LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JULY 2, 1968

The House met at 2:00 o'clock p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the following reports: The Sheridan Park corporation annual report for 1967; the Ontario research foundation annual report, 1966; the Ontario housing corporation and Ontario student housing corporation annual report, 1966.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

The member for Sandwich-Riverside has a question from last week.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Health. What is the procedure for donating one's body for kidney, heart or other transplants; and is there a permission card available similar to that used by the eye bank?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge no special card or form is available. This is all taken care of under The Human Tissues Act, which I believe was passed in 1964 or 1965. All the procedure is laid out in that Act.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Sandwich-Riverside—a supplementary question?

Mr. Burr: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Am I correct in assuming: (1) That the best transplant donors would be healthy individuals; (2) that such healthy individuals would usually die by accident; (3) that in the confusion and grief accompanying such an accident, speedy permission would be almost impossible; (4) that previously signed permission cards such as I have suggested, would be the best way of facilitating the transplants?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Yes, I think what the hon. member says is quite right, but I do not suppose the healthy, young individual thinks of dying—or thinks of dying suddenly—and therefore does not make provision in his will or otherwise to make his wishes known if he ever thinks of such a thing. But the Act also does state that one, or those having any authority or right over the body, has the right to determine what shall be done with it or its parts.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park has a question from last week and two today. He might place them all now.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have a question of the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Has the Ontario securities commission investigated trading in the stock of Pyrotex? Is it the opinion of the Ontario securities commission that a corner currently exists in that stock?

If the Ontario securities commission believes that a corner does exist, what action does the commission intend to take?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario securities commission is currently investigating trading in the stock of Pyrotex Mining and Exploration Company Limited. The action which they may take will depend on the information brought forth as a result of their pending investigation.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Minister accept a supplementary question? Do you expect the results of that investigation fairly soon?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, I am hopeful it will not be unduly delayed.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Minister inform us?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I will be delighted.

Mr. Shulman: I have a question of the Attorney General, Mr. Speaker. Why have charges against the Holiday Inn in Oakville not been relaid by the Crown attorney in the proper form?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, the charge against the Holiday Inn in Oakville has not been relaid because the acting Crown attorney, on a review of all the facts, has determined that the circumstances do not justify or support a prosecution.

I might say, Mr. Speaker—just as a little detail added to that answer—that the facts involve an 18 year old employee, a dishwasher, who on occasion carried cases of beer to the bar. He did not open the beer and he was not in the area where the public consumed beer and the acting Crown attorney, on reviewing those facts, did not feel that warranted prosecution and I think that was quite a proper decision.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Downsview has a question?

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. R. S. Smith), I have a question for the Minister of Lands and Forests, standing in his name. Following the serious accident which occurred at Sudbury yesterday to one of the aircraft of the department, would the Minister consider reviewing the policy of the department in respect to aerobatic demonstrations of this kind for public entertainment?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question, I must emphatically state that this was an aerial demonstration and not an aerobatic display. From time to time, we are requested to demonstrate the latest aerial forest fighting techniques as a means of informing the public of our advancement in this highly effective procedure. In view of the accident involving our department's aircraft, the policy of this type of demonstration is presently being reviewed.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): I have two questions for the Minister of Agriculture and Food and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will present both of them at the same time.

Will the Minister order an immediate investigation into all the reasons for the tractor demonstration by farmers from Warren to Sturgeon Falls on Highway 17, on July 1?

When will the Minister accept the resignation of the northern region representative to the Ontario milk marketing board, Mr. Cazabon, who is no longer entitled to this position because he is no longer a milk producer? When will the election for a new northern region representative to the OMMB take place?

Will the election of the northern region representative coincide with the three other elections to the OMMB to be held this year? Will all the new members take their seats on the OMMB at the same time?

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say to the hon. member, in reply to the first question which he asked, I have had no representations at all concerning the tractor demonstration. As a matter of fact, I did not even know it had taken place until I read this question, which was on my desk when I came to the House. I am not sure what the reasons are for the demonstration. I judged from the succeeding series of questions perhaps this is the basis for some of the unrest.

However, I do know from reports I have heard that one or two things indicate that the farmers were protesting for an increase in milk prices. They wanted a price of $7.92 for bottled milk per hundredweight; they wanted the present system of paying farmers once a month changed to the twice-a-month system, and they wanted an election to the milk marketing board to take place immediately to replace Mr. Lucien Cazabon, who was a farmer and milk producer but who resigned because he had disposed of his farm and herd. Mr. Cazabon submitted his resignation to me, which was the proper place to submit it as he had been appointed by me at the time that the milk marketing board was established.

I suggested to Mr. Cazabon that in view of the fact that we were holding elections for at least three new zones in the province of Ontario at the first of September, he might consider withdrawing his resignation or at least I might not accept his resignation until that time. This he agreed to do.

I think Mr. Cazabon is regarded by many people as a very intelligent, able farmer and milk producer in northern Ontario. He has the distinct advantage, Mr. Speaker, of being fluently bilingual—and I think this is quite an advantage in that particular area. I have felt he was making a very valuable contribution to the work of the milk marketing board of Ontario.

I believe that I answered a similar question from the hon. member during my estimates when he raised this point. I suggested to him that I saw no reason why there should not be an election for a member of the milk marketing board in that area represented by Mr. Cazabon, at the same time as the other zones would be electing. I would feel that there should be a co-ordinated election for all of those zones and certainly all members elected to the milk marketing board will take their places at the same time.

Mr. Martel: I have a question of the Minister of Energy and Resources Management:

Is the Ontario Hydro's practice of lowering the water level up to two feet at a time in Lake Wanapitae having a detrimental effect on the fish life in the lake?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, it is not Hydro's practice to suddenly lower the level of Lake Wanapitae two feet, and in fact the regulation procedures for the lake have been designed on the advice of Lands and Forests personnel to minimize any adverse effect on fish. Withdrawals of water are planned so that the maximum total drawdown through the four-month spawning and incubation period is four feet and the maximum in any month seldom exceeds two feet.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): A question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Lands and Forests.

What action will the Minister take to restore Leach's Lake in Beatty township to its original condition after having been drained by the carelessness of an adjacent gravel pit operation? What steps will the Minister take to prevent any future destruction of our natural resources in this manner?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this question as notice. I am in the process of getting information and tomorrow I will have a full reply.

Mr. M. Gaunt (Huron-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, my friend from Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) is absent at the moment, and with your permission I would like to ask a question on his behalf.

It is addressed to the Minister of Health: In what circumstances did the Pembroke ambulance refuse to cross the Quebec border at Allumette Island on the Ottawa River on Saturday night, June 29?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, since it is not required that ambulance operators report such matters to us it will take some time to get this information. I shall undertake to do that.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Trade and Development has answers to certain questions.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Speaker, the first question is from the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent):

> Will the Minister advise the number of loans made to Indians in Ontario from CMHC under the proposed $7,000 housing loan for Indians?

The answer: The current federal programmes for housing Indian families both on and off reserves are as follows:

1. Subsidy housing programme (on reserve): Houses under this programme are constructed by the Indian affairs branch with the maximum grant (in reality the cost) set by the Indian affairs branch at $7,000 per housing unit. Who will benefit from these units is decided by the local Indian band council which sets a list of priorities.

2. Capital grants housing programme (on reserve): This programme while similar to the subsidy programme is operated by the band council itself. The band appoints a band housing authority which has full responsibility for tendering, construction and all other aspects of the programme. To be eligible to receive the maximum grant of $7,000 per dwelling the band must set up a five-year programme after which it will receive no further grants from the Indian affairs branch.

3. National Housing Act mortgages (on reserve): Under a new programme just recently put into effect, NHA insured or direct loans are being made on reserves. These loans are intended for Indians who wish to build their own homes and cannot wait to get on the priority list.

4. Off-reserve housing programme: This programme involves a combination of two of the above programmes. It authorizes the Indian affairs branch to make loans of up to $6,000 to individual employed Indians to assist in the buying or constructing of a house off the reserve. These loans are actually conditional grants since the Indian may also borrow further funds from CMHC as a direct first mortgage. The Indian affairs branch grant, or "second mortgage", which varies in accordance with the income of the applicant, is partially forgiven by Indian affairs branch each year over a 10-year period providing the individual has not defaulted on his NHA mortgage payments. Applicants must show they have good prospects for steady employment that adequate rental accommodation is not available near their place of employment.

So that the hon. member may have up-to-date figures concerning central mortgage and housing corporation's activities in this field, Ontario housing corporation has written requesting these. Immediately they are received they will be made available to the hon. member.

The second question is also from the member for Grey-Bruce.

> Has the Minister considered a programme to serve the urgent need for housing in Ontario similar to the Detroit, Mich. programme where the UAW has joined forces with Consolidated Edison to form a multi-million-dollar programme to aid low-income housing?

The answer: The Metropolitan Detroit citizen development authority, a privately funded partnership between business and labour, has been establishd with the aim of providing housing for low and modest income families. It has raised $6 million for a revolving development fund with grants from businesses amounting to approximately $5 million, and grants from labour organizations amounting to approximately $1 million. With the fund, land is acquired mainly in the centre core of the city. The authority hopes to obtain its mortgage financing from the federal Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The authority has at present 24 units under construction and 481 units at the development stage. Development is on a negotiated contract basis. Rents will be set according to cost plus a one per cent development charge. Arrangements are being made to lease back 15 to 20 per cent of the constructed units to the city of Detroit for public housing use. A further 20 per cent of the development will be made available through the rent supplement programme.

There seems to be no obstacle to business and labour interests in Ontario making similar arrangements for the development of housing for low and middle income families. Such an organization could apply to central mortgage and housing corporation for long-term loans under the terms of section 16 of The National Housing Act. Such loans would be on either a limited dividend or non-profit basis.

The third question, Mr. Speaker, was from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Nixon):

> With regard to the senior citizens' housing project under Ontario housing corporation in Burford, Ont.:
> 1. Who tendered and what were the bids?
> 2. Who was the successful tenderer?
> 3. What is the estimated final cost, less land?
> 4. What consultation with local officials preceded the choice of plans?

The answer: This was a "builder proposal" call and the prices received excluded land:

1. Gordon Hicks Construction, Kitchener —$100,610. Gasbar Construction Ltd., Toronto—$83,632; Headway Corporation Ltd., Port Arthur—$146,240; B.I.B. Construction Ltd., London, Ontario—$91,900; Western Suburban Estates Ltd., Brantford—$85,633; Birchaven Developments Ltd., Hamilton—$95,000; Tureski Construction Co. Ltd., St. Catharines—$119,000; Joseph J. Coates, Burford—$92,411.

2. Gasbar Construction Ltd., Toronto.

3. $94,038; this includes the cost of construction, interest during construction, legal and surveying fees and other related costs.

4. The regional development manager of Ontario housing corporation met with municipal officials and with the members of council. On March 7, 1968, the council of the township of Burford passed the following resolution:

> That this council do not request the Ontario housing corporation to proceed with the construction of the Burford senior citizens home as per the preliminary plans of Gasbar Construction presented to council.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): If I may, the Minister has answered the question that was on the order paper as No. 63 in my name, and I appreciate having this answer promptly. By way of a supplementary question could I first draw his attention to the fact that the housing corporation did not accept the low tender? I wonder why that was so. Why did it not—

Hon. Mr. Randall: We do not necesarily always accept the low tender. There are other factors studied when we take a tender. For instance, there could be many things, perhaps the availability of putting up a bond, the availability of the workmanship. It is not always necessary that we take the lowest tender.

Mr. Nixon: Does the Minister not have a standard bonding procedure that would make a company eligible to tender? Can anybody come in off the street with a tender and then the housing corporation investigates to see, whether in fact, he could perhaps come up to the terms?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I would think all these people would be able to put up a bond. We do have a standard procedure but I suggest that when they do come in, they are analyzed by our staff and then they go before the board of Ontario housing corporation and they decide whether they take first, second or third as far as the bidders are concerned. We do not always take the low bidder. It may not be the kind of a project that we want to proceed with.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 27th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Chairman, I request the unanimous approval of the committee of supply to move to amend vote 401, item 7, cost of participation in the Japanese universal and international exhibition of 1970, by adding, "and outstanding costs related to Expo 67".

By way of explanation, Mr. Chairman, at the time our estimates for the budget year 1968-1969 were being prepared and printed, we anticipated that all invoices relating to our Expo 67 participation would be paid prior to March 31, 1968. However, suppliers in dispute amounting to $10,020.83 were not settled until after March 31, 1968, and in addition invoices amounting to $1,117.22 are still awaiting suppliers' justification of amounts charged. The proposed amendment will permit payment of the above outstanding invoices.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, might I ask the hon. Minister how much is added to the sum of $125,000 that already appears?

Hon. Mr. Randall: $10,000; this amount here.

Mr. Nixon: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Randall: $10,020.83, and there is still an undisputed amount of $1,117, for about $11,370 in all.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I misunderstood the Prime Minister, but I understood that in circumstances like this—I believe this came up in the Halton affair—that cheques can be backdated to allow the expenses to go in the year in which the sum was voted. Why is that not done in this case—which would remove the necessity for this amendment?

Hon. Mr. Randall: I do not have the answer to that, but we discussed it with the Provincial Auditor and he suggested this is the way it should have been handled when the estimates were going through. But we slipped up on it, so now we are asking for the approval of the House.

Mr. Shulman: Oh. I think you are doing it the right way now. I am more intrigued to find we have two different methods. Sometimes we backdate the cheques, and sometimes we ask for an amendment. I would like to suggest to you that yours is the proper way of doing it, and perhaps this should be the universal way in all the departments of the government.

Mr. Chairman: Do we have unanimous consent of the committee on the motion of the Minister of Trade and Development?

Mr. Nixon: But it does not, in fact, add any moneys to the vote?

Hon. Mr. Randall: No.

Mr. Chairman: The Minister moves that item 7 of vote 401 be amended by adding thereto the words "And outstanding costs related to Expo 67."

Shall the motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 201:

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, last February I had the honour of hearing the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) speaking at the federal-provincial conference in Ottawa, regarding the inclusion of the bill of rights in the constitution of Canada. The Premier (Mr. Robarts) had kept for himself the announcement that Ontario would participate in the expansion of language facilities, and had left for the hon. Minister, whose estimates are before us, to scuttle—and I use the word advisedly—the Attorney General may feel that he had a different approach, but in my view to scuttle—the proposal that had come from the federal government that such a bill of rights, with the co-operation of the provinces, be included in our constitution, and that some means be worked out co-operatively whereby this could be brought about.

The Attorney General had a carefully prepared statement at the time. I remember listening to it with great interest. Without saying that he personally, or this government, was opposed to a bill of rights, he showed the flaws, as he felt that they appeared, in the proposal that was put before the conference. I felt at the time, that Ontario was taking a considerable responsibility by leading off the discussion under those circumstances and with that particular attitude regarding the proposal. It, in fact, did scuttle the idea because representatives from all other provinces save one, I believe, followed the Attorney General, agreeing with his idea that perhaps it was premature, and that considerably more study should be entered into before we—

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Do you think Quebec would have agreed?

Mr. Nixon: The point is, we are discussing your estimates. This Minister led off the discussion. You sat calmly beside him after having taken the credit for the expansion of bilingualism in this province—as well you should—and let this Minister carry the load for destroying the opportunity that we have in Canada for enacting some sort of a bill of rights in our constitution. The only province—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: On a matter of privilege. I simply have to reiterate, I can only assume from what the hon. leader of the Opposition says that had we supported it Quebec would have supported it. I do not think you can make that assumption. In other words, I do not think you can tell this House that we made up Quebec's mind for Quebec, because Mr. Johnston had announced before the conference opened that he was opposed to it.

Mr. Nixon: It is not a question of privilege, but I am delighted to hear the Premier enter the discussion at this point because my point certainly is only this: that Ontario, in my view the leading province of Canada, not through the Premier but through the Attorney General, stated a position which was then followed by the other provinces with the exception of Prince Edward Island—which simply means that the possibility of having a bill of rights in our own constitution has been put on the shelf. Now, when we look at the development down through the years, it was the provinces—notably this province—that were against abolishing appeals to the law lords of the Privy Council.

The reason given in 1948 and 1949, as I read it—and you people are not responsible for this, but it was the Conservative government, the people who were your immediate predecessors—was that Ontario had been favoured by decisions that had been entered into in the Parliament of the United Kingdom in this regard. I feel that you are entirely too conservative in your approaches to these matters. I would say that this is an important matter. I congratulate the government, as do many citizens in this province and in Canada for making a proposal which enabled us to move into areas of bilingualism which are so important in meeting the requirements, or the recommendations, of the Royal commission in this regard. But it would have been most acceptable in the conference following our centennial year and the new approach that had been begun in the Confederation of tomorrow conference, if something other than a tone and an approach which would put this possibility in abeyance not just for the time being but, I sense, for a good long time, had been undertaken. We have a responsibility, I believe, and this Minister was the spokesman for the government in this regard, and we have a responsibility here not to let the matter die.

I would think that this government should be entering into a carefully considered continuing study on our own behalf so that when we meet the Premiers and the Prime Minister on the next occasion we can as the representatives of Ontario have a positive proposal resulting from our own study that would see the implementation of a bill of rights of the type, not specifically the same, but of the type that was recommended by the then Minister of Justice and the government of Canada.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, let me make it clear at the outset of these remarks that the whole content and the tone, if I could use that expression, of the remarks I made at the conference on Confederation was not to preclude at all the thought of the incorporation of a bill of rights in the constitution but simply after reviewing the whole matter to suggest that it needed very careful and further study. Ontario usually speaks first in most matters at these conferences and I do not know who should perhaps speak other than our Prime Minister first, then the Attorney General.

Mr. Nixon: I have no criticism, I just draw it to the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The Minister of Justice of Canada spoke at great length on this matter and I believe the remarks which I made were laid before the members of this House. I think every member got a copy of them. We suggested—as I say—that study of this very important matter was required, and I know that the hon. leader of the Opposition saw a good deal of discussion and comment in the press, pro and con, on this whole matter which indicated—I think it bears out my position—that this is not a matter that you sit down and write suddenly, saying this is a right and this is a right, and so on. These things must be studied.

I recall that there were actually professors, academic people, speaking for some of the provinces on this subject, sitting in the front row with the Premiers of the provinces and the Prime Ministers.

Mr. Nixon: There is only one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I thought there were two.

But I want to make this point clear, too, the other provinces did not necessarily follow Ontario. We had discussions, we had an understanding, we had some knowledge of what attitude the leaders of the other provinces were taking and I believe there were five at least who indicated very strongly before we got into the discussion on the conference floor that they were not prepared to suddenly agree to the incorporation of a bill of rights in the constitution without further study.

Now I recall that one of the arguments put forward was that—I think one of the academic gentlemen said it—"every country that has been brought along by Britain out of the Commonwealth and into independent status, has been given a written constitution"; and I felt like rising and saying "look at those countries, and do you think—can you argue—does it follow—that because you write the constitution down your rights are protected?"

If you think of many of those countries—and I do not want to name them—I think you will know, I think our people will realize, that the mere writing down and saying "this is a right" does not mean that you get it.

I could think of one of the leading countries in the eastern world which has a very rigid written constitution and I do not suggest for a moment—and I do not think anyone would ask me to say—that that guarantees personal liberty and human rights. Some of those countries have very rigid constitutions defining human rights.

I think on the other hand we can say—and I am not suggesting that you cannot write down and define certain rights—that in this way they perhaps can be guaranteed by our courts which, I believe, in the last instance are the guarantee of our freedom.

I think you can do this, but I think once you begin to define, you at the same time begin to delimit, and this is true of any type of legislation that you try to write. We have had, I think, a pretty broad expression, a pretty broad interpretation, in our unwritten constitution—insofar as it is unwritten—of our rights and freedoms, and our courts accept the principle of right and justice. They interpret them, I think, broadly, and they are not limited—although sometimes there is a limitation which goes to defeat justice as we may perhaps observe in a great neighbour of this kind.

I believe there is an area for study and to just close the matter as far as I am concerned, I would point out that this matter was not scuttled, it was not destroyed. It was put on the agenda and it is one of the prime matters on the agenda of the continuing study which I think, sir, is a committee of—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: We had five days before the conference opened to consider the proposal.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, this is point two—I have that; I will bring it out. I believe I was saying that it is a matter for continuing study of the committee of Prime Ministers and others, which follows the conference on Confederation. But the Prime Minister was good enough to point out that the subject was only brought to our attention as one that would be on the agenda some five days before that conference at Ottawa opened.

It is not dead, it is not scuttled; we are not against it; we are not trying to destroy it. We are very interested in it; we always said, and you can read my remarks—

Mr. Nixon: Yes, I have them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —which say—"Let us study it." If I may be permitted a moment, Mr. Chairman, to quote from those remarks very briefly:

> A proposed bill of rights must be considered in the light of our systems of jurisprudence and the principles that have been demonstrated. If an entrenched bill then seems necessary and desirable, there are specific effects upon Ontario and, indeed, all provinces, which must be considered. An entrenched bill of rights should not be considered unless it is done as an integral part of a complete constitutional review.
> If a bill of rights is entrenched at the federal level, then any ultimate redistribution of powers will have to be made in the context created by the bill of rights. The expression of these rights could, therefore, have a material, and perhaps unintentional, effect, upon the constitutional reforms that might ultimately be desirable.
> Since the entrenchment of individual rights above the authority of Parliament has a material effect upon possible distribution of power in constitutional reform, the two steps should be considered together.

Now I might read one more paragraph:

> We must always remember that our nation is founded upon the parliamentary system of government and not the republican system of government. In the former system, the supremacy of Parliament has always been an essential ingredient that is in our system, for it has vested in the people of the nation, through their elected representatives, their ultimate power over their rights and freedoms. This is a fundamental concept of democracy with which we should not interfere except in the revealing light of full and complete discussion.

Now, if I may use the word, I would commend my remarks to the leader of the Opposition. I know he has read them, but I think he misinterprets when he says I threw cold water, or scuttled, or tried to destroy. This was far from thought, and far from expression in what I said, but I do think—and I think it can become quite apparent—that as you start to revise the powers which are now divided and distributed between the provinces and the federal government—the powers, let us say, to take a simple example, property and civil rights, which belongs to the provinces. Once you say and you write into a federal constitution, a certain right—let us say that no man shall be deprived of his property without compensation, that is a simple example—that would be a proper right; but whose right then is it? Is it federal, or is it provincial? Should it be in the province; should it be in Ottawa? It is a matter for discussion. I expressed no opinion, and many other examples could be given.

I simply want to make the point that we did not attempt to disparage the idea of an entrenched bill of rights, but simply to say that as you write it, we are sitting on a constitutional conference; we are contemplating one day—and I would hope soon—a review of our constitution, particularly a redistribution of powers, and in the doing of that we should discuss, as an integral part of it, the matter of an entrenched bill of rights—a matter of human rights, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nixon: Well, I should say, Mr. Chairman, that this is probably not the occasion for any full blown debate on the subject, but I got the same subjective impression now as when I heard the Attorney General speak at the conference—that while he was prepared to discuss it, he was certainly of a mind that the supremacy of Parliament would make useless, in our form of government, or at least reduce, the usefulness of the entrenchment of the bill of rights.

I would say to you—and I say it is a subjective view on my part—that he came through this way at the conference, and that in this way, whether we led by speaking first, or we led simply because of the force of the Attorney General's arguments for at least postponing a serious consideration of the bill of rights, then many of the other provinces followed his point of view.

My point really is that since we do have some responsibility resulting from that conference, it is incumbent upon our constitutional committee that works under the Premier's office to be sure that we are prepared, when next we go, to have a definite stand in this regard, and not say that everything can be solved by further discussion. Because I would submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General, whether he realized he was doing it or not, did make a definite statement—what came through as a definite statement—that on his part, he did not feel that an entrenched bill of rights would have usefulness in the context of our own constitution.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, one word. I must again say I do not like the expression, "We are followed by the other provinces", and I do not think they like it, because they indicated their position, which was similar to ours—I think on all fours, one might say—before my statement. As I pointed out again, they did not follow Ontario's lead; they were with Ontario because it was their own attitude.

They had thought about it insofar as we had an opportunity to think about it before that Confederation conference and I accept the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition that we should have—if we are to discuss this, and we are to be involved and I trust we will—a formula or at least some more detailed presentation to make on specific questions and attempt to assist in reaching a bill of rights. But as I mentioned previously we just had a very few days when suddenly we were told that it is going to be on the agenda and there was not much time to think about it.

Mr. Nixon: Yes, the agenda was amended during the conference itself and I would just say that while the Attorney General feels that he, in his view, in his statement, did not lead the other provinces, we do have a real opportunity, I suggest, to lead the other provinces in this matter now.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We can be first next time.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, I do not share the leader of the Opposition's conclusion that this government is to blame for what happened because, quite frankly, I think it is historically accurate that other provinces indicated their view—and whether Ontario spoke first, last or in the middle, those views were going to come out.

I would also add that I think the Attorney General has a point in contending that when you are dealing with the whole revision of the constitution, and the redivision of powers, you cannot separate out the building-in of the bill of rights in the constitution without reassessing all the redivision of powers, which is going to be one of the main objectives of the continuing conference. But I do share the leader of the Opposition's view that it was impossible to listen to the Attorney General, either at the conference in February or now, without coming to the conclusion that he is very close to a decision even though he professes to be open-minded on the issue. He is very close to a decision and the whole thrust of his argument is that it is impossible and undesirable to have a bill of rights written into the constitution.

The Attorney General shakes his head, but the Attorney General has to concede us the right to come to our conclusions as to what he was arguing when he was doing the arguing. I repeat, as I listened to him then and as I listen to him now, the whole thrust of his argument is to place emphasis on the weaknesses in the proposition of inclusion of the bill of rights into a written constitution. That I thoroughly disagree with.

There are difficulties involved, but I think those difficulties can be coped with in the course of the whole reshaping of our constitution in the continuing conference.

Now, I would hope that the Attorney General really is open-minded on this issue. If he thinks, upon further study, it is possible to put it into the constitution, I hope that thrust in his argument will become more evident in the future. I know the Liberal Opposition is arguing, and I argue it on behalf of our group; quite frankly, I think it is a position that this government should think its way to, if it has not got there now.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I am a little puzzled by some of the remarks the Attorney General has made in reply to my leader's questions. Particularly, bearing in mind what he had to say when he advanced the compact theory of Confederation, which set us back, very considerably, in the whole of our constitutional discussions. It seemed to me, as I followed the newspaper reports of what went on there, that really the Attorney General and the Premier were not ad idem, they were not thinking along the same lines at all.

It was necessary for the Premier to slap down the Attorney General when he advanced the compact theory. But the Attorney General, it seems to me, returned to the compact theory when he said that we really are not going to have a bill of rights unless we take the whole package all at once. Which in effect meant, until we are able to cross all the t's and dot all the i's in the amendments to the BNA Act, the ruling is that we are not going to have anything written in that might, by some stretch of somebody's imagination, infringe upon provincial rights.

What I am saying, in effect, Mr. Chairman, is that the Attorney General began as a provincial rights-ist. He went to the conference as a provincial rights-ist—notwithstanding what his leader did, and said here in this House and in Ottawa—the Attorney General continued as a provincial rights-ist and was determined, as a law adviser to the Premier, that he was not going to give an inch. So, the end result was that there was an opportunity at that time to write in a bill of rights which would guarantee certain language privileges, certain individual freedoms and so on. We have lost that. We have lost that for some time. I do not know how long. I hope we get it some day, but what bothers me, Mr. Chairman, is the conflict between the Premier and his first law adviser, which has blossomed forth on a couple of occasions, but at no time more dramatically than when the Attorney General announced his compact theory of Confederation, which is just a bunch of nonsense. It blossomed forth again at the conference in Ottawa in a little more subtle way, but the result was the same.

