see me about a very wide variety of matters. We have many delegations; I think we deal with probably 75 or 80 invitations each week requesting my own personal appearance here and there. These all have to be sorted, dealt with, assessed and so on. Then, there are all kinds of reports for which I might ask concerning various matters proceeding within the government. I need these men to go to the departments and work with Ministers and senior civil servants who are preparing information which I want reduced to the smallest number of pages with the greatest amount of information possible on them.

Then, of course, Mr. Kinmond deals with the press, radio and television and looks after the TV room, as it is called, downstairs and deals with all the relationships of this department with the news media.

So in a very rough way, those are the duties and responsibilities of these men. As you can see it is highly individualistic work. It follows really no routine and it certainly follows no hours. I would say that these men are in many ways selfless and very dedicated. We work week-ends; hours mean nothing, crises come at any time of any day and certainly there is no time routine in the office of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition has a comment.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, there is just a little bit of information. We are talking about the length of the session. The Clerk, Mr. Lewis, just sent me the following information you might find of interest. In 1966 we sat 110 days; this year so far, 100. 1966 also had more night sittings. However, I am informed we have sat more hours this session.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make a few remarks on this, in part arising from the remarks made by the hon. member for Riverdale.

He urged that any reform of the presentation before the committee of supply be either held up or we go slow on this matter until we have looked into the change of setting up of the Budget or the estimates. I want to emphasize this, that no matter how we change the presentation of the estimates, or how more efficient they may be, it will not stop the talking.

We use the estimates, no matter how small a particular grant might be, as an occasion to make a speech. It may be an important speech, it may not. You may have an item of a $10,000 grant and it may be good for a four-hour speech. No matter how big or small the estimates are, the talk is bound to continue, no matter how you change the presentation of the estimates, and I want to emphasize that.

So I hope, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister will not delay any thought of reforming our procedures in this House because of that. I have spoken on this before and I do not, certainly at this late date, intend to dwell on it at length. But unless we improve the way we handle this business in this House we are going to bring the Legislature into disrepute.

We can blame ourselves. We are all at fault. We on this side of the House can be accused of talking too much, and on occasion we do. But other people can accuse the government of sitting back, "Let them talk the clock out."

We can all be accussed of this, and I, for one, want to see it stopped. I think if we use common sense among ourselves that we can get together and work out various means of procedure where we can be efficient and, at the same time, make sure that everybody has an opportunity to be heard.

No Legislature in the western world carries on the way we do. Certainly Ottawa does not; certainly Westminster does not. I think that we have to see to it that we safeguard the free speech that we have, with the checks and balances that are required at the same time to see to it that we carry on in a reasonable efficient manner.

What will be bound to happen is that many members who are interested in public life will just get fed up, secondly, many individuals who could be interested in public life when they see the way we carry on, just do not want to have anything to do with it, or certainly do not want to be a member.

I have used, I think, before the example of Mr. Richard Taylor, former member for Timiskaming. A very able man. A man of dedication and great knowledge. He just did not want to run again simply because of the incessant time he felt taken up where the private member could accomplish very little.

It is important in modern administration of government that these men are brought in, regardless of their party, and this affects men of all three parties. It is important. These people are not only attracted to the public life of the country and of the province, but they stay in and take an active part in the public life.

But if we are going to continue our discussions—regardless who is at fault—the way that we have done in this past session, we simply lack common sense, and all parties can be blamed if we do not see to it that we modernize our procedures in this House.

There are many ways of doing this, many suggestions have been made. I, as one member, want to say this, that it is incumbent upon all of us, and if my party failed to co-operate then my party would be at fault and I certainly would speak up against my own party if we failed to come to some reasonable set of procedures. But I know from what discussions have gone on in my own party, and some of the comments of our own members, that we are anxious to see that this most important business in the country—the business of government—be done in an efficient manner. The old days have gone—

Mr. Chairman: The member is becoming quite repetitious.

Mr. Trotter: Well, it might be. Thank you. I have not been speaking too often of recent date in the hope that this House would be cleaned up. At the same time, I want to say that I think this is of utmost importance because it is, I think, in many cases bringing the House into disrepute. I hope that in having this year as an example that this coming year we will make some definite progress.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 1501 carried?

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Chairman, I believe in giving credit where credit is due, and all too seldom do we express our appreciation for a job well done and for outstanding services rendered to the people of this province.

I believe that great credit is due to the Deputy Minister, to the Prime Minister, and the secretary to the Cabinet—you all know his name, Mr. W. M. McIntyre—for his outstanding service as co-ordinator of the Centennial celebrations and activities in this province during the past year.

He made a great and tremendous contribution to the success of the celebrations. Mr. McIntyre has given many years of service and he is deserving of our appreciation.

Votes 1501 and 1502 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes the estimates of The Department of the Prime Minister.

ESTIMATES, OFFICE OF THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR

Vote 1201 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: This completes the estimates of the office of the Lieutenant-Governor.

ESTIMATES, OFFICE OF PROVINCIAL AUDITOR

On vote 1601:

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): Mr. Chairman, on page 21 of the Provincial Auditor's report, he has a very brief statement as to the comments made by the Ontario taxation committee, better known as the Smith committee on taxation. All he says in his report is that, "Comments concerning the public accounts have been noted, and are being given due consideration".

I would like to know if the Treasurer of Ontario could give us a little more indication of what is being done, because the Smith committee, in volume 3 of its report, on pages 2, 3, and 4, were, in essence, highly critical of the way that the public accounts of the province are prepared. They admitted that the public accounts were not under their purview but since they had to deal with it to such a large extent, they could not help but make remarks.

For example, the Smith committee makes such statements as this, and I am not taking the statements out of context because I do not want to read the whole thing, but they say, "People inexpert in government accounts are almost certain to be misled, while the knowledgeable are inconvenienced".

They go into the whole argument that we have had on many occasions about the difference between ordinary and capital accounts.

They made reference in another way that the public accounts hinder a full understanding of government finance through the distinction drawn between ordinary and capital items of income and expenditure.

The third thing that I would like to mention is the reference to the grants made to Ontario universities, and I think particularly of the Ontario universities capital aid corporation which involves a great deal of money and which is going to involve even more.

Again they say, "Regardless of the reasons for presentation, in our opinion it disguises the true state of the government's financial position".

Well, I admit that we do not want to get into long talks at this time in the hearings of the House, but would the Minister comment as to the possibility of changes being made as a result of what the Smith committee has said about the public accounts?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, there is very little to be said about the matter insofar as it relates to the estimates of the Provincial Auditor. I did make some comment when we were discussing the estimates of The Department of the Provincial Treasurer, as far as the accounts are concerned. I think that I recall indicating that I was giving consideration to the continuing pursuit of getting on with what was referred to as a national accounts basis in our accounts presentation. I guess that that observation is as good now as it was when I made it on the estimates of The Department of Treasury. But I think it is quite appropriate to say that the matter referred to in the auditor's report in this respect is accurate and is being considered.

I have had one or two short conversations with the auditor in this respect and beyond that I cannot tell you really what has been determined. The whole matter of the Smith committee is being undertaken—as has been said in this House on a number of occasions—by a central co-ordinating committee in The Department of Treasury, assisted by representatives from other departments. Presumably, all these matters will be taken under consideration. Beyond that I am in no position to comment.

Mr. Trotter: Is there a particular time by which some definite policy will be set, or is it just going to be in the fullness of time, as happens so often? Is there a possibility of any definite change in the next year or two?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, there is every possibility. But I am back to what I have said many times with respect to the presentation of the accounts, and I cannot say any more. It is certainly not possible to change overnight from the processes of decades in this field, and I would hope that the hon. member would understand that. We have not only discussed it with the Provincial Auditor, as I have said, but we have had a series of meetings with the controller of accounts, whose function it is to set up the compilation of the accounts for the auditors' check.

Now, this is in process, and I have made a number of references to this. Presumably I will be advised further as the whole process advances. But all I can say is that it is in progress. To be definitive as to when we will switch from a format which is as comprehensive as the one we have been using—and I think everybody will agree—will take time and some appropriate consideration.

Mr. Chairman: The member for York Centre.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, the major differences which I have found between dealing with accounts and budget estimates and studying the financial records of a government has not just been its format, but the length of time between the accounts one is reading, and the budget one is considering. The fact is that it takes almost a year to receive the audited accounts. Is this due to the volume of work of the Provincial Auditor? Normally, in some very large corporations, we have audited accounts within six weeks of the year's end. In the government's case this would be the middle of May. I do not know when we can expect these accounts. Perhaps in the late fall. Is the delay within the department or the procedure of audit?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, it is a statutory requirement, as I understand it, that the public accounts in the province of Ontario for the previous fiscal year be in the hands of the members ten days after the opening of a succeeding session of the Legislature. As far as I am aware, that requirement has been met. I have explained to the House before that, in many circumstances, it is difficult to prepare the accounts for one year until well after the end of the fiscal year.

There is a lapse of time after March 31 for the orderly receipt of accounts, the processing of them by the various departments and the eventual audit. This takes time. There are many accounts, for instance, which are due and payable in effect on March 31 which may well not have been submitted. They require processing at the department level and the branch level in the department. They work up then through The Department of Treasury into the auditor's hands. This process also takes time. The books—while they reflect the financial position for a fiscal year ending March 31, are not always actually closed on that day.

I do not think that the process or performance varies greatly from what takes place in industry. You cannot reach the end of a fiscal period today and have everything delineated tomorrow. The volume of accounts that go through the various branches and departments of government and then through the accounts branch or the comptroller of revenue takes some time. We are doing our best to speed up this process in many fields. Again, this is an area where we have had a series of discussions with the comptroller of accounts and his staff. We are doing our best to speed up the processing of accounts for payment purposes, because I personally think that there is a limit to the amount of time that the creditor of the government should be allowed to wait. But to go into much more detail is difficult, I simply would have to assure the hon. members that there is recognition of the time factor involved here, and there is continued pursuit in terms of trying to improve the process and minimize the delay. That is all I can say.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I do not know if the explanation given by the hon. Provincial Treasurer would satisfy the hon. Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs if the George Weston Company or Union Carbide of Canada took a similar length of time to produce their results. They have a certain time that they are given by statute that is much less than the time that is taken by this government, many months less.

Union Carbide of Canada actually comes up with its own internal statement within ten days of a year-end. It has an audited statement prepared within six weeks—less than that, actually. They do it by not only the modern methods of technology, computers and the rest of it, they keep their statements up to date—but they plan a long way ahead for a year-end so they can provide those responsible for the direction of the company with prompt results.

We are responsible in this Legislature to the taxpayers of this province for the results of this province, certainly through the government and the Cabinet. We should be in a position to know the results far more promptly than the present legislation demands. And I would hope that the legislation would be changed to be more adequate in view of the fact that the modern technology permits it to be much faster. I think this matter should be considered before the next session to see if we cannot be provided with complete audited statements of the province much before that session opens.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would draw the attention of the Provincial Treasurer to the recommendation of the public accounts committee that, in any re-arrangement of the offices in this building, the independence of the auditor be emphasized by locating him in this building in order to make absolutely certain that people understand that the office of the Provincial Auditor is an office responsive to this assembly and not an office involved in the government administration. I know that we pay lip service to the separation of function of the auditor. But certainly, from the sensation I had in the last Parliament and the sensation I had sitting for the first time on the public accounts committee this year, this question of pre-audit and post-audit is also intimately involved in the sensation of the need to reinforce the independence of the Provincial Auditor from the government administration. I think it is the need for that separation of function, a good part of which is at the background of the concern about the lack of a post-audit in the government accounts.

I would certainly direct the Provincial Treasurer's attention not just to that particular item, but specifically for the purposes of this vote, to item 8 of the report of the public accounts committee which the member for Parkdale, as chairman, tabled yesterday.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I do not want to let this opportunity pass to say, through you, Mr. Chairman, a thank you to the chairman and members of the public accounts committee. I have received the report; I have read it and I think it is a good report. I have distributed it. Very careful attention will be given to its recommendations, I can assure you, as always.

Some of them will be capable of implementation earlier than others will, but there is no recommendation in this report which is not worthy of the careful consideration of the Provincial Treasurer and his staff and those who are associated in the whole matter of the public accounts of the province. I regard it as a very good report, so I think it only appropriate that I say a word of congratulation to the chairman and the committee this year.

The matter of the location of the offices of the Provincial Auditor is, of course, well taken, and I can say to you, Mr. Chairman, through you to the hon. member for Riverdale, nothing would delight the Provincial Auditor more than to be located in this building. The great problem at the moment is the fact, of course, that space re-arrangements are being undertaken. It will take a little time and if circumstances permit I am quite confident we will have the Provincial Auditor and his staff in this building when the appropriate arrangements can be made. I repeat with some emphasis, he would be delighted to be in this building. He feels that is where he and his staff belong.

Vote 1601 agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: That completes the estimates of the office of the Provincial Auditor.

This completes the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Chairman, before making this last motion, I think all of the hon. members of the House would want to pray for your forgiveness for all of their sins of omission and commission and to thank you for your tolerance and patience, kindness, and your understanding.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Reuter, from the committee of supply, reports the following resolutions:

RESOLVED:

That supply in the following supplementary amounts and to defray the expenses of the government departments named, be granted to Her Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968.

(See appendix B, page 6066).

Resolution concurred in.

Clerk of the House: The 3rd order; consideration of the report of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BOARD

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments concerning the workmen's compensation board, Ontario.

This is one department of government, Mr. Speaker, that has a very substantial effect on the lives of the individual. The comments that I would like to make are concerning several fields in workmen's compensation. One is concerning the supply of prosthetic appliances to individuals who have suffered some type of a serious injury where the arm may have had to be removed, or even in the process of the injury, the arm or leg was amputated.

I understand that there are appliances today which can be provided to the individual that would give him practically full use of the limb that had originally been lost. The workmen's compensation, from what I understand, seem to be a little reticent in providing this to the individual, especially to the individual who has received this injury some years ago. In fact it was well over six months ago that I met with a series of amputees back in my own community with the other members of the Legislature from the Windsor area. One of the major complaints they had to make at that time was that with the appliances available to the injured or the disabled worker the workmen's compensation do not seem to want to get into the 20th century and provide them with these new appliances.

I think that if this is so, Mr. Speaker, it behooves the workmen's compensation board to see to it that any individual who may have suffered this type of disability is provided with the latest type of appliance so that he can carry on as normal a life as he possibly could.

Another is concerning an injury that an individual may suffer. Because of oncoming years he finds that the workmen's compensation board says that this is as a result of an arthritic condition. The arthritic condition may have been accelerated as a result of the injury, but the injury was not as a result of an arthritic condition. He finds himself at a disadvantage when he wants consideration from the board.

Another field is where the individual is injured and, after going through a rehabilitation or treatment, returns to his employment. After being kept on employment for a short period of time he is laid off simply because he cannot perform the work that he originally performed. He has a disability, an injury, and the employer does not have lighter type of work in the industry.

As a result, the individual is laid off, and has to depend on the unemployment insurance for benefits. I think that where the individual is injured and where the employer cannot provide him employment of a lighter nature, workmen's compensation have an obligation to rehabilitate the individual to the point where he can find employment. Until the time he does find employment, he should be carried on workmen's compensation rolls.

The rehabilitation aspect is probably one of the more serious ones, Mr. Speaker, because once injured, the fellow quite often can never return to the same type of employment; he had originally been gainfully employed, making a fairly substantial wage and now finds himself unemployed or required to work at employment that does not pay as substantially as it did before. These are a few of the comments that I have and I hope that the Minister later on will be able to reply to them.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a few brief comments to make about the workmen's compensation board. You may recall, at the beginning of this session, during my first address to this House, I made some serious complaints about the board, and at that time I presented some 30 or 40 cases to the Minister who reports for the board to this House.

I was quite disturbed, shortly after that, when one of the senior officials of that board made a speech in which he said those cases had all been investigated and there was no merit to any of them. Well since then, actually I prepared a fairly lengthy brief, which would take about a week to deliver, on those various 30 cases which had no merit.

But it is a mixed blessing for all of us that we have appealed those cases and have won most of them, so I can spare you, and everyone else here, the necessity of going into those cases with no merit, which somehow we won on appeal. But the matter that disturbs me about those cases—those happen to be cases that came to me. And I did appeal them, and I did win most of them. And some of them go back for a very long time; many, many years.

Now what disturbs me—I am pleased that I got justice for these men. I am pleased that we won those cases. But the thing that is upsetting to me is the fact that how many more, who did not happen to come to their MPP, were turned down and never received justice for one of two reasons. Either they did not appeal, or else they appealed and were rejected because they did not have someone to speak for them.

Now on this business of not appealing, the persons who seem to get hurt most are the persons of non-Canadian birth who come from another land, and perhaps their English is not too good and their understanding of procedures is not too good, and all too often they are turned down by compensation and as far as they know that is the end of it.

We have had cases which go back some years, where the facts were so obvious that it was not even necessary to appear in front of the board, but merely by sending a letter to the board, which was referred to the review committee, the claim was immediately granted.

I would like to suggest, through you, sir, to the responsible Minister, that there should be some extra care taken to ensure that every person knows that when a rejection of a claim is made, he can appeal. And if his appeal is refused, then he can appeal again, because it is my understanding that when an appeal tribunal turns down a claim, it does not say in their letter, certainly in many of the letters that I have here, that they could appeal the case further. Well, of course, they have a right of further appeal and, from experience, we have found that we win a far greater percentage of the appeals to the board itself than to the appeal tribunal.

I am not sure what the reason is for that, but at the higher level there appears to be, perhaps, more discretion available to these gentlemen. But certainly that final appeal is a terribly important one.

I was a little disturbed when the Minister got up and mentioned—I forget, the vast number of cases that came through his department—twenty billion or something, and of them all, there were only 300 complaints or 200 complaints. I have 150-200 complaints here myself. Well, let me suggest to you, sir, it does not matter if there are two hundred billion cases he gets every year—what is the figure—20,000,000 or 20,000, 200,000—if one member in this House is receiving 150 or 200 complaints, many of which are genuine complaints, because we are appealing a large number of these, and winning most of them, so obviously they were genuine complaints—there is something wrong with the system.

I can understand the odd case where an error is made, but I cannot understand this very large number. I believe I have perhaps some 200 under appeal at the present time, at various stages of appeal. And this is disturbing to me.

I have more than the average member because there was some publicity given to my comments and I ran a personal ad, but still this is a large number to be coming here and it is disturbing to find that many of them have merit and have been turned down for a variety of reasons.

I would like to, without going into too much detail, deal with some of the problems these people have, because these are not unique problems; we seem to run into them time and time again. Before I go into the specific complaints, I would like to refer back again to the comments I made in the debate of the Speech from the Throne, in relation to cases that are being handled by the insurance companies for the workmen's compensation board. In relation to the fire which occurred in the compenastion board shortly before my dismissal from my last job, there were some number of people who were injured, and up until a very few days ago—I have not checked this past week or so—none of these people had received any settlement of their claim.

At the time, earlier in this session, I asked the Minister if there was some argument as to who was responsible for paying the claim, and the Minister, at that time apparently, was not aware of the fact because he said "No". And now I have a letter here from a law firm which states—and I would be glad to supply a copy to the Minister—that none of these claims have been paid because there is some question as to who is responsible, whether it is the compensation board, or the insurance company, or the government. As a result, many of these people have received nothing.

Let us not have the confusion that we had earlier this session, where in the case of one Mr. Lynch, it was pointed out the vast sums of money he had received on compensation. This has nothing to do with the compensation. Of course, these people have received their compensation. This has to do with the injuries received in the hospital, which is quite a separate matter. Incidentally, when discussing that matter, there was some discussion on Lynch re that rather peculiar form he was asked to sign, which said he was signing off all responsibilities, and the Minister explained this did not really mean what it said, and it only referred to his watch. Well, this may be and I certainly would not question the Minister's word. But I certainly would suggest to the Minister that he make certain that forms of this nature never be used in the future because it is all very well for the Minister to say it means one thing, when in fact it states quite a different thing on the form.

The other case I would like to refer back to, or two of the cases that I mentioned at that time are still very disturbing to me. One of them is a Mr. Gualtier who died in that fire. He left a crippled sister in Italy, who as yet has received nothing, and was offered a very small amount of money to settle the claim. And the Minister pointed out that no claim had been made for this woman under the Act. Well, of course, as the Act is worded, no claim can be made. A sister has no claim whatsoever, and if she had made a claim it would have been rejected and that would have been the end of it. A widow can make a claim. A child can make a claim.

But for the Minister to get up and say no one has made a claim for the sister under the Act—I expected better from this Minister.

So, let me again ask the Minister to please look into the merits of this case. Here is an injustice. If you are going to sit on the terms of the Act you do not have to pay anything, but let me suggest you should not be sitting on the terms of the Act.

I suggest we adjourn, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we have a quorum.

An hon. member: If there is no quorum of the House, the House must be adjourned.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): We will not only provide the hon. member with a quorum, we will provide him with an audience.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you very much.

Well, now that I have an audience and a quorum—the various complaints that we have had in these cases break down to some 20 different problems. I think probably the most serious, the most common, that was touched on briefly by the previous speaker, is the case of a man who seems perfectly healthy, is doing his job, has an accident—let us say a log falls on his back.

I have a case like that right here. He is taken to the hospital. X-rays are taken of his back and, sure enough, we find there is arthritis in his back, and we need not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, because if we took x-rays of every member of this House, you would find some 90 per cent of them have some arthritis in their back. This is a normal medical change that occurs, sad to say, in all of us over the age of 30.

But what happens? The compensation board looks at the x-ray and says, "Ah, pre-existing conditions. Therefore, this accident is an aggravation of a pre-existing condition".

When the man continues to have pain in his back, they say, "Well, you had an accident, you certainly should receive your compensation for it, and the usual figure is four weeks. It can vary. It can be two weeks or six weeks.

But after four weeks they say, "Well, you are still having pain, you cannot go back to work, you are still crippled. This is true, but you are only crippled half because of the accident, the other half is because you have got arthritis in your spine. If you did not have arthritis in your spine, this accident would have cleared up long ago and you would be back to work. So we are going to cut your compensation to 50 per cent starting today."

Well, the workman complains. He says, "I cannot work. I have got a pain in my back." And they say, "Well, it is not our fault that you have got arthritis."

The unfairness of this type of situation is so glaring and so common, and yet it occurs. I must personally have 30 or 40 cases of this particular type where a man who had no trouble from this degeneration—this arthritis, if that is the word to use, and I am not sure it is—has an accident. The board says then, "Because you cannot go back to work it is because you have this pre-existing condition." It is such an unfair way to handle this type of case.

Let me suggest through you, sir, to the Minister, that if he is going to make changes—and I trust he is—this is the first change that should be made. When a man is well and is working and has an accident as a result of which he develops a certain disability, the board should not go out of their way to look for some other condition which might have been aggravated by that accident, because the fact remains that if the accident had not occurred, he would be able to continue doing his job.

If the Minister or I were to trip going down those stairs and hurt our back we would be off work much longer than a young boy of 18, because unfortunately he and I now already have some degeneration in our spines. But this should not be reason for cutting off our pay.

I hope the Minister will agree with me, because this is one of the most glaring, one of the most outstanding inequities in the field of compensation in this province and it is so terribly common. You cannot argue this with the board, because I have gone down in cases of this nature, and they have said, "Well, you cannot argue the fact that he has the arthritis."

You can argue the percentage they will increase his 50 per cent pay to 75 per cent, but they insist that a part of that disability is due to the pre-existing condition, and because of the pre-existing condition they will deduct a certain portion of his pay. This is unfair and wrong. I want to stress this and forgive me if I am being slightly repetitious here, because this is a repetitious thing that occurs time and time again. Many of the other things I am going to list are not as common, but this is a very serious problem.

The second thing related to this is the matter of backs. I am not talking about pre-existing conditions. I guess if there is one difficult problem which the compensation board faces it is the matter of persons who injure their back, continue to have pain and the doctors cannot find anything. Let me say this is very, very common.

We see people in car accidents who can barely move, and yet when you examine them there is nothing to find, for the simple reason no bones are broken, nothing is out of place. It is always called soft tissue injury, the ligaments are torn or the muscles are torn. It is causing a tremendous amount of disability and a tremendous amount of pain, but an x-ray does not show anything.

Well, this type of person who is under compensation is in for big, big trouble, because the compensation board will pay them for a short time. They will get their pay for a few weeks, and then the board will say, "We cannot find anything, maybe he is malingering." They then say, "You have got to go back to work or we are going to cut your pay to 50 per cent or 25 per cent of your previous pay."

The man, in some cases agrees. Some of these cases are not legitimate, but many of them are, and no one can tell for sure which ones are and which ones are not. The best back specialist in the world cannot tell.

Now, this brings us to the crux of the problem. Are we going to cut off those who are legitimate, in order to make sure we catch the malingerers, or are we going to pay a few malingerers in order to make sure we do not cut off any legitimate complaint?

Unfortuntely, the board takes the wrong attitude. They say, "In order to make sure we do not pay any malingerers, we are going to cut off all of them." And unless you can prove something with an x-ray you are in bad trouble if you have a back ailment which does not heal quickly.

And this brings me to something that has been said, not in this House, but in committee. It has been said by the chairman of the board, Mr. Legge, it has been said in the Compensator, which is the official organ of the board.

This is what disturbs me, because they say it, but they do not always do it. They say all doubts are to be resolved in favour of the workman, and this is a sensible thing to say, and this is what should be done. But obviously this is not what is done, because I have case after case where there is doubt, and yet at certain levels of the board—and let me say at the highest level—it is much better.

At the level of the board itself, the final appeal if there is doubt and if the case is presented properly, you will find that you usually, get justice. This is not true at lower levels of the board.

I do not want to go into details, but just to illustrate one case, because it is such an outstanding obvious type of example of where this is not followed.

It is the case of a Mr. Richard who had an injury at work where a piece of steel fell on his finger and as he pulled his finger back, a little piece of steel went into that finger. There was a minor injury and he felt pain. There was a little piece of steel sticking out, and he jerked it very rapidly and pulled his hand back. He got a little pain in his arm, but did not worry about that. He figured it was just from the jerk.

He went to his doctor and the doctor took the steel out of him and dressed it and he was off work a day or two, and he was paid compensation. He went back to work and after a few weeks he got disturbed because his arm continued to ache. He went to see a doctor, and it turned out that his biceps muscle was ripped in two.

He did not know this at the time, the pain was centered on his thumb because he had a piece of steel in the thumb. Yet the compensation board said there was no proof that this injury of his biceps occurred at the time of the original accident. Therefore, they rejected his claim.

I looked this thing over. Let us say if there is any doubt, to begin with it is an obvious case where the story is logical, the action is logical, the rupture of the muscle is logical. It should have been granted to begin with.

But looking at it from the most uncharitable point of view, surely there was doubt, and yet this case was rejected by the board. It was rejected at the appeal level. It was rejected by the review committee.

Yesterday, my wife presented this case to the final level of appeal of the compensation board itself and received a sympathetic hearing. We do not have the result back as yet.

I rather suspect that finally this man will be given the justice which he should have got a long time ago, but the thing that disturbs me about this case is they say one thing —in case of doubt, the doubt is resolved in favour of the workman—and yet, we have a case here where surely there was doubt and yet it was resolved against the workman.

This is not unique. We have this time and time again and we should not have to go up to the final level of appeal, we should not have to have an MPP go down there and yell and scream and rant in order to get justice for these people.

It is at the original level, or certainly at the review committee, the first appeal level, that cases of doubt should be resolved in favour of the workman, because if not, even if ultimately they do get justice, in the meanwhile there has been incalculable damage done to that workman and his family.

They have not received compensation. The man cannot work. He requires surgery. Often they do not have medical insurance or a backlog of funds in the bank to pay for this type of thing, and people in this situation become desperate.

I know this man became desperate. He could not work. He was a labourer who suddenly found his right arm was gone. He really had a terrible strain in order to pay for the surgery that was required, and the compensation board said, "Too bad, we cannot prove that this accident occurred at work, even though the simplest examination of the claim would have shown so".

So let me again, through you, sir, suggest to the Minister, that not just at the highest level, not just at the board itself but down to the review committee and whoever makes the first decision. If there is an obvious doubt, for goodness sake at least to begin with, resolve it in favour of the workman. If then you wish to do further investigation, do so and if you find you are wrong, stop payment. But when there is a doubt to start with, the doubt should be, as your chairman has said, as the compensator has said, resolved in favour of the workman and not, as happens only too often, the other way around.

One other matter and this is another common problem. I am hitting the common problems first.

We have case after case here of labourers; men who are trained to do nothing but labour, who earn their living by using their hands, pick and shovel; doing the heavy work which, fortunately, the rest of us do not have to do. These men will have, all too often, no education. Many of them are immigrants.

They are not fit for any type of work except labouring and yet we have case after case where a man like this will have an accident, will injure himself, will be put on compensation—cases where there is no argument as to the legitimacy of the claim. The cases are put on compenastion and after a few weeks the man is told to come down to the board for an examination. He goes down and he has his examination and then he gets this awful letter in which they say, you are now fit to return to light work, therefore as of Monday either your compensation is being cut off or it is being cut to a certain percentage because our doctors tell us, true you still cannot do labouring, but you can go and be a bank manager or an MPP, perhaps.

The workman—what is he to do? It is again, a situation!

These are the men who earn the lowest amounts of money; they are the labourers. They have no bank accounts. They have large families all too often and suddenly, he is told, go and get a light job. Of course, they cannot get a light job. They are not fit for any light job. They cannot be trained for a light job; they do not have the education for it. They are fit to do labouring. They are trained for nothing else and that is what they are going to have to do all their lives.

I think the board is behaving properly under the Act. I am not faulting the members of the board. I am faulting the Act and the government who is responsible for that Act because this is such an archaic way of looking at it. This is such an unfair way of looking at it and it is such an inhuman way of looking at it.

Again I, through you, sir, am saying to the Minister this particular aspect is not the board's fault. I think this is the fault of the Act. Change it, because until you change it you are going to have hardships. You are going to have families ending up on welfare or ending up not having enough to eat when they do not know how to get on welfare.

This, I am sure, was not the idea that was behind the minds of those very bright people who brought in The Workmen's Compensation Board Act in the first place. I have gone back all those years to see what the original purpose of the Act was and it was intended to supply compensation for a workman who had an accident at work and cannot earn his living. The compensation was to make up a reasonable amount of his pay, until such time as he could begin to do his work again.

To tell that workman, go and get another job even though we know—we, speaking as the board or the MPPs—that he cannot get another job, is against the spirit of the Act. Although the board is acting within the wording of the Act this is, I am sure, not what the Minister or this government wishes. Let me say, just to digress for a minute, I have now had the occasion to appear before the members of the board at the appeal tribunal level and at the board itself on a number of occasions and unfailingly, I have found them to be courteous. I have found them to really want to do the proper thing. This is the impression I get from these men but in many ways, they are limited by the Act. And in some ways they are limited by an improper interpretation of the Act which has come down from above. Many of the interpretations are improper in two or three of the matters which I have listed already and other matters which I will go on to.

Certainly, the Act should be interpreted in the broadest sense. But one of the members of the appeal tribunal said something very interesting to me the other day. He said, "Doctor, this is not a welfare organization. If we pay out some money we have to go back to the employer who is involved, the firm that is involved, and justify the payment of that money. We cannot, if there is only a small doubt, pay a workman because really the employers are going to object and this is not welfare."

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, there is something wrong with the set-up of the Act, because if there is a doubt the board should not have to prove it beyond any reasonable possibility. They should just have to establish there is a doubt and if, in certain industries, the rates become higher perhaps you are raising the funds the wrong way.

Perhaps it should be assessed partially out of the public purse. Certainly it should be assessed largely from the employer but partially some of these funds should come from the public purse. It should not happen that workmen, who are injured at work and who —in my mind and I think to the mind of every other member of this House—should be entitled to compensation, do not receive their compensation and are forced to go onto public welfare.

Now to go on to another matter, the matter of medical doubt. I have a family doctor who has treated a man for many, many years; who sees the man after an accident at work and says, "You are disabled; you must not return to work. You should receive full compensation."

One of those cases was raised here in the House some time ago, I have a number of others. The one I raised was Mr. Cutajar, his doctor was Doctor Zadyko, who happens to be a neighbour of mine. Doctor Zadyko has treated this man for many years. He says, "I know you, I have examined you, I have treated you throughout this thing. You must not go back to work," and he issues a letter stating that.

The board says, "Fine, we will have another doctor see him." And they get a specialist to see him; they get two specialists to see him. The specialists say, "I do not find anything wrong. It is true you have got an excellent work record. You have never been off on compensation before. You never missed a day from your work, but we examined your back and we do not see anything. We do not think you are fully disabled, you should go back to work." So we go down to the board and what do we have? We have one letter from his family doctor, who has known him for 15 years and who has treated him for various ailments and has patched him up so he can go back to work. He knows the man is not a malingerer and who states this flatly in the letter.

On the other hand, we have the opinion of two men who have seen him for 15 or 20 minutes, who know nothing about his background, who could find nothing in the physical examination, as happens all too often in muscular injuries. They say, "We cannot find anything. You are fit to go back to work." In this particular case, the man's compensation is then cut to $14 a week because they compromise between the two views—the view of the family doctor, who says he cannot work at all, and the view of the specialists who say they cannot find anything. They say, "We are not sure who to believe. We will give you 10 per cent or 15 per cent or 20 per cent of your compensation. We will give you $14 a week. Go out and manage on that."

In case of doubt—of medical doubt—Mr. Speaker, surely the larger attention should be paid to the doctor who knows the patient, who has spent years with him, rather than to the other doctor, no matter how well qualified, who can only know a small portion of the case. He can only be aware of the physical factors and cannot be aware of the other matters, such as the regularity of the man's work, and the fact that he has gone back to work with a broken hand, with a cast on it so as not to miss a day. I am referring to a specific case now that I mentioned earlier.

If there is doubt, and again we come to the matter of doubt, if there is medical doubt, and if doctors disagree, any doctors, one or two, say that this man is legitimately injured and must not go back to work, then surely that doctor should be listened to. Regardless of where the preponderance of evidence is, there must be a certain amount of faith in the honesty of the man and the medical findings of the physician, particularly if it is the family doctor.

I would suggest to the Minister that the present system in this province is wrong and should be changed. If one doctor gives a letter saying this man should not work, then he should not be forced to go to work. Nor should his compensation be cut to an infinitesimal amount. I would suggest that if the board has had their own doctors disagree and at this point, what should be done is that the patient and his doctor should be told that there are medical opinions that do not agree with theirs.

The family doctor should be asked to refer the patient to a specialist in the field, of his own choice, not of the board's choice.

That specialist will be filled in by the family doctor of all the facts in the case. This is a much better way of doing it, rather than to pick a specialist out of the hat, someone who works for the board and who can only go on what he sees physically and apart from that, know nothing. Often nothing can be seen. Now, another matter.

These are related matters, and one is very serious. This is a delay in reporting an accident. We have many, many cases where a workman will be injured in work and falls down and hurts himself, gets up and feels fine; nothing is broken, and he seems to be okay. He therefore carries on working, and does not report it to the first aid or the boss. Three or four days later, his kink in his back is no better, so he goes to a boss, and tells him what happened and we find that the case is refused due to the delay in reporting. This is common, where a case is rejected because of delay in reporting. This is no reason to reject a case. The logic of the delay is obvious. The person does not think that he was badly injured, does not think that he will be off work, or need a doctor, so he does not bother to report. It is perfectly understandable, and yet time after time, we find cases rejected due to delay. They say, "How do we know that it did not happen at home, after you went home from work?"

This brings up a related matter: a workman who has an accident where there are no witnesses is in bad trouble. The workman's word, per se, is not accepted by the board, and he must be able to parade in one or more witnesses who will say: "Yes, I saw that saw fall down and cut off his hand".

Unless you have a witness to an accident, the board comes back and says: "How do we know it happened at work, and not at home?"

I have a case involving a trucker who was driving on delivery. He stopped to make the delivery, and as he stepped down from the cab, he slipped off the step and fell down. He lay there for some length of time, because he could not move. He finally managed to drag himself back into his truck and went home and phoned the boss to report. The case was refused on the grounds that they could not be sure that it had not happened after he had gone home.

This of course is true! How can he prove it? This is all too common, where a man has an accident, but no witnesses. Even if it is reported immediately—particularly if it is a man in the type of job where he does not have other people working with him, then he cannot provide witnesses. And if his employer is trying to keep down the compensation costs and is not too co-operative, then this claim is invariably rejected. And it is impossible to win an appeal, because we cannot supply any witnesses, since they do not exist.

Again, let me say that unless there is proof to the contrary, the worker should be given the benefit of the doubt, as the compensator and the chairman of your board have said. There is another matter which is closely related to the matter which I brought up before. That is the matter of saying to a man at a certain point: "You are only 25 per cent disabled, therefore go back to work and do 75 per cent of your work and we will make up the difference in your earnings. We will pay the 25 per cent".

Well, perhaps if I was on compenastion, I could come down here and speak only three-quarters as much and they will make up the 25 per cent difference. But for a man who has to lift heavy things all day long, the fact that he is only three-quarters better does not mean he can go back to work—because his back still hurts or his arm still hurts or the cut or whatever it is is not completely healed. To say to a man that he is three -quarters better, "Go back and we will make up the difference" often means "too bad, we know that you cannot go back, but we are only going to pay you 25 per cent from now on". This is another thing that is wrong. Unless the man can legitimately go back, this is a cruel and unfair way of handling the situation.

I am coming now to a much more serious matter. This relates to the system whereby employers will pay very much less annually in their compensation costs if they can keep their accidents down. Now this is a very-well-meant and laudable rule, I am sure. But it leads to some very unfortunate side effects. I have a case here of Mr. Junger. This is outstanding in the type of problem. Firms find that, if they can keep their accident rates down, they will pay so much less. This is great. They use safety measures to keep the accident rate down. But some firms do something that is not so creditable—they do not report accidents. They find that by not reporting accidents they will keep their costs down. It is cheaper to pay the worker for the medical costs and for the few days off work so as not to report the accidents. I am waiting for somebody to yell "name names!" I will anyway—

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Name names!

Mr. Shulman: Thank you. The member for Kitchener has obliged me. I have a case of Rolph Junger, and I have not gone into detail in the other cases because they are common. But this type of case is very hard to pin down, because the employer will not talk about it, and the board does not know about it, and the employee is afraid to talk about it for fear that he would be fired. Here I have a case where the employee was not afraid, because ultimately he was fired anyway because he had to go on to compensation. The system, as illustrated by this, is so very wrong. If you are going to use the system, you are going to have to make certain modifications.

The situation is this. This man worked for a company called Wallbar Machine Products. They are on Sharon Avenue in Cooksville. On September 16, 1967, he had a rather horrible accident. He was a visual inspector, and he was using a bottle of eyewash on his eyes from a medical kit at 2:00 o'clock of the afternoon. Now this bottle had always contained eye-wash. But on this day it contained Dettol for some reason—they were never able to find out how the switch occurred. Well, his eye was badly burned of course, so he went to see a doctor the very same day. Before he went to see the eye specialist, the foreman, a Mr. Heinz Metzer rinsed his eye with clear water and put castor oil in it to soothe it. To make sure that it was nothing serious, the man went off to see the eye specialist. Well, the firm did not want to report the accident. The doctor told him that the eye was burned; that he was going to be off work for some little time. He phoned his work and informed them he was not able to return to work, and was off for some weeks.

After two weeks, he had not received anything from the compensation board, and he was a little disturbed because he was running short of funds. So he called the employer to find out what about compensation, and the paymaster asked him to come into the office on Monday, October 2, 1967. The paymaster then gave him a cheque for $100; and said this money would compensate him for the money that would come from the compensation, and they gave him a form to fill out because they carried some sort of a sickness policy. They were going to soak the Occidental Life to pay for the medical expenses.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Speed it up.

Mr. Shulman: If the hon. member is in a hurry, he had better go home because we are going to be a long time yet.

Mr. White: Why does the hon. member insist on giving so much time-consuming detail well known to every member?

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Because we are trying to get the government to change the Act.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, the reason I am giving the detail is to point out the necessity of changing the Act.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Oh well, if the member has something he wants to say I would be glad to yield the floor to him at any time.

Mr. Speaker: Order please! The member for High Park has the floor please.

Mr. Shulman: If you can subdue the member for London South, I would be glad to continue, Mr. Speaker.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Well, Mr. Speaker, as the member for London South has pointed out—we all know about these cases—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order please! I think there is quite a bit of time being wasted now. Will the member for High Park continue please?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I will. The paymaster said they did not want an enquiry with the workmen's compensation board because they did not have the proper first-aid room—this is what he said—it may not be the reason. I do not think that is the reason. So this $100 would cover the loss of time and what he would receive from Occidental would come up to the same amount as he would have received from the compensation board. Well, the specialist refused to fill in the form for Occidental, as he had already submitted the forms to the compensation board. And the employer went to the Occidental firm and they refused the claim as it happened on the premises of the company and should have been covered by compensation—quite properly, let me say. The company then said to the compensation board, when they received the query, they knew nothing about this accident.

On Friday, November 24, Mr. Junger went into work, he was fired. He asked why he was fired, and the foreman said he was fired because he refused to give back the $100 the company gave him. Mr. Junger said he did not refuse to give the money back; this was the first he knew about it when he walked into work that day. For his time off work, he finally received $230 from the compensation board.

Well, I can understand how this whole thing occurred. I am sure even the member for London South can understand how it occurred. It occurred because firms—and some of the best firms do this—try not to report accidents because they find that it makes a tremendous difference to their cost.

I worked for the Massey-Ferguson Company some years ago, as their doctor, and one of the instructions was: "If a man is injured, and you can prevent reporting it by keeping him, keep him on. We will pay him his pay; he will get his pay all right; the man does not lose anything; but do not report it because it is going to push up our costs." And this works out all right for the worker in most cases, but in some cases it can work out tragically.

Because, if we have a case where a man apparently has a small injury, and he is kept on the payroll, even if he is just sitting in the first aid room the whole time—and there have been cases like that, at Massey, I have seen them; I looked after them—and the man received his pay and he did not lose anything. But the great danger here is if, subsequently, there is trouble from that accident. If a year from now, two years from now, that man develops some future problem, let us suppose it is a back and he starts developing some trouble with that, he has no hope of going back on the compensation board because the accident was never reported.

This is why firms that try to keep down their expenses, by paying the workmen for his time off in the hope that he will get back quickly and there will be very little expense, are doing a great disservice in some cases to the workman. And I would suggest to the Minister, his legislation should be changed to make the failing to report a compensable accident an offence. That is the only way you are going to stop this being done because otherwise you are going to find employers who are going to want to cut corners, small ones and big ones.

Now another problem, is the man who has low earnings prior to an accident. And this can happen all too often. A man can have a job where he has fairly substantial earnings, but it may be a type of job where, for seasonal reasons, or for a slowing down in his work, his earnings go down temporarily for a few weeks. And at that time he has an accident.

His compensation will be based on his earnings for the period immediately prior to that accident, no matter how high they were for the years preceding. And the result is that, even though the accident may be permanently disabling—he may never work again —whether it is permanently disabling or temporarily disabling, his compensation will be unduly low because of this factor.

May I suggest to the Minister another change he should have in his Act, that where this type of situation arises, the workman should be allowed to go back a further period in the records so that his pension or his compensation, as the case may be, will be brought up to a reasonable level? Now I think this a fairly obvious change that should occur.

There is a rather serious, and fortunately not-common problem, and that is the problem of the medical error. I am going to give an example again. I have tried to keep these examples to a minimum, but this one is an outstanding example of what can go wrong in a case, where nothing can be done because the doctor who made the medical error in the first place, rather understandably, does not wish to write up his error in a letter to the board.

Some of these cases go back a long, long time. I am rather delighted actually with some of the cases which I have won on appeal, at the board. Some of them go back many, many years. But some of them are not possible to appeal because you cannot get the medical evidence, and yet they are so clear cut.

A case that I want to bring to the attention of the Minister is that of Mr. Charles Kerr, 458 Victoria Avenue in Windsor, Ontario. His claim number is C-4161178. I am going to go into this case in some detail because it illustrates the rather horrible disaster that can happen to a workman and where there does not seem to be anyone you can turn to. You must forgive me, I tried to keep these cases as brief as possible, but this one is going to take a little time.

I have a letter here from the board which I received a few weeks ago, which sums the situation up as far as the board is concerned.

> Mr. Kerr has claimed that the paralysis of his right arm was the result of an accident on February 25, 1957, while he was employed by the Ford Motor Co., Windsor, Ontario. While at work, he was pulling on a wrench which loosened suddenly, causing him to strike his elbow on a machine; his condition was diagnosed as a right tennis elbow and total disability payments at the rate of $56 a week were paid from February 27, 1957, to April 8, 1957.
> Mr. Kerr has been to various medical specialists. Their reports have not provided objective findings to account for the right arm paralysis. Mr. Kerr has appealed his case to the review committee and to the appeal tribunal, resulting in a hearing at our offices on February 17, 1967. Subsequently, he was granted a hearing before the board on April 6, 1967. After consideration of his claim, throughout the appeal system, it has not been established his right arm paralysis arose out of or in the course of the employment on February 25, 1957.

Well, Mr. Kerr came to me with his story and I went into it in some detail. This is one case I am convinced is legitimate. And yet, apparently, we cannot appeal any more. We have gone through the whole appeal level and yet here is this man with a paralyzed arm, who, for the past 11 years has not been able to get any compenastion.

I have a letter here from a lawyer in Windsor, who set the details out of what actually happened and I want to read this into the record because in my opinion this is a flagrant case where doubts were resolved against the workman.

There is an affidavit here signed by the workman:

> After working for the Ford Motor Co. of Canada for 16 years, without any loss of time from my job due to illness, I sustained a slight bruise to my right elbow midway between the wrist and elbow. The skin was not broken and it healed completely in four days. This happened at the close of my work shift at 3:30 on February 25, 1957. The next day, after working at my job in a regular manner for about two hours, my foreman came along and inquired about the injury.

I told him that while it was swollen a little, it was not sore nor painful and it would be all right in a few days. He suggested to make sure that I go into the first-aid room for treatment and see what the doctor would suggest because this was the company rule.

And a very sensible company rule, let me interject.

Dr. Parker of the first-aid treated the bruise by plunging a needle into my right elbow and when he withdrew the needle my arm felt paralyzed. I have never been able to use it since.

Well now, to digress for a moment: Here is a case where a man has an injury at work, a minor injury, the doctor intending to help him, I am sure, put a needle into that bruise, intending to take out the blood clot and give relief. I am not suggesting the doctor did not do what he did with the best of intentions, but as a result of putting that needle in, he accidentally severed the nerve which applies the power to your lower arm. But, surely, this a direct result of that accident, and yet in spite of the clear-cut circumstances; in spite of the fact there was no other accident; in spite of the fact there is no medical evidence to indicate any disease that might have caused it, the compensation board turned down the case.

Now, I suggest to you that the compensation board turned down the case largely on the basis of the report that was put in by the doctor, Dr. Parker, who was involved in this accident in the first place. I can well understand Dr. Parker would be reluctant to send a letter saying, "Oh, gee, it is too bad, I happened to cut the man's nerve, he can't use his arm any more, you are going to have to pay him a pension for the rest of his life." The doctor might be a little hesitant to say that because he might have a little matter of a malpractice suit on his hands, it is possible. I am sure he was a little unhappy about the situation. I am sure he did not want the man's arm disabled, but it did occur, and the man has never been able to collect a penny for this.

Now, there is a lengthy deposition that has been made here by the man, by his lawyer, I will not take the time to read it all, but he did go down to the metropolitan clinic in Detroit, Michigan to get their opinion of what occurred. Their report is attached here and it reads: "Probable ulna nerve injury with marked anxiety reaction."

Well, we can understand the anxiety reaction. I would be a little anxious too if my arm had become paralyzed and I was not able to work for the rest of my life. But here they say "probable ulna nerve injury." This is from a first-grade clinic, an international clinic, and yet despite all this nothing apparently can be done. We seem to have reached a dead end.

So I say to the Minister through you, sir, 11 years late in the case of Charles Kerr, when a case of this type occurs, first of all I say to him for goodness sake, re-open this case, have another look, even though it has gone through all levels of the board, because I think if you look at the facts in this case you will agree with me that this man has been done a grave injustice and it is not too late to repair that particular injustice.

But even more important than Charles Kerr is that this is not a unique case. I suggest to the Minister that when there is a question of a case like this arising where the problem may have arisen from the treatment, and there are a number of other cases which I have presented to the board, of similar types of things occurring, perhaps you should have other medical opinions, not just as to what can be found but in what light it occurred, because it is understandable that the doctor may be somewhat less than frank.

Now, one other matter. Nursing care in the home. I have a gentleman by the name of Samchuk—I will not go into the details of his case—who had an injury. He subsequently was treated in hospital, subsequently was sent home where he required certain nursing care for which a nurse was brought in. There is nothing apparently in the Act which allows for payment of nursing care in the home. And I would suggest that this is an error; this is either an error or an omission, and this should be put in. There are certain cases where a man does not have to be in hospital; he is not that sick and yet he will require some home nursing care. I would suggest to the Minister that there should be an amendment or an addition put into the Act so that when the board agrees, and in this case I think the board does agree, that nursing care in the home can be paid for.

One other minor matter. If a man has an accident, goes off on compensation, receives his compensation, and goes back to work, and later, some time later, perhaps a year, two years, ten years later, his accident, that same accident begins to cause trouble again and he is forced to go off on compensation again, as the law now stands he will receive his compensation based on his previous earnings. Now, there are two ways of looking at it. If it is a permanent disability, it is figured on one basis; if it is a temporary total disability it is figured on another basis.

Let me say to the Minister—this is wrong. I think the board agrees this is wrong. I think the Minister will agree with me this is wrong. If a man suffers loss of time due to an accident, regardless of when that accident occurred, whether it was 20 years ago, or two days ago, his pay for his time off work should be based on his most recent earnings. Because over the years his earnings have gone up. All earnings have gone up, and that should apply whether it is total temporary, or whether it is total permanent, or whether it is a pension, because, after all, the fact that the man earned so much less 20 years ago is not going to help his responsibilities today. I am sure the Minister will agree with me this is a change that should be made.

I am going to finish off now with one final type of case, and I am specifically referring to the matter of silicosis. In fact there are two cases, I guess, I should refer to; I will not be able to get them both done today. Silicosis is covered in the Act very well; and when workmen develop silicosis and can prove it, they have no problem. But there is a related problem which is not covered, relating to workmen who develop silicotic-like conditions, due to the pollution of the air at work, but as the Act is worded, many of them can collect nothing. Now silicosis is not always caused by silica; or at least silicotic-like conditions are not always caused by silica.

Conditions which break down the lung, which prevent you breathing, which cause asthma, which cause emphysema, can be brought on by numerous other dusts or poisons. But if it is not silica itself, the workman is just out of luck. Now, there is a very outstanding case. A man by the name of Stepowski, and there will not be time to go into that today, but perhaps we will Monday.

But, just today, I want to mention to the Minister a case of Mr. B. Tepuric. Now I mentioned this case here in the House before; it has gone now through every level of appeal and has been turned down, probably quite properly as the Act is now drawn. I am not suggesting that the persons who heard the appeal did not behave with all consideration because they did. But as the Act is now drawn, they literally could not give this man his compensation. And yet, this is a man who worked at International Nickel. He worked for two years in the smelter where, I understand, there is a great deal of pollution, and then he moved to the refinery, where he worked for some ten years, gradually over those years, developing emphysema. Before he went to work for Inco his lungs were perfectly fine, no problems. X-rays taken back in 1948-49 show that his lungs were completely clear, yet he spent two years in the smelter, then these other years in the refinery, and gradually developed emphysema. And he came down to Toronto with a letter from his doctor in Sudbury, a pretty brave doctor let me say, who said this man had developed emphysema as a result of polluted air at his place of employment.

Well, we appealed this; I appealed it to the appeal tribunal; my wife appealed it at the board. Unfortunately, I had to be here in the House, and I could not appear in front of the board. The International Nickel Company brought in a great deal of high-priced talent to argue that the air at Inco is purer than anywhere else in the world, and that he could not possibly have developed this problem up there because they are pure, and if there was any pollution it certainly was not in the place where he worked for the past eight or nine years. He had not worked in the other place for all that time. He was only there two years anyway and therefore he should not receive any compensation. So he received no compensation. Well, I suggest to the Minister that the section on silicosis and the section on pollution of the air is going to become more and more common. This problem is going to become more and more common because we have not tackled the problem of air pollution in certain places, particularly places like Inco, where they clean the air out before the inspectors arrive—they get the blowers going.

So the government does not really know what is going on. I have figures here which were supplied to me by the union. They sneaked in machines to measure the level of pollution and it is so high that if we had it in here, none of us would come in here without a gasmask. And yet people cannot wear gasmasks all day long at their employment, and so many of these people develop complications—so it is pretty hard; they cannot collect on the emphysema. Yet as we read the Act, it says—they can collect only if—"This is a problem that is peculiar to the industry and common to the industry."

But how can you prove it is peculiar or common to the industry. Sure we know that workers at Inco and workers in Sudbury get a higher level of emphysema, but this is not enough to get them the compensation and International Nickel will fight to the death, any chance to give one workman this type of compensation, because if we win it for one, suddenly they are going to have dozens, perhaps hundreds, pleading for this type of compensation. And so they fight very, very strongly, very successfully and very inhumanely, because this man, I am convinced, developed his problems from breathing polluted air at the International Nickel Company. Yet we cannot get any compensation for him as the Act is now drawn.

I would like to suggest to the Minister, through you, sir, that this portion of the Act should be redrawn so that any type of lung or body disablement that occurs, as a result of breathing polluted air at work should be covered and the workmen should receive compensation.

I have a few other matters to go on to, sir, but the next one is rather lengthy, and noting the hour I would suggest we adjourn the debate.

Mr. Shulman moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. White: May I just take one minute here? Thanks very much to the member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) for leaving time for the rest of us. Really, this display of selfishness is more than I can tolerate.

Mr. Shulman: I offered to yield the floor to the hon. member an hour ago.

Mr. White: I want to make three points very quickly here, and they are all important.

It is unreasonable to ask injured workmen from western Ontario to come down to an office in Toronto on minor administrative matters and there should be an office in western Ontario.

Point two—

Mr. Speaker: The member for Windsor West has a point of order.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, is it not the case that you have a motion before you to adjourn the debate?

Mr. White: No, he does not.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Windsor West is quite correct, the motion had been put to adjourn.

Mr. White: Who put the motion?

Mr. Speaker: The motion had carried.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 2:00 of the clock, p.m.

APPENDIX A

(See page 6022)

Answers to questions on the order paper were tabled as follows:

39. Mr. Ferrier—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) Is the Ontario Northland Railway seeking to cancel passenger service on the Nipissing Central Railway from Swastika to Noranda; (b) if so, why?

Answer by the Minister of Energy and Resources Management:

(a) Ontario northland commission have made no final decision on this matter.

59. Mr. Nixon—Enquiry of the Ministry—What government departments, other than The Department of Lands and Forests, make use of the temporary help services industry described in the Globe and Mail as "slave market labour"?

Answer by the Prime Minister:

In connection with the instance mentioned in the May 23, 1968, Globe and Mail article, The Department of Public Works called for estimates from a register of approved moving contractors, established by the Toronto Cartage Association (movers' division). The lowest estimate was accepted, final payment to be based on the actual number of hours taken to complete the work by the various categories of workmen involved. The hourly rates to be paid were in accordance with the requirements of the Metro licensing commission, at rates set out under bylaw 67, tariff A.

The following departments have used the services of commercial agencies during peak periods: Highways; Labour; Public Works; Provincial Secretary; Trade and Development; Tourism and Information.

61. Mr. Reid (Scarborough East)—Enquiry of the Ministry—1. (a) How many superannuated Ontario teachers receive $1,500 or less a year from the provincial government's teachers' superannuation fund and the Canada pension plan; (b) how many receive between $1,501 and $2,000; (c) how many receive between $2,001 and $2,500; (d) how many receive between $2,501 and $3,000; and (e) how many receive more than $3,000? 2. What is the average age of superannuated Ontario teachers in each of the pension benefit classes noted in Question No. 1 above, that is (a) $1,500 or less; (b) $1,501 to $2,000; (c) $2,001 to $2,500; (d) $2,501 to $3,000; and (e) more than $3,000? 3. (a) What would have been the increased outflow of funds from the Ontario teachers' superannuation fund in 1967, if the minimum pension benefit had been $2,000 instead of $1,200; (b) how many superannuated teachers would have been affected; (c) what was the average age of such teachers (in 1967); (d) how many of these teachers retired at age 62; and (e) how many were women? 4. (a) What would have been the increased outflow of funds from the Ontario teachers' superannuation fund in 1967, if the January 1, 1966 amendment to The Teachers' Superannuation Act, whereby teachers' pensions were henceforth calculated on the basis of the best seven years of salary had also applied to teachers already on pension; and (b) what is the policy of the governments of British Columbia and Saskatchewan with regard to the inclusion of additional pension benefits to teachers already retired at the time of amendment?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

1. (a) Number of teachers receiving $1,500 or less—2469.

(b) Number of teachers receiving $1,501 to $2,000—1132.

(c) Number of teachers receiving $2,001 to $2,500—935.

(d) Number of teachers receiving $2,501 to $3,000—825.

(e) Number of teachers receiving over $3,000—3258.

2. (a) Average age of teachers receiving $1,500 or less—73.5.

(b) Average age of teachers receiving $1,501 to $2,000—71.0.

(c) Average age of teachers receiving $2,001 to $2,500—69.8.

(d) Average age of teachers receiving $2,501 to $3,000—70.6.

(e) Average age of teachers receiving over $3,000—67.7.

3. (a) Increased outflow if $2,000 was the minimum, instead of $1,200—$1,634,076.47.

(b) Number of pensioners affected—2948.

(c) Average age of those affected—71.8.

(d) Number retired at age 62—279.

(e) Number of women—2774.

4. (a) The increased outflow of funds from the Ontario teachers' superannuation fund in 1967, if the January 1, 1966 amendment to The Teachers' Superannuation Act, whereby teachers' pensions were henceforth calculated on the basis of the best seven years of salary, had also applied to teachers already on pension, would be $1,530,000 a year, or a capitalized value estimated at $16,300,000.

(b) Teachers' superannuation plans differ among the provinces and are not directly comparable. While there have been a variety of changes made to the plans there is no information concerning any announced policy on the part of the provinces mentioned.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, JULY 22, 1968

The House met at 10.00 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: We are to have with us sometime this morning a group in the west gallery from Whitby psychiatric hospital. I am sure that we welcome them if they are here, and if they come later they will be welcome when they arrive.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the annual report of The Department of Education for the year ending December 31, 1967.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I have three questions remaining of the Ministry. The Cabinet Ministers are not in the House at the moment, but if you would permit me.

One in particular has been pending since last Thursday. It might be possible for me to put them on the record and then for the hon. Ministers to reply when it is convenient, sometime later, just in the event that the House might perhaps reach adjournment today. Would you give me your comment on that, sir?

Mr. Speaker: I would think that it would be a very sound procedure, and that it could be followed by the other members who have questions. Then the question period will be cleaned up so far as is possible within the rules of the House.

Mr. Nixon: Thank you.

The first is for the Minister of University Affairs (Mr. Davis). Under item 23(c) of The Department of University Affairs, application for student awards; why is it no longer possible for a student previously enrolled at an Ontario university, who had a fulltime job for 12 months prior to such enrollment, to continue to receive student awards under the age of 21?

Under item 32 to 35 of the same application form; why must a student under 21, not living at home and in no way supported by a parent, parents or legal guardian, request such persons to fill in these items?

Is the Minister prepared to review the applications of Miss Olivia Manister of Toronto, and Miss Helen Wainwright, of Toronto, who are not receiving assistance from a parent, but are under the age of 21 and already enrolled in York University?

The second question is for the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis). Will the Minister make a statement on the resignation of Mr. T. N. Carter, and Mr. R. D. Armstrong of the board of governors at Ryerson polytechnical institute?

What is the reason for delay in the expansion programme at Ryerson polytechnical institute?

Finally, a question for the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough). Will the Minister extend the July 24 time limit for submissions from the Lakehead municipalities on the Hardy report for the duration of the postal strike?

Mr. Speaker: There will be some other Ministries whose Ministers are not present this morning.

The member for Cochrane South has a question.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): My question is for the Minister of Energy and Resources Management (Mr. Simonett).

Is Ontario Hydro using rainmakers in northeastern Ontario that are contributing to the abnormal amount of rain in that part of the province?

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, as my Minister is not here, perhaps I will bring this matter up under the Budget debate.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): There was a question dated July 19 by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman). Has that been put on the record?

Mr. Speaker: I have one dated July 19 by the member for Peterborough of the Minister of Education and University Affairs, and another of the same date, neither of which, so far as I know, have been put on the record.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps I might do so. These should be on the record on behalf of the hon. member from Peterborough.

The first one was: What steps will the Minister take to see that final approval is given immediately to the Innis College building plan, to prevent the phasing out of Innis within four years by not accepting new students, as is proposed by the college council as reported in the Toronto Daily Star July 18, unless approval for the new building is given?

And the second question to the Minister of Education and University Affairs by the hon. member for Peterborough—will any information on teachers in the hands of The Department of Education such as inspectors' reports, OCE standing, and so on, be released to the Metro Toronto school board central data bank?

Mr. Speaker: The member for Yorkview has a question.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Education and University Affairs.

Has the Minister given consideration to making provincial financial assistance available to York University in order that York might move quickly to build its school of public administration? If so, what action is contemplated?

Mr. Speaker: The member for Lakeshore likewise has a question.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Minister of Education and University Affairs. Is it correct that the director, R. A. Mackay, the director of physical planning, George Wildish, furniture co-ordinator, Lionel Socberin, and an architect, Mrs. Lily Steen, all on the permanent staff of Ryerson, were all dismissed without notice? If so, what was the reason for the dismissals?

Mr. Speaker: I have, among my unasked questions, one from the member for York South for the Minister of Social and Family Welfare from July 15. Does he wish to look at it?

Hon. J. Yaremko (Minister of Social and Family Services): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to both accept and answer the question.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would hate to have the Minister outdo himself this morning. The question was: Will the Minister introduce legislation immediately which will enable blind or disabled persons in receipt of old age security to receive additional moneys under the family benefits Acts to bring their monthly income in line with blind or disabled persons who do not receive a pension under The Old Age Security Act?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Speaker, no legislation in this regard is being considered at this time. Municipalities are presently permitted to provide additional assistance to the recipients of old age security when necessary. This assistance is shareable with the province.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the question to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, I would like to give the answer to that on behalf of the Minister. It is: Time will be extended until three days after the postal strike.

Mr. Speaker: As the leader of the Opposition has said, there may not be an opportunity for similar remarks, comments, and questions this session. I would like to read, as I have done in the past, for the information of the members and so that it may be on the record, the names of the many friendly young men who have served us as pages since June 26, when the House reconvened. They are: Fred Cass, Belleville; Richard Deacon, Unionville; Lorne Derraugh, Etobicoke; Larry Gideon, West Hill; Paul Gilmour, Toronto; Blair Gohl, Willowdale; Russell Green, Downsview; Paul Hammond, Oakville; Peter Jong, Toronto; Larry Kerr, Burlington; Teddy Kogler, Toronto; William Lochead, Forest; Simon MacDowall, Willowdale; David McClurg, Port Credit; Larry Molloy, Downsview; Gerald Papiernik, Toronto; Barnaby Ross, Toronto; Anthony Roy, Toronto; Jeffrey Seidman, Downsview; Mark Stokes, Schreiber; Douglas Thiers, Port Credit; David West, Willowdale; and David Wheeler, Clarkson.

As the members will note, the boys who have served us come from all parts of Ontario, and it is my hope that when the House reconvenes in another session, we may likewise have representation from the various parts of Ontario. I have already asked for and received the co-operation of the members to this end. While I am on my feet, and with the members' permission, I would like to express, not only to the House leader, and the leader of the official Opposition, and the leader of the New Democratic Party, but to all the members, my utmost appreciation for the courtesy with which a new Speaker was greeted, and the manner in which, from time to time at least, the business of the House has been expeditiously dealt with and on other occasions. I think we all enjoyed it together, and a great deal was accomplished. A great many matters of foremost concern in the minds of both the members, and their constituents, have been discussed in this House, which is one of its most important purposes. I say to each member, individually, a hearty thanks for courtesy, co-operation, and assistance in the work of the House, particularly during these gruelling hot times that we have had in the last weeks.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, as you pointed out, this could be the last day of the session, and I would think on behalf of the members of the House, who have not only enjoyed the session, but who have learned a great deal, under your guidance, we would like to express a sincere word of appreciation for not only the courtesies that you have extended to us, but for your tolerance and your understanding.