So, the end result, Mr. Chairman, is that we do not have any bill of rights enshrined in our constitution. I hoped we could have, and I think the result last Tuesday indicated that the people of Canada hope we will have very soon.

Vote 201 agreed to.

On vote 202:

Mr. Shulman: Under vote 202, Mr. Chairman, I am a little disturbed at the expense here. It is a matter of somewhat over $1 million. I have just been going over these figures, and I notice that inasmuch as the department this year, has taken over the administration of justice throughout the province, this is increasing the department's estimates by some 25 per cent. Yet, when we go over this particular item, there are wide divergencies. Salaries are up 70 per cent, travelling expenses 75 per cent, maintenance, for some reason, is up 200 per cent, workmen's compensation board has doubled, fidelity bonds are up 80 per cent, training and development up a third—I would agree that that is necessary. Conferences and conventions are up some 200 per cent. I would like to ask the Attorney General what the explanation is for some of these other wild rises in expenses from the 1966 accounts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there are two major items that have increased largely.

Last year, the estimate for salaries was $541,000. This year it is $872,000, an addition of $331,000. That is the large increase in the estimates.

Travelling expenses are up from $27,000 to $39,000—about $12,000. And maintenance, as the hon. member points out, has a large increase. It was $91,000. It is up to $183,000. It has doubled.

These things largely arise from the fact that we have taken over the administration of justice. We take in now, as a part of our accounting, persons in outside offices—sheriffs' offices, court houses, registrars' offices, and land titles registry offices. We have taken in and included in our payroll now, the payment of those salaries which were paid to a large extent by municipalities, and some bills which were paid, in the administration of those offices when they were run by the municipalities, out of fees allowance. Now they have all been brought in and under our system of administration of justice, and we will be responsible to see that these people are paid. We are not proposing to allow the local sheriff or the local master of titles to pay people out of fees allowance.

We will have knowledge, control and in that way audit these accounts. So, we have increased by just the fact that accepted this responsibility. We have expanded our own responsibilities. We have expanded the number of people we have to pay. Maintenance of these offices was practically doubled, and I think probably might very well have been. We might very well have estimated more because we are moving into a field which is a vast area, and previously to this year, only in the provisional and judicial districts—which run from Muskoka to Nipissing, Sudbury, North Bay, Algoma, Thunder Bay, and so on—only in those areas was the government responsible for the administration of justice.

Now, all the great populated areas of Ontario—lesser in area geographically, but greater by five times in population—is now assumed by the government and comes within The Department of the Attorney General as of the first of this year. If you will look, those are the reasons, and I do not know how to give you any detail, except to spell out to you all the various offices and perhaps give you figures on the personnel who have come in.

Mr. Shulman: Perhaps I did not word my question clearly enough?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If you will look at the first three items. As I say, they are increased. Exhibition expenses, which was $30,000 last year, is only estimated at $10,000, which makes that a small item. The compensation is estimated at $1,000 less. Unemployment is up by only $1,000. Training and staff development—our various magistrates, probation officers, Crown attorneys, our own law staff, and so on, when they attend conferences—are included in one vote which has increased by $8,000. But I think that you will find generally throughout my estimates, that it will be difficult to point out any instances where our estimates have been increased to a great extent. If they are increased, it is backed by very sound reasons. I pointed out in my opening remarks that last year in these estimates, the costs were reviewed for 10 meetings, by last year's performance, before the public accounts committee. I hope that those who were able to attend those meetings might have gotten some idea of how carefully we attempt to administer financially, and otherwise, the department. I will be glad to answer if the hon. member has further questions.

Mr. Shulman: Perhaps I did not word my question clearly enough. What confuses me is why there is such a varying rise percentage-wise, and this is over two years. For example, salaries are up 70 per cent, but maintenance is up 200 per cent. Have you worked this out on some statistical basis? Is this what it is going to cost you or is it just a guess?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The only detail that I have before me is that we take the expropriation for 1967 and 1968, which is $91,000, and this year, estimating as best we can with the increased responsibilities, we show for furniture and office equipment for additional staff the sum of $52,000, and for printing, stationery and communication, a separate $40,000. This makes the item of $92,000, which we feel that we will need to meet, as best we can estimate, the additional responsibilities that we have assumed. That is all I can add.

Vote 202 agreed to.

On vote 203:

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman, under the law revision item on this vote, it might be a suitable time to give commendation to the three great volumes that have thus far appeared under Mr. McRuer's signature under the Royal enquiry into civil rights, and to point out to the Legislature that this is an ongoing study, and that the amount of $30,000 is not great for the magnificent achievement that we are being presented with. I would also point out that the report—No. 1—has involved three volumes. These have been amply discussed over the last few days.

Mr. Chairman: Is the member speaking to vote 203 or 204?

Mr. Lawlor: Vote 203, section 4.

Mr. Chairman: We are dealing with vote 203.

Mr. Singer: McRuer is not in vote 203.

Mr. Chairman: This is exactly the point. Vote 203 has nothing to do with the Ontario law reform commission.

Mr. Lawlor: Law revision, and other committees: expenses.

Mr. Singer: That is not Mr. McRuer.

Mr. Lawlor: The hon. member is wrong, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that I am right, and that the law revision committee is chaired by the hon. former Mr. Justice McRuer, and that he is proceeding as a one-man commission with respect into the enquiry into civil rights and it has nothing whatsoever to do with the Ontario law reform commission.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, could the Attorney General not tell us where the commission on human rights is? My understanding of law revision is that it is the ten-year statutory consolidation and reprinting. Is that not what this vote is for? What is law reform, is that Mr. McRuer's commission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps I would best explain by explaining the items which we dealt with in the past fiscal year under the $55,957 spent on the area. The committee on security legislation, which was an outside committee really, assisted us in revising that Securities Act, which was an item of $51,-495.43. We had a committee working on consumer credit, and we brought in The Consumer Protection Act. That was an item of $1,875. In the securities legislation, I think that the hon. member is aware, we have Messrs. Davies, Ward and Beck, and Messrs. Osler, Hoskitte and Harcourt to assist in certain areas of that work, and the Pete Mitchell company to assist in some of the studies.

The committee on obscene literature—and I do not know if it could be tied very closely to revision of law—is continuing and it studies this area and assists us in administration, and those items that were in that area last year. The law reform commission is in the next vote.

Mr. Singer: The McRuer report is under vote 201.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that that was a Treasury board vote. The enquiry into civil rights was not The Attorney General's Department.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore has the floor. Has he any further questions on 203?

Mr. Lawlor: No, I shall speak to the Provincial Treasurer about it. Thank you.

Mr. E. R. Good (Waterloo North): Mr. Chairman, I would like to enquire of the Attorney General whether the commissioners for estates bills is under this vote.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This does not come within my department at all. I have not got the legislation referring tc the commissioner of estates, but I believe that it is The Legislative Assembly Act which provides that when private member's bills in particular come up which may affect estates, trusts and so on, they are referred to the commissioner of estates for study, and consideration. They are not paid out of my department, and I do not administer them. They carry on without fee. They are Supreme Court judges.

Mr. Good: There are no votes in the estimates then, that could refer to this so that we could question the operation of the estates commission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In my opinion, it would come within The Department of the Provincial Secretary.

Mr. Lawlor: Turning to the fifth item under this report on the conference on uniformity of laws, could the hon. Minister give some indication as to precisely what work is going on there? I understand that there is some work here that has been a long time under review, recommendations have been made in fact, as far back as 1931, concerning limitations. Some of the remarks made under this heading as to the archaic language is mentioned in the report of the law reform commission, having reference to this particular vote. It says that:

> It is clear from the recent decision of the Ontario court of appeal in Schwibel vs. Telekes, 1967, and referred to us by Laskin J. A., while yet unreported, that the archaic language of our legislation concerning limitation continues to impede the court in administering justice in this important field of law, and that reform is desirable.

Now this was first broached, as I understand, back around 1931. The final reports were amended in 1934 and 1944, I believe, and so far as I know, nothing has been really forthcoming for this Legislature under this heading.

The second part of my question is that I understand there is a model wills Act in the works at the same time. I wonder, while looking at this, whether it had anything to do with insurance law, particularly with liability regardless of fault? Incidentally, that is "regardless" of fault and not "without" fault—so the insurance people tell me. In any event, in what areas is the uniformity of legislation across this country being discussed?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the committee of uniformity of legislation is a committee which represents the whole of Canada, and representatives from all the provinces meet. They usually meet in August, and their deliberation continues for a week or longer. Their agenda is divided into study of the criminal law with a view to uniformity suggestions—and legislation, and the civil side. All the Deputy Attorney Generals, as I understand it, attend the criminal law discussions with legislative counsel. Our legislative counsel attend the civil law discussions. I can inform the House that certain of the things that were discussed there on the civil side, at least, included consumer protection legislation, and I think one will perhaps see the result of that in a growing uniformity in this area. Our securities legislation was discussed there. I think the discussions of the committee of uniformity of legislation resulted in the formulation of the proposed wills Act, which would be a uniform piece of legislation, which is now, if I am correct, being studied by the law reform commission. I know there are other matters. There certainly have been a number of suggestions which came from that conference on uniformity of laws, and when we were attending the Dominion-provincial conference on the criminal law legislation in Ottawa, many of the suggestions which were put forward there had come from the study of the commissioners on uniformity of laws in Canada.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Expropriation procedures legislation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Expropriation Procedures Act.

Mr Bullbrook: No. Expropriation procedures legislation. I thought that was discussed before that committee.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It may have been. I did not attend that conference personally. The Deputy Attorney General does, along with the Deputy Attorney Generals of other provinces, in addition to legislative counsel. Mr. Common has attended regularly, and Mr. Henry Bull is another name that comes to my mind—a person very knowledgeable in criminal prosecution and criminal law generally. But a good deal of work is accomplished there, and I think a good deal of progress is being made towards securing uniformity of legislation, particularly in those subjects I have mentioned—consumer protection, wills, and I think we will see it in the securities field.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I should like to ask the Attorney General, through you Mr. Chairman, if all proposed legislation in the form of bills from all departments of the government, arrives in the office of legislative counsel before it is presented in this House?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, Mr. Chairman, we did discuss this at some length on Friday last. That is true. All government legislation comes through the office of legislative counsel.

Mr. Sopha: Is that a recent development?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not particularly recent, no, but perhaps there were some occasions when some bits of legislation in the past did not get there, somehow. I can say to the hon. member that all legislation proposed by the government is reviewed by legislative counsel.

Mr. Sopha: Do we understand that these empires that have been created in the law branches of the various departments—the Minister of Highways has quite an empire of lawyers, and the Minister of Municipal Affairs has one, the Minister of Health is creating one, and the Minister of Agriculture and Food wants to be in the law—

Mr. Nixon: Do they not call them gaggles of lawyers?

Mr. Sopha: You might; that would be a good expression. Gaggles of lawyers, my leader said.

Do we understand that these law branches of the various departments initiate the framing of the legislation? And after it is framed in its rough state so to speak, does it then go to the office of legislative counsel?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that is a fair way of stating it. Let us take, say, The Department of Highways. The law staff would frame the legislation within its competence to carry out the policy of the department. It is submitted to the legislative counsel, not really to deal with the matter of policy but to consider the drafting to make sure that the intention is expressed—to make sure it is, let us say, intra vires or within the principles of affording appeal, the rights of individuals and so on are not infringed upon. To that extent, a legislative counsel would review it very carefully, and I might say we did discuss this quite thoroughly at the opening day of my estimates.

Mr. Sopha: Is that supposed to be a reprimand? Is that a reprimand to me, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not. Mr. Chairman, I am having to repeat myself considerably, and I do not mind doing that but I would want to say—

Mr. Sopha: I might have a fresh idea.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not fresh really, not fresh at all. Mr. McRuer made certain recommendations about bringing all the lawyers in the government within The Department of the Attorney General, and we discussed that. I think I said that I thought that that recommendation was a very meritorious one, and that we were striving to achieve it. I cannot say much more than that, but I think we have made some progress in that direction already and will make more.

Mr. Sopha: I am sure Mr. McRuer will not interpret it as a gratuitous comment from myself, but I merely want to remind you, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Downsview and I, long before Mr. McRuer took pen in hand and began to write his three volumes, had been advocating that the Attorney General over there should be involved in all of the law, and in every aspect of the law of Ontario, whether in the courts, in drafting legislation, in giving opinions or anything else that lawyers do. The Attorney General should be a kingdom unto himself in that regard. And if my friend from Downsview and I are here long enough, as I expect we will be, we are going to have our own way about that. We are going to have complete success.

We had a little victory the other day. I notice in the public prints that instead of going out to hire a downtown lawyer for that new Royal commission, we are going to use one of the home-grown products as the counsel to it, and all these are marks of progress.

It is analogical but not in four-square with this matter, but I was quite disturbed about this Collingwood nursing home business when the law department of The Department of Health went off half-cocked without apparently consulting the Attorney General's staff about it. I say quite categorically, I see no reason whatsoever that legislation should be initiated even it its first draft in any of these other departments within their legal empires.

If they want a bill drawn, then all they have to do is draft up a brief for legislative counsel and the other persons of expertise in The Department of the Attorney General and send it over and say, "We would ask you to draft this suitable bill to accomplish these purposes that we have in mind." After the initial draft it ought to go back to that department and they can point out any unique or peculiar qualities or matters that they wish to have included in it. I am sure the legislative counsel could encompass the special and particular, and the bill would then truly be a product of the experts in the law who ought to be—and I am sure they are, knowing many of the personnel—experts in this department. For the first time, in that way the government could become truly responsible for the form of legislation.

Two things ought to be said about this—and on many an occasion a search of the reports would demonstrate the validity of this observation—legislation of this Parliament has been under review in the courts and its ambiguities or its obscurities have unquestionably cost private litigants many hundreds of thousands of dollars, as it wended its way from the lowest courts through to the Supreme Court of Canada. That type of problem and that discouraging encounter with the law on the part of private litigants could, to a large extent, be avoided if the legislation emanated from one centre of expertise, and that centre ought to be nowhere else but in The Department of the Attorney General.

Then the second observation that ought to be made—and I hope this does not repeat what was said on Friday, forgive me if it does, Mr. Chairman—is that if the legislation were initiated in the form that I advocate then it could truly be said to be legislation of the government because in no way does the bill introduced here by any Minister, any of the 22, mean that that bill or that that Minister has a vested interest in the bill. It comes from him because it is relevant to his department.

But every bill introduced here as a government measure is the responsibility of the government as a whole and we know nothing about what goes on in the Cabinet chamber. I would suspect that these bills go in there for review by all of the Ministers at some time and they are taken to know the contents of them, with the exception of Bill 99, and it is safe to say that when your senior is not here, Mr. Chairman. I would measure my words more carefully if he was here. That one must have slid through without a proper amount of observation by the Ministers.

But the point I make is a valid one, that bills introduced here as government measures are the responsibility of the whole Ministry.

Now, does it not make sense that there be a common clearing house, a common place of initiation that in the words of Mr. McRuer, and again I emphasize that the member for Downsview and I—

Mr. Lawlor: On a point of order—

Mr. Sopha: I am almost finished and the member can have his point of order.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore wishes to raise a point of order?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Lawlor: My point of order, Mr. Chairman, was that under the omnibus clause vote 201 we, I thought, gave this a very thorough airing. Both the member for Sarnia and myself particularly went after this matter and this is highly repetitious.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I want to say on that point of order that the member for Sudbury was not here on Friday, but he is here today.

Mr. MacDonald: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, on one earlier occasion in this session, either myself or somebody else from our group, tried to revive a debate which had been conducted and concluded. You quite rightly said it was repetitious.

Now just because the hon. member for Sudbury could not be here on Friday I do not think the whole operation of the House has to be shaped to fit his schedule. I suggest that we follow the rules of the House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please! If I may point out to the member for York South, I would remind him of the incident on Friday during which the member for Riverdale spoke out of order at great length. I brought it to the attention of the member for York South that he also was out of order but he insisted on proceeding, and I permitted him to do so.

Mr. MacDonald: When was that?

Mr. Chairman: This was on Friday—or perhaps Thursday—evening regarding the topic discussed by the member for Riverdale, who spoke at great length about matters that were sub judice.

Mr. MacDonald: What was the topic under discussion?

Mr. Chairman: It was a matter of what was sub judice and what was not, and I permitted the member for York South to carry on then. However, the member for Sudbury has been speaking on this particular point and I am sure he has made his point at this time. I would now put vote 203.

On vote 204:

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, I will try to be expeditious. I assure you I have concatenated my remarks on matters in order to try and bring this debate to some kind of conclusion. However, with respect to this vote, for the first time since the law reform commission was constituted on May 8, 1964. have we a report before us, today, allowing us to see what they have been spending our money on, what they have been reviewing and exactly what these gentlemen have been doing.

The report itself is a compendium in effect, of our law, they are going over a very wide range of subjects, practically anything that comes to mind can be fitted in within the terms of these 30 pages which have been submitted. This being the case, I think this is a proper opportunity upon which to give some brief review, nevertheless, since as I say it is so wide ranging, it cannot be altogether that brief, and I wish to make a few remarks arising out of the submission of this report at this time.

The report says there are five studies that they have been going on with, some of which have been completed at the present time. These studies were before us or have been brought into legislation as a result of a reference from the Attorney General himself. There are in addition to this a considerable number of studies which were self-initiated by the law reform commission, three of which I shall mention subsequently, and they have 11 other studies, seven major ones and four minor ones, under way at the present time; all of which will have considerable impact upon the law of this province.

May I say that as far as this commission is concerned, it is not unique. There are other commissions, say in New South Wales and others, but they have not become too habitual or commonplace in the English-speaking common law world and the initiation of this sort of thing on the whole is a highly beneficial thing to all we legislators. In no way can we be given the springboards and the initial grounding and the immediacy of intelligence that goes into the making of legislation in any better way than through these auspices.

At the same time, I have spoken on a previous occasion in this House as to some of these boys having a field day, and we must watch them with due care and attention as their propensity is to spend a good deal of money. Where better can an academic enjoy the flowering of his talents and range freely than on taxpayers' money directed towards all the nice interstices and the arcane holes that exist in our legislation and which have existed under this present regime for so many years?

With those few initial remarks perhaps I could give a bit of a review and have a number of questions arising out of this as we go along, which the Attorney General may see fit to make some comments upon.

The personal property legislation that has come through—the Catzman report which was passed here last year—is not, as the Attorney General probably knows, in effect at the present time. The inspector of legal offices' report of this year indicates that the machinery to do with personal chattels and the registrations of various kinds of chattel mortgages, bills of sale and whatnot, the central registry system which is envisaged under that legislation, is still far from coming into being.

If the Attorney General could possibly help me, I would like to have some report as to just what the progress really is and what difficulties they encounter in expediting it, because it still seems to be very far away, much to the detriment of the commercial life of this province, from being able to establish such a simple thing as a lien on a motor car. The problems of the practising bar with respect to trying to root out the type of searches that have to be made at the present time are an impingement in this age of automation on our time, and on our services, that seem to go way beyond any advantage that can accrue.

The second thing is the wage assignments—we have dealt with that, The Execution Act—that has been amended; and The Evidence Act of which we had considerable debate and which we had to forefend against the people in the insurance bar. That is in effect. I do not suppose we have had any opportunity—at least I have not heard of any cases coming up under it as yet—but it was certainly a goodly move towards reducing costs of producing evidence, particularly medical reports. We said a good deal at that time and I think there is very little point in pressing it here now.

The fifth matter, which is still under continuing study, is the business of expropriation. The McRuer report is on one side of the fence in its broad-ranging civil rights aspect, and the law reform commission is handling the narrow aspects of the exact assessment procedures that ought to be utilized. The need for that is very great, I suggest to you, and I would ask you to expedite that. A good deal of work has been done on it and I understand it is on the verge of completion, so we are anticipating in this Legislature having before us very shortly an amendment to the expropriation procedures, or a new Act entirely, and you know the position of this party over here. We want a formula—and we think it can be devised: human capability can match the wish—of a "home for a home".

In my own riding—I will just say a word about this—there are 32 people with the present iniquitous legislation hanging over their heads and being thrown out of lands which, through government auspices, largely are being turned over to industry. Individuals are having their homes expropriated by public utilities or public offices in the borough of Etobicoke. To turn them directly over to the purposes of industry—unless adequate and proper compensation is given, at least on the scale they would have derived directly from industry in a sale—is a thing that ought not at this time to take place in our province, and I say it is taking place at the moment in my own bailiwick.

Apart from this, the reform commission is launching into a study at long last, thank heaven, and a little belatedly as usual, of The Landlord and Tenant Act. We will come to that in a moment. The hon. member for Downsview, I think, shares my feeling of phlegm, if I may put it that way, whenever I come to that particular statute, which was a product of, I think, the first Henry who went through the War of the Roses and has never been particularly altered.

The law reform commission has, under its second heading, powers of self initiation on a scale unknown, I think, otherwise, in English or other jurisdictions; far greater than the English law reform commission. The English law reform commission has to get the permission of the Lord Chancellor or of the Commons, whereas here they can come forward and can launch, on their own auspices, studies in the areas of law which strike them. Of course the propensity here, as I said before, would be to go off in some archaic field which nevertheless has some validity—I am not going to argue against it—and as a result of that have come before our Legislature the perpetuities legislation and The Condominium Act, which so far as it goes—I trust the price was not too great—is beneficial. The arcane and almost esoteric nature of the perpetuities legislation, of course, causes one to pause.

However, there is a third matter which they have completed but for which I do not believe we have legislation before this House. That has to do with The Mechanics' Lien Act. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Attorney General about the final report which was submitted to the Attorney General on May 26, 1967.

Just where does that legislation and the legislation coming out of the mechanics' lien report stand? May we anticipate launching into that field? That whole section of our law, designed to protect those who supply goods or services, is supposed to be an expeditious and a less costly procedure. Anyone having to do with that in our courts in the present day will find that there is much delay, and the cost in terms of the legal scale is terribly onerous. Anything that may expedite and simplify that piece of business is very much in order.

Now, as James Joyce used to say, we come to what we call "work in progress" and he ended up with "Finnegan's Wake". I trust that we have something more readable at the end of the day, and under this heading there are seven studies. It includes a wide range, I say, this reform law covers an encyclopedia. The first item under that heading, of course, is family law.

May I say, Mr. Chairman, the day that that legislation starts coming before this House we are going to have a field day, because the report itself is in three great volumes. It is an on-going report, it is not finished either, and in the areas of law with respect to resulting trusts and dower and a whole host of other things, it offers, at least for the lawyers in this legislation—and I see no reason why it would not for the others in this Legislature, too, because after all most of them have wives too—a great field of study and debate.

I have made what I trust are biting remarks about the cost of the thing, about the great time the boys had digging out ancient British precedents and going over vast historical realms, about going out to other jurisdictions —from Australia to Austria. The marriage law under the Ubangi was very foremost in their minds in trying to bring this study to a focus. I thought it could be done with far more thrust and incisiveness, and I would say that in future reports of this kind let them bear that sort of thing in mind or the consequences will become tense. There is a good deal that can be said about that report but I will pass on.

We mentioned a moment ago the business of limitations; that too is being brought up. I want to know under this heading—it is contained at about page 18 in that report—has the Attorney General received the recommendations of the commission as yet, as mentioned on page 18 of the law commission report? The third heading here is on the law of property. There are remarks made as to the total and radical revision of the British legislation under this heading in 1925, and some defensive remarks, I thought, that our law of course was not on a parallel, and because of the nature of tenures in Britain being rather diverse from our own, that therefore the same problems would not present themselves.

Nevertheless no lawyer practising in this province can help but talk about dower and courtesy and the nature of the consideration used in these transactions, without inveighing against it, without saying that the matter ought to have long ago been changed. There should be some kind of coalescence between the registry system and the land titles system in this province. That these two somewhat contradictory systems ought to be brought into a union more in the line of the land titles system is well taken, and as we advance I would trust our direction will be towards the bringing of assimilation of these different systems under our present law.

No one searches a title in this province today under The Registry Act without treading on quicksand, and I use that word advisedly, because it may be precisely some underground right or easement which is not disclosed in the system and from which we have no real protection.

What they do say about landlord and tenant occurs on page 19. They talk about feudal concepts of the land law. Much of the law of the landlord and tenant derives from the laissez-faire doctrines of the industral revolution and even earlier times, and may be out of step with modern commercial practices and social justice in residential accommodation which is demanded for our times. I do not think there is much point in launching into the business of security deposits, evictions, and the roles of bailiffs in this particular regard. I shall pass them over at this time.

Under the section of property projects again, I have a few remarks. There are ten sections under this heading—everything from intestate succession through to land use control. I have been reading over the weekend a rather masterful doctrine called "Tentative Proposals for Reform of Law Relating to Community Planning and Land Use Controls," by Professor J. D. Milner. Again, this is good stuff, and I hope the government will seize upon it, put its teeth into it and make some intelligent use of restrictive covenants and the imposition of zoning restrictions. They are completely out of hand in this province under The Planning Act as it now is and which is one of the chief causes, almost a prime cause, in the present depression in the building business and the cost of homes. That has to be rationalized and I can only say, get on with it.

The job, with respect to a uniform wills Act, is the sixth matter under consideration and again, I would ask the Attorney General, through you, Mr. Chairman, just how does that stand because that has been kicking around for quite a while, both at the conference of uniformity of laws and within the terms of reference of this commission, at least self-designated. There is a considerable section dedicated to it, which I will not read, on page 20 of the law commission report and it seems they have got the new wills Act into fairly good shape. I know very well how you tend to be overwhelmed—revamping our courts and whatnot—and that your work has been heavy of recent date. Nevertheless, these matters are also matters of urgency and we are willing to contend with it. We would ask that you come along with this and bring it forward and get it into the law and then let us get unto important things—economic affairs and poverty, and matters in this province which really reach to the depth of people's lives.

The other matter I want to mention, simply because I can take advantage of the House—and I was given a bad reception the last time I tried to get it in though I am sure it is quite valid on this occasion—is The Motor Vehicles Act and compensation fund.

The report is that they are involved in a study of such a fund. When the part two—six of The Insurance Act, which one of my colleagues informs me does, in effect, bring in the compensation aspects of the Saskatchewan scheme was brought before this House some weeks ago, and was then thrown over for indefinite future implementation on the slight pretext of uniformity throughout the country, which I have never been able to derive, then under those circumstances we come right back to the studies presently being made here in Ontario.

Can there be any question as to the necessity for implementing and bringing this in at the present time? Again, if on reading the report, the matter is imminent, there is no reason that legislation of that nature cannot be introduced. All parties and all reasonable men, I suggest to you, think that regarding the way in which insurance companies are handling claims at the present time and the failures to pay, particularly in cases where it is most needed, legislation is long, long overdue.

I will run through the other matters quickly. They include the business of the matter of confessions into the law of evidence—that is under study. The problem of the age of majority—I think that should be very much under study by the legal professions. As these young people come more and more into maturity, they are becoming more business-like, investing in the market, more and more so I find in actual practice, from day to day, that the age of 21 is anachronistic. It is simply not up to the times. Why should a 19 year old husband and wife not hold property in jointure and not have to place the matter under trust or some form of holding until they reach that age? They are able to earn their living and pay their way in this world and I would think that that business of bringing the age limitation down possibly to the age of 18, in any event to the age of 19, should be considered in the near future.