Mr. Nixon: It may be just a bit too early really for these expressions, but I want to join with the House leader certainly in extending our congratulations to you, sir, and our thanks, not only for your work here, but for your hospitality and good spirit on many occasions.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members on many occasions at the beginning of their Throne and Budget debates have expressed their appreciation. We have had our moments of difference and undoubtedly we will have them again but that is all part of the political game. I would like to join with others in wishing you well for the future as you have battled it out in the past.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The third order, resuming the adjourned debate on consideration of the report of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, you will be delighted to hear I am almost through.

To conclude, I wish to refer to one case as an example of the difficulties that individuals can run into under the Act as it now stands in reference to silicosis. I was referring to the problem of individuals who develop lung trouble as a result of polluted air at their environment, when we last met. I have a case here which outlines not only that, but a number of the other problems. It is typical of a clear-cut case where medical experts recognize that the man's lungs have been destroyed by an occupational disease where a medical certificate is supplied stating that this is definitely the result of an occupational disease where the history is clear-cut. Yet, the workman cannot collect a penny for the simple reason that the Act, as it is now drawn up, does not cover this type of problem, except if silica itself is involved.

Mr. Speaker, I am a little disturbed that the Minister is not in the House, because most of these remarks are really intended for him. It would be difficult for him to answer questions on this matter if he is not here to know what is going on. However, the case I am referring to is that of a Mr. Joseph Stepowsky, claim number 639,5634. I have a certificate here from his physician which sums the problem up very simply.

It is rather brief, so I would like to read the pertinent portions of this. This is a certificate signed by Doctor Ziegler, his family doctor:

> Mr. Joseph Stepowski came to my office last year on February 26 because of feeling very weak and short of breath. Because of this, he was unable to perform his work. My examination of this man at that time was very thorough and my findings at that time were as follows.

I will not go into the details here, but the physical examination is essentially negative, with the exception of finding some cough and some infection in his chest. He goes on:

> I prescribed penicillin capsules three times daily. I am Mr. Stepowsky's personal and family physician and have been for the past nine years and at no time has he ever been allergic to penicillin.
> The next day he called me at my home stating that he felt worse and in the morning had some rash over his body. I stopped the penicillin and the rash subsided. I then prescribed an antibiotic, watching him very closely. When he did not report that he felt better, I told him to remain in bed and wait for the results of bed rest. On March 8 I sent him for x-rays to Doctor Boron at 272 Roncesvalles Avenue. The x-rays showed extensive bilateral infiltration of the lungs. Bronchial vascular markings [these were the markings on the chest] were dense and diffused. Fibrotic change was present throughout the small islands of dense fibrosis. These changes were thought to be the result of occupational hazards in the absence of this chronic pulmonary fibrosis.

A suggestion was made of a cavity in the upper left lung field and these doctors advised me a test for TB should be made. Following their suggestion, I sent my patient to the Gage institute on March 17. An x-ray of the lungs showed extensive infiltration through both lungs. The tuberculin test for tuberculosis was negative. Two days later his condition suddenly deteriorated. He developed blood in the urine, a heavy puffed face, and his urine became filled with protein and infection.

I rushed him to St. Joseph's hospital for admission.

It then gives the results of what occurred in the hospital. I will not take the time of the House by reading that except for one line:

There was an extensive investigation for almost every possible disease, all with negative results. Four tests of liver function showed high abnormal values.

In the hospital chart there is mention that his abnormal liver test was due to congestion in the lungs, and he goes on to these other tests.

On May 28 he was discharged from hospital and went home. He was put in my care again and came regularly to see me every week for nine months. I asked him what kind of work he was doing for the John Inglis Company and he told me he was doing special work, having been given a big piece of high quality steel for polishing.

I asked him how he was doing it and if there was grinding. He told me he was using some special treatment of polishing the surface of the metal, treating it with some red liquid time and again every twenty minutes, and then spraying the surface from a container with a rubber atomizer. He was doing this work for a period of two weeks.

As mentioned in the hospital chart, since beginning that work, he began to feel weak and tired and his condition slowly deteriorated until February 25 when he quit working because he was very sick. His disclosure about the type of work led me to a positive opinion about his condition. I have made further inquiries and this last-mentioned work was treatment of metal for detecting cracks in the metal. The material used contained water fluoristan, with powder containing mercury, nickel and probably molybdenum. I asked him if he knew the name of the company producing this product for detecting cracks in metals and he said he was not interested in this and could not tell me; he just did what he was told at John Inglis. It took nine months of investigation on my part to find this method of detecting cracks in metal which is probably the newest one. He was doing this work for two weeks in December before taking ill.

I remember exactly when he first came to me complaining of shortness of breath. He told me he felt there was something in his lungs which he could not expectorate, and asked me at that time to give him some medicine for it, in an effort to get it out of his lungs. When I asked my patient why he did not disclose having done this last-mentioned type of work to the doctors in the hospital and to myself, he told me that he had been forbidden to tell anyone of this special work. He thought he was just polishing metal the same as he had been doing for the past 11 years.

On the grounds of the above findings, I am positive that his condition was precipitated by inhaling salts of heavy metal in his lungs and it caused this condition.

Now, together with this salt injury to his lungs and the damage to the kidneys, it is quite understandable that all of this occurred from these metals and that the abnormal tests of liver functions were also due to metal poisoning. Unfortunately, we did not realize what the trouble was at first and so we did not make a metal count of his urine.

About three weeks ago I got positive information about this method of testing metal and in conjunction with this I sent his urine to the department of industry and hygiene and spoke with the chief of this department. He told me there is very little hope of detecting the metal after one year. In spite of this, there is the fact that his urine today contains nickel, and one litre contained mercury of .006 milligrams. As he never worked with nickel or mercury products before in his life, and he had never been treated for any disease that would require this type of heavy metal, this abnormal amount of nickel and mercury in his urine is positive proof of metal poisoning.

It goes on at some length and I shall not go into that because that is the sum of it. Here is a man who was doing his work of polishing at John Inglis; a new method of detecting cracks by using this solution was found and he quite innocently used the solution. There is no question in my mind—there is no question in his doctor's mind—there is the proof of finding the metal in the urine one year later, that he was poisoned by mercury and nickel, and yet what is the situation when his doctor applies for compensation? Compensation is turned down. I got in touch with the compensation board to find out why this had occurred, and I received this letter back from the compensation board and it sums it up very, very well. It is called "Status Report—Joseph Stepowsky."

Mr. Stepowski has been employed by the John Inglis Co. of Toronto since 1951, performing various jobs, including intermittent grinding. He filed a claim in April, 1965, for silicosis.

May I say the reason the claim was filed for silicosis is this is the only way under the Act that a claim can be filed for this type of poisoning.

The workman was under medical care and admitted to St. Joseph's hospital on March 24, 1965. The medical information disclosed that Mr. Stepowski had a nephrotic syndrome, the cause of which was not clear. The Department of Health industrial hygiene branch reports on June 29, 1965: "There is no indication of silica exposure to Mr. Stepowski at the John Inglis Co."

I might interject that this seems quite reasonable inasmuch as there is no silica at John Inglis Co.

"He was exposed to a mixture of iron and abrasive dust that might have averaged as high as 20 m.p.p.c.f. for 11 years. This, however, could not cause silicosis."

If I might interject again, that was not a very brilliant conclusion.

Mr. Stepowski was examined by the silicosis referee board and their report of August 27, 1965, reads:

"Silicosis, according to the Act, is not present. There is no proven significant silica exposure in Ontario. Nor is there proven exposure to other hazardous inhalants in this province.

"Re-examination does not seem indicated."

The claim was rejected and the workman was advised on September 3, 1965, and informed of his right of appeal. The workman appealed the decision and the claim was referred to the review committee, who confirmed the rejection and denied the appeal. The review committee decision was appealed and a hearing before the appeal tribunal scheduled for May 2, 1968 at 8.30 a.m. And I have here the letter received on June 7 from the appeal tribunal:

Appeal tribunal orders claim for disablement arising out and in the course of employment be denied.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, we have a situation here where there is really no doubt at all that this man was poisoned at work. His lungs have been partially destroyed, his kidneys have been over 50 per cent destroyed, his liver is over 50 per cent destroyed. He will never work again—there is no question of that.

His life expectancy is very dubious at the present time. I should think that before too many years have passed we are going to have a widow who is not going to be able to receive a penny. And I say to you—and through you to the Minister—that this is a very unjust situation. And it is because of the peculiar way that this Act is drawn up that the board—and let me say again that I think the people on the board acted with good-will, they did not want to see this man rejected—but because of the way your Act is drawn up, the only way he can receive any benefits, any compensation, is if somehow it can be proven he has silica.

Of course, there is no silica, so how can you prove he has silica? The only other phrase under the Act which would allow him to receive compensation is a paragraph in the Act which states: "If this particular type of poisoning was common or peculiar to the industry." Well, of course, it was not common and it was not peculiar to the industry because he was the only one who was trying out this new process.

So in this particular case, again through you, sir, to the Minister, I ask him to intervene even if it does not come under the Act because surely this man should receive compensation. And more important than this one individual, I ask the Minister, please, change this section of the Act.

We must take the responsibility—in this province of opportunity. We should not weasel out. What we have done, really, is to weasel out of our obligations to a man whose life has been ruined because of an accident at work.

Well now, that finishes up the 20 different types of problems which arise under The Compensation Act. There is only one other comment I would like to make and it is in reference to a letter which is in today's Globe and Mail. It was written by one "Dalton Bales, Minister of The Department of Labour." I think this letter requires some little comment. I am quoting out of the letter, and it is referring to an editorial written by the Globe and Mail on July 15. It begins with some comments as to why only 75 per cent of wages are paid. This is a reasonable comment. Then it goes on:

> It is true, as you say, that the new legislation provides no increase in pensions to those disabled prior to August 1st of this year. But it must be remembered that a special study by the board showed that 91 per cent of the men and women who pass through the WCB rehabilitation service not only are placed in employment, with earnings averaging $91.87 a week, compared to a pre-accident average of $99.65, but they also have their WCB partial disability pensions too. To say that the only decent legislation would establish a single liveable pension for all ignores many factors of our mixed free enterprise and social welfare state.
> For example accident victims who partially recover but cannot return to their previous work are entitled to unemployment insurance in addition to benefits they receive from the WCB. Also worthy of note is the fact that, despite the fact that most of us would like to see all citizens enjoy the benefits of an affluent society, it must be borne in mind that we are not so affluent as many would have us believe.
> With this in mind it is necessary, when considering increases of workmen's compensation benefits, to keep in mind the financial impact on industry. Business and industry pay the entire costs of the operation of the workmen's compensation board in Ontario, and since they have to compete with industry throughout the world, the government must be careful about burdens it places upon them.
> Believe me, as the responsible Minister, I would like to see larger pensions. But all the facts were considered, not only by the government, but also by a Royal commission. This was not deemed possible this year. However, we are not doing badly considering our present resources and the ability and proclivity of the average citizen to pay taxes, the new improvements in workmen's compensation make Ontario a leader in this field in Canada.
> Signed, Dalton Bales, Minister, Department of Labour.

Well there are two or three things in this letter that upset me, Mr. Speaker. First of all it is quite true that 91 per cent of the workers who are injured received fair treatment and get reasonable wages afterwards.

Actually, I would have thought it would be a higher percentage than that, but what about the other nine per cent? This is really what I have been talking about for this past number of hours—the other nine per cent. If it is less than the other nine per cent, what about the other one per cent, or the other two per cent? Because we should design our system of workmen's compensation so that every person who is injured at work receives adequate compensation for his injury. Or if that person is killed at work, so that his widow and his family or his crippled sister —if I can refer to that case again—receives adequate compensation.

To come in here and say that 91 per cent of the workers receive adequate compensation or 99.9 per cent just is not good enough. We should expect that the Minister would get up and say: "I will not be satisfied until every workman who is injured in this province receives adequate compensation."

Now to go on, as the Minister does in this letter, and plead poverty, which is what he is doing, is really almost ludicrous. True, we are perhaps not as affluent as we would like, but what disturbs me is the system of priorities that this government holds, when we can give $1.5 million to breeders to improve the breed, when we can come in here, and without a word of discussion, raise the members' pay for off-duty work from $30 to $50 a day, as was done last week. Surely, these should rank far behind the need of those workers who are injured at work, unfortunately before August 1 of this year. We came in here—was it only two days ago—and had the Minister and Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) get up and give us a tremendous pension plan. After five years we (members of the Legislature) get the best pension plan that anyone gets in the whole world. Three-quarters of what we pay in, we receive annually. It is great. It is wonderful. It is nice to have. But surely this should rank far behind these other things which are so essential. And so I say through you, sir, to the Minister, that this Minister and this government system of priorities, is wrong.

Those who need it should receive first, and I think those who need it primarily to be widows and the families of those who have been killed at work. The workers who are on a pension, regardless of when the accident occurred. What difference does that make? They still have to live on this sum of money, and to offer unemployment insurance as the Minister does here is inadequate.

Sure it is a temporary stop-gap, but unemployment insurance unfortunately runs out, and someone who is injured at work should not have to look for unemployment insurance. He should not have to look to welfare. He should receive adequate pay in order maintain his family at the same standard of living as he was earning before, or reasonably close to it, during the period that he is disabled. If it is a permanent disability, for the rest of his life, and for sufficient time after that to look after his children, until they reach an age where they are able to earn a living themselves.

So I am going to stop now, Mr. Speaker. I am sure there are many others who wish to contribute to this debate, but in one final sentence I just wish to say through you, sir, to the Minister, The Workmen's Compensation Act, as we have it now in Ontario, is not adequate. Do not compare it to other provinces than Ontario which have a less adequate Act. Compare it to jurisdictions in the United States who have moved ahead of us in all these fields. Really this letter of the Minister summed the problem up very well, when he says, "Business and industry pay the entire cost of the operation of the workmen's compensation board in Ontario, and since they have to compete with industries throughout the world the government must be careful of the burdens it places upon them."

Exactly that is what the problem is, therefore, if you feel you cannot put a greater burden on these particular industries, it is the duty of government to inject whatever added monies are needed to pay these pensions, to pay the workers from the public funds. There is no holy law that says the funds all have to come from industry. If you have to change the law, for goodness sake do so, because The Workmen's Compensation Act requires a complete overhaul and this last Royal commission report which was brought in, does not even scratch the surface of the needs. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, I have four questions or comments; they centre around the four amputees at the Kelsey-Hayes wheel plant in Windsor.

The first point has to do with the prosthetic hands or limbs, and I am wondering whether it is the policy now to provide these? If so, should this not be a retroactive policy?

The second point has to do with the method of awarding a pension, which was used some 20 to 25 years ago. One of the men had the loss of his hand, during a year in which he had worked for only six months as a result of a lay-off because of lack of orders. Now if this man had lost his hand the previous year, or in the following year, his award would have been substantially greater, but because it happened in that period, apparently it was a minimal award and I question, of course, the justice of this.

The third point has to do with the differences in awards. According to my notes, in an award made in 1943 the man is receiving $56.25 a month. Two awards made in 1954 are for $82 and $72, and one made in 1956 for $66.50. I understand that the award that would be made at the present time, if a man lost his hand, would be in the neighbourhood of $175.

Now when other pensions are awarded, the old age pensions, army pensions and other pensions of that kind, adjustments are made to allow for inflation. As far as I understand this, these awards that have been made 15 to 25 years ago still are far below the rate that would be awarded today and I should like the Minister's comments on the accuracy, if my information is not accurate, or on the justice of this.

My final point has to do with the full philosophy of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario. I am wondering whether the Minister has considered the removal of the adversity aspect from the whole method of awards? As has been pointed out fairly clearly, the company has a vested interest in the award, and quite often on the other hand, is anxious, from a profit point of view, that the awards be small. On the other hand, the company has no responsibility frequently, for causing the accidents, some of which could not possibly be anticipated, and the company frequently, especially a small one, may suffer considerable financial loss. That is what I mean by the adversity aspect of the cases. I am wondering if the Minister has given some thought to stabilization of the rates, and, as has been suggested, perhaps some measure of subsidization, as I believe is done in other countries.

Those are the four points on which I should like the Minister to comment when he reaches that point in his reply.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on a couple of points. I think that most of my remarks pertaining to the bill that passed, would be relevant to this debate today, and that is already on record. There were a couple of points that were not discussed during that period of time.

One that creates a great deal of hardship on the employees in the plants, is the question of temporary partial disability. I mention that in respect to the area where the pension is reduced because the employee is suitable for light work. I think that the basic principle of compensation—at least as I understand it—is that the injured employee be compensated for the loss of earnings resulting from the injury. This is the basic principle.

One of the sections—I think that it is 41—relates that philosophy. But, I think that there has been a serious deviation from that principle, inasmuch as the compenastion is not related to the loss of earnings, rather it is related to the degree of disability. This is where the application of the act departs really from the principle. I think that this creates a great hardship on those employees. When they are okayed, or it is indicated that they are capable of light work, and their employer says that there are no jobs that would fit the man's capabilities, then the employee is having to maintain some form of standard of living in relation to the amount of the compensation. I think this is one area that this government has to come to grips with. In my opinion, it is time that the principle of compensation be put back in its proper context, not the question of degree of disability.

The hon. member for High Park did mention the fellow on permanent disability, who had his level of compensation determined at the time he was disabled. We now find that this pension is well out of line with today's cost of living, and benefits. I think it is time that the government made sure that the pension was realistically related to today's cost of living. They certainly would not be blazing any new trail in the matter.

In British Columbia, the consumer price index comes into play, and this is adjusted annually so that the permanent disability pension is kept in line with the cost of living, if not the wage increases. This would be a step in the right direction for this government.

To illustrate this, an employee who received $100 in 1956, would not have, in effect, $100 today, as far as its purchasing power, but only $80. He has fallen behind in relation to the cost of living. Also, as the pensions do not increase with the living costs, then there is a steady decline in the money paid by the employers. This area needs some attention, especially in relation to the question of reduction of the purchasing power of a pension due to the steady increase in the cost of living.

The last point is an all out fight for relief, against red tape and delay. I said earlier that this is one of the areas that many of the union centres which are handling compensation for their members find to be an area of great difficulty. There are numerous forms to be filled out. The doctor gets one, the employer gets one, the employee has one, and then there has to be a co-ordination of all these forms coming in before compensation is paid. We find, in many cases, great lengthy delays in terms of the employees receiving their compensation benefit.

Many of the employees in this province are not in a position to acquire any resources in terms of bank rolls, we might say, and they are living from day to day. If there is any lengthy delay in their compensation payments, they find themselves in a rather precarious position in meeting their daily costs, their daily requirements for living. In addition to that, most of them nowadays have acquired some debts. They buy an automobile and most of them have them on time payments. Let us face it, they are not able to pay with cash and the other household items that they need.

So there are payments they have to make out of the meagre resources that they have at their disposal. If there is a lag and delay then they are not able to meet their obligations which, very frankly, they had been meeting, the majority, prior to the injury.

What needs to be done in that regard is that there needs to be an all out drive against this whole question of red tape and delay. I think that if we could eliminate to a great degree the question of delay we would have made the compensation a greater service to the workers in this province.

Those are the three points that I raise during this debate and I think they are three points which are critical and need attention now.

Mr. Speaker: The member for London South.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Speaker, we are told, and I am prepared to believe, that we have got a workmen's compensation plan that is as good or better than that of any other jurisdiction. That being the case, it is a source of continuing astonishment to me that we do not remedy several very obvious weaknesses.

I have dealt with one or two of these matters in previous years and, in fact, I thought I wrested agreement from the senior officers of the board and of the Minister responsible, the predecessor of the present Minister of Labour.

First of all, it is unreasonable and unjust to require an injured workman to come to Toronto to deal with a minor administrative matter. I reiterate my request that there be a regional office in western Ontario. London would be a good site, but it does not have to be London. That is not my prime concern.

Point number two. It is unwise and inconvenient to locate all of the physiotherapy and testing facilities for the board here in the city of Toronto. Very often, a workman will have to come here for treatments which last weeks and yes, even months, sometimes five or six months. To have a man from southwestern Ontario located in Toronto for that extended period of time, I think, is a foolish way to do it.

This could be remedied by having a series of small facilities across the province. I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Bales) is listening when I say that there are surplus hospital facilities available in London at Westminster hospital.

I hope the board will enter into discussions with Westminster hospital to see how these empty beds might be utilized to benefit the people in this province.

I think Westminster hospital is at least one-third empty and to have those beds empty while there is a need for additional hospital capacity really seems to be very poor planning indeed.

The third, and probably most important point of all in my view, has to do with the appeal procedures. I was one of the many members who thought that the previous appeal procedures were inadequate. I think the point of view which many of us expressed in this chamber brought about an improvement to the present appeal system with its several stages.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will never be satisfied until there is an external stage in these appeal proceedings because one has the suspicion, as one deals with some of these difficult and perplexing cases over an extended period of time—sometimes years, believe it or not; sometimes for years we try to get justice, as we see it, for a workman. I will never be satisfied as long as all of the appeals are within the board because surely there is an unconscious and even unwilling bias introduced, whereby senior officers subconsciously are motivated to support decisions made earlier by their subordinates who they may know and who they may know well in some cases, who are business associates and perhaps even social friends.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the workmen in this province, certain labour leaders, including some in London, myself and, I expect, most of my colleagues here in the chamber, would urge the Minister of Labour to ensure that an external stage is introduced in the very near future.

I am not talking about expensive and cumbersome court proceedings. What I am talking about is a form of ombudsman. A person, a referee, not an employee of the board, with sufficient resources that he can call upon medical specialists and lawyers, if necessary; specialists of whatever kind to explore the details of a workman's claim and to bring justice in these individual cases.

If, as and when that is done, I think we will have a very good system. Until we do so, it will not be satisfactory to me and, I think, to a great many people interested in this area of government.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Mr. Speaker, I would heartily concur in the remarks just made by the member for London South.

Many of the things that concern me about compensation have already been brought up, but there is one problem that specifically concerns my area. This is the problem of compensation as it relates to miners and specifically, to the relation of silicosis in miners.

Silicosis is a very difficult thing to detect medically, I gather. I have taken cases in which one doctor says a man has silicosis, and the board will bring about three or four to say he has not. You are against the numbers game as far as the doctors are concerned.

But if you live in a mining community, especially a gold mining community, you see the number of men in their late 50's or 60's, who are broken in health with severe chest conditions, who can hardly climb one flight of stairs without having to stop halfway up; an abnormal number of men have these.

They go to get their x-rays and it is anything but silicosis. It might be emphysema and a number of other things.

These men, before they could get into the mining field have had to pass tests to say that they are in good health and have x-rays to show that they have a good set of lungs, that they are really a picked set of men. Yet as they go on in life and work in this kind of industry, their lungs develop all these kinds of conditions. Usually the air in the mining communities themselves, at least up in northeastern Ontario with the exception of Sudbury, is very good air. The pollution that they breath is definitely in the mines underground where they are subjected to this silica dust.

I had the feeling that unless you can get absolute medical proof, unfailing proof, you do not have much of a chance. The board will always throw back to you: "Well, it is not silicosis according to the Act." You have to have silicosis to the degree that a man is disabled and he cannot adequately work; it is a great impairment to him.

My feeling is that the legislation should be greatly broadened to include all chest conditions of miners who have worked a certain number of years in this dust-exposure industry and whose chest conditions have developed in the course of their employment. I take exception to these compensation people in Toronto who say: "Well, these kind of chest conditions develop in everybody"; because my experience has been that there are a great many more of these chest conditions in the miners, especially in gold mining.

I am very interested in the announcement by the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) that there is money being set aside this year to do research into this ailment and I suspect there will be something develop. I certainly hope so because miners are disabled; they are finished and you cannot get anything from the compensation board. So what do they do? They have to go on welfare.

I think another thing that needs to be looked at is the use of this aluminum dust in mines. It is put into the dry and the miners are supposed to breathe this in and coat their lungs. It is supposed to act as a prophylactic agent. Most of the miners I know feel that this does more harm than good.

I would urge this Minister to try to introduce legislation that would make not only silicosis, but also other lung-crippling ailments that have developed as men have worked in the mines, to be compensable and to see that the great number of miners in the various mining communities of this province have a greater degree of justice done to them.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks made by one of the previous speakers from the New Democratic Party with reference to the adversary system. At the present time, I do not believe that the system, employed by the workmen's compensation board of Ontario, either is, or is not, adversary. The workmen's compensation board denied that they do have an adversary system, and last year the members of the NDP—I believe it was the hon. member for Riverdale —said they would hate to see an adversary system come into being. On the other hand, when you consider that you have what are referred to as workmen's compensation board doctors, I think you do have an adversary system, because the doctors make reports to the workmen's compensation board and they are engaged and paid by the workmen's compensation board, so to that degree I suggest there is an adversary system.

My suggestion was that we do away with workmen's compensation board doctors and that we have the Ontario Medical Association or the College of Physicians and Surgeons set up a pool of qualified doctors who would examine and report on all workmen's compensation board claimants. These doctors would be paid by the Ontario Medical Association or the College of Physicians and Surgeons, whoever operated the pool, and the association then in turn would bill the workmen's compensation board. They could have a battery of doctors go over the patients, and I think if this was the case, if you had a very modern clinic set up in Toronto to carry out the tests that the hon. member for High Park was recommending—for instance the metal contents of the urine, if they gave thorough tests—and then the workmen's compensation board were to base their decisions on these unbiased reports, I think we would have a little more justice.

Also, as far as the adversary system is concerned, I think perhaps there is some room in the chain of appeal for the so-called adversary system. Perhaps this could be the final board of appeal, where if the pool is not set up with these doctors, lawyers could be brought in to give the workmen's compensation board doctors a thorough cross-examination to determine just how thoroughly they did examine the patient or the claimant who is seeking relief. It is quite conceivable that if they were given a thorough cross-examination there might be more justice as far as the claimant is concerned. If lawyers were brought in they too could act in an independent capacity, by operating out of a pool set up by the law society. The law society would pay the lawyers and then the law society would in turn bill the workmen's compensation board.

Now, the cost of these I think would be insignificant when one considers that the workmen's compensation board has admitted losing $1 million a year in premiums, because they bill only once a year. They lose $1 million a year, because they collect only once a year, rather than every month, as the federal government collect excise tax and other duties. And I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this pool of doctors could be paid for, this pool of lawyers could be paid for, if the workmen's compensation board started to bill monthly. First of all, there would be a saving of close to $1 million, which would pay a lot of doctors and lawyers. Secondly, because the money would be coming in monthly, at the rate of approximately $8.5 million a month, the money could be invested in short-term bonds and earn interest, so that each month this $8.5 million would be cumulative so towards the eleventh or twelfth month there would be almost $100 million in the kitty which would be drawing interest at short-term rates. So there would be no loss.

Furthermore, I think a lot of these doubtful cases—and it seems that here we sort of vary from the accepted concept that where there is a doubt you give the benefit to the citizen; with the workmen's compensation board it is just the reverse; if there is any doubt they do not pay. I think with this extra money that they would be able to get from the saving and the interest, they could pay part of these doubtful claims and start giving the benefit of the doubt to the claimant. And I submit all this, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of the hon. Minister.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene in this discussion until the member for London South gave me an idea based on experience that might be worth opening to the House. It strikes me, of course, sir, and is perfectly apparent to all hon. members that in respect of workmen's compensation, Ontario, the whole 117 of us are, in fact, ombudsmen, and there would be no member that would be in any way insulated against constituents coming, and very properly, to see the member in respect of difficulties they have encountered with this board. And in that sense, of course, all the members who have not legal training thereby become lay counsel to the board and develop their abilities along the lines of advocacy to the extent that they take a very close interest in the affairs of the claimant and the operations of the board.

Now, one thing—and here is where the germ of idea started the yeast with me from the member for London South—one thing I have never been able to understand about the board is the position they take at a given point in time, when they determine as a matter of judicial or quasi-judicial decision, that the claimant is no longer compensable. Now, to illustrate, they will encounter an accident where there is a soft tissue injury involving the area around the cervical spine and those types of injury, as all hon. members know, are very difficult of diagnosis. And it seems that they will determine an arbitrary point in time where the workman ought to have recovered and if he shows symptoms after that time very often the board takes the position that he is suffering from some sort of psycho-neurotic disorder. I think the term most often used is that of emotional overlay.

Now I have been told that, in the light of a very recent claim that I am forwarding on behalf of a workman, I have been told by the medical profession—and no one in the House is capable of taking more care than I am in relating matters related to medical science—that injuries to the cervical spine and the area surrounding it very frequently give rise to manifestations of depression in people who suffer, that they develop some kind of psychotic reaction to it and recovery becomes very delayed and very difficult in the person.

Now, I have often wondered, the board knowing that, being aware of that sequela that follows that type of injury, why they do not develop a psychiatric or a neurological department of their rehabilitation process. But their attitude seems to be, on the contrary, that the workman who has been diagnosed to be suffering from that type of sequela, must avail himself of the services of a psychiatrist or a neurologist at his own expense. Indeed, it is a matter of somewhat bitter experience to me to see where workmen have had to pay the fees of that type of practitioner whom they have consulted in an endeavour to get well.

I know it is a fact that if the psychiatrist submits his account to the board for treatment of a workman who has suffered the experience that I relate, then the board, out of hand, rejects his account. The cost, as my friend from Oshawa so well put it, sir, must be borne by the person who has not usually the means to pay. Indeed, in relation to the chap that I recently became involved with, he was of such meagre means, and needed the services of a psychiatrist. Because he had been to all the orthopedic surgeons, and the surgeons and the internist, and they had all told him, with one voice, that he was suffering from a psychiatric disorder, and being unable to pay for the services of a psychiatrist, I telephoned a friend of mine who practises psychiatry and asked him if he would see this person as an indigent. I am very happy to relate, and it would probably be general in the profession, that, of course, the psychiatrist acceded to the request and began the treatments.

This story that I speak of—I might just complete the record—has a happy ending for the workman. The psychiatrist was rather puzzled about the symptoms of this workman and ordered some further x-rays and discovered some pathology which, of course, will reopen the whole claim. Once you can show the board on an x-ray film that there has actually been an injury, nothing convinces the board more readily than that type of evidence.

But that distracts me from my original point that I do not intend to labour. I would like the Minister to comment on this aspect and to tell us what considerations have been made about the psychiatric and the neurological care of this type of workman; and to give us some hope that the board, in future, will not put these people on their own resources, but will, indeed, offer some services which are directed toward their recovery.

Now I suppose with the 117 ombudsmen that there is no more frequent type of complaint that we encounter than that type of injury to either the cervical or the lumbar spine. I daresay that the person with the disc injury, after he had been around to all other agencies, after his union has tackled it, and he has sought comfort and solace and assistance elsewhere, eventually ends up in the member's office, or in his home. And usually the poor fellow brings along with him a file that can be measured by inches—

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): That would choke a horse!

Mr. Sopha: Yes. Frequently they have to carry it in a cardboard box, there is so much. In many cases, strangely enough, his member is the court of last resort to him, whereas he should be among the first. One often wishes that he would come and see one early in the chain of the search for assistance so that we could apply whatever aptitudes and talents that we have as members to try to unravel this thing.

I hope the Minister will tell us that the board will stop this practice of throwing these people on their own resources and will offer them, in the way of treatment, some more tangible form of assistance than has been the practice in the past.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Sudbury East.

Mr. M. Martel (Sudbury East): I just want to add, Mr. Speaker, in several areas a few points—the first dealing with the silicosis referee board. I would like to know how many doctors make up this board and why, when you submit the medical evidence from four or five doctors, all saying a patient has silicosis or pneumoconiosis, the silicosis referee board just tosses it out the window and says he has not. These are specialists I am talking about who supply this medical evidence.

It seems in talking to various people that the silicosis referee board is an area you never win in; you never win a claim where you have to take it directly to the board. I have a case where I have taken it to the board and it has gone back to the silicosis referee board, and I have at least seven doctors saying the man has silicosis. I have been waiting for a decision now since June 11. This is one area.

The second area is similar to that brought up by the member for Sudbury. If a man develops a psychiatric overlay—this is the term that has been presented to me—and you try to get a psychiatrist to treat the man, you are told that there is no connection between the overlay that he has and the compensable condition that he suffered. Most of these psychiatric overlays seem to come from patients or men who have back injuries. If the man did not have a psychiatric overlay before the injury and he has been out of work for two years and suddenly he has a psychiatric overlay, there must be some connection between the injury and the overlay. To just wash your hands of it and say there is nothing we can do for him; and when you suggest a psychiatrist, they say "no"! Where is the man supposed to go—to the boondocks?

I have one man who gets $67.50 a month pension—three children; he has a psychiatric overlay. He has an 18 per cent disability, but he cannot walk across the floor. I must have written, to this date, about 25 letters in this case.

Another point, I was glad to hear the member for London South on the location of hospitals. I mentioned in my maiden speech in the House that in northwestern and northern Ontario there certainly should be a place for rehabilitation. These men have to travel 600, 800, and 1,200 miles and spend months in Toronto away from their families, or from the possibility of seeing their families.

I think there are certain large centres which serve as distribution areas to the north. I think Sudbury handles a large area, or Timmins, or Fort William and Sault Ste. Marie; and maybe Kenora, which could cover the north where patients would be near home, instead of coming 1,200 miles from Kenora to Toronto to be treated. And I do not think it helps them having spent three and a half months in one of these hospitals.

I do not think it helps you being away from your family this length of time. I do not think it helps the whole healing process at all.

In the last point, in keeping with the member for Oshawa, the payment system. I had a gentleman phone me last night. He was working up until eight weeks ago as a light-duty compensable case; lo and behold, he got injured a second time. So they stopped payment on the difference he was receiving and the wage deduction as a result of being given a labourer's rate. They stopped that payment even. And for eight weeks he has not received payment for the second case. Now this man has a house payment to make and he has other commitments to meet, and for eight weeks he has not received a cent, even on the first injury.

I think we must cut through the red tape and we must deal with the areas that I have mentioned, and all of the other members in this House have mentioned. I think it has been made quite apparent by all of those who have spoken here today. I think most of us have dealt within a sphere of five or six points, and I would certainly hope that the Minister of Labour would have his department deal with these five or six areas immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister.

The member for Niagara Falls. I might just say I had no other speakers on my list. The member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): I have two items that I want to touch on, and I will not be too long.

The most serious problem that an individual has to contend with, in my opinion, when he gets compensation, is when his compensation is cut from the greater portion to a lesser amount because he has recovered considerably and the board believes, or someone on that board believes, that he ought not to get the full amount.

I had a gentleman walk into my office two or three weeks ago, and inform me that he had explored every possible avenue. He did not look like a well man to me, but you can never tell by looking at a man whether he is well or not. He outlined his case and said that he had this serious problem. I wanted to get to Toronto, and I said you send me a letter. He sent me a copy of a letter that he forwarded to the Minister himself. He said:

> I understand that there is now in session a Legislature standing committee looking into abuse and unfair treatment by the Ontario workmen's compensation board. Being an injured workman who has suffered at the hands of the above-mentioned board, I would like the privilege, as a citizen of Canada, to appear and testify, also produce letters to prove that there is abuse.

The Minister looked into this immediately, and the writer of the letter was visited shortly after that by an individual from the workmen's compensation board who also said that he could not appear before the committee. I can readily understand why.

I did, however, inform this individual that I did not think there would be any harm in a citizen coming in and sitting in at the committee meeting. I thought it was a public meeting and he could listen to his case being put before the committee, before the board by some member of the Legislature.

I was only too glad to relate his case. I hope when they investigate this matter they will look into the possibility of reinstating him to the 66th, or 75 per cent of his wages at least. I believe a man ought to get that amount of money until he recovers and is able to go to work or get a job somewhere, and not be cut off. In many cases, the cart is put before the horse. The percentage of money is cut down before they have a job to go to or are capable of going to a job.

Having said that, I would just like to put on the record this individual's name and address. His name is Charles Salapat, 115 Pinkington Street, Thorold South, Ontario. He wrote to the Minister on April 20, 1968. I am sure the Minister will look into this case and see what can be done for this individual.

I hope the government will see fit to continue to pay them the full amount until they either go back to work, or you find that the man is swinging the lead, and is not entitled to it. I realize that that is a difficult area in which to work.

Shortly after I was elected in 1960, a Mrs. Moore from Fort Erie told me of a problem she had working with Irvin Airchute Company of Canada. There they assemble parachutes, working with a certain type of glue that will hold that parachute together. She finds that in many instances, as they work for a few minutes, their fingers stick together and they have to turn to a solvent of some kind to dissolve that glue, so that they can continue with their work.

The lady, according to the record I have here, did an excellent job. Because she was needed in her job, the workmen's compensation paid her a portion of her pay when she had to go home sick because of the infection in the skin. I am not going to get into what the experts said about it. But, Mr. Speaker, this lady found that her hands broke out. The skin peeled and she found her hands raw. She turned to a specialist in Buffalo who diagnosed that the glue was causing her the trouble.

She had to quit her job. Compensation was paid to her for a period of time, and I might say that the plant thought so much of this lady's service to them, that they recalled her when she began to recover from this ailment. She went back to work and the same problem re-occurred. She wrote to me. Her handwriting is not the best, but being a conscientious new member of the House, I typed out her letters so I could read them better.

Finally, the board decided that this lady was not entitled to any more money and she turned to her lawyer, Mr. Forestall in Welland. He told her to come and see me. They had a referee board with the decision of that day. Mr. Sparrow was the chairman of the board. They had a board hearing for her and the understanding was that you can come to the board and the decision will be final.

She naturally wanted to tell her story to someone, and she accepted that rule. They found that she was not entitled to any more compensation and she was cut off. In the meanwhile, the lady continued to go to the skin specialist in Buffalo, who wrote a letter to her at my request telling her to inform me that this ailment did come about from that job. She had to pay her doctor's bill. She was entitled to her compensation. I find that she should never have been cut off, because the ailment was there and it continued for years after.

So, after exploring every possible avenue and speaking about it in this House, I found that there was nothing more, Mr. Minister, to be done for the lady and I quit corresponding with her after I had spoken to her in my office. I said I was sorry there was nothing I could do for her.

But the lady did not give up. She continued to send me letters. Some were complimentary, some were detrimental. But all said that, in her opinion, her condition was caused by Irvin Airchute and the job she was doing and that she was entitled to compensation. I ignored her letter—there is nothing else one can do. Finally, I received another in May 18, 1968.

Out of all the letters that were talked about in this House, the correspondence with workmen's compensation patients that you had to contend with, Mr. Minister, this is only one workmen's compensation case. The lady believes, and I believe, and her specialist, the doctor, believes that the problem came about when she worked in that industry.

She should have received compensation even to this day, if need be. But the fact remains—and I think it affected the lady in more ways than one. They talk about psychiatric treatment. I think this lady needs that type of treatment, because this is what brought this condition on. She is obsessed with this one fact, and she is perfectly within her rights. This lady has not been treated fairly in the eyes of a layman, and I speak for myself.

I was speaking to one of the members of the compensation board, and I asked who I could talk to about Mrs. Moore's case and he suggested that I send these letters on to him. But to be sure that this gets the necessary treatment that I believe it ought to get, I am going to send this with a pageboy over to the Minister himself and let him put it in the hands of the right man to see what can be done to assist this woman. I believe she is entitled to financial assistance.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Hamilton East.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): The order paper provides for the adojurned debate on the report of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario, and, of course, that allows quite a degree of latitude for members to express their concern about the functions of the board and the provisions of the Act.

I am disappointed that we have not had more opportunity to discuss the McGillivray report in this House, and I want to say a few words about it, at this particular time.

If we remember, we had the board before the standing committee on government commissions I believe twice to deal with the compensation board and it was most ineffective because they sat for only about one hour each time and a few questions would take up most of the time. Certainly we could not get to the meat of the content of the McGillivray report.

I want to deal with a few parts of the report, but first I want to pose a question to the Minister. It is about the only part that I would like an answer to.

I want to make comments in regard to the other things, but I would like some comment from the Minister because I think it is important on this subject that I want to raise.

I want to quote from a story in the Toronto Daily Star, Wednesday March 20, 1968:

> COMPENSATION BOARD REPLIES TO SHULMAN
> A campaign by officials of the workmen's compensation board to publicly answer charges made against them by Dr. Morton Shulman, NDP High Park, began here yesterday. W. R. Kerr, the board's director of rehabilitation, told a Kiwanis meeting that charges of wrong-doing by "a professional critic" in 38 claims had been given the most careful and impartial review possible and there is nothing whatsoever to substantiate even remotely the charges of unfair treatment.
> Kerr did not mention Shulman by name.

This is the point on which I would like the Minister to take particular note:

> However, in Toronto, Bob Pendrith, a public relations officer with the board, said this is the start of a speech campaign to answer Shulman every time he makes a charge.

Now I think this is serious, Mr. Speaker and the Minister should inform the House as to the policy in this regard.

I want to know whether or not this is an official programme of the Minister and the department. I want to know if the—

Hon. D. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if I could just assist the member with reference to this matter.

This has been dealt with and the workmen's compensation board appeared before the standing committee and commissions on three occasions, if my understanding is correct, and I think on the last occasion, Mr. Kerr, the gentleman you mentioned, was there and there was discussion about this.

I think the whole matter has been dealt with. There is no policy of that nature and I think the matter has been dealt with at the standing committee. I am not sure whether the hon. member is really a member of that committee or was present at that time.

Mr. Gisborn: No, the hon. Minister is right. I was not present. I am not a member of the committee. I was not present at the third meeting. I attended two and missed the third one and if it has been dealt with and the Minister has made it clear that this is not the policy of the department, that is the answer I want. I would like him to answer the second point in regard to this story as to who initiated this statement.

Was it on the initiative of Mr. Pendrith, Mr. Kerr, or were they instructed to take on such campaign and now has the policy been changed?

Because if members of the board are going to get into the political arena and every time a member of this Legislature makes a public comment about the workmen's compensation board then we want to know just what the policy of the department is.

The Minister has said it has been dealt with, but it appears to me that there was some initiative by the chairman of the board in this regard, and I do not know just to what extent the thing was stirred up in standing committee. I will make some inquiries from my colleagues, and if they are satisfied, fine.

Now in regard to the McGillivray report, Mr. Speaker, this report was brought down in September, 1967, just prior to the October election last year. Up to this date, I am not aware as to whether or not the hon. Minister of Labour has made a statement in regard to the report. I think it is regretful because when a report of this nature and other reports from special committees are reported,

I think it would help the House and the members, if the Ministers in charge of the department related to the report, would make a clear-cut statement on the contents of such a report so that we would know how to approach the subject.

All that has happened to this report, the Minister has introduced in the House, is four or five changes to The Workmen's Compensation Act and they have been debated quite thoroughly in the House. But I am concerned with many of the regressive natures of the Act, and we will have to continually barrage the Minister with questions and comments regarding the Act, until we know where he and the government stand on many of those regressive recommendations.

Certainly the report itself, I find it to be most regressive and bankrupt for new ideas, as has been said before. There is nothing imaginative in it and the whole thing tends to increase the benefits for management and reduce benefits for the claimant on workmen's compensation.

I say this because of one aside comment made by Mr. Justice McGillivray in the report, on page 29, when he was going through just concluding a couple of long pages on his idea, and his feeling that we should think about stacking the old age security and the Canada pension plan with benefits from workmen's compensation by 1970, and he says this:

> I have also in mind that, as imports increase, many industries may be hampered in merchandising their products. It is essential that they be able to compete abroad and to meet competitions from imports at home. Both labour and industry must suffer if companies' production costs brought about by welfare measures are so increased as to cause loss of market.

Now what in the world kind of thinking was this, to be put into the hon. Justice McGillivray's study of the need for improvements in workmen's compensation provisions in this province? He starts talking about the whole implication of economics and the problem of industry in paying their way.

Now I just want to deal with a couple of recommendations. There are several, and most of them, in number at least, pertain to safety and I will leave that because we will have a chance at different times to deal with safety. We have dealt with recommendation number 1 at quite some length. We have dealt with recommendation number 2. Recommendations 3, 4, 5 and 6, of course, deal with the increase in computation of earnings and the widow's allowances and so on, but recommendation number 7 says this:

> That any increased compensation or allowance for past accidents should not be assessed against employers coming within the Act, now or in the future and that section 35 be deleted.

We are pleased that the Minister has not taken any action on it and I hope that he does not. This is why I say we should have had a clear-cut statement from the Minister some months ago as to the recommendations in the report so that we would know how to react to it in the future.

Now in regard to this recommendation, if an injured claimant is entitled, by review of his claim, to higher pension benefits or for any other reason, then they should be paid for by the fund in whichever schedule they come under.

Who is going to pay for it? Surely not the claimant, and certainly not the public. If we take this attitude, certainly we are revising the whole method of financial responsibility.

Recommendation number 8 is that there should be some review by all authorities of overlapping benefits, and failing such review by 1970, the Act should be amended to authorize the board to have regard, when awarding compensation, to amounts payable under old age security and the Canada Pension Plan.

I understand, and perhaps the Minister might inform me, for talking to some people who have made representations to the McGillivray commission that this recommendation was put forward by the board. I would like the Minister to tell me who made this recommendation to the commission, if he recollects. If this recommendation is to be given any thought at all, Mr. Speaker, maybe we should turn the payment of benefits over to the family and social benefits department.

Now, on recommendation No. 12, it says that the waiting period which the Act requires before any compensation becomes payable is reduced to one day, with no type of compensation payable for the day of the accident. I believe that I am correct in saying that this provision was implemented in Bill 150 that we passed two weeks ago. I would like to say a word about that because we went so quickly, I recollect, through the first few sections of that bill, and it got passed before I had anything to say about it. I think that this again is regressive, and is an imposition upon the claimant. This recommendation, I feel, applies the insurance principle, the co-insurance or deductible features to compensation payments.

Justice McGillivray, in his summation before he made this recommendation, said that in most cases the employer pays for the full day. I do not think that that is correct, and even if they did, it should be part of the Act. Now, it goes to say that if the employee is injured in the first hour of employment on that day, then he loses that day's pay. I just cannot see the reason for that, he gets the pay for the second day, but loses that first day's pay.

Recommendation No. 15 is that an independent workmen's advisor be appointed by the Attorney General of the province, to assist workmen in the preparation and prosecution of claims on appeals. I do not feel that that is a correct approach, because this would bring a legalistic attitude to the function of the board and the start of the legal profession getting into the whole function of the board; we have to be very careful about this.

I have concern about the number of cases that have been processed with the assistance of a lawyer who has applied and received legal aid payments on behalf of the claimant.

I raised this question with the Attorney General during his estimates, and he told me that he was not aware that legal aid was being used for this purpose, but he would check; that as far as he knew there had been no policy made as yet in this direction. I have inquired, and there have been cases where legal aid was provided through the lawyers to have them represent the claimant in regards to their case.

Many have said, and I agree, that there may be need for an ombudsman. Again, I do not know how this would function just by that simple term. When we talk about representation, or devil's advocate for the employee, I do not know why we do not consider some of the well trained unionists in the province who have served on workmen's compensation committees for many years. They could be hired by the department and told: "You are the representative in this area for people who need help in processing their claim."

This would be a very sensible approach, I would think; experience, but without the legalistic approach. Most of the union committee men who have applied themselves to the very tiring and complex workmen's compensation work are motivated by human interest. I am sure that if the Minister wanted to supply a devil's advocate for the claimant, then he could go into this field and find many people who would do a splendid job.

The last point is recommendation No. 16. If this should be passed, a regulation of the board requiring that any appeal be launched within three months of the decision from which appeal is taken, unless by reason of new evidence or other special conditions the board, in its discretion, should give leave to appeal. I do not think that this changes the existing situation very much.

When they get their notice of appeal, there is a little line saying, "And new evidence should be submitted in writing." It is hard to understand some of the regressive recommendations made by Justice McGillivray, and this is one of them.

This recommendation impinges on the long agreed and worthy application of the Act that the claim is never closed. Thousands of employees in industry, not organized with a union, and many newcomers to the labour force, learn their rights by trial and error in regards to workmen's compensation.

I think that if we deal specifically with the nine per cent that was talked about by the hon. member for High Park, then we will find that these groups fall in this percentage. Those not in organized plants are completely ignorant of the Act, and have maybe a lack of education, and do not know how to write a letter properly. They then face long delays until they find through some member or friend who recommends that they should get on with their case. They have a good case, and they find that the delay has been too long, and they are out on a limb.

Mr. Speaker, that is about all I have to say in regards to the report at this point. As I said, many of the recommendations deal strictly with safety, and there will be other times to deal with that.

I reiterate what I said that in regard to these reports. I think it is beholden upon the Minister of the department to give clear-cut statements in regard to the statements of recommendation in a report, and make us aware of the policy and attitude of the government with regards to any report of this nature, so that we can know ourselves when talking to others on the subject. We can avoid a lot of debate if the Minister has said, "We will not entertain this or that recommendation; we will consider that one, and so on."

We would have some clear-cut idea of just what the government's thinking is. As I said earlier, the report is regressive, and many of the recommendations, if implemented, will be a hardship on the claimant and make the compensation board's function more complex than it has been in the past.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Timiskaming.

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I would like to make a few comments on something that disturbs me in the McGillivray report. First of all, as I said when we debated the changes in The Hours of Work Act, is the fact that it was supposed to be model legislation in the beginning, and yet when they investigated the need for changes, they used as examples and for comparison, Acts which were passed in various provinces in Canada based on The Workmen's Compensation Act of Ontario.

Now, if we are going to make changes—much needed changes, I might say—then I am of the opinion, and I think many here are of the opinion, that we should not take retrogressive legislation, and use it as a model to upgrade the original model.

The Minister has stated, as my colleague mentioned, that we cannot put an additional load on industry because they pay the cost of compensation. But I would just like to read something that is in the McGillivray report, and it is a quotation from Mr. Justice Roach in 1950. He states:

> The public benefits by the fact that the worker, though disabled, is enabled to retain his self-respect. The compensation which he receives is not charity. He has in fact earned it.

I would like to point out to the Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a fact, that the worker, by his very labour through the years has earned the right to compensation. For us to say that we have to keep the level of benefits low because the employer has too much of a load, or we are afraid of adding too big a burden to the employer, I think is definitely wrong.

The worker today has earned the right to a fair compensation, and when the time comes for him to collect it should be paid without question. If it is necessary to add that extra burden to the employer, then it is a necessary thing and it should be done without question.

The member for Humber mentioned the fact that he would like to see the legislation changed to allow lawyers to take part in the appeal system. Well, if we go back into the McGillivray report, right at the beginning, he said:

> Employers were financially able to pursue such appeals. The workman, on the other hand, who had found sufficient resources to finance a trial was frequently unable to proceed to appeal.

This, in my opinion, and in the opinion of many, many people who have dealt with compensation, is that if we go back to where we hire lawyers to fight compensation cases, or to argue compensation cases, then, in most cases, the workman is going to be the one who suffers, because he will not have the finances to hire lawyers. And for us to say that we would do it through the public system of legal aid is just to say that the public is going to take it over and add another burden to the public purse. Whereas the system so far has not worked perfectly, and I do not think it will ever work perfectly, but it has worked fairly adequately and I think if we make the changes that are necessary, it will continue to work reasonably well without the need of hiring lawyers to argue our appeals for us.

Earlier in the estimates of The Department of Health we spoke on silicosis in relation to TB. Something that I mentioned then has bothered me ever since, when we spoke of tuberculosis and silicosis. One comes before the other, but silicosis, according to the board, always seems to come after TB and TB is the causative factor. Now, the hon. member for High Park mentioned a new drug that had been brought forward by Connaught Laboratories, call BCG, that could be administered to everyone in Ontario and will prevent TB.

When I asked why it was not used, the answer I got was that it was not used because the incidence of TB was very low. Well I would like to point out to this Minister that the incidence of TB might be very low in Ontario, but when we fight silicosis cases we find in almost 100 per cent of the cases, TB is present. And if every miner, or every child in the mining areas where there is a reasonable idea that they might become miners, were to have BCG administered in early childhood, then perhaps when they get to be the age where silicosis might be present, we will not have that old bugaboo of TB in the background. We will have, perhaps, a clear-cut case of silicosis.

It has been mentioned about the workmen's advisors and I am greatly concerned with the fact that the workmen's advisors today were executive assistants yesterday, and that we really have not changed the system in the board by bringing forth these workmen's advisors. They are not independent people, they are part of the old board system. I cannot question the integrity of these people. I know some of them very well, and I feel that they think they are doing a very reasonable job. The only problem is that they have been brought up with the system, and to take a person who has been part of the machine for many, many years, and then to call him an independent advisor is not possible, and I do not think it is right. I think what is right has been said here many times—that to make an independent advisor, you must have an independent group outside the board.

On rehabilitation, in some of the figures that came forward in the report of the board, they have said that 2,582 workmen were available for work on discharge from the rehabilitation centre. Well, Mr. Speaker, "available for work", but what kind of work? They tell us a man is able to work and yet I went to visit a man less than two weeks ago, he crawled on his hands and knees to open the door for me. And yet they told him he had a 50 per cent disability. Now, in my opinion, a man who cannot work, is not 50 per cent disabled, he is 100 per cent disabled. When I brought this to the notice of the board, they again raised his allowance, he is up to 100 per cent again.

But why should a person have to go through this many, many times before he gets a final settlement? He will go two months on 100 per cent allowance and then they will cut it down to 50 per cent. And only when you go back and tell the board or argue with the board do they bring it back up to the 100 per cent. I think adequate investigation would tell the board that there is no reason to cut it down to 50 per cent and it is only because they do not have that investigation procedure that this happens over and over again.

This same gentleman that I said had to crawl to the door, was told by the local inspector that he could drive a bus, that they were advertising for bus drivers, he could go drive a bus. He said: "Well, how do I go about getting a job driving a bus when the first thing they ask me is, 'are you fit to take a medical?' and his answer is 'no'." So the job is out. The second suggestion was that he could work at a service station—change tires, pump gas—but let me say this, Mr. Speaker, that employers today are increasingly insisting on a person being in fit physical condition before they give him a job.

Now, it seems ridiculous to me that this board can say that a man is fit for work when there is no work available for him. To say he can do a job that is reduced in labour content. There are many ways of putting it. I would say it is ridiculous for them to say he can take a light job when there are no light jobs available. And this board well knows there are no jobs available. In areas where we already have five or six per cent unemployment, they say, "Well, register with Canada Manpower". Canada Manpower looks at it as a joke, because as soon as the man registers they ask him if he is physically able to do the job, and he has to tell them, no. I am sure that at least 90 per cent of the employers in Ontario will not take a man unless he is physically able to do a job.

In the gold mines they talk about these men on light work. There is no light work in the gold mines. I have worked around mines and I know it. There is no such thing as a light job. And yet we hear every day where they are able to do light work, and it is the man's fault because he would not go to work.

Well this just is not true and no matter what the injury or how severe it is, if the man is unable to work because of that injury, then he is 100 per cent disabled. A little column I have out of the Northern Daily News quotes Mr. John MacDonald, assistant claims officer of the board, he says:

> One of the reasons claims for compensation can be rejected is on grounds of serious or wilful misconduct where such misconduct is deliberate and intentional. However, thoughtlessness or carelessness, is not considered misconduct. Deliberate breaking of safety rules would be considered as misconduct if these rules were shown to be strictly enforced.

I brought forward during one of the estimates that most of the mines—and I think they are not the biggest offenders, there are many other industries that are bigger offenders—but as long as everything runs smoothly, we have good safety rules, we have good safety habits, but as soon as it threatens the income of the company, then the safety rules are ignored, and yet according to the board, deliberate breaking of safety rules shall be misconduct, and he can be refused compensation. I was a supervisor in one of the mines and I can tell you that many, many times I have argued with other supervisors because they said: "We can do this job this way." And I said, "It is not safe to do it that way." Their attitude was: "We do not care if it is safe or not as long as we get it done."

For the board to say it is the employers' responsibility for safety and leave it at that—they are not doing their job. And to say they can wash their hands of responsibility because of an act of misconduct which in many cases has been brought on by the insistence of the company, I would say that the board again is not doing its job.

Before a man can work underground or in any dusty atmosphere in the north he has to have a chest x-ray which permits him to go to work. These chest x-rays in my opinion—I hold a card at the moment—are a big joke. You go in; you are supposed to have a medical examination; it usually consists of how tall are you and how much do you weigh. If you have gained weight, fine; if you have lost five pounds, the fellow says you are slimming down, and that is the medical examination. You have the x-ray. They never tell you whether you are fit to work underground unless you are completely unable to. They never tell you whether you have silicosis, or what stage of silicosis you have. Their only concern is whether you are still fit to go underground, or to work in that dusty atmosphere.

So when a man becomes 55 or 60 and suddenly finds he has silicosis, the board comes along and says he has held a card for many years, and all of a sudden he has silicosis. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Minister, that most of these people have silicosis not for one year or two years; it is 20 years. The silicosis starts many years back; and this board should concern itself not with whether the man should be working underground, but whether it is damaging his health and whether, at that time, 20 years previous to his actual silicotic condition showing up, 20 years before if they could bring that man out of underground and put him into another job or tell him not to go underground and when he retires at 55 he will not have silicosis.

One of the major injuries that concern the miners is back injuries. Fifty per cent of our arguments with the board are over back injuries, and about 75 per cent of that 50 per cent is usually adjudged as being degenerative back disease. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the Minister again, that the reason it is degenerative back disease in most cases is because this is part of an occupational hazard in mines; that the average person works in an atmosphere that requires him to stoop down for heavy loads, twisting loads, and conditions that are conducive to back injuries, and sometimes these injuries are very slight, but over the years they degenerate.

Mr. Sopha: The spine is not an engineering masterpiece either.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. member is quite right. It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I can sum it up in very few words, that the board wants to quit making excuses; wants to quit telling us that it is due to something else. With a little research they could find out in most cases that that "little something else" is also caused by their work conditions, and would be compensable. I suggest to the Minister that the sooner they do it, the better everyone in Ontario is going to be, and maybe next year or the year after, we can come in here and compliment the Minister on his forward-looking board; on better legislation that he will have to bring forward; and instead of saying that, in my opinion, this is regressive, this report is progressive.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on the question of representation of workmen before the board, because it is a problem that the board is going to have to deal with, or this assembly is going to have to deal with, because of the impression which is now abroad that the workmen's compensation board is tending to move even slightly into the area of an adversary system. My colleague, the member for Hamilton East referred this morning to the concern about the legal profession representing claimants before the board in a legalistic fashion, and expressed concern about the legal aid plan being available to lawyers to provide them with compensation should they represent a person eligible for legal aid.

Let me deal with one aspect of this problem which I would hope would be helpful to the Minister in his consideration of it. Every now and then there appear, under The Workmen's Compensation Act, strict questions of law. In my view these questions should, on the initiative of the board, be referred to the court and the government's administration of justice funds should provide for the court appointing a lawyer to argue each side of the specific legal point.

The case which comes to mind obviously is the one case which, in a number of years, has gone to the court; the case of Kucyk vs. the workmen's compensation board.

There was a question whether or not the failure of the board to submit the medical reports to the claimant or his representative was a denial of natural justice in substance. That is what the matter was about when it went to the court. The workman had to bear the costs of taking that matter to the court.

I think it is something which should not happen again. It would appear to me that the board, if a question of law is raised before it by the claimant, or on the board's own initiative, if they consider that there is a question of law raised by counsel for the board, who should be vigilant to look at the legal aspects of the procedures which are being followed, should have a clear method of referring that question to the court. And the court should be able to appoint, at the expense of the province of Ontario, a lawyer to argue each side of the legal point, in order to eliminate both the adversary system from that kind of problem and to eliminate the cost of that kind of application being borne by the claimant.

It is now almost past history, but the same sort of situation has come before the board on the question of whether or not the board in fact was hearing cases, not on its own motion, but really at the request of the employer which was not specifically provided for in the statute. That, in my judgment, is a question of law, as to whether or not the board was hearing it on its own motion, or at the request of the employer, which was not permitted under the statute prior to the amendment which has now been passed and is awaiting Royal assent. Again it is probably academic at the present time, but if that kind of question is raised by the claimant or his representative, or if the board itself, or the counsel for the board being vigilant as to the strict legalities of the statutory authority under which they are operating, or as to the strict appropriateness of the procedure which is being followed, should be able to draw the question to the attention of the board in such a way that the board would make the reference to a court. The court would appoint the counsel to argue both sides of the case, and the expense of that reference would be borne by the province, because it is generally the law of the province, as stated in the statute or common law, that gives rise to such questions. Leaving that question aside, I would hope that the Minister would give serious consideration to the merit of that kind of vigilance and the way in which I have suggested of solving the problem.

The other question is this question of the actual representation of the workman. That is a person who can, in a coherent way, place before the board the position of the workman, without becoming involved in the adversary system. This is extremely difficult. My colleague from Hamilton East believes that within the framework of the organized trade union movement in the province of Ontario, there are qualified persons with long experience who can, in fact, do that kind of presentation work. I have discussed this matter with him on many occasions, and I am not so satisfied that there is not a wide area amongst the unorganized workers of this province where they do not have this facility available to them. People who do not belong to trade unions, who do not belong to the highly organized trade unions which have the specialized kind of assistance available to them, either from their own union in the case of a particularly strong union or from the Ontario federation in the case of other unions, may very well not get the kind of presentation of their cases that they require. This other area of persons in the province of Ontario, in my view, do not have adequate representation in many cases, and this is where, in most cases, we as members, become involved in the workmen's compensation board. Or there are cases where the trade union representative has followed the case as far as he believes it can be followed and the matter still has not been satisfactorily settled from the viewpoint of the workman, and he still wants to raise the question.

I do not necessarily think that you have to exclude anyone, be he lawyer or no lawyer or any other person, from representing a workman, so long as it is clearly understood that the position of that person making the presentation is to present the case and not to engage in a controversy over the substance of the case. It is a difficult problem and is now made more difficult by the section of The Workmen's Compensation Act—on which no comment was made when it passed through the House, and I wish now that comment had been made—and that is where you are now specifically permitting the employer in the case, where compensation is payable out of the fund, to request the board in fact to appeal through the appeal procedure and continue to raise the question until it goes to the board. This appears, in my mind, to be an opening of the door toward the introduction of the adversary system and is a matter that I would trust that the Minister would reconsider.

If the employer is going to take the case to the appeal tribunal and then if the result is not satisfactory to him take it to the board itself and the board is then obligated to hear the case, you have in fact introduced the adversary system. Whereas I think it was quite possible with a board, with the employer excluded from the consideration of the case, for the workmen himself to deal directly with the board, or at the lower levels with the appeal tribunal, or with the claims officer and with the review committee at which he is not heard in the appeal hierarchial structure. It is possible to go before the board and to avoid pitfalls of the adversary system and yet make an adequate presentation, but it is not going to be possible to do so if you persist with the provision in the statute which now allows the employer to appeal every decision that is made by the review committee, or by the appeal tribunal to the board itself.

I think this is a matter, Mr. Speaker, which is certainly of great concern within the leadership of the trade union movement. They cast it in terms of the lawyers getting their foot in the door and running away with the compensation system and that the whole operation would grind to a halt. I think the other side of their attitude is that they have had a long association with it. The older leadership of the trade union movement recalls the dreadful stories whcih were abroad prior to the introduction of the workmen's compensation system in Ontario, and still have an automatic reflex action against the courts having whatsoever to do with the board.

My own view is that it must not be an adversary system, but it must be a system under which the workman has available to him, from a panel selected by the Minister himself, and established by him of qualified persons, to whom the workman can apply to have a representative appointed for his claim and make the presentation for him, and that he be clearly told by the board that he should have a representative. Because it certainly is my view that most workmen, simply by the nature of their employment, are not persons who are necessarily articulate in presenting their own cases. I would think that the Minister should give immediate consideration before this question deteriorates any further to the appointment of a panel or some representative system to whom the workmen can apply and be certain that he gets adequate representation of his claim before the board, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Mr. Bales moves the adjournment of the debate.

It being 12.30 o'clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, JULY 22, 1968

The House resumed at 2:00 o'clock, p.m.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BOARD
(Concluded)

Mr. Speaker: Before lunch-time, the Minister had apparently inadvertently adjourned the debate. I do not think that was his intention or the wish of the House. Our normal custom, of course, is for the Minister to close these debates. If the House is agreeable, I will ignore the motion made by the Minister and give the floor to the Minister of Labour.

Hon. D. Bales (Minister of Labour): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I did wish to make a few remarks before the completion of the debate in reference to the workmen's compensation board, Ontario, report. I listened with interest to the remarks of the various members, on Friday last and again this morning in reference to the report, and I will peruse their suggestions in the days ahead. As I said, I did intend to reply only briefly to the remarks made. It would be possible for me to deal in depth with many of the points and, I may say, to refute a great many of them, but I think that we have all heard a good deal in this session with respect to workmen's compensation. The workmen's compensation board has been before the committees on commissions and also on the labour committees. We have had an extended debate in reference to the amending Act, which was based on the McGillivray report, and again with reference to the annual report which was dealt with on Friday and again this morning.