The next section we can look forward to is—I know I personally do—the world of privacy and personal identification. I hate to quote the man, but as William Buckley says, "the problems of freedom are the problems of privacy in the modern world." In that whole area, and we are going to go into it in one aspect, I suspect, around vote 210—wire tapping—but there is a host of other manners of listening, electronic devices, eyeseeing devices of various forms of manipulations and subliminal advertising. All these things infringe upon our private lives and are only beginning to be touched upon in this province, only beginning to be really gone into deeply anywhere in the world.

I think perhaps New York, as usual, is somewhat in advance of our position with respect to legislation but the legislation of the Supreme Court of the United States is in a terrible mess, touching that whole area of eavesdropping and electronic control of people's lives. They have got themselves into a mess. I disagree with them completely—I shall discuss this during the next session—insofar as those principles delegate to the state legislators and to the state courts the actual operation of the law.

What they have said, as far as federal jurisdiction is concerned, both as to the admissibility of this evidence properly obtained, and to the obtaining of it at all under proper jurisdiction, I think the Supreme Court did not do too badly on that. What they have done is they have allowed the states to override their authority all along the line and, therefore, in effect, the protection of privacy is in great peril throughout the United States at this time, particularly in 35 of the states. In any event, this is their grab bag for the future and I will not hold up the House on that today.

The other matters which may seem rather secondary and incidental but are of great interest, I think, to the legal profession, particularly, are the business of caveat emptor in purchases of property. There is a study going on in that and the business of expunging records of conviction for previous offences. That has been mentioned in this House.

I think it has been given far greater play in the federal House but there is a role here for the provincial Attorney General in this regard. The sooner that consideration is given this, and we stop holding people indefinitely under the spell, or under the dark cloud, of a conviction for which they have paid the penalty, which affects both their livelihood, their chances of employment and immigration possibilities, it will be all to the good.

The other one is the administration—the admissibility of certificates of conviction on criminal matters and in civil cases. This would be a more expeditious way of obtaining information than putting a man on the stand and having to probe, "Were you convicted on such and such a day", and all that sort of thing. A simple certificate would obviate all that difficulty, and I would anticipate seeing that type of legislation brought into being.

Finally, with respect to innocent misrepresentation. This is a law which has given the profession a great deal of trouble; in which decisions go every way; and which, particularly with the high volume and turn-over in property transactions in this time in our history, ought to be brought into line and rationalized. In closing, may I say that I commend the government for having set up the commission, and I commend the commission for having launched into such a wide variety of subjects that extend and stand in great need of immediate revision, because the tendency has been to sit on it over the years, and many of these things have become of explosive impact and are causing unnecessary pain or suffering to goodly numbers of the citizens of the province.

There is no reason, as we are dealing with intelligent individuals, why we cannot get on with it and bring this legislation in in the near future and let the law commission head out into areas which in at least some of the aspects of the law are very necessary. Much of this stuff is peripheral, a cleaning of the house, of the cobwebs in the attic. But as to getting to the substance of the law, in many areas of contract, of injurious affection, and in a host of other matters arising out of The Motor Vehicles Act and whatnot, if we can get to that, then I think that we can do something for the people in this country.

Mr. Bullbrook: Mr. Chairman, if I might digress for a moment, I had the opportunity of going through four years of law school with the hon. member for Lakeshore, and as I listened to him speak in the hallowed halls of Osgoode, I always wanted to say, "Me, too". And today in the Legislature, I say in most parts, me too. I commend the Attorney General in terms of the concept of the commission, and the reports that have come through thus far. My friend from Lakeshore has dealt with almost everything from James Joyce to the shifting use, so I do not think that there is necessity for me to make much comment. But there is one thing. We have had published from this commission, the report on compensation for expropriation. My friend did but lightly touch on it.

This is the one thing that I want to put into the record now from my personal point of view. During the course of the estimates on The Department of Highways, I have been quite vigorous in my questioning of the Minister in connection with what his future policies would be. He has pointed out, as have some of your colleagues and yourself, in this House, the fact that we are hoping shortly for some type of uniform expropriation procedures legislation. Now, I say this to you, that when I read that volume on compensation for expropriation, I really read it with much interest. The time has come, in the law of the province of Ontario, to get away from the semantic approach of value to the owner in dealing with the citizens of the province.

Too many times have I argued before a tribunal—as have my colleagues in the House, members of the profession—through the veneer of archaic principles of English law, that came about through the mental gymnastics of hundreds of years, when we knew in our heart that people were being ill done by. What we were interested in, in effect, was, as my friend has said, some indemnification by way of justice, not rationalization for the expropriator. Now, to the Attorney General, there are two things that have caused me concern.

First, we have got to put the private citizen in the province in the same position, if at all possible, as the expropriating authority. Some people in the House feel that I go too far, but it is essential in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, that the expropriatee must have within his right the ability to choose an appraiser of his choice without a fear of any kind. If the government intends, or any emanation of the government intends, to take away private property rights, then I suggest that it is entirely incumbent upon them to put the expropriatee in the position of being able to go out and choose whatever appraiser he wishes, and the expropriating authority will pay all costs. I do not think that there was too much misunderstanding in connection with my position. I believe that my colleague from Lakeshore, when I put this position forward previously, and I do not think that the Attorney General was in the House, took issue with this.

Then there is the second question of the hiring of legal talent. I think that there is some opposition to this from my friend, but I suggest to you, sir, that there is an obligation also that the government pay for legal talent of one's choice. I find so many times, in dealing with this very problem—and understandably so—that governmental bodies are able to choose legal talent of great repute and ability, and so many private citizens are faced and facing the tribunal with people of less knowledge. Now, I would like to record also my personal opinion, that the government should be called upon to pay the entire legal costs for any counsel of the choice of the expropriatee. Those are the two things that I wanted to record at this time. This is the main report out of the McRuer report that has been tabled before us, and I would hope that in answer to the question put forward by the member for Lakeshore and myself that the Attorney General might make comment as to his attitude to the policy that will be exemplified under the new legislation.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I cannot share my friend from Sarnia's enthusiasm for the remarks of the member for Lakeshore. Today, I found him too discoursive and obtuse, and I thought that his remarks lacked focus. But what is needed here, in the area of law reform, is the introduction of some practicality. The law of Ontario—the great body of the law, the fifteen hundred statutes or so, public statutes presently on the books—any viewing of them from any angle indicates to one that the law has not yet, in the spirit of reform, arrived at the last third of the twentieth century. It is a fair comment, and has been said by others, that the body of the law in Ontario is still very much a reflection of the industrial revolution. Only in very modest degree, does it reflect the collective society in which we now live.

Since I am speaking in terms of practicality, I would like to first refer to one illustration of the activities of this commission. That is the report that they handed down which was six or eight pages in length. I thought that it was very expensively published, with a semi-hard cover on it, as I recall. I do not have it before me now, but that report dealt with increasing the limitation area in respect of claims to the Sandwich, Amherstburg, or the Sandwich, Windsor, and Amherstburg railway. It took them five or six pages to come to the conclusion that the limitation period which was theretofore three months, for bringing an action, should be increased to one year. That is a street car railway, I believe, and that equates with the TTC in Toronto.

Now really, I said at the time and I say it again, that all that was necessary in regard to that reform of the law to bring it into line with common sense, and human frailty, was for the chairman of the law reform commission to pick up the phone and dial the Deputy Attorney General and say: Look here! Let us amend the Act to make it a year, and he would have then put the thing in motion to get Arthur Stone to draw up a bill to be introduced here, and that reform would have been effected.

I would like to hear cogent argument to excuse the spending of public money in making a report for such a simple reform as that. The whole law of limitation, of course, speaking in the realm of practicality is in a mess.

The Limitations Act is beyond the comprehension of any layman, and many lawyers, who approach it. The whole field of the law of torts is a bewildering complexity where the practitioner has to have within reach a publication—a textbook publication—on limitations to inform him when he encounters the problem of what the limitation period is.

In the name of common sense, could not human affairs be ordered to the extent that we seize upon some arbitrary limitation period, say two years, or three years, in which to bring an action to effect a right and to recover damages where a person has been injured? Need we have a six-month period in respect of police officers, the actions of police officers and public hospitals. A year in respect of damage by motor vehicles, three years in respect of a punch on the nose, six years in respect of suing on a promissory note?

Would not human affairs be more simply ordered, if we said that within a space of two or three years, whichever is deemed appropriate, an action may be started in the courts to protect rights, or to secure relief? Need the law march on aimlessly, and in a state of confusion, in this area?

Now, of course, they will study it. The product of this commission has been very meagre indeed. Too much study. A great deal too much study. To make that point it occurred to me a long time ago—and I say in a most friendly way, to my friend from Sarnia and my friend from Lakeshore—that I went to a different law school than they did, but it occurred to me a long time ago, as a matter of abstraction, that Great Britain, in most areas of law reform, is about a generation or better ahead of us in law reform. After the gap of a generation we take the steps here to catch up in the reform of our law. I think it was back in the mid-thirties, I hesitate to quote an accurate date, that they reformed the law of real property in Great Britain. The rule in Shelley's case is a living maxim in Ontario. We have not got around to doing anything about that.

My friend from Lakeshore mentioned the complexity of the registry system, and the happy simplicity of the land titles system. It was two or three years ago that I made a simple suggestion to the Attorney General in that regard, that he might consider some kind of statute whereby a start could be made in requiring land to come into the land titles system—that is to say, all land with which a public body deals. Where a public body is involved, upon beginning to deal with that land, the land shall come into the land titles system. That would include conservation authorities, The Department of Highways, The Department of Lands and Forests and the multiple complex of the government of Ontario and its emanations involved with land in this province.

Now we come to a very difficult subject. I had a bill on the order paper here, two or three years ago, advocating a repeal of The Dower Act, and I never heard from a single women's business and professional club about it. Is that such a horrifying prospect? Would there be near revolution in this province if the Attorney General walked in here one day and introduced a bill to repeal The Dower Act? Would womanhood in the homes of the province rise up and revolt?

I doubt it. I doubt it very much, because they are given plenty of protection in respect of property in other aspects of the law. Indeed my experience teaches me that most husbands are dutiful enough that when they acquire the land for the family home they take it as a joint tenancy, and I dare say that applies in the majority of the conjugal unions in this province. But the Attorney General says that they are studying it.

Let us turn to another field, the whole law of contract. The whole law of contract is the outgrowth of several centuries of judicial decision, and I think society collectively is coming around to the point of view where the merit of Lord Mansfield's observation of the 18th century is becoming the accepted norm. Lord Mansfield said, in a celebrated case, that a man ought to keep his promises, and that not only is that a good moral maxim, it is also a good spiritual and religious one. But Mansfield, as the Attorney General will recall, was repudiated in that belief by a superior court at a later date, and the whole nefarious doctrine of consideration crept into the law and indeed distorted the law of contracts from that time to this. The law of offer and acceptance, in addition the necessity for some contracts being in writing, and many other aspects of the law of contract are unworthy of the enlightened society. I ask the Attorney General, in voting $190,000, when may we expect to see some product of this commission find its way into the House.

Oh yes, there is the law of perpetuities—that was one of the early ones—but I think that was a bit of an anomaly; I think that had something to do with the ready-made report that the great C. A. Wright had on hand and which he sent over to the Attorney General.

But one notes, Mr. Chairman—and if my friend from Sarnia is in disagreement with some of his colleagues, perhaps I will be even more so—that the law of real property gets all the attention, and it was ever thus. It was ever thus in the common law, that the law of real property became the focus of more attention than the law of human rights. So you see this law reform commission was a long time exercised about mechanics' liens—that was an early subject of study—and they must have spent a good deal of time on that personal property security legislation that has not yet come into force, but indeed is the law of this province on the statute books. But a simple thing—just to illustrate the contrast—like paying a decent amount to a widow to bury her husband under The Fatal Accidents Act after he has been struck down by a motor vehicle and divested of his life, is a niggardly $300 that will only pay a portion of a modern decent funeral at the best, and that remains on the statute books. Though a member of the Opposition can put a bill on the order paper and have it debated in the House, he wants for influence with the Attorney General, who can initiate it himself at some later time as a justified and well-ordered reform.

One is not without some solace in making remarks in that realm because over here we struggled for quite a while to remove the inhuman approach to the gratuitous passenger and eventually were successful. That dreadful blot on the statute books of this province that deprived innocent people of just compensation was remedied to some extent, but without a far-seeing approach, because the negligence with an epithet—as it is well described by Lord Atkin, I believe it was, negligence with an epithet—ending up holding sway in that regard. It will be a few more years, I dare say, until that word "gross" is taken out of the statute and it is put on the same footing as anything else.

The law of occupier's liability to remain in the realm of practicality will be some comfort to the Attorney General. He can drag his heels a little bit longer because the British are not yet a generation ahead of us there. That was only enacted, I believe—I would not want to hazard a guess, but it is fairly recently—it is in recent years that The Occupier's Liability Act became part of the law of the United Kingdom. So if we keep up that generation lag behind Britain, then gloomily I foresee that this gobbledygook that the courts engage in in determining liability for people who come on property, will be the order of the day in the courts. And that is a good illustration of how far the law gets from reality.

The television trumpets that one of the chain stores is having a monster sale with gold bond coupons and all the other attractions, and mother and the children are pummelled verbally through the press and television to come down and take advantage of these bargains. But if mother, in going down to the shopping centre, stops her car in an appropriate parking slot and gets out and looks and sees some ice on the parking lot, then the best thing mother can do, notwithstanding all the importunings, is get back in the car and drive home, because if she breaks her leg, having seen the ice, then mother is out of luck.

That is the gist of the case against Dominion Stores, 1962, Ontario Reports, and it shows the unreality of that branch of the law. In other words, in the collective society why ought not the property owner be responsible for those whom he invites to come on his land for his own profit and reward and against whose damages he may insure? That seems to me to be ordinary common sense, and indeed, in my illustration, Mrs. Smith, if I may ascribe a name to her, would recover damages under the common duty of care.

I have named three or four areas—there are many others—but the question really to the Attorney General on behalf of the people of this province and those who think about it, is that in this whole business of contributory negligence, for example—speaking in the realm of being human or just—the whole branch of the law needs a very searching, far-reaching overhaul. Scholars have questioned for a long time whether the innocent person should be affected by the negligence of another. The question to the Attorney General is "when"?

I will tell you part of the answer. Part of the answer is that for too many years this department was a prosecuting department. Its major activity was to pursue criminals through the courts, and its time was taken up and it was obsessed with the prosecution of offenders. The first citizen, a great man with labels, a couple of years ago changed the name of the department and made the Attorney General the Minister of Justice. He meant, by doing that, of course, to indicate or to suggest that the affairs of this department dealt with something more than the prosecution of offenders. If that is so, Mr. Chairman, is it too much to ask that this department busy itself in making a wholesale reform of the law? I think not. And I question, I dispute, with the greatest vigour, the notion that the Attorney General likes to lay around—he lays it around very expertly—that there can be no law reform without it going through the law reform commission. That, of course, is patent nonsense. Many reforms in many branches of the law could be made by initiatory legislation in this House without it going near the law reform commission at all. The common sense of many of the reforms compels their acceptance in terms of logic and humanity. For one thing, it strikes me as being very appropriate to point out that in less than two years' time the Attorney General is going to be involved in the revision of the statutes—if we are to have a revision by the year 1970. That would seem an appropriate time to me for an adequate staff of experienced lawyers to go through all the 1,500 statutes of this province and to determine almost a priority by an examination of them that there are many obsolescent features that ought to be removed.

On the other hand, there are many provisions in the statutes that are not consistent with the collective society in which we live. And such an essay as that has nothing to do with the law reform commission at all. The law reform commission need not be concerned in it. That is the exercise of an intellectual effort and a survey, an examination of the body of statutory law in this province. But I am becoming very discouraged indeed when I see that Sandwich, Windsor and Amherstburg effort and the law, in so many important areas that touch the lives and being of the people of this province, in crying need of reform.

Is it unfair to point out to the Attorney General that we had a three-volume report from the family law section? I forget how much it cost. We noted $30,000 at one time but I think the total cost was more than that. I think that was only one vote. They actually spent a good deal more and that three-volume report on family law has been in the hands of the Attorney General for more than a year. Where is the legislation that ought to emanate from it, that ought to be before this House? Now surely to goodness—if my colleague, my alumnus—no I think she was a year ahead of me—my good friend Anna Bacon-Stevenson, who chaired up that committee—surely they were serious people and they intended that the fruits of their labour should find itself into, in many respects, into legislative enlightenment.

But are we to infer, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General only reforms the law in election years, and do we have to wait until the session of 1971 to see a great batch of legislation come in here or when may we expect it? It is as simple as this: The people of this province spending the vast—perhaps I will substitute the word comfortable—amounts of money that we have voted here for law reform are entitled to see some of the products of those labours introduced here in bills that might be examined, considered and passed by this House.

You will note by way of contrast that when you have a vigorous man at the helm—and I am not drawing any odious comparisons—like the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) and he chairs up a committee—upon which my friend from Downsview and I had the honour to serve, though as far as any reference we were lost in obscurity in the glamour of the Lawrence committee—how quickly the activities of that committee were translated into legislative action and bills put on the order paper.

What is happening in this law reform commission and why are we denied far-reaching reforms? I am not advocating—I want you to know, as a layman, Mr. Chairman, I want to impress upon you, I am not advocating anything wildly radical in the reform of the law. I am merely saying to you and I ask you to accept me at my word, that in many areas, the law of Ontario is behind civilization. Civilization has not yet caught up to Ontario. That is the proposition I ask you to accept.

A good illustration of that, Mr. Chairman, which will come immediately to your mind, is the generation gap at Ottawa in respect of the law of divorce, where the British again were ahead a generation ago in 1947 or so. They expanded the grounds but in these other areas that I—

Mr. Singer: They had a one man in the law commission, A. P. Herbert.

Mr. Sopha: Yes indeed, and Mr. Justice Macardie, the part he played in it ought not to be overlooked either. But that is the point I make to you, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot get through to this league of experts over here. I make that point to you—in these areas that I mentioned, other jurisdictions in the common law system are away ahead of us.

Believe you me, Mr. Chairman, and you would be the first to agree with me, I am sure, that in the law of real property there is no reason whatsoever that that law should be hampered by decisions that were made in the time of Henry I, and the earliest beginnings of the common law. We should strike out. We can branch these anachronistic and antique forms that surround the law of real property and bring ourselves up to date.

There are many other areas where reform is needed—but I suppose, over here, with my friend from Downsview and my friend from Sarnia and myself, it strikes us as rather bitter to contemplate the slowness along the other side because we are reform-minded over here.

We are usually actuated by desire for reform and not change for the sake of change, Mr. Chairman, but reform in the sense of the true Liberal—a means whereby the lot of the citizen is ameliorated; he is bettered by reform and where reform, upon examination, is found to be an inviting venture and one that will reward the lives and property of those affected by it.

It is for that reason that we are impatient over here and I do not wish to venture like my friend from Lakeshore, into any philosophical discussions of law reform in itself, but I see it purely from the pragamatic point of view and as a utilitarian—that when various areas are found wanting when subjected to the most cursory examination, society must come to the rescue and the rescuer is the Attorney General.

Before the end of the session, and probably two or three days before then, my friend from Downsview and I will put on the order paper a bill intituled The Law Reform Act, 1968, and in that bill we will go across several statutes of this province and we will put in there, the reforms of statutes that we think ought to be enacted. We shall do that for the same purpose as the Prime Minister indicated in his Business Corporations Act which was introduced here—so they may sit over the summer and bear the scrutiny of the practitioners of law in this province to ascertain if they are worthy.

Now, in order to demonstrate that there is pith and substance, to use the constitutional phrase, to what we say, I will enjoin and persuade my friend from Downsview and my friend from Sarnia, to join with me to make a survey of some of the statutes and to include in the compilation, many of the things we have advocated in this House. We will lay that statute, called The Law Reform Act, 1968, in the British method. That is the way the British bring their law, or one of the ways they introduce a bill that might cover any number of statutes.

It has never been used as a legislative device in this province to my knowledge but the final responsibility for that type of thing must rest with the Attorney General who, more than anybody else in the Ministry, has control of these things and the content and character of legislation that deals with that head of jurisdiction under section 92; property and civil rights, as well as the administration of justice in the province.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 204?

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, under law reform, there is one matter that I would like to mention with some trepidity. I know the lawyers in the House are going to become upset, as they always do, when any matter comes up that affects them as a profession.

There is one particular law reform which I feel is long overdue in this province and I think it is extremely essential because it has been driven home with great tragedy in the last few weeks. I am referring to a large number of individuals in this province who have lost large sums of money, in many cases their life savings, because they put their trust in a lawyer who, through breach of faith, literally stole their funds from them, used the money for personal or other reasons, went bankrupt and the people were left literally helpless.

I would like to give as an example, the story of Mrs. Josephine Ferraro. This is an Italian lady who lives at 435 Caledonia Road and she had saved up a few thousand dollars and bought a house. Subsequently, she had to sell that home, and with the realization of an equity of $4,000 out of it, she could not sell the house without the benefit of a lawyer.

She went to a certain Mr. Wineberg who handled this for her, but he took the money for his own purposes and squandered it. When she asked for her money it wa snot there. She kept phoning the lawyer, and his secretary said that he was not in, and finally, he told all his clients that the money was gone, he had squandered it all. I believe that he subsequently was charged and sent to jail.

Now, it had been the custom of the law society to reimburse people who lost funds as a result of the crookedness of their members and so they gave Mrs. Ferraro back, not her $4,000, but $1,600. This was a tremendous loss for her because this money had been saved very painfully, and she came to me. I approached the gentleman at the law society who was handling this particular matter, and his reply to me was, "We only gave her $1,600 because there have been so many lawyers stealing money recently that we have not been able to raise the fund large enough to pay all the losses, so we paid a portion of her losses."

Now, I would like to suggest that there is a law reform needed here. Surely the profession as a whole should be required to maintain a control over their members so that this should not become such a common problem.

They should, I feel, by law be forced to raise sufficient funds from their members to protect those clients, those members of the public who, through no fault of their own, completely innocently have their money literally stolen from them. To send the lawyer to jail for two or three years, as happened in this case, is no redress or help for the person involved. This is a little different from the case where someone comes in with a gun and takes your money at gunpoint or threat of death.

Here is a case where you go in faith, supposedly to a reliable, honest man. There is a duty on the part of all professions to govern themselves, and a special duty on the part of the law society to maintain the integrity of the individual members and to guarantee that integrity by collecting a sufficient large fund through the collection of dues, or by whatever means you will, to protect the clients and I would like to suggest—

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): What about doctors?

Mr. Shulman: Doctors are not in the habit of stealing money, I am happy to say.

Mr. Ben: Very interesting!

Mr. Shulman: I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that this is a matter which does require his attention. I would ask him to look into it.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, a question directed to specific matters. In previous years, the item which is now called maintenance, was covered in the public accounts —last ending 1967—under "miscellaneous." The amount under that figure was $41,400, approximately. Now, as they come through, it is under maintenance, and it is a substantially smaller sum than the one I mentioned. Perhaps the Attorney General could give some indication of why the reporting to the Legislature was altered, and, secondly, something of the reduction itself?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might make a few brief comments. Of all the speakers who have expressed views with respect to this vote, I would like to say that I think that the House and members are indebted to the member for Lakeshore, who reviewed very thoroughly the whole business of the law reform commission, its activity, and its report—I thought he commented in a very capable way, if I may say that, about the way in which the commission was carrying on. He criticized certain features, very constructively. The member for Sarnia likewise.

I would like to deal with the items which I felt that I should, and I made a note of some of them. The personal property security legislation enacted as a result of the report and the study of the Caplan committee—that was not, as the hon. member for Sudbury might be interested to note, something that was initiated with law reform. He seems to be under the wrong impression that everything that is brought forward in the legislation, in the way of new legislation, which I think may be properly termed reform, originated with the law reform commission.

Perhaps while I am on that matter, I might point out to him that legal aid did not originate there. Personal property security did not originate there. Every Act, every bill, and I think that there were 40 which I introduced last year in this Legislature, has some reform in it—some measure of change, some repeal, some deletions and additions. As the report of the law reform commission indicates, there were only a half dozen matters which were reported to us last year, on which we moved, to bring in legislation. I have amended The Registry Act, The Land Titles Act, The Police Act, The Fire Act, The Fire Departments Act, and many Acts too numerous to mention in these short remarks. They do not originate, necessarily, with the law reform commission.

Mr. Singer: Now you are playing with words.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I shall deal with this matter at more length before I finish too. The Personal Property Security Act, for instance. When brought down, we reckoned and estimated that it would take five years to make it effective. We deliberately felt that it would take that much time to phase out the things which are affected by the legislation—such as bills of sale, chattel mortgages, conditional sales, liens and to bring in the change of laws, to let those contracts which were dependent on the present laws to wane, so that they could work themselves out. Then we could bring in the administrative side, the computers, and the equipment for the registries that we have envisaged in that legislation, which will simplify and make it possible to do our contract in that field of our economy more quickly.

We felt that this would take five years, and we have four years to go. It may be possible to achieve the result of effecting that legislation and implementing it into action in less than that time, but let me say to you that it is not just a simple matter of passing that bill today, having it proclaimed tomorrow, and it is then in force. There is a great deal to be done in the way of providing facilities and machinery, and in its effect on the contracts which are written under bills of sale—as I say, chattel mortgages, conditional sale agreements and all the other areas of that personal property Act. So that was a particular point raised by the member for Lakeshore. I wanted to deal with it.

The Expropriation Procedures Act, or The Expropriation Act, as it might be called, was raised by both the member for Lakeshore and the member for Sarnia. I would think that the member for Sarnia, particularly, asked me for my views on whether, in that legislation it should be the government's policy to pay for legal counsel for the expropriatee, and for the assessors' charges, evaluation and so on. I would like to say this, and I will express my thinking on this point. We have in tow and in preparation, an amendment to The Expropriation Procedures Act, and I would ask hon. members to note that the matter of the basis of compensation was referred by the Attorney General to the law reform commission. That, we felt, was most important. The commission points out in its report, that the matter was referred to them.

We felt that we had a fairly, but by no means perfect, Expropriation Procedures Act, but that we lacked—and this was something that was not dealt with by the select committee of the Legislature some four or five years ago—we lacked the logic or premise, or basis, on which to found a formula for compensation of property taken. We asked the law reform commission to deal with it, and we were preparing legislation on the basis of the report which we received. When the hon. Mr. McRuer produced his report on the enquiry into civil rights and went considerably broader than our reference to the law reform commission had required or had asked. He went into the whole matter of compensation, or expropriation rather, and historically dealt with the principles behind it and went into the matter of procedures modus.

The question of appeal, the question of evaluation, the questions of payment and so on, he dealt with. He dealt with compensation as well, and it has to be borne in mind that Mr. McRuer sits as a member of the law reform commission. He is a former chairman, and now I believe, a member or vice-chairman—certainly a member of that commission. So, faced with that broader point of view, we felt it wise to take it into account. We did so, and the legislation which was promised in the Speech from the Throne, the expropriation bill, provided equitable means of compensating for property taken and means of carrying out and achieving that objective. It is in our hands, and has been studied, not only by the legal staff but, I may say to you, by my colleagues in all departments of government. And, as Mr. McRuer has pointed out, there are 35 statutes in Ontario giving expropriation powers, so that it is necessary that there be a broad field of study to get the views, and to ascertain the effects of expropriation in all these fields. We are moving, and have moved, I may say, as quickly as was reasonably possible. We shall be producing that legislation, I would hope, soon—I will not attempt to fix a date. We shall be producing it, and I think then, to answer the enquiry of the hon. member for Sarnia, I think that would be the appropriate time when I produce the legislation to say, "Here is our policy."