I have said before that our legislation on workmen's compensation is good legislation. I think there is general agreement on that. However, I have never at any time maintained that our legislation was perfect, or that amendments and changes should not be made in the future. With this in mind, I have already asked the board to carry forward studies that would enable us to make additional improvements in reference to this Act in the future. We invite constructive criticism of the board and the legislation and I am not unmindful of the remarks of the hon. members in the House this morning and in the various debates that have taken place.

I am not unmindful either of the changes which are going on in other jurisdictions in reference to the field. There are times when many changes are taking place, and new concepts are coming into being. I may say that, during my term as Minister, and particularly following the submission of the McGillivray report, I have endeavoured to study the types of legislation in this field, both in other parts of Canada and in the United States and abroad. However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks to supplement the information in the report of the workmen's compensation board, which is before us at this time. In that regard, I think that it would be useful in assessing the report to outline briefly the history of the workmen's compensation board, Ontario, so that we might have a better understanding and appreciation of what has taken place over these last 53 years.

Mr. Speaker, the workmen's compensation as we know it today had its beginnings in 1910. At that time the chief justice of this province was appointed by the provincial government to enquire generally into workmen's compensation.

There was an Act in force in Ontario at that time, known as The Workmen's Compensation for Injuries Act, but it was not comparable to our present day legislation.

For example, there was no redress for the victim or his dependents if the accident was caused through his own negligence or the negligence of a fellow employee.

In appointing the chief justice, the government gave him wide powers of investigation and his report was prepared over a period of several years.

The main point I wish to stress in reference to that was that the commissioner found that the compensation system had one major flaw: They tried to place the responsibility for the accident and the cost involved on either the workman or his employer. This led to litigation and defeated what should have been the real aim of workmen's compensation.

The Meredith report was produced in 1913.

His major recommendation was that a completely new Workmen's Compensation Act should be developed and that one of its basic concepts should be to overcome "the costly delays and nuisances of litigation in order that the injured workman and his dependents could receive the benefits of speedy justice, humanely administered."

He also recommended that workmen's compensation be considered a cost of doing business and a cost of the commodity or service to the consumer, with compensation to be paid from a fund acquired on a collective liability basis from business and industry.

And the new Act based on his report really came into effect in January of 1915.

In essence this meant that if any workman suffered an accident or industrial disease arising out of and in the course of his employment in an industry covered under the Act, he is entitled to compensation. This is a matter of right. It is the workman's just due by law.

It is not charity or welfare in any sense. The basic principle, which still exists today is collective liability for the employers and benefits without litigation for the workers.

Since then, the Act has been reviewed a number of times. I believe the first review was by Mr. Justice Middleton in about 1932; again in 1950 by Mr. Justice Roach and in 1966 Mr. Justice McGillivray was appointed as a Royal commissioner. The report of Mr. Justice McGillivray was submitted to the government last September and released at that time. The report was studied carefully by the government. There were in all some 44 recommendations, some embodying administrative matters, other requiring legislation. The report was used as a basis for the amending Act, which has been dealt with and passed by this Legislature this session.

Today, Mr. Speaker, the Ontario workmen's compensation board is many things.

It is a system of adjudication and it is an administrative tribunal which provides impartial hearings in all cases appealed to it.

It is an insurance company and a trust company, providing lifetime pensions.

It is an educational institution responsible for the operation of nine safety associations who work with industry and labour in an endeavour to cut down accidents in all fields.

It is a hospital and rehabilitation centre.

It is a $120 million-a-year activity, employing 1,400 people.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would pay tribute to the staff of the workmen's compensation board. They deal with a great many cases. Last year some 374,000 new claims came before that board and I am pleased that in the discussion of the report of Friday and today, reference has been made a number of times to the courtesy, the co-operation and the concern of the staff to do a good job and help the workmen in compensation matters. And so I too pay tribute to them. I have found them most co-operative and most helpful in carrying out their job.

Mr. Speaker, in 1967, as the report before us indicates, 94.57 per cent of all cases reported to the board were accepted. Most were accepted on the basis of the initial reports from the employer, the workman or the doctor. Some were accepted following enquiry to gather more facts and others were accepted on appeal. In 5.43 per cent of cases the claim did not come within the provisions of The Workmen's Compensation Act. Mr. Speaker, there has been reference made to payment of compensation and I may say that this is a matter that I have discussed with the board on a number of occasions and I know how anxious they are to see that payments of claims are made as speedily as possible.

It generally takes several days for the employer, the workman and the doctor to notify the board of an accident. Nevertheless, 53 per cent of all claims not requiring extensive enquiry or investigation were paid within 10 working days of the accident and 84.1 per cent were paid within 15 working days.

While compensation is usually paid every two weeks, an initial payment of one week is made as soon as possible after the accident to assist the injured workman promptly.

Mr. Speaker, the report before us also notes that in 1967 the compensation board received an average of 1,492 new claims every working day for a total of 374,670 claims in 1967. Despite this large volume, each claim, I am informed, was considered individually and entitlement was determined on the facts reported.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is important for the hon. members to appreciate the possibility of human frailty and error is taken into account in these matters.

To ensure that justice is done, the board has a three-level appeal system.

Every workman whose claim is rejected is advised of the facts on which the decision was based and of his right to appeal. No person party to the decision can sit on the review of that decision and each level of appeal acts independently and impartially in accord with the evidence. Written decisions are given, with reasons.

The first level of appeal is the review committee which reviews all evidence on file plus any new evidence supplied or obtained on further enquiry.

The second level of the appeal system is the appeal tribunal. Its sole function is to hold hearings of an enquiry basis, either in Toronto or in various county towns as requested by workmen. A summary of the information on which the previous decision was based is available to the workman on request to assist him in his appeal.

At a hearing, the procedure is informal and I think this is wise. The workman may be represented, if he wishes, by a union representative, MP, MPP, solicitor or other responsible person—or he may conduct his own appeal. Witnesses may be brought to give information to the tribunal but their signed reports or statements may also be presented.

Appeals of tribunal decisions are heard by the board itself in Toronto. The procedure here also is informal and similar to that before the tribunal. Mr. Speaker, there also is provision for a second appeal to the board if new evidence can be presented.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, the question that naturally arises is: How many appeals are heard? Well, sir, the compensation board claims that two million decisions affecting entitlement were made in 1967. You will appreciate that there are a number of decisions in reference to each appeal.

But what is more important, I think, sir, is that only 4,527 of these two million decisions were appealed to the review committee. This is approximately one-fifth of one per cent and, while I am aware that statistics can be used in a variety of ways, I think these I have just presented indicate that the present system is reasonably fair and reasonably just for the workmen themselves.

I may say that this appeal system came into being in 1965. I have arranged with the board to have an appraisal made of the system itself. No matter how good or how well a system may appear to be working, periodically we need to stand back and look at the system and see where improvements can and should be made.

And, Mr. Speaker, when one examines the treatment and rehabilitation services provided by the board I think that is a reasonable assessment.

Every injured workman is entitled to the best possible medical care at no cost to himself and is free to choose his own doctor initially or a drugless practitioner such as a chiropractor or osteopath.

Attending doctors report regularly to the board's medical staff on the progress of their patients. Highly-qualified specialists throughout the province consult in complex cases to ensure that injured workmen get the best possible treatment.

Where hospitalization is necessary semi-private accommodation is provided. All prescriptions drugs required because of disability are paid for by the board as are any necessary appliances or prosthesis.

The board also accepts full responsibility for paying the entire cost of any medical services needed.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, some years ago it became apparent that a workman's recovery would be improved if he received a sustained course of physiotherapy. Most general hospitals are equipped to give such treatment, but only for short periods each day.

To provide such treatment throughout the day, the board started its own service. The programme grew from a small operation in one room with several therapists until, in 1958, the board opened its present hospital and rehabilitation centre at Downsview.

Now, with 520 beds and facilities for outpatients almost 5,000 of the most severely disabled workmen are treated there each year.

Because medical rehabilitation is essentially an individual problem, several special clinics have been established to deal with problems individually.

There is a neurological clinic to deal with head injuries, an amputee clinic, a general trauma clinic and a back rehabilitation clinic which deals with the problem of back cases.

The clinics are headed by leading consultants and are staffed with teams of nurses, therapists, gymnasts and vocational rehabilitation counsellors.

And, Mr. Speaker, at the present time, research work is proceeding under the auspices of the board in a variety of fields. I will not go into all of these, but there is one in particular I would like to note and that is a large pressure chamber at the Toronto General hospital.

This chamber provides emergency treatment on an around-the-clock basis for those suffering from caisson's disease. It is also available for carbon monoxide poisoning and other conditions, like gas gangrene and barbiturate poisoning. That service is available, not only to workmen's compensation board patients, but to those who are in the Toronto General hospital or require that treatment.

There is constant follow-up of medical progress during the acute treatment stage and a continuing liaison between the patient's own doctor, the board's doctors and consultants.

The board's medical staff also assists the claims adjudicators through advice and opinion.

Board specialists assist in dealing with questions in claims concerning heart disease, industrial disease, industrial noise deafness and radiation sickness of all types. Close liaison is maintained with the environmental health branch of The Department of Health.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that one of the most important phases of the board's work, to me is its rehabilitation centre dealing as it does with the treatment of injured workmen and necessary help that they must have to take them back to gainful employment.

Every workman whose compensation is reduced to a partial disability basis because he is capable of performing suitable work is now offered assistance in seeking temporary employment, and the work has to be within his capabilities at the time, because it is an on-going matter. A workman is informed by letter when he is no longer to be paid and his compensation payments are being partially reduced. He is advised to contact his employer if he has not already done so concerning suitable employment.

If employment is not available and the workman requires assistance from the vocational rehabilitation department, he is asked to return a request for vocational rehabilitation service. On receipt of this request, the rehabilitation officer, head office, immediately telephones the employer and the workman in an effort to arrange modified employement.

If suitable arrangements cannot be made in this manner, a rehabilitation officer in the field contacts the workman and possible employers in person and he is asked if he wants assistance.

During 1967 some 975 requests for service were received. Of this number, 60 per cent were placed in modfied employment. Following inquiry, an additional 20 per cent were able to return to former employment.

Seven per cent were receiving further treatment and not available for employment at the time of enquiry. In 9 per cent, the workmen were not placed in employment as it was not feasible to locate suitable work. The remaining 4 per cent did not return to work for a variety of reasons.

It should be noted that, in cases where the workman is capable of suitable work but no job is available to him, the employment people, within the board itself make enquiries and assist him in finding additional work.

In the rehabilitation field, and it was mentioned this mornng by one of the other members, 91.37 per cent were satisfactorily placed in employment and their average weekly earnings amounted to $91.87 per week. Here, too, Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that, when these people went to work and received that salary on an average basis, in addition they received partial disability compensation.

Mr. Speaker, there are only two more aspects of the board's activities with which I wish to deal—administrative costs and its safety education programmes. We have had much debate on safety matters when the amending Act was before the House.

There are nine safety associations and the board is spending an ever increasing amount of money in that field to assist them in safety work and education. In reference to the administration costs of the board I think that it is important to note that in these times, when the work of the board is increasing substantially, the increase in the cost of administration and staff is not increasing at the rate of claims or payments.

Since 1957, while claims reported increased 37 per cent, employers covered increased 52 per cent and benefits paid increased by 119 per cent, the board's staff has increased by only 8 per cent. The actual costs of administration were 7 per cent of the funds received from the employers. That is a decrease, I would point out, of 4 per cent in 1967.

Now I had intended to end by issuing an invitation to the hon. members of this House to go and see for themselves the operation of the board and its rehabilitative centre. I know that many members have been there and it has not yet been possible to suggest that to the board, but it is my plan to do so next year.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, as Minister speaking for the department in the House, it has been my concern that the workmen's compensation board and the legislation that it administers be kept up to date as much as possible.

I have taken careful note, as I said before, of the suggestions that have been made. We will, in the future months, seek to improve, as we have done progressively in the past, the workman's compensation legislation. I move the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: This completes this order of business; next order.

NOTICE OF MOTION

Clerk of the House: Government notice of motion No. 1, by Hon. J. P. Robarts:

RESOLVED:

That, henceforth, every member of this House, may as a matter of right in this House, address the House in either of the two official languages of Canada.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour today to introduce this motion to the House which provides for the right of any member of the legislative assembly of Ontario to address the House in either the French or the English language.

As I present this resolution to the House today, I would like to say just a few words to put it in its proper context. It is a very simple resolution, really, and I would say it does little more than formalize and recognize what has been the practice in this House for at least the years that I have been here. What we are doing in this resolution, in effect, is recognizing a fact, a situation.

As in so many of our approaches to constitutional problems in this province, we have not really required that it be written down and spelled out. I think in many of the discussions over constitutional issues which have arisen in the last few years, if you examine what has been done in this province, you will see that we have pursued perhaps what might be termed a typical Anglo-Saxon approach. We have dealt with the situations as they arose, in a very practical manner, and really not paying too much attention to the legal niceties in order that we might do what appeared to us to be the reasonable thing to do. And so it is with the use of language in this Legislature.

It has always been assumed that any member could speak here in either of the two languages in Canada. But in placing this resolution on the order paper, it seemed to me that the time has come perhaps to give this situation formal recognition as a result of some of the events in the last few months, perhaps the last few years.

There are several events that have occurred in the last year, which, I have no doubt, have influenced the thinking of many Canadians about the character of their country, and in particular the position of the two linguistic communities—if I may put it that way.

Among these events, I would mention the Confederation of tomorrow conference, which this government sponsored last fall. It was followed very shortly by the first report of the Royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. That event was, in turn, followed by a constitutional conference called by our former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, in Ottawa in February of this year.

Since that time, yet another document has come to our attention which deals, at least in part, with this matter. I am referring to the document that was tabled in this House last month—the report of the provincial committee on the aims and objectives of education.

It was interesting to read in that document a recommendation which stated that, quite apart from expanding all other levels of French language education, conversational French should be a compulsory subject of instruction during the first year of a child's schooling. This is a recommendation in the Hall-Dennis report. I think many of us here would wish that this had been possible in the early days of our own education in this province. Perhaps I could quote from the Hall-Dennis report, because it does express a point of view that is held by many of us, and one that I have, on several occasions, tried to make. If you will bear with me, I shall quote briefly from that report:

> History has made the English and French the original nation-builders in this half-continent. Common sense in the national interest demands that this fact be accepted without reservation, and made the instrument whereby a country, unique in this respect, may shine before the world as an example of what should be a worthwhile ideal. Ontario has a major role, perhaps a decisive one, in holding Canada together, and its educational system has a prime responsibility and opportunity in this field. Ontario, through its educational system, has the opportunity to cement the partnership between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians. The time is opportune for our educational authorities to say to all Canadians that French is not a foreign language in Ontario schools.

I think that that really is the nub of this entire situation.

> Notwithstanding the difficulties and shortages of personnel now existing, all boys and girls in the schools in the province must be given the opportunity of becoming conversant in both English and French, so that in the next generation our citizens may be competent to communicate freely with their fellows of the other tongue in Quebec or elsewhere. If this is part of the price of national unity, then let Ontario pay it gladly, for in so doing, it will not only do justice to all citizens, but its people will also reap rich dividends culturally and economically far beyond the cost of facilities and personnel needs to accomplish this result.

That is the end of the quotation from the Hall-Dennis report, and, Mr. Speaker, I cite these events merely to indicate the degree of progress that has been made. These are perhaps milestones as we go along the path of developing our country in its second century. There are many other public and private instances of initiative in this area.

However, it does seem to me that, with a resolution such as this, we really are doing nothing more than giving formal recognition to a situation that already exists. I believe that, in the hearts and the minds of our people, this must be accepted and that these things must have their greatest impact. That is why what we are doing today is nothing more or less than a formality.

At the conference in Ottawa in February, the government undertook certain actions. This, of course, was one of them. I do not intend to repeat what I said at that time, but we undertook to tackle the whole question of the French language in Ontario. We undertook to set up task forces to deal with various areas of the use of French in Ontario. We have achieved a good deal in the intervening period since February.

There has been legislation introduced in this House which will lead eventually to the provision of education at the elementary and secondary level for French-speaking children so that they may enjoy to the full the entire scope of our educational system. We have gone ahead with French primary and secondary schools. And we are going ahead with French teachers' colleges. We are going ahead with a French college of education. All of these matters will, of course, take time. But the beginnings have been made and I think we are able to say that we have carried out the commitments which we made in this area last February.

There are four task forces presently at work on the various problems which follow in the wake of those policy proposals we made in February. We will be receiving recommendations from these task forces in the next few months and I do not propose to do anything more today than to indicate the areas in which they are working in order that the House may understand that what we did undertake to do we are in fact doing.

We appointed a task force to deal with the very complex problem of the administration of justice. We set up another task force to deal with the use of the French language municipal administration. We set up another task force to deal with the use of French in the provincial public service. And finally, we set up a task force to deal with the use of the French language in regard to the Legislature, and our provincial statutes and official publications.

The task force on judicial administration, Mr. Speaker, is made up of the representatives from The Department of Justice and of the Attorney General, including the assistant Deputy Attorney General, who is the chairman; the registrar of the Supreme Court of Ontario; and the assistant chief magistrate of this province. This task force has on it as well the co-ordinator of the federal-provincial affairs secretariat and two research officers. That completes the group.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Nobody who speaks French?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Pardon?

Mr. Sopha: Anybody who speaks French?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Yes, there are French-speaking personnel in that group and—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Who are those people by name?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Pardon?

Mr. Singer: Who are those people by name?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, I would have to get the names for you because I have not got them all. But in answer to the question put by the member for Sudbury, the majority of the personnel in the provincial affairs secretariat are bilingual. We have some, whom I refer to as the modern generation of our university graduates, who just simply are bilingual, whereas people like myself are not —being one generation ahead of them.

But coming out of our universities now is a pretty constant flow of bilingual personnel for which I think we may all be thankful. These are the men we have employed in this particular area and I think we might very well look forward to a period when bilingual personnel will just simply be there as a matter of course. Because this is what is happening, particularly among the young people in our universities today.

Mr. Singer: You mentioned assistant Deputy Attorney General. Which one are you talking about?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Well, if you want to make a speech, you may do so in due course. If you want—

Mr. Singer: No, no.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: If you want me to list the personnel of each one of these task forces I will do that and table it here so that you will be able to know—

Mr. Singer: It would be helpful.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —you will be able to know because there are four complete task forces.

That particular group has been studying the provision of bilingual judicial services in Quebec and New Brunswick. I would not in any way attempt to minimize the difficulties that arise in the adminstration of justice, particularly when all the precedents, statutes and so on are in one language, when the whole basis of the law may be in one language and not two languages. But, nonetheless, this is all being gone into very carefully.

The municipal administration task force has three representatives form The Department of Municipal Affairs and once again, I have not their names but I will provide them. And it has two, three people from the federal-provincial affairs secretariat. This particular task force is examining the situation in various municipalities in Ontario to see what services are presently being provided; to see what services might necessarily be provided and, of course, to look at how much services are to be provided.

Once again, we are drawing upon the experience of the province of Quebec and the province of New Brunswick and this task force is studying how matters are dealt with in those provinces as well.

The provincial public service task force consists of two representatives from The Department of Civil Service plus three from the federal-provincial affairs secretariat. Hon. members will see that the federal-provincial affairs secretariat runs through all these task forces. Then, of course, there is one member from the advisory services division of the Treasury board that sits on this task force as well.

Its aim is to develop a set of general principles which might relate the use of two languages and which could be applied to all departments and all agencies of the government. As we have discussed this on other occasions, we have made it very clear that we had no intention of making people learn second languages, but we do need to recognize where the services of this government should be provided in both languages.

The House might be interested in knowing that we have instituted a rather intensive level of education in the civil service for those who are interested. I think that there are quite a few members of this Legislature who availed themselves of the courses that are being made available. There are some 222 people in the civil service who have been nominated for French language courses and many of these are presently in classes. Some of them are still being tested and we have some more intensive courses and broader courses which will be made available to the civil servants this fall.

We also propose to provide courses for those civil servants who are working in the field in French-speaking areas so that they may take the language courses as well. We think that we will have several hundred civil servants taking the courses in the fall. This will, of course, be in addition to the flow of the people, as I mentioned in reply to the comment by the member for Sudbury; this will be in addition to those people who are coming into the civil service today who are bilingual. The task force which is dealing with this Legislature and our statutes and various formalities of Legislature is made up of the Clerk of the assembly, his assistant, the legislative counsel, director of our translation bureau and, once again, those three members of the federal-provincial affairs secretariat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, very briefly these are the things we are doing today. This is the way in which we are carrying out the commitments we made last February. At that conference, I said this resolution would be presented in this House and once again, I reiterate that what we are doing is really recognizing a state of affairs which has existed for a good many years.

But I think it is very necessary that this motion be put and accepted by this House. I hope it will be accepted by the House unanimously because it will indicate in a formal fashion that we are not only aware of the necessity of recognizing the two languages, but that we are aware of the problem of which this is nothing but a sort of an indicator. I think any examination of the first volume of the report of the B and B commission, as it is known, will indicate to any thinking Canadian that these matters are much deeper than just the mere use of language.

It is a recognition of the place in the total community of Canada of our French-speaking compatriots. I am delighted, in this House, to move a resolution such as this, which will recognize this situation and which will indicate that in this province, we are prepared—not only prepared, but willing and anxious—and we approach wholeheartedly and with enthusiasm the whole question of the recognition of the French fact, as it has been put so often in Canada.

Perhaps I might end these few remarks with a quote from Dr. Claude Bissell, the president of the University of Toronto. As you know, he has recently spent a sabbatical year at Harvard and, addressing an audience there, he said as follows:

> Above all, I place great confidence in the changing attitude of English Canada. Particularly, of those English-Canadians who live in Ontario, an attitude now based more realistically upon the facts of history, on a consciousness of the harsh acerbities of the past and on the strength and exuberance that the French-Canadians can bring to the Canadian scene.

Personally, it is my own feeling that we are very, very fortunate to have in this country a dual culture such as we have. I think it is one of the great strengths of Canada and to paraphrase myself at that conference, I made the comment there that I honestly feel our children will say "What were they arguing about? What was the discussion?"

Because it will be so obvious, and must be so obvious, that here we have one of the great opportunities of any country in the world to put together two great cultures and out of this to produce a distinctive Canadianism which, I think, we discovered to some extent last year, our Confederation Year, and which is ours to deal with if we only will. That is why I am so pleased to place this resolution before this House this afternoon.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the introduction of this resolution recognizing the use of the French language in this House. Speaking on behalf of my party, I can say we support it wholeheartedly.

I know the Premier, when he paraphrased himself as saying "What are we arguing about?", would be the first to recognize that there has been no argument that I can discern in this House; that there has been acceptance on all sides of the programme that has been proposed for more than a year now—in fact for some years—and which was enunciated by the Premier at the federal-provincial conference in February.

I well remember that moment and, if I may say so, sir, I thought that the Premier spoke eloquently on behalf of the opinion that is generally accepted, certainly in this House and across the province, at the conference at that time. It was extremely well received by all concerned.

His comment also that it has been his experience recently that graduates of our university system tend to be, as a matter of course, bilingual is perhaps a reflection more on the secondary system than the university courses that are available. His experience is perhaps comparable with mine and that is the teaching of French was something less than exemplary and efficient, although it required a good deal of work in the secondary system up until perhaps about ten years ago. It may have been during his own term as Minister of Education that some changes were brought into being. I do not believe by any means that it has reached anything that could be called an approach to perfection.

The quote from the Hall-Dennis report indicates very clearly that there seems to have been some kind of a roadblock, mental or otherwise, in the extension of the teaching of the French language down into the elementary grades. We would be treated, if the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis), were here I am sure, to some sort of an interjection which would indicate that it was all a matter of staff, but as we have pointed out in this House many times there are alternatives to the one that the Minister of Education and the Cabinet have undertaken in this province.

I believe that we have been lagging in a system which, in many other ways, is very progressive in the modern methods of teaching an effective knowledge of the French language in the schools of this province.

There are many areas of considerable interest associated with the resolution. When one looks back on the rise and fall of prejudice against the French and against the English in the use of their languages in various parts of our nation, it makes an interesting study indeed.

We need only go out the front door of this chamber to see some of the political leaders from both parties and some parties that we do not hear of much any more, who were involved in this controversy over more than the last century. When the Parliament at Westminster, in their wisdom, joined together Upper and Lower Canada into the united provinces of Canada, the members of the then Parliament or Legislature, as I believe it was called, were forced to travel many miles in order to convene to conduct the affairs of the nation or colony, as I suppose it would better be called under those circumstances.

It is interesting to speculate not only on the problems that they would experience when they would travel to Quebec City where the Parliament was convened for a number of years, or Montreal or Kingston, on the other hand, when the French members had to travel great distances in order to fulfil their responsibilities, but it is interesting to speculate on the problems of language.

There was no simultaneous translation. The education system in those days, of course, did not even give or would give very few of the members the modicum of knowledge that enables us to follow some of our political colleagues when they undertake the use of the language with inadequate background.

So, we can trace, if we wanted to take the time this afternoon, and I do not want to do that, in detail, the changing views of those people associated with various religious, various political persuasions, in the history of our province.

I believe it is interesting to note that we may have come through one of the cycles in which the attitudes in some parts of our province and some parts of our nation have been not as progressive as they might have been in the acceptance of one language or the other.

That is why, for a variety of reasons, I welcome the resolution here which simply gives the resolution of the House the acceptance of something that has been accepted in a de facto manner for many years.

We realize the rules of the House do not permit the use, up until now, of any language but English, and yet we have been treated in my short time in the House, since 1962, to brief speeches not only in French, but in the languages of some of the other groups that have made up the strength of our province and our nationality. There are others who are better equipped to talk about that aspect of the strength of our province, and really the strength of the contribution to the debates here.

As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Stormont, the hon. Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Guindon) may take part in this discussion later in the afternoon, and we all remember his contribution, and it may very well be he will want to burst into song again. We can look forward to that, perhaps, as the hot afternoon draws on for some several more hours.

But in listening to the Premier recount our approach to extending bilingualism through the services of our administration, his administration, and through the municipalities of the province, we welcome this as well.

I have often felt there should be the availability of an up-to-date translation service here for all of us as members who have to carry on some of our correspondence in French. We can arrange this ourselves, but it seems to me that it could be a responsibility, and, I suppose it is for many departments, a responsibility of the administration to provide this service.

As far as speeches made in the Legislature are concerned, while I do not feel at this time simultaneous translation is anything that would add very much to what we are doing here and would have some considerable financial responsibilities associated with it, I hope that Hansard would have the facilities to translate a speech that is delivered in a language that is not readily understood by all of us as members.

Now, I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a formality. It is an important formality, however. It had been my intention perhaps to attempt some comments en français, but the heat of the afternoon, and the fact that a good many of my colleagues have indicated that they want to make some comments as well has made me, I suppose, lose my nerve as much as anything else.

But we on this side welcome the resolution warmly. We looked forward to the extension of bilingualism in the service, particularly as the services of this government move out into the municipalities of those areas which are predominantly French-speaking.

On other occasions I have had an opportunity to discuss the extension of the French language in education. This has been debated on several occasions, and it is not necessary to repeat our views there, they are well known.

So, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what changes this will make in our debates. I hope that our members from French communities and those who have a facility in the French language will feel at home and at ease in this House in the use of the language.

We can anticipate the use of some other languages, I expect as well, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will accept that use in the future as you have accepted the use of French in the past.

The matter under concern is one of great importance. The acceptance across the province is one that is much more enthusiastic now than it would have been, I suppose, even four or five years ago. And this is a change that all of us welcome, because we do live in a community that is changing, a community that is accepting the great advantage we have in our bilingualism, and the advantage beyond that in the languages and cultures that have come to us from so many nations of the world since 1945 and certainly before.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps the hon. leader of the Opposition would join me in seconding this resolution?

Mr. Nixon: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I would be honoured to be so associated.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by underlining and elaborating briefly on the basic points which the Prime Minister made in introducing this resolution.

As he indicated, this resolution merely formalizes what has become an accepted tradition in this House. In itself, it really is not a very great step forward. Therefore I think it is necessary that we should view this isolated effort at achieving a greater effort of bilingualism in the broader context of the programme that the government has given leadership in as enunciated over the past year.

Indeed, I think our objectives may be broken down into two.

First, I think we have got to give more effective teaching of French to those who are English-speaking now. The Prime Minister has noted the fact that, whether because of more effective teaching in the secondary school, as argued by the leader of the Opposition, or because of more effective teaching at the university level, we have more of our graduates today who are bilingual.

But I think we have to go right back into the school system, and to make certain that there is an opportunity for more extensive use of French in public schools and secondary schools, so that when one has completed some 12 or 13 years of education one will not be so completely bereft of a capacity to speak the language as has been the case in the past.

Secondly, and equally important, I think we have to note the objective of providing greater opportunitiy for speaking French to those for whom this is a mother tongue. Once again, this is in the making, so to speak.

We have the opportunity or the plans for the establishment of complete secondary schools as we now have complete public schools, in the language of French. The Prime Minister has reminded us this afternoon of the task forces which are tackling the problem of establishing bilingualism, not only in the general government services, in municipal affairs and in our courts—particularly in those areas which might become so-called designated areas, because they have a basic 10 per cent of population which is French speaking—but in a broader context, which I will not elaborate on further, Mr. Speaker. I think it is incumbent on us to make this resolution which I hope, along with the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, will be passed unanimously by this House to make it a meaningful resolution, because quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, at the moment there is danger that it is going to be a mere gesture.

If I may just paraphrase what the Prime Minister has said, that it merely formalizes what has been a tradition—quite frankly, if we have no freer flow in the use of French in the future than we have had in the past in this Legislature, it is rather difficult for anybody to argue that the Legislature will have become bilingual.

I think something more has to be done if one is going to achieve bilingualism, and here I have a measure of disagreement with the leader of the Opposition. I do not think it is possible to achieve a greater measure of bilingualism in this House unless you have simultaneous translation. Rarely are people going to speak French in the knowledge that many members of the House will not understand them while they are speaking French.

And they certainly are not going to be supplying copies of what they are saying in French and English. This is all too cumbersome.

If I may borrow the Prime Minister's term—if French is not a foreign language in Ontario, then to have a genuinely bilingual Legislature you must have a simultaneous translation of French so that the interjections and the free flow of the use of both official languages can take place in precisely the fashion that it can in the House of Commons at Ottawa.

I, for one, do not feel that the expense involved is going to be a great expense, in the broad picture of a Budget of $2.8 billion, and also in the context of the importance of achieving this objective.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to go into further elaborations in English on how this resolution can be made more meaningful. I propose to attempt to say what I have to say in the language which is about to become an official language in this Legislature.

Monsieur le président, je suis fort de vous asurer de l'appui chalereux du Nouveau Parti Démocratique à la résolution au nom du Premier Ministre. Je le félicite pour ses efforts à la fois généreux et clairvoyants pour accorder à la langue française la dignité qui lui revient. Il fait bien de promouvoir l'acceptation du français par tous les députés.

L'on n'a pas toujours accordé à la langue française une telle dignité, une telle acceptation—et l'avenir ne sera pas différent du passé tout simplement parce que nous adoptons cette résolution aujourd'hui. Ce sera seulement par son emploi frequent et spontané que le français deviendra une langue courante —comme l'anglais—dans cette chambre. Je présume que cela est le but de la résolution.

Pour attendre ce but, faudra-t-il modifier davantage les règles et les traditions de cette chambre. La stipulation qu'un député, s'adressant à l'assemblee législative autrement qu'en englais, doit d'abord fournir une traduction en anglais, ne devra plus s'appliquer au français. Si un député a le droit de s'adresser à la chambre dans l'une ou l'autre des deux langues officielles du Canada, il faut écarter cette règle. Si non, le français continuera d'être traité comme une langue de second zone.

Il se peut que, par courtoisie, les députés parlant en français voudraient fournir leur texte en anglais à tous pour permettre aux députés non-bilingues de savoir ce qu'ils disent. Mais cela devrait être question de courtoisie, non plus de règlement. Les interventions en français devraient être aussi spontanées que celles en anglàis.

Si nous sommes d'accord qu'il est à souhaiter que nos débats soient spontanés en français tout comme en anglais, faudra-t-il que nous nous entendons à propos d'encore deux choises. En premier lieu, il nous faut la traduction simultanée en chambre. Deuxièmement, monsieur le président lui-même devrait faire de son mieux pour devenir bilingue.

Sans le premier, il sera toujours impossible pour un député de se servir de la langue de son choix confiant d'être compris—si pas toujours approuvé. Le traduction simultanée permettra l'emploi du français lors des débats sur les crédits gouvernementaux: il est justement pendant ces débats que nous avons quelques unes des "prises de bec" les plus importantes entre ministres et députés.

Je suis persuadé que le premièr ministre veut que cette résolution soit plus qu'une simple geste de bonne volonté; qu'il veut vraiment faire quelque chose pour reconnaître le désir des députés de tous les trois partis pour améliorer le sort des francophones d'Ontario. Donc, monsieur le président, je lui prie instamment de consulter avec vous pour déterminer la meilleure façon à installer tout ce qu'il faut pour la traduction simultanée en cette chambre.

En plus, monsieur le président, et avec tout le respect que je vous dois et en connaissance de l'importante position que vous occupez dans cette chambre assemblée, je me permets de vous suggérer que vous devriez faire tout ce que vous pouvez pour apprendre à vous débrouiller en français. De cette façon vous pourriez rendre vos décisions et faire vos observations dans la même langue que le député à qui vous vous adresser.

Pour terminer, je voudrais exprimer au premier ministre ma reconnaissance pour la célérité avec laquelle il a d'abord accepté, et aussitôt agi, sur la suggestion faite plus tôt cette année à l'effet que l'on donne des leçons de français au députés. Comme un parmi plusieurs de notre parti qui se prévalent de ces leçons, je peux attester de l'excellence de l'instruction et de l'utilité de ce que nous essayons d'apprendre.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Bravo.

Mr. MacDonald: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker

—I do not know whether that "bravo" is in French or English—this resolution merely legalizes what has become a tradition. Nevertheless, I think that it is important because it reflects a greater measure of good will between the two founding peoples.

To borrow the Prime Minister's phrase, it is to be found "in the hearts and minds of our people". Also, it reflects a willingness to achieve a greater measure of bilingualism. In doing so, we will realize something more of the ideal of Confederation, which has been lost somewhere along the way in our first century.

It is vital for Ontario which has the largest bloc of French-speaking citizens outside of Quebec, to provide leadership. This resolution gives some expression to that leadership, and it is for that reason that it has our hearty enthusiastic endorsement.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister without Portfolio, the member for Stormont, has the floor.

Hon. F. Guindon (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate and to urge all members of the House to support the resolution before us.

I believe that the adoption of this resolution will constitute another important step in our Prime Minister's programme to maintain and strengthen the unity of our country.

In this programme, first priority has been given to the satisfactory resolution of the linguistic and cultural problem. Few, if any, will deny that this is one of the central problems facing Canadians as we embark on our second century. Solving this long-standing problem in a spirit of common sense and goodwill, will create a climate favourable to the resolution of our other difficulties in the constitutional and economic fields.

I wish to record the gratitude of all Franco-Ontarians to the Prime Minister and the government of Ontario for the measures being taken in this province to recognize the French fact and to implement the recommendations of the Royal commision on bilingualism and biculturalism.

I would first like to mention the tremendous progress which has been achieved in French-language training in our schools and colleges. Last August, the government announced establishment of French-language secondary schools within the publicly financed school system. This session, we approved legislation which sets out the provision for the establishment of public French-language elementary and secondary schools. While the principle of bilingual education had earlier been recognized, until these bills were placed before the Legislature by the hon. Minister of Education, no specific statutory guarantee had ever been made for French-language schools in Ontario.

To Franco-Ontarians, this is of immense significance, for it means that regulation 17 is now effectively dead and buried.

The process of establishing French-language schools and classes has been proceeding in several municipalities since last August. I am happy to inform the House that in my home town of Cornwall, instruction in the French language is well established at both St. Lawrence high schol and General Vanier secondary school and planning for expansion of the programme is going ahead. By September, 1969 it is hoped that instruction at St. Lawrence high school will be basically in French.

Our government's ultimate objective, now within our grasp, is to assure every Franco-Ontarian student the opportunity to be educated in his mother tongue from kindergarten through university and beyond.

In addition to this progress in the educational sphere, the government of the hon. John Robarts is encouraging the use of the French language in this Legislature by means of the proposal now before us and is pledged to extend the French language in the civil service and in other governmental services in areas of the province where the use of French is substantial. Special task forces as mentioned today by the Prime Minister, are now at work to determine the best methods of accomplishing these objectives and many of our public servants are engaged in French language courses.

On behalf of the French-speaking minority in this province, I wish to commend the Prime Minister and the government of Ontario for programmes and policies which will enable the French-speaking people of Ontario to participate more fully than ever before in the growth and development of this great province of ours.

I know that there are those within this province who are most unhappy with the measures I have just mentioned. Some, because they feel the programme does not go far enough; others, because they feel the Prime Minister and the government have already gone much too far.

Mr. Speaker, one cannot over-emphasize the importance of moderation at this period in our history. It seems to me that, as legislators, we must be the pace-setters in this respect.

For that reason, I was disappointed with certain remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur in his maiden speech to this Legislature. I envy his ability as a speaker and I applaud his courage in placing views on the record which differ from those of his leader. But, I must also deplore his failure to acknowledge the fact that French has been one of this country's official languages since its formation in 1867. Nor can I understand why his constituents should be worried about having the French language "forced down their throats".

I would refer them to the remarks of our Prime Minister who stated, and I quote:

> Speaking for the intentions and efforts of the government of Ontario, let me state, as explicitly as I can, that our aspirations to achieve a wider and more formal recognition of the French language in Canada will in no way force anything on anyone.

I therefore hesitate and regret having to challenge that portion of a speech made by the hon. member for Sudbury, which was devoted to our constitutional crisis.

My challenge is not prompted by any lack of sympathy on the part of the hon. member for Sudbury for the aspirations of French-Canadians—far from it—or he was most lavish in his praise of French-Canadians.

Instead, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the hon. member for Sudbury finds the British fact in Canadian history so objectionable for I believe that the monarchy and our monarchial form of government continues to have great relevance for large numbers of Canadians. I would remind the hon. member that the government of Ontario does not intend to be party to the transformation of this country into a republic, nor do we intend to allow anyone to interfere with the basic concepts of our constitutional monarchy and our Parliamentry form of government.

That is not to say there will be no changes. Changes are certainly necessary, but the need for them will be considered carefully in relation to all that has served us so well in the past, incuding the institutions and processes of law and government which we have inherited from the United Kingdom and which most of us continue to cherish.

It is appropriate to recall that the hon. George Etienne Cartier spoke of the need for moderation in his speech during the Confederation debates on February 7, 1865. He said:

> The fact however is that when we see such extreme opponents as Mr. Clerk of the "True Witness", Mr. McDougall of the "Witness" and the young gentleman of the "Institut Canadien" combined to resist Confederation because each party argues it would produce the most widely different results—we might look upon this fact, as one of the strongest arguments in favour of Confederation. We have, on the other hand, all the moderate men.

It is appropriate to recall also that each of the French-speaking members of this Legislature and, indeed, all previous Parliaments to my knowledge, regardless of their party affiliation, have been moderates. It is appropriate to recall what our Prime Minister has had to say on this subject:

> The future of Canada is too important to be left to the whims of extremists on either side of the present debate. We are moderates. We represent moderates. As such, we are determined to make an important contribution to the new Canada.

It might also be appropriate for me to address a few words through you, Mr. Speaker, to my French-speaking compatriots in the province of Quebec.

I would first like to emphasize the Prime Minister's request to them not to ignore the many significant changes that have taken place in this province and in other parts of Canada.

In Ontario, as we have seen, bilingual practices are being widely extended in many former strictly English-speaking institutions. Major changes have been made in our educational system and a new awareness of the French fact is being developed throughout this province. But I would remind our friends in Quebec that the implementation of bilingualism will be a lengthy, difficult and costly business. In the words of The Financial Post of July 6, 1968:

> Officials – federal officials that is – acknowledge that no matter how hard they try, the process of providing bilingual service will be long, slow and full of difficult technical obstacles. Federal effort, it should be remembered, is only a fraction of what is sought in the Royal commissioner's bilingual districts. All levels of government and many other services are involved. There will be, in short, no overnight transformation.

As our Prime Minister has stated, if these efforts are made to appear irrelevant by some authorities in the province of Quebec, as appears to be the case in some areas, it will be impossible for the rest of Canada to maintain progress in this field.

Results of the recent federal election have exposed the hollowness of the threat of separation. These results indicate that French-speaking Canadians in Quebec know that Confederation offers them the surest hope of preserving their language and culture.

Finally, I think the results of the election indicate the importance of the question of regional economic disparity within Quebec as well as throughout the rest of Canada.

In September the average wage or salary paid by British Columbia industries was $116.87. Ontario's figure was $107.70. Alberta's $103.40 and Quebec's $103.22.

The six remaining provinces were all below the Quebec average, with the lowest being Prince Edward Island at $72.54. Mr. Speaker, these figures indicate that, in September of 1967 there was a spread of $44 in the average weekly wage between Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. That breaks down, of course, to over $8 per day or more than $1 per hour.

Under these circumstances it is easy to understand why these Canadians are not unduly concerned about the preservation of French language and culture and constitutional amendments. It is easy to understand why our Prime Minister insists that the highest priority must also be given to the problem of regional economic disparity.

Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this resolution, I believe, represents another important step in Ontario's programme to strengthen national unity by recognizing the legitimate aspirations of Franco-Ontarians.

I was most delighted, Mr. Speaker, to see that the resolution is being seconded by the leader of the official Opposition and is supported so strongly in both English and French by the leader of the NDP in this Legislature.

I think it is a reasonable step. It is a moderate step. Let us take it with complete unanimity.

Monsieur le Président, il serait impensable que l'humble député du comté de Stormont qui depuis plus de 11 ans a eu l'avantage de parler dans cette Chambre honorable en français, aux applaudissements de collègues quit sont de langue anglaise, il serait impensable dis-je, de terminer ces quelques remarques sans le faire dans l'une des deux langues officielles du Canada, je veux dire: la langue française. Et j'ai l'impression, monsieur le Président, de me faire l'interprète fidèle de la pensée des quelques 700 milles francophones qui demeurent dans cette province en exprimant d'abord au Premier Ministre, à son gouvernement, et à tous les membres de cette Législature, leur reconnaissance pour le courage, la compréhension et la bonne volonté qui vient de se manifester aujourd'hui en ce que je dirais une heure solennelle et un moment historique.

Comme on le sait depuis quelques années, les canadiens en général, peu importe leurs origines, s'interrogent sur l'avenir de notre pays. Et dans ce dialogue, comme je le dissais tantôt, les modérés vont, je crois, jouer le plus grand rôle. Bien sûr, quand on joue un rôle sans tambour ni trompette, nous n'avons peut-être pas la publicité que nous aurions eu en réclamant des méthodes subverssives beaucoup plus révolutionnaires mais, néanmoins, nous avons tous, je crois, travaillé dans le plus pur intérêt de notre province et de notre Canada en restant calmes devant cette mer houleuse parfois et en comprenant le problème et en l'étudiant à la bonne franquette comme nous l'avons fait cet après-midi.

Je ne peux m'empêcher de féliciter tous ceux qui ont pris part à ce débat dont le parrain la résolution lui-même, le Premier Ministre, appuyé par le chef du parti de l'opposition officielle lui appuyé solidement par le chef du nouveau parti démocrate qui s'est exprimé dans un français impeccable cet après-midi.

Je crois qu'il faut faire l'impossible pour promouvoir l'unité nationale dans notre pays et pour cela je sais que le temps me manque d'en dire plus long, mais pour cela il faut éviter, il faut bannir les mouvements extrémistes. Pour ce faire, je crois qui'il faut nous donner la main peu importe nos affiliations politiques, donner l'exemple et par la parole et par tous les moyens possibles afin de ne pas donner naissance à ces mouvements réfractaires qui ne veulent après tout que la destruction du plus beau pays au monde.

Nous sommes inquièts et avec raison de certaines déclarations attribuées à des associations de la belle province. Je l'ai souligné tantôt en anglais. Certaines de ces déclarations semblent préconiser l'unilinguisme, or comment pourrait-on les accepter à cette heure-ci du dialogue où en Ontario et dans d'autres provinces on parle de bilinguisme. Nous ne pouvons pas accepter la théorie de l'uniliguisme dans la belle province soeur. D'ailleurs depuis toujours, le Québec a jalousement respecté les droits inaliénables des minorités et je crois que cela a été l'argument le plus fort en faveur d'un bi-linguisme d'un bout à l'autre du Canada. J'ai la ferme confiance et j'ai l'espoir que nos frères du Québec vont continuer à pratiquer cette méthode déja vieille de plus de cent ans.

Aujourd'hui en terminant, monsieur le Président, je crois que nous venons de poser un geste de bonne foi. D'une certaine façon, le Canada anglais tend la main au Canada français et je puis vous assurer encore comme interprète de cette minorité francophone que nous la serrons avec chaleur, avec franchise, avec gratitude, avec amour, et nous fixons notre regard sur un ciel plus prometteur.

En terminant, monsieur le Président, je n'ai pas l'intention de finir mon discours par un refrain comme ce fut le cas la dernière fois mais je ne puis m'empêcher de répéter pour une dernière fois ces vers de Sire Georges Etienne Cartier, "O Canada, mon pays, mes amours"—"O Canada, my country, my native land."

Mr. Speaker: The member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

Mr. A. W. Downer (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on this resolution. I am not opposed to the resolution as it stands, but I have an idea that this is only the first step. I would like to know what further steps the government has in mind?

First of all, I think that the resolution is quite unnecessary, as the subject that it deals with is something that is already accepted in this House, sir. It has been accepted here for quite a long time.

In the British House of Commons, there are many, many unwritten rules. As a result, the rules are far more flexible than they are here. I think that the same sort of thing should apply in this House.

This resolution is meaningless unless it leads to something else, such as to make the province bilingual, something never envisaged by the fathers of Confederation, or by those great men who drew up the Act of Union of 1841.

To carry this to its utmost conclusion, would mean the expenditure of millions of dollars that we can ill afford. There are so many other items far more important on which to spend this vast sum.

It would mean Hansard in two languages. The court reporters, the stenographers, all along that line, would have to have their reports in both languages. It would also mean that immigrants coming to the province would have to learn two extra languages. You know that one is difficult enough to master. These people would have to know their own native tongue and the two languages that they would have to have here.

Now, I am not concerned with the racial or religious overtones of the people of Canada. It is my very firm belief that we should call ourselves Canadians, not Irish Canadians, or Scotch Canadians, or German Canadians, or French Canadians—just Canadians. People should say: I am a Canadian. That is the proudest word that one could use.

It has been proved, too, in many parts of the world that the two language state is not always a happy state, or a contented state. Take Belgium for example. The Flemish and the Walloons are always at loggerheads and each other's throats. The same is true in South Africa with the two language groups there, the Afrikaans and the English.

Mr. D. M. De Monte (Dovercourt): They have three official languages in Switzerland and there are no problems there.

Mr. Downer: They have their problems there, too. Now, we hear much these days about the "minority" and the "rights of the minority", and they get a lot of publicity in all news media. Consequently, a great deal of the attention focussed on them is often wholly out of proportion to the importance of most of the issues involved. But no one who believes in democracy would deny a minority group the right to a hearing, or permit any injustice that they might possibly be subject to. But the word minority implies inequality. This, I contend, sir, is not true here in Ontario. We have our human rights code, which provides penalties for anyone who would discriminate against another on the basis of religion, or race, or colour, or language, and surely we have covered the whole situation.

The minorities have the same rights as the majority, but they should not have any greater rights. Canadians of French descent in the province do not lack anything that the majority possesses. Resolutions do not always cure the ills that they are supposed to cure, and sometimes they intensify the troubles. If there is a feeling that giving these people more rights would make for better relations between the different areas of Canada, then I feel that the idea is erroneous.

It is my feeling that the major difficulties are not linguistic or cultural, but economic. Why we are constantly dealing with the small side issues and not facing the real problems is more than I can understand. The great freedoms: religion, assembly, and speech, are enshrined in all our hearts, but freedom from want is not yet secure. Secure that freedom, and I am sure that all our other difficulties would disappear, and that is why I say that this resolution is meaningless.

Here in this House, the French have the right and they have had it for some time, to use their language. The fact that almost one-third of Canadians are of neither French or English origin, points up the serious disruptive consequences which would result from designating any language as a second official national language. In June 26, 1877—my predecessor was talking about 1865—Sir Wilfrid Laurier had this to say in the city of Quebec:

> Can you find under the sun a happier country where French people enjoy greater privileges? Why then do you try to claim rights incompatible with our state of society, to expose the country to an agitation, the consequences of which it is impossible to conceive?

Well again I say that bilingualism is not essential to national unity. The opposite is true, and the truth is that no country with two languages can ever hope to be really united. I mentioned this before and I think it will bear repetition: Belgium, India, South Africa, are examples, and in nearly every case, the language is used to emphasize or segregate a particular segment of the population. There is no surer means of division. Let us have one nation, not two, or ten. We are all of equal importance, with equality of opportunity, with everyone in full possession of their democratic rights and liberties which have been the heritage of free men. Freedom for all.

Friends, Mr. Speaker, freedom will be a reality, and only a reality when social security and human welfare for all our citizens become a fundamental objective of the nation. Thank you very much.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Port Arthur.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Monsieur le President: Ce de langue française jouiront du decision de cette assembée a introduire, a apprendre et a parle la langue française. Et j'ai beaucoup admire ce de nos deputes qui ont sacrifier de longues heures pour étudier la langue. J'admire aussi tout l'esprit que ce qui ne sont pas de langues française ont montre dans ce projet.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that all those of the French language in this province will applaud the decision of this assembly to introduce, to learn and perhaps even to speak, the French language. Certainly, I would like to say now that I very much admire those of our members who have sacrificed many long hours in order to study the French language.

I have also admired the wonderful spirit with which those who are not of the French language have shown toward this entire project of bringing French to some official capacity in the province.

This does not mean that I agree with the principle. I think that the dean of this House —the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe is to be congratulated—has certainly won my respect because he has proven himself a man of courage to go against a resolution that has been introduced in this House by the Premier of the province. I very much admire him for what he has done. He is saving face for us.

I have been very much afraid all along that this issue—not issue, this intention—of bringing, or validating, the French language to some official capacity, would be done through the enactment of legislation which might not have undergone the test of argumentation in the House. It seems to me that nothing should be legislated upon, no law should be brought into effect in this Legislature that has not been put to the test of fire, a proper debate. I would hope that some of the contributions I have made would help to do just that.

We are talking about a large expenditure of money. We are talking about introducing and changing – altering really – the social aspect of our Ontario society. We are elevating French to a new position. We are certainly elevating the bilinguist to a position of privilege, and to say that the French language is not being forced down the throats of our people is wrong. The civil service—there are so many of them—these are residents of Ontario; they will now find it to their advantage to learn the French language in order to get into, perhaps, better positions. They may think that if they do not do it, they are going to be left behind. Try and tell me that French is not being forced down their throats.

Teachers who want to get ahead in this province and perhaps stay ahead of certain French teachers, who would be brought in from Quebec, will be smart to learn the French language. I am sure a lot of them out there are doing it right now to stay ahead of the game.

This is perhaps one of the most difficult subjects I have ever tackled, not only in this House but anywhere, because, of course, my leader and this party stand pat in support of this legislation. I must say at this moment how much I admire our leader and our party for allowing me—perhaps this is why I am seated way off here in the corner to be a little bit of a rebel—but believe me I am not a rebel, I am not a bigot.

My remarks are not intended to exemplify the narrow mindedness of some people who are opposed to the introduction of the French language to some official capacity for what you might call very narrow minded reasons—very bigoted reasons—mine are not that way—I am extremely close to the French-English problem. I am exactly that myself—half-French and half-English.

I have had occasion in the last six months while commuting back and forth to Trenton, Ontario, to speak to many people of French origin and English origin from the Montreal area on the train. I have found that the French people in Quebec take no notice at all that Ontario is going French. It does not mean a thing to them. As a matter of fact, I brought the matter up during the question period in the House a few months ago, and as we read the paper we see it more and more they are phasing out the English language in Quebec. The English people from Quebec that I have spoken to are very disturbed and very upset about it, believe me.

So while we, in this province, are doing everything we possibly can to make the French more comfortable, it would seem that in Quebec everything possible is being done to make the English less comfortable. So I say to you, what are we accomplishing? We are going to satisfy, perhaps, 600,000 people. We are going to make them more comfortable, but will we be doing them a favour in the long run, because, after all, where will their children have to earn a living? Probably in Ontario, which is primarily English.

If we bring them up in the French language I do not think we are fully equipping them to earn a living and carry on a happy life in Ontario. I am sorry to be the one in this party to sound a contrary note to this thing, but I will not vote against the resolution. I will not vote against it, because I know it is going to go forward. I know it is going to be approved this afternoon, and I know that those who are supporting it are doing it with the highest and the best of intentions.

I know what an impression it has had on the Ontario residents of French origin. I know that all the intentions are proper and so for that reason I will support it. Another reason why I will support it is that the resolution states that both languages will be acceptable in this House, that we will all be able to speak one language or the other, and who am I to speak?

I have made use of that privilege already three times, but as the member for Dufferin-Simcoe, I am concerned about what this step will lead to. I am concerned about how much it will cost and how closely it will eventually affect the lives of our people personally.

Perhaps there is not too much outcry. Perhaps it is being found very acceptable right now by many people, but I do fear that once the principles that will follow from this initial one are put into effect—once these affect the lives of people in Ontario personally—we will hear a lot more.

I would like to echo the sentiments of the member for Stormont when he said that this will not be easy. He said it himself. We have launched on a difficult course, and it is we in the legislative position who are going to be responsible for whatever difficulties that arise from our legislation. There is a happy mood in the House today that we are going ahead with this very fine thing. We are being great Canadians. I certainly hope that when the days of difficulty come, we will be equally fine Canadians and be able to live up to the responsibility of our actions.

I wonder about this resolution that the Premier has introduced from this point of view. It seems a little bit premature inasmuch as the Legislature at this time is not equipped to handle both languages. I think that was proven very conclusively the other night when I put a few remarks to the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), and I had to translate my own remarks. I do not blame him, because I do not expect him to know French. I do not see why he should have to, and I do not see why he should—perhaps he felt no personal embarrassment, but in a way he was embarrassed.

It was as though he was a sort of lesser person because he was not able to react to my words in French. Of course, he is not, but this is what the French fact does. Once you accept it, this is what it does. There will be many moments of embarrassment in the future for the people of Ontario, because of this.

I say let us be extremely careful. I will certainly do everything I can to help this dream become a reality and to succeed. I will certainly not fight against it. I will argue against it at this time. I will put forth my reservations as I have, but I will certainly try to do everything I can to make a success of it later on. I think we should all try to obey the laws of the land, and this will become law. I will certainly do my best to obey it and to make whatever contribution I can to its success. But at this time, I would be very much a hypocrite if I did not voice my reservations.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate and I hope I will steer the debate on a different direction than the last two speakers have seemed to push this debate.

During the federal election, the Liberal candidate addressed our area over television in French. He told the people that it was very important that they vote for Mr. Trudeau because Mr. Trudeau would be the one to keep Quebec in Confederation, grant certain rights to French-speaking people. He tried to use the big stick to scare them and say that if they did not vote for the Liberal Party, that if separation took place, their rights in Ontario and their place in Ontario would be greatly jeopardized and they would, no doubt, lose their language.

I would like to compliment the hon. Prime Minister for the step that he is taking today in introducing this resolution and the leadership he has given in this field in this province. Because I think that he in the right direction. After listening to the last two speakers, I can see that there was some content in what that federal Liberal member had to say; that there are certain people in this province who would try to cut off the rights that the French-speaking people of this province should be granted—and slowly but surely they are being granted under this government.

I think it is important for us, as legislators, not to acquiesce in that which is not of the highest spirit. I think it is improper for us to reinforce prejudices and to try to preserve the status quo at all costs. I think it is important for us to lead, and to do that which is right and true and just. This was what I felt was my responsibility when I was in the pulpit, and I think this is my responsibility when I stand in this Legislature.

There are those in our province, our section of the province, who are unilingual; unilingual French. The majority of French people are bilingual. They have made the effort to learn English, but the English-speaking people too often have turned their backs and said they have got to learn our way and that is it.

The person who has been the loser has been the English-speaking person, because there is a great deal to be gained in learning another language, learning another culture and finding another way of looking at things and thinking about things.

I think some of the reforms that have been introduced in this session that we are to look forward to—French-speaking secondary schools in this province for those areas where there is a sufficient proportion of the population that are French-speaking—is certainly something that is overdue, and something that is very, very much welcomed by the French-speaking people of this province.

In my riding, the people have struggled along, financing their own French high schools, and this is a great relief to them.

Another thing that is of concern to me, is that there needs to be more French-speaking doctors in this province for the French-speaking population. The French-speaking people have all the rights of the English-speaking, we were told by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe.

I wonder if he has ever gone to a French-speaking doctor, or a doctor speaking some other language, and tried to explain all the aches and pains he has. There is often a breakdown of communication at this point, and I would like to say that I think that something more could be done in making the courts of this province bilingual. I do not feel the French-speaking people of this province are perhaps treated on the same basis as those of other languages. I think that certain rights should be given to them, and that we should have bilingual judges and bilingual magistrates and, if possible, the courts conducted in French in areas where there is a large part of the French population.

I would like to say to the English-speaking members of this Legislature that we have a great deal to learn from the French when it comes to broadmindedness, generosity of spirit. We are far behind them, and there is a great deal that needs to be done on our part to catch up.

Certainly this resolution would mean that we have to perhaps pay a good deal of money for translation services, to have simultaneous translation and so on, but I think it is worth the effort to make our French-speaking people of this province realize that this is their province too, and that they have done a great deal to open up the north country. They have pioneered and they sometimes have sacrificed as much, and maybe more than some of us who are English-speaking.

I am very happy about this resolution, and I give it my whole-hearted support. I had hoped that all of the members of this House would speak in favour of it. I hope that the members of the government party will follow the Prime Minister in the lead that he has given here, and in conclusion, I would just like to say this:

Je donne mon appuie à cette résolution.

Mr. W. E. Johnston (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I intend to support this resolution, but at the same time, to place on the record some views of mine which I know are shared by the majority of residents in the historic riding of Carleton.

There is anxiety and insecurity about the future of our nation, and I sense this throughout my own constituency. We are deeply troubled about this, and feel that now is the time to review the situation carefully before we go any further down this uncertain path.

Mr. Speaker, much of this atmosphere of crisis has been created by the spurious claims of power-hungry politicians, who ignore the realities of the past, present or future, and who are spreading their philosophy throughout the land in a most irresponsible manner.

Yet out of the various demands which have been presented to us it is possible, for the first time, to get a glimpse of what the leaders in the province of Quebec are demanding. It was set out quite clearly by Laurier LaPierre in the Toronto Telegram of February 3.

According to LaPierre, we must first accept the proposition that two societies—English and French—constitute the totality of Canada. Then we must discard the old scheme of majority-minority relationships and understand Canada as the manifestation of two co-equal societies.

Next, we must re-write our constitution from scratch so that, as he says: "This co-presidency will exist over a free, independent sovereign republic of Canada".

Mr. Speaker, it would be nice if one could dismiss this concept as the pipedream of a single French-speaking socialist. However, I believe that those who have read the B and B report, and followed the conference in Ottawa know that LaPierre's alternative to Confederation is a pretty accurate description of the full price we will be asked to pay to keep this nation together.

I am worried, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution before us—which is reasonable and acceptable—is simply the first step towards official bilingualism throughout Canada, and beyond that to the acceptance—in one form or another—of two co-equal societies, one English-speaking and one French-speaking.

We are being asked, it seems to me, to deny the British fact in our history and to discard those concepts of freedom, justice and democracy as expressed in our British traditions and institutions of government, and under which our province and our nation—including Quebec—has prospered as few other lands anywhere in the world. We are being asked to forget the contribution which those whose origins are neither French or English have made in the development of our country.

We are being asked to believe that, for 200 years, the French language and culture have been oppressed, and to accept a major share of the blame for the dissatisfaction and turmoil which exist in the province of Quebec today.

I reject this proposition. I feel that the resolution before us will do little to placate the demands of Quebec, or to promote national unity. On the contrary, by its implications for the nearly 2 million citizens of this province who are neither French nor English, it may well have a divisive effect. This resolution is based on the recommendations contained in book 1 of the B and B report.

I am certainly no language and culture expert, Mr. Speaker, and frankly I am confused by this report. First of all, on page 21 we read the terms of reference, and I quote:

> The essence of the commissioner's terms of reference is:
> To enquire into and report upon the existing state of bilingualism and biculturalism in Canada, and to recommend what steps should be taken to develop the Canadian federation on the basis of an equal partnership between the two founding races, taking into account the contribution made by the other ethnic groups to the cultural enrichment of Canada, and the measures that should be taken to safeguard that contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to agree with these terms of reference. As we have already seen, The BNA Act was an attempt, in part, to overcome the evils of an equal partnership between Canada East and Canada West. Today we are being asked to accept this unworkable and undemocratic principle of equality between our two linguistic groups as the basis for the new Canada. This proposition must surely be rejected if Canada is to survive as a nation.

On page 31, the commissioners explain their definition of culture as follows:

> In this sense, which we ourselves shall use, culture is a way of being, thinking and feeling. It is a driving force, animating a significant group of individuals united by a common tongue and sharing the same customs, habits and experiences.
> Clearly, the two cultures designated in our terms of reference are those associated with the English and French languages in Canada. But, as there are the two dominant languages, there are two principal cultures and their influence extends, in greatly varying degrees, to the whole country.

In this definition, Mr. Speaker, you will note there is no reference at all to either religion or education. The definition of culture from the Concise Oxford Dictionary is as follows: follows:

> The training and refinement of mind, tastes and manners; the condition of being thus trained and refined; the intellectual side of civilization.

The Standard College Dictionary defines culture as:

> The training, development and refinement of mind, morals or tastes; the condition thus produced, refinement, enlightenment. The sum total of the attainments and learned behaviour patterns of any specific period, race or people regarded as expressing a traditional way of life, subject to gradual but continuous modification by succeeding generations.

Webster says:

> The body of customary beliefs, social forms and material traits constituting a distinct complex of tradition of a racial, religious or social group.

The commission's definition hardly seems adequate for the situation in Quebec, where education was almost completely in the hands of the church from the very beginning until 1964. In such a situation, education and religion together were, I suggest, the dominant factors in the culture. In case there is any doubt about this statement, let me quote from French-Canadian authorities.

From the classic novel, Maria Chapdelaine, we can get a glimpse, I believe, of what we are talking about:

> Three hundred years ago we came and have remained . . . strangers have surrounded us whom it pleases us to call foreigners; they have taken almost all the power; they have taken almost all the wealth. But in Quebec nothing has changed. Nothing will change because we are a pledge.
> That is why it is necessary to remain in the province where our fathers dwelt and to live as they lived, so as to obey the unwritten commandment which shaped itself in their hearts, which passed into ours and which we must transmit in turn to our innumerable children. In the land of Quebec, nothing must change.

Then we have Maurice Duplessis, the father of the Union Nationale Party:

> The Legislature of Quebec is a fortress that we must defend without failing. It is that which permits us to construct the schools which suit us, to speak our language, to practice our religion, and to make laws applicable to our population.

That this culture has survived and flourished under our federal structure, no one in this country can deny. Nor can anyone deny the fact that in the political sphere it has motivated French-Canadians to exert a much more important influence on the federal government than any other single province in the country. For example, Mr. Speaker, since 1900 the Quebec vote has been an almost solid bloc vote—except on three occasions, in 1911, in 1930 and in 1963.

Throughout that period, the Quebec majority in the federal Parliament has sat on the government side in all administrations except four.

In the economic sphere, Quebec has certainly lagged behind Ontario, but this has little to do with linguistic or cultural inequality. As early as 1706, the intendant of New France included in a report the following statement:

> The English do not leave their homes as most of our people do. They till their ground, establish factories, open mines, build ships, and have never looked on the fur trade as anything but a subordinate part of commerce.

From the beginning, French-Canada chose to follow a different way of life, which in many respects did not undergo any radical change until about 1960. The classical tradition of French-Canadian colleges prevented graduates from playing their full part in the scientific, engineering and business development of their province.

To realize how much blame attaches to the educational system—with which English Canada had nothing to do, one need only look at the intense efforts now being made to reform the system, to fit it better to the times in which we live.

The situation outside Quebec is very different, and differs again from one province to another. Here in Ontario, as the Prime Minister has often stated, we are proud and fortunate to have many cultures; the products of different racial backgrounds, religions, and so on. English Canadians today are not united by environment, language, education and heritage to the same extent as is the French-speaking Canadian.

This may not have been true of Ontario at Confederation, when this province contained about 13,000 persons whose ethnic origin was neither English, French nor American. But, fortunately, for us, our ancestors were less interested in the purity of English culture than in the development of our province.