Mechanic's lien—we have that report. This was one of the questions raised. We have the report of the law reform commission, but I must tell you that there has been so much difficulty, so much opposite opinion, between the construction group and the suppliers that the law reform commission had to hold extra hearings, actually after producing its first report, had to provide hearings again to get the points of view which have not been reconciled.

Now I do not say that we have to wait until these points of view which are, I think, perhaps irreconcilable, are reconciled, but we want to feel that when we do produce legislation in this field, which is a confused and unsatisfactory area, that it will be a satisfactory piece of legislation.

I do not suppose that you can meet everybody's approbation or get that but it will be as reasonable, as logical, as helpful as it can be. So we have not been able in the light of the views that have been expressed—and this has been going on right up to recent weeks—to produce that legislation just yet.

The hon. member for Lakeshore mentioned limitation of action and asked if we had received the report on that. We have not. I note the commission says they have completed their study, or words to that effect, but they have not yet delivered to us a report on the matter of limitation of actions.

Now I would like to take a moment just to deal, I see the hon. member for Sudbury has returned, and it is very nice to hear him extol the British system of—

Mr. Sopha: I always did, is there something sinister in your words?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I think not. It is nice to hear you extol that for which I have much respect but let me tell him this, I have great respect, too, for the way the British approach their legislative problems.

I was not able to find a report I read, I think it was when I was back at law school, perhaps earlier than when the hon. member for Sudbury was there, the report produced on the real property system in Britain. That was in 1928 or 1929 and it has not yet been implemented.

Mr. Sopha: How about The Real Property Act 1935—what is the year of that Act?

Mr. Bullbrook: 1925?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, 1925.

Mr. Sopha: No, not the Act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the report, not yet implemented. I do not think you will find any registry office in Great Britain, no central system—

Mr. Sopha: Anywhere in great Britain?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You have to get the deed out of the lawyer's office. When we were studying The Consumer Protection Act, we could find nothing approaching that in the law of Britain.

Mr. Sopha: You were pretty weak on real property—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As I say, no central registry, no Consumer Protection Act. I do not believe there is any law of condominium there, as far as I can discover when we were preparing our legislation and I think that is quite an advanced piece of legislation. There are some things in which I think we have moved.

Mr. Singer: It is pretty hard to raise mortgage money.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it helps.

Mr. Singer: How many times has it been used?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: However, I have heard the hon. member make a great fuss over the Sandwich and Windsor railway report which was just a small thing, six pages, like this, and he said—

An hon. member: Too expensive!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it did not cost much.

Mr. Sopha: What is wrong with a phone call?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It was not a hard cover. A curious thing was that although he said all this could have been done by a telephone call—that special limitation existing all down the years to that particular railway—it was curious that when the law reform commission brought it to the attention of the House, the hon. members are quick to decry its importance. Yet never will you find on the pages of Hansard, where you stood up in past years and said, "That should not be there", I do not think you will find that.

So I think you might give the law reform commission some credit for having located that area of injustice and removed it because I cannot find that any of the hon. members raised the question at all until the law reform commission wrote this small six-page report.

Mr. Sopha: I never heard of that railway.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No? I think you ought to give the law reform commission credit for having discovered the railway and discovered the injustice and having it removed.

Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the estimates of the law reform commission this year are somewhat less than last year. A total of $190,000 this year and I can recall the hon. member for Downsview—I think it was two years ago, I have not got the Hansard, but he will recall, two or three years ago—saying in the estimates of the Attorney General, "You do not do enough research, you do not spend enough money".

Mr. Singer: Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: "—you do not get enough academic people, you should be doing research in the field of law," and I think I stood up and agreed with him. I think he was right.

Mr. Singer: You would, now you are cutting back on your estimate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No; very little.

Mr. Singer: That is what you said.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, less than last year; $213,000 last year, $190,000 this year. I agree with him and you will find that the law reform commission in its projects on family law; on real property; on the law of evidence; the limitation of actions; that these things do touch the lives of these people very close to the family law and property law. They are employees, professors, law professors and academic people from our universities and law schools all across this province and to some extent from outside Ontario, doing research which I think is most valuable. And I think, Mr. Chairman, when you spend $190,000—

Mr. Singer: Did my colleague from Sudbury say you should not do this?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, but he seems to decry the fact that we are spending this much money.

Mr. Sopha: Without any evidence of a product.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, if the hon. member cannot see the evidence, I do not know how I can enlighten him. The evidence of the results are all before us, in legislation, in courts and in the way we are moving. I say, Mr. Chairman, that I think this $190,000 is the best value for this estimate, or of any estimate we could vote in this House, in any department.

I think it is well worth the money. I can think of nothing that should be supported more by members of this House than in the field of research and study and reform of law. That is my sentiment with regard to this estimate.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General bridles under criticism. I have seen this technique used by him before and he loves to compliment a theoretical speech, sir, such as was given by the member for Lakeshore. It sounds nice, and it pats somebody on the back, but it does not really get down to the meat of the issue. With due apologies to the hon. member for Lakeshore and my colleague from Sarnia, they are new boys in the House and they have not suffered the growing pains of this law reform commission, as my colleague from Sudbury and I have.

Mr. Chairman, nobody in this House would have objected one whit if the estimate for the law reform commission had been increased from $213,000 to $250,000, provided we were satisfied that you were turning out a product. This is the concern my colleague from Sudbury and I share, and have shared, since we began to talk about this, since we began to talk about law reform in this House.

Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General is quite right when he says that a couple of years ago I criticized him severely for not spending enough money, and I agree. I repeat that criticism. The Attorney General apparently has been reading my speeches and I would have hoped he would have paid more attention to them than he has because what I said then, I repeat now, and I am not going to read the whole thing to you. If you want I can get it out and read it all over again but as the Attorney General shakes his head, I will not do it. I just say you are not doing enough and it is not coming through quickly enough.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, with the views put forward by my colleague from Sudbury when he says the concentration has not been sufficiently directed to things affecting people; that it goes more to matters concerning property. I would like to see a real study done into the fields that concern the magistrates' courts and the law of evidence. You are beginning to nibble at it, but what have you done about trying to determine what to do with the chronic alcoholic—the fellow that Magistrate Bigelow deals with so badly? What have you done about that? Surely that would be a task that would be well worth the while of any law reform commission worthy of the name.

What have you done about the teenagers who come into courtroom No. 23 in Toronto day after day who have social problems, who are disturbed, who are emotionally unhappy, and who get sent off to one or other of the places they get sent off to? What have you done about taking those people away from the courts and providing proper social services to treat them? What have you done about that? That is the thing that I think the people of Ontario would like to see. Surely the law reform commission could turn its mind to a better system of magistrates' courts.

I cannot deal with this at too great length, Mr. Chairman, because it comes under a separate vote. It is under vote 207. But what have you done about the sort of thing that Howard James wrote about in his book "Crisis of the Courts"—which, incidentally, I may say, Mr. Chairman, to give full credit to the chairman of the law reform commission, he was the first person able to produce for me, and very kindly lent me, the bound copy of the book, and I have it here. What have you done, Mr. Chairman, about directing the law reform commission into the kind of reform that Howard James talks about in this Pulitzer-Prize-winning series of articles that was published in the Christian Science Monitor?

That is the sort of thing, Mr. Chairman, that we think the law reform commission should have been directing its attention to. The Attorney General says, "I brought in umpteen statutes and each one of them is a bit of law reform," but when you look through them, the ones that have come through this year, and it is not law reform, it is crossing the t's and dotting the i's and changing the grammatical errors, and that is all it is.

Law reform means really, at least in my mind, Mr. Chairman, getting to grips with the anachronisms and the archaic shibboleths that we have in our law. They are there for no reason and continue on merely because the man charged with the responsibility by the government of Ontario has yet to come to grips with this problem. When the Attorney General begins to seek refuge in the fact that two years ago I criticized him for not spending enough money, I again repeat that criticism, Mr. Chairman. When he tells us that it is a little bit reduced this year I think he should be embarrassed to say that they have cut back on the money allocated to the law reform commission instead of substantially increasing it.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I only wish the Attorney General would see that there is no department of government which affects the flavour and the quality of our society more than his own. The Department of the Attorney General, within its jurisdiction, goes to the very essence of our society, how we behave, and our relationships with our fellow men. Departments like that of the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) are just marginal frills on the thing—looking after some relatively unimportant aspect—but what I am saying is that the very essence of our society is determined, to a large extent, by the activities of this department.

One reason I get up is to share with my friend for Downsview his enthusiasm for the spending of money in this area. It is useful, Mr. Chairman never to lose sight of the fact that the member for Downsview and I do not run things around here—it is useful to remember that. However, I merely want to protest that he and I have our responsibility of putting forward the propositions which we think commend themselves to common sense, and against that background I say that I share with him his enthusiasm that we might spend a great deal more in this area.

The Attorney General seeks, and he did so very weakly, to defend this law reform commission for that little pamphlet about the railway in Windsor. Goodness gracious, Mr. Chairman, am I being unreasonable when I say that rather than that little dissertation on that railway, might we not have expected some survey of the whole field of the law of limitations? Did it have to be constricted to the Sandwich, Windsor and Amherstburg railway? Could they not have expanded their hours of study of the law of limitations and let us have some kind of a report on that whole rubric of the law?

I am not going to take the time or tarry to look back in my previous speeches, but I am going to tell him this, that I was talking about the inhumanity of the law of limitations long before this law reform commission was founded, several years before it was founded. I took the opportunity to make observations in this House about the injustice that stems from these artificial limitation periods, and I merely want to say that I welcome the day when that law reform commission grabs hold of that whole Limitations Act and puts it in language that is somewhat comprehensible and goes through the various statutes and determines what shall be a practicable and just limitation period.

Then I want also to protest that my friend from Downsview and I read some books on the subject. We have a lot to read. The leader of the Opposition imposes upon us a terrific responsibility to do a lot of reading, but we have to read subjects affecting several departments. He has one in his hand there—a very good book which I read. I read one that is in the library and I looked in the back to see how many other people had had it out, and only one other subscriber has had it out. It is called "Law Reform Now," a British publication.

Mr. Singer: It got into the library because we suggested it.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, we suggested it be purchased by the library. It took a long time to get it from Britain. I have great admiration for the British system—I do not care much whether John Graves Simcoe is resting in peace or not—but I have a great admiration for the British system of government and its importation into Canada and the changes that we have made in it to suit our own environment, our own needs and the desires of our own people. It has been a work of genius, I say to the Attorney General.

But the authors of that book, very able lawyers, say the whole law of contract is a mess and it is no longer consistent with the business forms that we pursue in this province, the commercial life to which we are so committed. They say the law of contract is not an appropriate vehicle to pursue our economic life efficiently and with a diminution of expense that we encounter.

So, all the member for Downsview and I are really saying is, let us have a quickening of the pace. I have heard the chairman of the law reform commission—a very able lawyer and a well recognized legal scholar—say: "These things must be cogitated upon." Oh, yes, what was his phrase? I am blessed with a good memory; I recall his phrase now. He said—and I will not do butchery to it: "Law reform is not something to be thought of on an idle summer's afternoon." In other words, it is not the vehicle for passing cogitation. He meant to imply that it is a very serious business.

All right, I accept that, but I say also that society moves too fast to wait. In this modern age, we just cannot wait, we are impatient, and intolerant of delay, and the people out there on the street that we represent are not willing to tolerate the academic approach to reform, they want it yesterday, that is the way the world moves. And they are right.

When the statutes contain inhumanities, when they provoke situations that lead to injustice, then people are right to be intolerant of delay. Those things must be remedied tomorrow, because a society that respects itself does not have to wait for cogitation and study and research. But, of course, this government is the most studious government that ever existed on this continent.

Before doing anything, they have to study any phenomenon from at least four different vantage points and by several committees or advisory groups or some other mechanism before they will finally see the light of day or see the necessity crystallized in legislative action. To say that, is to speak about the story of our legislative lives, because my friend, the member for Downsview and I have observed that over many years.

Well, we are not asking, I want to emphasize, for radical innovation at all; we are not demanding experimentation or a wild venture into legislative adventure. No, we are not. We are asking for practical reforms in the law in the areas that I have mentioned—and I could dredge up many more areas—and we are asking for it at an early time and we will settle for nothing less. Now that takes me back to saying that he and I—able lawyer that he is—do not run things here. No, we do not.

But as long as we are carrying out our responsibilities, he and I will be on our feet in this Legislature protesting the common sense of this action. We only hope that at the next session the Attorney General will not come in with the usual "passel" of legislation that he comes in with—and he did not have as much this year as he had in previous years—the technical corrections and housekeeping amendments, well illustrated by the innocuous bill that the Attorney General usually introduces on the first day of the session.

Well, that is not going to saitsfy my friend, the member for Downsview, and my friend, the member for Sarnia. And, by gosh, I am encouraged with the knowledge that whereas my friend from Downsview and I are getting to be old hands around here, that we have a fresh breeze of intellectual excitement back there on the back bench that in many ways will give a new verve to the law in this province. And we welcome his participation.

The last thing I want to say is that I have been disturbed over the years by the personnel of that committee, the law reform commission. And they are all very good lawyers. Some of them are friends of mine. Mr. Chairman, why is it, when this government sets up a commission, it is always composed of these people from the gold brick firms downtown? Why do you not get some struggling, threadbare lawyer sometimes that might be impelled by a gleam of missionary zeal?

The product of this commission, you see, is a reflection of who they are. Probably 31 of those fellows come from a firm with at least 30 lawyers in the complement. The head of the firm probably does not know them all, but they deal with these exotic matters in the law of real property and it is no coincidence nor is it an accident that these people come to the law reform commission and say, "Look we have to reform the law on mechanics' liens, that is bothering us, and we have to look at the law of wills". That is a lot of their business, and I would not doubt they will be after the law of succession duties next; that will be high up on the agenda.

But if the Attorney General searched around—I will tell you the name of the person, I do not want to leave this in a vacuum—if you put a fellow like Aubrey Golden on that commission, I would guarantee you that it would be dealing with human rights. I am not going to get into the matter of the drunks and the penchant for this government to put people in jail.

We are going to deal with that under the administration of justice where we may be much more discoursive on it, but my plea, and it is a very serious matter to me because I am a reformer—I am in the tradition, I hope, of Mackenzie and Baldwin and Blake, and yes, Maskenzie King and Liberals of that stripe.

I do not want to sit around this Legislature year in and year out unless I see some improvement in the life of our people, resulting from the quality of the legislation that passes through here. That can be the only justification that I have in being so silly as to come down here year after year and participating instead of having my feet up and playing with the children at home.

Well, a person has to get justification from somewhere. I get it in seeing improved legislation, and that is the business of this law reform commission. I say to the Attorney General that, commencing next session, I hope we see some product out of that commission that will take Ontario—and he can have the praise, like all of his 22 colleagues over there—into the forefront of the nation, if not the universe, in the reform quality of the legislation. And he will find on this side that my friend from Downsview and my colleague from Sarnia will be the first to hail the validity and merit of it. We will be on our feet; we may say that it is long overdue and we may be excused for that little qualification, but our votes will be behind that legislation also.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: For the benefit particularly of the hon. member for Sudbury, I should put on the record a portion of the report of the Ontario law reform commission, because with all his readings, he does not appear to have read it.

Page 17, under the heading, "limitation of action," I read this because he spent so much time on the Sandwich and Windsor railway and went on to say that he would have hoped that there would be a study and report on the whole matter of limitations. Now he does not seem to be aware that this study has been going on for some time. And I should like to read this, Mr. Chairman. This is paragraph 61 of the Ontario law reform commission's annual report:

> A comprehensive research project involving the law and limitation of action was initiated by the commission in 1965. Much of the law on this subject in this jurisdiction is very old.

They go on at some length to outline the work that is being done, the difficulties, the archaisms and the anachronisms that are in the law; the references to the people they have consulted; the laws they have looked at with the view to reaching reform; and in paragraph 66, the commission has completed its deliberations and its report to the Attorney General containing its findings and recommendations is now in course of preparation.

So I just wanted to set the mind of the hon. member at rest that this whole field of limitations is being studied. The report is now being prepared and it was out of this study that the little matter over which we took so much time—the Windsor and Sandwich, or Sandwich and Windsor railway—arose.

Mr. Singer: Are you sure of that? My friend from Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. B. Newman) told me where he thought it came from. He said that over the years the lawyers in his city have petitioned everybody in sight to get this changed, because they are the people who deal with it. They thought it was a great anachronism. That is where it came from—not out of this study at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think it came in a different sense—it was in the study of limitations.

Mr. Singer: Oh, I see.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I would not say it was initiated; it came out of the whole study of limitations.

Mr. Singer: I think that my friend the Attorney General instead of criticizing my colleague from Sudbury for not reading should find out whereof he talks, before he talks. I use another example.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think your friend—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General mentioned the law about condominium and hailed that as a great reform. I have enquired from many of my legal colleagues in the House—I have asked my colleague from Sudbury, my friend from Sarnia, my friend from Kitchener, my friend from Dovercourt, my friends from Halton—none of us has come across a single instance where that law has been made use of. Could the Attorney General tell us on how many occasions the law of condominium has been used?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, Mr. Chairman, I would have no way of knowing off-hand. This is a recent law. It came in the last session. But if the hon. member wants to make these enquiries broad enough, as we did in preparing the law and in studying it as a law reform commission, he will find that it is used with great effect and great benefit, not just in this continent, but all around the world.

So that I assume that now having passed the law, and giving our people the opportunity of using something that has proven very effective in providing housing, that we will find that it will be used. Just to say that it has not been used yet, is not, I hope, to condemn it.

Mr. Singer: Oh no, I did not want to condemn it. I just recall the remarks of the hon. Minister of Economics and Development —or is it Trade and Development now—that this was one of the magic solutions that we had to solving the housing crisis. That was a year ago.

Then the Attorney General could not retain himself this afternoon with telling us what a great reform they had brought in by giving us a law on condominium. And I was just forced to comment, Mr. Chairman, in view of all that fulsome praise, that I had not found a lawyer in this House who knows of it being used yet, even though it has been on the statute books for a year.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: Prior to the fairly lengthy reply by the hon. Attorney General of the overall thoughts that we had had on law reform, I had asked a specific question arising out of the budget accounts of the public accounts in the last full year which we have, and I would press him on this matter, at this time.

The figure has changed under the term "maintenance", from 20 to 23. I am not taking exception to that, I am simply saying that under "miscellaneous" it was 41,400 the previous year, that is in the 1966-67 full year. Why is the alteration, and why is the changed nomenclature? That is the number one question of a very specific kind.

Arising out of the debate that has gone on so far, I would like to advert to the family law sections of the law commission's work. I did not say much about it in passing. However, a few questions do strike me that are of considerable interest.

In the report they mentioned that there would be a full day's discussion by the members of the legal profession at the annual mid-winter meeting of the Ontario bar, that meeting took place and they had numerous panels. I was pleased to attend it and heard the discussion on balancing claims and resulting trusts and a host of fairly complicated matters. I do not think it brought any great light, and less heat, from the assembled brethren.

Nevertheless, it was indicated then that these panels having met, something would be forthcoming by way of legislation. Section 50—paragraph 58 of this report—then says it is anticipated that the remaining subjects of the project, the entire study by the research team, will be completed in 1968, and these additional subjects are listed at some length. Among them is the structure of a tribunal best suited to deal with matrimonial causes and family law generally. Recently we went through a considerable, if not tortuous, debate on the setting up of a tribunal in this province to handle precisely these matters.

My question has to do with whether or not the proposals or the tentative proposals of this law reform were taken under consultation. Were they available even at the time that we got into the business of reforming the structure of family law justice in this province through the courts? Did we, or did you, have available at that time a background report or some form of consultation that is going on under the general auspices of Professor Baxter towards the range and the pertinency of the courts that we have set up in the past couple of months which are handling matters of precisely this kind?

Whether, in other words, the law, the family law, the commission, had taken into consideration the kind of thing that we were doing, that we were not missing the boat in any way? And that perhaps these courts might have been set up somewhat differently with a different structure—maybe a division between the criminal and civil jurisdiction—which might have been more far-reaching than it is under our new legislation? In other words, did you have this opportunity to get the considered judgment of people working in the area of family law?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, to answer this specific question, first about a relationship of the miscellaneous item as it appeared in last year's estimates, and our maintenance this year; these are really the same. Maintenance covers what was miscellaneous before, and you will have observed, I am sure, that the miscellaneous items last year are spelled out in detail amounting in total to $41,433.78. This is one item which is less, considerably less, in our estimate this year. We have just included in maintenance the type of thing that was in miscellaneous last year.

With respect to the matter of family laws study, this has been going on, and is continuing. The papers we received were not the report of the Ontario law reform commission in this matter. They were the background. There were certain background studies and background papers, and in presenting them to us not too long ago the law reform commission said: "We are now proceeding to prepare our report. You will receive it in due course."

The documents which we received were certain background papers prepared by various eminent people who were working on this project. I am not sure whether the hon. members know that this family law project is headed by a professor I. F. G. Baxter of the faculty of law of the University of Toronto, and he has with him research fellows, and consultants engaged on a part-time basis: Dean T. G. Feaney of the faculty of law of the University of Ottawa; Professor J. D. Payne, of the faculty of law, University of Western Ontario; Professor Dean Mandis De Costa, of the Osgoode hall law school; Professor John Swan, of the faculty of law, University of Toronto; Professor E. R. Alexander, of the faculty of law, University of Toronto; Paul Reid, graduate in sociology at York University, and several others, whom I will not name. The papers I say that we received were some of these background papers, and the hon. member for Lakeshore further directs these questions to me.

Did we make use of, or did we have the benefit of anything further in preparing our —I take it that he is referring to The Provincial Courts Act? Particularly the juvenile family court side?

No, Mr. Chairman. I know that all hon. members are aware of the hon. Mr. McRuer who sits as a member for the Ontario law reform commission. He, as you know, spelled out, and at quite some length in his present volumes of the inquiry into civil rights, the type of court which we should have for our present magistrates' courts—how they should be designed, how they should be upgraded, and on the juvenile and family courts side—as you I am sure very well know—the considerations which should apply there are spelled out in great length. We did take those into account, and I feel quite certain that we took those into account almost without exception. I feel quite certain that the hon. Mr. McRuer sitting as he was, a member of the law reform commission, and presenting that report of his to us, was expressing, I am sure, the concensus which would have come forward in the law reform commission on that side.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 204. The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, is the Attorney General going to answer the query which I directed to him some hours ago?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. I regret that I did not. I have a note of it here. The only note I made was when the hon. member said that the law society—he said he was in touch with the discipline committee—and said they did not have enough money. Has the hon. member got a letter to that effect? No? The reason I ask is this. I know that there was a period, I think some two years ago, when the fund created from the contributions of lawyers —and they were all assessed to that fund—I know there was a period when that fund was not capable of meeting the defalcations which had occurred. Steps were taken to fortify the fund, and further steps were taken to make more frequent inspections and audits of lawyers' accounts, and my understanding is that that fund was restored and has been capable for some time of meeting all claims that are properly proven.

Now, I am not questioning the hon. member's understanding of the answer he got, but I think I have a feeling that perhaps the claim was not proven in the manner it should have been—I would like to see the hon. member bring this to my attention. If he will bring me a statement from the discipline committee of the law society of Upper Canada, saying that we have not go the money to pay the claim, I would be very interested to see that. I am very interested because I pay into that fund, and my clear understanding is that it is capable of meeting all claims which are now against it, and that it will be maintained in that way.

Mr. Ben: Will the Attorney General permit me to assist?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, just allow me to thank you.

Mr. Ben: You are a little off base here. I think if your memory serves you right, there was an amendment a while back which limited the amounts paid to any one solicitor defelcating to $50,000, with a maximum of $15,000 to any one client. Now, in this particular instance, the lawyer in question went for roughly a quarter of a million. So in this instance—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is $1,400?

Mr. Ben: No, the claim here was for $4,000 and she received only $1,600. There was a limit of $50,000 for a lawyer defalcating—although they have gone over sometime—and a limit of $15,000 for any one client or claimant. It is conceivable that in this particular incident, they have pro-rated, because the claim was so much above the maximum they pay.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I appreciate the hon. member's desire to be helpful, and I think he has indicated some further information, but I do not really believe that is relevant to this case. If the hon. member for High Park will get me a statement that they will not pay because they have not got the money, I will be glad to follow it for sure.

Mr. Shulman: To elucidate this a little further, this particular lawyer did not just have this one claim. He had a very large number of clients whose money he had somehow spent. I would like to ask the Attorney General, is that correct still? Is that the situation at the law society, that there may not be payments over $50,000 for a crooked lawyer? Is that the situation?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If someone is in the position of claiming an amount larger than $50,000—that they put in the hands of a lawyer—the rule is, I think, that the fund will entertain up to $50,000, but not beyond that on any one claim.

Mr. Shulman: That is not the question I am asking. Is there a limit for a lawyer? In other words, if a lawyer has a large practice and manages to go, as in this case, for $400,000, is there a limit beyond which the society will not go, and they pro-rate it among all the clients? That is my question.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Offhand I must say I do not know. I could get the answer for the hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: May I suggest to the Attorney General—if the member for Humber is correct, and I believe that he is from what I understand in this particular case—they did not say they did not have the money, they said the number of persons getting into difficulty in this way, and the number of claims had made it impossible to pay the full amount. If that is the situation, it is a very bad situation, because we have here a very successful lawyer who turned out to be crooked, just as a very moderately successful lawyer may turn out to be crooked.

May I suggest that I agree there should be a size limit for individual claims. There is no question about that, but I do not think that there should be a limit per lawyer. I think it is important, it is essential, that the society make sufficiently frequent checks on lawyers' finances so that a lawyer with this large sum of money will not get into such great difficulties. Surely the person who is putting in $4,000 should not get back only $1,600, because 200 other clients also lost money. There seems to me, to be a flaw in the logic.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to add this. The hon. member raises this by way of a suggestion that this is an area of law, he suggests, in which we—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I get the point. He raises this because he says this is an area of law into which, as a government, we should legislate to protect people who suffer from the defalcations of lawyers. Well, perhaps this is a point worth certainly considering.

I would say that I want to make it plain that the government does not, the Attorney General does not administer the law society of Upper Canada. At this time, it is a self-governing profession, subject to certain legislation in The Law Society Act, subject to certain regulations, subject to certain control. But it has its own discipline, its own members belong to it, and I think down through the years, it has operated perhaps not too badly. Maybe in our present day and age with large sums of money, and with the way in which our economy moves, perhaps a further study should be applied here.

Now, I perhaps could tell you that, as you are aware, Mr. McRuer made certain recommendations also, relating to all the professions which seek legislation to govern themselves. You are aware that the professional engineers presented a bill which we had assisted them with and having given it first reading, to provide the self-publicity, we would complete it this session.

I am, I think, able to advise you that the law society of Upper Canada is anxious to present legislation also, for its members, and we are asking that study be done in this field to take count of the recommendations made by Mr. McRuer and other matters such as those raised by the hon. member.

So we will perhaps be producing, before too long, legislation in this field.

Mr. Sopha: Since we are speaking about law reform and this matter of the law society has come up—and many of my brethren downtown in the profession never thank me for this—one reform that I might advocate is that that society should recognize that nothing named Upper Canada has existed around here for 143 years.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Are you really upset?

Mr. Sopha: Well, 1841 to 1968 is 127 years when there has been nothing named Upper Canada that you could put your finger on. They might start with changing the name of that society to—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Upper Canada village?

Mr. Sopha: No, I mean as a political unit. As a political unit we have been Ontario since the Act of union. There are many things wrong with the governance of the profession; that would be a good starting place.

The Attorney General says that he has nothing to do with the running of the profession, but the legislation, the bill, the Act, the statute, comes under his department. I have complained, and as I say, they never thank me for it down there. But out of the desire to say what is right, in accord with reason, I have pointed out that with the doctors and dentists and the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), they stipulate in that legislation that there shall be geographic representation.

The medical profession has geographic representation. The dentistry profession has too, but it is all right for doctors and dentists but it is not all right for lawyers, and presently, the profession is governed overwhelmingly by the Toronto profession. True, most of the lawyers are in Toronto. The majority are in Toronto but I dare say if you totalled up the numbers you would find an imbalance, even with the percentage that practices in Toronto. Presently, as the Attorney General well knows, there is but one lawyer from north of the French River, just one—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Reform Institutions): Is he from Sudbury?

Mr. Sopha: No he is not from Sudbury.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Nobody from Sudbury?

Mr. Sopha: Nobody from Sudbury. Nobody. Just one on the governing body, and he is from Port Arthur. I am told—and this is hearsay only and subject to the vagaries of hearsay, because I was not at the meeting—that at the last regular meeting of my association a resolution was passed and sent to the head office of the bar down there at Osgoode hall, demanding geographic representation on the governing body. They may have been a bit indiscreet in going this far, but they told the head office that if they did not get some geographic representation north and west of the French, they would petition the Attorney General to set up a separate society for northern Ontario. The Attorney General nods, so I suspect he has received a letter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You were not at that meeting?

Mr Sopha: I was not at that meeting. I knew nothing about it. I did not a bit to assist or encourage. Are there any more synonyms that can divest me of my connection with it? I did not know anything about it until it was a fait accompli and was told that that had been discussed at that meeting.

If you want to get into the realm of law reform, the other thing I have drawn attention to is that it is very strange that that body corporate never holds a meeting of the shareholders. The first citizen is bringing in legislation here and has put on the order paper for study by the legal and business community, in which he is going to democratize the running of a corporation and make it more amenable to criticism and constructive suggestion. But the governing body of the law society never holds a meeting of the members in which to hear any useful comments about the running of the profession. That is a very strange anomaly, I must say.

The only contact we ever have with that body is when they tender a free lunch at the Ontario meeting of the Canadian bar association. You have got to have a sense of humour to really size that one up, because all they do in tendering the free lunch is give themselves the opportunity to make a speech. I suspect the man who gives me a free lunch for the purpose of making a speech to me, but that is about the extent of it. We hear from the treasurer and it is a very gloomy occasion, I must say, because all he talks about are the lawyers who have stolen money and the degrees of their nefariousness in—

An hon. member: Has it taken long?

Mr. Sopha: Well, it has in past years. They cite the statistics of who has taken off for Brazil recently with a wheelbarrowful or two of the loot and that is about it.

In recent years that very erudite group known as the benchers has started a publication which it calls the Gazette and I noticed that one arrived at my desk this morning. The public relations gambit. It was rather humorous to see that I got condemned in the first issue. It is a collector's item. They went out of their way to condemn me in the first issue.

An hon. member: What did they say?

Mr. Sopha: You want to know what they said? They said that my talents made me worthy of—what do you call the place they closed down across from the city hall; the Casino?—worthy of a Casino comic, and I put that away for my grandchildren to read.

Mr. Nixon: Could we reduce their vote or something?

Mr. Sopha: I took it as a compliment. And that was a fellow Liberal, too, who condemned me; that is what hurt. It is the blows you receive from your friends in politics, not your enemies.

Over the years I get very discouraged about this. As a democrat, I say in all seriousness, the initiative is never going to come from the profession, I fear; it will have to come from the government. It will have to come from the Attorney General.

An hon. member: They are too well fed!

Mr. Sopha: The Attorney General will have to say to them, "Look here, we will have to take the necessary steps to democratize this and make this governing body responsible to the opinions that views the criticisms of those that it governs."

I do not see, as a matter of principle, that that statement can be quarreled with. I do not see that it is open to be controverted. It is all very kind. For one thing, I think the five-year term is much too long, and this business of making lifetime members of people elected three times is just absolutely not in accord with any democratic notion at all. Who makes us lifetime members after being elected three times?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: No job security here.

Mr. Sopha: No, not at all and that is the way it should be. We all make one too many trips to the ballot box and let them run the same risks. Now, it was only a few years ago that we got a minor reform. They used to put past Attorney Generals on the governing body and I think that is gone. That is not gone? Well, it should be.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): No, that is not so.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You did not figure that one would go, did you?

Mr. Sopha: It should.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Once you are an Attorney General, you are on the benches for life.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is the only percentage in being Attorney General.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: But the one we did change, I have it to mind, applies to judges of the Supreme Court. When they left the bench, they became lifetime members, so the thing got cluttered up down there and the average age of the governing body was about 78. They tell me years ago—and this is the final anecdote—that the pillar of the profession—I will not name him—but he used to go to the meetings, he was about 85, and when the meeting convened he would walk over to a settee and lie down and have a sleep. And he would say before going into slumber, "If anything intelligent is said around here, which is unlikely, somebody wake me up." That is just about the size of it.

Well, what are we going to do? I guess we are going to do nothing until finally the profession itself will have to exercise some initiative.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Put the insurance men in charge.

Mr. Sopha: But I am very discouraged that that is likely to happen.

Vote 204 agreed to.

On vote 205:

Mr. Shulman: On vote 205, there are two brief matters I would like to bring up, Mr. Chairman. First, I am wondering why the office of the senior Crown counsel's expenses have gone up some 50 per cent in two years? This surely should not be involved in the new services. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sorry, I could not get the question.

Mr. Shulman: The expenses under vote 205 are up some 50 per cent since we had the last estimate. That is over a period of two years and I am asking what is the reason for that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, here are the figures I have before me, sir—senior Crown counsel, vote 205, salaries for the last fiscal year were $217,000. Our estimate for this year is $240,000, an increase of $23,000. I do not know whether I can get the details but perhaps I can find something. Yes, we have annual increments, salary revisions of that $23,000. The annual increments and salary revision is $15,800, that is sort of a built-in increase that comes along. Then, overtime and casual staff and so on is $3,200, an item we anticipate. Then, additional staff, that would probably be one person, I imagine perhaps two, at $4,000, so that your $15,800, $3,200, and $4,000, give you the total of $23,000 which is the total increase.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I have here the last public accounts we have, which show a figure of $160,000 which is now up to $240,000, an increase—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is two years ago.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I said over a period of two years; a 50 per cent increase over two years. I still do not understand it, even with increments. Surely the increments are not sufficiently great to bring your expenses up 50 per cent in two years.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I can just think offhand, very quickly, of a number of things. There has been an increase in staff, quite an increase in staff over a two year period. Salaries have increased very substantially, and with the assumption of the administration of justice costs up to this reform by the municipalities, our estimates are substantially increased on that account. Those things come immediately to mind.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, to pursue this matter I would like to leave the crooked lawyers and go to the crooked contractors now. I would like to ask the Attorney General why the senior Crown counsel does not lay charges against the crooks and the thieves who travel about this province, promising to put additions on houses, accepting the money and then just departing.

I have a lengthy article here, which I will not read in detail. It is from the Toronto Daily Star, of Tuesday, November 21, 1967, and it relates how one gentleman, a certain Harvey Cassells—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am quite prepared to discuss this but I think it should probably come under vote 206, the criminal law division, where it talks about the prosecution of persons committing criminal offences. I would be glad to discuss it there.

Mr. Shulman: Is it not the responsibility of the senior Crown counsel?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, it is not.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 205.

Mr. Sopha: I referred to it earlier though not in depth, but I want to express considerable reservation about Mr. Callaghan being the counsel to this Royal commission investigating the conduct of the two magistrates. The Attorney General is in no sense the prosecutor of these magistrates. It is not a prosecution, and if there is one case where in order to make the thing completely independent, outside counsel ought to have been employed, I would think it is this case.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I may say so, this is in no sense a prosecution, I agree. The senior Crown counsel is not a prosecutor. We have a director of public prosecutions. The senior Crown counsel is of the Attorney General's office and they are not to prosecute; they are to lend their talents, knowledge and ability to the administration of justice and he was selected for this case by the commissioner who said, "I should like to have your most senior counsel assist me in this case". He is not appointed by the Attorney General, or by the government.

Mr. Sopha: The point I would like to make—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He is not there to prosecute and I think the Attorney General's office has a responsibility to see that the administration of justice is rightly carried out. To say that my advisers, my senior Crown counsel, cannot take part in carrying out that responsibility, is something I cannot agree with.

Mr. Sopha: Well, let us examine this under our system here. Here we have the excutive of which the Attorney General is a member. The executive and the administrator, let us lump them together, and over here we have the judiciary. Under our system they are rigidly separate. Now something went wrong over here, without going into the merits that caused the Attorney General and the government to act, and quite properly, the Ministry initiated a commission of enquiry.

But I would think that that commission of enquiry ought to perform its duties quite independent of the Minister and quite independent of the executive. Now, in order to achieve the total independence, I would think that it ought to be divorced from the assistance of one of the Attorney General's senior advisers. Under the vote with which we are now dealing, one of his advisers, Frank Callaghan, because there is no question of the impartiality of the enquiry under Mr. Justice Rand, a very reputable man with a very keen mind, but why should the executive and the administrative branch, when they are not concerned, why should they give or allow to be inferred a question of concern in what goes on in the enquiry, by having a senior man assisting the enquiry?

My point is that the Attorney General, who initiated this enquiry should have been completely divorced from this enquiry to give the total impression of fairness. This was one case where every one connected with that enquiry should be divorced from the government of the day. Now, what is wrong with that proposition? I was quite astounded in picking up the paper, when the habit, and indeed the practice almost invariably followed that commission counsel were selected from lawyers outside the government—in every on—I want you to know, Mr. Chairman, how after all the protestations of the Attorney General that I read in the press over the weekend, that I was astonished to pick up the paper and see the senior Crown counsel was the commission counsel. I think that was a very unwise and indiscreet move. Mr. Justice Rand, if he made that request, should have met this repartee from the Attorney General, "No!"

In order to keep the executive totally divorced from this, we suggest that you look elsewhere to get counsel. Here is one inference that can be drawn. I shall just lay it on the table. The one inference that can be drawn, and I will not distort words, or torture language to make it, is that the Attorney General, having initiated this enquiry, has it in his interests to have someone there, one of his senior advisers there to keep his hand on the pulse and to see how the enquiry goes from day to day.

Now that conclusion is irrestible, that in other words, the Attorney General, having taken this very dramatic step, and I would be the first to say that the Attorney General acted with responsibility—knowing the danger that the Attorney General is in if he is wrong—that Mr. Callaghan go, to resort to the vernacular, to keep an eye on things for the Attorney General, so that he knows from day to day just what is going on, and whether it is justified. What we want to achieve here, is a precedent. This type of enquiry, which we have not encountered before, is a precedent.

We have been very fortunate in our judiciary. In order to achieve the maximum of fairness and to allow or allay the public fears and suspicions, it was incumbent upon the Attorney General here to say, "I want that enquiry, having initiated it." I am paraphrasing this, because he did initiate it, "Having done that, I want it to operate in a complete atmosphere of independence and impartiality."

I do not see how he could have done otherwise in the circumstances. And in the attitude that he took in this House, in response to enquiries directed to him, I would say that he is being very illogical about this—with all the other protestations and the actions of the government, allowing Mr. Callaghan to be the counsel for the enquiry strikes a discordant note.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Shame!

Mr. Sopha: Shame about what, what is the shame about?

Mr. Winkler: Because you are casting a reflection on the hearing.

Mr. Sopha: Is that your contribution to the public life of Ontario? Shame?

Mr. Winkler: It is as far as what you are saying is concerned.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, well I am putting up argument, and it can be met in the way that argument should be met, by argument to refute it. That is my argument. I am drawing attention to the inconsistency of this one Act, and I would like to hear from the Attorney General as to how he justifies Mr. Callaghan's particiption in that Royal commission.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member will certainly hear from me, because I found it very hard to sit still while he was impugning motives to me which do not even cross my mind—that I wanted somebody there to watch how this would go. I look upon the administration of justice so differently apparently than the hon. member that I cannot conceive of taking such an attitude and I found it very hard to not interrupt him.

I think and agree with the hon. member that there is the executive side of, he said, the judiciary. Clearly, yes I agree. But the Attorney General and the government—the executive—has a responsibility to provide the administration of justice, while it sets up facilities, and provides personnel, in certain of its courts and makes everything available, and makes certain rules so that justice may be administered.

It has a responsibility to see that justice is administered. In the office of the Attorney General, when he finds something making it doubtful whether justice is being administered, he has the responsibility to investigate it. If the Attorney General, in this case, had appointed the senior counsel, who is his senior man, I would think that he would have been justified if he had said, "I find something here which must be investigated. You are the senior counsel; investigate it. Get all the facts, and bring them out and let us know." I think that he had a responsibility, from which he should never shy, to do that.

It would have been simple, perhaps, to go downtown as the hon. member says, and get an eminent counsel, but I do not feel that this was called for. In any event, it was the commissioner who said, "I would like in order that all the information which has been laid before you may be brought out, that you allow me to have your senior counsel to assist me." And we agreed to that.

There is one other reason I should mention, which perhaps made it wise that Mr. Callaghan should serve, because as I have mentioned in the House, information came to our notice, some four weeks ago, and in the development of the investigation, and working with the police details, Mr. Callaghan assisted and had some knowledge.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, then he is going to be a witness?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I think not. He had some knowledge, and there was also I think, surely apparent here, the advisability that the enquiry be not delayed, and that it be completed without delay. To have got someone completely new would have taken perhaps some weeks' time for preparation. But I cannot go along with the hon. member's thinking when he says that because the senior counsel in the office of the Attorney General —in which office rests the responsibility for the administration of justice—because his senior counsel goes to assist a commission that he has something personal or ulterior or a wrongful motive. This I cannot understand and I cannot accept it.

Mr. Chairman: Order, it being six of the clock, I do now leave the chair.

The House recessed at 6:00 o'clock, p.m.

Legislature of Ontario Debates

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JULY 2, 1968

The House resumed at 8:00 o'clock p.m.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 205:

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sarnia.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Mr. Chairman, before we rose for the 6 o'clock hour I had come to my feet.

I was most interested in the reply of the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) to my colleague from Sudbury (Mr. Sopha). First of all I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, that as I understood the reply of the hon. Attorney General, he was really in effect replying to what he called an inference or imputation of some sort of motivation on his part in connection with the appointment of Mr. Callaghan as the counsel to the Grant commission enquiry. I must say, sir, that I did not understand this at all from the remarks of my colleague from Sudbury; and I must say this, that any time that I have listened in this House to the hon. member for Sudbury he has been able, without ambiguity at all, or any equivocation, to put forward exactly what he had in mind.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Always?

Mr. Bullbrook: Absolutely!

I will say this: There are sometimes members of this House who cannot understand him; but that is understandable on my part, really, because he does speak at a very high level, there is no doubt about that. But, sir, he made no imputation or inference of motivation on the part of the Attorney General.

He was, in effect, bringing to the attention of the Attorney General thoughts that the public might have—and one of the most obvious thoughts that the public might have in connection with this very appointment.

In the maiden speech that I made in this House I talked about prior Royal commissions and the delicate position of the government in connection with the appointment of both commissioners and counsel with respect to this. I spoke about Judge Waisberg; I spoke about Mr. Justice Parker, and meant no adverse reflection on their talents or objectivity at all and I am sure my colleague from Sudbury meant no such inference. But the thing that interested me, and why I came to my feet in connection with this discussion, were the comments by the hon. Attorney General that Mr. Callaghan had been involved for approximately four weeks in connection with the investigation into this matter.

This investigation has been going on for three months, according to the original statement made by the Attorney General to this House. I suggest this, and I request the response, Mr. Chairman, of the Attorney General to these comments.

As I understand the function or responsibility of counsel, it is:

1. To interrogate and bring to the attention of the tribunal all the evidence that is available and should be available to the tribunal to properly make a decision in connection with the matter before them, when the terms of reference are set down by the order in council.

2. To give counsel and advice to the commission.

Now it does cause me concern as a practising solicitor and as a member of this Legislature, that we have a man, in effect, who for four weeks, according to the admission of the Attorney General, has been invested with some responsibility in connection with the investigation into the subject matter that really is the foundation for this commission of enquiry.

I do not know Mr. Callaghan. Some day I hope to have the opportunity of meeting him. I understand he is a man of great talent and ability, and a credit to this department. But I have just never been able, in my short term of life, to accept the principle of entire objectivity. I suggest this to you. After a man has been vested with this responsibility of, really, dealing with the entire background of this commission's responsibility, I just ask the Attorney General, is he really the person who can go before the public—and this is really what the member for Sudbury is saying—who can go before the public and show to them no prior posture—complete objectivity—in connection with this matter? It bothers me that perhaps he cannot. He might be able to, but the essential ingredient here is not whether he is able to or not, but really now that we have recorded in Hansard that he has been involved in in the investigation in this matter.

I have no doubt he has been dealing with the police in connection with this matter. He knows the very foundation of the insinuations that have been brought against these two magistrates.

Probably—really, at this stage, I should not make this comment but I will—probably, one would assume that there is some merit in the insinuations, since the hon. Attorney General has called them grave and very serious. I doubt very much if a man with his incisive talents would really call them "grave and serious" unless they were grave and serious.

My point basically is this: I would really like to hear the hon. Attorney General—unless other colleagues of mine or other members of this House want to comment—put forward the proposition of why this man should be counsel to the commission. I think the fact that Mr. Justice Grant has asked that he be counsel is neither here nor there. If the hon. Attorney General has really taken up with Mr. Justice Grant the fact that this man has been involved in the investigation, perhaps he will bring this to our attention. This might allay my fears somewhat because of the great respect we all have in this profession for that honourable gentleman.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I may just comment on what has been said by the member for Sudbury and the member for Sarnia, as I understand it.

They produced shortly before the dinner adjournment, and now again after dinner, a kind of a red herring. The quetsion that they should be asking is: who could be more objective as counsel to the commission? Assuming that we have any right to dictate the choice of the commissioner as to who the counsel should be, but the question has been raised that way.

I would think under any system of the administration of justice as we know it, then surely a person in the position of the senior Crown counsel of the province of Ontario is more able, given the lack of objectivity of all of us in the many circumstances, to exercise the kind of objectivity which is required in this particular enquiry. Indeed, when I heard of the appointment of Mr. Callaghan—apart altogether from his qualifications, but simply because he held the office which he did hold—I felt that it was not only an eminently proper appointment but I was delighted to see that the commissioner had selected him to fulfill this particular role.

It is not often that I am subjected to the plaudits of the government benches.

Mr. Bullbrook: Well, if the member keeps on in this way!

Mr. J. Renwick: But the point which the member for Sudbury and the member for Sarnia have obviously missed is that the mere selection of counsel from Toronto or elsewhere in the province practising at the bar means that you are going to have objectivity that has been disabused on so many occasions. I would not want to feel that in this particular grave and important enquiry that the counsel should have been selected from the bar in the province of Ontario.

I need only say that I had grave reservations about the degree of objectivity, for example, of the counsel for the commission in the matter relating to the chief coroner of Metropolitan Toronto. Now my colleague, the member for High Park (Mr. Shulman), had grave reservations about that objectivity.

I had certain reservations with the objectivity of the counsel for the commission related to the children's aid society. And I would suggest to the member for Sudbury and the member for Sarnia that before they pose this kind of odd question in this assembly, that they ask themselves what would be the assurance of objectivity that they could expect to achieve by the selection of counsel from outside The Department of the Attorney General?

Mr. Chairman: The member for Halton West.

Mr. Bullbrook: If I may just say, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Halton West had been endeavouring to get the floor previously.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to start off by saying that I disagree with the hon. member for Sarnia and also the hon. member for Sudbury, and agree with the hon. member for Riverdale. I can recall in this House on many occasions where members opposite have asked why we do not use counsel in our own department in inquiries in Royal commissions.

I can recall particularly last year in our public accounts committee, of which the hon. member for Sudbury was a member, and the same this year of which the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) is the chairman, the final report of the committee recommending that wherever possible and in nearly every case we use counsel from within the department to act as commission counsel on enquiries.

I think the Atlantic Acceptance case was used as an example, but it was realized that because that hearing was so complex and would be so time-consuming that it was logical that we use outside counsel.

I think the hon. members opposite who are complaining about the appointment in this case are unduly suspicious.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): That was a friend of the Premier (Mr. Robarts).

Mr. Kerr: The Attorney General is quite logical that someone from this department, from The Department of Attorney General, should be appointed in this case.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): And he was chosen by the commissioner.

Mr. Kerr: As the hon. member for Riverdale has said, in view of the position of senior Crown counsel, certainly it is a most logical person to be used, the appointment of commission counsel in this particular case.

Now, we have had a lot of discussion during the past several days about the situation involving the two magistrates, and the appointment of Mr. Justice Grant. Up until now, up until late this afternoon, there has been no question about the appointment of Mr. Callaghan. Why is this being raised now?

I heard the hon. member for Sudbury say this afternoon that he read something in the newspaper over the weekend that very well pleased him, and I assume from that he was referring to the appointment of Mr. Callaghan. Is that correct?

Mr. Sopha: In one aspect.

Mr. Kerr: I think that Mr. Callaghan, because of his position in the department, Mr. Chairman, is capable of complete objectivity. I think he will be in the same position that many local Crown attorneys are in the prosecution of many cases involving provincial statutes, and many other types where the position may be questionable. I do not think that there is any way we can impugn the integrity of this gentleman.

Mr. Sopha: Well, we are not doing that. Let us make that clear.

Mr. Kerr: Certainly, I think it is important that justice be served, and also that justice appear to have been done. I think with this appointment, we are sure of that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bullbrook: My friend from Halton West just hit the nail on the head, really. And with the greatest respect to that admirable gentleman from Riverdale, whom I respect greatly, this is not a question of objectivity—but to hear someone on the floor of this House talk about complete objectivity, where does such an animal exist? There is no such a thing as complete objectivity. Nobody talked completely objectively here. What we are trying to convey, what we are trying to point out to you, in effect, Mr. Chairman, are the implications in connection with this.

Now, I would not have risen at my seat had not the hon. Attorney General said that Mr. Callaghan had been four weeks investigating this matter. I am most interested, really, in the reply of the hon. Attorney General. The hon. member for Riverdale and the hon. member for Halton West, both have talked about the question of objectivity. I, during my remarks opening this evening's session, have said that I am prepared to accept the integrity, objectivity, talents and ability of Mr. Callaghan. I do not know him personally, but he is well known to me by reputation.

That is not the point. The point exists, as it did in the Parker commission, as it did in the Waisberg commission, that this government and this Legislature cannot afford at all to, in any way, cast a shadow upon the objectivity of a commission of enquiry of this nature. You cannot permit to be said that which was said by the member for Sudbury, reflecting not his thoughts, not his imputation of the motivation of the Attorney General, but what might be said by the public. And this—

Mr. J. Renwick: What he might say, the public would say.

Mr. Bullbrook: What might be said by the public. Not what he might say. I say again, when he wants to say something, he can well say it. And the point I make here is this, that if this counsel, learned, objective, as full of integrity as he is, has been investigating this matter for four weeks, how does he advise the learned commission? How does he advise? This is not a court.

When you go into court, there is a defence counsel, and there is a Crown counsel, and the court sits above you. You are not individually invested with the responsibility of advising the court. You give them your opinion, and you put before them the evidence as best you can, but certainly this counsel has a responsibility to the commission. That is what he is called, the commission counsel.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, too long has the House been deprived of the intervention of the member for Riverdale. It is unfortunate that when he returns to the fray he so completely misses the point. What my friend from Sarnia and myself shall do is that we shall stand or fall by the logic of what we say in this regard and it is nothing other—

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Than a bizarre illogicality.

Mr. Sopha: We will stand or fall by the logic of what we say in the validity that our arguments may or may not have and we choose nothing else than that. Now it is too bad, it really is a pity that the member for Riverdale introduces the form of special pleading that he does, in respect of his references to what happened to his pal for High Park. That is precisely what he did.

He buttresses his argument, or attempts to buttress it by saying, let us not have counsel from downtown because look at the way that counsel treated my colleague from High Park and look at the way downtown counsel treated the principals in the Timbrell affair.

An hon. member: You were criticizing them earlier today.

Mr. Sopha: Oh no. Not at all. In no way. I do not know that the activity of John O'Driscoll was that much open to censure in respect of the sad affair of Mrs. Timbrell. This is the first I have heard of it but I strongly suspect that this special pleading from my friend from Riverdale will go to the extent that every time they are shot down in their accusations, the blame must be laid at the foot of commission counsel. That will be an argument that will not wash and does not merit the offer of my friend from Riverdale in saying that he will stand or fall by the logic of his own arguments.

Now I am much disturbed by hearing the Attorney General say that Mr. Callaghan was involved in the investigation for a period of four weeks. In his statement in the House, on June 22 he said:

> The information warranted further investigation, and this was subsequently carried out by a special detail of officers who were assigned to this task and who have been working in co-operation with the law officers of my department.

And I suppose, until I am corrected, that means Mr. Callaghan is one of the law officers.

Then I say to the Attorney General that that makes it even worse because then there is no distinction. I would be happy if somebody could point out the difference or distinction between Mr. Callaghan preparing his case to assist Mr. Justice Grant in the Royal commission, and the Crown attorney, in any part of the province, preparing a case for presentment in a court of criminal jurisdiction.

What is the difference between the two? Would it not be preferable, is it asking too much, is it a wild and irresponsible suggestion to make that every effort be made in these unusual circumstances? Now let us underline that word unusual. This is not the investigation of the chief coroner of Toronto, try as they might. There have been some who have not been swept away by the argument that a coroner is a judicial officer. This is not the investigation into the activities of the children's aid society. It is not the investigation into the debacle that accompanied or that occurred to a finance company. This is an investigation into a separate system of government in this province, that separate and independent system, the judiciary.

It is extraordinary and it is unusual. And accordingly, the principle upon which I put it has so far remained unchallenged by any of the rhetoric that we have heard, that every effort ought to be made to indicate to the public that the investigation launched by the Attorney General, acting as chief law officer of the Crown, initiated by him, is separate and independent from him. Now that is the principle upon which I put it and really, that is not asking too much.

That merely means that no one in his department who has been concerned in the investigation, that is to say who has a full knowledge of it, is involved. Being human, Mr. Callaghan is like every other person on the planet; when he becomes aware of information, his mental processes begin to work and he forms preconceptions and predilections. That is human, that is the human intellectual process, prone to all the failures, and the dangers that it has.