As a result, Mr. Speaker, we have in Ontario today a total of 1,877,615 persons whose ethnic origin is neither English nor French. Franco-Ontarians number 647,941. However, in the B and B report, the commissioners have chosen to show the composition of our society by mother tongue rather than ethnic origin. The differences between these two sets of figures are quite revealing.

For example, the B and B report shows only some 183,000 citizens of German origin, whereas in fact there are over 400,000. We are fortunate and proud to have these wonderful people in this province, and the same must be said for the Italians, Dutch, Polish, Scandinavian, Ukrainian, Jewish and others —including our Indians and Eskimos.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the B and B commissioners have placed undue emphasis on the language aspect of culture, and in their recommendations they appear to have completely ignored the other ethnic groups in this province, who today outnumber Franco-Ontarians by more than three to one.

I am further confused by our government's acceptance of bilingualism but not biculturism. I agree completely with the Prime Minister's statement that we have many cultures here in Ontario, although they are expressed in the English language. If then, our citizens of German origin, for example, can retain their cultural heritage while speaking English, why is it not possible for Franco-Ontarians to do the same?

Our province has already embarked on a considerable programme of French language training in our schools, and this programme has been accepted and supported by voters throughout the province. The object of this programme, I believe, should be to ensure equality of opportunity for all our children, that their education is not handicapped by the language spoken in the home. The same priority should be given to special English classes for children of new immigrants who are unable to speak English.

But I think we must be realistic. The teaching of English to all groups in this province is of paramount importance unless bilingualism is imposed on the entire province. This I know is not the intention of the government.

Consequently, if we are not to prejudice our children's futures, we must recognize these facts. Extension of French language training in our schools must take into account the needs of our children as we, in this province, see them—and not as a response to the unending demands from the province of Quebec, or anywhere else.

For the same reasons, I feel that the extension of provincial and municipal services in French is of more doubtful value still. It will be a costly programme to implement and difficut to control. But what is much more important, I feel, is the fact that unless such facilities are provided throughout the entire province, we are simply going to separate or isolate our Franco-Ontarians from the mainstream of life in this province.

What is the advantage, Mr. Speaker, in providing these services to Franco-Ontarians? Do they want to be separated in this way, or do they want to become Ontarians in the same way as those of all other ethnic origins, including English, Irish and Scottish?

In other words, Mr. Speaker, are we acting in the best interests of all the citizens of this province, or are we simply reacting to the unrealistic demands of Mr. Johnson and others in the province of Quebec? This is the question that must concern us in this House.

Mr. Speaker, the need for an honest appraisal of this Confederation crisis is long overdue. Those French-Canadians who liken the situation in Quebec to that of a new nation seeking freedom, are using spurious analogies to lessen the burden of their own responsibility. They are the ones who belong to the colonial school of thought. They believe that all Quebec needs to do to move ahead is to free itself from the colonialism of the English regime. However honestly held, this view is wrong, because French-Canadian colonialism or oppression is a state of mind, and not a reality!

By acceding to their demands, language or otherwise, we merely cover up the hard, cold fact of life. Even if we all learn to speak French, what of the 200,000,000 English-speaking Americans who are our closest neighbours and friends and with whom we do the bulk of our business?

In this respect also, Mr. Speaker, our neighbours in Quebec are far from realistic. If they want to do business with Americans—and they do—they must learn to speak English, whether they call themselves Canadians or something different and regardless of the language spoken in the rest of Canada.

Ironically enough, Mr. Speaker, it is the French-Canadians' linguistic and cultural freedom which has effectively separated them from the mainstream of progress and development in North America. Nor is separatism a reasonable alternative. On February 7, the Globe and Mail reported the major findings of a study on the economic implications of separatism carried out by a Mr. Brichaut, Belgian-born economist who has been studying the subject since last fall.

Mr. Brichaut said that:

(a) Mr. Levesque's plan for maintaining economic ties with the rest of Canada after separation would never work, because of English Canada's adverse reaction to separatism. This has been confirmed by Lester Pearson himself.

(b) Quebec as an economic entity is a figment of the imagination of Quebec nationalists.

At the last count, according to the gentleman from Belgium, he said that in practice that Quebec is totally dependent on the presence and goodwill of outsiders for its economic survival, both internally and in international markets. As the instability and economic situation worsened in an independent Quebec, the government would seek to exercise an ever-increasing degree of control over the business world.

The residents of my riding, Mr. Speaker, were greatly reassured by the Prime Minister's detailed and forthright statement on the Confederation crisis to this House on February 27. This explanation has dispelled much of the concern created by conflicting reports on Ontario's position at the recent Ottawa conference.

I feel certain that they would wish me to support this resolution, since it simply formalizes a practice of long standing. At the same time, they are concerned, as I am, with the uncompromising attitude of the province of Quebec. With each concession from English-speaking Canada the ante is raised. The bill at the Ottawa conference was higher than at Toronto. And we are still not certain what the final bill is likely to be. I agree with Eugene Forsey who said recently:

> Canadians are hearing too much about the French fact, and not enough about the British.

For that reason, sir, we feel that Ontario should extend the hand of compromise no further in the interests of national unity until it has been established—beyond doubt—which nation we are attempting to preserve.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will permit me, by making a personal reference, to tell you of the joy I experienced yesterday when I visted a summer camp on Lake Nipissing. It is operated by a priest who is an outstanding figure in our community, Father Regimbal. He, incidentally, is the brother of Roger Regimbal, the joint chairman of the Conservative convention at Maple Leaf Gardens last September.

This camp, operated by La Centre des Jeunes de Sudbury, was a girls' camp and my daughter, ten years old, grade 5 at Ecole Ste. Denis was a participant in the very entertaining programme that they put on for the parents. And I stress to you, sir, the extreme pleasure that I felt that there was not a word of English spoken all afternoon. And I tell you about the parental pride that I experienced when I heard my daughter participate in this programme speaking in fluent French.

My son started le jardin last September at Ecole Ste. Denis. We live in a community where there are many bilingual schools. We moved in April and quite close to the area of the town in which we now live there is a bilingual school. Toward the end of the school year, my wife and I wondered how well our son was getting on in French. We had heard that boys were not as proficient as girls, so we asked him one night at supper, to say something. The only thing that he knew, sir, was his prayers.

Now we are Protestants. Whereas my mother and grandmother might be horrified at a Protestant learning Catholic prayers, we live in the age of ecumenicity now and participation in the religious exercises of other faiths in the present world is perfectly all right. He is very good in French in prayers, but I must say that every time he lost his place he had to go back to the beginning and start over again. This took the better part of a half hour to get through them once.

Well, sir, I make that reference in saying what are the realities of the past. That phrase was used twice by the member for Carleton. What personally are the realities of the past?

My great grandfather came down out of Quebec and got a Crown grant of land in Belleville, sometime around 1840. After that, his place of residence in Quebec was obscured in the mist of the past and none of the family after that could say precisely from what part of Quebec he came from except that it was on the south shore.

Our name was Sauvé then and my great grandfather Sauvé married an English-speaking woman who had come out here indentured as a maid, as a domestic. She worked at a place called Codrington, down near Belleville. She changed the family name, the religion and the language—all in one fell swoop.

I have seen pictures of her. She was a very fearsome woman, very dominant.

Well, what are the realities to me, personally? The realities, then, are that finally things become rectified in about three generations. My children become fluent in the French language and are also able to speak the English, the mother tongue, with facility.

I deeply regretted the attitude taken by the member for Carleton and the member for Dufferin-Simcoe, as much as did I regret the participation of support of my esteemed colleague for Port Arthur. The realities of course, are that this country started on the Plains of Abraham when those two young men fought it out.

They talk about youth taking over today. Wolfe was 32 and Montcalm was 47, when they fought it out. By the chances of fate, the English were victorious. The choice left with the English, as conquerors at that point, was whether to treat the French as conquered people or to do what they, in fact, did—to treat them as equal partners in the building of the nation on the northern half of this continent.

That decision was affirmed, of course, by a statutory enactment of 1774 and reaffirmed in 1791. From that time on, French Canadians were accepted as equal participants. Now that rose out of the climate of the times. The threat of the American revolutionaries and the uncertainties as to what the Indians might do. All those things led to those decisions. But the decision was taken, and it is part of our history.

That decision was only really changed once and that was referred to by the member for Dufferin-Simcoe. Lord Durham was sent out here in the latter part of the 30s and he took a very patronizing and cavalier view of the French Canadians. His report is distilled in one part of it where he says in effect that the best thing we can do for those people is to save them by anglicizing them.

We will get them all speaking English and that will solve all the problems of the two nations warring in the bosom of a single state. But that did not work and John Diefenbaker was so horribly wrong at Maple Leaf Gardens when he called that experiment of 1841 a two-nation policy. It was the very opposite of that. It was a one-nation policy with the intention of eliminating the French Canadian.

By 1857, of course, it was recognized that that would no longer work and something had to supplant it. What, in fact, supplanted it was that the French Canadian refused to be anglicized. He survived by the multiplication of birth. Really he won the war in the bedrooms of French Canada. That is where it was won.

Well, there were just a few thousands at the time of the conquest. These people who treat French as their mother tongue have multiplied until today the French fact referred to by the member for Stormont, the hon. Minister means that there are six million people—the French culture, heritage and language—who live in a single geographic entity. No matter what English Canada may think, or wish, those six million people are not going to go away. It is a fact of life of this nation, a basic characteristic of Canada, that there are two peoples of two languages, different heritages, and different cultures.

Here is the only point in which I disagree with the Prime Minister, with whom I have very sincere and deep admiration this day for having the courage to put this resolution on the order paper, and to call it, and invite its passage by this House.

He says it formalizes what has been the practice in the past; I do not think that it does any such thing. All Canadians who were alive to public events, watched the Prime Minister of Ontario at his Confederation for tomorrow conference, and the posture that he adopted at the subsequent conference at Ottawa in February. He did not say to his fellow Premiers that this would be a formal act, and he undertook to them at that time that he would take steps to make Ontario more of a bilingual province.

Today, passing this resolution, it is more than formality, I say to my friend from Stormont, it is a qualitative change. We make a far-reaching change in the life of this Legislature and its customs. Because the Legislature expresses by its vote, that its will shall be, hereafter that both the languages shall have equal and official reception in these halls, it is more than a formality.

Two other things ought to be said; one is that the French-Canadian has a catch phrase, "Je me souviens". He has much to remember in his past. I referred to one of the things that he remembers, the Act of Union of 1841, and the member for Stormont referred to another which I will not repeat, which was part of the history of this province. There are many other indignities that have been heaped upon him and his language.

One thing is to be marked in the attitude of the French Canadian, he has always been immaculately tolerant of minorities himself. In passing this resolution, this House catches up to Quebec. French and English have always been guaranteed official status in the province of Quebec, and both languages have been used for many years in their Legislature. The statutes are printed side by side in French and English.

Mr. MacDonald: Therefore we do not catch up.

Mr. Sopha: But we take a step toward catching up. I do not want to stop to quibble with my friend from York South (Mr. MacDonald) who made a very fine contribution this afternoon, but we ought to have some reservation, some modesty about the act we take, that its parallel was passed many years ago in the province of Quebec, where the province has always been accommodating to the English language.

The other thing that ought to be said is that in the vein, the tenor, the quality of what Pierre Elliott Trudeau said across this country in the contest just finished, that French Canadians, if this country is to survive, must feel at home in all parts of Canada. They must feel that they and their language especially, are welcome in all parts of the country, and that French Canadians, when travelling from one end to the other of the country will encounter multitudes of people, and especially those in the government service who are able to receive what they have to say, and to make reply in their own language.

Illustrative of that, there is a delightful story told by J. J. Greene, when he was Minister of Agriculture, of the farmer who came from the province of Quebec to the Department of Agriculture offices in Ottawa, and spent all of one day trying to get in to see the Minister. Finally, just before 5.00 o'clock, he got into Mr. Greene's office, and told Mr. Greene: "It is the first time that I have been to Ottawa, the capital city, and everyone I encountered spoke English, and I could not find anyone in the government offices who spoke French. Why is it, Mr. Greene, that I have to wait until the end of the day, in the office of the Minister, to encounter the first person who is able to converse with me in my own language? Is it truly the capital of my country where I come and wish to come and speak one of the official languages and find difficulty in speaking to someone? I think that I will go home and stay there, in Quebec, rather than to visit what, to me, seems to be a foreign country".

Well, that is the message that Mr. Trudeau conveyed in one part of this country to the other, and that is the message of the B and B commission. Notwithstanding the member for Carleton's inability to understand it, so he said. Surely he understood that part of the report that expressed the opinion of the commissioners that we face a crisis, unless our French-Canadian compatriots on the one hand are not discriminated against because of language and lack of equal opportunities, and on the other can converse freely and easily in every part of the country.

So here in Ontario in passing this resolution, we are cognizant of the reality of the past. We are catching up to the present, and as the Prime Minister said this afternoon, very hopefully, it gives one cause for great encouragement when he said that so many of the young people come out of the universities naturally speaking French. This is really worthy of enthusiasm.

Finally, I say to the Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, most sincerely that I stand in admiration of him. My admiration is very great, to see the posture that he adopted for Canada at the Confederation of tomorrow conference, which he repeated when he represented this province at the federal conference, words of moderation and reason, which he spoke. Really he did us in Ontario proud with that stance that he took. It gives the opportunity to express to him, as I stand in this House, the gratitude to him for the courageous act, having come from that last conference in putting this resolution to this House.

It must have troubled him, and I noted part of that trouble when he participated in the Throne debate, when he went out of his way to refer to the words he had used at the Confederation conference, to allay the fears of many in Ontario who either do not, or are unwilling, to understand. And really, by putting this resolution, coupled with all the other things that he is doing to encourage the use of the French language in the province, through these things, we have a chance of creating the climate of understanding between English and French in this country which will lead us on to even greater feats than the Canadian people have accomplished in the past.

As I sit down, I am reminded—and I say to my friends from Carleton, Dufferin-Simcoe and Port Arthur—of those words of Hugh MacLennan that I put on the record a number of years ago:

> We Canadians can forget the bad things of the past. If we can only forget those memories of friction and strife; put them aside for all time; look to the future; the brightness of promise that it offers to our people in a climate of amity, understanding, communion between the two great language groups that make up the fabric of this great country

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): M. Président, j'aimerais féliciter le Premier Ministre pour la présentation de cette résolution. En même temps, je voudrais féliciter les trois chefs et leurs partis se joignant ensemble pour une meilleure acceptation de la théorie de deux langues officielles au Canada.

Avec le movement ecuménique qui nous fait mieux comprendre les groupes religieux, je crois que nous avons fait deux pas gigantesques en enlevant les deux sources principales de discordes qui ont fait de grands ravages parmi l'humanité pour des siècles.

Let me begin my comments by complimenting the Prime Minister on presenting this resolution. I also want to commend the three leaders and their parties for the manner in which all have joined together to bring about a fuller acceptance of the two official languages for Canada envisaged by the founding fathers of Confederation, along with the ecumenical movement which has fostered a better understanding among religious groups.

I believe we have made two gigantic steps to remove two of the main items of friction which have plagued mankind for centuries. Now that we have accepted French officially, it remains for us to give it more than lip service.

We in the Legislature must serve as the example for the rest of Ontario to follow. I am not suggesting that everyone here must become fluent or even knowledgeable, for this is not possible for some in this Legislature, either for those of the founding nations or from our fellow Ontarians who come from the other linguistic groups in this province.

Tolerance by all must be the watchword if we hope to fulfill the hopes of our forefathers in respect to two official languages. Yet we must guard to ensure that the other linguistic groups not only maintain, but also feel they, too, are considered first class citizens in Ontario and in Canada.

From the manner in which this Legislature conducts itself, so too will the province conduct itself.

In northern Ontario where many of the citizens are already bilingual—and many others understand to some degree either French or English, even if they do not speak these languages—the example of tolerance that I have mentioned is indeed in evidence. If this example is to spread throughout the province, then Ontario, I suggest, can serve as a vital link between Quebec and the provinces to the west, and as the leader towards unity for all provinces.

We in this Legislature, therefore, have a vital role to play in this plan. The plans to continue the French courses being offered are welcomed by all. Indeed, they are not only helpful, but at the same time many of us have found a welcomed and relaxing break from the busy days in the life of a parliamentarian.

I believe that two further steps are necessary if our goal is to be attained. Some secretarial staff, as mentioned by the leader of the official Opposition, to assist those who have constituents in northern Ontario particularly, or from the area at Windsor, who correspond in French and French only. I think it is vital that we reply to them in the same language that they correspond to us.

Secondly, we must have installed in the Legislature the mechanism for instant translation. I do not know how many of you have ever gone to a church where the sermon is preached in both languages, but it becomes very frustrating for someone who understands both. On the other hand, it becomes frustrating for groups who only understand one.

So you do not satisfy anyone who has to hear a translation, or they understand and listen to the same sermon twice. I think it defeats the very thing that we are attempting to do here; to foster a willingness by the members to speak in the language of their choice. Without this, I think we are going to defeat the goals that we have set out for ourselves.

I do not want to take any more time of the House except to say that again I wish to congratulate the Premier on introducing this resolution, and ask him to take into consideration the two suggestions that have already been put forward before I spoke, and to ask the members to be the leaders in making this a reality by showing the tolerance that is necessary to make it possible.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Now, Mr. Speaker, the ridings of Carleton and Carleton East are separated by the Rideau River, and although the member for Carletons is, and I hope always will be, a close and long time friend of mine, our approaches to this resolution are separated by more than a river.

I may say, sir, that it was five years ago that I first rose in this House to speak French at a time when it was highly uncertain as to the legality of doing so. The uncertainty was equalled by my ability to handle French. This evening, the right to speak in French and use French in this Legislature will be settled, but I may say with regret that my ability to handle French remains uncertain.

Mr. Speaker:

Je desire maintenant m'addresser directement à la résolution proposée par le Premier Ministre. J'appuie fortement cette résolution et je suis convaincu que la grande majorité des gens de Carleton-Est l'appuie également.

La résolution marque une nouvelle étape dans la reconnaissance du fait français dans la province et dans les améliorations des services que la province doit y apporter.

La résolution consacre l'usage du français dans notre Legislature. On pourrait peut-être songer à d'autres moyens plus pratiques pour reconnaître cette dualité canadienne. Mais pour moi, cette résolution embrasse tout ce qui à de plus symbolique et fait preuve d'une nouvelle attitude, d'une nouvelle politique, d'un nouveau départ dans notre province.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to continue to address myself to the resolution which has been presented by the Prime Minister and to state that I support it, and that I believe that the overwhelming majority of the people of Carleton East support it.

It is one more step in Ontario's programme of improved service to and increased recognition of Franco-Ontarians. It establishes the right to use the French language in this Legislature. As such, it is of much less practical significance than a number of steps which the government has taken and will be taking in this whole field.

But, to me, sir, as I have mentioned in French, it has great symbolic significance as evidence of an attitude, a state of mind and of developing policy in this province.

Mr. Speaker, the riding which I have the honour to represent is approximately 50 per cent French-speaking and approximately 100 per cent English-speaking. About one-half of the population is of French racial origin and virtually all of these people are bilingual.

The other half of the population is what General de Gaulle calls Anglo-Saxon, namely a typical Canadian mix of German, Scotch, Irish, Polish Scandinavian, Jewish, Italian and English.

It is such a riding Carleton East, and its predecessor, Russell, which from 1879 until my election in 1963, for a period of 84 years, invariably chose a Franco-Ontarian to represent it in this Legislature.

Part of the reason for this break with the tradition of generations lies in the fact that the proportion of Franco-Ontarians in the population of the riding is now somewhat lower than in the past. Part of the reason is to be found in the bond of confidence which George Drew and successive Ontario Premiers have forged between the Progressive Conservative Party and the French-speaking people of eastern Ontario over the past two decades.

But, part of the reason is also that the Franco-Ontarians of my area are not committed to voting as a bloc on racial or linguistic lines.

In both the 1963 and 1967 elections the names of Franco-Ontarian candidates were on the ballot with my own.

Mr. Speaker, having described a riding where almost all of the people can speak English, and a riding where the people have for a number of years demonstrated their general confidence in the policies of this government, it might be asked why, on either practical or purely political grounds, I would wish to speak in support of the resolution which is now before the House.

Dealing first with the practical aspects of bilingualism in an area such as my own, I would point out that reasonable fluency in English still leaves several important problems for Franco-Ontarians.

The first of these has been the problem which has faced French-speaking children upon their entry into our secondary school system, and the devastating effect upon such students of having to assume the double burden of an increased scholastic work load at the same time as they were required to shift into instruction in English by English-speaking teachers using English texts.

The dropout rate of French-Canadian children at the secondary school level has been not only a measure of personal and family pain, but also the measure of wasted ambition and talent in a society, in a province, indeed in a world which cannot afford such waste.

The Prime Minister, last summer, announced the government's intention to move to cure this deficiency, so that bilingual educational opportunity will become available at all three levels of education in Ontario—not only at the elementary and university levels, but now also at the secondary school level.

The result will be the creation of a complete educational system available to those who wish to undertake and complete their schooling in French.

A second and much more limited problem relates to the administration of justice. Here, I refer to those circumstances or occasions, although rare, in which failure to have an adequate or precise understanding of English may lead to a Franco-Ontarian receiving less than justice, due to misinterpretation of language.

How serious a problem this is no one can measure, but, in a society as conscious of civil rights and civil liberaties as the one in which we live today, we are bound to take all reasonable steps to eradicate risks of injustice.

Finally, there is the problem which even a Franco-Ontarian, relatively fluent in English, has when faced with understanding and working with the vast flow of laws, regulations, directives, rulings, orders and statements which emanate in increasing volume from the Legislature, the government, the civil service and scores of boards, tribunals, commissions and authorities.

Mr. Speaker, these are examples of some of the practical problems which may be faced by a large portion of the people of my riding. These are some of the problems which the government of Ontario has moved, or is moving, to overcome or ameliorate. They relate to nothing more than the practical discharge of a democratic government's responsibility to give reasonable service to the people, reasonably requesting it.

Je dois soulinger, M. le Président, que le principle du bilinguisme ne se résume pas a des services de traduction ou a la création d'un corps de fonctionnaires bilingues.

Il ya a aussi cet ésprit que j'appele "considération". Dans un sens, cette considération n'est ni plus ni moins qu'un respect des valeurs humaines qui permet aux francophones et aux anglophones de vivre et de travailler ensemble dans l'amitie et dans la solidarite.

Dans un autre sens, cette considération implique un changement dramatique dans nos attitudes.

L'antagonisme et la passivite d'autrefois sur ce qui touche la survivance de la langue française en l'Ontario sont maintenant deplaces. Nous, les membres de la Legislature, représentant toute la population d'Ontario, decidons par l'adoption de cette résolution de devenir les collaborateurs de nos concitoyens de langue Française dans leur lutte pour souvegarder leur langue maternelle dans notre province.

La langue est le réflect d'une âme. Cette âme sera desormais implantée dans notre système politique. L'initiative du Premier Ministre est des plus heureuses; elle fait preuve de courage politique et signale un nouvel avenir pour tous les gens de la province.

Je dirai plus: Elle represente une nouvelle alliance que le gouvernement desire consacrée avec cette belle et grande minorité Canadienne.

However, sir, there is more to bilingualism than translation services and the development of a corps of bilingual civil servants. There is also a thing called "recognition."

In one way recognition is little more than an exercise in good manners—the good manners one to another which allow the English-speaking and French-speaking to live and work together in harmony in Carleton East, village by village, street by street and house by house.

In another way, recognition implies a most fundamental shifting of attitude. It implies that instead of being antagonistic to or passive about the maintenance and protection of the French language in Ontario, we in this Legislature, representing the people of this province as a whole have decided that we are to be active allies and partners of our French-Canadian citizens in their struggle to maintain and protect their mother tongue in this province.

Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is as simple as it is symbolic. It plants the French language at the seat of political power in our province. The Prime Minister's action is one of political courage as distinct from political expediency.

It includes the acceptance by this government of a particular and quite specific view of the place, of the status, of the role, not only of Franco-Ontarians in Ontario, but of French-Canadians in Canada.

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I rise to enter this debate and add my comments as one of the third group in the province who are neither of French or of English background.

Many of the members of this House are also members of this third group, and they and their predecessors in this Legislature have attempted to serve the province of Ontario as a whole, and not as two or more parts.

We have, of course, joined in with either the English or the French-speaking portions of the province. However, many have kept their own language and customs to a degree so that they can be used to build a stronger nation and not to be in any way divisive.

The walls of our strong civilization in Canada have been generally built with stones marked either French or English, but very often in our community the mortar that holds this wall together comes from the many others who have chosen to come to Canada.

Many came after the American revolution; others due to famine or persecution or revolution in Europe in the 1840's; others since 1945. They came to build the railways and the canals more than 100 years ago; they stayed to add to the mosaic that is Canada. Their children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren are now proudly citizens of Ontario and proudly citizens of Canada.

Monsieur le Président, je donne mon support à cette résolution. J'espère que tous les membres de cette chambre donneront leur support aussi.

Chaque chef du parti ici a présenté la décision propre. Le progrès de notre province est assuré. Chacun de nous représente un compté différent de cette province.

C'est important adjourd'hui de faire les propres décisions et d'assister au développement d'une société juste.

I do hope that all the hon. members of this House will support this resolution. Those of us who are members of the third group in this province are proud to welcome to this chamber the ability of those of French-speaking background to add their voices to the deliberations here in their own tongue. Let this be the first step of recognizing formally the rights of Canadians of French origin within our province. We are stronger as a province and as a nation if we do so.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments in connection with this resolution. I would like to touch on the historic value of one gentleman who made quite a contribution. Count Joseph de Puisaye was a wealthy Frenchman who happened to take the wrong side during the French revolution. He was a Loyalist who raised an army in defence of the king and his indiscretion left him fleeing the guillotine and wading into the English channel before he was picked up and taken to England for refuge.

He came to Canada in 1798 and attempted to found a French Loyalist settlement on Yonge Street just north of the city. Within a year he travelled to Niagara and, approving of the beautiful area, built a house that still stands today. During the war of 1812, after he had gone back to England, it was used as a hospital for Canadian troops. The house, of course, changed owners many times and in 1965, when it was owned by John Boese, it very nearly got burned down on a training exercise of the Queenston fire department.

The Niagara historical society raised up in high indignation, persuaded the parks commission to take it and Mr. Boese gave it over freely, anxious to put up a new building on his land. A letter to the Niagara parks commission by way of the Toronto Daily Star in the "help wanted" column on July 18:

> The Niagara parks commission has lost one of the most exciting historical sites in Canada—the 169-year-old French-style home of Count Joseph de Puisaye at Niagara-on-the-Lake. This house was the last reminder of a Niagara colony founded by this famous French general and, only three years ago, was saved from destruction and given freely to the parks commission so that it could be preserved as a public historical site.
> The commission has now sold it privately for $4,234.33 without telling anyone. How can they do this, when the people of the area and the local historical board worked so hard to save the house, and then trusted the commission to look after it? Can you do anything to help recover this house for its intended purpose?

Mr. Speaker, the reason that I drew this to your attention this day is I found no other place I could make these comments. If we, or the government, and we members of Parliament are sincere in what we have said here this afternoon, there is an opportunity to preserve a home that was owned by a great French general in Niagara-on-the-Lake.

A small investment of some $4,200 was made and in that particular area they moved that house, Mr. Speaker, through you to the Prime Minister, they moved that house next to the McFarland home. I have found on occasion that commissions of the government, not being in direct contact—

Mr. Speaker: Might I point out to the member that the debate is on a resolution for the use of French in this House. I have given him considerable latitude and if he would care to come back to the subject of the resolution and debate, the floor is his. Otherwise, I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Bukator: We are back to normal again, Mr. Speaker. You and I have had this little debate before, but I am coming directly—

Mr. Speaker: The member will have no debate if he abides by the rules of the House, no debate with Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bukator: The fact I am trying to draw to the attention of the Prime Minister is if we have any respect for the French-Canadian in this province, as we are indicating here this day, we would restore this home to the purpose for which it was given to the parks commission. The French are entitled to this historic spot, and I draw this to the attention of this House and to the Prime Minister, hoping that they will repurchase this place and redevelop it for the good that we are trying to do through this excellent resolution. I concur with the Prime Minister in this resolution. I do believe it is proper, but I think we ought to put some material things where our words are.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other member who wishes to speak to the resolution before it is put to the House?

If not, then the resolution moved by the Prime Minister, seconded by the leader of the official Opposition, is as set out in notice of motion on the order paper.

Resolution concurred in unanimously.

Clerk of the House: The first order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

Mr. A. Carruthers (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in the Budget debate and assure you, sir, that my remarks will be as brief as possible. I trust that the speakers who follow me will act in the same manner.

The Budget which has been considered during this session of the Legislature contains some very sobering facts and provides a preview of the significant changes which lie ahead of us in this Ontario of tomorrow. The Budget is a yardstick by which the government can estimate what it can do and how quickly it can be done. This yardstick must, on the one hand, measure the needs of our people and the province, and on the other hand measure the ability of the economy to meet those needs.

The responsible position of the government in choosing a yardstick that is in keeping with the productive capacity of the province is in sharp contrast to those policies enunciated by other groups. Theirs is an adjustable yardstick which is extended to great lengths to cover large unproductive socialist programmes involving large expenditures of the taxpayers' money, and then shortened to apply the tax burden to those sectors of the economy which have the initiative and the creative ability to produce.

I congratulate the government on its basic tax exemption programme. It is doing much to assist, particularly, the family farm and the small homeowner. Although the programme does relieve the farmer's tax burden to an extent, the answer to the problem of agriculture lies to a major degree at the federal level. Establishment of national farm marketing legislation, better control of imported agricultural products and the extension of export markets for farm produce, are the responsibility of the federal government. And I urge the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart), for the province to continue his efforts on behalf of the Ontario farmers by urging the federal authorities to set up national marketing legislation.

Ontario has a large number of excellent marketing plans, but because of inter-provincial trade and the significance and potential protection offered by these plans—crop insurance, capital grants, and so on—to the farmer is to a great extent nullified in the final analysis.

The problem lies in Ottawa.

The present Budget forecasts a total net general expenditure for 1968-1969 of $2.78 billion, an increase of some $489 million over the current year.

It is truly an investment Budget. An investment in the people and their ecenomy and in governmental institutions. The increase in the current Budget is concentrated in four areas of priority, namely, education, health, housing and local aid to municipalities. It is an investment in which the county of Durham is sharing to a major degree in expanded roads, schools, parks, social services.

During this fiscal year almost 60 per cent of our province's revenue will be spent in the fields of education, health and welfare, and for that reason, Mr. Speaker, I intend to confine my remarks today to these three areas.

The government's record of achievement in each of these three areas is excellent. At the same time, we must avoid complacency and we must constantly strive to improve standards while imposing the lightest possible burden on the taxpayer. In this connection, I would like to mention two general principles which I feel must be more closely followed in the future. These are, first, the need to help only those who are unable to help themselves and, secondly, the importance of decentralizing as far as possible, many of the functions which are now carried out at Queen's Park.

I would like to consider how we might apply these principles by turning now to the fields of education and health and welfare which I mentioned earlier. This session has witnessed great progress, indeed, in the field of education. The citizens of Durham county have co-operated fully and with understanding in the consolidation of our public schools on a united county basis, and on a zone basis for the separate school system.

The citizens of the united counties of Durham and Northumberland have a particular interest in the development of our educational system on a sound basis, because of the heritage of educational traditions they have inherited from the past. The founder of our public school system, Dr. Egerton Ryerson, was a citizen of the united counties. As president of Victoria College in Cobourg, he rapidly rose to distinction as one of Canada's great educationists. It was under his guidance that facilities were first created for training teachers. This overcame one of the greatest obstacles in universal education—the shortage of teachers.

The literary works of Catharine Parr Trail, Susannah Moodie, Archibald Lampman, Rhoda Ann Page and Joseph Scriven, the world-renowned hymn writer, all former citizens of the united counties, have contributed a wealth of literary knowledge to the world. Present day education is indebted also to other famous citizens of Durham and Northumberland counties.

The Right Honourable Vincent Massey, Canada's first native-born Governor-General; Watson Kirkconnell, outstanding Canadian teacher and president of Acadia University in Nova Scotia; Professor Charles Currelly, professor of archaeology, to whom the Royal Ontario Museum owes, in no small degree, its present status as one of the continent's great museums; Edwin Guillet, author of 20 volumes of Canadian history, including The Valley of the Trent.

Mr. Guillet's talents were recognized in his appointment as histriographer of the province of Ontario in 1934, and last, but certainly not least, Mr. Peter McGillen, retired outdoors editor of the Toronto Telegram, and now a retired citizen of that area.

With this heritage of educational achievements, the citizens of Durham and Northumberland go forward with confidence into a new era of education under a united county board. The introduction of French language training within our school system presents a new concept of education to the citizens of my riding, and in supporting the programme, may I suggest that in the days ahead, its significance and purpose be clearly defined in order to dispel the misconceptions and misunderstanding created in the minds of many of our citizens. This is of particular concern to me as representative of a people whose ancestors were, to a major degree, of United Empire Loyalist and northern Irish stock.

I must congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) on the recognition of Franco-Ontarian rights. We have had a very interesting and long debate with respect to the resolution presented by the Prime Minister. I think a great deal of understanding has been the result. It is a difficult problem, and one that will last for many years to come. I think that we must look back through history as the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) has done, in referring to Lord Durham's report. Certainly the situation that has existed in Canada over the centuries has been a product, to a great extent, of fate and history.

Indeed, to a major degree, it lies in the characteristics of the two people; on the other hand an Anglo-Saxon seagoing race, and a colonizing race because the sea made them so. On the other hand, our French friends were a continental people, and, to a large extent, have remained so to this day.

The resolution, and I trust that I am in order in referring to it at this time, does recognize for Franco-Ontarians, the same right that we as Anglo-Saxons have in the province of Quebec, the right to educate our children in the language of our choice.

One wonders what may have happened if history and fate had not taken a hand. As we look back over the centuries we see the development of the present situation from the days of Champlain.

Had Champlain not been forced to associate himself with the Huron and Algonquin Indians in the fur trade, because it was on the fur trade that the colony existed, had he not been forced to ally himself with those two tribes, history would have recorded a different story. The English colonies along the Atlantic seaboard had allied themselves with the war-like Iroquois, who played a very important role in the battle of the Plains of Abraham in September of 1759.

Certainly one wonders what would have happened if La Salle had accomplished his aim of building a chain of forts from Quebec down to the Gulf of Mexico, hemming in the English colonies along the Atlantic seaboard. That fateful day on which he was murdered by one of his own men, may have changed the course of history.

The Louisiana purchase also had a great effect on the situation that developed on the North American continent, as far as English- and French-speaking citizens are concerned. The great French state in the southern part of this country was transferred over to an English-speaking American power.

The Quebec Act, in extending the boundaries of Quebec to the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers, I believe, had more to do with the American revolution than The Stamp Act or the taxes placed on tea by King George III. By extending those boundaries, the ire of the English colonies was aroused and it was one of the major reasons, I believe, for the American revolution which resulted in thousands of English-speaking people flocking into this province and creating in Ontario an English-speaking area on the North American continent.

Indeed, the situation might have changed drastically had it not been for the course of history. I think the member for Sudbury referred to the battle on the Plains of Abraham in 1759, a ten-minute battle which decided in his words, "the fate of this continent."

Actually, it did not decide the fate of this continent. The battle on that September day was not the decisive factor. The French were besieged in the citadel of Quebec, but two fleets the next spring were on their way to Canada, one a French fleet and one an English fleet. It just so happened that fate chose that the English fleet arrived first and raised the siege of Quebec. Had the French fleet arrived first, this province and this country might today be a French nation.

Certainly, following the conquest of Canada, Quebec isolated itself within the boundaries of what is now the province of Quebec, and this isolation had a great deal to do with the situation today.

It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to change 200 years of history by a simple resolution. It is difficult for us as Anglo-Saxons to understand the French point of view, and yet, as we look at the situation in the province of Quebec itself, we see that the use of French as a language is declining among the French ethnic group themselves.

We may pass resolutions, we may make every effort to introduce French into our schools, but in a sea of over 200 million English-speaking people it is very difficult to keep that tide of language back. This is the task that we face, and I certainly trust that the Prime Minister's efforts in this respect will be rewarded.

So as Anglo-Saxons we have been the beneficiaries of fate.

We must never forget too, that language is simply a tool of communication, and as such we are going to use the most practical tool at hand. In a world which is becoming an English-speaking business world, it is going to be very difficult in the days ahead to create a bilingual nation on this northern half of the American continent.

Language is not something that is permanent. Language is dying and being born every day, and one of the factors that complicates the situation is the fact that most of the technological terms of the day, most of the business terms, the new terms, are in English, and must be translated into French, in the majority of instances there is no word in French for them.

These are the factors that are going to have a great bearing upon whether this country can be made bilingual or not. Certainly by this resolution we recognize the fact that Franco-Ontarians have the same rights and the same privileges that our English-speaking friends in Quebec now have.

The recent report of the committee on the aims and objectives of education headed by Mr. Justice Hall presents a new and challenging vision of education in Ontario. It is true to say that the main thrust of this unconventional document is faith in the curiosity and initiative of the child. These powers exposed to a sensitive school environment will, and should, produce achievement. But in the making of school years "a pleasant learning experience" it must also develop a sense of responsibility on the part of the future citizens of this province and of this country. A sense of responsibility that to a significant degree appears to be lacking in modern society.

Nowhere is this more apparent than in the present unrest in our universities. There is much in the Hall report that merits commendation. At the same time, I feel that the report is in many respects utopian, and under present conditions could be very costly to implement fully.

Plutarch in his "Lives" presents the argument as to whether the ship in which Theseus sailed home from Crete was the same ship as that in which they set out, for they took away the old planks that had decayed, putting in new and stronger timber in their place.

Replacing old planks with new in our educational system is an important task, and care must be taken that the new planks are strong and that those timbers that have stood the test of time are allowed to remain in place.

Two of those tested planks, may I suggest, are engrained with a stout moral fibre and a love of country. There appears to be a strong tendency today to replace both these planks with more flexible material which may, under strain, give way to a flood of irresponsibility which could in years ahead drastically weaken our ship of state.

Let us make sure that in replacing new timber for old we chart the course of our destiny in the field of education, without being forced by reactionary forces to return to the point from which we set out.

There is perhaps a lesson for us in this young province from the experience in other jurisdictions. May I quote briefly from two articles which have appeared recently in the Christian Science Monitor. The first article is entitled "Trends" and refers to the educational problems in Dade county, Florida.

> Until now, 225,000 youngsters in 214 schools in Dade county have been protected from the teacher's paddle by school board policy which limited corporal punishment to last resort status.
> But after a year's study by a joint committee on discipline, during which five teachers were either shot or stabbed by pupils, the Dade school board had adopted a new policy giving teachers stronger authority in the classroom.
> Because during school hours teachers or principal takes the place of the parent, he now is authorized to give orders and enforce them. This includes the use of force generally applied to the body of the offender.
> Under previous policy teachers, technically, could not even take an unruly child by the arm and force him back into line. Along with the corporal punishment policy is a new one. It gives the superintendent power to expel any pupil found carrying a deadly weapon. Dade officials say that in an average year a typical assistant principal could be expected to find and confiscate up to 100 pistols, knives, brass knuckles and the like.

The second article is entitled:

> THREE RS—PEOPLE TAKE CALIFORNIA REINS
> Progressive education may be riding into an ambush in California, and, if it is, the nation's largest school population, 5 million strong, will be caught in the crossfire.
> A liberal, socially-oriented educational philosophy was top gun in the state until 1963 when Max Rafferty was elected superintendent of public education. Dr. Rafferty demanded, as the incoming superintendent, that Californian schools return to teaching the three Rs. He changed the official philosophy of his department from progressive education to education in depth.
> Dr. Rafferty, with a phonics reading programme in one hand and a patriotic song book in the other, has the means necessary to blast the progressive culprits, as he called them, from the territory and here is his plan:
> 1. Give major control of the schools back to the local school districts;
> 2. Revise sharply the state tenure law for teachers, giving local boards more authority to dismiss their employees;

3. Take away the power of the state curriculum commission to recommend textbooks for state use;

4. Take away the right to appoint the commission from the board, and place it in the hands of the superintendent;

5. Require all new teachers to take competency tests in the fundamentals as a requisite to granting credentials;

6. Urge elementary schools to adopt the phonics approach to reading.

Whether Dr. Rafferty will succeed in turning the clock back is a question, but these articles do indicate that there is a reaction setting in with respect to progressive education as we know it today.

There is a lesson in it for us, this must not happen, but in charting the educational course of this province, let us keep these facts in mind and from the base so firmly established by Egerton Ryerson let us go forward with a sense of purpose, responsibility and direction towards that ultimate goal of democratic education visioned by Mr. Hall and his associates.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there are visible signs that we are on course. The increased participation of large numbers of our young people in cultural and community activities is tangible evidence of this fact.

This is due in no small part to the new concept of education. It is very apparent in my own area of the province, and again may I refer to the heritage our citizens have reaped from the past—the rolling hills, the scenic lakes and streams and quiet countryside of the united counties of Northumberland and Durham have inspired in the past and are continuing to inspire the creative minds of our young people. Many of Canada's outstanding leaders in the field of art and the theatre have claimed the united counties as their home.

May I name but a few? Charles Fothergill, an early settler in Port Hope, was a keen observer of nature in his paintings, many of which hang in the Royal Ontario museum. Gerald Hayward, who is buried in St. George's cemetery at Gore's Landing, became renowned all over Europe for his remarkable miniature paintings. His brother, Alfred Hayward, became equally famous for his paintings of flowers and landscapes. Paul Kane, renowned for his Indian paintings, was also a citizen of the area prior to moving to western Canada.

The cultural foundation established by these former citizens is being carried on today and is evident in the numerous art clubs in our schools and in our communities and, fostered by the new educational incentives, the community has many artists in its midst who have the potential for fame in the years ahead. Indeed, the art studio of Mrs. Dora Holdaway at Bewdley on Rice Lake has become one of the outstanding tourist attractions of the area.

Science fairs in Port Hope have attracted large crowds and have demonstrated the creative ability of today's students.

The impact of the new concept of education is also showing tangible results locally in the world of the theatre through the formation of a number of theatrical groups.

On August 9, the Great Pine Ridge festival of arts opens in the progressive village of Newcastle. During the period August 9 to August 30 there will be three outstanding productions.

The interesting feature of this festival is the fact that the participants, the actors and actresses, are all students drawn from the four corners of the Pine Ridge area of Northumberland and Durham. Young actors and designers will be coming to participate in the festival, working under the professional guidance of Miss Joan Bennett, Mr. Roy Higgins and Miss Joan Frith, students who have taken advantage of the new educational opportunities in the arts and are now developing their talents to the benefit of their communities.

Here again they are but carrying on the tradition of the past, following in the footsteps of many leading theatrical stars who began their careers in the united counties community. The community takes pride in the careers of Marie Dressler of "Tugboat Annie" fame, who was born and raised in Cobourg; Catherine Cornell, famous dramatic star; Beatrice Lilly of musical comedy fame who became known as the funniest woman in the world; and Ann Helm, native of Port Hope, whose Broadway successes led to leading movie roles and today she is a prominent TV star.

The report of the committee on the aims and objectives of education is an historic and monumental document. One cannot help but agree with the principles and ideals it projects for the future, but as a teacher of some 30 years' experience and as one who has seen many changes in the system, I may be pardoned if I may have, perhaps without justification, certain reservations.

I would like to suggest that we must question the universality of the recommendations of this report, relative to free university tuition, beginning with the first year in 1970. I think as a member of the Progressive Conservative Party I must take a stand against universality of this nature.

I believe that university education must be provided to all citizens of this province who can qualify and benefit from it, but the assistance which we as taxpayers provide to these students must be related to their individual needs. In other words, I object to asking the taxpayers of Ontario to provide free university tuition to the sons and daughters of parents who are quite capable of paying these expenses themselves. I urge the government to continue the present policy whereby assistance made to each student is related to his financial circumstances and to those of his parents.

I have certain reservations also with respect to abolishing academic competition in our schools through the removal of examinations.

I realize that, in theory, it is an ideal, but in practice it tends to remove the challenge and to place students on a common level with, again, a universality of standards. If examinations can logically be replaced with other challenges which will have the effect of preparing the student for life, all to the good, but I fail to see how our young people will be prepared in this manner for the shock they will receive on leaving school and entering our highly competitive world to work and earn their living.

For centuries, sports have been emphasized in all educational systems throughout the world. Part of our heritage which must now presumably be discarded is that of play up, play up, and play the game. If competition is to be eliminated from the curriculum should we not also abolish competitive sports?

I was disappointed to note that this report, although very forward-looking in many aspects, was extremely conventional on the question of our separate schools. As far as I can see, the report fails to provide an up-to-date concept of the role which religion should or should not play in the school curriculum.

I would think that a modern concept would at last visualize perhaps the removal of formal religious teaching from the curriculum, but the inclusion of a programme emphasizing the basic virtues upon which all religions are based, and which form the core of a truly democratic and responsible society.

It is the lack of this influence in our educational system which is causing concern to some religious groups. Perhaps we have much to heed in the policies followed by our Roman Catholic, Christian Alliance, Jewish Community, Seventh Day Adventist group.

In the field of health expenditures, Mr. Speaker, the big question mark as we look to the future concerns medicare. According to the Financial Post of June 29 of this year, several provinces are now re-examining their position to joining the federal plan. The reason, apart from the results of the recent federal election, according to the Financial Post, is British Columbia's method of entry into the plan which has successfully avoided compulsion and established that that province can raise a good part of its costs under the plan through premiums.

If the example of British Columbia is followed by other provinces, we can expect increasing pressure on this province to join the federal scheme.

Our Health Minister (Mr. Dymond) was correct in asserting recently in this House that Ontario would, in effect, be subsidizing other provinces if it joined the plan. It would also increase Ottawa's contribution to all provinces, with the poor provinces as the major beneficiaries.

Ottawa, of course, has to find the money for its share of medicare costs from general revenues, most probably higher taxes. We in the provinces, however, have greater leeway to finance our share as is made clear in the British Columbia anouncement that premiums would be charged to all medicare subscribers. The government would subsidize the premiums of low-income citizens.

I think we should bear in mind the action which was recently forced upon the government of Saskatchewan, and which was discussed by the Premier of that province before the Kiwanis International here in Toronto on July 1.

Mr. Thatcher said that Saskatchewan was the only administration in North America with a complete programme of free hospitalization and medical care, but the escalating costs year by year have been frightening, and I quote from the Globe and Mail of July 2 as follows:

> No administration should adopt a completely free plan because it leads to abuses. As an example, one woman had visited nine different doctors in one day and the province had to pay.
> About 10 per cent of persons in hospital were there unnecessarily, he said.

I might also add that the experience of the Labour government in Britain has been similar to the Liberal government in Saskatchewan, and Mr. Harold Wilson has also been forced to reintroduce deterrent fees which he had abolished on coming into power only a few years ago.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the government is to be commended for the emphasis it has continued to place on the requirements of The Department of Social and Family Services. This year the estimates include the sum of approximately $230 million, the highest in the history of the department. Since the fiscal year ending March, 1967, the expenditures of the department in the field of social betterment have risen by nearly 50 per cent.

I know that the energetic Minister (Mr. Yaremko) in charge of this department is determined to study new proposals, and to initiate new programmes when it has been established that these are sound.

Mr. Speaker, I have additional material, but I think that I will take the cue and bring my address to a close. I realize that I have taken considerable time, and I said at the beginning that perhaps the members would appreciate it if I had just tabled this.

On the other hand, I have listened for long hours throughout this session to long and tedious speeches, a great deal of repetition, and I think that I am entitled to a few minutes to say a few words—significant or not.

I am going to close with a quotation from a statesman of many years ago, a great humanitarian, John Bright, who said:

> I believe there is no permanent greatness to a nation unless it be based upon morality. I care not, [he said], for military greatness or military renown. I care for the condition of the people among whom I live.
> Great halls, baronial castles, stately mansions, [and we might, in today's world, add large corporations or international unions], do not make a nation.
> The nation in every country dwells in the cottage and unless the light of your constitution and the beauty of your legislation is reflected there on the lives and conditions of your people, rely upon it, you have yet to learn the duties of government.

Those words, uttered so many years ago, express, in my opinion, the policy of this government and a policy which, as a private member, I endeavour to follow. It is a policy reflected in the Budget, a Budget designed to meet the basic needs of our people, a Budget designed to provide an environment in which the individual can develop his talents to the utmost of his ability.

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me in the Budget debate, I rise to stress the urgent need for a Minister of Social and Family Services to review and update the pre-added budgets of The General Welfare Assistance Act, and The Family Benefits Act—the pre-added budgets upon which the basis of payments under these Acts are made.

I have isolated three specific points to deal with, and will speak for the need of two specific studies. I speak firstly for change under The General Welfare Assistance Act, section 9, of the regulations of the Act, where it is stated that:

> The welfare administrator, or the regional administrator, as the case may be, may determinate the recipient's budgetary requirements in accordance to sections 10 and 11, and amounts may be received up to a possible maximum of $300 a month, or $69.20 in any week by a recipient with three beneficiaries or less. However, for cases where there are more than three beneficiaries to consider, these maximums shall be increased by a further $10 in any month, or $2.30 a week as the case may be, for each dependent in excess of three.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose of this exercise is to get some reality into the pre-added budgets and into the maximum amounts that are used to gauge the amounts for those who qualify for assistance under these two Acts. As it stands now under the present legislation, a head of a family and three dependents may qualify for the maximum assistance for food, shelter and necessities of $300 per month. Removing the $100 allowance for shelter for that size of family leaves $200 a month; and for each additional child or beneficiary, only $10 per month is added.

Now, we have a very elaborately constructed pre-added budget to follow as a guide. It is somewhat misleading inasmuch as for children over the number of six, there are allotted amounts per month according to years of age varying from $23 to $36 per child. But a ceiling is put on this by the regulation which allows a maximum of $300 per month, including shelter, and $10 per month for each additional beneficiary.

As it is, Mr. Speaker, it works out, for one parent and three children; and for two parents and two children, that they may qualify for the $300 a month maximum. But if you take away the maximum of $100 for rent for that size family and leave them $200, the additional $10 per month works out at 33 cents a day, and 33 cents a day will not buy a quart of milk for that beneficiary, who is so often the child, Mr. Speaker.

The child will not develop properly on this sort of inadequate scheme. I draw to the attention of the Minister, Mr. Speaker, that much of the economizing put forth by this government in this year's estimates of The Department of Social and Family Services ended inevitably by robbing and harming the development of children.

Children are short-changed by this government's economics one way or another. We saw it early in the session when the government could not find $30,000, Mr. Speaker, to assist the Big Brother movement which, in turn, assists both the children and the mothers.

We saw it in the cut-back in the grant to the children's aid society in spite of the fact that Judge Harry Waisberg pointed out as recently as this February in his Timbrell enquiry, that the children in that particular case had a minimal number of visits from the agency. The judge pointed out this was due mainly to a shortage of staff and to inexperienced staff, because perhaps the salaries had not helped attract experienced staff. Before the case could be presented for enquiry, an experienced social worker had to be put into the case in order to sort out the facts.

The victims are children, Mr. Speaker, in the established basis of need that is applied to parents as a requirement to allow day-nursery services for children of mothers who work. I say, Mr. Speaker, that that service should not be judged on a basis of need for the parents; it should be based, rather, on a basis of needs for the children.

Once again we see that what is needed is a study, I believe a worthwhile study of what is happening. Under the auspices of the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko), it should, hopefully, lead to the opening of a children's bureau in our province and might, in time assure us of less emotional disturbance amongst children; which Mr. Speaker, was the least heard debate in the assembly. Once again, we ended in short-changing the children.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Cabinet could be influenced by a study to show that funds and programming now, and adequate care and guidance for the disadvantaged children of our province could save inestimable problems of the future for the government and for the children.

As an example it was suggested, by Dr. Charron I believe, the Deputy Minister of Health, in a public address recently, that the Victorian Order of Nurses could spot emotional disturbance in children on their home visits. Day-nursery teachers, Mr. Speaker, could do the same. Doctors have stated that cases spotted by seven are often cured by 11 and 12 years of age, whereas left later than that, can result in being major misfits in our society, and then having to be assisted much more expensively in hospitals or correctional institutions. We need a study as to what is happening to disadvantaged children in our province. How many there are? Where we are going in this regard, and Mr. Speaker, we need it now.

I would like to draw attention to the fact that the province of Saskatchewan has proposed, in their brief on the status of women —and I am quoting from the Toronto Daily Star, May 1, 1968, Saskatchewan is willing to share with the federal government in the cost of setting up day-care centres for children of working mothers.

Under the proposed plan, a working mother with pre-school children would get a tax credit of $200 deducted from her income tax. She would get $80 deducted if she had school-age children.

Now this is just a lead up, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the brief proposed that day-care centres be provided without charge, or with minimum charge, to working mothers. The need for such facilities in Saskatchewan will become acute as the province becomes urbanized.

The need in our province, Mr. Speaker, is acute. The children in our day nurseries should not be robbed; they should not be penalized, by being there according to the means of the parents' ability to pay, or their willingness to pay. Day nurseries in our province—which is really pre-school education, Mr. Speaker, which we will go into later—should be a right of the children of the province of Ontario.

Being six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest adjournment of the debate?

It being 6.00 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

Mrs. M. Renwick (Scarborough Centre): To continue, Mr. Speaker, on the time allotted to me under the Budget debate, I would ask the hon. Minister to seriously consider perusing, if he has not already done so, and adopting, the bare minimal budgets that have been prepared by the social planning council of Metropolitan Toronto. They have been updated now, Mr. Speaker, to 1967 and 1968 cost of living for the use of social and health agencies of Metropolitan Toronto, and as useful reference for government. I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the social planning council budgets are not budgets that allow any frills. The basis of these charts are meticulously designed to remove any margin of doubt in this regard.

I quote from the publication's table 1 on costing for meals: Meals at home based on a family of three to five persons. The lowest amount I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister is for a one-to-three-year-old child and is $4.05 per week—it ranges according to the age of the child—four-to-six-years, $4.68 a week; seven-to-nine years, $5.49; ten-to-12-years, $6.40 per week.

A very carefully prepared budget of food requirements based to ensure adequate nutrition at a reasonably low cost based on the dietary standards for Canada, recommended by the Canadian council on nutrition May, 1963.

This scale of nutritional requirements is universally acceptable throughout the country. This guide from the social planning council is based in such a way so as not to allow error. The basis runs from six months to a year of age, up to 10 to 12 years for children, from $4.05 to $6.40 a week; or $17.40 a month to $27.50 a month—less than a dollar a day per month, Mr. Speaker, which makes our $10 additive per beneficiary inadequate.

Is this government going to limp along in the antiquated method of assistance that it uses at this time instead of streamlining the department, and taking leadership with the adoption of a guaranteed income? Surely it is not difficult, Mr. Speaker, to update and change the pre-added budgets according to the changes in cost of living, which need change every few months.

Take as an example in working out, more realistically, the modification of its base, the family which may receive a $300 maximum per month for four beneficiaries. An additive of $10 per month represents 5 per cent of this budget for food, clothing and personal needs, based on a family of four. That is the $300 a month maximum, less the $100 maximum for rent, leaves $200 a month for four beneficiaries; or $50 a month per person.

Now, to work from there on, under the budget which this government is using at the present time—the government decreased by 80 per cent the amount allotted to each added person in that family for food, clothing and necessities. In the social planning council budget, in contrast, it is stated that for the families larger than three or five persons on which that budget is based, there should be a decrease of 10 per cent, Mr. Speaker, not 80 per cent. And 10 per cent reduction in the case of the $50 per beneficiary would make an additional amount of $45 per month for each added child for food, clothing and necessities.

Still inadequate! But if that is inadequate, what is $10 per month, $2.30 a week, 33 cents a day, for a beneficiary? What happens to the child who is the beneficiary from this government of $10 a month for food, clothing and necessities? What happens when he needs a toothbrush or a pair of overshoes or a pair of pants or tickets to get to a school event?

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the child just does not get there. These things, as he should have them and as he needs them, are simply not forthcoming under these budgets. And that is not good enough for the children of this province. It does not allow them the dignity that is essential to good mental health, to say nothing of nutrition for healthy bodies.

I have taken an actual budget of a family of three children: A school-age child of six, a pre-schooler of four and a pre-schooler between one and three years of age, They are children of Mr. and Mrs. G. Hodgins, and I asked them for an actual budget, Mr. Speaker, of their costs per month. I would like to submit it and just contrast it for a moment with the same amount received under general welfare assistance and under The Family Benefits Act.

Food in this particular family of five, $150 a month—not an unreasonable amount, Mr. Speaker, for five persons in a family; medical bills, the portion that is not covered by OMSIP because there is an ill child in the family, $20; milk and bread, $9; drugs, because of the ill baby, $18; transportation, a modest amount which I presume covers churches and certainly very little else $5 a month; clothing, $12 a month—this particular person makes clothing; life insurance, $6; telephone, $6.71; Hydro $10; rent $100. A total of $336.71.

The allowance made for this family at the present time under The Family Benefits Act, because the father is a student, is $271.41.

The government is quite realistic, Mr. Speaker, when it comes to assessing costs such as Hydro. The Hydro allowance is $9.90 a month; the family in the budget I used allowed $10 a month. That is a good example. On any fixed-price service such as this the government comes out with a correct estimate. It cannot very well argue with the Hydro company. But budgets that are accurately based on the current costs of food and shelter are simply not forthcoming.

Under section 10, item 6 of The General Welfare Act there is a section on shelter. Section (a) provides an amount up to $43 a month for a single person and an amount up to $85 a month for the head of a family, in heated premises. Where there is more than one dependent in the household, the maximum amounts shall be increased by $5 per month for each added dependent in excess of one. So a man, wife and three children receive, under this particular section for shelter, $100 a month. Mr. Speaker, here are a few basic facts of life about shelter in Metropolitan Toronto. First, $43 a month for shelter for a single person is a totally unrealistic figure.

If any hon. member in the assembly is in any doubt, he need only check through the classified ad sections of the current newspapers. Any member concerned with these budgets will find that $14 to $15 per week is the going rate for a housekeeping room. Even if the recipient is lucky enough to find a $12 a week room, it still comes out at $50 a month.

Where does the added $7 come from over the $43 shelter allowance? The beneficiary receives $47 a month to live on above the $43 shelter allowance; so if the beneficiary tries to maintain some dignity of not living in inferior kind of accommodation, he pays for it by trying to exist, then, on the $47 a month, minus what he pays extra in rent. So he ends up with 30 days and $40 at $1.33 a day.

We are forcing these people to seek out agencies—Scott Mission and the like—to learn the hours of the best times to come and go for clothing, boots, overshoes and, hopefully, bedding. Then we profess amazement that such people have become con artists at the game, or derelicts in our society.

I say, Mr. Speaker, we have left no real alternative, where these budgets are concerned. Let us look at the shelter allowance for a couple, so often the aged—$85 to $90 a month. We have something between 4,000 to 5,000 applications for senior citizen housing in the city. That speaks for the problem itself. Senior citizen housing is the only kind of housing available at the price of $85, $90, and $95 a month. Somewhere, somehow, reality must be brought into this scene. Small one-bedroom flats over stores on Lawrence Avenue East, in the north of the riding of Scarborough Centre, was the last hold-out of low rents that I know of in that riding—$85 a month, something like 12 months ago. This was one of the examples I used, Mr. Speaker, in my maiden speech, that those rents are now $120 a month.

If you look, then, and ask, where does this family go—where can they go in our city at $85, $90, $95 a month?

Take a look at the next group, the small family that ends up with $85 plus $15—$100 a month. In my visit to the emergency housing shelters of the city, where staff are constantly in search of housing, of two reports that came in that day for family accommodation, both of them were for $150 a month. And that was all for one day, Mr. Speaker.

It is exactly the same tough problem in Metro Toronto for the head of a family with children to find accommodation, as it is for the single person and the elderly couple at these present rates. There is not a member of the assembly, Mr. Speaker, who can come up with accommodation in this city for a family of two parents and three children for $100 a month. I think any of the out-of-town members who have been looking for accommodation know that there are not even bachelor suites left in the Metropolitan area of Toronto for $85 and $90 a month.

I urge the Minister to ask the government for a study relating to rental costs in our city because, except for the very few limited dividend buildings that were built years ago under the federal scheme, there are not any dwellings available at the rates used under the present family benefits or general welfare assistance allowances.

When we are looking to see the costs of accommodation in our city we should also be looking, Mr. Speaker, for the quality of the same and a study which the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko) might instigate could certainly be well used by the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) in his responsibilities of housing. The study is urgently needed at this time; and I know whereof I speak because in the riding of Scarbourough Centre there are 52 apartment buildings. A classic example of what happens to them is the one at 1360 Danforth Road that, at the beginning of the election in October, was considered a modern, new building—two bedroom suites rented for $140 a month.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not small business, this is big business. There are 180 suites in one block; they are now building 196 next door. The paint is peeling off the first building; the road—until it was repaired last week—to the parking lots and the parking lots were in very bad shape, they were broken right down to the dirt underneath the tarmac finish. One of the gimmicks of such apartment buildings is a swimming pool and, in this particular building, I am told it was so polluted last week it could not be used. The reason for the pollution—when I say take a look at the quality as well as the cost of rental accommodation in our city—is that when they pumped down to the last foot they had 10, 11 and 12-year-old boys pitching in to wash the sides of the swimming pool with the water that was, in fact, the dregs of the drainage. The pool had to be closed because of infection, but it mysteriously opened on Saturday and some of the tenants were waiting until this morning to know for sure that the water is safe.

Most of these buildings, Mr. Speaker, require 24-month post-dated cheques. The people in the buildings, as tenants, have no idea who owns the building and complaints under this system become irrelevant. These buildings, Mr. Speaker, went up approximately $40 rent last month; they increased $35, $37 a month and, of course, are excluded completely to welfare recipients. So if our housing is so poor for those who can afford to pay $170 per month for two-bedroom suites, how are we housing the people under general welfare assistance, or under The Family Benefits Act, at $100 per month?

The only place that the people under these two Acts can get accommodation, at the rate which it is allowed, is under the Ontario housing corporation which has 13,000 applications on file. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that a study of rental costs and the quality of the accommodation in order to re-evaluate the amount of money allowed for shelter under The General Welfare Assistance Act is essential. It is also the same amount allowed for shelter under The Family Benefits Act.

A number of miscellaneous items in the new estimates and budgets of this government, under The Department of Social and Family Services, should be given consideration. I will itemize, Mr. Speaker. First, an adjustment of payments under The Blind Persons' Allowance Act, and The Disabled Persons' Allowance Act, because it has become evident in some cases now under The Family Benefits Act that these recipients can in fact receive less than they did under the old Acts. This, in fact, is diabolically opposed to the whole spirit of the Canada assistance plan which was designed to improve and standardize such allowances amongst other specifications which were outlined.

Along with the same particular area of the department, an item which deserves consideration of reallocation of allotment is under The Family Benefits Act regulation, section 7, item (c), referring to a blind person who has attained the age of 18 years and is blind or otherwise disabled as defined by regulations, and is not in receipt of a pension under The Old Age Security Act. The person may receive more under The Family Benefits Act than under The Old Age Security Act, and may end up the same way as the previous example of the blind persons' allowance, and the disabled persons' allowance, where we can in fact, be going backwards.

Under the child welfare branch, item 5, The Children's Institutions Act, where we budgeted this year 80 per cent of the cost, it is just not realistic assistance care under the Act. This still leaves the parent with 20 per cent to pay. Mr. Speaker, 20 per cent of the care of a child in a children's institution represents about $2,000 per annum, making it impossible for a family whose earnings are between $4,000 and $10,000 or a family in need to avail themselves of the institution care for a child without assistance from a benefactor or private agency. That is perhaps why the institutions are now predominantly occupied by public wards. The other people cannot afford to place their children there when they have to pay 20 per cent of the costs. There should be a very good opportunity in the new estimates—and certainly I expected it in the last, Mr. Speaker—that the cost of $1,905,000 presently under this department for day nurseries should be under The Department of Education for pre-school education, where it belongs. The proof that it belongs in pre-school education is the fact that the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) has junior kindergartens under his department. Day nurseries are not, as the Act states, custodial care. They are part of the learning process, and the Minister of Education must be certain of this.

Let us have the Cabinet hear from the Minister of Education on his view of pre-school education, and that this is where this particular operation should belong. Custodial care could then be adopted by The Department of Social and Family Services in financing after-four programmes for the children of mothers who work. I would like to compliment the Minister on the fact that the project of the Duke of York public school for after-four centres did receive a grant for operation for this next year. After-four centres can be operated by lay people—and the need of them was covered in the discussion on the estimates of the department.