Accordingly, it would seem good sense that when searching around for a counsel, the Attorney General and the commissioner have said, "Look here, we are going to create an atmosphere where this enquiry will go forward completely independent of the government." Now that is the way I read The Magistrates Act. Is that not strange that I should read, and I have always read, The Magistrates Act in precisely that way? Once the Attorney General becomes aware of improprieties, he looks to the independent arm of government, the judiciary, and he appoints a person who is a fact finder. I always drew the inference that the investigation into impropriety is a process that is, from that point on, completely independent of the executive arm.

It is to be noted we have not much experience in these investigations, though we have a good deal of experience in investigations generally. They are a national pastime. The Royal commission is a cultural folkway with us, brought to a high point in development by John Robarts and those who preceded him. But we only have one precedent of modern times in this country, and that is the investigation carried on by Ivan C. Rand.

Now it is to be noted that when that was put in motion by the government of Canada they had all the facts. But I do not recall that Mr. Pearson, or the then Minister of Justice, I do not recall that they insisted an Associate Deputy Minister of Justice should be counsel to the enquiry. On the contrary, Mr. Rand brought in an Edmonton lawyer, in private practice, to be his assistant.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Minister of Justice and Attorney General): Well, he has not insisted on any such thing in this case either.

Mr. Sopha: Had Mr. Rand written to The Department of Justice or to The Attorney General Department of Ontario which was involved to a limited degree, then Mr. Landreville would have had the right to look askance at the whole proceeding. But there is no point if the Attorney General's and the Premier's minds are made up. We are only making the suggestion that this has got off on the wrong foot here; that we plead on behalf of these two men who stand accused, that the enquiry be completely independent.

I do not use that word "objective". I am focusing on its independent nature, independent of the executive of which the Attorney General is the leading member.

I do not think it is too much to ask from the point of view of the public concern and the public interest in this that the whole thing go forward in a quite detached way. But I have not imputed any motives. I sought to put into words what I feel the public would say about this—and Hansard will bear me out—and it would be a legitimate posture for a member of the public, being apprised that Mr. Callaghan had been involved in this for a period of four weeks, to say, "Well, this has the aspects of a prosecution on the part of the Attorney General. There is his agent."

I am unable to distinguish, perhaps the hon. members can, especially my friend from Halton West who is a very astute lawyer, but I am unable to distinguish between the two cases.

The Crown attorney preparing a case for the next assize, does not approach it with a personal interest, or I hope not. Some of them do not, most of them do not. He is not supposed to approach it from personal interest, he is acting on behalf of society to lay the facts before the jury and let the court determine.

Mr. Callaghan, whom I have known for many years, will not approach this with any personal motivation, I am certain. But in the same breath I say that Mr. Callaghan, whether he likes it or not, is inextricably part of the process. He is employed by the Attorney General. He has been involved in the investigation. His first master is the Attorney General to whom he must look for advancement and appreciation of the efforts that he displays in the performance of his task. And in the whole process of having been initiated by the Attorney General, the Attorney General is not disinterested. He is not a disinterested person. All you have to do is to look at the end of the process.

Look at the end of that process and reason backwards. If the magistrates are given a clean bill of health, the Attorney General is in a bad way.

An hon. member: Why?

Mr. Sopha: That is a fact of life. When one remembers what happened to the first Attorney General, he was shot to death in a duel for talking when he should have been listening. You will appreciate what led to that when I tell you, Mr. Chairman, you will know when I tell you that his name was John White.

The Attorney General is exposed to this kind of thing because he is the man on the government benches who has to take risks. He should not, in these circumstances; in taking the daring course that he has done; in putting Mr. Callaghan in the position where there is uncertainty about the independence of that tribunal, and we would be remiss in our responsibility if we did not point that out. We can do so, and I will use that word "objectivity", do so with objectivity because we have not suffered the anguish that our friends on the left have suffered through Royal commissions.

They have lost them all, they have never won one.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): You never can with the Conservatives in power!

Mr. Sopha: So really, we do not weigh the comments. It would have been so simple to choose somebody from the profession outside and not to involve the government or the House in it. We, as members of the Legislature, would have been left, in these very unusual and extraordinary circumstances, we are all involved here, we would have been left completely detached. All we had to do was to wait until Mr. Justice Rand had heard all the evidence and made his report and we could know the rights and wrongs of the whole thing.

That is not the position we are in. All of us here now have a friend at court. We have an emissary, a servant. That is not a term of opprobrium, it is a term to describe his relationship. We have one of the province's servants right in the centre of the maelstrom which is about to occur from the middle of this month on, and that is a position that we ought not to be in, and the Attorney General should have saved us from being in it.

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Chairman, surely all we are asking is for the Attorney General to attempt to insure that the independence which has faced the various supporters of any Royal commission in the past is continued in the present. It must almost appear to some of the backbenchers that the hon. Attorney General must arrive at this building and get out at the side door. If he got out at the front door of the building and if he came up the steps he would be greeted with the slogan of the province that possibly could be taken notice of by the government. Each of the rest of us pass here each day, and this slogan of course is "Watch Your Step." You see this sign which we are only trying to impress upon the Attorney General at this point. We are advising him that if he is to "watch his step," if he is to appoint to this commission someone who is without question independent, he will save himself a lot of public disfavour which might rebound not only to his harm, but also to the harm of the position of the senior civil servants who are placed in this position by his decision.

We think his decision is not the best one in this circumstance for this Royal commission at this time. We certainly encourage him to change this point of view for the better handling of this matter.

Mr. Kerr: Mr. Chairman, what this hon. member apparently is saying is that to have a certain amount of window dressing, in other words, to assure the independence of this commission, hire a downtown lawyer and have him use the facilities of the department, and all the investigation that has gone on in the last two or three weeks, and, I would assume, use the facility of the senior Crown counsel. In this way you will somehow or other assure more independence, or indicate that the commission counsel is more independent by the appointment of one such person. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Bullbrook: What I am saying, Mr. Chairman, if I might, is this—that, most respectfully to the hon. member for Halton West, there is a distinction in sifting and going over evidence when you are senior Crown counsel to The Department of the Attorney General and when you are counsel to a Royal commission. This is the distinction. Once the orders-in-council were signed then whoever is counsel goes into the matter fully and deeply, but he acts in the capacity as counsel to the commission and he is able to advise and interrogate.

But here we have a man who has acted in a dual capacity. Before the orders-in-council were signed, Mr. Chairman, he investigated this evidence as Crown counsel to see, in effect, if any wrongdoing was done. This was his responsibility, and it is the responsibility of the Attorney General. We went over this Friday afternoon here in this House—his responsibility to prosecute and to investigate—but you cannot wear both hats.

You can wear both hats, but we suggest to you, in effect, from a public point of view it is much better that you do not wear both hats.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park was up just previously. The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, the general principle, I would think, in matters of this kind—and it has been for many years sought to be brought to the attention of the House—is that the Attorney General from within his own department ought to conduct special proceedings of various kinds. I think that is a good decision on the whole. Why should special prosecutors be brought in from the outside?

However, in this particular situation, I think that the position of the senior Crown counsel goes beyond that of even the Crown attorney in the field. It seems to me that there is some division of chores between the Crown attorney in his investigatory capacity and the policing and prosecution of cases. In other words, he relies by and large upon the police authorities to bring evidence before him for people to lay charges and to set up indictments. He goes on from there in the prosecutor's role, relying upon some external power, some external procedures, in order to bring this forward.

In this case I suggest there is something rather unique. In this case the deep involvement from the very beginning—the initiation of the proceedings, the investigation right from the word go—the senior Crown counsel in this is deeply entwined in the meshes of several different capacities. His objectivity, or whatever you call it—independence—is not retained in this case.

If independent counsel were brought in from the outside, I suggest he would have a greater measure of objectivity than can presently be employed, humanly speaking, by any Crown counsel at this stage of the game. I feel, therefore, that perhaps, however difficult it may be, since you wish to get on with the matter, there is the imperative of proceeding immediately not to do injustice to these two men. There is the imperative of proceeding in a way that will not bring from the general public, from the newspapers, and from members of this House, any question of the independence and the non-ambiguous role that must be exercised by the men in the peculiar circumstances of this case.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest, through you, to the Attorney General, that if it had not been for the mischievous speech of the member for Sudbury, no member of the public would have thought anything unusual had taken place with the appointment of Mr. Callaghan to this position.

However, now that the damage has been done, and it has been done, I think that the member for Sudbury has put you in the position, sir, where you must make a change and you must appoint another counsel.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Mr. Chairman, in listening to this debate which has involved almost totally the legal people of the House, I think, as a layman, I might have a word to say in regard to what the public thinks, exactly as the member for Sudbury has suggested earlier. He puts forth in his views what he thinks the public will think, and that, of course, is from a legal point of view.

This is not always the case, I would like to remind him this evening; not always the case at all. I thought, as he started out this afternoon, that he was beginning to follow a course such as the course as is normally followed by the member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent), to which I would take great objection.

I believe that the objectivity referred to by the member for Riverdale this evening was a real point and that is why I applauded him; I give him credit for taking that view. When the member for High Park says that the Attorney General is in a position now, because of the damage that has been done, I can say to him that he is totally wrong.

The people of Ontario, I believe, will congratulate the Attorney General, if in fact the appointment of the senior Crown counsel is such. This is what we must bear in mind. Surely this is a man of integrity? It has been said all over the House. Then why has the member for Riverdale said this evening, "Do some of the members endeavour to use it as a red herring in the case?"

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and to all the members in the House this evening, that I have sufficient confidence in the appointment of Mr. Callaghan, and in the appointment of the chief justice, that not only justice will be served, but it will be served in such a way that it will be a credit to the Attorney General and also to the administration of justice for the province of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Chairman, I enjoy very much watching the members opposite me and to the left wearing two hats.

A lot has been said in this House deploring police acting as prosecutors in our magistrates' courts and the hon. member who just sat down talks about what the public thinks. I am glad that there is now a spokesman for all the people in the province of Ontario who knows what all the people think and that we are now redundant.

At any rate, from my point of view, the people of the province of Ontario think it repugnant that they have to be faced as a prosecutor, with the man who represents the people who are, in fact, laying the charge against them. In this particular instance, we have a situation, inadvertent, but factual, where the chief adviser to a Royal commissioner—because he is not somebody appointed by the Attorney General, but by the Lieutenant-Governor in council. This is a Royal commission where we have as chief adviser the one who is actually the accuser—the one who blew the whistle. Oh yes, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General may shake his head, "no," but, in essence, I suggest to you that it was the senior Crown counsel who had to advise the hon. Attorney General whether or not there was sufficent evidence to justify him asking the Lieutenant-Governor in council to appoint a Royal commission to look into this matter.

Somebody had to put the facts before the Attorney General in the first place, and I suggest it was the senior Crown counsel. It had to be—it had to be the senior Crown counsel that advised the Attorney General.

You may shake your head until the marbles roll, the fact is that this is what happened.

We have a situation where the evidence that was accumulated by the senior Crown counsel and the staff of the Attorney General and which is supposed to justify the expenditures of public funds for this Royal commission, is going to be put before the commissioner, and who is he going to ask to pass on a validity of this evidence, but the man who accumulated it and passed it on to the Attorney General.

This is the thing—oh, yes—that some of the members here say is quite proper—that there is nothing improper about it, in actuality or in theory. I suggest that they are wrong. I pardon the hon. member for Lakeshore, because at least he saw that is inconsistent with the theory that justice was to appear to have been done.

Mr. Lawlor: Whenever I appear to be on the same side as you there must be something wrong with me.

Mr. Ben: That just confirms what I have thought for a long time.

At any rate, you must give the appearance that justice is being done. And just as we deplore the fact that the police officers are in fact Crown prosecutors in police courts, I know, passing judgment on evidence—passing judgment on the evidence that is being adduced by the officers—so I think we should deplore the senior Crown counsel passing judgment on the evidence which he gathered together and is producing for the Royal commission.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 205. The Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if perhaps the hon. members understand, first of all, that the senior Crown counsel in the office of the Attorney General, The Department of the Attorney General, is the head of the civil division of law, not the director of public prosecutions. He is an advisor, a lawyer, head of the advising staff of senior Crown counsel.

Now I must start right with the hon. member who just sat down. He speaks of him passing judgment on the evidence. He does not pass judgment at all. Nor was he part of the investigating team which accumulated the evidence, and, to use the expression he accumulated the evidence he passed on, he had no part in that.

In my statement to the House, I said that he was associated with the investigation, and surely the members understand that he would review the evidence which was brought in. I explained it was a detail of police; the intelligence branch, and he reviewed that evidence to advise what course of action the Attorney General should take.

Mr. Ben: That is exactly what we said.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Surely he had the right and the duty to do that.

The Attorney General, I think I may say again, and I do not want to have to say too often, has a duty and a responsibility of seeing to the administration of justice. To assist him in carrying out those duties, one of his staff is senior Crown counsel, a lawyer from the civil side. It will be his duty to review that evidence before the commission. It will be his duty as the hon. member for Sarnia said, to bring out the facts and to make a presentation of those facts, and he will not be prosecuting. This is not a prosecution, this is an enquiry.

Mr. Bullbrook: Is it his duty to advise the commission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It will be his duty to present the facts, as disclosed by the investigation, to the commission. I suggest that if the Attorney General has the responsibility to see that justice is properly administered, he has a right, if he wished, which he did not exercise here, to use his staff to assist them. But I say again, the unbroken rule which we have followed in this province, with Royal commissions, is that the commissioner selects his counsel, and this was no exception.

Mr. Justice Grant asked for the assistance of my senior Crown counsellor who had, as I say, reviewed the evidence.

Now, along the same line, the hon. member for Sudbury said it is a risky thing the Attorney General has done, and it will be a sad day for him if he does not prove what he has asserted.

The attitude of the Attorney General will be that of a senior Crown counsel—to find the truth of the matter.

Mr. Sopha: You cannot create a world of your own, you have to live in this one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have to live in this one, and I will take the risk as the hon. member said. But let me ask him. Supposing the Attorney General had the right to select counsel, suppose he had selected the most eminent counsel from outside, from some outside law office, would he have stood any less risk? Would there have been any less objective? Would it have been any more independent?

Mr. Sopha: You just tell Mr. Justice Grant—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think the hon. member for Riverdale made my point. That is an argument which has no force. To select an outside counsel, even if I had the right to do it, would have made whatever risk I may take no less. I am sure, as was said here by some members, perhaps it is difficult for anyone to be entirely independent or objective. But certainly the senior Crown counsel, I feel, as a part of the office which is charged with the administration of justice, was the proper person to present objectively and independently the facts which will be shown before the commission that has been appointed.

And what I would say is this. Observe the conduct of this enquiry, observe the action of senior Crown counsel. See how it presents the facts, and then if after that has been done, if then it is proper to say that there has not been objectivity shown, if there has not been simply a search for the truth, then I will accept any criticism that may be offered for my choice, or my consent to the choice of counsel as requested by the commission.

But I think that to presume at this stage that because the senior Crown counsel of The Department of the Attorney General is going to assist the commissioner to get at the facts of this matter, to presume that this is not going to be an independent and objective enquiry, is a waste. It is wrongful I think. It is a waste of words.

Let us see how it is conducted. I think I can stand here with confidence and assure this House that it will be a fair, impartial, independent, objective enquiry, and I applaud the choice of the commissioner. I think he made a wise choice in selecting the senior counsel in The Department of the Attorney General.

Someone compared, or tried to compare, or suggested that this was the same sort of thing as a Crown attorney prosecuting.

Mr. Sopha: That is me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. Well, perhaps one could draw some measure of comparison. But even in the office of the Crown attorney, which the hon. member for Lakeshore pointed out, he has a different role to play. He has to prepare an indictment and proceed on. Even there—and I have acted as a Crown attorney—we were always, I think, instructed that we try to bring out the facts, to present the Crown's case, and let the court make the judgment.

I am sure that the hon. member for Sudbury is familiar with the saying, "the Crown never wins, the Crown never loses." That, I think, is particularly true here, that there is no attempt to do other than to bring out the facts which were brought to our attention, reviewed by Crown counsel, who decided we should present them to an enquiry, and this we do.

I cannot believe that we should have acted otherwise. The hon. member for High Park said that the hon. member for Sudbury has made this mischievous speech, now—

Mr. Sopha: Oh, he uses words loosely.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is what he said. He said this has so affected public opinion that now we should be constrained to appoint another counsel. Well, I must say, I do not really give the speeches of the hon. member for Sudbury such credit for changing public opinion.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is the most damning cut of all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I cannot say more. We discussed this before the adjournment, and my point was that the commissioner selected his counsel and counsel is a part of the Attorney General. I trust the hon. members will give the Attorney General credit for seeking in the administration of justice the right to deal impartially, fairly, honestly, in seeing the duty of the administration of justice is without reproach; and that anything which impugns it shall be investigated before an impartial tribunal and the judge here. We are not to judge the evidence, but to place it before the judge who is the commissioner.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I want to add a postscript without repeating anything I said previously.

We have our responsibilities here to make our observations and draw attention to matters of public concern that we feel are important, and we will stand or fall in the public favour depending upon the validity of what we say.

I want to remind the Attorney General that in two Royal commissions that come to mind, people affected by them—one in the Roach commission—resorted to the court of appeal and the court of appeal overruled the commission. In the Parker Royal commission, the chief coroner through counsel resorted to the court of appeal and got relief there against the ruling of the commissioner. Now supposing that Magistrates Gardhouse and Bannon at some point in the enquiry—which is not unlikely, having cited precedents—feel that the enquiry is not being conducted in accordance with precepts of natural justice; then what position does that put Mr. Callaghan in? Mr. Callaghan is then over in the court of appeal, upon the return of the stated case—I speak with no authority about The Magistrates Act, section three, but under The Public Inquiries Act Magistrate Bannon may, upon proper grounds, require the commissioner to state a case for the court of appeal; then Mr. Callaghan is over in the court of appeal in a position of opposition to them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, that is wrong. He is wrong in his premise; he is wrong in his statement. The commission counsel is never represented in a court of appeal, always by other counsel.

Mr. Sopha: Well, what was Mr. Dubin doing there? My friend from High Park, when his lawyers—what was Mr. Dubin doing?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Dubin did not present the case in the court of appeal. It was Mr. Frank Callaghan, senior counsel who presented the case. Counsel for the commission was not represented in the court of appeal.

Mr. Sopha: Oh yes—oh yes, let me correct that because it was the conduct of Mr. Dubin which was under review.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, no.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, yes. Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Dubin could not be there; he was under review.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, let us be factual, let us be truthful in the facts. In the Windfall hearing the commission counsel did not take the case to the court of appeal. It was the senior counsel again, Mr. Frank Callaghan. So the point the hon. member is raising—there will be no difficulty there.

Mr. Sopha: Who was the counsel in the Roach commission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Roland Wilson.

Mr. Sopha: Roland Wilson. Was he in the court of appeal on the return of that one—about the right to cross-examine witness?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know, I was not—

Mr. Sopha: Well, it would bear looking into.

Mr. MacDonald: That was before the explosion of Bill 99.

Mr. Sopha: It would bear looking into, but presumably—all right, no matter who is in the court of appeal, Mr. Callaghan has something to do with the presentation of the enquiry, of the presentation of the evidence. It is conceivable a situation could arise whereby Magistrates Gardhouse and Bannon —this is my point—could complain about the way in which Mr. Callaghan, however well intentioned, is presenting the evidence to the commission.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Some other counsel would appear.

Mr. Sopha: You see—I borrow my friend from Lakeshore's phrase—having cited that possibility which is not unrealistic or far-fetched, I borrow my friend's phrase to show the ambiguous position that The Department of the Attorney General has allowed itself to be put in. I leave on the record, by way of postscript, these words of the Attorney General. These words will be the assessment of whether the appointment of Mr. Callaghan was right or wrong according to the dictates of common sense and of the conveying of a sense of justice. Here is what the Attorney General said:

> I am certain that the procedure we have adopted will maintain the integrity in our system which we are all entitled to expect, and at the same time, provide complete fairness and equity to the magistrates concerned.

In view of this mistake in allowing Mr. Callaghan to be put in this position, I must sit down, expressing considerable dismay and wonder about it.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, if I could move to another aspect of the office of the senior Crown counsel. I would appreciate it if the Attorney General would comment to the House about the position of the province with respect to offshore rights. The senior Crown counsel appeared for the province, as I understand it, on the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision of the supreme court was made on the reference and I would think it would be appropriate if, at this point, the Attorney General gave to the House a statement of the province's position with respect to any offshore rights that the province may have in the waters which form the boundary of the province of Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: Have you read the article in the 1968 University of Toronto Law Journal?

Mr. J. Renwick: No.

Mr. Sopha: The Attorney General got shot down in that case, notice.

Mr. J. Renwick: Where was that?

Mr. Sopha: The offshore case.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was British Columbia. The decision in the offshore case which involved the ocean shores was not a case which particularly affected the position of Ontario, which is inland waters and inland seas. Our position is still open. At the conference when the question was discussed, as I recall, Mr. Pearson, Prime Minister as he then was, suggested that the question should be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada. There was still left open the possibility of some discussion on this question, but we were not involved. But to watch and observe the case which was presented, particularly by British Columbia—the mover in that case was supported by the provinces who had offshore interests in the oceans.

Mr. Sopha: Including you?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We filed a factum and placed our position there, but it has not been dealt with yet, it has not been heard and we have a position where we can have our case heard which turns upon some different considerations than the offshore rights as they affect the Atlantic and west coast provinces.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, what are the waters that are involved in the province's offshore rights? Are there any of the great lakes or is it entirely restricted to Hudson Bay and James Bay?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Hudson Bay, James Bay and the Straits of Hudson Bay.

Mr. J. Renwick: The Hudson Straits?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: It is wise to remember, of course, that the reference in regard to B.C. which is very thoroughly reviewed in an article in the University of Toronto Law Journal of this year, issue No. 1, I believe, is an opinion only. It is not the law of Canada. Under The Constitutional Questions Act or whatever it is called up in Ottawa, the government by order-in-council asked for an opinion of the court, and the court has rendered its opinion in respect of British Columbia.

It ought to be remembered in all fairness to the Canadian government, that when discussions were proceeding—and as usual, the greatest trouble was encountered with Quebec—the government said, "Before we continue with these negotiations we would like to have the opinion of the court, to clear the air". And the government exercised the initiative to choose British Columbia and the continental shelf, the Pacific Ocean as the locus of the case, and Ontario. I think there were five provinces that joined in. I am not certain of that. Quebec certainly did not. Quebec did not file the brief. But I think five provinces joined in in filing a brief. So the matter, in all fairness, is left this way, and the Premier knows more about this than any of us who are doing the talking, that the federal government has offered to negotiate this with—

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I think Mr. Pearson's point, Mr. Chairman, was simply that he wanted the opinion, but he did say that the solution would in all probability be political rather than legal.

Mr. Sopha: That is exactly why I wanted to provoke you into the debate. For you to say that—because that was my understanding, the way it was left; and unfortunately the attitude they took in our sister province, Quebec, was: "We do not care what the supreme court says". They do not recognize it as a federal court, and Mr. Johnson has indicated that he will not be bound by the decisions.

An hon. member: We have the opinion, let us get to the politics. It was Mr. Lesage.

Mr. Sopha: Pardon me, yes. You are right. It was. But Mr. Johnson, of course, is a natural blood brother in those things.

However, I want to make this point, that I will suffer all the censure that befalls my due in saying that one of the great mistakes of Confederation that was made of the four provinces was the leaving of the natural resources in the hands of the provinces.

A thesis could be written to show the injury that has been done to our Confederation and to the development of our country, the fact that the provinces have had complete control over the natural resources.

We have at least the flexibility of redressing that mistake in respect to the offshore minerals. I would be perfectly content—I am not that much of a narrow provincialist—to see jurisdiction over the offshore wealth, if it exists, to be vested in the Parliament of Canada.

That is one of the ways that we can redress the balance in this Confederation, and we can give some flexibility to the Parliament of Canada, to affect the economic life of this country. I suppose because some of us over here are such strong centralists in 1968, that is reflected to a large extent in the national policy of our party, and it must to a larger degree account for the results on Tuesday last.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 205!

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, what is the present state of the position of the government with respect to the offshore rights? Is there any particular initiative that the Attorney General should be taking in this area, or is it now, so far as Ontario is concerned, totally transferred to the political realm, in which case my question is not appropriate?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I can only say that we filed a very extensive and complete full brief, well documented, well annotated, well supported with authorities on our particular position. I believe the court took note of that, but I do not think it really had too much bearing in the decision or the opinion which was handed down.

I think I would have to leave it to the Prime Minister to say whether we are now in the stage where we approach the political discussion, which was indicated by the Prime Minister of Canada, which we would be open to pursue. He wished to get first an opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada.

So I would take it, if I read it right, his meaning, and I was present at that conference, I would take it that he meant when we get the court's opinion and see what the court may be able to say on this matter. We are still ready to negotiate.

Since then, we are all aware, the office of Prime Minister at Ottawa has changed. I would think—my opinion is perhaps no better than anyone else's here—but we are now in the position where we might take some initiative and seek to negotiate that, along with perhaps some of the other problems, but I would have to leave the Prime Minister with that.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Perhaps I can help to some extent, Mr. Chairman. The position really is that we do not, in the advice that we have had, have any offshore rights in the sense of that term as it was placed before the Supreme Court of Canada, for this reason.

James Bay and Hudson Bay are considered in international law, by the authorities that we have consulted, to be inland waters in the sense that they are pretty well completely surrounded by part of the country of Canada. Therefore, if we look at the mineral rights underneath Hudson Bay, we are really dealing with an agreement that should be made between the various jurisdictions within Canada.

The northern boundary of the province of Ontario is neither the high-water nor the low-water mark of Hudson Bay and James Bay, and the jurisdiction at the present over Hudson Bay really belongs to the Northwest Territories which, in fact, are controlled by the federal government.

At one time there was a move made, and I the government of Canada the provinces can cannot quote the Acts, but by application to ask for changes in their own boundaries. It was suggested at one time we extend the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba on the west side, out into Hudson Bay, and extend the boundary between Ontario and Quebec on the east side, north. Various lines were drawn with a view to a common agreement between the three provinces, and thus we would settle the question of the jurisdiction over whatever minerals or oil or gas may exist under the surface of Hudson Bay.

This agreement never came to the point where the provinces together made an application for a change to their boundaries through the government of Canada, mainly because of some inability among ourselves to agree as to where these lines should be. Some of the reasons were technical from the point of view it is simple to draw a line on the map, but a little more difficult to find the line on the ground.

In the meantime, there are certain exploratory activities going on in Hudson Bay, and I would say at the present time that the province of Ontario has no jurisdiction over what may lie under the waters of Hudson Bay.

Now, if you come south to our other water boundary, which is the Great Lakes, you run into another entirely different situation. Here we, as a province, control the bottom of the Great Lakes out to the international boundary, but the federal government controls navigation in the waters above the bottom. Therefore, we do control drilling, for instance, in the Great Lakes, our provincial jurisdiction over the bottom of the Great Lakes extends out to the international boundary.

Well now, when you have said that you have covered all the water boundaries that Ontario has, and we really have not been drawn into an international water any place.

Presuming the opinion that we get concerning Hudson Bay is legally accurate, and that, of course, is a presumption that might have to be settled sometime in an international court because it could be that United States or any country in the world could say that they have international rights in Hudson Bay. The opinion we get is that because of the physical setup, it would be classed in international law as an enclosed water.

We have, therefore, not an international waterway in the sense, for instance, that the Gulf of St. Lawrence is international. We do not control the Gulf of St. Lawrence, it is an international waterway and all countries in the world have rights to use it. This is the situation as it exists today.