I think my earlier comments stated that one in three women in Ontario work and that 50 per cent of them are working for $2,000 a year and 25 per cent of them for $1,000. A child has a 50-50 chance, Mr. Speaker, of being born to a needy family where the mother must work; and this government must provide services, pre-school education as well as home care in the field of day nurseries for the children of working mothers.

It may sound a little far out, Mr. Speaker, to some of the members of the assembly that we would in fact provide day-care services for children of working mothers. But in some of the back Hansards I read where Mr. Bryden, member of the then existent riding of Woodbine, stated that 150 years ago the Tories took the position that education for children was not the responsibility of the state. We have seen what has happened to that, let us hope that the care of children of working mothers will not be too hard for the members of the assembly to embrace.

Under general welfare assistance, Mr. Speaker, we have seen what happened when a $7.50 per diem amount was allotted. That tragedy was halted in mid-flight. I just hope that we will see provision for the people in the nursing home care of the province in the next session.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the next item is to bring these two Acts, The General Welfare Assistance Act and The Family Benefits Act, into accordance and there are several aspects of them that are different.

The Minister claims that they are now almost identical. They really differ in many ways. One Act recognizes common-law marriage—The General Welfare Assistance Act—but The Family Benefits Act refers constantly to a married woman. The benefits for a single person under The Family Benefits Act is $62 but, under general welfare assistance it drops down to $47 a month. I think if a person needs $62 a month to live on for food and necessities and clothing under The Family Benefits Act, the same person certainly needs $62 under general welfare assistance, not $47.

We have allotted certain forms of pin money in some of our Acts, but we have completely disregarded—and I think money will have to be provided in the future—the families that are in the hostel. When a family goes into an emergency housing hostel in our city the welfare family receives no money whatsoever during that period. So that such a simple thing as going to the telephone for a number of times during the day to contact the Ontario housing corporation in order to get out of the emergency shelter, requires 10c every time the people telephone and they are in there with no money, not even the $15 allowance.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that this also appears in the fact that there is not any comfort allowance for people in mental institutions.

While I hesitate to mention it in this weather let us remember the cold days of May and let us see, Mr. Speaker, if the heat allowance cannot be extended beyond the month of April to May or even to June, according to weather, for the people under general welfare assistance and family benefits Acts. Once again, the heat section under both these Acts is different but I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the heat in this particular building where we work was on in the middle of June.

Day nursery service for children will have to be arranged for the children of working mothers. We must look, Mr. Speaker, at the quality of the life the children lead. Where do they play? Where are they turning their energies of mind and body? Is it in destruction, or is it constructively turned?

The two studies, Mr. Speaker; what are we doing, as far as children are concerned, in Ontario? Where are we going in that particular area? And the cost of rental accommodation and the quality?

The Canada assistance plan had one goal—the removal of poverty. It called for strong, imaginative, generous, and realistic action from the governments, and it outlined a number of points that pertained particularly to provinces. I said in the discussion during the estimates of The Department of Social and Family Services, Mr. Speaker, that this government has failed to embrace the true implication of the Canada assistance plan. It has taken the moneys, and it expanded to a board of review, which was a necessity. It made changes only where it absolutely had to, in order to receive the reimbursement.

I would like to read into the record what the Canada assistance plan from the Canadian welfare council really meant in their policy statement of July, 1966, in Ottawa under the heading, "The Provinces":

> The provinces would establish, provide and maintain rates of cash benefits at levels that are high enough, and have sufficient flexibility, to actually meet need whenever it occurs, and make provision for upward revision of such benefits as the income levels for the population as the whole improves.

We are not doing that, Mr. Speaker, when we have a $300 maximum, plus $10 per child over and above two or three—which includes rent.

I would like to point out that the social planning council, when they devised a scheme for rents, it was very difficult for them to do so, because they did not have the staff. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that since they have provided actual budgets which the government might well adopt, perhaps the government could adopt the attitude that it will provide the enquiry that the social planning council would like to have done on the study relating to rental costs.

They took a survey of 429 unfurnished units by watching daily advertisements, and a survey of 260 different apartment advertisements; these results are based on the telephone enquiries. The tragedy of this whole report, Mr. Speaker, is that the government could provide the kind of information to the social planning council that could make this chapter on housing completely relevant. As it is now they unfortunately have to report this—that resources of 1964 did not permit an accurate survey in Metropolitan Toronto for this purpose. The 1964 guide recommended that a study relating rental costs to specifications be made. This study has not yet been initiated. I quote a housing costs survey based on the results of a telephone survey of 260 different apartment advertisements appearing in daily newspapers and involving a minimum of 429 unfurnished units. This information is a general guide.

Bachelor apartments, city of Toronto: Low $103; high $126. For the boroughs: Low $95; high $115.

One-bedroom apartments, city of Toronto: $125 low and $155 high.

Two-bedroom: $151 as a low and $195 as a high, in the city of Toronto.

In the boroughs, one-bedroom: $118 low; $135 high. Two bedrooms: $145 low to $158 high.

The following table gives a range of housing costs for the City of Toronto and the five boroughs, representing rates for available housing at mid-year 1967.

Unfurnished apartment rents: Monthly costs

	City of Toronto		Borough
	Low	High	Low	High
Bachelor	103	126	95	115
One bedroom	125	155	118	135
Two bedrooms	151	195	145	158
Three bedrooms	[1]	[1]	170	185

[1]Too few were available, for statistical analysis.

Note: An apartment is a unit in a building having three or more dwelling units.

No actual resemblance to the $100 shelter allowance under these Acts.

The provinces were expected, under the Canada assistance plan, to make provisions for health services for persons eligible for assistance under the plan, in accordance with the health charter for Canadians outlined in the report of the Royal commission on health services.

To establish or otherwise provide such things as family counselling—which we have not really used, Mr. Speaker. Visiting homemakers, we have not expanded to the full use. Day-care centres for children; day-centres for old people; home-management training courses; counselling services. We have a budget from The Department of Social and Family Services for counselling that is small in comparison to the total outlay of moneys. The outlay of moneys for The Family Benefits Act alone is about 50 per cent of the total budget of $110 million. Yet, under research and planning—projects where this government might be able to learn and to change this system from being a system of payments into a system of rehabilitation and prevention, hopefully removing poverty—under research and planning we have a budget of $200,000. There cannot be very must research or planning under that budget, Mr. Speaker.

They also state that the department would encourage voluntary agencies and make full and appropriate use of them in operating the plan. Earlier in the session I spoke about the fact that private agencies have no rapport from this government in the job of assisting the casualties of our society.

They even went on to say that they should authorize and recruit sufficient staff, that they should plan, develop, maintain and support staff development, and staff training programmes to cover all the forms of training, public and voluntary agencies.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when, for the purpose of this particular department, rather than being a department of payments for the casualties of our society, it should become a department wherein we truly work to rehabilitate—to remove the indebtedness that occurs to casualties of our society when they turn to government assistance.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson (Victoria-Haliburton): Today I wish to express some thoughts on several subjects that are, and should be, of concern to our people and give suggestions on how these problems may be solved.

Also, Mr. Speaker, may I, through you, thank the Globe and Mail, the Toronto Daily Star and the Telegram for recently dealing with the issue of disposable bottles for soft drinks and other refreshments containers?

On June 29, 1966, I spoke on this subject and quoted several of the recreation area papers who had become concerned about this problem. I want to, once again, urge our two senior levels of government to deal with this problem in some reasonable way—to the lasting benefit of our environment. Perhaps the joint body of the council of natural resource Ministers would be the proper people to discuss this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to deal a minute or two with the report that recently this government has received on the Lake Ontario economic region.

As reported in the Telegram issue of Tuesday of last week—and the words used in the heading of this article which stated "A Plan for Oshawa's Poor Neighbours" in my opinion are most unfortunate; I believe they really do no credit to the reporter, nor this paper. In the opinion of the people of the area concerned I know that my words today will meet with their best wishes to see if this could be corrected.

The report does justify my remarks made on the estimates of The Treasury Department on Monday of this past week and they justify the recommendations. One of these is the expression of the tourist industry expansion that is needed in my area. Also the large need for highway facilities to allow the expansion of this tourist industry.

Because of the inevitable relationship between regional development and any updating of existing municipal structure, I believe we should know here of several vital internal feelings of each area and its people. Therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest some of these things that should be thoroughly considered, in my opinion. What are some of the most urgent problems confronting my county's people in 1968; and what questions do these problems suggest, in an attempt to see more clearly the goals of the people?

I believe some of these problems are internal problems. The kind of society they might wish to have is determined by three general forces—political, economic and social. On the political part, I believe the crux of any political system in Victoria-Haliburton counties is the balance which is achieved between the opposing poles of centralization and decentralization.

The practical heart of the issue is: What is the necessary authority that must be granted to the local government apart from the local government's present jurisdiction? Do our people seem prepared to grant any further controlling powers to a central or regional government? If so, is there a consensus as to the nature of these powers and their range?

Do my people want to:

(a) revise the present division of powers to account for charging needs and circumstances;

(b) make more precise the written provision of areas of divided jurisdiction;

(c) alter, by providing for special regional programmes, a special status or differing arrangement?

These are political ends on which our people must pass judgment and seek a consensus if they are to make progress in our pursuit of shared goals.

On the economic matters, Victoria and Haliburton are confronted not only by the internal, lateral strain between provincial and regional interests, but also by the external southward pull of concentrated population centres. These twin forces underlie the debate on the economic future of Victoria and Haliburton counties. Do the counties of Victoria and Haliburton wish to preserve their political sovereignty even though it might involve a risk of continuing to be the economically poor cousins of their southern neighbours, or can my people have their cake and eat it, too?

These questions are as old as Canada itself and the answers to them perhaps lie in the testament that Victoria and Haliburton counties during their first time have opted to live apart from other counties. There are other related fundamental issues that have not been determined. The most central of these is a question of differential treatment and growth of our regions as contrasted to the concept of approximate regional equality across Ontario, and does an approximate regional equality mean equality in basic standards of public services, or of per capita personal incomes, or of growth in population?

On social matters what are the chief factors contributing to the social and cultural goals of Victoria-Haliburton? In what ways do my people participate in a revolution of rising expectations and how do these ways affect the admittedly elusive notion of the quality of Canadian life? Among the many factors which could be cited in this category, two might be singled out for special attention since they appear to be common to the interests of most Canadians.

One is the influence of governments, be they federal, provincial or municipal, as they touch more and more Canadians every day. There is continually growing pressure on governments to play a larger role in the life of all citizens in every region of the country. This development is in sharp contrast to the spirit that prevailed in an earlier age. What impact is this new, positive phase of government having on individuals? Should Canadians be taking greater stock of the dimension of the public sector in their society? Should they be asked to determine more precisely what role they want their governments to play in their lives?

Two: In a technical and increasingly specialized society the necessity of education and sophisticated patterns of education are becoming ever more apparent. What values do Canadians attach to education and are they prepared to pay the spiralling costs of universal education at all levels? Have Canadians been too concerned with this need and demand for education and insufficiently concerned with establishing discriminating kinds of education to fit a wide variety of social, economic demands?

These are some of the shared social concerns of Canadians. Some consensus about their relative importance and contribution to Canadian society must be achieved since they, too, are aspects of the goals of Canadians. While there are undoubtedly many reasons for a changing society the following are obvious:

1. There has been a decline in rural power and irrevocably a loosening of the relationship among the provincial counties;

2. There has been an increase in the city power and an instinctive rural withdrawal in the face of such power;

3. There has been forced on Victoria-Haliburton the necessity to view the province more broadly and in particular to be sympathetic towards less fortunate parts of the country.

These are some of the concerns of my people in 1968. The solutions can depend on how we see ourselves and on how they define themselves concretely rather than abstractly. It is what my people are today and hope to be in the future that is crucial. The essential factor is the willingness and determination of our people to agree on the kind of area they want to have in common. This government, in view of this report, must have these answers. They also have posed some solutions which must get action and attention.

This government has established the priority, now it remains to do the job and, Mr. Speaker, I am going to be bold enough to suggest a policy of regional development strategy for my area. In order to expand development of Victoria and Haliburton counties one must first question whether we can do more toward opening the area to those with the incentive to bring in capital.

These people must be encouraged to make a deliberate decision to harvest our resources. In order to start such a decision we require certain things to be done to assist the present people of the area to sell its potential to those who might be interested. We must prepare an inventory of resources through the modern techniques of research. We must establish a plan of long-term goals and short-term objectives, and we must create a policy of co-ordination for all public and private operations in the direction of these long-term objectives. Each long-term and short-term objective must have a cost-benefit analysis and a stepped-up government programme of improvement of services and roadways.

We must construct new works and services on the basis directly related to the need; make provision to evaluate the programmes at the end of a reasonable length of time; and we must be assured that federal, provincial and local policies do not clash with these needs. Our resources study must include as the first step a policy—the resource of available tourist land, mineral and timber assets and agricultural potential. Our regional development council must have greater participation by local authorities devised.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some time ago the forest products accident prevention association of Ontario made a suggestion which I consider a good one. It has to do with the establishment of a school for loggers in this province. It was suggested that possibly arrangements could be made with authorities to establish an experimental logging area in which certain privileges and responsibilities for each authority would be created. One of these privileges would be to establish a training school for what might be called technicians in our industry such as drivers of wheel skidders and other logging equipment.

Possibly even individuals could be trained as power-saw operators and anyone who knows the problems of safety in our logging today realizes that our workers have found that they cannot be safe and still meet the production requirements when they are first starting on the job. This is, in my opinion, one way that The Department of Lands and Forests and Labour might co-operate with the people in the industry—the tools of the trade, along with our safety people—in establishing a much better safety practice in the lumbering industry in this province.

It may be well, Mr. Speaker, that senior governments of this country should also give study to what would happen if we had sewage and water systems operated and financed in a somewhat similar way to the Ontario Hydro, with provision for release in financing as a cost on land and the application on a user basis, instead of the present method. It would seem to me that if a charge for hydro was a basic part of land cost, we would see perhaps today another $1,000 or $1,500 being added to the cost of our homes here in this province.

The proposed study could take a look at the OWRC operations now being undertaken in our villages and townships under 2,600 population, in which experience is daily being obtained. I believe, Mr. Speaker, this could be the subject for a committee of this House and it could also have the result that the necessary capital could be found. It could be a shared programme, perhaps 40 per cent provincial, 40 per cent federal and 20 per cent local. These figures may be wrong but they could be adjusted to what the needs are and what the proper perspective would be.

I also want to say to the hon. members of this House that our horizons must not be limited by our present problems. We must look forward beyond them to a future province greater than our past has ever been. We, as Canadians, know so little about this country of ours. What shareholder in a corporation does not know more about the whole enterprise in comparison than we do as residents of this country?

I welcome the opportunity of going with the members of this House to see more of Ontario and understand it better this fall. I want to thank the government for suggesting such a trip and I hope it is a working trip and does something for the areas which we visit.

We, as residents of this country, also want to think about 30 years ago when this country was looking to a potential 15 million persons, and what figures of population are we looking at today? Some say 25, 50 or 100 million in our future! I suggest to the hon. members that they have not thought about it lately, as they are thinking of today's problems almost entirely, not those of a doubled population or greater. In the 1920s most of Victoria-Haliburton's tourist traffic came by train, but today 100 per cent come by car.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Some fly in.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson: Well, the hon. Minister says that some fly in. I hope a lot more will fly in after the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) builds us an airstrip, and also improves the one at Lindsay. I am sure the hon. Minister of Mines is now going to assist me in getting the funds for this project.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): We said sock it to them.

Mr. R. G. Hodgson: I do not think I need anything from The Department of Correctional Services.

Therefore, it is plain to anyone that we must, if we wish to maintain an even expanded type of traffic, have a system of highways that are comparable, at least, to the type of highways in other tourist areas of this province. No tourist area, no province, which desires to make a recreational industry a part of its national effort, can hope to expand or improve without a fine system of surfaced highways to carry the tremendous motor traffic—and I am sure we can expect this tremendous motor traffic in the future.

I believe we must make this province more interesting to unaccustomed Americans—with an atmosphere of Canada—and in this I do not mean flying the flag of the USA at every pop stand. We have, in this province, the right to fly beautiful flags that represent our history, why do we need to fly those of another people?

I have pleaded the case for my people, who live within my two counties, but an equal benefit is available to the seasonal residents we wish to gain from the urban centres of this province. I leave to another date to enlarge on how these people can be helped if the beneficial wheel of improved prosperity begins to turn in my tourist area. Industries of several types may come and go, they move or they may not be prosperous, but the tourist industry which was placed here by God himself can be developed to a greater potential. Ours is a developing recreational area, and we wish it to be Ontario's finest, serving not only our urban population of this province but those who choose to remain in our rural areas.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Now we will have a recapitulation of all previous speeches.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I had really intended only to discuss the Budget tonight but the member for London South (Mr. White) finally has had a great idea and so I am going to put the Budget aside for a moment. He has for once—the first time this session—made a very good suggestion: That someone should recapitulate the various matters that are brought up here in the House. So, I shall oblige the member for London South by doing that. The member for London South is leaving the House. It gives me great disappointment, I enjoy speaking so much more when he is here to give me his excellent interjections.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of discussion these last few days of the length of this session. Perhaps I might give that one word, because I disagree with the members who have spoken on that particular subject. We have been here five months which, apparently, is considerably longer than the Conservative government in the past has been used to running legislative sessions. The reason we have been here longer is because we have a larger Opposition, and a more aggressive Opposition and a more probing Opposition, and we are going to be here longer every year.

Frankly, most of the people in this province are used to working more than five months of the year, and I do not think there is anything particularly wrong with us sitting here five months or ten months if we have to, to go through all the work that is necessary. We have sat here five months and we have not really touched the basic important issues—housing, taxes, air pollution. We have seen all sorts of bills pass which are not going to really scratch the surface of the problems which we, on this side of the House, believe are the important problems which government should be looking after.

There are certain changes that should occur in the working of the House, and this has nothing to do with time. This has to do with two things. First, I think it would be agreed by the members on all sides of the House, and this is the farce that we call the private members' hour. In their benevolence some years ago, I understand, the government said: "Very well, we will take an hour, we will take two hours a week, and you may discuss the bills you bring in; we won't allow them to go to a vote no matter how clever they are or how good they are, even if every member of this House agrees with them; even if speakers from all sides of the House got up and say 'we agree with this bill', we will not let it go to a vote; if it is a good bill and if our side agrees with it, in three or four years we will bring it in, perhaps with some government member's name on it."

We have seen this. The member for Yorkview (Mr. Young) brought in, year after year, his bill recommending changes in motorcycle laws, and nothing was done about it, even though everybody agreed with it. Finally, after a suitable interval – the government usually likes five years, I think this time they took only four, because they are becoming more progressive—they had one of their backbenchers bring in a similar bill and, finally, it became legislation.

Well, this is a farce. We waste our time here. If you do not allow these things, we will send you private letters. We will put the ideas in the letters and you can bring them in under your own names to start with and save a lot of time, and we can get these progressive changes four years earlier.

So, Mr. Speaker, for goodness sake, if we are going to have private members' hours—and I think everyone agrees they are a good idea—allow a free vote. The government does not have to fall if a private member brings in a good idea and it passes. Everyone would understand it would not be a vote of confidence.

This would be a way of bringing in the good suggestions that are brought in from all sides of the House from time to time. There is no reason why the government cannot allow a free vote. If for any particular bill there is any particular reason why they should not want to allow the legislation, then they have the numbers, let them vote it down.

We have bills brought in here which affect the good and welfare of the people in this province and we have Conservative backbenchers getting up and speaking on behalf of those bills, and nothing happens. I think this is the first and major change that is required, in order to improve not only the working of the House but the feeling that the backbenchers are doing something worthwhile, not just putting up ideas for the government to bring in as their own some years later.

The other matter which caused a great deal of irritation on the Opposition side is the question period. I think most of us try not to abuse the question period. We certainly, in this period, have tried to keep our questions as brief as possible, as pertinent as possible and as close to urgent matters as we possibly can. Because of the time set-up, especially now that we are sitting in the mornings, it is very difficult to get in the questions sufficiently far in advance for the Ministers to have whoever does their thinking for them write out the answers.

So, I would like to suggest to you, sir, that we could very well bring in the system which is used in Ottawa. You can still keep control. You can have a time period if you wish. Certainly the questions should be pertinent and urgent matters of the day. But it should not be necessary for the Minister to be given a day's notice or half a day's notice, although if it is a matter that is going to require some research obviously it is to the member's advantage to give the Minister some advance notice.

This is a ridiculous archaic rule that is still used in this House and it is one that I think perhaps the Ministers now can set aside, so that the question period can be a proper give and take, and a proper way of spontaneous answers—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): They are afraid of being caught off guard.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, they are afraid of being caught off guard, but some of them are improving efficiently, so that they are able to partake in the debate and perhaps they would allow, next year, spontaneous questions and spontaneous answers, and if they are embarrassed, well, they can still take it as notice and they—

Mr. Lawlor: They can, then, take it back afterwards.

Mr. Shulman: That is true—perhaps.

There are a number of changes that we have suggested be made in the expenditures of this government; changes that are going to cost a lot of money, many millions of dollars, perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars; and the changes that we have suggested invariably involve people. I will go into these in some detail, perhaps when I get into the Budget, later this evening.

But invariably, when we suggest these changes—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Well, where are we now?

Mr. Shulman: The Budget proper. Invariably when we suggest these changes the question comes up, where is the money to come from and—having gone through the Budget proper—it is very obvious where this money must come from. There is only one really fat department. One department that could be cut down beautifully without anybody really feeling it. And this, of course, is The Department of Highways.

We could do all of the changes, without even bringing in any new taxes. We would make all of the changes that we have suggested here this session; bring in the things that the Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko) says there is no money for. We could bring in the changes that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Bales) has said there is no money for. We could actually give decent pensions to widows whose husbands die on a job. We could pay a comfortable allowance to people who do not have a penny coming in who are in disabled persons hospitals.

All this if we could just cut a little of the fat out of The Highways Department.

Here we have a year where the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) gets up and says, it was a tough year. "We have got to save money because it is hard to borrow money in the capital market. We hate to bring in these new taxes, but we need a little more money for horse breeders and we promised the people we would give them $50 back on an average house. We retax that back right after the election in another way, but still it is a tough year." Yet we see The Highways Department continuing to grow and get fatter every year and nothing being done about it.

So this is where I want to start. That is the department that should be cut to the bone. That is the department where, in this tough year, there should not be a highway built in southern Ontario. I had the opportunity—the mixed pleasure—of going to northern Ontario, and their highways are a shambles. The work has to continue up there. We could have managed here this year. We could have managed without building anything further on 401. It would have taken five minutes extra to get home Sunday night. The Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) was bewailing this, when this particular department was brought up before the estimates. We could have managed very well and that money could have done so much better in so many other places. But this government's system of priority is what is wrong with this government basically, and this is really where our major difference is.

Everybody agrees that we would like to have 12-lane highways all over Ontario right up to Hudson Bay, but we cannot have them. Everyone agrees there should be comfortable allowances paid to disabled persons. We do not have them, but we can have them, and this is where the priority system is wrong. There is something wrong in the legislative council and there is something wrong in the Cabinet that their priorities are so cockeyed.

Well now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to digress for a moment on to a slightly different matter and talk about the need for an office in Ontario which we, in this party, have requested on many occasions.

The Liberal Party—for some strange reason—has also requested this, and that is an ombudsman. I have often wondered why the Liberals just do not phone Pierre Elliott Trudeau and say please appoint an ombudsman for Canada, but I guess they have not got around to that yet.

In any case, they give lip service to it and we mean it. There should be an ombudsman in this province and there is nothing like a personal experience, Mr. Speaker, to indicate to you how much the individual in this province needs an ombudsman when he comes in conflict with government.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: I might be available—

Mr. E. A Winkler (Grey South): Is the hon. member after a job?

Mr. Shulman: I might be available after we form the government.

The purpose of an ombudsman, of course, is to stand between the individual and government at whatever level. We, as MPPs, all receive letters from many, many people who have problems which should be handled by an ombudsman, some of which we are able to solve. I see perhaps a little more than some of the members because of the large amount of publicity I received in some of these cases. In fact I was rather delighted when the Premier (Mr. Robarts) revealed the count of his mail the other day to find that he had slightly less than I do, but these last few weeks—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): The hon. member does not like himself, does he?

Mr. Shulman: The facts hurt just a little.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The hon. Minister does not like facts, does he?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I heard one of the Conservative backbenchers say the Premier does not advertise, but he certainly does a lot of advertising with his picture in the papers—mentioning the province of Ontario. I wonder if his advertising comes out of the public purse. Mine does not.

Anyway, these past few weeks—to my great sorrow—I found that I needed an ombudsman. In fact, I still need an ombudsman and all the people on the street where I live need an ombudsman. So we got together the other day and one of my neighbours suggested we contact our local MPP but, unfortunately, our local MPP has lost his feathers and he has become a very tame little bird so we are going to have to take another approach.

I would like to tell the House of this particular problem which exemplifies the need for an ombudsman in this province.

Our personal problem for which we need an ombudsman began on June 14 of last year when all the residents of Russell Hill Road—which incidentally is not in Forest Hill village, it is in the city of Toronto—south of St. Clair received a lovely letter from the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, department of roads, and it said:

> Information bulletin—File No. 200216: Storm sewer construction south trunk drains, Spadina expressway.
> The Metropolitan Toronto department of roads is constructing a trunk storm sewer to accommodate the rain water from the Spadina expressway and the area traversed through the city of Toronto in the borough of York. The route of this large drain follows the alignment of the expressway from Ellen Ridge Drive to the south of St. Clair Avenue and the Nordheimer ravine then east through the ravine south of Russell Hill Road to an outlet in the Don river.

And then it goes on with many details as to who is handling the construction, the various general contractors, the initial work, and so on, with great details about the storm sewer, and it finally finishes up:

> This storm sewer construction is a vital project of the development of the areas of the city of Toronto and the borough of York and cannot be constructed without some inconvenience to the residents of the surrounding area. We will endeavour to keep these to a minimum. If further information is required or complaints are received, we will promptly investigate the circumstances and supply the necessary information.
>
> Signed, J. L. Shirley, > Project engineer,
> Department of roads,
> Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

Well, it was a very nice, polite letter and we all thought it was very kind of the department of roads in Metropolitan Toronto to let us know that they were going to build a sewer in our back yards.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): The original letters were sent out at the instigation of the local MPP—

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to find who is responsible for this. The MPP for St. George, the Minister of Mines, has acknowledged that he is responsible for this letter. I wonder if he will acknowledge responsibility of the letters that follow?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Let him go on, I am rather delighted. Well, we were all very pleased at receiving this letter because it was kind of them to let us know and we were delighted that we were not getting the Spadina expressway, thank goodness it was going two blocks farther west, and the people that lived on those streets were going to have cars in their back yards. We were just going to get a great big pipe, and they were going to put it under the ground and they were going to cover it with grass and it was going to be beautiful. It is, after all, a minor inconvenience to have a hole dug in your back yard, and a pipe put down there, so we did not worry too much about that.

Well, some months went by and the bulldozers moved in; not in the back yard, but in the ravine behind it, which must be a good 100 or 150 feet back. They were not very pretty, but this was the price of progress. They began digging holes and then put down a great big pipe, and our little stream back there disappeared, but this is the price of progress.

January went by, and then at the beginning of February, I think about seven in the morning, we thought that an earthquake had begun. All up and down the street a great huge pounding began, and the earth was shaking and the houses were shaking, and plates began to fall off the table; walls began to crack; and windows began to break—not just in one home, but in a series of homes.

Quite seriously, at first I thought that there had been an earthquake, and went rushing out into the back yard to see what this pounding was. They had moved in a funny machine, and I am not sure what the technical name of it is, but because the earth was frozen, and they did not want to wait until it melted, they had a great huge pile driver, and it was ramming down into the frozen ground with tremendous gusto, some ten or twelve feet into the ground, and simultaneously, because the ground was frozen, shaking the earth for hundreds of feet farther in all directions.

Well, I and one of my neighbours went dashing out yelling: "Stop, you are wrecking our houses, you cannot do this." The poor man on the top of the pile driver stopped when I said, "Do not do a thing, I am going to get an injunction. I am going to go to my MPP, and I may even go down to Metropolitan Toronto to find out what they are doing. And I phoned the project engineer, a Mr. Shirley, at metropolitan roads, and he said to send them a letter. So on February 9 I sent them a letter saying that the whole house was falling down and to please stop. I got a very polite letter back on February 16:

Dear Dr. Shulman—

An hon. member: "Dear Dr. Shulman!"

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: To continue:

Your letter of February 9 to the clerk of Metro Toronto, concerning the driving of piles on the construction work at the rear of your property, has been forwarded to me. I have contacted the engineers and the contractor, Peter Kiewit and Sons, Contractors of Canada Limited, and I understand that the contractor and his insurance agent have discussed your complaints with you. Please contact me if there are any further developments in this matter.

Yours very truly,
Mr. M. R. Browning,
Director of operations.

The same day I received a letter from the metropolitan clerk:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 9, 1968—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does anybody ever start "My Dear Dr. Shulman," or "My Very Dear Dr. Shulman"?

Mr. Shulman: I do not dictate the letters that come to me. The Minister of Correctional Services has a little better control of the letters he receives.

—with reference to damage to your home at 66 Russell Hill Road. We checked this with our officials and are advised that the contractor, Fenco Harriss, has placed the matter in the hands of his insurance agent, Dale and Company, and we understand that they have already been in touch with you. If you require further information it is suggested that you get in touch with Dale and Company Limited.

Signed, George M. Foster,
Metropolitan Toronto clerk,
Municipality, Metropolitan Toronto.

Well, there was silence for a week. The pile drivers stopped. We did not bother to fix the broken windows and a parade of men started to come through our house—engineers, insurance men, excavators—they came and they measured and took pictures and expressed their concern. A man came in with a seismograph and they put the seismograph down one day and sent up a red flag and the pile driver began. The whole house began to shake and the seismograph went like this, and the engineer said: "It is a very low reading, we hardly feel it at all."

I should have realized then that something was wrong but I still was fairly innocent, and—trusting the metropolitan government and the construction companies and rather weak-mindedly trusting the insurance companies—I said, "Carry on and do what you can."

An hon. member: Allstate?

Mr. Shulman: No, strangely enough, it is not Allstate this time. Well, three weeks went by and then suddenly at 7.30 in the morning: "Bang! Bang! Bang!" And the house began to shake again. The neighbours started phoning that the houses were shaking and the walls began to crack north of us and south of us, and the dishes started to fall off the table again, and I was rather upset—

Some hon. members: Dear Dr. Shulman!

Mr. Shulman: I rushed out to the back yard again and said to the man on the top of the pile driver: "Stop, I am going to get an injunction." And he said "My boss says I cannot stop, we have got to keep pounding." So he kept pounding, and I ran down to my lawyer, and he said: "Well, you should learn some law. You cannot get an injunction if the damage they are doing is repairable by money." So I decided that I had better write a letter to Metropolitan Toronto, and on March 21, I wrote them a letter as follows:

Dear Sir:

Re Spadina expressway, contract R1067. On February 9, 1968, I wrote to you to complain to you of damage to my home because of pile driving by your contractor.

I should interject for those who have just arrived in the House, this is nothing to do with rectal problems.

Following the letter, I was visited by numerous insurance men and engineers, but despite my pleas the pile driving was not discontinued. Despite their assurances there has been further serious damage since that time. For example, several panes of hand-made unique stained glass window facing the ravine shattered within one day of the engineer's bland assurance that the vibration was very minor. I am writing to enquire as to whether Metro intends to make good for all the damages, as otherwise I shall seek legal redress.

The next day I got a lovely letter back from the metropolitan clerk.

Dear Dr. Shulman,

This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 21, 1968, with reference to damages to your home. Your letter had been referred to the metropolitan commission of roads with request that the commissioner reply directly to you.

Yours truly,
George Foster, metropolitan clerk.

Well, three days went by and sure enough a letter came from the department of operations, of the commissioner of roads:

Dear Dr. Shulman,

I have your letter of March 21 from the metropolitan clerk, referring to damages to your home, which you state were caused by work being done on our trunk storm sewer.

In our contract with Peter Kiewit and Sons, Company, the contractor on R1067, there is a clause which states that the contractor shall indemnify the Metropolitan corporation from all claims. Any claims for damages which are sent to us are forwarded to the contractor and we insist that he resolve them. Your letter has been forwarded to Peter Kiewit Sons, and I shall ask them to contact you immediately.

An hon. member: Who is your member of the Legislature?

Mr. Shulman: The Minister of Mines.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: I had considered approaching the Minister of Mines but he has informed us that he is responsible for the initial letter of the series, and under the circumstances, my faith in him has been a little shaken.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Obviously he has forgotten his responsibility to his constituency.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I am now asking the Minister, through you, if he will act as my personal ombudsman in this problem. Anyway, some time went by and finally we received a letter from the insurance company for the metropolitan government. Their name is the Canadian automobile service association, and I am quite concerned as to why—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Oh, that is terrible.

Mr. Shulman: I am quite confused as to why a Canadian automobile service association represents Metropolitan Toronto, but I presume that there is some strange logic.

Dear Dr. Shulman,

Re our insured, Metropolitan Toronto, we are the adjusters acting for the insurers of Metropolitan Toronto, and we are in receipt of copies of your correspondence to the metropolitan clerk. The pile driving operations are being conducted by our assured contractors under the terms of a contract which contains a "save-harmless" clause.

Perhaps the lawyers in the House know what this means, but it is rather foreboding.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: To continue:

We understand that you have already been contacted by the contractor's representatives and that they are investigating your complaints. Under the circumstances we must deny liability on behalf of Metropolitan Toronto.

Yours very truly,
J. N. Walsh, adjuster.

Well, I and other of my neighbours began to have serious problems. We found for example that our ceilings were beginning to part and water was beginning to run into several rooms. This was upsetting, and we had contractors come up who had been up on the roof previously and they said in the last few weeks everything had parted. I was a little upset when Metropolitan Toronto said because of the save-harmless clause everybody was out of luck, but we thought perhaps the contractor would do better.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, we went to this particular government—and I am giving the details of this case to show how government can become very callous when individuals are involved—at any rate this individual government said they were not responsible because everything was safe and harmless.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: We were then contacted by the contractor Peter Kiewit, and he said: "Well, we cannot pay your damages. It is too bad, we are very sorry about the whole thing. We cannot pay your damages. We cannot pay the damages of the other people down the street that have been hurt. We cannot pay the damage for people up the street, because we have an insurance policy. You see, we are in the construction business; we are not responsible for paying for damage, that is why we carry insurance. We carry insurance with Topless" – Topless? – "Toplis and Harding of Canada Limited" – that is spelled Toplis–"but do not worry, we deny liability because it is our insurance company's responsibility. They will look after everything."

So then some months went by, and we did not hear from the insurance company. I kept phoning them. I found the adjuster a lovely gentleman, a very nice man; he kept saying: "Do not worry, we will call you back." He never called, and I phoned every day for about two months and he never called back. Finally, I thought my wife would do better, so she phoned him, and the next day we received this letter.

Mr. Singer: "Dear Dr. Shulman–"

Mr. Shulman: No. No.

Dear Mrs. Shulman:

> Re our insured Johnson Kiewit subway corporation. Our file No. 9 LL 68-217-HG–

What disturbs me also about these letters is that the numbers keep getting longer and longer as the friendliness in the letters gets shorter and shorter. This was the last letter of the series–

> In accordance with our telephone conversation– which I am not very clear about, because the telephone conversation was, "We will call you back":

> –we would confirm that our principal for reasons previously explained have instructed us to deny liability in respect to your claim against the above-captioned insured.
> We remain, yours very truly,
> Toplis and Harding of Canada Limited.

End of series.

We thought perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we were wrong. After all, all these houses did begin to break down at the same time when the pile driving began, but perhaps it was a coincidence. So we thought perhaps they are right –perhaps it was not their fault and the pile driving had nothing to do with it; and the insurance company was not responsible; the construction company was not responsible; and the drain was not responsible; and the metropolitan clerk was not responsible. So we thought, well, we should find out for sure. We had so much damage, let us invest a little bit more and let us find out for sure.

So the leading–

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Did the hon. member get in touch with the alderman?

Mr. Singer: No. He wrote to Action Line.

Mr. Shulman: No. We did even better. We got in touch with Warnock Hersey International Limited. Warnock Hersey happens to have an international reputation as engineers and contractors doing this particular type of work, and Warnock Hersey came up, at a terrible price per hour, and they spent–

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Get to the point! Get to the point!

Mr. Shulman: Patience. Patience. We are getting there, this is just the introduction.

Warnock Hersey sent three men up and they spent some time there, and they presented a very lengthy, beautiful report with pictures and everything. At the end of this report they said that–

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Perhaps I should read the whole report, it is very interesting.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: Well, the conclusion then.

> It is our considered opinion–

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Their report said:

> It is our considered opinion, bearing in mind the limiting conditions set forth above, that the cause of all the damage noted in this report is heavy intermittent vibration.

Warnock Hersey also went into homes farther down the street and found the same thing–the same problem–the type of cracking and breaking caused by vibrations. Yet here we sit–and it so happens in this particular case this metropolitan clerk and this insurance company and this contractor have chosen an unfortunate street to pick upon, because the people on this street tend to fight back.

This is typical of the type of thing that can occur anywhere where people's homes are expropriated, or damage is done, and everybody says: "Too bad, we are denying liability, what are you going to do about it?"

I will tell hon. members what we are going to do about it. We need an ombudsman, because as things stand now—there we have the response of the Liberal benchers, "Get hold of a lawyer."

This is the attitude that is bad because most people cannot get hold of a lawyer, because of the cost. To bring a suit of this nature against a contractor can drag on for years—sure as heck the insurance company will appeal it. It can cost, as I have learned to my sorrow, thousands of dollars to fight these very peculiar cases. So most people say, if they are in a situation such as we are in, where the damage is a tiny fraction of what the lawyer's fees will be: "I suppose there is $2,000 damage in our home; $1,000 damage to the home to the south of us; $500 to the home north of us. Instead of chasing this amount of money we will let it go. It is not worth hiring a lawyer and taking the chance of heavy court costs where you may end up spending several times that."

That is why this response of "get a lawyer" is the worst response. I would expect better from the member who offered it.

There should be some responsibility on the part of government, if not on the part of the insurance company, when they do damage, to come in and repair the damage. This is just simple justice. When the government members deride it and laugh about it, when the Liberal members say, "get a lawyer," they are not doing justice to the position which they hold here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: The member for Downsview has very little contact with this problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, when the metropolitan clerk writes, "we are denying liability," and this is wrong, what is the response? Should you contact your MP, or your MPP, or your alderman, or your lawyer? Or should we have an ombudsman, so that when someone is caught by a big government on one side and the possibility of heavy expenses, there is someone to go to who will handle this? This is what we need.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Why did the hon. member not get in touch with his alderman?

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, since we are talking about aldermen: As we well know, the alderman, of course, will be sympathetic. He wants the votes, perhaps more than the MPPs. His margin is a little narrower, and he will come down in the council, and he will say, "This is a terrible thing." And the metropolitan clerk says: "Well, we have an agreement—we have a save-harmless clause."

It is true. I have today written to the mayor, and last week we wrote to various other individuals. Unfortunately the mail strike is probably holding some of this correspondence up.

I wrote to the mayor because I thought it would be more effective.

Mr. Speaker, if the front bench could subside we will get through probably tomorrow. I was hoping I would get through tomorrow, but as it is it may be not until the next day.

As to the matter of the length of my speech, the member for London South has suggested that I should go over the various matters which have been brought up in the House and for which there are tail ends. I gave this a little consideration before I came in here and found that it was going to take somewhat over a week. The members of my own party pleaded with me and I have promised them all that my speech will be no longer than the speech I gave in reply to the debate on the Throne Speech.

I would like to go on—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Mr. Shulman: I think it is perhaps fair that, inasmuch as this is the end of the session, I might briefly mention the three bills which I had the honour to introduce here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: I had the pleasure and honour of introducing three bills here, Mr. Speaker. They have not been given Royal assent yet and that is why I am going to mention them here.

One of them had to do with air pollution, Mr. Speaker, and this at least had the privilege of being debated here.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, it was my understanding that it was against the rules to debate any other item of business under a particular item of business. I am gratified to see the expert on the Liberal front benches nod agreement.

Mr. MacDonald: The member for London South is wrong, as usual.

Mr. Shulman: Inasmuch as the member for London South has missed most of the Budget debate, I guess he is not aware this precedent has been set by one or two members of his own party.

My first bill on air pollution did receive debate here and the only complaint from the government benches was that air pollution from automobiles was not covered in that. Now, inasmuch as it was expressly stated at that time, that I was bringing in a separate bill to cover air pollution from automobiles, this was a quibbling complaint.

Unfortunately, because the session is running out, the bill which I brought in, an Act to provide for the control of air pollution from motor vehicles, Bill 175 will not have the opportunity of being debated here. But I would like to say—and I am not going to go into it in great detail, Mr. Speaker—but I would like to say that this covers the one major source of air pollution which is not covered in the previous bill which I brought in to cover air pollution.

It should not be necessary for us in this House to wait several years for the government to act in this matter Now, air pollution—I am going to speak on this very briefly—we have really done nothing this year in the field of air pollution.

I was rather appalled a few weeks ago when the Minister of Health got up and said: "We have a pilot project going. The meat packing plants out in west Toronto are being cleaned up and this is going to be our first great project, so you see what we can do." Well, I have been reasonably modest up to that time, on that particular subject, but inasmuch as the Minister has brought it up as his pilot project, I think perhaps the members might be made aware—

Mr. Speaker: I would point out to the member that he is quite in order in discussing his particular bills which have not been debated here, but at the moment he is now returning to a debate on a matter which has been dealt with, and the rules of the House indicate that that is not again to be debated. So, I would request that he confine himself to those things properly debatable, even in the wide latitude of the Budget address.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I may. I do not know that the Speaker is, perhaps, exactly correct. The bill having been passed, it is something in the past, and he can now argue that the law still lacks some mechanics to make it sounder than it is.

Mr. Speaker: Not during the same session.

Mr. Ben: That bill is settled, but he is just pointing out that the law as it stands still lacks a lot of good sound factors which would make it stronger than it is.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I refer to page 451 and 453 of the 16th edition of May's Parliamentary Practice, and on page 451 under "Summary of Rules," it says:

> A member while speaking to a question may not introduce a matter which is irrelevant to that question, allude to debates of the same session upon any question or bill not then under discussion.

And on page 453, at the bottom of the page, it says:

> Reference to debates of the current session is discouraged even if such reference is not irrelevant as it tends to re-open matters already decided.

Mr. Speaker: I think the member for High Park understands the situation and can be relied upon to carry on.

Mr. Shulman: Well, I was very pleased to have this break, in any case, Mr. Speaker. But actually I was not going to repeat anything. What I was going to speak about was the particular problem in my riding, which I have not brought up until this time; to explain the background of how the air pollution was cleared up in that riding; and for that reason, I made reference to the air pollution bill.

Mr. Sopha: We know what the particular problem is in this member's riding.

Mr. Shulman: The particular problem that we used to have in my riding, Mr. Speaker, involved the matter that the riding smelled, it smelled rather badly.

Mr. MacDonald: It was a Tory riding.

Mr. Shulman: It has been smelling very badly for some 35 years, and the reason it smelled badly was that there are packing plants there, and packing plants have animals, and animals do various unpleasant things, and nobody was cleaning it up. The result was the odour would waft down beautifully all the way from St. Clair. Sometimes, it got down as far as the lakefront but you could always get it as far as Bloor if the wind was blowing in the right direction.

A lot of people were unhappy about this problem in my riding. I lived there for many years and we were told nothing could be done about it. From time to time we went to the good Conservative representative who said nothing could be done about it. That particular member was the chairman of the committee on air pollution, so he should have known. He said nothing could be done about it.

There was an election last October and one of the issues that developed in that election was the smell in High Park riding. There was a rather large meeting which the good Liberal judge, the then candidate, attended. He was one of the three of us but he was defeated. He became a judge. He was the only true winner, I think. The good Conservative member attended. He was the chairman of the air pollution committee.

I was there and we brought up this matter of smell. And I said: "But I have been down in Chicago and they don't smell in Chicago, so why do we have to smell in Toronto?" Apparently the animals were a little different in Chicago. They are scrubbed.

So the member explained it was not possible to clean that smell up. It did not seem right, so I went down to the Darling plant in Chicago and they gave me their plans. I brought them up here and I took them to Canada Packers, I took them to Swifts. They did not do anything before the election because they were still hopeful that perhaps the good chairman of the air pollution committee would be re-elected and that would be the end of their problem. But, unfortunately, he was not.

On October 18, I was in touch with the president of Swifts and the president of Canada Packers. On October 23 five days later, suddenly we had some results. I had a lovely letter from Mr. W. D. Gossett of the general engineering department of the Canada Packers plant, re odour control, west Toronto plant. I shall not take the time of the House to read this very lengthy report unless anyone wishes to hear it, but to sum it up briefly, they decided that perhaps it was time that something was done about odour control in west Toronto, so they laid out a heavy schedule which I have here.

This is why I asked the Minister earlier about his policy about air pollution in west Toronto. He did not know too much about it. He gave us a very nice one-sentence reply that this was a pilot project and everything was going to be lovely. I could not help smiling a little because, at the time, I had this very detailed report in front of me, showing how they were going to control rendering odours, sewage odours, the oil refinery, air odours, blood dryers, animal odours and so on, with great detail, the costs, the method by which it is done.

Hon. members might be interested in knowing the method by which it is done. It is all so very simple, it is ridiculous. It is done with a great, big fan. It used to be that they had a bunch of small fans in the packing plants, and the smelly animals would come through and they would blow the fans and the smell would go out in the air and everybody would smell it. Now, they put in one great huge fan. But this fan sucks in so that instead of the air going out the windows, the air goes in the windows. It is all pulled into one corner of the plant where this big fan is, and behind the fan is a great, big tub of water, and dissolved in the tub of water is the potassium permanganate and the air bubbles through this potassium permanganate and it comes out smelling sweet.

The little smell that is left is cleaned up by pouring a little perfume on it as it comes out. They cleaned up the whole darn thing with a great big tub of water and a big fan.

This is the problem they had not been able to solve for 30 years. Well, this is the pilot project which the Minister of Health has told us about in west Toronto and I thought perhaps the members would be interested in knowing why and how we got that pilot project. But this disturbs me a little bit, Mr. Speaker, about air pollution in the rest of the province, because if this is how we are going to have projects going, may I suggest to the various members—I am sorry the member for Sarnia (Mr. Bullbrook) is not here because he needs it because his riding smells too. I am sorry that he cannot hear—

Mr. Ben: How much is it going to cost?

Mr. Shulman: How much is it going to cost? It is going to cost Canada Packers an initial expenditure of $190,000 and, in the future, another $254,000.

Mr. Ben: That is .01 per cent of their turnover?

Mr. Shulman: It is, I think, something like, one per cent of their capital last year.

Mr. Ben: It took them 30 years.

Mr. Shulman: It took them 30 years to get around to spending that one per cent.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): The hon. member is guessing.

Mr. Shulman: No, I am not. I looked up the figures. Well, this is what we are all going to have to do in our own ridings because I do not believe that the government is going to move. If this is their pilot project which they had nothing to do with—very little to do with it I would suggest—then the various members had better go around to the different plants and present schemes, and tell them: "If you are not going to co-operate, boys, we are going to get up and yell in the Legislature because this is the way to get results."

The air pollution in the Conservative ridings? I am afraid there is no solution for it. We are just going to have to leave that be for the next three years.

Now there is another bill to which I had the pleasure to give first reading in this Legislature, and which I would like to spend a few moments on because it has had no discussion as yet. I think it is terribly important and it has to do with breathalyser tests.

One of Ontario's better newspapers, the Kingston Whig Standard has written this up in some great detail. Briefly, Bill 159 is a bill to bring in a modified implied consent law; and this modified implied consent law is a little different from the implied consent laws we have in other parts of the world in that, instead of insisting that persons have a breathalyser test—because some people object to the breathalyser test—it insists that you take either the breathalyser test or a blood test or a urine test to test your body alcohol. If you refuse to take a test, your licence to drive would be automatically cancelled for six months.

Now, there has been discussion of this type of change in this area and in other jurisdictions for years and despite the continued discussion and despite the proven results in areas like California and England, nothing has been done here and there has been nothing in the comments of the Minister involved to suggest that anything is going to be done.

This, I think, is so very important. I am convinced from reading the research that this can make a massive change in the number of deaths on our highways. I would like to take a few minutes and read the write-up here in the Whig Standard of last Saturday because I think it is so very important. I quote:

> Bill 159 is probably one of the shortest private member bills to hit the Legislature in a long while, but its impact on the motoring public of Ontario could be earth-shaking in a great many ways. Dr. Shulman has fathered the bill which is short-titled The Blood Alcohol Test Act, 1968. Officially, it is known as An Act respecting impaired drivers. If and when the bill is ever passed by the Legislature then breathalyser, blood and/or urine tests will become mandatory for all motorists suspected of being impaired while driving their vehicles. In effect, the bill will give the suspected tippler two choices; he can take the test or lose his driver's licence for six months. Last December, the then Justice Minister Pierre Trudeau introduced similar legislation to be enacted by federal authorities. He included the proposed breath-test law in his omnibus bill. The bill died when Parliament was dissolved by Mr. Trudeau after his move to the Prime Minister's chair. Present laws allow a motorist to refuse the breathalyser test and his refusal cannot be held against him in court.
> Dr. Shulman said such a bill should have been passed in Ontario years ago regardless of any dissent from persons concerned with the possible infringement of civil liberties.

When I was a coroner in Metro I found that 50 per cent of in-car fatalities and highway accidents involved liquor. That alone, is sufficient reason to pass this bill immediately.

I will not go on. It is a full-page article, but there is one portion here in a separate article which I do wish to read because the one objection that has been made against this type of bill is that we are interfering with civil liberties. I was very interested to see that the Kingston Whig Standard did a poll of a number of lawyers in Kingston, including two Crown attorneys, and they responded unanimously. This represents a tremendous turn in the way that lawyers and the legal profession are thinking and the heading is:

> LAWYERS FAVOUR COMPULSORY TESTS
> Should the government have the right to demand a motorist to volunteer information which may be used against him at his own trial? Kingston's Crown attorney and four city lawyers each say the answer is "yes". The proposed compulsory blood alcohol test > legislation now before the Ontario Legislature may cause a stir elsewhere in the province but in Kingston, lawyers of both the prosecution and defence say they rest their case on common sense.

> The Whig-Standard asked Crown Attorney John E. Samson and city lawyers B. W. Trumpworthy, B. Swaine, H. L. Cartwright and G. M. Steel, to give their views on the proposed law change. As the law now stands, a motorist suspected of impaired driving can refuse a breathalyser test, but under the proposed bill he must submit to the breath, blood or urine test or forfeit his licence for six months.

They then go ahead at some length with the various comments of the Crown attorney—I believe two Crown attorneys and four other lawyers, all of whom spoke in favour of this bill.

So I would like to say to you, sir, and through you, to the responsible Minister, that there has been a tremendous change in feeling toward this type of legislation among the legal profession. Certainly among a good large section of the legal profession—

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): How can the hon. member say that? Does he say that on the basis of fact?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I say that on the basis of one Crown attorney and—

Mr. Bullbrook: It is not logical.

Mr. D. M. De Monte (Dovercourt): There are about 30 lawyers in Kingston—

Mr. Shulman: I would say that six of the 30 lawyers in Kingston—the six who happen to be chosen by chance—

Mr. Bullbrook: But the hon. member always generalizes.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I do generalize—

Mr. Bullbrook: The hon. member always generalizes on the basis of something that he has read. Has he done a consensus of opinion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Order.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, the member has asked a reasonable question. Yes, I have done a consensus of opinion.

Mr. Bullbrook: How many lawyers has he asked?

Mr. Shulman: On this particular subject—the medical legal society had a meeting at which—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

The members will please address each other through the chair as is proper in a debate such as this. The exchange of pleasantries and questions in this manner is neither in accordance with the rules nor is it allowing the debate to continue properly.

Mr. Bullbrook: Well, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to you. Sometimes it is difficult to contain oneself.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, actually I think the question asked was a reasonable one, even if it did not go through you, sir. I would like to inform the members that at a meeting of the medical legal society in Toronto—which is a society formed of doctors and lawyers who are interested in medical and legal problems—at a meeting where I was present, and at which I believe there were perhaps between 50 and 75 lawyers present that particular night, somewhere over half of them agreed that this was a proper change.

So I would say, through you, sir, to the members, that a sizeable body of the profession as I said before have now—

Mr. Bullbrook: But that is not what the hon. member said before. That is the point.

Mr. Shulman: As a sizeable body of the profession now agree that this change is not infringing on civil liberties or, if it is infringing, it is infringing in such a small way that the benefits which we would receive far outweigh those infringements, it should be brought in. Perhaps next year the government will see fit to introduce such legislation.

Now, I would like to speak briefly about one or two of the departments that I have had the pleasure to criticize this past session. There was a matter that came up in reference to The Attorney General's Department in the past week which related to coroners' inquests and this is a matter in which I have considerable interest. We found that when this matter came up, referring to the death of one Isaac Teichroeb, that inquests are sometimes held in the cases of violent deaths and The Coroners Act is sometimes followed.

This death took place 1½ years ago. It involved violence, it involved a violent death where a worker was burned to death under most peculiar circumstances. No inquest was held for the simple reason that the coroner was never notified. There was never any coroner's investigation and yet what I find disturbing is that we have a Coroners Act which was brought up to date before this death occurred because of the Pat Morgan case some years earlier where there had been a death not reported under unusual circumstances.

So The Coroners Act was brought up to date and tightened up and what do we have? We have exactly the same situation again where there is a violent death, where the circumstances certainly merit investigation, where there may very well be liability of individuals or a firm involved here. The doctor who signed the death certificate does not bother to report the death to the coroner. Nobody else reports the death to the coroner, and yet when the matter is brought to the attention of the acting Attorney General, there is no suggestion charges are going to be laid against those persons responsible.

The response we get is "Well, it is too bad there was not an inquest because the death was not reported to us." This is not the response the Minister (Mr. Wishart) should give. He should say, "The death was not reported to us so there was no inquest, but we will hold the inquest today and we will lay charges against the persons responsible, the persons who covered this death up so that in future this type of thing will not occur".

This is the response we should get from The Attorney General's Department. He does not show the gumption, the action that is expected from him in these matters, because coroners' inquests can be very important in preventing other deaths.

The other area where I am disappointed in The Attorney General's Department is in relation to a matter that I brought up in my first talk in this House. It involved the matter of two gentlemen who were involved in the theft of a small amount of $5 million—a little matter of forgeries involved there. There were original letters presented by officials in The Attorney General's Department saying it was a forgery and charges could be laid. Nothing was done at that time. When the matter was brought up no explanation was given, no charges were laid.

Another matter was brought up, a man who got out of jail by falsifying medical reports. Nothing was done about that, no investigation was held. We expect a little more equal application of the law no matter who is involved and this is my major complaint against The Attorney General's Department.

I would like to turn briefly to The Department of Health and OMSIP, which is a great step forward in this province, but there are still many problems in its working and they just do not use common sense. I am sorry the Minister of Health is not here, but I have a case here which illustrates the type of problem that comes to our attention and which illustrates that OMSIP needs a further tightening up, a going over by the Minister or someone from outside, so this type of silly thing will not occur. The reason I am bringing this up in the House is that I wrote the Minister involved about it some weeks ago, on July 10 actually.

There are many matters that come to me and I write the Ministers. When I receive a response it is not necessary to bring it up in the House provided they are willing to take some action. Well, this particular Minister is not too good with his mail and he did not answer this letter, and this is why I am bringing this matter up in the House.

On July 10 I wrote to Mr. Dymond as follows:

> Re:
> Mrs. E. I. Bertram, OMSIP Contract No. 4018371837.
> Dear Mr. Minister:
> Through an error at OMSIP Mrs. Bertram did not receive her May premium notice until June 7. She paid her premium by cheque on June 13, but claims for May have been denied because of the suspension of her contract. It does seem unfair that Mrs. Bertram should be penalized because of an error by OMSIP and I would ask that you look into this matter.

Well, there has been no response. I have letters here from The Department of Health medical services insurance division signed by a Mr. K. G. Gore, supervisor, claims edit, and it is addressed to Mr. D. A. McLean, manager of elgibility services, 40 St. Clair Avenue West. Someone happened to send me this letter, but it is rather interesting here because it confirms everything that Mrs. Bertram had said. It is very brief and I would like to read it.

> Refer to the attached copy of an LC-36 REV. No. 3 letter sent to Mrs. E. Bertram on June 25, 1968, by clerk no. 1617.
> Please note that Mrs. Bertram received her first premium notice June 7, 1968. She paid her premium by cheque on June 13 at 2195 Yonge Street. Mrs. Bertram received a premium reminder on June 28, 1968, a copy of which is attached. Claims for May, 1968, have been denied because of the suspension of contract No. 318371837.
> Would you kindly investigate the suspension of Mrs. Bertram's contract and reply direct to her.

So here we have a situation where OMSIP makes a mistake. They forget to send out the premium notice; they send it out three weeks late; she pays her premium by return mail; OMSIP is aware they made a mistake.

Here is a letter from the senior official in The Department of Health who confirms it is OMSIP's mistake; he writes OMSIP pointing out it is their error and yet in spite of this, in spite of a letter to the Minister, we still cannot get any results. Mrs. Bertram cannot get her bills paid and the doctor says they refused to pay him, therefore she has to pay. So there is something wrong in OMSIP. Anybody can make a mistake, but once the mistake is pointed out there should be a willingness on the part of the Minister of Health and the other officials on down to whoever is handling this in OMSIP to correct the error, and if it is their error they should not penalize someone else.

Now very briefly—I am sorry the Provincial Secretary (Mr. Welch) is not in the House—but I would like to again mention that favourite whom we all love to mention from time to time, Mr. E. P. Taylor. You may recall, Mr. Speaker, that many moons ago when the matter came up of that brewery which does not make annual reports and does not let its shareholders know what is going on—the hon. Minister said that if the details would be supplied to him he would be glad to look into the matter and decide whether charges should be laid. Well, the details were supplied but, sad to say, we are still waiting for the charges. I would suggest that next year the brewery will not make an annual report either—they have been doing this for 11 years now—but it does not seem to matter because apparently some of the people have to obey some of the laws some of the time.

I again say, through you, sir, to the Minister, and I hope he reads it in Hansard even though he is not here, for goodness sake, if you are not going to enforce that law, do not enforce it against anyone else and take it off the books, because it looks bad that the rich people of this province can get away with so many varied matters that others cannot.

Now, The Department of Public Works—

Mr. Sopha: How many more has he got to go?

Mr. Shulman: How many departments are there?

Mr. Sopha: Twenty-three.

Mr. Shulman: Well, we will be here a while, then.

I would like now to turn to The Department of Public Works for a moment. I am sorry to see the Minister is not in the House but perhaps he will read about it in Hansard.

One of the functions of The Department of Public Works which was not gone into during the estimates, unfortunately, is the matter of safety. One of the duties of the safety division is to go around looking at the various buildings that are owned by the government and see whether they are built safely, whether there is a fire hazard, and they do this job very conscientiously. They go around to the various buildings and when they find something that is a fire hazard they do not hesitate to tell the various departments that it is a fire hazard. There is only one thing wrong; nothing is done about it.

We have a little place about a block and a half from here at 253 Spadina Road. It is called the George Brown college. Last December The Department of Public Works sent up their safety inspectors and the safety inspectors went through and they were pretty appalled and they sent this letter to The Department of Education—The Department of Education is responsible for George Brown college—and perhaps I could quote the letter, it is not too long:

> On Tuesday, December 19, 1967, I made an inspection of the building at 253 Spadina Road, Toronto. This building is owned by Metropolitan Toronto and is leased by the George Brown college, who occupy the second and fourth floors.
> On the day of inspection there were no students in this building. During the regular school term there are approximately 130 students attending classes in this building. As the condition of this building violates all and every fire safety regulation, it is impossible at this time to give a complete report and recommendation. These will follow after a more thorough inspection is made. In the interest of fire safety I would recommend that these premises be discontinued immediately for use as classrooms—and so on and so forth. Well that was in last December—December, 1967.

The Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) is a reasonable man and probably one of the more progressive members of the government, so I thought it would be interesting to see what he did when he received a letter saying: "This building violates all and every fire safety regulation." So I let five months go by and in May I went up to look at George Brown college at 253 Spadina Road and they had made a change, mind you, they had made a change.

They are still on the second and fourth floors, and it is still a firetrap. Everything is clapboard and masonite, and the place will burn down without any provocation whatsoever; but they have made a change. Before they had 130 students, and now they only have 128 in there, so this is an improvement.

If there is a fire, there will undoubtedly be a lower mortality. That is what is the matter with the department.

I am not faulting The Department of Education, because I have a series of these letters involving many different buildings owned by the government, and I am not going to take the time of the House tonight to read them, but perhaps when we go through next year's estimates I will have the pleasure of going through each department and reading the letters.

I have a series of letters sent out by The Department of Public Works pointing out the terrible hazards in various buildings either owned or leased by this government through the province, and they think that their duty is done when they send out these letters saying: "It is terrible. It is a firetrap, and if it burns down everybody in there is going to be burned to death." Nothing is done.

Something is wrong either in that department or in the other department which files this way and does not care about it.

Now, I am delighted to see that the Minister of Correctional Services is in the House, because I would like to make one or two remarks about his department. I would not want to miss the Minister of Correctional Services.

An hon. member: They are still reform institutions, no matter how you look at them.

Mr. Shulman: There are three matters which I would like to bring up under this department that I find very disturbing. Let me say that there are many things about this department that I find disturbing. There are three matters which I find most disturbing outside of the Minister. The first is the policy—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member admits that I disturb him?

Mr. Shulman: Only when he can't answer the questions that I ask him.

The three things that I find most disturbing, and I boil them down to three words, are transfers, family suffering and bonding.

Transfers first of all. This department has a most peculiar philosophy of transferring customers, prisoners, around the province. This is used as a form of punishment and it should not be. I can well understand if a prisoner is in an institution where he has certain privileges, to be allowed outside, or to take training, and he abuses them, then I can understand that he should be transferred to a tougher institution, a place where there are fewer privileges, or no classes, until he is sufficiently disciplined to go back.

But our policy in the province goes far beyond that. Our policy is peculiar in that we will take a prisoner who, let us say, is in Guelph, and he is a bad prisoner. He will be transferred to Burwash, and the tough ones go to Millbrook. All this I can understand. Then suddenly they say in Millbrook that he is too tough for them—send him to Sarnia.

Sarnia is an ordinary jail, and the guards do not have the training of the guards at Burwash or Millbrook, and the facilities are not as good, they are not adapted for holding tough prisoners as they are at Millbrook, and yet they send the men there. They also send them to North Bay, this is a favourite.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: This was all discussed under the estimates.

Mr. Shulman: This matter had not been fully investigated at the time of the estimates, although we were aware then that prisoners had been transferred out of Millbrook, and no reason was given. Some prisoners are transferred hundreds of miles from their families, and questions to the Minister go unanswered as to when the prisoners are going to be transferred, to a jail—I certainly cannot understand why a jail when you have Millbrook available.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I explained that to the hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, but not very well.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member means he was not satisfied with the explanation?

Mr. MacDonald: That is right, and he has a right to say why he is not satisfied, too.

Mr. Shulman: If the Minister has to put a prisoner in jail, why pick the one that is farthest from his home? We have jails in southern Ontario that are three-quarters empty, scattered all over this area, and yet they sent 12 prisoners up to North Bay, 10 of whom had their relatives in southern Ontario. This is just unnecessary cruelty. This is objection number one; cutting families and visitors off is a type of punishment which is going to send a convicted criminal out on to the streets when he does go out, and who will head back very quickly into the reform institutions.

We have this great new bill that has been brought in, and we go through the lip service. This is what I object to; they talk beautifully in here and the things that they say are wonderful, but in practice the things that they do are bad.

Mr. Ben: Does the hon. member believe all that?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I do.

The second matter which I wish to discuss under this department is the effect on families. If we are interested in reform we have to do something about the families which are suffering so needlessly. If the hon. members will forgive me, I am going to read a letter which I received from a prisoner in Burwash this week.

Dear Dr. Shulman:

> I was arrested on February 27, 1968 and placed in custody for a number of crimes. On April 23, 1968 I received a sentence of nine months definite and six months indefinite. Having a wife and children, I realized that I had made a very bad mistake, and therefore feel that it is only right that I should pay for it.
>
> Keeping this in mind, I keep asking myself if it is I or my wife and children who committed these crimes, for this is what has happened to them up to this time.
> On April 24, 1968, my wife was informed by the Sudbury city welfare—

She lived in the wonderful city of Sudbury that I have things to say about from time to time:

> —that she would have to move because they would not pay the rent which was $140 per month. She was told to move by the end of the week or they would take her children and put her to work.
>
> After losing her father a few months earlier, and then having me end up here, you can see and understand why she chose to move, even though she did not have anywhere to go. She placed all her belongings with friends, and with the children in tow, began looking. After a week of frantic search she was unable to locate anything, so she returned to the Sudbury welfare. They suggested that she move to Toronto, and after asking my permission, she agreed.
>
> Arrangements were made for her, but when she asked to have our things picked up she was told that there was not enough time.
> Because of this, all of our things were lost except a few pieces of clothing belonging to the children. Dishes, linen, my clothing and effects, and all her clothing and effects were some of the things.
> After reaching Toronto, she was placed in emergency housing on Richmond Street where all her freedom was taken from her. She was forced to take our children and all our belongings wherever she went.
> If you were 110 pounds and had to carry 29 pounds of a baby boy, and hold hands with a four-year-old, and keep your eyes on an 11-year-old, then you would have no freedom either—

Mr. Sopha: Too bad he did not think of that beforehand. Did he?

Mr. Shulman: May I suggest that there is a certain responsibility for the families on the part of society?

> Also, only her rent was paid, and she was not supplied paper and stamps with which to write me.
> After a month there, she was phoned by the head supervisor of the buildings who informed her that she could not stay there because she was not a resident of Toronto, having come from Sudbury, and she had to get out. She has tried everywhere for help and all she has gotten thus far have been threats to take her children into a home.

He goes on at some length. This is not going to produce reform, Mr. Speaker. If we are really interested in reform in this province we have to do something for the families involved. Rehabilitation begins before that prisoner walks out of that door. By that time it may be too late. One of the functions of the rehabilitation officer of The Department of Correctional Services should be to look into the problems of these families, or at least, if he is notified of the problems, to take it upon the department's responsibility to see that innocent families are not shoved from pillar to post as this family has been, because the breadwinner was a criminal.

If you are interested in punishment, then by all means punish the criminal, punish the families, punish the children, bring back the stocks, bring in the whips.

But the Minister keeps saying that we are interested in reform. And I say, if the Minister is interested in reform, then start with the family. He cannot allow them to be punished like this.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: How would the hon. member have dealt with that?

Mr. Shulman: The hon. Minister's department should have rehabilitation officers who should have interceded in Sudbury, who should be willing to intercede with the welfare department to see that city councils do not—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: May I ask the hon. member whether he ascertained whether rehabilitation officers in this particular case did contact the family?

Mr. Shulman: Certainly the prime responsibility was that of the welfare people. The original responsibility was with the welfare people in Sudbury. There is a responsibility on the welfare people in Toronto, but a portion lies on the rehabilitation officer. I am sorry all the rehabilitation officers spend their time with the men, they do not spend it with the families.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Might I point out to the Minister that this is a debate, and the proper way to carry on a debate is through the chair. Now if the Minister wishes to address his remarks to the member he will please do it in accordance with the rules of this House.

Mr. Shulman: The third matter which I wish to mention briefly under this debate is bonding.

Under the estimates of The Department of Correctional Services I brought up the matter of bonding, and this is a most serious problem in rehabilitation of prisoners. The Minister at that time played down this problem, and said: "You may be able to find the odd case where it does not work out, but we will step in when there is difficulty, and we will straighten things out."

By golly, it was not two weeks after that when this problem came up. The man I am referring to, the Minister knows—we have discussed this at some length. His name is Ron M. I will not give his full name, because he finally has a job and is on the way to rehabilitation, and this was really a tragic story.

This was a man who had become an alcoholic two or three years ago and, as a result of this, he had become involved in crime, he had been sent to jail, and he had reformed. Everyone was convinced he was reformed. The prison guards were convinced, the prison governor was convinced, the rehabilitation officer was convinced, the parole officer and the parole board were convinced. Everyone was sure he had reformed.

He was a car salesman and when he came out of jail he wanted to go back to being a salesman.

So he went from place to place and he was honest—he told the whole story—he admitted that he was an ex-con and most places turned him down because of that.

He finally came to the Ontario Automobile Company who said: "We do not care if you are an ex-con, we will take you on. We will give you a job. There is only one problem, can you get bonded?" He said he thought so, and he applied for bonding.

I was then approached by Mr. Kerr, the man who does the hiring at Ontario Automobile, and I also spoke to the rehabilitation officer for Mr. M. He could not get a bond.

The General Assurance Company said, "We do not bond ex-cons. We are not going to give you a bond so you cannot get a job. Tough luck."

I got in touch with the Minister and he said he would look into it. The rehabilitation officer did his best, too. Two days later I got a lovely letter from the Minister saying everything was being looked after, and sure enough they did get a bond for him. They got a $1,000 bond with another bonding company.

The only trouble is, Ontario Automobile Company needs $100,000 bond. They kept the job open for a week or so, and then said, "Well, too bad, we do not mind taking ex-cons but we will not take ex-cons who cannot get bonded. So too bad for you, you go out and do something else."

Well, this man came to see me and he said, "Am I to go back to crime? Those are the two choices. I can sell cars, but they will not let me sell cars because I cannot get a bond; or shall I go back and break and enter; shall I steal? These are the two possibilities. This company, the General Assurance Company, refuses to give me a bond. Well, what happens?"

This story has a happy ending—

Mr. Ben: May I ask through the Speaker: Why would an automobile dealer require that a salesman that sells cars be bonded for $100,000?

Mr. Shulman: Yes. I would be glad to explain that. I thought that was rather amazing, too. I did not think he could steal that many cars, but apparently when you are using a demonstrator car, Mr. Speaker, and you run into someone you require this larger bond. They want a $100,000 bond—not just Ontario Automobile, all the companies. Goodness knows why, but they do, and they insist on it.

This story has a happy ending, Mr. Speaker. I was desperate in this case. It seemed absolutely impossible and yet three days later, Mr. M. phoned me to say "I got my bond. I am going to work for the Roy Foss Company. I have got my bond, and I am going to be able to sell cars, and who do you think is at the bottom of it but the General Assurance Company." I was a little amazed at this.

The reason he called me is that he had another problem, that he was not given a licence to sell cars because The Department of Commercial and Financial Affairs has a special investigation on any ex-con and normally, apparently, it takes two weeks. I must say in this case the Deputy Minister behaved very kindly and he rushed it through very quickly, within a day, and the man got his licence and he is now selling cars. I was amazed at why the General Insurance Company suddenly repented and found a soft heart and would give the $100,000 for the Roy Foss Automobile Company, but would not give $100,000 bond when he wanted to work for Ontario Automobile. So I phoned the General Assurance Company to find out what was the answer to this strange mystery. The company said: "Oh it is very simple. We would not give a bond to an ex-con but we gave him the $100,000 bond because Mr. Roy Foss who owns the agency guaranteed the bond."

So here is the problem, Mr. Speaker—and through you to the Minister—until we have something done about this bonding problem you are going to force this type of man back into crime. Here we had by chance a man—I presume his name is Roy Foss; in any case whoever owns the Roy Foss Company—who has done a tremendous public service. Here is a man who really has moved out of his way to prevent this man from going back into a life of crime.

But we do not have many men like that. We do not have the men who have the financial resources to do this type of thing, and until the Minister finds a way of solving this bonding problem—and it has not been solved, this case certainly proves it—you are going to have this type of man who wants to reform coming out into public society and being forced back into crime, and this is probably the most serious problem facing this department.

Mr. Ben: May I ask the member a question? Why would Roy Foss guarantee the bond when he would not need it if he is going to guarantee it? What kind of a bond is it?

Mr. Shulman: I believe there is some regulation, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The story is not quite the way the hon. member is telling it.

Mr. Shulman: Perhaps under The Used Car Dealers Act it requires a bond, but every used car dealer requires it for his salesmen—we checked back with the association.

Mr. Ben: He is guaranteeing it, in other words he is going to pay it.

Mr. Shulman: He guaranteed it personally, Mr. Speaker. However, that is information we received from the General Assurance Company, not from Roy Foss.

Now, I would like to move on to another department, and this is—if it were not sad it would be ludicrous—The Department of Transport.

The Department of Transport in their wisdom or lack of same have an unsatisfied judgment fund and if someone does not carry insurance they can pay $25 at the time they get their licence and they are given a licence to drive on their car. It is a car licence of course, not a driver's licence.

But just a few weeks ago I learned of a very strange provision in this particular law, and this is in reference to those poor individuals who have paid the $25, who do not carry insurance, and then proceed to have an accident. The particular man I am referring to is a Mr. Wilfred Carberry and he lives at 117 Fern Avenue, and he ran into a most odd situation.

He was driving along in his car at the corner of Lakeshore Boulevard and Leslie Street and another car ran into his rear end. He felt it was the other fellow's fault and he did not worry too much about it because there was not that much damage, so he forgot about the matter.

The police came and investigated it. There were no charges laid, the policeman thought there was apparently fault on both sides. Then suddenly, two weeks ago, Mr. Carberry received a letter from The Department of Transport saying "Your licence to drive is cancelled. There is $297 damage done to the other car you were involved in an accident with. We have paid for that damage under section 5 of the Act and until you pay us back we will cancel your licence."

Well, this did not make any sense to me, so I got in touch with The Department of Transport and they said section 5 of the Act says that: "Without any court case, without any police charges, without any civil case, the department is entitled to pay out any sum of money to a person involved in an accident if the other person involved does not carry insurance but has paid this special $25 fee, and we can carry this out without holding any hearing. All we have to do is send a registered letter to the person. Whether or not he gets it is his business, all we have to do is send out the registered letter."

Well, I said—

Mr. Sopha: A very just provision that was long wanted in this province.

Mr. Shulman: The member for Sudbury thinks that this is a very just provision. Let me tell him the circumstances in this particular case.

In this case a registered letter was sent out, but unfortunately the person who answered the door and signed for that registered letter turned out to be a ne'er-do-well relative of Mr. Carberry who signed for it thinking there might be money inside. He then opened the letter, found it was just this silly thing, threw it away, and then left—he was visiting there. He is now in jail, so it is very difficult to take any recourse against this particular man.

Carberry knew nothing about this whatsoever. The first thing he knew about it was when he received this letter saying: "Your licence has been cancelled, turn it in immediately."

So I wrote a letter to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett). It did seem unfair that if a man was not to blame in an accident, without any proof of liability, he should be forced to lose his licence or else pay out this large sum of money—which in this case the man does not have. I got a letter back from the Minister which reads as follows—it is dated July 8; this is fairly fresh:

> Dear Mr. Shulman:
> Re: Mr. William Carberry. Your conclusion that Mr. Carberry was not at fault is at variance with the police report for it was necessary that our officials be satisfied that here was liability before meeting the claim of Mr. Rapos.

—and so on.

> Yours truly, Irwin Haskett.

Well, I am always interested in police reports—and I do not get a chance to see many these days, Mr. Speaker—so I went down to police headquarters on Jarvis Street and I paid them the $5 and I got a copy of the police report, which I have here. And I thought it was rather strange that if the police report said that Mr. Carberry was at fault, you would have thought they would have laid a charge. Well, the police report does not say Mr. Carberry is at fault.

I rather wonder what police report the hon. Minister was referring to. It certainly could not be the police report of this accident. In fact, I think rather the police officer —perhaps it was habit from his experience— but he referred to the drivers of both cars as "accused No. 1" and "accused No. 2. But one must presume that this was his habit.

He lays no responsibility in this report whatsoever. In fact, it looks from the report as though he thought both drivers were partially to blame, for, as Mr. Carberry was approaching a green light it turned orange and, instead of slamming on his brakes, he stepped on the gas to speed through it. Another car, which was stopped at a red light, without waiting for the delay—there is a two-second delay—but apparently without waiting for that two-second delay, started through the intersection and struck the rear of Carberry's car. But nowhere in this report does it say anything about who was responsible, or about liability—nowhere.

This is an unfair provision of the Act. If you are going to have this type of provision, whereby a man's licence can be cancelled, at least allow him a hearing. At least make sure that there is personal service of the notice upon it.

Here, a man—who I am convinced is absolutely innocent of any liability—has suddenly lost his licence. He earns his living with his car, and this man is in very serious difficulty at the present time, because he does not have this $200 or $300; this is extremely unfair.

Mr. Sopha: We suffered the other type for many years.

Mr. Shulman: The member for Sudbury has made an interjection, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to suggest to the member, it would not be difficult to hold a hearing in this case. If you are not going to have a court case, at least hold a hearing and give the man a chance to speak up on his own behalf.

Mr. White: This speech must be nearly over. The NDP are returning to the chamber.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): We are just starting!

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): It is the second shift.

Mr. Shulman: I think I should say a word about the most serious problem that is facing this province today—housing, Mr. Speaker.

The housing problem, unfortunately, has not been solved in this province, and I received a letter just the day before yesterday, which spells it out so very well. With your indulgence, I would like to read it into the record. It is from a Mr. John Windsor who lives, of all places, in Bramalea, at 25 Workman Drive in Bramalea. His letter was dated July 3:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

I have a grievance which is to me a complaint which I would appreciate your looking into.

Here in Ontario they have a scheme which is called Home Ownership Made Easy.

I have recently returned from Britain, this January, and I am at the moment working for a Canadian company known as Canadian Wire. After heralding the praises of Canada to my wife, I now feel compelled to turn to you, as a Canadian citizen, for help. I will explain why.

My salary at the moment is $95 a week as a truck driver with the above company, and my wife has a salary of $80 a week. But applying to Home Builders, Bramalea Consolidated Developments, we were told that our combined salaries would enable us to purchase a semi-detached new home here in Bramalea. This is some eight weeks ago.

We would be required to put down a down-payment of $2,000, which we were able to do, and I received an acceptance letter from the builders some five weeks ago, stating that they had accepted our bid and that I would hear from the mortgage company.

After waiting some time, a week or two, I called the builders and they assured me not to worry, everything would be fine. As you will appreciate, every weekend we were watching the house grow and we purchased various articles for our new home to be, and we were both very happy at the thought of owning our own home.

Last Friday, June 28, 1968, we were informed by the mortgage company, the Bank of Nova Scotia, Bramalea, that our salaries were not sufficient for them to accept us, even for a 30-year lease.

This to me is very strange. I have been in touch with the bank and they inform me that the fault lies with, and I quote, "Bramalea Developments," by not putting in the advertisement in the newspapers the minimum salaries people require to purchase a home. This is a false misrepresentation.

I feel, in all honesty, that this is a terrible way of doing business with people, as the land on which the house is built on is leased to whoever purchases the home from the Ontario provincial government.

It would seem to me that this home ownership made easy is not, and I repeat not, for the average guy, but perhaps the junior executive class. If this is so, I would like them to state this in their advertisement. The Bank of Nova Scotia told me that this has happened, not only to ourselves, but to many others.

Yours very truly,

John Windsor.

That letter sums up really the problems in the housing situation, even with HOME—home ownership made expensive, home ownership made easy. Call it what you will, it has not come close to solving the problem of people earning a reasonably good wage.

Here is a family; both adults are going out to work; they are bringing home a good take-home wage. They save up a $2,000 down payment, and they cannot buy a home. Now, this is not proper in this province of opportunity.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, under the debate for The Department of Commercial and Financial Affairs, I spoke at some length about timely disclosure. I was rather pleased to see in the Globe and Mail of Friday, July 19, some new developments that occurred in that particular field in the United States.

You may recall at that time I asked the government and the Minister to bring us up to 1934, which is when the United States government insisted on timely disclosure. We have not quite got around to that yet. And there have been some new changes which have occurred in the States, which have made timely disclosure, at least down there, a very minor thing of the past. We now have a new policy of full disclosure.

Perhaps I could quote this from the Globe:

> The board of governors of the New York stock exchange has voted to expand the exchange's timely disclosure policy for their list of corporations to include major corporate developments under negotiation or in the planning stage.

This is something which is just—we do not tell them even after it is done up here. But now the US is going to insist on the shareholders being informed when the negotiations are going on.

> The board said yesterday that to avoid creating an unfair market for a corporation's securities through leaks of information, an immediate public announcement of a pending development should be made once discussions extend beyond senior management. As negotiations leading to mergers, aquisitions and other major developments often require the use of outside consultants for business appraisals, tentative financing arrangements, market analysis, engineering studies, and to survey attitudes of large outside holders, availability of major blocks of stock and other matters—

And it goes on at some length here to point out that it is not fair that these person should have advance knowledge of developments that are occurring in a corporation, and once negotiations reach this point where it is beyond the immediate insiders that the shareholders must be informed. Here we do not even have to tell them after negotiations are completed.

So I would like to suggest to the government, through you, sir, that with this new staff in the United States, this is going to be one more force preventing funds from coming up to Canada. It is going to discourage individuals and corporations from investing in corporations here in this province. when they can invest in corporations in the United States where they will know what is going on. It has become even more urgent that this Minister, who I am sorry to say is not in the House tonight, bring in the proper legislation to make these changes.

To illustrate the bad type of security legislation we have here, some three weeks ago I asked the Minister about a stock called Pyrotex which, at the time, was trading in Toronto at something like $7.50 or $8. It was very obvious that this stock was not worth anywhere near $7.50 or $8. Today, some three weeks later, it is now trading at 30 cents. This—

Mr. Sopha: How much did the hon. member lose?

Mr. Shulman: I make a policy, Mr. Speaker, that if there is a matter which is to be discussed in this Legislature, I make no investment in that type of security. This is a very good policy which perhaps should be followed by everyone else in the House.

In answer to that interjection: It would have been very easy to make a great deal of money, actually.

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Shulman: Certainly.

Mr. Whitney: Listening over here, in the remarks the hon. member made, I was not sure whether he said "exposure" or "disclosure." If it comes to exposure, we, a few years ago, had a member for Wellington county who, under critical conditions, said that he exposed himself all around this province and nevertheless, never did a bit of harm.

If it comes to disclosure, just the other day we had the hon. member for Humber who suggested certain remedies on disclosure. So I would like to be clear just which the hon. member said, exposure or disclosure, and I would like him to enlarge on it.

Mr. Shulman: I would like to say that timely exposure is very pleasurable, Mr. Speaker, but timely disclosure is what I am talking about.

Pyrotex represents everything that is bad in our Canadian securities laws. We had a company which had really no value; they were digging a piece of moose pasture in somebody's back yard which was being promoted very expensively through payments of rather large sums of money. And yet, they were doing this so openly in Toronto that a broker called me up and said: "Can you not do something to stop this disgrace?" I had to get up in this House and ask the Minister to begin an investigation which finally stopped this type of thing.

Well, Pyrotex is not the only one. We have many others, most of them are not as blatant as Pyrotex, but surely Ontario should be known not as the province or the jurisdiction from which the Pyrotexes of the world are sold. It should be known as where you can invest your money safely. We should have as good a reputation as other jurisdictions and so once again, through you, sir, to the Minister, bring in proper legislation.

Mr. Sopha: What does the hon. member say about the Great West Saddlery Company?

Mr. Shulman: I do not think, Mr. Speaker, this is the occasion for me to give tips to the member for Sudbury, but if he would like to speak to me in the back hall I would be glad to discuss it.

Mr. Singer: Oh no. He wants the hon. member to tell him here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Shulman: Well, now—

Mr. Sopha: Some of my constituents are disturbed about it. What does the hon. member think? He is an expert.

Mr. Whitney: Tell us.

Mr. Singer: Speak up.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I said that we require very high standards of morality in this House. For my part, and I think all the members on this side of the House attempt to follow this, in the case of Pyrotex it could have been a very easy thing before getting up in this House to go and sell a few thousand shares short and make a huge sum of money with no problem. But this would have been very unethical. I would like to think that no one in this House would do something like that.

I think it is very important to members of this House particularly, if they are members of the legislative council, to bend over backwards so that there should be no suggestion that they are doing anything improper. I am not referring to illegal acts, I am referring to legal acts—

Mr. White: The hon. member is the only member in this chamber that sold the Canadian dollar short.

Mr. Shulman: To make certain—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: For the sake of accuracy, there is no legislative council.

Mr. Shulman: For the sake of accuracy, may I change that word to the Cabinet.

There is a matter which I brought up here in the House some weeks ago and—

Mr. White: That is true, is it not?

Mr. De Monte: Why bring it up again?

Mr. Shulman: Because I did not discuss it. I asked him questions. I got some answers and now I am going to give my comments about it.

The matter has to do with the subdivision of land in Oakville—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Shulman: I confess, Mr. Speaker, I did go on TV in the States and say the Canadian dollar was weak; and it was weak. However, I do not think that has too much relevancy. One thing I will say, what I have done has been made very public. I did not hide it too much on those particular television shows.

This particular matter involves a subdivision of land in Nottawasaga township and this particular Minister—

Mr. Singer: The hon. member said that four times. Get on to something new.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, if the hon. member will be patient, he will get something new.

This particular Minister sent a letter which I have here, it is dated November 22, 1966 and I just wish to quote one paragraph:

> At the outset I suggested that the planning board and council visualize the kind of municipality and area Nottawasaga could and should be 30 years from now and what its particular role in the whole region can best be and draw a word picture thereof on the official plan. I suggest that it be along the lines of a picturesque, fresh, green mural section of land.

And he goes on from there. Nothing wrong with that at all. Wonderful sentiment.

This is one of the complaints I have against the government. When they speak, they speak wonderfully; when they write, they write wonderfully; when they act, they act not quite so wonderfully. This was not a new sentiment of this particular Minister. I have his maiden speech here in front of me. I quote again:

> Mr. Speaker, I am a supporter of a government that attends to the planning of the future of the province in all aspects.

One of the chief of these is the education of the people and thoroughness and planning has been the approach of this government in this respect.

A year later this particular Minister came out to the local council and he made a very interesting speech in which he said that these areas must remain rural and he urged them to maintain the rural nature of this land but, unfortunately, he did not behave as he spoke. Once again, actions and speech were a little different. I have an editorial here from the Oakville Daily Journal-Record—

Mr. Singer: The hon. member read that.

Mr. Shulman: No, I did not read that.

Mr. Singer: Did he not read that?

Mr. Shulman: This is a new editorial. This one is brought out in reply to criticism of one of the council women in Oakville. I would like to just quote from the article:

> With his right hand, the Minister asked the people of Nottawasaga to take one course of action but at the same time, where the opportunity presented itself, with his left hand he took a different course of action for himself.

This was where hundreds of acres of land were separated into numerous parcels just previous to the final reading of Bill C89. It is the double standard I deplore.

And the last paragraph in this editorial is as follows:

> Municipal politics today need more public watchdogs—referring to Mrs. McCarther who brought this out—and fewer rubber stamps. We trust that even Mr. Kennedy would agree with us on that point just as he may also deplore double-talking politicians who do not carry out in practice what they preach in public.

I do not wish to belabour this point, Mr. Speaker, but I would like to suggest that being a member of this legislative assembly, the dignity and the stature—

Mr. Singer: Is the hon. member making this charge?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I am making this charge. The Minister spoke one way and behaved in another.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

I would point out to the member for Downsview that I have said several times this evening that debates will be carried on here properly, in accordance with the rules and not directly between members, but between the members and the Speaker and the members. I would ask that he follow those rules of which he is well aware, having sat in this House for many years.

Mr. Shulman: All I really wish to say, Mr. Speaker, is that I am not interested particularly in individual cases. We, as members of this Legislature, represent the people of this province and whether or not we wear our shirtsleeves or come in here in our shorts or wear a tie, is really so irrelevant.

This is not what gives us dignity. What gives us dignity is behaving above reproach and this is the way everyone in this government, on all sides of the House, should behave. If we are going to participate in a debate on any matter in this House, we should divorce our personal interests from that matter.

Mr. Singer: Why does the hon. member not bring him before the Bar? He is a terrible Minister, bring him before the Bar.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I think that perhaps this is a very spirited debate tonight.

Mr. Singer: Bring him before—

Mr. Shulman: I am sure you will be delighted to hear I am coming close to the first half of—

Mr. Singer: Charge him with being corrupt.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I would like now to turn to the situation of the insurance companies which I discussed in some detail under The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

When I was discussing health insurance, I was rather critical of British Pacific company and the Allstate company. British Pacific had sold that peculiar policy where you had to have a car accident inside your house before you could collect and Allstate had all sorts of funny gimmicks to avoid paying off on their policies.

Allstate have now given their reply. Mr. Walker, the manager of Allstate said—and I quote:

> Kazinsky had admitted in a statement signed by him that he had an ulcer condition before issuance of the policy. If he had indicated this we could have provided him with a modified policy which would have provided for some insurance. As the > policy was declared void since the inception, the company would have refused to pay the $480 for the nose operation, and we had asked Kazinsky for the return of $289 in the letter announcing the voiding of the policy, but we did not press for it.

The point is that he states that this policy was cancelled because Kazinsky had admitted, in a statement signed by him, that he had an ulcer condition.

This is untrue. I have gone through the complete file at the Allstate company. There is a letter—an unsigned letter—to which I referred earlier.

But I am rather pleased by their statement, because now the Allstate company has gone on record. They say: "This is the reason we cancelled the policy."

Therefore, through you, sir, to the Minister, once again I am asking this government to hold a hearing in this particular case to determine who told the truth.

If Allstate can produce the letter they talk about they will get all sorts of profuse apologies. If there is no such letter—and I submit that there is no such letter—if they are unable to submit such a letter, then their licence should be cancelled and they should not be allowed to sell insurance in this province.

I feel very strongly that a hearing should be held, and if not, we are going to be having many more cases of this nature in this next year.

Well, having concluded my preliminary remarks, I would now like to turn to the Budget. I realize that it is highly unusual for a member to discuss the Budget during the Budget debate, but I had thought that a few words might be in order.

I find that the interesting part of the Budget is not the front half that the Minister reads, but the back half that nobody reads. Once again, it reveals that the government's piorities are not the priorities which many of us believe require first call on funds available.

On page B-15 which is a breakdown of the expenditures of the government, we find that four per cent of the money we take in goes in payments to persons; 17 per cent goes to highways; 20 per cent in overhead to keep the wheels turning.

On page C-7, we find the way of raising the money. More money is now raised in sales tax—by some 50 per cent—than is raised by corporation taxes; and more money is raised in gasoline tax than through corporation taxes. This is surely a wrong emphasis.

Surely we should be raising most of the money where it hurts the least, and that is from the corporations. As you look at the figures from 1964 to the estimates for 1969, you find that the corporation tax is staying much the same, but the sales tax has doubled in four years, and gasoline tax is up by 50 per cent. They are taking the money from the places where it hurts the most instead of where it would hurt the least.

The whole emphasis of raising the money is wrong, and the whole emphasis on spending the money is wrong. When we look to spending, we find some $452 million to be spent on highways next year, compared to health which will get only $332 million; municipal affairs, with all your grants, is only getting $225 million; social and family services, away down, at $121 million.

The emphasis is wrong. The government is raising it wrong and spending it wrong. That is what is wrong with this Budet.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shulman: —but they will not let me, on a lighter note, by relating, and it is very brief, my misadventure during this session with a certain Toronto newspaper.

The publisher of the Telegram and I had, for the last few years, what my psychiatrist friends describe as a love-hate relationship. We went through the love relationship phase 6 years ago when I worked very hard to elect the publisher to the House of Commons from Spadina riding, and he used his small influence with the Conservative government to seek my appointment as chief coroner. Fortunately, he had more influence with the government than I had with the people of Spadina riding.

Well, sad to say, the publisher and I are not now in the love phase of the relationship. I am afraid that he is not too pleased with my political activities. Last week I made a speech about auto insurance, and I was surprised to read in the next day's Telegram that one of the hon. Liberal members had challenged me to repeat my speech outside of the House. I was quite willing to do this.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, do you think you could make the member for Downsview keep quiet for about two minutes?

Mr. Singer: The hon. member asked to have him brought before the Bar of the House, and then he backed down.

Mr. Shulman: That is true.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Mr. Shulman: If hon. members will be patient, they will all be clear on the matter.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I have pointed out to the member for Downsview that he has been around here long enough to know the correct way to behave, and I would ask that he do so for the remainder of the evening.

Mr. Shulman: I was quite willing to repeat my speech outside the House, but I could not recall any such challenge, nor was it recorded in Hansard. I did not think that the matter was important enough to rise on a point of privilege, but I did mention it during the next day's continuation of my auto speech and this produced a rather strong and inaccurate article in the Toronto Telegram in which I was described as "snarling in the House". Perhaps the members will agree that among my various qualities, obnoxious or otherwise, "snarling" is not included.

I am afraid I then made my appeal to the Speaker, to have the publisher called before the Bar of the House. While the Speaker considered my request, I was informed by an hon. member that he had, indeed, issued his challenge to repeat a portion of my speech outside the House.

The same day, I received a lovely letter from Mr. John Hudson, public relations manager at the Telegram, which contained some lovely compliments. I had the pleasure of showing you this letter, Mr. Speaker, in which he invited me to choose any topic and to discuss it on a radio programme to be sponsored by the Telegram. Well, I was pleased. I thought that the publisher was making amends. I immediately wrote to you, Mr. Speaker, you may recall, and I said:

> Last week I rose in the House to complain of reporting on the Telegram of July 9, and 10. The member for Humber has since informed that he, in fact, had made the statement reported on July 9, and in view of this, and in view of a letter received today from the Telegram which they refer to me as quote: "An outstanding public figure in our country".

I like that line, may I say that again?

> In which they refer to me as "an outstanding public figure in our country," I wish to withdraw my request that the publisher of that newspaper be called before the Bar of the House, even though there has been no explanation for the article of July 10.

Mr. Speaker, imagine my shock when the Telegram followed your statement in the House with an indignant article in which the publisher said that he certainly had sent no such letter to me, and did not know of anyone else in the Telegram who had. It appears that there is a certain lack of communication in that newspaper.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I related this sad story to my psychiatrist friend, and he said: "You have now learned a great political truth. You may love a publisher, you may hate a publisher; but you must never fight a publisher. They always have the last word, and this is known as Bassett's law."

Thank you.

Mr. Singer: Is that all?

Mr. G. R. Carton (Armourdale): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) has a sense of humour, a keen sense of humour, and I trust that he has; but in case he does not, I apologize beforehand for the remark I am going to make. I could not help but reflect, as I spent many years on a farm during my youth and as I noticed him flailing his arms and taking the water, I reflected that it is the first time I have ever seen a windmill run by water.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is a pretty old one.

Mr. Carton: Mr. Speaker, I thought perhaps at first I might explain the reticence, apart from a basic natural shyness, with which I enter into debates in this House. It stems from the early days in my membership here, when I spoke to the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) and asked him how often I should or should not participate in the debates. He replied: "Gordon"—and this is a very wise reply—he said: "Gordon, it is better that the members of this House wonder why you do not speak, than to wonder why you do." I have tried to follow this through, Mr. Speaker.

Also, sir, before I get involved in my Budget speech, there is one piece of information I would like to pass along for the consideration of those responsible for the rules in this House. This concerns itself with the custom of a certain primitive race in Africa, and realizing the strain that is placed on the orator and the strain that is placed upon the audience by long speeches, it is their custom that the speaker must stand on one leg while giving his address and the moment that the other foot touches the ground, the address is over.

Mr. MacDonald: That certainly would have cut the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Carruthers) out this afternoon.

Mr. Carton: This is simple, Mr. Speaker, but it is certainly worthy of consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I rise for the first time in this current session—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member might find this a convenient time to move the adjournment of the debate and—

Mr. MacDonald: The hon. member's foot touched the floor.

Mr. Speaker: —and go into his address tomorrow so that he will be uninterrupted by the overnight adjournment.

Mr. Carton moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the Budget debate. That is tomorrow morning at 10:00.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 10:55 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JULY 23, 1968

The House met at 10:00 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) moves, seconded by Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer):

That a select committee of this House be appointed to continue the review of the terms and provisions of the election laws and any related Acts and regulations, in the light of modern needs, practices and concepts, for the proper presentation of those qualified to vote, and to report its findings and recommendations to this assembly.

And that the select committee has authority to sit during the interval between sessions and has full power and authority to employ counsel and such other personnel as may be deemed advisable and to call for persons, papers and things and to examine witnesses under oath, and the assembly doth command and compel attendance before the said select committee of such persons and the production of such papers and things as the committee may deem necessary for any of its proceedings and deliberations, for which purpose the honourable the Speaker may issue his warrant or warrants.

And the said committee to consist of 13 members to be composed as follows:

Mr. Dunlop (chairman), Messrs. Apps, Belanger, Bernier, Carruthers, Ferrier, Hodgson (York South), Newman (Windsor-Walkerville), Rollins, Singer, Smith (Simcoe East), Smith (Nipissing) and Young.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves, seconded by hon. Mr. MacNaughton:

That a select committee of this House be appointed to continue the enquiry and review of the law affecting the corporations in this province as reported on by the select committee of this House appointed on June 22, 1965, and re-appointed on July 8, 1966, and in particular, to enquire into and review the law relating to mergers or amalgamations, the rights of dissenting shareholders in the event of various fundamental corporate changes, the purpose, function and scope of the annual return, the field of corporation finance, the law relating to the protection of the creditor, and the dissolution of the ordinary commercial corporation in Ontario.

And further, to enquire into and report upon such specialized types of corporations as insurance companies, loan and trust companies, corporations without share capital, credit unions, finance and acceptance companies, co-operatives, and extra-provincial companies, together with the legislation of other jurisdictions relating to the same matters.

And that the select committee has authority to sit during the interval between sessions and has full power and authority to employ counsel and such other personnel as may be deemed advisable and to call for persons, papers and things and to examine witnesses under oath, and the assembly doth command and compel attendance before the said select committee of such persons and the production of such papers and things as the committee may deem necessary for any of its proceedings and deliberations, for which purpose the honourable the Speaker may issue his warrant or warrants.

And the said committee to consist of 13 members to be composed as follows:

Mr. Carton (Chairman), Messrs. Braithwaite, De Monte, Henderson, Johnston (St. Catharines), Lawrence (Carleton East), Meen, Price, Reilly, Renwick (Riverdale), Rowe, Shulman and Sopha.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, before we leave the matter of committees, on many occasions the issue has been raised of a committee that would maintain a continuing review of orders in council. This proposal now has the support of Mr. McRuer.

I was wondering if the government has given any further thought to this and what their conclusions are.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr.

Speaker, we went into this matter very thoroughly as a result of some questions raised by the former member for Woodbine, Mr. Bryden. Following that enquiry there was a pretty complete statement made here in the House and, as far as I am concerned, that is the position of the government. The position has not changed since that statement was made.

Mr. McRuer had some comments to make in this regard. Of course, his report is under careful scrutiny at the present time. It may be that some changes might be contemplated, but at the moment, nothing has been settled and the position, as I say, remains as it has been.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

The Provincial Treasurer has a statement.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that, because of the postal strike, an extension of time will be given to those vendors who have not been able to make their returns for June under The Retail Sales Tax Act.

The extension will cover the period of the postal strike. Retail sales tax payments for the month of June are due on July 23, today.

Vendors who wish to file their returns immediately may deliver them to their district retail sales tax office or to any branch of the province of Ontario savings office. As of this morning, the branch is short some $22 million in June returns from about 40,000 vendors.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I might just ask the Provincial Treasurer: Has his office, upon enquiry, informed vendors that they must in fact make their returns for June and that there would be no accommodation because of the mail strike? Is this announcement a a change in that policy?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. leader of the Opposition that this is a position that has emanated because of the strike. Vendors will not be penalized for late filing, because filing monthly, as is normally required, is a practical impossibility.

This is simply to get the word to vendors that they will not be penalized and to offer them these alternatives if they wish to make payments through the facilities that can be made available.

I made references to the sales tax offices and they are located fairly strategically throughout the province, as are the provincial savings banks.

It was felt desirable not to extend other facilities for this purpose, in view of the situation, but it does make it possible for them to comply to a considerable extent.

Now that the member has asked me, I might say that, if the postal strike lasts very long, the normal anticipated cash flow upon which the Treasury of the province depends, will be very, very seriously impaired.

Mr. Nixon: The Treasury's credit is still good for a while.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, it is still costly!

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, I have the answers to questions 822 and 827.

Question 822 was asked by the leader of the Opposition: What plans has the Minister to assist the 75 employees at the glue factory in Brantford who will be unemployed following an antipollution order of the OWRC?

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that these men are still employed, but if the company does not comply with the order of the OWRC, they will be out of employment shortly.

I would suggest, sir, that they register with Canada manpower or perhaps take it up with some other department in the provincial government.

Mr. Nixon: They will find that pretty helpful.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: And the answer to 827, asked by the hon. member for Cochrane South (Mr. Ferrier): Is Ontario Hydro using rainmakers in northeastern Ontario that are contributing to the abnormal amount of rain in that part of the province?

The answer is "no". Ontario Hydro is not guilty.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to table answers to questions 7, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26 and 45 all of which are on the order paper. (See appendix, page 6221)

Then the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) asked me some days ago about a sentence imposed upon a young lady for shoplifting. I undertook to investigate this and I find that she pleaded guilty to the charge when it was raised.

She apparently declined an offer by the magistrate that the case be adjourned in order that counsel might be provided for her. Before she was sentenced, the magistrate asked her mother, who was in the courtroom, to make any statement she might like in regard to the matter. Her mother really did not add very much to the proceedings and the imposition of the sentence is entirely within the discretion of the magistrate. It could have been appealed, of course, but by the time the matter became public, the sentence had been served and the incident was, therefore, closed. But the magistrate was acting within the powers given to him, in exercising his own discretion.

Now, sir, on a matter of personal privilege. I seldom rise on such matters in this House, but in this morning's Globe and Mail, on the front page of the second section, there is attributed to me—in a direct quote—words that were said by my hon. friend from Carleton East (Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence)—

Mr. Nixon: And the Premier does not agree?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: —and in view of the fact that it is a very direct quote it must have been a misprint because I know the reporter who wrote it and he is very accurate in most cases, so that I would say something slipped somewhere. However, I feel that, inasmuch as it is a very direct quote, that both for the sake of the other hon. member and myself, I had better set the record straight.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Does the Premier want to bring anybody before the Bar of the House?

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Labour has yet been able to receive a more comprehensive answer to the question that I asked on July 19? He said he was going to look into it further and report to the House.

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think what I really said was I would look into it and report to the hon. member; and yesterday afternoon I dictated a letter which he will receive this morning.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, before the first order is called, I wonder if the Minister of Education could respond to questions I have put to him earlier.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, I understood that somebody had been in touch with the leader of the Opposition to answer these questions as I did with one or two other members. As I recall the questions, one related to Ryerson polytechnical institute and the resignation of Mr. Carter and Mr. Armstrong and whether the Minister would care to make any comment, Mr. Speaker. As I recall, the press made statements or explanations as to their resignations and I cannot add anything to their statements.

With respect to the delay in the expansion programme at Ryerson, I understand that part of the reason at least for the delay is the magnitude of the programme and the need to reorganize the internal administration of the institution to deal with the expansion. I should also point out that the institute did some 16 or 18 months ago acquire substantial additional property south of Ryerson belonging, I believe, to the O'Keefe Brewery Company whereby they were able to renovate and provide for substantial increase in enrolment at the institute. While the delay of the new plant, of course, is of some concern, nonetheless the institution will be able to handle additional numbers of students through the renovations that are being made through the other property acquisition.

In respect to the second question asked by the leader of the Opposition, relating to the student awards programme, I will not read the question again, but the answer I shall provide was, I think, made available to the public last Friday. Now I want to make sure there is no misunderstanding because I think the leader of the Opposition's press release really indicated some slight misunderstanding of the situation. I shall attempt to answer the questions in the three parts.

Contrary to what the hon. member has said it is possible for a student previously enrolled in an Ontario university, who had a full-time job for 12 months prior to such enrolment, to continue to receive student assistance under the age of 21 if their personal and family resources are insufficient to meet their total educational needs. In 1967-68 students in this category were treated as independent students. They are now treated as dependent students in an effort to provide an equity of treatment with those thousands of other students under the age of 21 whose parents are expected to bear their share of the cost of their children's post secondary education.

The answer to the second section of the question which relates to the request for parents or guardians to complete certain items of the application form for such students becomes, I believe, self evident, Mr. Speaker.

The normal procedures of the Ontario student awards programme allows for the review of any application where a student feels such is required. Such a review is carried out within the terms of the programme as they have been established for the 1968-69 academic year.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, in reply to this question, might I emphasize that changes in the regulations for the student awards programme in 1968-69 were made only after extensive consultation with student award officers in post secondary institutions across this province. They were made in an attempt to ensure fair and equitable treatment for the anticipated 50,000 applicants within the resources available. In this regard it is felt that a decision by a parent not to assist his son or daughter should not in itself remove the obligation from that parent to do so within the limits of his financial ability. Were it otherwise, every parent would be justified in expecting the province to bear the full cost of educating his children at the post secondary level.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister? Are we to understand then in the cases that I put specifically to the Minister in the third question—I did not refer to them by name—where the parents will not assist and the students have had province of Ontario student award assistance in the previous years, that they will get no assistance this year because the parents could help if they would?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, it will be the same as in other years. They will be able to appeal to the student award officers at the individual institutions where these matters are given very careful consideration. I think in the vast majority of cases that were submitted to the department from the student award officers on appeal last year, the appeals were given very positive consideration.

Mr. Nixon: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister will permit, pertaining to his first answer. Are the vacancies on the board of Ryerson polytechnical institute those which the Minister will fill?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Yes, these will be appointed, Mr. Speaker, by the Lieutenant-Governor in council.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 1st order, resuming the adjourned debate on an amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

BUDGET DEBATE
(Concluded)

Mr. G. R. Carton (Armourdale): As I was saying in my opening remarks last night, Mr. Speaker, there is a sense of timing when one is on his feet whether it be making a speech, whether it be addressing a jury or whether it be cross-examining a witness. I am reminded of the story of that outstanding criminal lawyer, Rufus Chote, who was a brilliant cross-examiner. On this particular occasion he was defending on an assault charge, and having drawn an admission from the only witness that he had not seen the accused actually bite off the ear of the man, instead of leaving it at that and winning his case, he went ahead to emphasize and said: "Then I understand that you did not, in fact, see the accused bite off the ear of the man". To which the witness replied, "No, sir, I did not see him bite off the ear, I only saw him spit it out on the ground". And of course, there ended the case. So there is a point beyond which one should cease, and of course we never learn from mistakes and of course I am going on with my address.

As I rise for the first time this session, Mr. Speaker, I do so with great pride because I am honoured to be a member of this 28th Legislature, a Legislature which I suggest will more than any of its predecessors, leave its mark on the people of Ontario, as it debates and brings forth new and progressive legislation to advance the social and economic well-being of all our citizens over the course of this next four years.

I must, at the outset, congratulate the Speaker on his appointment and tell him that to date he has done a most creditable job in a most difficult position. It is no less than we expected of him but certainly he has had a most enviable record of achievement in the House, firstly as a private member and secondly as a member of the Cabinet in various portfolios, and now as Speaker of the 28th Legislature. I think it is a most fitting appointment and all the more so because he has, in my opinion, one of the most charming wives in the Legislature to share the social duties incumbent with this high office. While you are in the chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I also congratulate you on a job well done.

October 17, 1967, is now past history, but since this is my first opportunity I would like to comment briefly on the outcome of the election as I interpreted it. Insofar as our leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) was concerned it was again a tremendous personal victory because although the good people of this province realized that a stronger Opposition was needed for good government, they certainly were not going to take a chance—and did not—of losing the leadership of the man who has earned the respect and the admiration of all the people of this province—regardless of party affiliation; a man whom history will record as not only a great leader for the province of Ontario, but a man who unselfishly on every occasion—as was emphasized by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) yesterday—puts above all the Canadian nation and the Canadian people.

As for the leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Nixon), it is no secret that I believe he possesses all the qualities of a fine leader, and I am only grateful as a Progressive Conservative that he had not been chosen leader earlier, because there is no doubt in my mind that he grows in stature every day that he occupies this high office. He is now in the fortunate position as well that, on October 17 last, he added considerable talent to his party with the election of at least seven or eight backbenchers who are definitely comers; men who will be a great source of strength to their leader, and to certain veteran members who have been carrying a terrific work load most ably for some time now—among them the hon. member for Downsview (Mr. Singer), the hon. member for Sudbury and the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter). I think the Liberals in this province are most fortunate in their representation in this 28th Legislature.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Do not overdo it now.

Mr. Carton: And now for the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. MacDonald). Notwithstanding that I have resided in my present riding—and I am sorry he is not in his seat to hear this—of Armourdale for some 20 years, I was born and spent a great deal of my life in the riding of York South, which is represented by the hon. leader of the New Democrats. I attended public and high school there, established my first law office there and became president of the local service club, the local YMCA, and the local retarded children's association, so I know that riding. This is the riding which truly nurtured the cause of the CCF and later the New Democratic Party, for it was here that my high school English teacher, the late Joe Noseworthy, pulled the political upset of the century locally, when he defeated the Rt. Hon. Arthur Meighen back about 1940.

Joe Noseworthy won that election because of his own personal popularity, and from that date, with one or two exceptions, it has remained with the New Democrats both provincially and federally. I attribute this in large measure to the hard work and dedication of the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald). And I must say that, in addition, he personally deserves a great deal of credit for what I consider—having regard to all circumstances—an excellent showing by his party on October 17 last. He, too, has added considerable strength in his numbers and I am sure that he is enjoying his role as a leader more this session than heretofore, because he does not personally have to take the heavy role in the debates as formerly.

Far be it for me to counsel the members of his party, but with the trend to changing leaders which is common in Canada today—a recent fad—I would simply warn them that, in my opinion, their present leader stands head and shoulders—possibly with one or two exceptions—above any of their present members of the Legislature, as does the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon) among his members; and of course my leader among our particular members.

So, history has recorded the events of October 17 last and we have begun—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: All he has to worry about are those one or two exceptions.

Mr. Carton: —we have begun and almost completed the first leg of a journey along the legislative paths towards our political destiny, to be likewise recorded and voted upon by the electorate some four years in the future.

I have enjoyed listening to the debates thus far, and although there is much repetition, I think by and large the members are to be congratulated. There is much to be said for the cut and thrust of debate, but I must confess that on occasion, not the debates but the interjections—and in all fairness the interjections on all sides—sometimes make me cringe. On occasion the remarks are downright cruel and I hope are not meant; if meant in the heat of the moment I hope they are forgiven, and soon forgotten, for surely we are all hon. members trying our best in our own way to represent our constituents and the people of this province.

In this vein I might add that I, too, on occasion feel my Irish blood rising as some of the members of the New Democratic Party give forth, proclaiming that they are the only party interested in people. Mr. Speaker, I state this not in a vain sense as an individual but in a proud sense as a Tory—and I repeat that—in a proud sense as a Tory. I will match any member in that party for freely given hours and freely given money from not too plentiful a pocket, from my graduation from law school right through to the election to this Legislature. I do not deny, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. members opposite are here because of an interest in, and concern for, people but I say categorically and without fear of contradiction, that as parties, and I daresay as individuals, we are all, every one in this House, in a like position.

Mr. Speaker, there is one matter of great interest, I am sure, to all hon. members of this House that has perhaps been overlooked to date. And I refer to the fact that for the first time we have sitting in our ranks the son of parents who were born in Italy, the first of his race to be a member of the Ontario Legislature.

We are all aware of the tremendous contribution of the Italian race to our life in the province of Ontario, particularly, Mr. Speaker, in the construction industry and its allied fields. In the great metropolitan area of Toronto alone we have now approximately 200,000 Italians who, almost without exception, have proved themselves to be industrious men and women intent on becoming good Canadian citizens in every true sense of the word. The immigrant parents have laid the foundation, and the first generation of Canadians are taking up the torch and becoming leaders in business, in industry, in the professions and in politics.

All three parties in this House have their following among the Italian race, and all three parties will benefit greatly from this association. And this is as it should be in our democratic way of life.

So, Mr. Speaker, out of courtesy to the many Canadians of Italian origin and descent in this province, and in particular as a tribute to the member concerned, I beg your indulgence and that of the House so that in my best Irish-Italian I may address a few words of congratulations in Italian to the hon. member for Dovercourt (Mr. De Monte), whom I value as a member of this Legislature, as a colleague in the legal profession, and as a friend and acquaintance for many years.

Durante la guerra ho passato un anno in Italia sotto brute' condizione, ma ho visto la bellezza dal Italia, e la bonta' dal popola Italiano. Nel stesso tempo, ho imparato un poco dalla lingua Italiana, per' non usandola ho dimenticato la piu' gran parte.

De parte del primo ministro, e di tutti gli onorevoli mebri della questa casa della provincia dal Ontario, vi felicito sinceramente per le vostre realizzazioni fino oggi e vi auguri un gran successo per l'avvenire, mentre preparate il corso per la partecipazione alla politica provinciale in questa grande provincia della vostra eminente razza. Voi fate onore alla vostra razza, alla vostra professione, al vostro partito, e a questa assemblea.

Mr. Speaker, the English translation is as follows, for the benefit of those who do not speak Italian—and for the benefit of those who do:

I spent about one year in Italy during the last war where even under the most adverse conditions, I learned to appreciate the natural beauty of the hon. member's motherland, and the warmth of its people; and at the same time I acquired some knowledge of the Italian language.

An hon. member: And the Italian girls!

Mr. Carton: Without usage, I have forgotten most of my knowledge of the hon. member's language, but on behalf of the Prime Minister and all hon. members of the Legislature of the province of Ontario, I sincerely congratulate him on his achievements to date, and wish him well in the future, as he pioneers provincial politics in this great province for his great race.

The hon. member is a credit to his race, to his profession, to his party and to this assembly.

Mr. Speaker, we have many new members in this House, men who are in the main young men who are eager, who are dedicated and who sincerely want to do a good job. It is for this reason I am going to dwell four or five minutes on a subject of special interest, I am sure, to them, and I think of general interest to all of us. Frequently we hear statements made by citizens, and in some cases by responsible citizens, that the ethics in politics are on the decline, that they are not what they used to be.

Now, this is very disturbing to me, as I am sure it is to all hon. members, because if governments at all levels do not have a purposeful regard for political morality and a conscious respect for higher values in modern life, we have a most serious barrier to the advancement of the best interests of our nation. In the main, politicians are referred to in two diametrically opposed senses:

First, a politician is referred to in a complimentary manner, meaning he is smooth, suave, witty, diplomatic, urbane, clever, articulate and above all charming. And I am sure that we would all agree that this applies to the hon. member for Donwsview, the hon. member for Sudbury, the hon. member for Riverdale, and so on. But secondly—and this is what I do not like—they refer to a politician as opportunistic, unethical, unprincipled, dishonest, disreputable, flamboyant, corrupt and always motivated by selfish expediency.

Some time ago I was searching for material for a radio address on this topic and I enquired at the legislative library for a book entitled Morals and Politics. The attentive, friendly librarian laughingly and facetiously replied: "I do not recall such a book; would it be possible for these two subjects to be related?" This only whetted my appetite further. Subsequently to that, I had the pleasure of listening to Hon. Walter Dinsdale, former Minister of Northern Affairs in the Diefenbaker administration, at the first international seminar of the international Christian leadership ever held in Canada. At that time Hon. Walter Dinsdale said that the popular connotation of "old soldiers never die—they just fade away", applied to politicians was changed to "politicians never die—they just smell that way". Humorous, yes, but also frightening.

It is a somewhat anomalous situation that arises when one offers himself or herself for public office for the first time. Up until this moment he commands the respect and admiration of his fellow men. However, immediately upon becoming elected he or she becomes a politician overnight, and thus open game for criticism by anyone and everyone near and far, no matter what their background may be or how well or how ill informed they may be.

This, I think, is one of the barriers that prevents many capable women and men from seeking elected office. It is to the credit, therefore, of those presently holding public office that in spite of this anticipated and this realized criticism they go ahead. Indeed, I believe that the ability to absorb criticism levelled from all sides, unfairly in most cases, is a prerequisite to a successful political career.

One must learn to recognize that he can only do what is best in his opinion, having regard to all circumstances, and having once made his decision to abide by and uphold it. Why is it that the public takes such delight in belittling politics and politicians; that one of the favourite pastimes today is to berate and ridicule everyone and anyone political? When one reflects, it is obvious that next to discussion of the weather the most popular topic is politics.

This is because the press, the radio and TV devote much of their space and much of their time to politics, both national and international. This makes even the most casual reader or listener politically conscious, but, unfortunately in the majority of cases, politically ill-informed.

Another factor is that being human the public in order to cover up their own shortcomings, seek to ease their conscience and rationalize their own inadequacies by searching for a scapegoat, and who is more vulnerable than those in the limelight, the elected representatives?

I would point out that if there is corruptness—if there is inefficiency—if there is a lack of sincerity and integrity in politics, I submit it is but a reflection of what must be worse in the area outside the political boundaries. Furthermore, I feel that each candidate is but a reflection in large measure of the political morality and character of the majority of the residents in his riding.

However, contrary to a sense of defeatism and futility in the politics of today I sense a re-awakening in the electorate; a keen interest in our public affairs, possibly brought about by the many elections over the past eight years—I believe over 30 in number. What the public tends to forget is that there is not—and there will never will be—a political utopia where the issues at hand are backed by the whole weight and by the solid support of public opinion, thus making the requisite decisions easy to render.

In almost all instances the issues are complex and cloudy, there is no clear ray of sunshine to illuminate the right path for them, and the right path is never without rough stones to try the walker.

I am greatly concerned, Mr. Speaker, with the public attitude towards politics and politicians, because no country in history ever existed without politics. Why should anyone feel superior to politics? We achieve our freedom through political action; we live by politics, created by political thought. Education, welfare, in fact all the things we now recognize as necessary and vital to our lives, were brought about by politics.

I sincerely believe that the entry of women into active political life has done much to enhance the public opinion with respect to politicians in latter years. I have nothing but the highest possible regard for the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Pritchard), formerly Hamilton Centre, with whom I had the good fortune of occupying the adjoining seat for my first two years of political life. She is a very talented, practical politician and one from whom we could all take a few lessons, and I am sure that the hon. members in the New Democratic Party would speak likewise of the hon. member for Scarborough Centre (Mrs. M. Renwick).

Politicians have a momentous task in these days of constant change, to try to always interpret in good moral conscience the right and the true path. I beseech the public that if our day-by-day decisions do not always meet with their full approval, or if they read or hear of some terrible breach of moral judgment by us, I ask that they try not to prejudge the verdict. They should seek out the facts and put themselves in our position, bearing in mind that uppermost in the thoughts of the majority of politicians is the fervent prayer: "Help me to be part of the answer and not part of the problem."

I firmly believe that political morals and devotion to the public cause are at the highest level ever. We are in constantly changing times, and if those who are of the older generation do not fully concur with all the things that have happened, we must reflect that the decisions that we made along the ways of life did not always please our own parents.

The citizens of this country are builders of the future, and whether we build as public servants or as private citizens, whether we build at the national or local level, let us remember the advice of the Reverend Phillips Brooks of Boston:

> Do not pray for easy lives; pray to be stronger men. Do not pray for tasks equal to your powers; pray for powers equal to your tasks.

One of the most difficult things to understand is the apathy of the general public, and yet this is perhaps human, because unless one has a personal interest it is difficult to instill enthusiasm. Yet every effort must be made to eliminate public apathy from this nation of ours. The need for profit and gain must become secondary to the welfare and concern of the individual and the nation.

While criticism of the political beliefs of the individual and/or his party are to be expected and accepted, no man or his party should be held up to public ridicule. Too many men in our lifetime—President John F. Kennedy, Senator Robert Kennedy, Martin Luther King—have paid the supreme sacrifice for the right to express themselves in a free society.

Responsible citizens should not tolerate those within our society who for personal gain or popularity seek to discredit those who have offered their services to the citizens at either the municipal, provincial or federal level.

We have a choice in this Canada of ours, a choice inherited from our forefathers who died and fought for this heritage, a choice to be governed by men who are governed by God, or to be ruled by tyrants. This is the choice of the public and I urge them to remember this in order that government and politicians may be kept in the true and proper perspective that they have so rightly earned through our democratic processes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to get down to more mundane things in this Legislature. I feel that more can be done to aid the excellent work now being done by the Ontario housing corporation. We have the finest Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) in all of Canada, and on top of this he is doing an excellent job in the very difficult field of housing. But I feel that the cures to the housing crisis require other aids. I am almost loathe to advance my personal convictions about housing in this Legislature after hearing the matter debated almost ad nauseam in the past few months, but I can set forth my own views in three or four minutes.

I am convinced, absolutely, that the two great factors that have contributed to our nation building in Canada to date are: Firstly, the supremely important part played by small business and family corporations, on whose behalf the member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly), spoke so eloquently on February 10, 1965, and the other I think equally important factor is that we have been—and if I have an infinitesimal fraction of influence on the Legislature, we will continue to be—a nation of home owners.

I am almost fanatical in preserving—or perhaps resurrecting is a better word—the rights of the average citizen to own, preserve, and protect his own very private dwelling to which he can return each evening away from the cares and toils of daily employment and raise and enjoy his family. This is the be all and end all of the average man's existence. If I personally had the power I would move heaven and earth to give it to him.

I adamantly and vehemently refuse, with all the will at my command, to retreat or to admit defeat and say that in this magnificent young country we are all doomed to be a nation of cliff dwellers. It just is not so, and will not be so.

There is a growing and widespread shortage of housing in Canada that is now bordering on the dangerous. Inflation is now, to put it mildly, going at a fast trot—nay, some would say galloping. The poverty line in the first half of 1967 for a family of four—two adults and two children—was conceded to be $5,000 and by the end of 1967, $5,600. It has been said by knowledgeable people that any one in Toronto earning less than $10,000 could never hope to own his hown home. This is in spite of continuing good times.

You cannot blame the labour unions; they are only seeking to put their workers within the poverty line of $6,000 or the home owners bracket having an income of $10,000. You cannot blame industry and huge corporate profits; because on one hand there are the increasing bankruptcies, disclosing that all that glistens is not gold, and on the other hand if there is gold, then the governments are taking 52 per cent of it. But you can and should blame the collective—the three—levels of government. If John Q. Public would get some gumption and stiffen his line and say: "Look, we are sick of one level of government blaming the other," we might begin to get somewhere.

I am sorry to say that, apart from the provision of funds, the burden, in my opinion, falls four square on this government. We are, in fact, the second level of government, and we can take steps to control the third level of government—the municipalities—which are only creatures of our imagination and ingenuity.

We, in this Legislature, have jurisdiction over actual house construction and the laws and regulations affecting it. We must take steps to cut down the soaring costs of building. We should establish a realistic down-to-earth building code programme for this province to replace the present archaic and conflicting municipal codes.

There are other sources of cutting building costs which have been mentioned many times in the Legislature by all parties. I wonder how many members of this Legislature sometimes took time to read an address by Mr. Bruce McLaughlin, a very successful, determined, but socially conscious young developer and builder made to the Metropolitan Toronto home builders last April 22? Let me quote a few key phrases from this address for your serious reflection. I quote:

> The building and development industry is responsible, directly and indirectly, for about 20 per cent of provincial productivity. Therefore one must conclude that, unless the building and development industry is performing satisfactorily, the entire economy will be weakened.
> It so happens that the building and development industry is performing very badly, and it so happens that the economy of this province is plagued with problems of such serious proportions that we aptly term these to be crises situations.
>
> I hope to demonstrate to you that proper land use planning, whereby government, in co-operation with our industry, can build a system of new cities, is the fundamental key to alleviating several of our most crucial public problems.
>
> The traffic congestion in major cities is building up into intolerable levels of tension and inefficiency. A large proportion of the public is being forced to travel ever-increasing distances at ever-increasing cost and waste of time. In addition, public expenses on highways and interchanges, which are extremely high, are continuing to climb. If we proceed to sprawl, without method or reason, there is no way out of this particular predicament.

And the end paragraph of the quote:

> The development and building industry has the capacity and is anxious to build the quality and quantity and type of home that the people of the province want, and, if the municipal restrictions against home building are lifted, our industry could build homes of the type and price which the people need.
> The municipalities are preventing the solution to this problem, because it is beyond their financial capacity to educate > the children, unless they can also attract sufficient nonresident assessment, to ensure that they will have balanced assessment. That is to say that not less than 40 per cent of their assessment is to be nonresidential in nature, and many municipalities are looking for 45 or 50 per cent commercial or industrial assessment. These municipalities are pressuring the provincial government to do something about the educational burden and to do something about achieving balanced assessment.

I congratulate our government on the basic shelter exemption plan, but this is only a stopgap, and a psychological crutch to the homeowners, and overburdened taxpayers. I am looking forward to the committee now sitting on the Smith report—many members of which are presently out of the Legislature doing just that.

Mr. Speaker, I am appalled and alarmed at the shortage of reasonably priced houses. Walter Dean, the president of National Trust and Savings suggests in his assessment of the lending environment, that there will be a continued inflation of housing prices, steadily rising rents, and mounting hardship, especially for low-income families.

The primary mortgage lending institutions are the loan and trust companies, and these are experiencing difficulties in attracting savings. And even the simplest of us can appreciate that no savings growth means no mortgage lending growth.

The bankers are, in the meantime, having a field day. They charge more for loans and pay more for the savings, and they are not mortgage providers. Ordinary loans, which are their main business, and consumer loans, which are more profitable, are their main concern.

Along the same lines, insurance companies seeking a hedge against inflation are turning to the financing of large apartment complexes, which usually offer the mortgagee a participation in the equity.

Mr. Speaker, interest rates and the money supply come under the jurisdiction of the federal government. Prime Minister Trudeau must take steps to make adequate funds available for housing at rates which people with modest incomes can afford to pay.

Subsidizing interest rates would not be costly. On $1 billion it would only be $30 million, if we took the difference between the exorbitant 9 per cent and 6 per cent. These latter problems are for Prime Minister Trudeau to solve—and solve quickly—if he truly means that magic phrase with which he wooed the Canadian electorate: "A just society".

In addition, government spending or overspending at all levels must subside and the government must better stabilize their affairs.

In conclusion, on this particular topic, I would point out that, according to the economic council of Canada, by 1980 eight out of ten Canadians will be living in cities. We must prepare now to meet the problems confronting city dwellers—not only housing, but traffic and transport problems, air and water pollution, decaying neighbourhoods, and so on.

The number one problem now is housing. We have met and conquered many challenges in this Legislature. Let us in the immediate future solve, once and for ever, the critical housing crisis. It is a most serious social problem confronting Ontario today.

Mr. Speaker, it would be improper to leave the topic of housing without making a few pertinent remarks about the allied field of tenancy. I hold a year-round clinic every Monday night in my riding and one of the major problems that is repeatedly brought to my attention is the present serious problem concerning tenants.

One night alone, I had representation of 25 to 30 tenants whose rent had been raised 30 to 40 per cent in one month and, even at this drastic increase, the landlord would not give them leases. Presumably, after getting the rents up, the new landlord would be re-selling almost immediately and another increase would be forthcoming from the then new landlord.

Now, sir, I realize that there are two sides to every coin and understandably, in some cases, the landlords may feel aggrieved. I am also aware that many members in this House dismiss the problem with the old adage, the law of supply and demand. Again, as in housing, I refuse to accept this heartless theory. In a rapidly increasing urban area, landlord and tenant relationships are going to increase drastically over the next few years. Now is the time to come to grips with them.

We, in this Legislature, are equally concerned with protecting minorities as well as protecting majorities. There are few lawyers left in this Legislature, Mr. Speaker, all too few, and I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, we are all completely disenchanted with the present situation of landlord and tenant law. Time has come—and is, indeed, long overdue—for a complete revamping of The Short Form of Leases Act, which is antiquated—nay, it is completely out of date. This is the first and most important step that could be taken by this House, and one that must be taken forthwith.

There are, as we know, many abuses perpetrated not by a large number but certainly by too many landlords respecting the security deposits, the right of distress, fees for allowing assignments, the forced execution of one-sided leases and numerous other flagrant actions by landlords. These must be corrected. The unorganized individual must not be left at the mercy of well-organized and well-financed groups of individuals and organizations. Large apartment complexes are here to stay.

Another partial solution that could be considered, and one that I heartily recommend, would be the establishment of a special court to deal exclusively with landlord and tenant applications. This would expedite matters brought before the court and certainly would eliminate a great deal of the cost presently involved.

Another idea that comes to mind could very well be the establishment of, and forced membership in, an organization embracing all apartment owners. This body could then be a regulatory self-disciplining force which could operate along the lines of our present professional associations.

We owe it to the many hundreds of thousands of tenants, many forcibly so due to the housing crisis, to give proper, and immediate and prompt action to their urgent plight. Many tenants are frustrated home owners. Let us, at least, help them retain some sense of pride, some sense of security, some sense of decency. The important remedies are within control of this Legislature. Let us accept our responsibilities, and correct the abuses and alleviate the hardships.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the favourite pastimes of modern society seems to be apart from the politicians, seems to be belittling, or rather castigating, our police forces.

One can only speak from one's own experiences and observations. I would like to go on record as stating that without any question of a doubt, I sincerely believe that we have one of the finest police forces in the world in Metropolitan Toronto, if not the finest.

This is in spite of certain and occasional allegations of improper conduct against certain individual members.