At one time it looked as if we might reach some agreement in the Hudson Bay situation. Changes of government, political considerations, and some very practical considerations brought us to the situation where we failed to get agreement.

We extend, for instance, the eastern boundary of Ontario and the western boundary of Quebec. If we just extend that line north you will go through James Bay, you will also go through the Belcher Islands. The Belcher Islands contain a great deal of very low grade iron ore. It may not be of value in our lifetime, but it may be of value some time in the future.

These are some of the considerations that one has to look at.

Then when you get into Hudson Bay you will find that what forecasts we can get from geologists and so on would show that perhaps the greatest possibility of discovery of oil and gas would be more towards Manitoba than Quebec.

I am just speaking from memory of some of the things that were considered, but from a practical point of view, as I say, by changes in government and one thing and another, these discussions came to a halt and have not been resumed. We are ready to resume them at any time.

Mr. Sopha: I am correct, am I not, there is offshore drilling taking place in Hudson Bay, for example, and as I understand it, the drillers have to get two permits. They get one from the province and they get one from the federal government pending the settlement of this. Am I also correct in saying that total jurisdiction over all islands in Hudson and James bays is in the hands of the federal government?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Because of the provincial boundary, I forget whether it is the low-water mark or the high-water mark, but it is where the water is in Hudson Bay and James Bay. As a matter of fact, this was one of the disputes with Quebec some time ago, when Mr. Levesque was Minister of Northern Affairs or something, dealing with the Eskimos and Indians who live on those islands.

Mr. Sopha: Right. Well now, I just want to make one additional observation. Ontario, realizing that title to the lands probably is in the federal government by reason of the instance that the islands belong to the federal government, adopted quite an ingenious argument, as I understand it, that we were prepared to say to the court, "We do not care who owns the land. We want you to find that we have jurisdiction under The BNA Act and that we have jurisdiction over the minerals to be found in it."

That is all very well but that does not do much for the provinces in two circumstances. That does not do very much for the "have nots" of the country. Two provinces have no sea coasts at all, minerals might be found offshore of one or two of the rest of the eight provinces, but we have no assurance that all the provinces have offshore minerals. British Columbia might have some and, on the other hand, Newfoundland may have none. The fairest and just way, I would say, so that the wealth that may be encountered will be shared equally by Canadians, is to leave the jurisdiction over the offshore wealth in the government of Canada.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 205 carried?

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: What did the Attorney General say?

Mr. Chairman: I did not hear.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It was, perhaps, not too serious a question but I thought if you are going to let the Dominion government have any offshore minerals, why not say it would be fair and just to share Alberta's oil with the whole of Canada, and potash in the other province and so on. I do not think the argument really—

Mr. Sopha: Goodness, I made my position clear. In the deep, dark days of the 1930's, when the federal government was powerless to influence the economy, J. S. Woodsworth stood in the House of Commons and he moved a resolution which was unanimously assented to without debate by the House. It recognized the castration of the federal government to do anything to alleviate the ills of this country and that resolution led to the Rowe-Sirois commission.

Now, that is the story of our life, that the federal government, except in monetary matters—banking, and that type of thing—is powerless to intervene to affect the economy directly with interest rates, money supply and that type of tangential interference. One of the reasons that R. B. Bennett suffered so badly was that the federal government did not have control of the resources of this country in order to do something on a national scale to alleviate the distressing circumstances.

So that is why, looking back in history, I take the position that I do, and I am not so much of a provincialist, and I never have been, that I want to narrowly protect the interests of Ontario at the expense of any one or all of the other provinces.

Vote 205 agreed to.

On vote 206:

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to question the Attorney General on vote 206 in the matter of Crown attorneys' instructions. If two individuals are charged with the same crime, they are both of the same background, circumstances are exactly the same, but one man pleads guilty and the other pleads innocent and is found guilty, is it the policy of the Crown attorneys' branch of the department to recommend a longer sentence for the man who pleaded not guilty?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is an entirely suppositional case, I think, Mr. Chairman. I would certainly say immediately, no, it is not the policy of the Crown attorney to recommend a longer sentence for the one who had to fight his case in court—who pleaded not guilty—than the one who pleaded guilty to the charge.

But let me say, in answering that, that I think it would be not only rare but almost unheard of that you would ever find two cases, two individuals with the same background, the same approach, the same circumstances surrounding whatever crime, and to take a suppositional case like this and say, would this happen, and would that happen, is pretty hard. But I do know that the Crown attorneys have no instructions that would suggest anything like what the hon. member has asked—a request for a longer sentence for the one who pleaded not guilty than the one who pleaded guilty.

Mr. Shulman: Well, let me pursue it a little further. Would the Crown attorney receive the approval of the Attorney General if he were to say to an accused person, "If you plead guilty I will settle for a three months sentence. I will agree to ask the judge for a three months sentence. But if you plead not guilty and we find you guilty, I am then going to ask for a longer sentence"?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I do not believe the department would approve of that policy and I do not believe that policy is pursued actually. I think, quite often, Crown attorneys may discuss with an accused, with his counsel, the nature of his offence, the limits of sentence within which his case may fall and in doing so seek out from him the circumstances in which the crime was committed and perhaps be able to say to him, "I am prepared to ask the presiding magistrate or judge to give you a sentence for such-and-such a term, and if you care to plead guilty you may have some assurance of what I am prepared to ask of the magistrate".

I think this is done quite frequently and I see nothing out of the way with that because it is a matter of information to the accused of what his sentence may be and what the Crown is going to ask for. Of course, now that every accused is entitled to legal counsel under our legal aid plan, I think it is very seldom that a Crown attorney approaches an accused individual. Certainly if he does, the individual knows, I believe, that he has a right to counsel and that counsel may speak for him and may discuss his case with the Crown attorney or the prosecuting attorney.

Mr. Shulman: Just before I go into specifics then, to complete the suppositions, I gather the Attorney General would also not approve of a Crown attorney saying to a lawyer, "If you will persuade your client to plead guilty, we will settle for a short sentence, but if you insist on fighting his case I am going to ask for a longer sentence".

The Attorney General, I gather, would not approve of that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, Mr. Chairman, not in that light.

An hon. member: Does that deserve an answer?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, hardly, but I understand the hon. member is speaking of specifics, he is going to comment on some case where he says this happened, I anticipate. I do not think that such language is used. I think counsel do discuss cases and say, "Here is a case which can be from six months minimum to two years."

Now circumstances of this man's age, his family, his need, whether this was done on impulse, or was deliberate, whether this was done with companions, whether he was led into it, and so on, whether there was violence —all these things are discussed. I think, possibly, it is true that if all this matter has to be brought forth in the court, there is, I think, an attitude of feeling, rightfully perhaps, that the court will be influenced more in making its decision than if a simple plea of guilty is accepted.

Mr. Shulman: Well, Mr. Chairman, to come down to specifics. I am sure that all of us, and particularly the lawyers, have heard for years rumours that deals could be made, and that if someone was willing to plead guilty he could get a much lower sentence. I have never yet had the opportunity to have this in writing until this time. I will tell you of a specific case to illustrate this to show just how wrong this is.

Let me say that I think that the fact that someone insists on his innocence should not be reason for an added penalty and I am sure the Attorney General will agree with me on that because sometimes these people are innocent; it can happen.

The man I am referring to, the specific case, is a John Ferguson, who visited a town called Belleville some months ago. He drove his car down there and while in Belleville he met an old acquaintance to whom he loaned the car. This gentleman proceeded to break into an establishment, steal a safe, and get caught in the process—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is reciting facts. I do not have any doubt that he sincerely thinks these are so, but I wonder if these are the facts that were presented to the court? Could I ask if he is reading from a document? Is this a letter from the man's lawyer and signed by his counsel and this is a lawyer's complaint that he got one kind of treatment, or was offered some sort of a deal?

Mr. Shulman: If the Attorney General will let me finish I am sure it will become very clear.

Mr. G. Demers (Nickel Belt): It will take a whole hour.

Mr. Shulman: It will take ten minutes, and we spent several hours listening to matters which were not quite as important. I think that justice to individuals is more important than the offshore rights, or the Crown counsel, or the chief counsellor, or who is going to look into that particular matter.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Relax, gentlemen, it will take a lot longer if you do not.

In any case, the man who did the breaking in, a certain Ibbetson, was arrested, charged and received three months in jail, which he has served.

Mr. Kerr: Have you got the transcript?

Mr. Shulman: That is not the point. Just be patient. The point in this matter is the attitude of the Crown attorney.

Now the guilt or innocence of Ferguson is irrelevant to the story at the moment, although let me say that I am personally convinced that he is innocent. He knew nothing of this. The police interviewed him, let him go, and he returned to Toronto. Some weeks later they came down and laid a charge against him.

He was defended by a local lawyer through the legal aid and a rather upsetting letter was received by him from his lawyer, which I have here and which I wish to read into the record. This is on the stationery of Barrett and Lally, barristers, solicitors, notary publics, 27 Campbell street, Belleville, Ontario, and is dated March 28, 1968:

> Dear Mr. Ferguson:
> You will recall that on March 26 the charges against you were adjourned by Magistrate R. C. Jackson in Trenton until Tuesday, May 21, at 10 o'clock in Trenton.
> You will recall that on both charges—the break and enter and the possession charge—you elected trial by judge alone—

May I interrupt to say this was on the advice of counsel.

> —and therefore on May 21 the only matter that will be before the court will be a preliminary hearing. You will recall that we put to you the suggestion that was made to us by Crown counsel that, if you pleaded guilty to the possession charge, they would withdraw the charge of break and enter and would raise no objection to our submission that you should not receive more than three months, as Mr. Ibbetson only received three months.
> Pursuant to your instructions we told the Crown attorney that we were not going to plead guilty to any of the charges and he informed us that he would be asking for a longer term of imprisonment than three months if you were convicted.

He goes on, but this is the point. Now surely, Mr. Chairman, if a man insists on his innocence he should not be threatened and this is a threat. "If you insist on pleading innocence and we manage to convict you, you are going to go to jail for a lot longer."

What, in effect, this will result in—it must ultimately result in cases where a man is innocent, but is unable to establish his innocence and who will accept a guilty plea in order to get off with a shorter term in jail. Surely this is the wrong attitude of the Crown attorney?

The Crown attorney should not be interested in whether that man is pleading guilty or innocent. The Crown attorney's job, as we have discussed in this House before, is to present the facts and to assist the judge. For him to make a threat like this I suggest to you is improper.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, before we accept the fact that this threat was made, again I point out you see that here we have the hon. member presenting what he says is the true, full story.

I do not know what the Crown attorney may have to say to this or whether he admits that any such discussion took place with this defence counsel. I should think we ought to look into that and I would be glad to do so, but I am not going to accept—and I make this very plain—I do not accept that as condemning the Crown attorney.

I do not approve of that way of dealing, but I do not accept it, at the same time, as condemning the Crown attorney involved, whoever he may be. I would like to have the details and have it investigated.

Mr. Shulman: I am happy to accept the Attorney General's word in this matter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I have a copy of the letter?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, and I would be delighted to have it investigated, but I think it is very important in the general matters, away from this specific case, that Crown attorneys should be instructed that this is not proper behaviour for Crown attorneys.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They do not have to be instructed, they know this. Let me say this. In highway traffic cases, I am aware, and I think all hon. members are aware, that quite often a number of charges will be laid—maybe two or three, or perhaps four. They involve dangerous driving, or careless driving, or leaving the scene, or something of that sort. Generally, or quite often, if there is a conviction on one of the more serious charges it is seen fit not to pursue the others. I think this is—

Mr. Shulman: There was no conviction.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, no. I say if there is a conviction on one of the offences, it is quite often that the others are withdrawn. This is not an uncommon practice in various types of criminal matters, where you could lay two or three variable charges.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on this very same point I think we are indebted to the member for High Park for having actually produced a letter which says, in fact, what goes on in the courts constantly. I think the Attorney General should seriously investigate the proposition that throughout the province of Ontario double-barrelled charges are being laid as a matter of course by the police against people.

I think it is true that every lawyer in this assembly is well aware of the fact that there is a certain amount of log-rolling which then takes place on the basis that if you plead guilty to the lesser offence, there will be some kind of a non-objection by the Crown as to what the sentence will be in the case—or a non-intervention by the Crown—and that the more serious charge will be withdrawn. It is usually a reflection of very poor police work. The police do not know on which of the two charges they can get a conviction on the evidence, and they put the accused person, and his counsel, in a most invidious position. Both because of the cost to the accused person, if the case is proceeded to trial, and from the point of view of just what the evidence will bear in terms of proving a particular offence.

I understand very clearly that if a single charge is laid against the person, and that charge results in an acquittal, there is then nothing to prevent the police, at a later date, laying for the first time the lesser offence, if they then think they can prove it. But at least if that procedure were followed we would avoid the log-rolling which takes place when charges are double-barrelled against a person. They are, as the Attorney General said, part and parcel or part of our system of justice.

I think it is very poor police work in the first place. I think it is an invidious position that the Crown allows itself, in many cases, to get into. And I think it is an invidious position which defence attorneys allow themselves to get into. Somebody waits in the courtroom until there is some slight opening by which this arrangement is consummated. Whether the more serious charge be withdrawn, or the lesser one, and a conviction registered on the lesser one or as to what is likely to transpire when the appeal is made as to the sentence. I would think that the Attorney General would be well advised not to treat the incident that my colleague—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I feel it perhaps better to interrupt the hon. member than to wait until he is finished. If he will allow me.

It is necessary and I know this of my own experience in practice as a Crown attorney; I know it in my own experience as defence counsel; it is necessary. There is nothing wrong—and I want to make this very clear—it is necessary quite often to lay two or three, certainly more than one charge. Perhaps if the police were perfect, perhaps if they were able to judge what offence you can prove; but it is necessary to lay, quite often, quite frequently, two or three charges, because you do not know which one you may succeed upon. If you lay the more serious one and the court finds that not proven, then that is the end of the case. You have got to start afresh in another one .

So it is quite frequent in many of these offences that a more serious offence, a less serious offence or a different offence at least, may have been committed, and the police are not in a position to judge which one they will be successful in establishing and proving to the satisfaction of the court. It is necessary, quite frequently, to lay two or three offences. As I say, I think there is nothing wrong with this.

Having established, having proven to the satisfaction of the court that one of the offences was committed, the prosecution then withdraws any others. But to put all your eggs, as it were, into one basket—to use that old expression—and say we will select this charge and prove it and having failed on it we will either have to forget about the matter or start afresh next week or some future date, is not good practice.

This is not a very good way to conduct the criminal side of the administration of justice. There will be delay, there will be expense, there will be the calling back of witnesses. You can understand all the objections that could be raised of that type of thing. You would be bringing the accused person back and he would, I am sure, complain. He would say, "Well, you had me in court last week on a case which has been pending for three weeks, then it was tried and you lost it. Now, just because you are deliberately determined to convict me, you lay another one."

You could see what would happen. I am sure we would be open to a great deal of criticism. He is charged with two or three offences arising out of the same set of circumstances and the police attempt, the enforcement assigned attempts to prove what the offence was and the court is satisfied on one of those and the others are withdrawn.

I think that is a reasonable approach, rather than doing them one at a time, down through a period of two, three or four months.

Mr. J. Renwick: The Attorney General obviously knows the point and he has a different point of view than I have on it. The fact of the matter is that if the police lay a charge and it is a single charge, or it is a double-barrel charge, and they are required to proceed with the more serious one because they have laid it, then the police have two alternatives. One, if the single charge is laid they abide the event in that particular charge. If they want to bring a further charge that then becomes their problem at a later date and they are subject to whatever criticism may be that would engendered in the public about a person being brought up on a lesser offence at a later date instead of being charged at the same time.

If, however, they double-barrel the offence and they proceed with the more serious offence immediately in the court because they have chosen to lay that, then they can always proceed immediately afterwards with the lesser offence.

The criticism is that the double-barrel charge is laid and the more serious offence is withdrawn as part of bargaining procedure, and that bargaining procedure, in my view, is inimical to the interest of the administration of justice in the province.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General of this province is going to go down in history, he has attained immortality tonight by admitting that his concept of justice in this province is determination to convict. Now he justifies that procedure. Those are your words, "determination to convict". But with the Attorney General it is a game that you must convict if you lay half a dozen charges—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I have never said those words that my attitude is a "determination to convict". I do not know what the hon. member is talking about. I certainly did not use that expression, or express any attitude of that kind.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order please!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have not used the expression as expressing any attitude. I cannot even recall using that expression for anyone's attitude.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): He said exactly the opposite.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member is speaking of something I said here this evening, is it something recently that I said? I cannot recall.

Mr. Ben: You said it in reply to the hon. member for Riverdale.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I did not use that expression.

Mr. Ben: You have got to know which charge you are going to succeed on and are determined to convict on one.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh no; I did not say they were determined to convict.

Mr. Ben: Oh, well that is—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I did not say it. I must say, Mr. Chairman, I did not express that—

Mr. Ben: Read Hansard tomorrow. I will apologize to him, but the concept is clear. He justifies this playing games with the citizens of this province and laying half a dozen charges in a determination to convict on at least one. Now, what kind of a justice is that? If you go to court you are supposed to be charged with a specific crime. You are supposed to know exactly what offence you are charged with, and what offence the Crown intends to prove against you.

Well, the Attorney General thinks that it is justified to lay half a dozen charges in the hope that you can convict on one. That to me is deplorable, it is shameful, it is intolerable. For this man to get up here, Mr. Chairman, and justify—

Mr. Chairman: I must point out to the member that the Attorney General—

Mr. Ben: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Chairman: The Attorney General has denied that he used those words.

Mr. Ben: And I say if I see in Hansard tomorrow that he has not used those words, then I will apologize.

Mr. Chairman: I think the member should refrain from accusing the Attorney General of using those words until he knows. I think we should take the—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

I think we should take the Attorney General's word that he did not say what the member is accusing him of saying.

Mr. Ben: Fine. Then on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, you want to take the word of the member for Humber that he did?

Mr. Chairman: No, the Chairman is not going to take the words of the member—

Mr. Ben: Oh, it just works one way I see. That again is the form of justice.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for Humber will be fair about this matter when we have an opportunity to examine Hansard. Certainly, I do not know how I could have said that I was expressing an attitude of determination to convict. I do not feel that way. I think I did point out that the police and those assisting in the enforcement of law sometimes found it necessary to lay more than one charge.

Mr. Ben: That they were determined to convict, that was the word you—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In order, I think, that is to obtain a conviction, yes.

Mr. Ben: That they were determined to convict were the words you used.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, well let me ask the hon. member. Let us say that a policeman observes someone handling a motor vehicle in what he thinks, in his opinion, would be clearly dangerous driving. He knows the attitude of the court and he knows what evidence he is able to pick up from his brief opportunity to observe the circumstances. He knows that he will have to go to court and prove. Would the hon. member say that he would not be justified in laying a charge, perhaps, of dangerous driving and then perhaps of careless driving, because he knows an offence has been committed, at least he feels that sincerely. Would the hon. member say he should charge this man just with the dangerous driving, or just with careless driving, or with one, perhaps the most serious one, and then it being dismissed, perhaps for lack of ability to prove it, to proceed on the other later on or at the same court, or how?

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, nine times out of ten you would not do either. You would charge him neither with careless driving nor with dangerous driving, but either going through a red light, or going at a speed in excess of 30 mph.

I have spoken to police, because as the Attorney General well knows, I am in some way connected with the police department and have been for some time. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that they will invariably lay a charge of careless driving when the proper charge is going through a red light. This is the system that they have been taught to follow, to lay the most severe charge that they can under the circumstances, regardless of what their own personal opinion is.

A man can go through a red light, and this is what is causing disrespect for law and order in our province today, especially in a municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, that a citizen simply breaking a law by going through a red light will be charged with careless driving or dangerous driving. Or he may be driving at an excessive rate of speed, simply an excessive rate of speed, and find himself charged with careless or reckless driving, and not with simply speeding.

This is what is causing a great disrespect for law and order. It is causing people to shun the police, and it is causing the people to act like this Legislature did the other day when there was more support for the criminal than the victims of crime, because people now just resent the police.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to worry this matter, or prolong it, but it seems to me that the very example the hon. member used, he says simply going through a red light. Now, there are very few occasions, perhaps in the dead of night, or in the wee sma' hours when there is no traffic, when it might be a simple matter of going through a red light. But even then, it seems to me, it is at least careless, and I should think on most occasions going through a red light would be not only careless, but might be very well dangerous.

Now, is the policeman to be the judge, that is all I ask of the hon. member? Should he say in all circumstances we just charge him, as he says, simply with going through a red light.

Mr. Ben: Should the policeman know what charge is—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, is it dangerous to go through a red light? Is it not dangerous at certain times in certain circumstances?

Mr. Ben: Well, who is there to see except the policeman?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Surely the hon. member will admit that if he went through a red light in downtown Toronto at noon, it would be pretty dangerous.

Mr. Ben: It may, nor may not, depending on what the policeman thought.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And the policeman has to make up his mind.

Mr. Ben: Well, the judge is not there to see it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. The policeman has to prove the facts.

Mr. Ben: The policeman has to get up there and support his charge, and this is the deplorable part of it, if the policeman says in my opinion he was guilty of dangerous driving when in fact he was not. He charges him with that. In other words, if he went to court and took any other attitude he would be making a fool of himself.

Mr. Shulman: Just before we leave this matter of making deals, I would like to point out to the Attorney General the abuses that can occur as a result of that in a somewhat different field.

I related some weeks ago the case of the mental defective Mario A. whom Magistrate Bigelow sent off to Guelph. There was another aspect of that case that did not come up at that time and that was how Mario A. first appeared in court. And this lad, 16 I believe he was at the time, had been given a glass of alcohol by an older man and had been then persuaded to break a window—

Mr. Bullbrook: Oh boy; another story!

Mr. Shulman: Yes, it is a true story. In a liquor store. He climbed in, took out a case of liquor, he got away with it. He walked away with it and gave it to the older man who then sent him home. The boy went home to bed and the older man was then caught by the police later that night and a deal was made whereby no charges were laid against this man if he would give the name of the person who broke into the liquor store and he gave the name of Mario A.

Mario A. was picked up by the police and he was subsequently charged and convicted as circumstances have been brought out here before, and went to jail. The instigator of the crime, in my view I think, is the real criminal since the boy was mentally defective.

Yet he had no charge laid against him at all, even though the police actually found him in possession.

Now, I think another matter which the Attorney General should look into in addition to this matter of extra terms for pleading innocent, is this matter of deals. Does the Attorney General agree that the police, presumably with the knowledge of the Crown attorney, should be allowed to make a deal with an obvious criminal in order to bring in some other person?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the sincerity of the hon. member, but if he were a member of the legal profession I think he would realize how difficult it would be. Let me put it as simply as I may.

Assume that the police picked up the man with the beer in his possession which apparently they did. Let us say they charge him with having stolen property, with possession of stolen property. I wonder if the hon. member has any idea how difficult it is to prove that he knew it was stolen? All sorts of defences could be put forward, and I could think of many if I were defending him. The only evidence I take it that would convict him would be the evidence of one mental defective person who would say, "I got money and I was asked to break in" and the man who I would be defending or some counsel would be defending would deny that. A person of sane and sound mentality—

Mr. Shulman: May I interrupt just for a moment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let me finish. I just want to make a simple—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It has to be with knowledge that it was stolen. You see, to recite these cases with all sincerity, as I know the hon. member has, is simply not enough. We could spend hours discussing this sort of thing.

Perhaps there was an injustice here, I do not doubt perhaps there was, but I do point out that the police are fixed with the situation where they could take that man to court and spend their time, and the prosecuting attorney's or the Crown attorney's time and come out with nothing. This is the type of thing that one must appreciate as a lawyer, I think.

If you watch court proceedings and see the cases that are brought, you would see how difficult it is to prove knowledge, particularly of stolen property and that sort of thing.

All I can see in that type of case would be the details in evidence of the man who had it in his possession. He would say, "I got it from this boy, I never gave him any money. I never told him to do anything about it."

The boy would say, "I have got the money, and I went and got it". He would be admitting he went in the store and got the goods and gave them to this man, and I am sure that gentleman at that point would deny the story completely.

Now what are the police to do? I do not approve of some of the things that happen, but I cannot take each individual case here with the facts if they are available to justify or not justify, one or the other.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I understand this now which I did not before and I thank you for that.

I would like to go on to another matter here and this is to do with money again. Under this particular vote, once again we see some rather large increases, but there is one startling increase. Salaries are up 50 per cent, travelling expenses are up 200 per cent, Crown counsel prosecutions are up 60 per cent, but maintenance, over a period of two years, is up 1,000 per cent. I would like to ask the Attorney General what is the reason for that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, again largely the takeover of the administration of justice. I will take the items, if I can, one by one.

Salaries, the appropriation for 1967-68 was $1,591,000. That has increased by $606,000; and $129,000 of that is the annual increment and reclassification of staff. That is something that just follows on, the annual increment and increase in experience and time of service—there is a reclassification.

Then there are approved salary revisions. This was done, I think the hon. member may be aware, by a team of persons expert in the reclassification and revision of salaries. That is $173,000.

Then we have in an item of overtime help, casual help and gratuities. Those are things that arise from time to time to assist in carrying on the work. That is a matter of $35,000.

Those three items together make $337,000 of the $606,000.

The remainder is particularly related to the takeover of the administration of justice. We have additional staff due to the absorption of municipal costs.

These things were paid for by the municipalities. There are 10 Crown attorneys who were previously paid out of fees of office. Now they are paid as a part of the salary of the administration of justice.

In other words, we get in the revenues which they were keeping through an arrangement with municipalities to pay their salaries, and we now pay them out of administration of justice. As I pointed out before, we now have control of knowledge. We have audit procedures, and I think this is a great improvement over what existed when the municipalities were carrying it on.

There are 10 Crown attorneys who were previously on fees. That is an item of $138,000; it is an average of $13,800 each. There are clerical staff for those 10 Crown attorneys which we now have to assume and pay. For those 10 members of clerical staff the figure is $43,000, and you can average that at $4,300. There is clerical staff of eight previously paid out of office revenue, that is when the administration was being carried on in the municipalities. That item is $35,000. That gives us $216,000. There is $45,000 for a purpose I did not give. There were six assistant Crown attorneys due to our increased workload with the administration of justice. They come out at $45,000 in total. There are five clerical staff to assist them.

We have three items of $337,000 of which I gave you the detail. Those last two amount to $73,000, and the Crown attorneys previously paid on fees $138,000 and their clerical staff, $43,000; and eight clerical staff previously paid out of office revenue, $35,000; a total of $216,000. That makes up the figure of $626,000 which is in our estimates this year.

Largely, as I say, apart from increments which are annual and the revision of salaries, almost entirely accounted for by the increased responsibility. With that increased responsibility the change is that instead of allowing the Crown attorneys to be paid at the local municipality level out of their fees of office, they are now paid out of The Department of the Attorney General; and that adds to our costs.

But I should perhaps mention here, I think members are aware that in the arrangements we made with municipalities we have taken on the revenue side—which does not appear at least up to this point in my estimates—we have taken on the revenue side all fines except municipal bylaws; so that a great deal of this is offset on the credit side.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter I wish to pursue under this vote. I started to bring this up before. Referring to itinerate non-contractors, and the problem was well spelled out in the Toronto Daily Star of November 21 of last year. It is a long article. I just want to read one paragraph of it, because it sums the problem up very well.