As a matter of fact, forgetting the Metropolitan Toronto police force for a moment, let us examine the average Canadian policeman. He has children, he is in his 20's and has been a policeman four or five years. He makes $135 for a 40-hour week. He gets three weeks' holiday a year and he has a pension plan that, after 30 years, pays him 50 per cent of his average lifetime salary.

In 1966, the number of motor vehicles stolen outnumbered the number of police by more than 5,000. In 1966—and I am using those figures because they are the latest available—in 1966, excluding civilians and cadets, the number of policemen and policewomen on Canada's 700 police forces was 34,069. Yet, that year they investigated more than 1,094,000 non-traffic offences, including more than 266,000 deaths, 102,000 break-ins, 53,600 assaults and 350 murders and attempted murders. They also laid more than 1,892,000 traffic charges including 35,340 impaired, 3,057 drunk driving, 614 criminal negligence and 13,101 failing to stop at the scene.

Mr. Speaker, they solved 94 per cent of the murders, 92 per cent of attempted murders, 86 per cent of manslaughters, 76 per cent of woundings and 73 per cent of rapes.

I, for one, am naive enough—and I hope I continue to be naive enough and old-fashioned enough—to look upon the majority of the police forces as defenders of society, as protectors of the weak and oppressed. The life is routine, it is dull and it is boring. I am sure that they become quickly disillusioned. Their financial reward is small. Their promotions are few. They continually work on shifts. They work most traditional holidays. They must enforce many outmoded laws. They suffer from a chronic shortage of men and money. They become disenchanted, disillusioned and leave the force. In 1966, Canadian police forces hired a total of 5,920 policemen, cadets and civilian employees. They lost 3,506. In Metro Toronto in 1967, about 300 police personnel resigned.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is high time that recognition, and due recognition, is given our fine police forces, and that those of us who hold elected office should lead the way. The measure of the due and proper enforcement of our laws is a measure of the success of our society and the measure of advancement of the best interests of the community at large.

As legislators, we exercise a certain amount of influence. I look upon this as a trust and I strongly urge that we take time to get better acquainted with the law enforcement forces, and give to them the support that they give to us; as they uphold the laws that are made by us.

I might add, by way of special interest to the members of this House, that we have every right to be proud of our excellent police force in the Ontario Provincial Police. To those hon. members who have not attended a graduation ceremony at Aylmer, near St. Thomas, I urge that they do so at the earliest opportunity. They will come away with a great sense of pride and a warm inner glow as they watch the ceremonies honouring the graduates who have have worked hard and conscientiously to earn a position with the Ontario Provincial Police. The Ontario police commission are to be highly commended for their leadership and their direction.

Mr. Speaker, I became aware, recently, of a new plan in effect in Alberta, called the "orderly payments plan". This plan helps in-deep debtors by consolidating their debts into one monthly payment and, by law, forcing their creditors into accepting a mere five per cent interest. In effect, the province becomes the mediator between creditors and debtors. It collects the monthly payments, distributes them to the creditors, and keeps them from hounding the debtors.

Debt accumulation, Mr. Speaker, is the product of our times. Young people get married, credit is easy to get, and before long they are on the merry-go-round. In no time, a family comes along. When a job is lost or an anticipated raise is not forthcoming, creditors start hounding, nerves get on edge and, yes, I suppose, many separations and ultimately divorces are a direct result of financial circumstances.

As I understand it, there are certain conditions attached to this government assistance in Alberta. For example, nothing further can be bought on time without approval. And even then, it must be a necessary item costing less than $500. They cannot miss their monthly payment except when emergencies, such as unexpected doctor bills, arise. If these conditions are breached, the plan ceases and they are thrown back to the creditors.

The average Canadian family has a debt of about $2,000; the national consumer debt is close to $8 billion, and that does not include mortgages which are estimated at about $16 billion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, quite recently in Toronto, and I will just read one paragraph:

> Depressed, and in debt, Robert George Robinson stole a car last August 11 to drive to a Toronto-Dominion bank on Jane Street, He entered carrying a pellet gun and then left.
> "You stopped short at this very last moment," said the judge, "and this was to your credit."
> Defence counsel Dennis O'Connor said Robinson held two jobs in an effort to meet his obligations but was unable to keep up with them. He owed $3,000.

The most important cause of debt, Mr. Speaker, is poor judgment, that and impulse buying. Add to this, interest which varies from 18 to 23 per cent, and you are on a debtor's magnet. Most people are on it, and most people do want to discharge their debts. I know we have a debt counselling plan in operation in Toronto but I am sure that it lacks the necessary power inherent in schemes with government support.

This plan, in Alberta, deserves the attention of our Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs (Mr. Rowntree). And, if successful, I would heartily advocate a similar plan in Ontario. And, if not successful, I would urge that every thought be given to innovate a plan that is, because help is needed, and needed badly in this area, by a large segment of our population. A debt-free family is a happier family and what we want in Ontario is happier families.

Mr. Speaker, I represent a riding comprising constituents who, in the main, are in the income group of $5,000 to $10,000. There are many homes where the woman has to work, she must work. Day care is not just a welfare problem, it embraces many income groups. Mr. Eberlee, the Deputy Minister of Labour, is quoted as saying: "Canada's economy could not function without the working women." The number of women in the labour force fluctuates, but in 1967 it averaged about 2.3 million. One in four is married, with children under 16. It is estimated that by 1971 half the women in Canada will be working for wages. And, Mr. Speaker, the prime reason, the compelling reason, and the compelling force, for women going back to work is simply a matter of economics, the drastically rising cost of living. It is stated that a decent standard of living today for a family, necessitates an annual income of $6,000. And yet, apart from these many married women, there are hundreds of thousands of single, widowed, divorced, and separated men and women, raising children alone. According to the 1961 census, one family in ten had only one parent; it may now be one in six. For children whose parents must work, who are desperate, the choice in many cases is rotten day care or no day care at all.

Mr. Speaker, we are in a changing, complex society; we are searching and we are searching desperately for understanding, for the opportunity to work out our own problems. We are no longer people who can be classified and saddled with vague promises; we want action, we want solutions, and we will take considerable risk to put our faith and trust in a leader who is a product of this society, who is, as it were, a man of the people. I quote the words spoken by the former Minister of Public Welfare:

> Working wives are contributing to many social problems. Mothers should accept the job of fulfilling the most important role of all, that of wife and mother.

In just three short years, the attitude has changed considerably and will change even more so in the next three years. I realize that our government is well ahead of others in Canada in this field, but this brings me small consolation because there really is much more that can be done. I urge the Minister to lend every possible support to this increasing and critical problem through the day nursery plan. It is a vital area. Anything that affects our children and their future must be given top priority because we are not given a second chance. Our citizens of the future deserve every opportunity to grow up in an atmosphere which will nurture and fulfil their highest potential.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Education (Mr. Davis) on recent legislation bringing schools for trainable retarded children under the new county boards of education—thus, for the first time, granting them the same rights as other children. I am especially conscious of this one area of the complex of education because I became personally involved with the York township association for retarded children almost at the outset, some 15 years ago. I happened at that time to be the charter president of one of the Canadian Progress clubs in this city, and we eagerly affiliated ourselves with the cause of retarded children at a time when the government was not even remotely interested.

Big oaks from little acorns grow. As I recall, the steps involved progressing from classes held in a church basement to a school purchased by our club, to making representation to government. And incidentally—and this was long before I was interested in politics—I recall coming to Queen's Park, at which time I came with a young banker; he and I formed a deputation to the then Minister of Education. I may say that of the three, two of them have gone on to great heights in success because the then Minister of Education — who, incidentally, received us most cordially, and was most helpful at that time—is now the Prime Minister of this province; and the young banker that I went with is now president of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. I would like to point out that I take off my hat to government in this respect but I take it off more so to the parents of these children, and their undying dedication to the cause. And also, a final reminder to all members of this Legislature that we owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to the many service clubs across the province, and to the thousands of members who give wholly of their time and abilities to serve their fellowman.

Mr. Speaker, I like to think as we go through life that perhaps indiscretions committed in youth will be forgiven and better still forgotten. And, accordingly, I personally am not in favour of school records becoming the tools of the police, employers, or what have you.

Some hon. members: hear, hear!

Mr. Carton: This is purely a personal matter, Mr. Speaker, because I look back on my own school days and I realize that the most important single ingredient, outside of native ability, is motivation. I happen to be one who was fortunate enough to advance fairly rapidly; I finished grade 10 at the age of 12; then certain factors intervened and I must confess that my academic record became anything but illustrious for a year or two, until an all-consuming passion for football necessitated my achieving good marks. I sometimes wonder what might have happened had I not been sports-inclined because, being one of seven children, six of whom never went past grade 8, and having a father who could neither read nor write, I was certainly anything but education conscious. So hon. members see that, were my public record at certain ages held up to public scrutiny, I am afraid I would not have passed the accepted tests. We hear so many valid arguments advanced about criminal records, and the fact that there should be a period beyond which there is no recall. Surely school records should a fortiori be treated on a much higher level. The exception, Mr. Speaker, of course, with school records is if the student himself gives permission, or in fact, requests references from the school for employment purposes, or, as many of us in this House did many years ago, for acceptance into the armed forces.

I have wrestled with my conscience, Mr. Speaker, the past five years concerning a matter which was the subject of a resolution debated in this Legislature last year. The resolution was moved by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt), who spoke exceedingly well, in advancing sound and logical arguments for the inclusion of para-medical groups, such as chiropractors, under the Ontario medical services insurance plan. I have not spoken on this matter to date, and you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that there was a very friendly persuasive pressure group, ever so gentle and diplomatic, in the form of a get-together with certain of the hierarchy of the chiropractic association in each of the past few years. I deliberately avoided these, after attending the first one, because I did not want to have my thinking influenced by association with what I thought were an exceedingly competent, dedicated and honourable group of men. I have had a large number of people in my riding contact me concerning this seeming discrimination, and I took it upon myself to go back over Hansard, and I read and I re-read all the material dealing with this problem. Having done so, I wish to say that I associate myself with most of the remarks made by the hon. member for Huron-Bruce, and certainly with his ultimate objectives in this regard, that is, the inclusion of chiropractors and other medical people under OMSIP.

Mr. F. Young: Any port in a storm.

Mr. Carton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to interject one small but important comment to the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton). There is one phase of succession duty levies, that both as a practising lawyer and politician, repels me. This is a situation which arises when residential property is in the names of the deceased, and his or her spouse as joint tenants. It is the subject of long and needless correspondence as the department places the onus on the survivor, usually the wife, as to where she got the money to contribute so as to become joint owner, and when and where and how she managed to raise her portion of the mortgage payments.

In my view, this should be completely eliminated. And insofar as the resident is concerned, if it is held jointly, it should not form part of the estate. This could save the government countless manhours of correspondence and eliminate much bitter feeling, and speed up succession duty assessments, and render great service not only to the public but to our succession duty assessors, who could spend their time to better advantage on more meaningful and complex and productive matters.

Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer, I would be remiss if I did not say a word about our Attorney General (Mr. Wishart). It is most difficult to say something and say it properly, and succinctly. I merely say that there was an article by Scott Young recently in the Globe and Mail, and there was one paragraph which sums up my own personal opinion of our Attorney General. It goes as follows, and I quote:

> After going over many characteristics, incidentally, of the Attorney General, to me, with all these characteristics adding up to a distinctive, humane, civilized parliamentary style, he is just about the perfect Attorney General.

Mr. Speaker, during the Attorney General's estimates, there was much said about impaired driving charges, and I would like to pass along for the benefit of the lawyers in the House an experience that I had with a client of mine. He had never been in trouble before and he was charged with impaired driving, and I told him to come to my office at 9:30 a.m. and we would be up to the magistrate's court by 10:00 a.m. But he was so upset at having to appear in court, that the night before he had gone out on a real bender.

When he came into my office he was in no fit condition to walk, let alone drive. I took him down and gave him some coffee and managed to get him up to the court. When his case was called he got to the witness stand and, of course, the usual evidence was given by the policeman. It really is the usual evidence and there is no way that you can beat it, except that I do not believe in pleading guilty and I will never let a client of mine plead guilty to anything. But in this case, the policeman gave the magic words: "His hair was dishevelled, his face was flushed, his eyes were glassy, he was unsteady on his feet, I smelled alcohol on his breath and he was in no fit condition to drive a car."

I took a look at my client in the box and said: "Well officer, look at my client this morning. His face is flushed, his hair is dishevelled and his eyes are misty. If you saw him sitting in a car on Bay Street now, would you charge and arrest him for driving impaired?" He said: "Yes sir." The magistrate said "You cannot arrest a man for the way he looks and case dismissed." To this day my client does not remember that I got him off.

You know Mr. Speaker, before leaving this topic, I wanted to say that I was somewhat shocked by the remarks made from time to time in the House concerning those devoted humanitarians, those overworked, underpaid, unselfish men who are dedicated to the advancement of the best interests of the community in which they live. I am talking about lawyers. If you are not with me, I am reminded particularly when the member for Beaches-Woodbine (Mr. Brown), gave forth with his description of lawyers, of Shakespeare's "Henry VI", Act 4, Scene 2, where it says the first thing: "Let us kill all the lawyers". So you see it goes back quite some time in history. We are, as hon. members know, the butt of many jokes.

As a matter of fact, three or four months ago, a family I knew as a child had moved away from the neighbourhood and had not been back for years. The father of my friend said: "I can recall when you were five or six years old, that you already wanted to grow up to be a pirate. By the way what do you do?" I said: "I am a lawyer." He said, "Well congratulations." It goes like this every time you tell someone that you are a lawyer. I also get the impression—I am sorry that he is not in his seat, and I stand to be corrected—that the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Shulman), believes that being a lawyer does not necessarily make angels out of men. I admit that his profession has the better of us there.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Carton: Mr. Speaker, we are at the time of year when many addresses at annual meetings of financial corporations point a finger of criticism at the government. These words were spoken by Mr. George Riley, the president of the North American Life Insurance Company at their annual meeting. Using these words as a springboard, I would like to dwell for about seven minutes, and that will be the end of my address, on government, on corporations and the public. It seems to me that ofttimes the regrettable impression evolves that government and business are operating in a role of contending parties. In between these two stand what Mr. Riley calls the "innocent bystander", John Q. Public.

Taxes have risen drastically, and obviously they must continue to rise as politicians of all governments vie one with the other in promising the public what they have hoodwinked the public into thinking that they need. Make no mistake, a snow job is being done on the public in many cases. We in the provincial governments in Canada have been, to a certain degree—and perhaps continue to be, even today—a little smug because our taxes do not land the solid body blows to the taxpayers' pockets as do the federal income taxes and municipal realty taxes. Ours have light glancing blows, but make no mistake, provinces, and I mean all ten, the day of reckoning will come, and is fast approaching. It is said that the average taxpayer subscribes to the theory that it is better to pay up in ignorance than to examine the bite and die of the shock.

Mr. Speaker, I will not go through the many increases in provincial taxes that we have passed right across Canada. I will get back to my main topic, but I did want to interject just a few words on policies and taxation because they are interrelated. My main theme of government and business, and of John Q. Public, is that the government is the whipping boy in many cases; and this is equally true of business. Both are targets for the professional establishment hater. I think that everyone will agree with me that business communities like all human institutions are not without faults and the same is true for government, although I am sure that the hon. members of the Opposition will take exception to any indication on my part that perhaps the government in this province is not perfect. We do make slight mistakes, but I assure them that despite their protestations to the contrary, we are not perfect.

It is easy to blame all the shortcomings of business for all the ills of business, as is indeed done daily in the House by some irresponsible critics, including some of us who have done pretty well out of the system that we publicly denounce—and are not above doing even better. As a Progressive Conservative, I am completely and wholly dedicated to the private enterprise system. This does not mean that I have an anti-government prejudice. Private enterprise in itself is not a sacred cow. It is continually on trial. There are certainly no absolute guarantees that it will survive as a major component of our society. Its continued and accepted place in our society depends, as do all matters in a democracy, on the continued support of the majority of the people. If you go back, and not too far—just to the Nazi regime in Germany and the Stalin regime in Russia—you will find the greatest tyrannies inflicted on men have been as a result of the concentration of political and economic power in the same hands. That is to say, when political power is highly centralized and not subject to the restraints imposed by the presence of private economical power, there is nothing to prevent it from exercising total and complete control over people's lives. Private economic power, which is diffused throughout the society, provides the counterbalance required to guard against a centralization of all power. If private enterprise is weakened or disappears as a force in our society, then individual freedom may well be on the way out. Private enterprise has proven, at least to date, that it is the most efficient means of producing most of the goods and services our society needs.

The Soviet Union has now admitted this as it applies many of the techniques of the private enterprise incentive system in the management of its own business and industry. The comment that I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that private enterprise is important; it is worth preserving; it is worth the hard thinking and the hard working required to ensure its survival in our society. The business community is not, as its critics portray, a public-gouging élite intent on stepping on the downtrodden poor.

Business first and foremost has powered the industrial expansion and growth of Canada and, in so doing, has done more than government; has done more than unions; and has done more than propagandists to reduce the proportion of real poor in this country to its lowest level ever. It is business in the person of its inventors, its researchers, its investors, its merchandisers and its managers which now, more than any other reason of social change, has narrowed the yawning gap between the haves on the one hand and the have-nots on the other.

In Canada today we are, as in virtually all the nations of the so-called free world, experiencing a phenomenon which is profoundly affecting our lives and the future of our children in years ahead. There is tremendous growth in the power of government and its encroaching influence on so many aspects of our private lives.

Governments determine what our children are taught in school; governments determine the cost of most of the goods and services we use through their control of sales taxes, customs and excise; governments provide us with an ever increasing number of those goods and services; governments provide financial subsidies to the young, pensions to the old; governments determine through their control of corporate taxes the level of practicability of business and industry and the proportionate profits which can be retained by the owners.

Governments control the amount of money we can retain from our personal earnings through the operation of the personal income tax; government is the largest single employer in our country. During the past 80 years in the United States the number of full time employees of the federal government has spiralled from 100,000 to 2.2 million. This is more than its ten biggest corporations combined and does not include the armed forces or the people employed by the state in the municipal government. In Canada it is the same story. I believe that one in 12 in Canada works for some form of government.

From the moment of our birth to the disposition of our estates after our death a multitude of government departments controls, regulates, influences and records almost every aspect of our lives. Notwithstanding the tremendous growth of government influence, pressures today are demanding even more government intervention and there are basically three reasons for government growth:

One—the Parkinson factor which theorized that all human organizations tend to grow at a rate that bears no necessary relationship to the function that they perform.

Two—the legitimate need for services government is asked to provide. For example, defence and police protection.

Three—and this is my point, Mr. Speaker—the failure of private enterprise to correct its own abuses and live up to its responsibilities which accompany the privileges.

If you examine our legislation you will find that a vast amount has been enacted as a direct consequence of the disregard of certain sectors of private enterprise for the interests of the public as a whole. When private enterprise, or private business, fails to correct the abuses which exist in its own midst, when it tolerates practices which are not up to the highest standards, it is inviting government to intervene in its affairs.

What is forgotten today is that government and private business share a common purpose, and that is the building of a society in which all people have the maximum opportunity to develop their highest potential. Business men on the one hand, and politicians and civil servants on the other, need each other. They should not be suspicious and distrustful of each other. A prime example is the shortsighted and narrow view shared by many business men towards health, welfare, and security programmes. The overall benefits that they produce for society should transcend the immediate cost.

Business men must understand that the role of government is the redistribution of the nation's wealth so that all citizens may share to a certain minimum extent in the benefit of our national development. Conversely political and government leaders must develop a greater appreciation of the fact that private enterprise is the most effective means of producing the wealth on which the nation's economy and government revenues depend.

Private enterprise is the goose that lays the golden egg and the goose must be kept happy and healthy. To domesticate it, to subject it to reasonable discipline, is necessary. But to harass it or to keep it worried or undernourished, is the height of folly. Business men today can counterbalance the concentration of economic power in government hands by becoming concerned with, and involved in, the progress of political decision making. It has been said that capital which overreaches for profits, labour which overreaches for wages, or a public which overreaches for bargains, will all destroy each other. In essence, to put it succinctly, we are all partners but we must be partners in the obligations as well as in the benefits.

Private enterprise invites government intervention and public mistrust when it shows itself as being narrow and dogmatic in its reaction to social change; when it misrepresents its products and services; when it tolerates standards which are a threat to public health and safety; when it permits unconscionable profiteering; when it subordinates its responsibilities to the public and to its customers and shareholders.

One other factor affecting the future of private enterprise in Canada today, Mr. Speaker, is the problem of bigness. Companies today are getting larger and larger by a process of merger, acquisition and consolidation. A new word has recently been coined, a "conglomerate". Automation, the computer age and competition are going to accelerate this even more.

What conceivably could happen is the involvement of giant bureaucracies which can smother the initiative and freedom of the individual as effectively as a state bureaucracy. Private enterprise is on trial and I for one pray and trust that it will live up to and meet the challenge.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I am a Progressive Conservative and believe in our basic philosophies, but I am a Progressive Conservative who is not as kindly disposed to massive production and conglomerate management as I am to small business, because I believe small business originally built our country and still constitutes a powerful economic force.

I am a Progressive Conservative who has a strong compassion and feeling for my fellow human beings, which comes from spending the early part of my life on a farm, and the latter part of my years with the labouring class. It is my desire, Mr. Speaker, and my pledge, as long as I represent my riding in this Legislature as a Progressive Conservative, that this is the party of the small man—make no mistake, the Progressive Conservative Party is the one that advances the cause of the little man. I simply say, Mr. Speaker, that it is propitious timing, or would be propitious timing, for my party and my government to change now ever so slightly the wording, but ever so greatly the meaning of the slogan of this province.

We celebrate this year the 25th anniversary of Progressive Conservative government in this great province and as we all know our slogan is proudly "Ontario—province of opportunity." Truly this is so because our great leaders, and foremost among them our own Prime Minister, have kept their hand on the pulse of this great province. But now, Mr. Speaker, I am advocating that for the next 25 years of Progressive Conservative rule we dedicate ourselves to a new slogan: "Ontario—province of equal opportunity."

It is time to stop tinkering with the nuts and bolts and think of the whole machine. Our government must develop farsightedness, looking beyond the next election to the next generation, to the continuing good of the people, and take the measures that are necessary to assure it. Let us depart from the plane of fragmented, departmentalized decision making, failing to take account of the interconnection of things and their results.

Let us as I said, Mr. Speaker, remake not only in slogan but in fact, Ontario the province of equal opportunity.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted to hear the member for Armourdale (Mr. Carton) speak in this assembly. I am quite happy at any time to see any member of the Tory backbench get up and enunciate progressive social policies in many fields.

I can only believe that in the case of the member for Armourdale, it was because of his long association in his formative years with my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, the member for Broadview, John Gilbert, the ex-member for Danforth, Reid Scott, and the member for Greenwood, Andrew Brewin. I may say that somewhere along the line the member for Armourdale opted in a political sense for a different party. In his closing remarks, I believe, he illustrated quite clearly the distinction which he made in his mind, and why he selected the Progressive Conservative Party as his political home.

The contributions which the member for Armourdale made in the debate will be remembered, and I would trust that the resurrection of the Budget debate in this assembly would mean two things. One, such contributions by members of the back benches of the Tory Party and secondly, but most important, the attendance on the government front benches of the Ministers of this government. The Throne debate and the Budget debate are the government programme and the government fiscal policy, but in this assembly when we enter those debates the front benches of this government are always vacant, making the usual exceptions for the regular attendance of the now Minister or the soon-to-be Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Grossman).

Most of the other Tory government Ministers do not consider that their Budget presentation or their Throne Speech deserves their attendance in this assembly when members of the Opposition or members of the government back benches speak. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before we get bogged down in some fine distinctions as to what the specific rules and regulations of this House might be, that first of all we recognize the importance of the attendance of the government Ministers during important debates in this House.

Let me correct any impression that just came across the floor from the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence). I am not speaking about the attendance of all the government Ministers, all the time, nor am I speaking about the attendance of all the members all of the time. But I am saying that we have sat in this Legislature at important times in the transactions of public business in the province of Ontario, when there have been on many occasions as few as two, three and four members on the government benches. I am saying, Mr. Speaker, that their awareness is not the point. The point is that they should be in attendance to hear what is contributed in the transaction of public business by the members of the Opposition, and by the members of their own party who occupy the back benches.

Mr. Speaker, I want again to correct what the Minister of Mines has said. I was not calling for the attendance of the Ministers of the government at all times, any more than I was calling for the attendance of the individual members, but the point has been reached in the fine balance which this government believes it fosters in the province of Ontario where the attendance in the House by the Ministers of the Crown is less than adequate, in my opinion. I might say, Mr. Speaker, that most of the things which I state in this House are "in my opinion". Nothing refreshing about it; the Minister without Portfolio, the member for Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) made one of his minor contributions in this assembly by saying "in my opinion". It is not up to him to denegrate anybody's opinion. That is what this place is about—the expression of opinion, and the interchange and exchange of ideas.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

I think the private debate should be discontinued and we will continue the Budget debate.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for being distracted.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

The member for Riverdale has the floor.

Mr. J. Renwick: I am quite happy, Mr. Speaker. If I ever get any response from the Tory benches I consider I have accomplished something in the course of the day.

Mr. Speaker, there is always the problem in a Budget debate such as this, to perform the fine art of selecting what one is going to comment about, because there is such a wide range of problems that deserve comment, and could be selected as worthy of attention in the closing remarks of the Budget debate for this party. My principal concern, Mr.

Speaker, is that the government tends these days, because of its lengthy time in office—and I, of course, along with many others had the privilege of reading the epitaph of the Tory party in the Globe Magazine last weekend—the principal criticism that I have of this government is that they now wish, because of the long time that they have been in office, to translate every problem into what they refer to as a complex, difficult technical problem, and to remove it from the field of political exchange. This is about the oldest gambit that can be perpetrated on the Opposition by any government, and this is what this government has done. Every problem is too complex. Every problem is too technical that it really does not deserve any sharp division of opinion between one group of people in the province and another group.

The Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart), for example, dug right down to the furthest depths of the political grab bag about how you deal with a problem. He was faced, as the Tory government was faced, with a split in the agricultural community of the province, of the farm community. In order to heal that split, the Minister of Agriculture and Food posed the threat of the foreign domination of the agricultural industry of this province and the corporate threat to the agricultural industry about which he intends to do nothing, other than to make certain that he very carefully heals the breach between the Ontario farm union and the Ontario federation of agriculture. Well, the protest in the province of Ontario by the agricultural community will not cease simply because the Minister of Agriculture and Food indicates that he in some way is concerned about the domination of the agricultural industry by United States interests, or by the corporate interests, to the destruction of the traditional farmer in the province of Ontario. The reason the protest will not cease is that, as in the case of the sugar beet plant in Chatham, the Minister of Agriculture and Food will in fact do nothing about it.

There are many other areas, specific areas that you could deal with in each department where the government of this province is not selecting the problem, and it not dealing with the problem and is not giving any indication that to them it is a problem. They are isolated in problems that they think are important. I mention only one or two of them because they are not the main burden of my remarks, but the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and this government is going to have to face up to a two-fold problem on its hospital insurance coverage. It is going to have to face up to it at the next session of the Legislature, or again, it is slowly going to have its power base in this province whittled away. The first one is, that there are in this province a number of people who are chronically ill but who do not, in the opinion of doctors, require medical care and attention, but who are not covered during their illness under the Ontario hospital services insurance plan.

Now, that gap in the plan must be filled and filled immediately. I give you an example of a man who earns in the neighbourhood of $6,000 a year. His wife, who until March 31 of this year, was a patient in the Queen Elizabeth hospital in Toronto, was covered by the Ontario hospital services insurance. Since that date, because she is now categorized as only requiring domiciliary care, the cost to that man is running in the neighbourhood of $20 to $25 a day. His income is in the neighbourhood of $6,000. His wife will not be well again in her lifetime and therefore the cost to that man of the proper care of his wife, while he continues with his employment, will exceed his income. The cost will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7,000 to $7,500 and his income will be $6,000.

Now, I believe that there are many members who can cite similar instances. I think it is a matter which can be dealt with at no great financial cost to the government. I think it is an important problem. It may be marginal to the government. It is of crucial importance to the man to whom I have referred; and it is of crucial importance to many other people because this man—and he is but an example of many others in the province—because of something which is no fault of his at all. In fact, in about two years' time he will be bankrupt, if the government will not take upon itself to extend Ontario hospital care to cover the care of such a person as this invalid wife, either in a nursing home in the province, or under domiciliary care in the home of the man, so that they can be re-united. OHSI should provide the money which is required, so that he can retain or hire adequate care, if she chooses to be in her own home.

This, to my mind, is an urgent matter which the government must deal with, and must deal with promptly, in the interests of ordinary humanity.

The second aspect of the Ontario hospital services scheme is one which I think the government must move to. Again, I do not know what the cost is. I do not think it would be unbearable in a province such as this. Under the OMSIP plan the government pays the premiums of those persons who have no taxable income and half of the premiums of those persons who have a taxable income of, I believe, $1,000. In the case of a single person; then $1,500, in the case of a married couple.

I believe that you must now transpose that same system to the hospital services commission payments, so that if there are people in the province of Ontario who have no taxable income, the hospital premiums should be paid by the government and if they have, up to the $1,000 in the case of a single man, or $1,500, in the case of a married couple, low as those amounts may be, those persons also should be entitled to the coverage under the hospital insurance commission plan.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, one could take various departments of government and point out matters which are of great public interest. They may be only marginal to some people, but they are basically and fundamentally important to the persons who are caught within that kind of a trap. In my view and in the view of this party, of course, it is the obligation of the government to seek out and to isolate the kind of inhumanity which is inherent in our system. To intervene, by governmental action, to remove that inhumanity. And to make certain that those persons who are affected by it can live, and continue to live, in some sense of reasonable dignity.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with, as I said, a number of highly selected matters. I think it would be an appropriate time, in view of the remarks that were made by the member for Armourdale, to refer—as undoubtedly he referred in his remarks—to the last issue of The Financial Post of July 20, which lists the 100 largest corporate enterprises in Canada. Many, of course, are located principally, insofar as their direction and control is concerned, in the province of Ontario.

This government may feel that it can wash its hands of any concern about the impact of this type of corporate growth. It is my view, of course, that the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs (Mr. Rowntree), particularly, can play a very important role in what to me is the workshop of Canada, the province of Ontario, in fashioning and beginning to shape the kind of solutions which might ultimately be accepted across the country.

I think, in our constitutional framework that many times we wait until the federal government—which requires a much greater degree of consensus and on whom a particular problem may not impinge with the same force—that we wait too long for that government to take action. Yet in a province such as Ontario, the ramification of the problem and the concern about the problem would, with proper study, care, and within the legislative authority of this assembly, have provided at least the guidepost toward the ultimate solutions of the problem.

The Financial Post lists the 100 companies; there is nothing new about it; they do it every year, but their remarks, I think, are quite pertinent. I think I need only make the remarks, and not pursue it, for the members of the government to understand what I am talking about.

I quote:

> As the giants of Canada's corporate world become even bigger, through mergers, the economic impact of the élite group of 100 largest companies continues to grow. . . . With combined sales of $23,471 million, the 100 companies account for about 42 per cent of sales of all Canadian companies, excluding merchandising and financial firms. . . . Combined earnings for the 94 companies for which figures are available were $1,340 million, probably accounting for 65 per cent of earnings of all Canadian industrial, resource and utilities companies.
> This year's list emphasizes, even more than previous years, the degree of foreign ownership in Canadian manufacturing companies; 45 of the 100 industrials are controlled from outside Canada, mostly from the United States, and there are substantial foreign shareholdings in another six.

Well, I commend the particulars in The Financial Post to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. Again, I quote only a sentence without adopting all the attitudes of The Financial Post to the kind of concern which this should cause here:

> That the implications of these developments for corporate life in the 1970s requires much hard thinking now.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about the foreign domination of the Canadian economy to the exclusion of the very fact of the corporate domination of the economic life of Canada and particularly, of the province of Ontario.

This is not to say whether or not it is a good thing, or a bad thing, or what aspects of it are favourable or otherwise. What we have to have in the province of Ontario is adequate knowledge and informatioin about the impact of these companies upon the economy of Ontario and upon the economy of Canada.

This, to my mind, is an area where the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs, and this government could very well begin to provide some of the solutions to the problem of the relationship between the individual in our society, the corporate economic bodies in our society, the government in our society; to find where the balance is which will enhance individual freedom to the extent that that is possible, in a highly organized and organizing society. To find what the role of corporate enterprise of that size may be and, in addition, what role the government has to play, in an intervening way, in the decision-making processes related to the economic life of the country.

These are matters which require urgent attention and constant study and I do not suggest, for one moment, that there are any final answers available either now, or that there are likely to be. But I think it is incumbent on this government to begin to investigate, in a systematic, intelligent way. It must obtain the kind of information that will provide the criteria of judgment which, ultimately, will lead the government to adopt policies and to introduce legislation which will solve some of the very difficult economic, social and governmental problems which the government is faced with in the next several years by the development of the corporations in the life of this country. My plea simply is, let us start now to examine and to understand what is taking place in the economic life of the country.

We have—and again, I do not give any view of the matter one way or the other, I do not know any more than anyone else does, but is the takeover of a controlling interest, minimal as the shareholding may be, controlling interest nevertheless of Canadian Breweries by the Rothman group of companies, is that the kind of decision in which the government should not only not be involved but not have any information in advance?

There are a number of other amalgamations, within the last year or two, which are listed in The Financial Post. Of course, they are reported from time to time. And again, my question is: Are they the kind of activities which should take place without any prior government knowledge? Without the government having any view which it may wish to express in the integration of the corporate life of the province of Ontario and ultimately of Canada; because many of those basic industries find it important and valuable to have their head office operation in the province of Ontario?

This is a field which is very important from my point of view, very important from the point of view of the New Democratic Party, and one which I believe the government has been far too standoffish about; believing in some way or other that it is interfering if it moves in to investigate and to understand corporate amalgamations and mergers; believing that in some way they are intruding upon the so-called free enterprise and initiative of the small business man who is so close to the heart of the member for Armourdale and who is a very important part of our society but who, in fact, under this type of corporate amalgamation and merger practice, is slowly but inevitably either going to disappear or to remain in the economy of the country merely as an adjunct or a minor sales outlet or playing some relatively minor part in the corporate economic life of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, strangely enough, about a year ago when I was also winding up the debate of this party under the Budget, I drew to the attention of the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), that he had not made, nor had the government made, any statement of any kind, about the Carter commission on taxation. Since that time, to my knowledge, there have been no statements or views expressed by the government on the recommendations of the Carter commission on taxation. And I am going to again, Mr. Speaker, as briefly as I can, elaborate, in this instance, on that particular aspect of the taxation system of the province because my very cursory remark, last year, to the Provincial Treasurer, obviously has not produced any results.

The province of Ontario derives from the personal income tax and from the corporation tax in the neighbourhood of 40 per cent of its revenue. The magnitude of the figures is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that in the current year, the Provincial Treasurer expects to gain from the individual income tax, $650 million and from the corporation taxes, about $315 million. Very close to $1 billion, or as I said previously, about 40 per cent of his revenue. And yet, the government of the province seems to be hung up as to how to deal with it. We find, first of all, that prior to the election, the Provincial Treasurer announces that he is not going to touch income tax, and he is not going to touch corporation taxes and he is not going to touch sales tax. I should correct that. He, in fact, said, "I am not going to touch corporation taxes and I am not going to touch the retail sales tax," and, of course, that carried with it, the fact that he was not going to touch the income tax, because under the abatement system, it is not within his control. But, in fact, he was saying that regardless of the fiscal needs of the province of Ontario, he was going to opt out of those three fields as having any bearing upon what he might recommend to the province of Ontario by way of taxation measures in the year which we are now in. He also opted out from any serious concern about the progression of the tax system and, of course, we paid the price. The people of the province of Ontario paid the price and The Department of Lands and Forests became the scapegoat for a multitude of these minor taxes which were imposed by the government of Ontario on the people of the province.

But, in this field of the corporate taxation and in the field of the personal income tax, the government of this province has said nothing that I know of. The Smith committee report specifically excludes from its terms of reference any concern about the corporation tax or about the income tax. It specifically states that they are matters being dealt with by the Carter commission. And, of course, the Carter commission, when it makes its report, is also hung up on the proposition that it cannot deal with the needs of the provincial governments or the needs of the municipal governments. So we have, in the popular language of the day, the blind interface between the Carter commission report and the Smith commission report. This is the hang-up of the government in the fields of these taxes.

I want to ask the Provincial Treasurer, and I know he is not going to have an opportunity to reply at this point, but certainly, next session, I would like to have him reply to three or four areas of concern that I have about the Carter commission report. It has been variously hailed, as I am sure the Minister himself is aware, as either being an orthodox document, revolutionary document, a counter-revolutionary document, a great advance in fiscal reform. It has been termed radical, in terms of the technology of the tax system. It has been also called conservative, in terms of its ideology. It has been stated that it is radical in changing the rules of the game but not its outcome, and that no one who seriously believes in hard and serious social reform should confuse Carter with that reform.

There are all sorts of views which have been expressed about it. I only want to isolate three or four topics. They are not matters, necessarily, that I have isolated in my mind. They are products of what I have read and thought about the topic.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): It is a tax philosophy.

Mr. J. Renwick: Yes. There are four basic areas. Is the government of Ontario—it has always had for some long time a separate corporation tax levied under a separate corporate taxing statute—is it prepared to have the corporate tax, as it is now known, disappear?

That, I think, is a fundamental question because the Carter commission report says that corporate taxes, as we now know them, will totally disappear and that the tax which will be imposed will be a tax on the individual shareholders who own the company.

It raises very serious problems and I, personally, do not see how you can adopt the whole of the Carter commission philosophy of a dollar is a dollar is a dollar unless you eliminate the corporate tax.

Again, I do not say whether it is a good thing or not, but I would like to know what the government's view is on that aspect of the Carter commission. The ramifications for the impact of the taxing structure on the individuals in the country and on the businesses in the country, is something which I believe is very great, if the corporate tax, in fact, were integrated.

I think it would make it very difficult for government to raise the kind of moneys that are required if it was not able to have the corporations, in fact, earn the surpluses in the society—have the government take 50 per cent and have the corporation retain 50 per cent. It is a very important part of the leverage which is involved in the government's balance between the private sector and the public sector in my view, as to how the percentages of taxation—how the percentages of retained earnings on the one hand and the percentage that is taken by government on the other hand are balanced off, in the need to maintain the balance between the public sector of the economy and the private sector.

It appears to me to be a valuable part of the framework of government financing and government intervention in the economic system in order to provide some kind of leverage as to how the economy is to work in any given year. I think that deserves very serious comment. I think it deserves public comment by the Treasurer of the province of Ontario and in debate in this assembly.

I would like the Provincial Treasurer to state whether or not he accepts the Carter commission philosophy on the question of gifts and bequests. We all know that there is substantial pressure in some of the other provinces of Canada to eliminate, for example, the succession duty taxes from the provincial sphere. I would like to know, simply because within the philosophy of the New Democratic Party, the inheritance of wealth from one generation to another is not consistent with either the equality of opportunity that the member for Armourdale spoke about, or consistent with the equality of condition which we, in this party, are very concerned about. I think it is up to this government to make some statement about the very important recommendations which were made by the Carter commission on the question of gifts and bequests. And, of course, involved in this again, is the position of the government of the province of Ontario on the question of capital gains taxes. All of these are involved in some way with the unequal treatment of certain persons within a community.

If you happen to have the kind of wealth where you require the advice of tax experts in order to minimize your taxes, then you find that when you pay the taxes you can in fact minimize them by making use of the special provisions of the taxing statutes so that gifts are taxed at a lower rate. The capital gains tax which the United States adopted—and there is great pressure from the business community, if there is going to be a tax at all, for the government to adopt in Canada a differential tax rate; a lower tax rate on it. So far as inheritance taxes are concerned, the same principle follows, that there are privileged positions within the community for those who have wealth which they wish to transfer to other persons.

The third aspect on which I think that the government should comment is the fairness of the system. I think there has been a great deal of emphasis in the public's mind that the tax structure recommended by the Carter commission is and will be, in some way, a more equitable system. Equitable in the sense that equals are treated equally under the system. It is very questionable as to whether or not there is virtually any merit in the Carter commission so far as the redistribution of income within the economy, within society is concerned. I would like to have the Provincial Treasurer's views as to the fairness or the equity of the Carter system. What is his comment about it? Is it more equitable than the system under which the province of Ontario now gains about 26 per cent of its revenues even though it is under the national tax structure and it is done by means of an abatement provision?

The fourth area which I believe is important for the Provincial Treasurer to comment about, concerning the Carter commission, is the area of the so-called neutrality of the tax system. I understand that the Carter commission, in fact, says that the tax system should be entirely neutral; that it should not, in any way, influence the allocation of resources. It would therefore mean that the private sector of the economy makes its decisions uninfluenced in a fiscal way by the government of the province or the federal government through the tax structure.

It then makes the connection between neutrality and economic growth without giving any supporting information about it. It says, for example, that the neutrality of the tax system automatically means economic growth. I question whether or not the connection is anywhere near that great. I question whether or not, really, the lessons of the last 30 or 40 years have been learned, that governments, as such, have very important parts to play in stimulating the economic growth of the community.

The last item is one that I think this government has got to take under study. It is the question of the guaranteed annual income. It comes into this by way of the negative income tax but as someone said—the Carter commission was underway, of course, during the years when poverty was discovered in the United States and in Canada and became a matter of social concern—and therefore the Carter commission, in fact, did not study it. My understanding is that somewhere in Carter there is a footnote that this matter should be subject to a separate and distinct study. I think that the government of this province should do that kind of a study to put before the people of the province of Ontario its explanation of the various combinations of methods that have now been devised by which such a plan could be worked out. It is not something that can be undertaken in all its technical details by any one of the Opposition parties. It requires a great deal of skill and technical attention and study. But such a study, even if it took no view of the matter whatsoever, would be at least valuable in throwing into the public market place for adequate discussion the relative merit of instituting that kind of a scheme. We, of course, believe it has very real merit in many areas. We, of course, might very well change our minds if the arguments were all placed before us. But, on the information that we have before us, it would appear to go a long way toward solving some of the basic problems of our society, so far as those persons are concerned who are unable to earn a living for whatever reason, by continuous full-term employment in our society.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the very last matter which is of concern to me, and I am afraid that it is going to go over the adjournment. But I would like to start in on it—I understand, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to continue right on.

The focus of my remarks in this instance is on the Provincial Treasurer's Budget statement, for he joins together and relates slower growth and higher unemployment in the society. In my view, Mr. Speaker, there is no more fundamental problem that this government faces and will face in the next couple of years, than a slow-down of economic growth and an increase in unemployment in the province of Ontario. The Provincial Treasurer, in his Budget statement, of course, relates it to rising costs and prices, rising interest rates, tighter capital market conditions; and the whole presentation of his Budget is involved in those areas of the problems of growth and unemployment over which he says he, as Treasurer, and this government have little, if any, control. Therefore one must rule out the international monetary market, one must rule out the flight of people from paper money into gold, from U.S. dollars into gold, one must rule out any matter which this Treasurer or this government can deal with, although other governments have the power to deal with them. Similarly with interest rates, the government can have little, if any, impact in a direct way on the interest rate structure of the country or of the world.

There are areas in connection with prices, of course, in which this government could begin to provide the experimental machinery under which there would be some form of public scrutiny of prices within the society. Prices, and if necessary the related aspects of profits and wages. This government in my view, could very well be a front-runner —again part of the workshop theory of the province of Ontario—in instituting the kind of board where there would be the initial stages or the public scrutiny of price increases, which I think would provide much valuable information in again fashioning the kind of policies and, in due course, the kind of legislation which ultimately will be required in that field.

I want to stay away from that area, and I want to deal more particularly with the whole question of unemployment. The Provincial Treasurer, again, Mr. Speaker, in his supporting papers to the Budget, has this to say:

> That the Ontario economy in 1967 geared down to a slower rate of growth, that overall the Ontario economy managed to expand its real output by 3.7 per cent and increase employment by 3.6 per cent, whereas the labour force increased by 4.2 per cent, thus productivity did not decline in Ontario in 1967, but neither did it increase.

What I take that statement to mean, Mr. Speaker, is that the growth of the province, the economic growth of the province, failed to keep pace with the growth in the labour force, and that the productivity, that is the per capita output, within the province remained unchanged.

He then refers to the particulars of the labour force, that the total labour force rose in 1967 by 115,000 to 2,834,000, a growth of 4.2 per cent. Employment did not keep pace with the growth in the labour force. Unemployed persons rose to 89,000 or 3.1 per cent of the labour force compared to a rate of 2.5 per cent in 1965 and 1966; unemployment among young workers also worsened during the year. He then ends up by summarizing his view of Ontario economically for 1968, that there will be a growth in real output amounting to 4 per cent, higher employment will account for half of the 4 per cent growth in real output, and increased productivity for the other half; since the labour force is expected to grow faster than employment, there could well be a rise in unemployment to perhaps 4 per cent. Four per cent translated into figures in terms of the work force in the province of Ontario means somewhere in the neighbourhood of 110,000 to 120,000 people who would be unemployed during 1968, on whatever seasonally adjusted basis the statistics may ultimately show.

Now, it seems to me that the government is able, in this area—that is the area of economic growth and dealing with employment—with the proper policies, with the proper mixture between the activities of the public sector and of the private sector, with a proper concern about the redistribution of the wealth of the society in the province of Ontario, to effectively do something drastic about the slow-down in economic growth and about the increase in unemployment.

I am not an expert in these fields, but I am led to believe that for every one per cent increase in the per capita output of the province of Ontario, that that in fact means that there is a disappearance of about one per cent of the jobs in the province. This is my understanding of it. Translated into figures, I take that to mean that if we have a work force of 2.8 million people, and if there is an increase in the per capita output or productivity, that that will in fact mean that there has been a disappearance of about 28,000 jobs. Therefore, what the government has to do in order to deal with the problem of unemployment, is to provide not only the jobs for those who come into the labour force for the first time, but provide the kind of policies which will enable those who are displaced from their employment to re-enter the employment market in other fields; this seems to me to be the measure of the problem.

I think that where people become confused about it is that there is this constant emphasis upon the increase in productivity. If we can just increase the per capita output of our society, if we can just do that, that in some way or other we are really going to have a larger pie to divide. But the fact of the matter is, that the very increase of productivity, which means our ability to increase our standard of living in this province, is made at the expense of jobs within the society. Therefore the government has got to provide not only an economy within which those who are flowing into the society can get employment of all kinds, but it has got to provide the policies by which those persons whose jobs are eliminated can get the retraining and re-entry into the labour force in order that we can maintain our economic growth and maintain full employment.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the member would yield me the floor for a moment. There is a motion of this House which has been adopted some ten days ago and which calls for adjournment at 12:30 o'clock, p.m. I understand that the members are anxious to continue and I would like agreement of the House for the suspension for today of that motion.

Agreed?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Will the member please carry on?

Mr. J. Renwick: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, to summarize as best I can, the problem as I see it is that with the increase of the population of the province, and the increase of the labour force of the province on an annual basis just to maintain the standard of living that we now have, there must be an increase in real terms—in the gross provincial product—and if the output per capita remains constant.

Therefore we have to do a considerable amount of running just to stay where we are. In order to provide the kind of improvement in our standard of living and the additional surpluses which are required in our society—in order to accomplish our objectives—we have to increase our per capita output which, I understand, is the definition—for practical purposes, rough and ready as it may be—of productivity. And in the very doing of that we are displacing people from the work force. Now, it is true that the normal attrition of of society displaces people from the work force by means of retirement, death and for other reasons.

However, we are talking about displacement because people are able to live longer, and work longer; and, for many reasons, we are probably talking about the displacement of a substantial body of the current working force. If we are going to increase the productivity of the current working force and of the province, therefore the government's obligation is not simply the education of those who are coming up—providing them with the skills in order to enter the employment market—but to provide the adequate retraining and upgrading facilities which will enable those displaced to regain a place within the employment structure of the province. This is, of course, important altogether apart from the point of view of the individual; it is very important because one of the major factors of the economic growth of the society or the province of Ontario is the consumption by the people of the province, or the consumer demand.

As the Minister's Budget statement said, that consumer demand was a very important ingredient for what growth we did achieve in 1967. The other ingredients are government expenditure, business investment and the export trade—including the tourist industry.

By maintaining a high level of employment and dealing with this question of those who are displaced, this government has a very real responsibility to maintain the level of consumer demand within the economy. Now, all of these items are quite intertwined and one can certainly move very quickly to the effect of automation on a society as far as the same problem is concerned—that is, the increase of the per capita output in the province. But in addition to that, the impact of automation and to what extent automation is going to be the way in which the per capita output of the province is increased; to what extent is the impact of automation in fact going over the next five or ten years to displace from the work force, larger and larger numbers? Well, it has been said, and these two sentences put the problem clearly:

> A community devoted to the production of consumer goods is ripe for automation.
> Therefore if you have a vastly greater amount of your resources engaged in the production of goods, then you have a society which is more and more likely to face the drastic impact of automation. On the other hand, a community which employs its affluence to improve urban environment and alleviate poverty and inequality, to enhance aesthetic experience and to raise the quality of public health and education, will devote more and more of its resources to endeavours only minimally subject to automation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to make the point that where the Provincial Treasurer in his Budget refers from time to time to the public sector simply supplementing the private economy and being sort of adjunct to it, to be used very judiciously and propitiously so far as its intrusion on the private sector is concerned, and where in another case—as he gives his reason or excuse for not introducing the federal Medicare plan here—what he refers to as the delicate balance between the private and public sector, I would like to draw to his attention that one of the ways in which he can lessen the impact of automation and therefore do something to lessen the impact of the increase of per capita output on the province of Ontario, in terms of displacing people, is to perhaps consider shifting that balance to a wider participation by the government in the public sector.

Now let us put aside one or two of the mythologies that creep into any such talk. There is some suggestion that government spending is wasteful spending and that government always spends and the private sector for some reason always invests. Let us use the same terms. It is either public investment or private investment, or it is private spending and government spending. Government spending can be very productive. It may not be productive in tangible goods—it is anathema to the Tory party to suggest that a government enterprise should produce shoes. We hear about the catastrophic results to the government of Saskatchewan because of the boot manufacturing operation. But one of the mythologies is if the government produces goods it is wrong and therefore only the private sector could produce goods—and should produce all the goods that it possibly can—and that the government should stay out of and not interfere with the activities of the private sector and not deprive the private sector of resources for public expenditure.

Well, what I am saying to the Minister very clearly is that part of his "delicate balance" which may very well be an essential ingredient of solving what appears to me to be this problem of slow growth, and the problem of unemployment with which he is faced or appears to be faced will be giving greater consideration to a larger expenditure by government in the public sectors in those areas which are not intimately and directly connected with the production of goods.

I do not think the question of unemployment unrelated in many ways to other areas. We talked about the aggregate demand of society which if it was kept up would provide full employment. There is another aspect of it—that is the structural unemployment about which I spoke—and that is the people displaced from the working force for one reason or another are not able to re-engage in the work force because the relatively unskilled, and semi-skilled jobs are disappearing that in other times would be picked up again at the same level.

It is quite different now of course. The demand is for increased skills, and the persons who are now displaced from the work force find it difficult—if not impossible—to get back into the employment field. I would like again to quote a sentence which appeared to me to state that particular point clearly that:

> The pace of technological change, the rising skills required for employment and the shortage of those skills amongst the unemployed explained past increases in unemployment.

I think that also is part of the problem with which the Provincial Treasurer is faced.

I think the only other comment that I want to make in this particular part of my remarks—and these are my final remarks and again I speak strictly as an amateur in this field—is that the usual form of inflation about which we spoke was the demand-pull inflation, then it became fashionable during the early part of the 1960s to speak about the cost-push inflation. In my understanding that cost-push inflation as distinct from the demand-pull inflation is the degree to which a society has moved in its economic activities from a competitive society to an administered price society. That is where the distinction takes place, and that for practical purposes if you have a totally competitive society the only inflation you would have would be the demand-pull type of inflation and if you had a fully non-competitive economic society you would have nothing but cost-push inflation.

All I want to say is that the demand-pull inflation was more or less part of the laisser faire free market operation; the cost-push inflation is very much the product of the decisions of basic industries in society. This has been illustrated—and this as is often the case in our society of course, that many times the United States throws into bold relief the very same problems that we have and we tend to think that because the relief is not quite as bold in Ontario we do not have the problems, when in fact we can learn a great deal for the solution of our problems because of the bold relief within which they are thrown in the United States —when the confrontation took place between the late President Kennedy and Mr. Blough, the head of United States Steel Corporation on the question of prices—it was not just a clash of personalities. There was a fundamental problem involved, and it was not just that one man had thought that the other man had not kept his word as a result of the steelworkers and steel industry negotiations for a new contract. What, in fact, was taking place, of course, was that the steel industry was increasing its prices. The closest estimate that anyone can get is that only one sixth of the price increase that the United States steel industry was then going to undertake for the basic commodity within the United States economy was due, in fact, to the results of the negotiations under collective bargaining between the steelworkers and the United States steel industry. What they were saying in the United States steel industry was: "We are going to so operate the steel industry in the United States that we can have an unused capacity—I believe the figure is down to 33 per cent—and still make a profit. As our capacity becomes unused, we are not going to drop our price in order to stimulate demand. What we are going to do is keep our prices at a level regardless of unused capacity in plant and employment—regardless of that, we are going to earn this kind of profit by deciding this kind of price."

Now, again I am not commenting—there is nothing morally good, or morally bad about the problem. All I am saying is that they are serving their interests. Government has got to serve the public interest in the United States. In fact, the late President Kennedy endeavoured to serve the public interest, and has probably left a continuing impact upon the future economic life of the United States, because of his intervention. And in this field of administered prices let us not get trapped into thinking that the so-called cost-push inflation is something which is dealt with by intangible market forces over which we have no control.

It is, in fact, the result of the decisions which are made. And those decisions are matters with which this government and any government which is concerned with and must accept, the primary responsibility for economic growth and the level of employment in our society, has got to be concerned about. Therefore, I say that this to my mind produces the need for this government to act, pending any decision by the federal government—because of my particular workshop theory of solving Canadian problems that this is the workshop where they can be solved—we have got to have the institution of a prices review board.

No one is talking about price controls or any other kind of controls. What they are simply saying is that the public has a legitimate right to know how prices are established in the basic commodities in our society. When that information is available I would be the first one to say that any government that introduced controls would be totally wrong. Why would they be totally wrong? Because, as in all these areas of which I have tried to speak today, there is not enough knowledge. So what you have to find out is how these decisions are made.

We, the government of Ontario, the repository of the public interest, are interested in knowing how prices are established within the basic segments of our society, be they commodities or services. This is what we are talking about. It is not some remote philosophy, it is not some idyllic conception of what the society might be. It is not some total transformation of the society. It is an assertion, powerfully made, intelligently made and intelligently articulated, of what the public interest is and what its intervention should be. So again I say that a very important part—and again the Provincial Treasurer in his statement which I for my own purposes have attempted to unravel, and have attempted to express some of the unravelling in my remarks; where he says, our fiscal policy; let me go back a little bit: "The Ontario Budget is an economic plan of action." That is what the Provincial Treasurer says. "This particular combination of circumstances, rising costs and prices"—with which I believe I have now dealt in my last remarks—"rising interests rates"—over which, I have said, this government has little control except by persuasion and then not very much over the structure of interest rates in Canada or on the international market, because we have got this problem of either bondage to gold or some new, more fluid method of providing for the financing of international trade, and therefore this Provincial Treasurer is not responsible for that—"tighter capital market conditions"—and he has indicated that he can influence the capital market some way, even though in this Budget he is staying out of it—along with these that I have tried to fasten on in my remarks in this Budget debate, winding it up for this party, are the ones where the Provincial Treasurer has a wide area of influence and control—"slower growth and higher unemployment." Those are his prime responsibilities, not to the exclusion of everybody else, and not divorced from the impact of other influences over which he has little if any control, but over which within this province he has some substantial control he says this "creates a complex of conditions which almost defy rational policy making".

I am simply saying that it does not defy rational policy making. I think that when one isolates the factors which are involved, this Provincial Treasurer and this government can say very clearly that there are areas in which we can ensure the continuing economic growth of this province at a higher level. We can ensure that those who are displaced from the labour force by the increase that we hope will be achieved in the per capita output, can be re-absorbed into the employment force; that we can provide the jobs by which the increase in the labour force in the natural sense of those initially entering it can be employed in it; and that we can, in fact, deal to some extent with the so-called cost-push inflation by intervening for public scrutiny purposes through the instrumentality of a prices review board into the administered price structure in some, if not all, of the basic commodities and services which determine the level of inflation and increase in price throughout the province of Ontario and, indeed, throughout Canada.

Those are areas with which this government can deal. I mentioned one or two subsidiary ones. I mentioned the question of the increasing control by a narrow segment of the corporate society over our economy. I have not dealt with my own particular view that Galbraith's "Industrial State" is nothing but a modern day apology for monopoly capitalism; that there are areas where it is very important to realize and to clearly realize that these 100 companies are not controlled, as Galbraith says, "somewhere away down in something called the technostructure, where little fellows being paid very little and having certain computer skills are in fact making the decisions.

They are in fact controlled by a number of people in our society who are making the decisions; and in my view that aspect of it deserves the attention of the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. But the main body of my remarks and my main concern was simply to deal with the responsibility of this government on the question of slower growth over the last two or three years; the increasing unemployment over the last two or three years; and what will continue to be his major problems and to make certain that he understands that we understand that he can do something about it.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. Farquhar (Algoma-Manitoulin): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion during what is, I expect, the last day of this Parliament, I have been afforded the opportunity and the privilege of winding up the debate on the Budget. This responsibility I shall do my best to discharge, realizing that, while it is a privilege second only to the privilege of representing the riding of Algoma-Manitoulin in this chamber, it will be a somewhat different set of opinions than is normally presented on this occasion by this party and I refer to the previous member for Grey-South (Mr. Sargent) and the very able member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha), who have previously taken this position.

I am quite mindful that, in terms of experience or speaking ability, any presentation I make will compare quite unfavourably with presentations of speakers from this party of previous years. I may not be able to spark the interest of other members, but I do have a few opinions that arise out of a careful examination of the procedures which have taken place and the problems and items which have been debated during the current session.

However, Mr. Speaker, while it is an oversimplification to say that we take ourselves too seriously in this House, it often occurs to me that, in this chamber, we become so involved with the image of oratory that we sometimes forget why we are here. The rest of the world may be yawning on occasion in the face of our wonderful pronouncements. So, if my remarks do appear inadequate by comparison with others, I hope they will be accepted in this context.

Before I begin, as is the custom, I would like to extend my heartiest congratulations to yourself, Mr. Speaker, for your performance during the sometimes hectic, almost violent exchanges which have taken place here this year. While we have not always agreed with your rulings, which is our prerogative, I think it would be fair to say that your firmness and sound judgment did much to get us through this first session of a new Parliament in a responsible way, and that you exercised the right degree of flexibility necessary to guide and control ambitions, in a year which introduced so much new talent to this House.

Perhaps you will permit me, sir, to suggest that we, in this party, appreciate the contribution which Mrs. Cass has made to the life of this session. I wish particularly to mention that your gracious lady has more than fulfilled her role, and in a most charming way.

I have also a short word of commendation for your Chairman, a gentleman whom we all respect and admire. He has proven himself capable, fair and diligent. I shall not soon forget an occasion when his true stature showed. I have no intention of embarrassing him, Mr. Speaker, but it takes a good man to deliver a retraction from a ruling under the circumstances in which he found it necessary to do so.

We were treated this morning to a most thoughtful and responsible donation by the member for Armourdale (Mr. Carton). No vitriolism, and yet a lack of the usual plaudits from those benches. I appreciated his effort and I can only say that he set the tone for the wind-up in a way that I would like to be able to pursue.

Perhaps I should comment briefly on some of the remarks of the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick), who is not taking advantage of these outstanding comments.

As I do, I make it plain that I have no intention of fighting the battle of the Budget or the estimates again. I think that this party, forming the official Opposition, has shown a capacity and willingness to debate, consider and suggest, on every occasion which presented itself. And in fact, as Whip, Mr. Speaker, I have been most gratified, on many occasions, when it was necessary to absorb fast curves and go looking for speakers in a hurry, I found our people always ready, always capable, and always prepared. I simply want to express to those members, through you, my earnest appreciation for the co-operation and the agility of mind which they exercised—at the drop of a hat on many occasions.

The hon. member for Riverdale has presented a set of opinions, and, as always, has done it most ably. I can agree with a good deal of his government criticism, but I had no thought of finding myself in competition today with him or his party. I came here today with a few mild criticisms of the administration and I simply say that the basic difference between this party and the New Democratic Party is that we Liberals are aware that we have a destiny to fulfill and we are in the business of preparing ourselves for the responsibility of governing.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): We could recognize that attempt.

Mr. Farquhar: It seems that the members from the New Democratic Party would like to discuss this a little further. So we will do that.

It is my opinion, in view of recent developments, that the New Democratic Party is a disappearing force in Canada—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Farquhar: Not only that—

An hon. member: —disappeared from the House here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Farquhar: I really appreciate this. It gives me an opportunity to pursue the matter and to say that they are not going anywhere in Ontario either.

I have some reasons for saying this. I think that the country—the citizens across Ontario—have become frightened by the radical and divisive elements within that party.

Mr. Gisborn: The hon. member was shaking on October 18.

Mr. Farquhar: You know, that brings me to a little point. It is very hard, in Algoma-Manitoulin, to get too pessimistic as your majority keeps growing.

I think that the people of Ontario have become frightened of the sounds of irresponsibility emanating from the New Democratic Party. They have rejected, as recently as June, the fact that NDP policy consists of scratching and screaming and biting and kicking at anything that represents authority, or administration. They have rejected the federal arm of the party in Ontario and they will further reject the provincial party in Ontario for the same reasons.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Stand up and defend yourselves!

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Hardly worthy of comment!

Mr. Farquhar: They do not believe that short-term answers to regional problems, or continual government donations, will settle their problems. They are tired of hearing theories as answers to practical problems.

Another great ploy of this party, of course, was mentioned earlier this morning. It seems to be to continually wear such a bright halo which is meant to prove that they are the only champions of the small and neglected of our society. Some of them talk at great length in this Legislature—

Mr. Gisborn: That is old stuff, the hon. member can do better!

Mr. Farquhar: I will wear it out anyway—about individual cases which call for nothing really but a phone call to the appropriate department.

No member of this House needs to take a back seat to the NDP members with respect to constituency service. I doubt if there is a member of this assembly who does not accept this responsibility as his automatic duty. We simply feel no need to make such a fuss about it. I have always found that if a member researches these individual problems through the federal, the provincial and the municipal authorities he has very little time left to pat himself on the back.

Enough about the socialist group, except to suggest that it may be time for that party to more clearly define its leadership. I think the people of Ontario are wondering whether the leader is the nominal one from York South (Mr. MacDonald), or whether, perhaps, the irresponsible member with the burlesque approach, who has made the most column-inches during this session, is the leader. It remains to be seen.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to have a particularly good memory to recall the interest with which a promise in the Speech from the Throne was received, to the effect that a series of conferences would be initiated throughout Ontario to foster interest in community affairs, and improve communication between the newcomer and the established residents of our province. That seemed a genuine enough approach at the time, but has been proven a hollow one. Five months later there is still no dialogue with which to inspire a sense of community for the people of Ontario.

All they get, as in the case of the Hardy report on the Lakehead, is direction from above, and the old fait accompli technique. More often than even that, though, they get only window dressing. A past master of that art is, of course, the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall).

Those of us who have gone to 950 Yonge Street with hopes for real and sincere approaches to problems of regional development and economic disparity have examined this hon. Minister's statements with a microscope, but we find nothing but a pronouncement that is geared to promotion of the image of the office of The Department of Trade and Development.

Our thinking that this department's responsibility, sir, was to direct, promote and foster industrial growth seems to have been mistaken. That there are many one-industry towns across northern Ontario is a well-known fact. One example of the ineffectual workings of this department is the lack of foresight and planning involved in allowing the town of Blind River, in Algoma, to fall to pieces overnight when it was known months before that the Domtar company woud be pulling out at short notice.

Since a major part of the economy of Ontario hinges on effective governing by The Department of Trade and Development, I feel that here—as has been hammered home many times in this House—if it honestly cared about the economic disparity of this province, is a chance for the government to actually do something about it.

We all know the hon. Minister to be a genial, able politician, but since he is the head of such an important department, the people of Ontario expect more than a disarming smile and a pat cliché to solve our very real problems.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Especially when the cliché is: "You cannot eat independence".

Mr. Farquhar: A "put-up front" can never substitute for action in genuinely trying to promote areas of the province which need help in getting a start.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the Premier (Mr. Robarts) supports his Minister, and in so doing, shows that the same blasé approach to solving problems is not only condoned, but is the general rule of this Conservative administration.

Before I go any further, I wish to state that any reference I make to the Premier, Mr. Speaker, must not be misconstrued into lack of respect for his personage. He is a man of stature, and let me say that the statement last weekend in the Globe and Mail did not exactly deny his stature, so it will not be necessary for me to enlarge on that point.

But we, in the Liberal Party, are well aware of the many demands on his time and energy outside the normal activities of the Legislature itself. On many occasions his complete fairness and open, frank acknowledgment of the role of the Opposition has been apparent, certainly to me.

However, the basic fact remains, that the business of governing Ontario requires full-time leadership and direction, as does any business, but this has not been the case.

Lack of judgment and planning have brought us to the spectacle of today as an example of what I am saying. The Premier will, no doubt, have in his mind valid reasons for the late opening of this year's work in Parliament, relating as it did to the timing of the federal-provincial conference. But here we are on July 23, trying to examine the problems of this province under conditions which, to say the least, are not conducive to orderly and objective procedures.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we could have bumbled along in his absence for a few days. We have done it before and since. In any case it is hard to believe that an arrangement could not have been made to do more of the business of the session at a more seasonable time.

We in the Legislature are not, apparently, the only ones lacking confidence in the Premier's managerial ability. The last provincial election which showed a loss of nine government seats, even in the face of an increase in the total number of seats from 108 to 117, proved a waning of enthusiasm for Ontario Conservative tactics in the management of the province's affairs.

The hon. Premier might take note of the fact that after 25 years or so of Conservative government, the people are registering their disapproval of the machine becoming more powerful than the man or the party. The dispensing of patronage is not a new game, but when it interferes with the economy of an area to the detriment of a community, it should be studied a bit closer.

I am reminded of an occasion when someone decided that the licence-issuing authority in Elliot Lake be removed from the control of the voluntary organization, the chamber of commerce, a very few weeks before October 17 last. Needless to say, a violent exchange took place between the appropriate department, the recipient of the favour who shall remain nameless and the chamber of commerce, a body representing a substantial cross-section of the town. Well, you can imagine who won.

The result, an inferior set of facilities, needless bitterness and financial setback for the voluntary organization and as far as I am concerned, one more mistake like that and Stanley would not even have had to campaign. The government's insistence on taking care of its own, no matter what the cost or who gets hurt, is another speech altogether and I will not beat it to death here; but it is certainly having its reactions.

Irresponsible action on the part of Conservative Cabinet Ministers has, at times, also brought on a situation of chaos in the House. On the occasions of voting or divisions it seems to me that there has been a lack of responsibility on the part of Ministers who demand up to an hour and a half to get to the Legislature from their offices, to take part in a division. We on this side of the House accept it as our responsibility to be here, regardless of all else, and if we are not here when the vote is called, then we say, "Let it show on the record". That is what we call responsible government. There has never been one occasion during this session when I, as Whip, have had to phone anyone to come in for a vote. We have always taken the view, as a caucus, that we vote with the people who are here.

In the light of this let me recall these occasions. First of all, I would ask members to take a look at their Hansards for July 11, 1968, page 5477. The amendment to The Workmen's Compensation Act, moved by the member for Brantford (Mr. Makarchuk), was defeated 47 to 38 and the following dialogue took place:

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman, the "ayes" are 38, the "nays" 47.

Mr. Chairman: I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I do not believe we can let this go by without objecting to the inefficient way the government undertakes votes in this House. It is an inefficient method of taking a vote. Mr. Chairman, the bells have been ringing for 40 minutes on a straightforward, routine committee vote. I have no idea what difficulties you had in assembling your members, but it—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: I am on a point of order and I would like to complete it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: I would like to complete my point of order. Now, Mr. Chairman, during some of the looser comments of a few moments ago—

Mr. Chairman: May I respectfully point out that the point of order raised by the leader of the Opposition was out of order in committee? It cannot be dealt with by this committee—the method of summoning the members for a vote. We are dealing only with this particular bill.

Mr. Nixon: I would say, Mr. Chairman, that surely, as a member of this House, I can express my objections to the inefficient way the House leader is conducting government affairs.

And now let us look at Hansard, page 594, back in the chilly days of March when the hon. member for Grey South (Mr. Winkler) wished to adjourn the debate, and this resulted in a motion being put challenging the ruling of Mr. Speaker. That motion carried, ayes 48, nays 37. But at what cost in time and temper did the government uphold its majority then?

There have been three or four close calls, Madam Speaker, which have demonstrated the inefficiency of the government to marshall its forces for their primary duty in this chamber. It is not our responsibility at all to make it easy for Ministers to get to and from their offices, or to make excuses for the traffic situation. We simply say that, when a vote is imminent, they should be here. Their legislative responsibilities come before their departmental chores. I recall that the hon. Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) once complained that he was not in his place in the House because he was helping draft the basic shelter exemption legislation. In this instance, the government would probably have fared better in the eyes of the people of Ontario if he had stayed in his seat.

Mention of the basic shelter exemption, which has been so aptly referred to as a Social Credit measure, brings me to my next point, which is that the pre-election mood of the government was one of a mask of gaiety. There were promises at every turn. But now the old Conservative pattern has reasserted itself. In this session and the next one, beginning in the fall, I suppose, we shall see the real face of Conservatism, with the mask torn off. Then the gifts will have blown away with the summer wind, and it will be taxes and more taxes. We had the first round of taxes in the Budget, and there will be more to follow. This is what Conservatism really means to the man in the street.

Four long months have passed since the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), brought down his Budget. In the interim we have seen a new beginning to Canadian politics, and a new direction taken by Canadian affairs. As the country has moved into the new age, it is preparing to tackle the problems relating to its future in a totally new way. It is no secret that what are called "total information systems" are to be employed at the federal level to achieve the management purposes of government. It is all the more remarkable, therefore, that the provincial Budget, and the press comment that heralded its delivery on March 12, should be possesssed of a quaint, almost Victorian air.

How the Provincial Treasurer must be regretting the form in which his Budget was couched, in the light of the expression of the will of the people of this province, and of Canada, on June 25. What the results of that day, June 25, portend are still being analyzed as the Gallup poll published in the Toronto Daily Star only last Thursday, shows. For example, among those with low incomes, the Conservatives lost most heavily while the Liberals made substantial gains among the urban workers. But one thing is sure: That the Conservative Party, not only federally but also within this province—has become the country party—a reversal of its historical role. And things have gone even further than that. It looks now as though if there is to be any future for the great and noble Conservative Party, it lies with those who have been alienated from the existing power structure.

But the Budget nevertheless bent a knee in the direction of Bay Street and thumbed its nose at the average person. A quarter century of Tory rule in Ontario erupted like an angry volcano in one further assault on the average man. The Provincial Treasurer made clear, by word and deed, that big business must be left alone in order to preserve what was still conceived of as a "delicate balance" existing between Queen's Park and Bay Street or, as the official phraseology has it,

"the public and private sectors of our economy". Therefore, in order that the gross provincial product might continue to creep up, big business must remain unmolested, while the individual taxpayers' problems would be accelerated by a further $125 per family per year.

True, about $50 of this would be given back to landlords with the stern admonition that they must pass it on in fulfillment of a rather rash election promise. But obviously, few tenants believed that they would, in fact, be the beneficiaries; the ultimate recipients of this money. Or worse, they were frustrated by the realization that what their landlord would give with one hand because he had to, he would immediately take away with the other, because that was his intention all along.

As regards the other impositions in the Budget, I believe they cut so deeply into the individual freedoms of the people of Ontario that this will quite probably be the last Tory government in this province.

I am of the opinion that the days immediately preceding Tuesday, June 25, amounted to a weekend of decision for the voters of Ontario, in that the federal voter had to decide whether his pocketbook would stand the strain of a federal Conservative government in office, with his painful experience of the Ontario Conservative government's taxation programme. Was this what Conservatism across Canada now stood for he asked himself.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Farquhar: Right now we are trying to discuss what happened to the federal Conservative Party in Ontario, and if the hon. Minister has a set of reasons for what happened on that day I would be glad to hear them.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Farquhar: The increased burden of costs on such things as OMSIP premiums, car licence plates, gasoline, cigarettes, fishing licences, provincial park facilities, to mention a few, compelled the Ontario voter to show, by his rejection of a federal Conservative government, his sense of betrayal by the Conservatives in the last provincial election.

Here, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country have spoken more eloquently than I can hope to do. The people of Ontario have indicated quite clearly that they are part of that great new movement away from the pretenses of the past, of which this Budget is an example. This Budget is a double-talk document which sells the people of Ontario short. With revenues of two and a half billion dollars, it still shows a deficit of $252 million or some $700,000 per day. It is a most regressive document, punitive in its effect upon the lower-income groups. Regressive taxes as has been said many times, are those which hit hardest at those who can least afford to pay them. This Budget surely is the king of them all in that regard.

If I could be permitted a few moments, Madam Speaker, to revert from the Budget to the Speech from the Throne, we were told that priorities had been established and were being followed. Among the priority items were the provision of adequate housing at reasonable cost. Without making a housing speech at this point, Madam Speaker, I would say that all that has happened in this area, so far as one can see, has been a concerted cry, "Hands off, Mr. Hellyer," when that hon. gentleman, in the light of inaction here, took certain steps to do something about it. What positive steps have been made in the fulfillment of promises in the areas of urban growth, of mass transportation? Has Barrie any hope of a GO train before the turn of the century if this government stays in office?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The Minister of Mines.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: I would like to point out to the hon. members opposite, that they are certainly not being lady-like at the moment.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Throw him out.

Mr. Farquhar: Where are those "adequate water and sewage facilities", in quotes? What about urban redevelopment? Outdoor recreation was supposed to be of "immediate importance". To what? To the revenue department alone, it seems!

I know that the leader of my party will, immediately this session ends, be embarking upon a vacation tour of provincial parks, and I know that he will, on several occasions, be expressing himself forcefully on this point.

Meanwhile, I should like to cite an example myself of lack of effort. On Manitoulin Island, the largest fresh-water island in the world, a tourist Mecca, with opportunities for the promotion of recreational activity second to none, there has been nothing—until the last few weeks—even beginning to resemble a provincial park programme. For that I point the finger at this government and specifically at The Department of Lands and Forests.

The arteries—the highways—across this section of Ontario, in 1968, are still gravel; still deplorable. Is this what we mean when we speak of the "immediate importance" of outdoor recreation?

What about "excellence in the provision of services for the health and human betterment of all residents of the province," to quote once more from the Speech from the Throne. Do hon. members remember the phrase "trust us" which fell from the lips of the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) and from some of his colleagues also? "Trust us!" If we had trusted less, perhaps the Collingwood affair would not have happened.

What about property owners who trusted the government to honour its commitment on expropriation procedures? Let me read this section of the speech:

> The report of the Ontario law reform commission on the basis for compensation in expropriation has been given detailed consideration by my government. Legislation will be placed before you to ensure that owners of property which must be acquired in the public interest will be dealt with fairly and will receive compensation on a reasonable and equitable basis.

Yet here we are at the end of the session, and nothing has been done. The excuse, of course, is that in the meantime the McRuer report has come along and that, presumably, this will open up the whole subject afresh. But surely this is no excuse for having failed to bring in an interim measure. We can always improve on an Act or replace it with a better one. Any Act is better than none if the complexities of the civil liberties ramifications are such that the perfect Act cannot come in right away.

Those of us who know people who are dependent on drugs are far from convinced that the Minister of Health's plan to bring down drug prices has had any effect at all. So there was another Speech from the Throne promise that was just so much window dressing. Drugs are still as expensive as ever, and the government knows it. But now they are entrenched until the next election, and we cannot expect them to take any action at all on this urgent matter until election time is much closer. They will act when they have to.

People must be having a jolly good laugh at the line "programmes will be accelerated to improve the purity of the air we breathe and the water we drink".

This is because the government has clearly been unable to work out a means of progressive cleansing of the environment without bankrupting industry, so that people all over the province are still surrounded by smog, or sulphur dioxide; by exhaust fumes or fly ash; by polluted water unfit to swim in and unsafe to drink; and by all kinds of combinations of these nuisances.

We in the Liberal party realize that, as a matter of urgency, the correct balance must be found, area by area, between coercion of industry to act expeditiously and the anticipated effect on the local economy of each costly control step in this enormous environmental cleanup process, which we can no longer delay. I am of the firm opinion that in many cases industry has not even been approached with any degree of resolution on the part of the government. I am sure that co-operation will be forthcoming in the great majority of cases, provided that leadership is shown.

However, The Robarts adminstration stumbles on, while the province wallows in its waste.

And now listen to this famous promise:

"My government will embark on vigorous programmes to further maintain adequate levels of food produced by Ontario's agricultural industry." How the sugar beet farmers will applaud that statement! There is an industry that this government has done to death. And then they expect people to believe in these promises from the Speech from the Throne.

How about this one?

> My government proposes to establish an Ontario roads-to-resources programme to further promote the development and use of the abundant natural wealth of our province. This programme will include the planning and development of transportation systems to and from the main arterial routes. These will be based on the resources of forestry, mining, fish and wildlife, tourism and the requirements of the residents of northern Ontario.

Well, there's a whole programme that never happened! The north is worse off than ever before, neglected and forgotten, except at election times; ignored by Ministers whose windows face southward toward Bay Street. The northern people are second-class citizens in Ontario. They are treated as such by the Robarts government, which takes out their life blood, raw materials, yet will not take industry to them or nourish them in any way with forward-looking programmes and decent infusions of capital, incentives and guarantees.

In contrast, the Liberal plan for the north

—a northern development fund with a guaranteed "floor" interest rate and a built-in bonus factor or risk element, would allow the people of Ontario to invest in their own resources, and would open up the north in a way that can only be imagined by the most far-sighted. We have the answer for the north and, once again, the results of the federal election in northern Ontario has shown that the people are just itching for the provincial Liberal programme to be put into effect. They have had their taste of the Robarts plan, and the taste is bitter. They have had enough.

It could even be said that this government's entrance into public support of the recent federal election campaign may have had a disastrous effect on the federal government's chances in northern Ontario. In fact, the prevalent opinion in the north, as I hear it and understand it, is that one Conservative administration in Ontario is one too many.

Now we had great hopes that the one Cabinet Minister who hails from the north —the Minister of Lands and Forests (Mr. Brunelle)—a man whom we all still believe understands the north in a way that his fellow-Ministers can never hope to do—that this man would understand also what policies the north needs, and would be able to put these ideas across in this Cabinet.

But now we begin to be somewhat alarmed as we begin to see his attention drawn southward by the many items that call for his decision there. This involvement in ancillary responsibility has really left no Minister free to project the aims and ambitions of the north full time—yet a full-time mission this must be! However, we are fortunate on this side of the House in having a new representative for Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid), whose recent critique of the Department of Lands and Forests was, I suggest, a model of constructive opposition at work. In this, the member for Rainy River was strongly supported by another new member for the Lakehead, the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Knight).

The member for Port Arthur pinpointed the essentially local weaknesses in policy when dealing with The Department of Mines in his role as critic of that department. However, may I say that the best thing that has happened to The Department of Mines for a long, long time is the appointment of the recent Minister. It is like a breath of fresh air to have a person with his individual thinking ability at the head of this very important department. It remains to be seen how well he is able to withstand the pressures that develop. But, at the moment, I'll have to say that I'm quite happy with him.

It would be both tedious and unfair for me to work my way through the Liberal benches, pointing out the opportunities that have come the way of each member to make some hole in the government's defences, which is our job, but all have done so with effect. I would, however, like to single out the remarkable contributions throughout the session by the new members for Sarnia (Mr. Bullbrook), for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), and for York Centre (Mr. Deacon). The member for York Centre has zeroed in unerringly on the complex financial scene, which baffles so many of us, and has shown the faults of government policy in activities coming under the jurisdiction of the Ontario securities commission, in the insurance field, and so on. He has been ably backed in the consumers affairs field by the member for Kitchener, who was also the Opposition Treasury critic.

And certainly, the remarkable quality of the Attorney General's (Mr. Wishart), estimates debate depended on three salient factors—the timeliness of the events and practices that were coming under scrutiny, the keen new mind which led the formidable phalanx of Liberal lawyers into the attack, and the unfailing courtesy of the Attorney General himself in handling the occasion as the gentleman he is.

It is at this point that I feel impelled to pay tribute to my leader, the leader of the Opposition and of the Liberal Party in Ontario, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Nixon), who has again proven his outstanding ability to take in the significance of a situation while most of us are still listening to the actual words of a statement.

This ability to think on his feet, and to react immediately and raise the appropriate point that the Minister has tried to conceal, is a measure of his effectiveness in the role he now fills, and the promise of his capacity in the role that he will undoubtedly fill after the next provincial election.

His persistent advocacy of the select and standing committee system has been followed by the belated recognition by the government that this is indeed a more efficient way to conduct the affairs of the province. There are those who see Parliament as a show, and aim every adjective in the direction of the press gallery. The Liberal leader is not among those who would demean the dignity of this House for the sake of a headline. He has too high a respect for parliamentary tradition, and too great an example from his own family history, to allow himself ever to lower his standards by one iota.

When the time comes, as it surely will, for him to form the second Nixon ministry in Ontario, we know he will lead the Cabinet with the same skill and mastery that he has displayed in caucus; that he will lead the government of Ontario with sound business sense; and that he will restore efficiency and dignity to this chamber, and have his Ministers where they should be, in their seats in this House, and not engaged in other business somewhere across the city.

I am impressed by my leader's ability to express himself in a coherent, positive and responsible way—no hysteria; no semantics. His is a personality that expects and demands loyalty. He has the ability to show the way and the Liberal caucus is as one in recognizing his individual dedication to policies intended for the betterment of the lot of the people of Ontario.

It is no wonder, then, under such leadership, the party goes forward, and that the people of Ontario are beginning to recognize that there is a provincial party that is now ready and prepared to meet the challenge of power and to replace the tired, faded image of an old and entrenched party.

It was on the evening of March 25 that the leader of the Opposition seconded by the hon. member for Downsview, moved the amendment to the motion "that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means", in these terms:

This House regrets:

1. The government's dependence on regressive tax and revenue increases which impose harsh new burdens on lower and middle income citizens and employers, particularly in the financing of health services;

2. The paltry commitment in dollars and initiative towards alleviating the worsening housing difficulties;

3. The lack of initiative in maintaining the Ontario sugar beet industry which will add new financial hardships to the agricultural economy;

4. The absence of a wage price review board that should be operating in areas of provincial jurisdiction to assist in easing the cost of living and to act against inflation;

5. The lack of an overall reform of the grant policy to assist municipalities in reducing local taxes, particularly as they are related to school costs;

6. That no effective programme for the industrial and economic growth of northern Ontario has been proposed which would channel private and public funds into the development of our natural resource areas.

And now, four months later, if members on all sides of the House will search their consciences in the next hour or so, while the hon. Premier is speaking, I am sure that they will find it necessary to support the amendment to a man.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could start these remarks where the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin (Mr. Farquhar) ended—in joining with him on a personal basis, in the praise that he has paid to my good friend, the member for Brant (Mr. Nixon); and to state that we do look for his continued leadership in all levels of government as he maintains his present role. No doubt, after 1971, he will have his reward in that upper chamber at another place where all loyal supporters of that party will have their ultimate resting place.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that at this particular time one cannot help but share in the sympathy which one should feel as one listened to the tone of the speech of the hon. member for Algoma-Manitoulin. I talk about the content and not the speaker, for whom I have a very high regard.

Never, never have I heard a more negative, a more disparaging, and a more unrealistic approach to what is going on in Ontario. How can anyone who has been around and witnessing what is going—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Welch: —how can anyone who has been around and witnessing what has been going on in this province in the last two decades, following the tremendous emphasis in our Centennial year, stand up, in the light of the facts and attempt to fool the people of the province into believing that all the progress and tangible evidence of social conscience, and all of the other matters which have been developed for the people of this province by this government and its predecessors in office, have not, in fact, been going on.

It would seem to me that the Opposition parties in this province would be wise if they would recognize what, in fact, has been going on. If, instead of sitting on the banks and watching the tide of progress go by them, they got in and took some of the credit and shared in the fact that they have been in this Legislature and that they and their predecessors joined in formulating these policies for the benefit of the people of Ontario.

I see evidence today that the people of this province have had enough negativism. They are looking for positivism in the people who assume positions of public responsibility. I have never heard anything like the moaning and groaning in the face of the facts of progress under the dynamic leadership of the government and its predecessors, who have been in office in the last two decades. It is disgraceful.

I do not know why the leader of the Opposition has been talking about fishing. He has not been too lucky in his catches up to now, I can tell you that.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the members of the House in what I consider to be a concensus—of a welcome to the end of this lengthy and taxing and, I think we all agree, exceptionally productive first session of the 28th Parliament of Ontario. While in terms of days of sitting this is not the longest session in the history of the Legislature, it has surpassed any previous session in terms of the numbers of hours in which we have been in the chamber looking after the business of the people of Ontario.

Shortly — and I trust very shortly — the Lieutenant-Governor will enter the chamber to participate in the prorogation ceremonies. This will, in fact, be his first official visit to the Legislature since his appointment. We in the House have already welcomed the appointment of the Hon. W. Ross Macdonald as the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario. I would want to do so again in the chamber this afternoon, and join all members of the House in extending our warm good wishes for his continued good strength and health as he discharges his various responsibilities in the office.

I should also like to join with all members of the House in paying tribute to the Hon. W. Earl Rowe, who served so ably as the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario from May, 1963, to his retirement earlier this month. I know that I express the thoughts of all of us here when I commend Mr. Rowe on the outstanding conduct of his office, especially during the extremely busy Centennial year. We wish him many years of health and contentment in his retirement.

May I also take this opportunity to extend congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on your excellent conduct of the business of the House in a busy and onerous session. I should also like to single out for particular words of appreciation, with the other members, for the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Reuter), who has enhanced the respect that all members held for him by his fairness and impartiality as chairman of the committee of the whole House.

Earlier this session many of us extended a warm welcome to the hon. members who were sitting in the House for the first time. I hope that each has found that service to his constituents through the conduct of the business of the House has been satisfying and rewarding. Those who were new members when the session began in February are now obviously well-seasoned veterans. Now, as the first session draws to a close, I hope that you have developed a feeling of familiarity with our customs and habits of purpose and accomplishment, and a feeling of understanding, and appreciation, and respect for the Legislature and its traditions and dignity. We trust that all will have a pleasant and safe summer.

Just by way of facts and figures on this session, as I said, this is not the longest session in terms of days of sitting. During the fourth session of the last Parliament in 1966, the House was in session for 110 day sittings and 60 night sittings. As of last night, we had sat, during this session, for 101 days and 55 nights.

However, this session has now exceeded the session of 1966 in the number of hours in which members have been in the House. As of adjournment last night, the House had met 560 hours, compared with 544 hours during the 1966 session. It is interesting to note, in passing, that about 48 per cent of the time was spent in the consideration of the estimates of the departments of government.

I should also point out something about the question period. Since the beginning of the session, more than 1,000 questions have been asked of the Ministers, up to and including yesterday. We can see in the question period, evidence of the competition between the two other parties for the role as to who is really the official Opposition here.

I am pleased to announce as we get ready for the prorogation, that there are certain winners in the prize day. The Liberals asked 512 questions, but the real winner in the question period is the New Democratic Party, with 534 of the questions.

I made some reference to the fact that, I suppose, at the end of every session, there should be some prize giving. I only regret that the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) is not in his seat, because I have a prize for him.

We had a little study made with respect to the question period and, lo and behold, the winner of the newspaper clipping award of the year is the hon. member for Grey-Bruce, who asked 14 per cent of the questions. I will send over to his leader the award for this, which is a pair of scissors and a marking pencil. You will note that the prize is tied in blue ribbon because, in checking throughout the entire government, I could not find any red tape.

I trust that that will be turned over to the very likeable member for Grey-Bruce, in the hope that he will realize that he has won top honours.

While this is one of the longest sessions of the Legislature in the history of Ontario, it should not be mentioned so much in terms of days or hours; rather it should be weighed in terms of its legislative achievements. Very few sessions have dealt with such momentous and far-reaching matters. The hon. members can well take justifiable pride—and I say all members of the House—in having participated in the process which will ensure the continued progress of our dynamic province.

Since I have been using some facts, perhaps I should mention that the hon. members have had placed before them, for consideration, some 150 public bills, which either have proceeded or will proceed, to Royal assent. Several, including The Business Corporations Act, 1968, and The Business Corporations Information Act, 1968, and The Provincial Auctioneers Act, were not proceeded with.

In all, this House has considered and approved almost 200 public and private bills. The beneficial effect of this legislation already is being felt throughout this province of ours.

Although the session is now drawing to a close, the hon. members and the government have before them a very heavy schedule for the summer and early fall. During September, as we know, it is anticipated that a large number of members will participate in the members' tour of northwestern Ontario, which should be exceedingly productive.

As indicated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts), consideration is being given to a possible session of the Legislature during the autumn months. There are several important matters which would justify calling the Legislature into session. As you are aware, the select committee conducting an examination of the recommendations of the Ontario committee on taxation is currently hearing representations based upon these recommendations and the committee has been asked to report back to government by September 17. It may well be possible to present to a fall session the views of the government on the future rationalization of the taxation system used in the province.

At this session, we might also be in a position to consider The Business Corporations Act and expropriation procedures.

Many hon. members will also be occupied, following this session, with the work of the select committees, the membership of which has been announced in the House—the one on corporations law and the other on election law.

Of course, the government, will also be occupied in the months ahead in a series of important federal-provincial and interprovincial conferences related to constitutional reform, fiscal matters and other important considerations. These conferences, Mr. Speaker, will begin on August 1 when the provincial Premiers will hold their annual meeting, this year, as the guests of the Premier and the people of Saskatchewan.

I think at this time, Mr. Speaker, there are one or two matters, indeed matters of concern to the government, which it is anticipated will be the subject of these inter-governmental discussions in the weeks and months ahead. And perhaps it would be well in a summary way to list these matters for the interest of the House.

As we all know, on July 1 of this year, the federal Medicare programme went into effect with only two provinces in Canada participating. As the hon. members are aware, this province is not yet participating and has indicated its reluctance to participate in the programme as presently defined. The attitude of the government was announced by the Prime Minister on January 24 of this year and has been reiterated in the House by my colleague the hon. Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), on June 18.

It is extremely unfortunate—and I underline that, Mr. Speaker—that the federal government, at least to the present time, has adopted an inflexible attitude towards the priorities and the requirements of the provinces in this federal Canada of ours.

Medicare is a case in point, where little attention has been given to either the experience of the various provinces which now have medical services insurance or the degree of coverage now enjoyed by the people of the provinces. This attitude has been compounded by the rejection of request by the provinces for clarification of the federal government's Medical Care Act.

Our view, the view of this government, that the implementation of a national Medicare plan at this time should have been further delayed, of course, was rejected. I submit to the House that the necessity of further consultations and a re-assessment by the federal government of the inflexible position which has been adopted, retains it urgency today.

After all, Mr. Speaker, when eight of the ten provinces decline to enter a programme because of an inability to participate, it is time to re-assess the programme. Surely the Prime Minister of Canada should now call a conference at which these matters can be discussed and the Medicare programme re-assessed. Only by sitting down together and resolving the difficulties which surround the present plan can we hope to get this spirit of consultation. This has been the message which has been going from this government to the senior government; consultation so that we can discuss the present plan. Then, in this way, we can obtain the most comprehensive programme of medical care that can be devised, at a cost—and we are cost-conscious—that can adequately be borne and which will meet the specific requirements of the residents of this province and of Canada.

In the meantime, we in this province have been doing something about it. And we did it a year or two ago while we were waiting for some other level of government to initiate its programme. Let us not lose sight of the fact that we have been looking after our people in the interim.

I want to talk about matters of interest to us on constitutional matters and a review of matters dealing with constitutional development; I am reminded of many important developments. A highlight, Mr. Speaker, was the historic Confederation of tomorrow conference called by the Prime Minister of Ontario last November and convened with the concurrence of this Legislature.

Indeed, I am sure, it would be appropriate to say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the stature of Ontario's Prime Minister as a great national figure was tremendously enhanced by his leadership in calling and conducting that meeting here in Toronto. There is absolutely no question that the Prime Minister of Ontario has won a special place throughout all of Canada—a man right up there with John A. Macdonald and George Brown and others who made Confederation work in the first place, a man who is determined to make sure that Confederation continues to work and meet the needs of this new century.

There can be little doubt of the respect that our leader holds throughout this country. It was my pleasure, not too long ago, Mr. Speaker, to be in Quebec and to be in Quebec City, to sit in the Legislature of that province, in the Speaker's gallery, and to listen to the leaders of both political parties heap praise upon the leadership and the concern of the leader of this government regardless of any partisan approach. They joined together in paying tribute to the Prime Minister and his appreciation of the consultation and the partnership which must exist between these two great bounding provinces. It was a tremendous opportunity to sit and to listen to the tribute from both Premier Johnson and the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Lesage.

Indeed, I think that if one were to make reference to this now-famous article which appeared in the weekend magazine of the Globe and Mail, one could see there that the author of the article has caught something of the national vision of this great man. He quotes from a speech given by the Prime Minister in Quebec City, when he used words such as this about the partnership: "The partnership which must be there in fact and in spirit and in purpose." Listen to these words coming from the leader of this government:

> I am certain that the two great peoples who established our Confederation are ready to make a greater effort to make it work and to succeed. Let us do everything to unite and let us do nothing to divide.

That was in Quebec City and then, in Hamilton, speaking in terms of the approach which must be made by men of goodwill where partisanship is in fact laid aside as we seek the road upon which this great country of ours should continue to journey in the name of opportunity for all of our people, the Prime Minister said:

> I have never felt that there was any contradiction between speaking up for Ontario and taking a clear stand for Canada. The two go together. That is why I have consistently made it clear to the leader of the federal government that he could always count on our wholehearted co-operation in all efforts designed to strengthen the national economy. I renew that pledge tonight and I repeat that so long as I am the Prime Minister of Ontario, political partisanship and party advantage will not be permitted to impede the progress of Canada.

That is the spirit with which this government approaches the whole question of constitutional matters.

There can be little doubt that the Confederation of tomorrow conference was instrumental in helping Canadians launch the current examination of the future of Canadian federalism. The Confederation of tomorrow conference and the subsequent conference of Prime Minister and Premiers in February resulted in the establishment, as we all know, of continuing committees, which are now preparing the way for further meetings of Prime Ministers and Premiers. While there has been no indication when these further meetings will be held, it has been suggested that another conference would be called before the end of the current year.

This government and this party stand united behind our Prime Minister.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I am awfully glad the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) has raised that question, because if there is anything which—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Welch: The point I would like to make is that there is one thing that stands quite clear: The Progressive Conservative Party of Ontario is united in its determination to work for Canada and the unity which we all seek. We have seen no displays of this unity across the floor of this House for some time.

Surely it must be obvious to the member for York South—very obvious—that this government is committed and dedicated to a stronger and more united Canada.

In the months, of course, since the Confederation of tomorrow conference, and the Ottawa constitutional conference we have accomplished a great deal in preparation for the future conference of the Prime Ministers and the Premiers. A number of basic points have evolved which may well form the basis of our future negotiations. In this regard, the government would like to place before the House certain particular points, which would illustrate this matter.

First, The British North America Act is not untouchable. It can well be examined in order to determine whether it should be amended or rewritten to serve Canada and its people to better advantage in its second century.

Two. It is all very well to discuss changes in The British North America Act, and indeed even to decide on changes. However, until we find a method of amending The BNA Act—which is satisfactory and acceptable to all provinces and to the federal government—it is only an exercise in theoretics to consider specific changes. Reaching agreement on a method of amendment requires a high priority.

Three. We believe that it will be of continuing advantage to the people of Canada to remain a federal state. It is interesting to note under this point, Mr. Chairman, that today, this very day, marks the anniversary of the signing of The Act of Union of 1841. If we need any illustration through history—and the lessons of history of how not to approach the problems of Canada, there was a pretty good statutory example, I refer to The Act of Union because of its failure. Its failure to recognize the need for harmonious integration. The attempt in that Act to impose in some statutory way the melting pot theory. Indeed it is appropriate that we would have this historical reference to realize that what we seek is a unity in our diversity working within the framework of the federal state.

Four. Our constitution should remain flexible enough to be adapted periodically to fundamental social change.

Five. In our approach to matters of the constitution, each level of government must respect the constitutional jurisdiction of the other. I come from an area which is steeped in history, the great county of Lincoln where the first government which is a predecessor to the present government met 75 years before the government of Canada was organized. And in this particular regard we keep in mind that each government has certain responsibilities assigned to it—nothing particularly now that we should not be prepared to meet in the spirit of co-operation and to arrive at those solutions which will be consistent with meeting the problems of the modern times.

Six. The province should have either separately or together a variety of relationships with the federal government. We include in this list as our seventh point that the federal and provincial government must have sufficient sources of revenue to enable them to discharge their responsibilities under the constitution.

We say here, too, as our eighth point, that Canada should be a bi-lingual multi-cultural state.

We say as well that all governments in Canada should provide wherever practicable bi-lingual public services; and that Canadians should be able to have their children educated wherever feasible, in either of the official languages.

In that spirit and with these general guidelines we continue to indicate our interest in working with all the governments of Canada to work out these solutions for the future needs of this country.

Reference in this debate should also be made to matters of fiscal relationships. As fundamental to the future stability of Canada as the working out of a satisfactory constitutional approach to Canadian federalism is the requirement to rationalize the entire field of public finance.

The Prime Minister and the hon. Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) have discussed at length on many occasions, in inter-governmental conferences and in this House the urgent requirements of providing adequate financial resources to those levels of government which have specific responsibilities for the rapidly growing demands for spending.

One of the distinctive characteristics of the changes going on in Canada within recent years has to do with the migration of population to urban areas from our farms and from our small communities and the accompanying urban growth. This is not unique, of course, to Ontario. All of the provinces of Canada have felt the pressures of the population explosion and this shift to the urban areas. All the provinces are facing constantly and rapidly growing requirements for spending under their constitutional responsibilities.

I pay tribute to the Minister of Trade and Development (Mr. Randall) under whom the Ontario housing corporation works. While other people are talking about housing for our people, this government, through its commission, has been doing something. Of course, these are not new—the government of Ontario has been wrestling with these changes for several decades. We have got $400 million in the works for housing now. We are spending over 90 per cent of the federal funds available for housing in all of Canada because of the leadership of Ontario in the housing field.

All levels of government are of course involved, municipal, provincial and federal. The Provincial Treasurer spoke about this matter just last week. His comments are not a matter of expressing opposition—and I say this to the member for Algoma-Manitoulin, I would want him to hear this before he went back to his people—this was not a matter of expressing opposition to a federal initiative in an area in which the provinces happen to have responsibility at the moment. This is a matter of ensuring that through co-operation and co-ordination we avoid duplication of effort, and expenditures. As your federal leader says, there is only one source for all the public money needs, and that is from the taxpayers. Why should not the Provincial Treasurer, being the responsible man he is, ensure that there is this co-ordination to avoid such duplication in the interests of the people of Ontario? If you are not interested in the people of Ontario, we sure are, and that is why we are here.

It is obvious that the financial needs of the province and the municipalities are enormous. Now to the extent that the federal government participates in providing a measure of relief from these burdens, the pressure on the provincial government and the municipalities will be lessened. It would be preferable, quite preferable, to have federal contributions co-ordinated by the province in the context of provincial-municipal planning.

However, the solution of the problems is far more important than a debate about constitutional niceties. There is an immense job to be done and I am sure we all would agree. On the other hand—and I think this is a very important consideration—let us never lose sight of this—we do not want to find ourselves in the position whereby the activities of the federal government result in the government of Ontario being involved in further financial commitments. We have in the past had the experience—and I might say in some cases bitter experience—of enduring commitments made without adequate recognition by the federal government of the financial difficulties they were going to impose on the provinces.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Charlotte Whitton says that is what the provinces do to the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Now you see, the member for York South knows it is not just a matter of reallocating tax fields or tax revenues to the provincial governments from the federal government. We are faced with a situation whereby because of population changes, urban development and escalation in the costs of existing government programmes, a gap is rapidly widening between revenues on the one hand and expenditures on the other for existing provincial programmes without introducing new initiatives.

As an example, I point out to the members of the House the rapidly expanding requirements for education resulting from the increase in the number of young people now going through the school system and remaining longer in the school system.

In pointing this out I am sure we are all aware that it is easy for some to say that a large wealthy province such as Ontario will —or ought to—be able to look after itself. But may I say as a member of this House that for Ontario to make this case is to make not a parochial point but a national case. We have to recognize that requirements such as education and housing and urban development, to which reference has already been made, are national requirements, in the sense that they exist within all of our provinces, but each is within provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, when we talk about the needs of the government of Ontario for expenditures in these areas, would you not agree that what we are really talking about are national needs because the economic wealth and the production of Canada depend in a large measure on Ontario?

We are a very responsible partner in Confederation, we recognize this; and do not lose sight of this—Ontario wealth depends, in large measure, on our capacity to deal with these requirements. We would be less than responsible if we did not recognize this.

For this reason, would you not agree that the issue has to be taken out of the narrow context of federal-provincial relations and placed, Mr. Speaker, in a broader context of good economic and financial management; and of tax sharing, so that we can ensure the strong economic future of Canada? In a governmental sense, Canada is made up of all its governments and, therefore, we should not adopt the attitude that a transfer from one government to another in any way weakens the country.

What we have to be concerned with is ensuring that sufficient revenues are available to meet our national needs, regardless of which government has the jurisdiction; and avoiding, I hope, all these jurisdictional disputes which hold up much needed programmes. This should be, indeed, must be, the essence of federal-provincial discussions this particular autumn. The government recognizes that our federal-provincial policy, our financial management and our economic policy are closely interrelated.

Now, there has been talk from the Opposition benches that discussions on federal-provincial fiscal matters may be delayed beyond this autumn, and that the federal government may seek to extend the current tax-sharing arrangements. But I would like to assure this House that the government of Ontario, as our leader has already said on many occasions, is prepared and ready to sit down and discuss fiscal matters with the federal government at any time. Indeed, I am sure that all would agree that it is imperative that we lose no time in resolving the fiscal difficulties in which the provinces and our municipalities find themselves.

The government departments involved in taxation matters, grants to municipalities and in the analysis of the Smith and the Carter reports—to which reference has been made today as well—have been at work for some time. A composite attack on our taxation problems in Ontario is being taken. We have to proceed at once on both fronts—federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements and the rationalization of our system of taxation.

So as you can see, Mr. Speaker, the weeks and the months ahead will not be without activity of very immense importance to the people of Ontario, and to Canada.

Some reference in these remarks, I think, should be made to the significance of the year 1968 as it relates to matters of human relations and human rights. The hon. members will recall that the Speech from the Throne did draw to our attention that 1968 has been designated by the United Nations general assembly as an international year for human rights; and throughout this year, the member countries of the United Nations are reviewing the efforts and the achievements of the last two decades in the field of human freedom. Nineteen sixty-eight was chosen quite purposely for this intensive observance because this is the 20th anniversary of the adoption and the proclamation of the universal declaration of human rights. Canada, of course, is among the many nations which have ratified this historic charter. And I know too, and I say this again to illustrate the point, that all members of the House should share in the accomplishments of the House. I am sure it is a measure of pride for all of us in this House that 24 years ago, four years before the adoption of the universal declaration of human rights, Ontario took the first substantial steps in establishing the principle that human rights are indivisible. In the intervening years, we have adopted a number of statutes which now constitute the Ontario human rights code. This code and the human rights commission, have been widely praised for perception and fearless application, and have been the inspiration to others working in the field of human rights.

This province also has undertaken studies into the wider field of civil liberties. During this session we received the first report of the Royal commission under the former chief justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario, the Hon. James C. McRuer, and this report is one of the most important documents of its kind ever produced. During this year it is appropriate that we refer to the reminder of the chairman of the Ontario human rights commission, Dr. Louis Fine. He used these words:

> International human rights year for us must be an occasion for individual and collective self-examination, in order to make sure that we are in fact applying the principles of the universal declaration and our own human rights code in all areas of our community's life.

Of course, we would be the first to agree—I am sure each member of this House would be the first to agree—that notwithstanding the tremendous example of legislation in this field, the great leadership comes from personal example. You can pass laws on this particular matter but it has to permeate into the hearts of men and women. I am sure that is what the author of that music in South Pacific meant when he put these particular words in a song—

> You have got to be tough from year to year, you have got to be tough before it is too late, to hate all the people your relatives hate.

And how important it is, because although we can pass laws, although we can set standards legislatively, to be emulated throughout the world, it is really in the attitude of men and women where we find the greatest example. Indeed, a judge, who not too long ago was sentencing two young men for some particular offence under the Acts said this:

> We can pass our laws, but until such time as I have before me some overt behaviour, the courts cannot deal with it. The courts cannot get into the minds and into the hearts of men.

And so we continue, through legislation, and, I hope, through personal example, to clothe these great principles in some practical way, and we strive ever to emulate the highest ideals in our relationships with our fellow men. It is imperative that each of us in this House continues to strive for the highest levels of improvement in the field of human rights and freedom.

The exhaustive study and recommendations contained in the first report of the inquiry into civil rights provides an excellent opportunity to enter into this individual and collective self-examination. It has been adopted by the government of Ontario, as the yardstick against which all legislation and programmes are being measured.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is significant, and I have made reference to the silver jubilee article which appeared in last week's Globe and Mail magazine section. It is with some pride that we review the accomplishments of this administration and its preceding administrations dating back to 1943. It is particularly significant of the continual rejuvenation of this party that over this period of time, this leadership, in an evolutionary way, is changed. New people have come to take the positions of those who served with such distinction in the past.

I was reminded of this in a very personal way when this party took power in 1943. Many of us were just beginning our work in the secondary schools of this province, and here, many of us now have an opportunity to serve the people of our province in the activities of this particular party; a tremendous example of the evolutionary and progressive nature of the philosophy of this party.

Indeed, I would like to use an example. Because I have not had the opportunity to reply to a debate of about a week ago in connection with the liquor policy of the province, to underline this evolutionary process, simply by using it as an example.

The evolutionary process, each step building from the solid foundation of what has gone on before, has been a fundamental part of government throughout the history of the province of Ontario under the leadership of this party. All change is not necessarily progress. I hope that we would agree that it is progress when it involves improvement and, at the same time, carries with it continuity. This is the philosophy of this party as we approach all of the problems which come before us.

The liquor laws of the province—to make some reference in reply to the very stimulating debate of a week ago, a very helpful debate, are good examples of this.

Over the years, changing requirements and customs—and I want to underline this—the changing requirements and customs of the people of Ontario, have resulted in many changes in the statutes and regulations affecting liquor control, its sale and licensing. Committees were established since right after World War II, and there has been a continual review.

I would be the first to agree that the government must continue its review on matters of personal behaviour, on matters of social custom related to this particular subject. It is important that the government be continually reviewing the regulations and the statutes and rules to make sure that they are relevant; to make sure that they are, in fact, consistent with the practices. It helps us very little to have people waving their arms around in this House and suggesting this and that and picking out little examples, which by the way, do nothing but illustrate the fact that they do not know anything about changes which already have taken place in the liquor regulations.

What we are looking for in debates, such as the one last Monday, and in the continual review which should be given, are constructive suggestions.

I am prepared to advise the members of the House that notwithstanding all of the study and all of the consideration that has been given in the past, we will immediately, following the prorogation of this session, set up the necessary committees to review once again, to make sure that the laws and regulations and the practices are, in fact, consistent with the social customs of our people. We are launching immediately a review of all of the liquor laws of this province. I would hope that all members who are listening now would take this as an invitation to submit their suggestions and their recommendations so that we might have the benefit of their advice on this particular matter.

In the fields that fall within the jurisdiction of the liquor control board, reference was made a week ago Monday to the whole question of merchandising. I might point out to the members of the House at this stage, that the liquor control board now has been asked, and is presently planning, to develop three self-service stores in the Metropolitan Toronto area by way of experimenting in some changes in merchandising to see whether it is more consistent with the buying habits of our people.

We have a great responsibility in this matter. Perhaps, if I might be permitted a personal comment, we have reached the time when we should place the responsibility exactly where it belongs, on the people who are taking part in these particular activities and who are licenced to do so, which call into review the social customs of our people.

If I might interrupt myself, I was delighted with the responsible tone of some speakers a week ago when they expressed their concern as far as our young people were concerned. I can assure you that as far as this person is concerned, I have got a great deal of confidence. You talk about lowering the drinking age. I have got more confidence in the approach of young people to drink today than I have in some people who are 61. I feel that we have among us, a group of young people who have a great sense of social responsibility, who in fact are quite willing to recognize inconsistencies in a negative approach of "thou shalt not". I think perhaps the time has come when we should take a brand new look at the whole approach as government has itself evolved in this area of personal behaviour and social customs. I can assure the members of the House, by way of commenting on that debate, that insofar as the liquor policy of Ontario is concerned it is about to undergo another very thorough review. I repeat that I would hope that all members of this House would share with this Minister and the committee their views on this subject.

Well, the time for conclusion should, by now, have arrived and indicative of the changes, in concluding the Budget debate for the government, I think it is very well to remind the House of the impressive strides forward by the people of Ontario. Notwithstanding the moaning and the groaning and the tears that roll down the faces of the Opposition speakers, the economy of this province is in good order and our productive capacity is continually improving and we can look forward with confidence to the months and years ahead because the Progressive Conservative administration is in charge of the ship at sea.

I make no apology for that particular remark and I can—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Well, I made some comment the last time I made a speech like this, about the elimination of certain people and I certainly did not turn out to be a very good election predictor so I will not make any comments about 1971. I have not thought of anything that will rhyme with 1971 and 20, so if we can get that together, we will do so. Time alone will tell.

In view of the anniversary which we in the Progressive Conservative Party will observe in August of this year, the completion of a quarter of a century of continuous service to the people of Ontario, perhaps I may be permitted—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That is not saying very much for the good judgment of the people.

Surely the hon. member has more respect for the people's judgment.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): The people are showing better judgment every year.

Hon. Mr. Welch: That is why the hon. member is where he is and why we are here, because we have a certain respect for the democratic process. This is the party of freedom and enterprise opposed to—perhaps—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Name it and we are for it.

Perhaps I may be permitted to suggest that the soundness of the province is the product of the policies of the Progressive Conservative government. We who are members of the Progressive Conservative Party take a great deal of pride in the confidence which the people of Ontario have expressed in our policies and, accepting that trust we do so with humility and with a determination that this—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I am not surprised that the hon. members of the Opposition would laugh at the word "humility", because I have seen no signs of that over there at all.

As we approach this silver anniversary, a significant milestone in the continued development of Ontario, I am reminded of the dramatic changes which have taken place in the time since August 1943, when the Hon. George Drew was chosen by the people of Ontario to form the government. I remind the member for Algoma-Manitoulin—and it is too bad that he had not spoken to me before he wrote the speech—I am reminded too, of the many great Canadians who have been members of the executive council and the Legislature in the 25 years since that election. I think particularly of such men as Mr. Drew, and Thomas Kennedy, and Leslie Frost, and not to overlook our own great, dynamic leader, that great Canadian, the present Prime Minister of Ontario.

I think also of the men who formed other Conservative governments and guided the destinies of this province for a total of 50 years of this century. I should like to illustrate the fact that there are some with us who can, from their own point of view, recall this quarter-century of service to the people of Ontario. There are only two in the House and the press gallery who have been here consistently during the last quarter-century.

There is the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Downer), first elected to this House in 1937. He has the enviable record of being re-elected eight times. He was Speaker in the House from September, 1955 to May, 1959, and I might say that he is the only member of the government who has ever sat in the Opposition.

Then, turning to the press gallery, may I pay a special order of tribute to Mr. Don O'Hearn. Mr. O'Hearn came here from Halifax having served six years as a newspaperman in Montreal and covered the 1943 election for Saturday Night and then the first session of the new Legislature. He has twice been president of the press gallery, and now covers Queen's Park for the Thomson papers, the Windsor Star, and for the past ten years for the Hamilton television station. His father was Attorney General for Nova Scotia in the '20s, his younger brother Peter is a judge in Nova Scotia, his brother Walter is executive editor of the Montreal Star, and we are glad to include him in these remarks as we rejoice on our silver anniversary and know that Mr. O'Hearn is still serving the people of the province through the media of the press and television.

Just in case it has escaped anyone's attention, Mr. Speaker, may I remind them once again the Progressive Conservative Party is the party of Confederation and the party of development, of progress, and of social development. It can be stated without fear of contradiction that, by our actions and in the trust placed in us by the people of Ontario, the Progressive Conservative Party in Ontario remains and is pre-eminently the party of Confederation and development and progress. I suggest, as we conclude, to all members of this House that when the anniversary of the formation of the Progressive Conservative government is observed next month, it will be recognized as merely a marker along the broad highway of progress along which the people of Ontario are travelling.

During the last quarter century, we have progressed an immense distance. The achievements have been unparalleled in the history of any other province of Canada. Keep in mind that this journey is not finished. There is not a government programme that is not in need of further development. As we face the changing social needs, there is the continual review. Nothing stands still. That is what the word Progressive means with Conservative; nothing stands still. The membership of this party is continually being rejuvenated and we have, continually, new talent introduced to its ranks to ensure a consultation with the changing needs of the times. I remind you that all our programmes are under review and we underline that the progressive nature of the party emphasizes that progress depends on improvement and continuity. These accomplishments have been replaced by fresh challenges, each of which must and will be overcome. But we face them with confidence in our capacity and experience to deal with them effectively and courageously in the times ahead.

When the bells ring and this government is supported once again, it will continue to meet the needs of the people of the province to give some real tangible meaning to the words of that song which has become the theme song of Ontario, that she will continue to be a place to stand and a place to grow.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer) moves that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair, and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition) moves that the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means. be amended by adding thereto the following words:

This House regrets:

(1) the government's dependence on regressive tax and revenue increases which impose harsh new burdens on lower and middle income citizens and employers, particularly in the financing of health services;

(2) the paltry commitment in dollars and initiative towards alleviating the worsening housing difficulties;

(3) the lack of initiative in maintaining the Ontario sugar beet industry which will add new financial hardships to the agricultural economy;

(4) the absence of a wage/price review board that should be operating in areas of provincial jurisdiction to assist in easing the cost of living and to act against inflation;

(5) the lack of an overall reform of the grant policy to assist municipalities in reducing local taxes, particularly as they are related to school costs;

(6) that no effective programme for the industrial and economic growth of northern Ontario has been proposed which would channel private and public funds into the development of our natural resource areas.

As the members are aware, the House will first vote on the amendment of the motion moved by the leader of the Opposition.

The House divided on the amendment moved by Mr. Nixon, which was negatived on the following division:

Clerk of the House: In Her Majesty's name, the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor doth assent to these bills.

Mr. Speaker: May it please, Your Honour:

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and faithful subjects, the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario, in session assembled, approach Your Honour with sentiments of unfeigned devotion and loyalty to Her Majesty's person and government and humbly beg to present, for Your Honour's acceptance, a bill intituled, An Act granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1968 and March 31, 1969.

To this Act the Royal assent was announced by the Clerk of the legislative assembly in the following words:

Clerk of the House: The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor doth thank Her Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, accept their benevolence and assent to this bill in Her Majesty's name.

The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor of the province was then pleased to deliver the following gracious speech:

Hon. W. Ross Macdonald (Lieutenant-Governor): I extend warmest greetings to you on this, the first opportunity I have had to address the Legislature of Ontario since assuming office as the representative in the province of Ontario of our beloved Sovereign, Queen Elizabeth II.

I should like to express my deep appreciation of the affectionate welcome I have enjoyed and the confidence which has been expressed for the office which I hold and for myself. I shall endeavour to preserve the dignity of the office of the Lieutenant-Governor and to serve our Sovereign and the people of Ontario to the maximum of my ability.

The first session of the 28th Parliament of Ontario is about to end. This session, which also marks the beginning of the second century of the province of Ontario, has been one of the longest in the history of the Legislature. Since the session began on February 14 with the Speech from the Throne read by my distinguished predecessor, the Honourable W. Earl Rowe, the public and private bills placed before you for consideration and approval make this session one of the most productive in recent years. Those legislative proposals which you have approved will ensure the further strength and ability of the people of Ontario to meet their responsibilities to our province and to our country. I commend the hon. members for their diligence and constructive participation and congratulate each of you on the responsible and dedicated manner in which you discharged your obligations to your constituents and this House.

The legislative programme which this House has approved included enactments which will provide for equality of educational opportunity for all the young people of Ontario. Passage of amendments to The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act and to The Separate Schools Act allow for the creation of larger units of administration for public, secondary, and separate schools. A substantial decrease in the number of school jurisdictions will follow. Further developments within the school system of Ontario include amendments to The Schools Administration Act and The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act. These authorize the establishment of schools and classes in the French language at the elementary and secondary levels of the public school system.

The hon. members approved record expenditures for all facets of our educational system to ensure that it remains one of the most comprehensive and progressive available anywhere. This support will enable our institutions of higher learning to improve upon the quality of programmes for which they have already earned an enviable reputation.

A significant and far-reaching development was the transfer of a substantial degree of the weight of taxation borne by property owners. Hon. members approved several measures which reduced this burden, including The Municipal Tax Reduction Act and those enabling the assumption by the province, from the municipalities, of the costs of the administration of justice.

Legislation was approved to implement the programme for equalization of industrial opportunity, whereby many of our smaller communities are assisted in acquiring industry and, thereby, stimulate more uniform economic growth and employment throughout Ontario.

Improved working conditions will follow legislation of The Department of Labour. The Employment Standards Act replaces several other enactments concerning employment practices and conditions. Under this Act overtime payment beyond 48 hours of work weekly, equality of payment for men and women, and the establishment of seven statutory holidays annually, were given support. Amendments to The Industrial Standards Act are intended to improve safe working conditions. Substantial increases in benefits under The Workmen's Compensation Act also were approved.

The wellbeing of the people of Ontario continued to be safeguarded through continuing attention to the social services required by a growing and vigorous population. Additional benefits under the health care insurance programme of The Department of Health and welfare services of The Department of Social and Family Services have been strengthened and broadened. Included are outpatient care, essential ambulance services and optometric benefits. Substantial progress is being achieved through an expanding preventive health care programme.

Programmes for the control of air and water pollution were strengthened, with funds approved to enable the government's programmes to be vigorously pursued.

Consolidated were 18 previous enactments of the Legislature dealing with adult offenders. When complemented by federal legislation, The Department of Correctional Services Act will authorize the establishment of a programme whereby inmates will be permitted to participate in vocational or educational training within the community. The new Act also incorporates the change of name of The Department of Reform Institutions.

Enacted during this session was The Provincial Courts Act, which provides for the establishment of a provincial court in each county and district in Ontario. These courts will absorb and replace the magistrates and juvenile and family courts and will provide a court system of greater flexibility than heretofore.

Amendments to The Securities Act, The Loan and Trust Corporations Act, The Insurance Act and The Consumer Protection Act provide greater protection to the people of Ontario in their financial dealings.

Legislation was considered and approved to establish the second large regional government in Ontario. The regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton will become a functioning metropolitan community on January 1, 1969.

The agricultural industry of Ontario was further strengthened by various proposals put before and approved by the hon. members.

Enactments respecting the marketing of cattle for the production of beef give Ontario farmers authority to establish a beef improvement association and to develop and improve the grading and marketing of beef.

The legislative programme put forward by The Department of Transport and approved by the House was the most significant in the 11-year life of the department. Legislative measures were taken to assist municipalities in constructing airstrips. Other measures dealt with highway and vehicle safety and contained important advances, including specific recognition of commercial highway transport to the economic life of Ontario. Legislative proposals by The Department of Highways, in concert with the department's extensive construction programme, will further prevent dangerous traffic conditions developing on roads leading to controlled highways.

During the session, legislation was approved to establish the Royal Ontario museum as an independent institution with increased flexibility in serving the interest of the people of Ontario.

Extensive reorganization of two existing departments of government was given legislative approval. The new Department of Treasury and Economics will bring together the machinery of the government for the development of policies on financial and economic management and federal-provincial relations. The Department of Revenue will administer taxation statutes and other revenue legislation. The new Department of Trade and Development is charged with the responsibility for housing and establishment and stimulation of business and industrial activity throughout the province.

In reviewing the first session of the 28th Parliament of Ontario, I join with the hon. members in expressing the gratitude of the people of Ontario to the public servants of this province. This year marks the 50th anniversary of the establishment of the Ontario civil service commission. During this half century the commission and the public servants have demonstrated their deep loyalty and sense of duty in the service of the residents of this province. On behalf of my government and the hon. members, I commend them for the successful performance of their assigned tasks.

In discharging their responsibilities, all hon. members have had ample opportunity to scrutinize thoroughly and give approval to the spending estimates of the departments of government. I thank the hon. members for making provision for the funds necessary to conduct the business of the government. The economic growth of Ontario and the excellent financial position of the province will enable the necessary funds to be raised. I am pleased to note that the affairs of the government are in excellent order.

In declaring prorogued this first session of the 28th Parliament, I pray that under the guidance of divine providence our province will continue to provide an increasing measure of satisfaction and prosperity for all our people.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, and hon. members of the legislative assembly, it is the will and pleasure of the Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor that this legislative assembly be prorogued and this legislative assembly is accordingly prorogued.

The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor was pleased to retire from the chamber.

The House prorogued at 3:30 of the clock, p.m.

(See page 6172)

Answers to questions were tabled as follows:

7. Mr. Deans—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) How much land has been assembled at this time for the satellite city proposed in October, 1967, for Saltfleet Mountain; (b) have any arrangements been made to provide services for this land; (c) what price was paid for the land now assembled; (d) is this land being assembled directly by the Ontario housing corporation, or by private developers or real estate agents acting on behalf of the Ontario housing corporation?

Answer by the Minister of Trade and Development:

(a) 1,562.4 acres.

(b) Discussions have been held with the city of Hamilton and the townships of Saltfleet and Binbrook concerning the servicing of these lands. A team of expert consultants has been set up to act for Ontario housing corporation in all planning, design and negotiations pertaining to this development.

(c) Ontario housing corporation is continually in the market place for land and uses its best endeavours to obtain the best possible prices. To disclose prices paid in any one area could well jeopardize the corporation's ability to obtain land at reasonable cost.

(d) The land was assembled privately and offered to Ontario housing corporation as a package.

22. Mr. Ben—Enquiry of the Ministry—What would be the increase in cost to the present public school supporters in Metropolitan Toronto if all the pupils at present enrolled in separate schools in Metro Toronto were brought into the public school system?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

This question is hypothetical.

23. Mr. Ben—Enquiry of the Ministry—1. What would be the cost of giving to the separate school system the same dollars per pupil as now given to the public school system in Ontario for (a) grades I to X; (b) grades XI to XIII? 2. What would be the cost of giving to the Metropolitan Toronto separate school system the same dollars per pupil as now given to the metropolitan public school system for (a) grades I to X; (b) grades XI to XIII?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

Not envisaged in law nor contemplated by the regulations.

24. Mr. Ben—Enquiry of the Ministry—What would be the annual cost of teaching all the pupils at present enrolled in the separate school system of Ontario if they were brought into the public school system for (a) grades I to X; (b) grades XI to XIII?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

This question is hypothetical.

25. Mr. Ben—Enquiry of the Ministry—What would be the capital cost (i.e., the cost of supplying facilities) of absorbing the pupils at present in attendance in the separate school system of Ontario into the public school system for (a) pupils in grades I to X; (b) pupils in grades XI to XIII?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

1(a) The cost of any such coverage cannot be predicted accurately.

1(b) Same as above.

26. Mr. Ben—Enquiry of the Ministry—As of December 31st, 1967, or the last statistical period, how many pupils were in attendance in the separate schools of the province of Ontario (a) in grades I to X; (b) in grades XI to XIII?

Answer by the Minister of Education:

(a) At September 30, 1967, there were 404,497 pupils in attendance in the separate schools of the province of Ontario recognized by law.

(b) At September 30, 1967, there were 16,993 students in grades 11 to 13 of the Roman Catholic private schools.

45. Mr. Deacon—Enquiry of the Ministry—1. Re Ontario housing corporation: (a) What was the total cost per unit of the Alexandra Park town housing development, including property acquisition, demolition, architect fees and construction; (b) what is the contracted total price per unit of the Blake Street project? 2. Re Ontario student housing corporation: (a) What is the cost per unit of the new University of Guelph residences; (b) what is the total contracted cost per unit of Rochdale College?

Answer by the Minister of Trade and Development:

1. (a) The town house units in Alexandra Park were constructed in two phases with separate contracts and different contractors as follows:

Phase 1 comprised 47 row housing units, 29 of which were 3-bedroom and 18 4-bedroom. The contract price for construction was $645,461.64. Architect fees were $39,660.29. This resulted in an average building cost per unit of $13,733.22 plus architect's fees of $843.84 for a total average cost per unit of $14,577.06.

Phase 2 comprised 216 row housing units, 130 of which were 3-bedroom, 59 4-bedroom and 27 5-bedroom. The contract price for construction was $3,822,569.00. Architect fees were $192,785.00. This resulted in an average building cost per unit of $17,697.08 plus architect's fees of $892.52 for a total average cost per unit of $18,599.60.

The land on which these units were built was acquired and cleared as part of the Alexandra Park urban renewal scheme. In consequence, OHC was not in any way involved in the cost of acquisition and clearance. The land for the public housing units was transferred to OHC at a cost based on $1,000 per dwelling unit.

(b) The Blake Street development comprises 460 units, of which 129 are 1-bedroom, 204 are 2-bedroom, 58 3-bedroom, 36 4-bedroom, and 34 5-bedroom. The contract price for construction was $6,325,000. Architect's fee is included in the contract price. This resulted in an average building cost per unit of $13,750. Land for this development cost $1,380,000 for an average of $3,000 per unit.

Comparing the Alexandra Park and Blake Street developments the following factors are significant:

	Alexandra Park	Blake Street
Average bedroom count per unit	3.5	2.22
Land cost per unit	$1,000	$3,000
Average cost per dwelling including land	$18,872.53	$16,750.00

2(a) The Guelph student residence currently under construction comprises accommodation for 1,162 unmarried students together with dining, kitchen, and other communal facilities. The construction cost per bed is $7,777 plus architect's fees of approximately $470 for a total cost of $8,247 per student bed.

(b) The student residence known as Rochdale College was developed by a student co-operative of the University of Toronto. We do not have cost figures on this development. However, perhaps other student residence developments carried out by Ontario student housing corporation on the same basis as the Rochdale College development will suffice.

The University of Western Ontario student residence currently under construction comprises accommodation for 1,204 unmarried students together with dining, kitchen and other communal facilities. The construction cost per bed is $4,289. As this was a builder proposal call, architect's fees are included in the construction cost.

The University of Waterloo student residence currently under construction comprises accommodation for 960 unmarried students together with dining, kitchen and other communal facilities. The construction cost per bed is $4,500. As this was a builder proposal call, architect's fees are included in the construction cost.

As the hon. member is aware, both OHC and OSHC have made extensive use of the builder proposal method of development.

This has led to such interesting innovations as builder proposals by private enterprise on urban renewal sites. An example of a builder proposal on an urban renewal site is the Blake Street project in the city of Toronto. This method resulted in cutting the time involved from approval to start to 18 months compared with the usual four or five years required under the normal method of urban renewal. This project was first suggested by the metropolitan corporation as a redevelopment area, but was not considered suitable by the urban renewal authorities. In response to a proposal call, a private developer offered to build a 460-unit housing development for OHC on part of the land. As is usual in a builder proposal, the developer assumed all responsibilities for the preparation of plans, specifications, soil test reports, making the necessary application for rezoning, together with the securing of all municipal approvals.

In the case of student housing, the builder proposal technique has been used exclusively by OHC with the exception of the student residence at Guelph University. At the time the OSHC was created, the Guelph development had already reached an advanced planning stage with the university using the architectural firm of John Andrews and Associates. Rather than risk delaying the development by discarding the planning already carried out, OSHC agreed to go along with the development as originally contemplated.

This was similar to the situation which obtained in the Alexandra Park urban renewal area. The city of Toronto had already retained a consortium of architectural firms to do preliminary design work on the public housing element, and although OHC would have preferred to use the builder proposal technique, in the interests of expediency it agreed to continue on the direct construction basis already started by the city.

Apart from the very substantial economies which have been achieved through the builder proposal technique, this arrangement also lends itself to considerable savings in time as full advantage is taken of the builder's experience and capacity. Proposal calls by OHC and OSHC contain detailed requirements concerning the standards of construction required and it has been our experience that this produces housing of a uniformly high design standard. All proposals are subjected to an extensive analysis and appraisal by the professional staff of OHC before the successful proponent is selected.

Builder developers who submit proposals are responsible for preparing all plans and specifications to the requirements of the corporation, for making applications, for any rezoning required and for securing all approvals necessary from municipal and other governmental agencies.