This is a letter from Mrs. Elizabeth Davies.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to curtail this, but I did wonder if the hon. member was going to bring it up before. If it is a matter of prosecution it probably should be discussed.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, when we were under vote 205 the Attorney General asked me to discuss this in vote 206.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, if that is what it is, it is properly under this vote, Mr. Chairman, but if it is a matter of investigating and pursuing this; I am wondering if it is under—

Mr. Shulman: It is a matter of lack of prosecutions. The letter is from Miss Elizabeth Davies:

> A year and a half ago I signed a contract with Mr. Harvey Cassels, of Cassels Construction Company for an addition to my house. I gave him $2,000 and he said work would start in about three weeks. After about a month I began phoning Mr. Cassels, but I could never find him in so I went to a lawyer, and so on and so on.

I will not read the whole letter. She finally ends up: "What can be done about people like this?"

Mr. Kerr: Check on them before you hire them.

Mr. Shulman: Easier said than done, to the lawyer from the Conservatives.

The answer is not very much. The Attorney General knows of many cases like this. For years his office has been inundated with complaints about companies who vanish or go out of business. Despite the evident need for action the yawning loopholes in our laws have not yet been plugged and only the government can plug them.

When they looked into this particular individual they found that civil proceedings had begun against him some 18 times. Judgment was given against him in 16 of the cases, but of course nothing could be collected, because he would just move on from place to place. There is no problem locating the man, the reporter located him the same day.

I would like to ask the Attorney General why is it that in this province, this type of abuse can occur? You may recall, sir, that I wrote you a few weeks ago about a similar case, where a similar type of fraud had occurred, and it was the opinion of the staff that once again no criminal charge should be laid.

Now, it appears to me that this is a criminal act. I am not a lawyer and perhaps I look at things a little more simply than the lawyers do, because when someone comes up and takes money with the promise of doing something, and does not do it, and repeats this activity time and time again with victim after victim, why does not the government do something? Why are not charges laid?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, first of all we do prosecute a good number of these. We prosecute quite a number of the fraudulent home builders and repair people. We prosecuted the aluminum siding people in Kitchener. These cases are all investigated.

The hon. member presumably got an answer from me, and I think we told him we would investigate it, but—

Mr. Shulman: You did investigate it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, we did investigate it. We investigate them all. For many of these cases there is not the element there which makes a criminal prosecution possible, a successful prosecution. Many of them are simply contracts where the service is not given as undertaken. It is a question of civil regress. We prosecute them and investigate them all, and we have an anti-racket squad for that purpose. They are busy all the time, and we refer many cases to them. They investigate them, and if we can find that there is a possibility of prosecution and that is likely to be at all successful we prosecute and have got a great many prosecutions. We have taken on additional staff for that purpose.

Mr. Shulman: Well, may I suggest to the Attorney General, if the cases that have been brought to his attention such as this one cannot be prosecuted, there is something wrong with the law. May I suggest to him, that perhaps this law should be tightened up.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, again let us have the facts of that case.

Mr. Shulman: The facts were published. There has never been any question of the facts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know that those are the facts. I am not sure that they were ever brought to our attention. I am not sure the party ever went to the Crown attorney. Did she say she had gone to the Attorney General or the Crown attorney?

Mr. Shulman: She says: "Three times we have asked the justice of the peace to lay a charge against this man, but each time we have been told that it is a civil action and they cannot do anything."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I can have the facts of that matter, we will investigate it, and it may very well be that the justice of the peace was right, that there is no possibility of a successful prosecution.

Mr. Shulman: Well again, the law should be changed.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Many of us have signed contracts and did not get satisfaction. That did not mean that the parties were criminals, who offered the goods or the services.

Mr. Shulman: Well, Mr. Chairman, let me come back to the other similar case which I wrote to you about, where a man went into a store, went into a series of stores, bought goods which he was to return to pay for and did not return and did not pay for. The response again was that this should be a civil action, but of course your civil action is useless. These people cannot collect with a civil action.

This man should be put in jail, he should be charged. A man who is going about the country—and apparently there are some of these people who go from small town to small town—fooling the people in the towns into giving him goods which he is supposed to return the next day to pay for, surely this is fraudulent and if it is not, it should be.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, Mr. Chairman, surely to goodness we must not get to that point. If I did that the hon. member for Sudbury would be calling me the Attorney General who would be prosecuting with Draconian severity. That is his expression. The hon. member for High Park is suggesting that when a man goes into a store and buys goods, and gets possession, and goes away and says he will be back tomorrow to pay for them, that I should prosecute him for fraud.

Mr. Shulman: I did not say that Mr. Chairman. I said that when a man was making a pattern of this, going from town to town as in the case which I drew to your attention, then he should be prosecuted.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is not under our law, a crime, to go into a merchant and talk him into giving you goods, unless you give him a bad cheque. To give the impression that you will come back to pay and he trusts you, and you do not come, then that is his affair. If he wants to do business that way, he must be more careful.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sarnia.

Mr. Bullbrook: Mr. Chairman, just a few remarks in connection with this vote if I might? First of all, with respect to the discussion by the hon. member for High Park, and the hon. member for Riverdale, in connection with the laying of multiplicity charges, this is by and large a reprehensible course of conduct by the police. But I must say in deference to the remarks made by the hon. Attorney General, there are many times, especially in connection with contained offences.

By way of example, attempted robbery, contained in robbery, or attempted rape, contained in rape, where there are certain essential ingredients of the larger offence that in the opinion of Crown counsel it might be difficult to prove. The interest of justice and the interest of the pocketbook of the taxpayers of the province, and in the interest of the accused, which really is the incumbency more than anything else of the defence counsel, is best served by some discussion between the two counsel involved.

In making that comment, and agreeing with the Attorney General in that respect, I do not in any way compromise my association with the remarks of the hon. member for Riverdale.

In this vote there are two things that I would like the Attorney General to cast his mind to. One is the question of confidential instructions to the Crown attorney by the police. I frankly have been blessed in my short association in the city of Sarnia with a Crown attorney who takes the position that his responsibility is not just to secure a conviction. It is to convey to the court as best as he can, the evidence that supports the Crown's position in connection with the prosecution. He has from time to time shown part of or all the confidential instructions.

My first question is this. I do feel that sometimes, and I have run across this with several Crown attorneys, that they feel that they have some sort of propriety interest in the matter before the court. The confidential instructions to the Crown attorney should not be discussed with counsel for the defence at all.

It goes without saying and we all know that in indictable matters, you know the witnesses you are faced with. But in matters where you are proceding summarily, sometimes defence counsel go in there somewhat tabla rasa. He does not know what he is coming up with. I suggest that the interest of justice might well be served if there was some liaison in connection with the confidential instructions to the Crown attorney. I recognize that at a certain point in the investigation it is not in the best interest that all the information should be given to defence counsel. But perhaps the Attorney General might wish to comment on this?

Now, the thing that I wish to be vigorous about is the course of conduct on the part of the police. Is the course of conduct on matters that I consider insignificant really, where they feel that it is incumbent to incarcerate these so-called wrong-doers forthwith.

By way of example. A young couple breaking the law, sitting in their car with a bottle of liquor, perhaps a few weeks before they are married. Discussing something and having a drink really, and nothing further than that. But they are breaking the law.

There is no necessity that they should be thrown in jail, absolutely none. But this has happened throughout the province of Ontario many times. Over-zealous police officers.

I think that there has been considerable upgrading, as the hon. member for Humber conveys, I have had some association with the police. Before I went into politics, I was the solicitor for the police association in our city, but by and large I found them to be reasonable, and I found that they performed their function admirably.

But there are some of them who have not got the message, and the message that I wish to convey, and might receive some reciprocation from the Attorney General, is that there are times when people are incarcerated in connection with offences in certain circumstances when they should not be put in jail at all.

They could easily be summoned to court. I will not go further, but there are matters which I have dealt with over the years that almost brought my blood to boil. I have seen people put in jail on some of the flimsiest charges. Some of the charges were withdrawn, but, of course, one does not expect a police officer to be vested with the knowledge of the law that the Crown attorney is. I accept that.

But I used that example, which is not exaggerated, of having liquor in a place and finding yourself in jail at midnight, and sometimes also not having a JP able to get out of bed. This has happened to many defence counsels, and these JPs have this responsibility, I look upon it as such, to get out of bed. I do not care what hour of the night it is, and I have said this to them. I do not care if it is four o'clock in the morning, your job is to get out of bed. These people should not have to languish in jail, but I must say, they do not get out of bed for me.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of technical points to start off with—

Mr. Chairman: Order please! Does the Attorney General wish to reply to this before the member speaks?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, if I might be permitted, Mr. Chairman. First of all on the question of the confidential Crown information being handed to defence counsel. I think that I have to say that I know that many Crown attorneys go a long way to assist defence counsel, and we encourage that insofar as this can be done.

But I think that there is a point where the instruction of the police to the Crown attorney is like instruction from a client to his attorney. Whether the Crown attorney should reveal his whole hand without the consent of the police is a matter for his own discretion. I cannot say that as a general rule he must reveal every detail of the information given to him by the police. I think that there is some reasonable comparison there, with the information given by a client to his solicitor.

Mr. Bullbrook: Well, it should be somewhat elastic.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, there has to be some elasticity, but I think that Crown attorneys are usually pretty reasonable in this respect, and it is encouraged.

In the example that the hon. member gave about the couple drinking in the car. There are some very difficult cases sometimes if a policeman comes across them drinking. Let us say that he left them there to drink. Are they going to drive the car after they have finished the bottle?

Mr. Bullbrook: If you would permit me. I accept the fact—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Just let me draw the picture a little further. They drink the bottle and drive the car and get into a serious accident and someone is injured or killed. What is the policeman to say to himself?

Mr. Bullbrook: Mr. Chairman, I know that I should not interrupt, but let me say that it goes without saying that he takes the bottle away from them and, in effect, if he is at all worried about their driving, he says, "Out of the car and home," if that is necessary. It is the question of taking them right to jail that bothers me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I was going to come to that. Let us say they may have nearly finished the bottle then I think he has got the business of seeing they do not drive that car which becomes a dangerous weapon in their hands. He either has the business of getting them home or taking them to some place of custody for a time at least until they are perhaps in better shape, or until they have made some arrangements to get home themselves. The policeman has some problems too. We do encourage, through our Crown attorneys, the use of summons wherever possible rather than arrest and this is our attitude.

Mr. Lawlor: As I say, I had two technical points. One has to do with the estimates again of last year where there was another section here called criminal appeals and special prosecutions branch, for which $279,000 was asked. That has disappeared and been assimilated into, I would take it, the balance of the subheadings under this vote. I would like the Attorney General to indicate as to how this has been done and why it has been done.

The second technical point arises out of item 8, grants, which are $76,000 for the first time in these estimates. There was a grant of $5,000 to the Crown attorneys association, so the boys could all meet and decide what they were going to do, "a thinkers' conference" I am sure. But now there is $76,000, and I think that this being for the first time, that this Legislature should enquire as to why this is the case.

Leaving the two points aside, I think I will just continue with the rest of my remarks and get them out of my system.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Would the hon. member be good enough? I was trying to pursue in the public accounts, the location of the first question which he had mentioned. Now I missed his second enquiry. I do not know what he was asking so I must ask him to repeat it.

Mr. Lawlor: In the estimates of 1967-1968, Mr. Chairman, at page 18 under the criminal law division, there is a section over and above. At the present time, it is the office of the director of public prosecutions and the Crown attorneys but in previous years there has appeared the criminal appeals and special prosecutions. I do not see anything about that in this year's estimates. It seems to have disappeared into clean air. While the Attorney General is thinking about that—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I could answer that, Mr. Chairman. In our reorganization, we dispensed with that. That no longer exists. To perhaps avoid placing our lawyers in certain groups or categories, we just dispensed with that as a title. We do not carry it on under that name.

Mr. Lawlor: If I may pursue that then just for a second. The special prosecutions —in this province and particularly in the city of Toronto, I know for a fact on their liquor legislation, there is a special prosecutor who is still retained by the department. Again, coming back to what we mentioned earlier this evening, is it the intention and tendency of the department to eliminate special prosecutions and would that be part of the reason for eliminating this heading?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. We do not employ special prosecutors. If you are referring to The Department of the Attorney General in liquor cases, that is not our man. I think perhaps that may have been a city case but it is not The Department of the Attorney General and that is not the reason for the elimination of that particular branch to which the hon. member has referred. It is just a matter of what we felt was a better organization within our department. Instead of putting certain lawyers in that category or group, we simply dispensed with that as a branch of the department.

Mr. Lawlor: Perhaps the hon. Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, might wish to address himself to the second point with respect to grants.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the one I meant. I wanted the hon. member to repeat his question. I do not know what that was.

Mr. Lawlor: Under item 8, in the vote, grants $76,000. There is nothing like that of any previous size or anywhere close to it in any previous years. The best we can get is the previous year in the estimates under the same item 8. Under the Crown attorneys association about which I was jocular, there was $5,000. Why $76,000 this time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The grants, total of which is $76,000. In 1967-68, the previous fiscal year, we made a grant to the Crown attorneys association of Ontario to carry on their work with conferences, discussions and seminars and so on of $5,000. This year we are asking for $2,000 which is a decrease of $3,000 in that item.

Now the increase, or the other $74,000 of the total vote, is a grant to the centre of criminology at the University of Toronto and that is for the purpose of enabling the centre of criminology to conduct a special study and research in the areas of the administration of criminal justice and the prevention of crime as follows: (a) The unrecorded crime in Metro Toronto. They are doing quite a study in that portion of it. (b) The effectiveness of criminal law functions and law enforcement in controlling illegal corporation activities. To help them achieve those objectives we have proposed a grant of $74,000 to give them some assistance financially.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: For those purposes, yes. They have others – this will not cover the whole cost. This is a grant in assistance and not to cover the whole cost. I doubt if we will have a grant of this kind for this particular objective again. It may be that we will be getting assistance from another field of study but that will wait for another year or until whenever it may come forward.

Mr. Lawlor: Thank you very much. To go on to more substantive matters, I suppose the first thing I want to do is to make it crystal clear, at least to myself, about a matter which I do not suppose you should admit in this Legislature, and which I quite improperly, but nevertheless deliberately, pressed during the recent bills that went through.

If you recall I was insistent all the way along the line on this business of fees being paid into the hands of justices of the peace and other administrators of the courts and so on, which gave them an inside interest and a personal reason for seeing that convictions were obtained. I consider that Mississippi justice. It has prevailed in this province up until recently. Now that is what I want to get crystal clear.

As McRuer points out, two or three things arise under this heading. There were eight Crown attorneys, he says, who were paid on a fee basis and four on commuted fees. Now as I understand the remarks of the Attorney General on a previous occasion, particularly tonight, this is no longer so—that no Crown attorney in this province is any longer deriving fees. Well the fees they do derive on the other hand are paid not into their pockets in any proportion or amount, but into the Treasury of Ontario and looking at the annual report of the inspector of legal offices, they would appear to be quite considerable fees.

If these are the correct fees then there were $1,338,000 etc.—that is close enough—moneys paid. This is the report for the year 1967. I believe that is the calendar year for this particular department—on the inspector's report on page eight.

The second point arising out of that: If that is so, in other words, that all Crown attorneys on a full time basis, or whether or not they are deriving their whole increment from the province and not from any accused person or convicted one for that matter, are they paid pretty much at the same rate? Because on the previous page, McRuer points out the whole scale of fees. I will not go over them but I will mention one or two.

He says one receives a salary of $20,000, 17 receive $15,000 and then it goes down on a sliding scale to where you get, at the end of the day, three of them receiving $6,000 to $7,000. Now, are these fees now uniform throughout the province, are they all getting pretty much the same? Is there a seniority system, or what would be the basis for any discrimination among Crown attorneys? My final point arising out of this which is again a simple point of information, if there was, in the year 1964, a change in The Crown Attorney Act, 1964, appointing Crown attorneys at large in the province, and three had been appointed up to McRuer. Are you continuing to appoint such attorneys at large? On what basis do you so appoint them territorially? Is it based on the 19 area divisions of the police or on what grounds do you do that? Do you feel that that is operating a good working system at the present time? I would like some information on just how it is working.

Now that is as much as I want to deal with regarding the Attorney General. I have one final matter which may bring on a little debate, though I trust not, and that has to do with the bail system in Ontario. Perhaps the Attorney General may not think that this is the proper place to talk on this and if not I will desist. On the other hand, it seems to me to fall within the ambit of the vote and could fall under the next vote for that matter, under magistrates' courts, I would suppose. If it is acceptable at this time, I would quote a word or two from the Ontario bible at least.

Mr. Chairman: Should the bail matter come in here?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It could be dealt with here as well as anywhere. Largely, as I said, there are some areas where we can touch it and it is generally a matter set forth in the criminal code, and the discretion as to how it is used is up to the magistrates, but we might get some benefit from discussion here.

Mr. Lawlor: Emerging out of the Dead Sea scrolls, and myself being an Essene, not among the Philistines, there is a great deal to be said on page 745 of McRuer under this heading. He says here:

> There appears to be widespread indifference to the injustice done to accused persons by reasons of unnecessary incarceration pending arraignment. The injustice is demonstrated in a study made by Professor Friedland of those admitted to bail before arraignment and those admitted to bail on arraignment in the city of Metropolitan Toronto. Of the group studied, 92 per cent of those charged with criminal offences were originally arrested.

There is much too much arresting being done in Ontario, as I indicated at the inception of this debate.

> Of this percentage, only 12 per cent were bailed from the police stations.

Under the conditions of possession of liquor I would think that there is special power in the sergeant, under The Summary Convictions Act, to grant bail. I do not think there is any need to call the justice of the peace, although I think that this is generally not known by the sergeant, and they do insist upon calling the justice of the peace who, as my friend has indicated, are very loath to arrive at three o'clock in the morning. The counsel kick their heels in the hallway waiting for one of them to show up.

> "An additional four per cent were released from the jail on Sunday afternoons." The study shows—and this is what I am after—that "84 per cent of all persons arrested for criminal offences remain in custody until their first court appearance." I trust that there are directives going out from this department in line with these recommendations to bring back to civilization numerous citizens who for the first time having anything to do with the police, are thrown into the cells, often in most unsavoury conditions, and who are presumably innocent because that is our law. Nevertheless they have to wait until ten of the clock or later the next morning to be dragged up from the hole, simply because they have not been provided with adequate services by way of bail.

When they do arrive up there, the whole mentality continues to be defensive and imprisoning. In other words, do not grant bail unless you can help it. The animadversions of McRuer under this heading are admirable as usual. The point is that there is a man who owns a home and has children, and has a steady job and some atrocious bail is set which is punitive really, and designed to keep him in custody. Why, heaven only knows. I had an experience there the other night, with someone in a case of some strikers at Goodyear, where, without reason, they set $500 bail for each of them, but when I appeared on the scene I argued, in accordance with McRuer, that these people out not to have cash bail; they ought to be released on their own recognisance, as they were thoroughly respectable citizens, and there was no reason for this.

Finally after a good deal of argument this was agreed to. That man will appear in court without having the authorities hanging over his head. All the trouble that they had to go to collect this money in hard cash, and in bonds for the other accused to be released was ridiculous. Such are my thoughts with respect to the operation of the bail system of which I speak, and the actual administration of which, and how the system is operative. And I would hope that the Attorney General would have a great deal to say on this and I would try to prevail upon him so to do. To alleviate, in line with the Ontario bible – McRuer – the whole condition that presently exists, touch bail proceedings.

Mr. Sopha: Under this heading one observes that the last public accounts available to us—that is to say the year ending March 31, 1967—a total of $149,822.15 was spent under the heading of Crown counsel prosecutions, which is item number four. The Attorney General asks for something approaching $100,000 more than that. Now, in order to understand just what is going on here, may I enquire as to the identity of the person who got the highest amount of money during that fiscal year, H. O. St. John? May I enquire who H. O. St. John is?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. St. Jacques, about whom the hon. member for Sudbury enquires, is the Henry St. Jacques of Ottawa, an assistant Crown attorney.

Mr. Sopha: So he got $5,180. D. H. Scott —I believe that was the one connected with the Truscott affair; and he is of Welland, the Crown attorney of Welland is he not? He got $5,025.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I might mention it here, he worked on the Truscott case.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, and there is S. A. Colpitt; he is or was Crown attorney of the district of Cochrane, and he got $4,416. H. F. McCulloch is Crown attorney of the county of Wentworth, and he got $2,400; and B. Ryan, $5,605, he got the highest amount. Who is he?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have no objection at all to answering all the questions of the hon. member—

Mr. Sopha: Well, why are you so evasive?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not evasive. Just a moment. As the hon. member pointed out when he started to discuss this he was reading from the public accounts for the fiscal year ending 1967. As I say, I have no objection to this at all, but the point is that we have—and I was about to reply to the hon. member for Lakeshore—we have dispensed with all extra payments to Crown attorneys. They are now purely and simply on salary and they are all—and perhaps I could take a moment to answer some of the points that were raised—they are now all Crown attorneys who serve at large or for the province of Ontario. So we may direct them anywhere, to serve anywhere and to accept special prosecutions. It would have to do with Mr. Calbick, who is very capable, and my senior Crown attorney. He can be directed to take a special case, which he has done on more than one occasion. I will go through all these names if you like and try to sort them out, and tell you what services were rendered. This is something that happened. We no longer have this system. So you will not see any figures—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, because the hon. member for Parkdale and I put a stop to it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be glad to give you credit.

Mr. Sopha: Precisely why it came to an end.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, it was—it was not I think altogether. I do not want to take any credit away, but it was something that came about not too long after I became Attorney General. Perhaps I might take a little credit. In any event it is no longer in effect. We have Crown attorneys at large in the province of Ontario. We do not have special prosecutions, and special payments. And justices of the peace—while I am on my feet, could I say —the justices of the peace still are on fees.

Mr. Sopha: Could I get a word in edgewise?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There was a gentleman who asked—

Mr. Sopha: I was making a perfectly legitimate comment, and before I completed my remarks, the Attorney General got up on his feet, and like the CBC he pre-empted my time. I wanted to add, since there was criticism this afternoon, that the member for Parkdale and I got the provincial auditor on our side to put a stop to this. These were inexcusable payments. Now, are we to infer the proposition that $230,000 of the taxpayers' money is going to be used to pay Crown attorneys at large who are going to wander this province conducting prosecutions? Is that the proposition now being advanced?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Crown attorneys are now all on a salary basis.

To return to my point of a moment ago. I would point out to the hon. member that the hon. member for Lakeshore preceded him in his discussion here, and asked certain questions, and I was simply trying to take in order the questions which were asked. I was not trying to pre-empt his time, and I was trying to get back before we got too far afield to answer some question the hon. member for Lakeshore had asked.

Mr. Sopha: All right, excuse me, I pre-empted his time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You pre-empted his time.

Mr. Sopha: I now withdraw, and please be my guest. Come on in and answer him, and if necessary I will wait until tomorrow.

I can hardly wait because I do not understand. I must be obtuse tonight, but I do not understand. You have $2,217,000—and I will rest easy if I have the answer to this question: Does the $2,217,000 pay the 90 Crown attorneys that you have in this province? Does that pay them?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: Well, what is the $230,000 under item 4?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Those are the per diem assistant Crown attorneys who serve when needed on a per diem basis. That item is to cover their service.

Mr. Sopha: Fine, I am in a state of equanity. Please proceed.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 206. The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Chairman, it is with some degree of trepidation that I must speak during the estimates of this department with all the eloquence that manifested itself here tonight, but I want to talk about justice for Indians.

In a study that was conducted by the Canadian correction association dealing with Indians and the law, I would like to make some brief reference to some of the quotations from it.

> In Ontario, particularly from North Bay west, and in other western provinces and territories, the incidence of Indian involvement with the law is alarming, and is purely out of proportion to their numbers. Unhappily for the Indian and the Eskimo, with his special needs and special problems, he has received little opportunity to get what services exists.
> It is obvious that the federal, provincial and municipal governments cannot afford the luxury of failing to develop programmes to be geared towards this particular group.

Later on in specific reference to Ontario:

> In southern, eastern and central Ontario the great majority of offences centre around alcohol. If the offence is not under The Liquor Control Act it has been committed while impaired.
> With regard to offences with Indians in the institutions of southern Ontario, approximately 80 per cent of the cases are breaches of The Liquor Control Act, and the other 20 per cent vagrancy, theft, assault, impaired driving, etc., contains elements of alcohol abuse.
> Ontario, northwestern, has a vastly disproportionate number of Indians. The Indian people are coming into conflict with the law, except for very remote areas. The offences are either violations of The Liquor Control Act or crimes—usually crimes of violence where liquor played a prime causal role.

I think in speaking to some of the Ontario Provincial Police, particularly in the north part of the province, they seem to have a better idea of what the contributing factor is with regard to the Indians' involvement with the law, and the reason for it. It is this frustration that they have with regard to the whole economic situation that the Indian finds himself in and not the reverse as some people tend to think.

There are many many ways in which all levels of government have been remiss in providing for the kind of attention that is necessary to bring Indians into the mainstream, and to relieve some of their frustrations, and in that way you get to the root cause of the Indian problem.

A lot of people tend to think, particularly the sociologists, that the reason for the Indian drinking to the extent that he has, or getting the name of being an habitual drinker or somebody who cannot handle alcohol, and therefore runs afoul of the law, much more often than the general population proportionately, is caused by frustration.

Many of the officers of the Ontario Provincial Police that I have spoken to seem to have a better idea of what is needed. I was wondering why this department did not prevail upon other departments of government to implement the kind of programme that is necessary to divert the Indian population's attention away from drinking, to divert his attention from relieving his frustration in this way.

If I may quote here an article from the Toronto Daily Star, on January 26: "Indians in jail cost millions that should go for help."

That is quoting A. E. Bigwin and he said that about 2,500 Indians are now in federal penitentiaries, almost five times the number imprisoned in Canada proportionately. If those in provincial jails were added to this figure—he said—it would show that more than 30 per cent of inmates are of Indian ancestry although Indians only make up about three per cent of the total population.

It must be obvious to everybody that it is a problem that has reached such proportions that it just cannot be ignored any longer. The Ontario Provincial Police realize this and I think to some extent they are a bit lenient with the people who are the Indian population when caught for offences against the liquor control board, or the liquor laws of the province. They do overlook some of them, but where they are not overlooked, it is a clear case of discrimination against the Indian people.

In another article by Magistrate Morrow, when he investigated the problem at Hay River in the Northwest Territories, he urged that drunkenness should not be a crime. It should not be because if you put an Indian who is causing a minor offence under the liquor laws of the province of Ontario in jail, nobody suffers but his family. He invariably ends up in jail because he does not have the necessary resources to pay the fine.

If he has a job, he has lost it by the time he has served his sentence and it has served no useful purpose because he is out of a job. He has to apply for more welfare, and usually it is not the offender who suffers, it is the wife and the children.

I think the officers of the Ontario Provincial Police are in a better position to judge what the conditions are on the reserves and bands of Indians in settlements on the edges of communities, particularly in northern Ontario. I think they are in a position to judge what the frustrations of the Indian people are, and to some extent what could be done.

I was wondering if this department has taken under consideration any kind of a programme that would help. One way I think it could help would be in establishing many more of these friendship centres.

It is common knowledge that the average person who comes in from a reservation and wants to spend a little time in an organized community, if they want any social life at all about the only place they can go is to the beer parlour.

A good many of them would welcome an opportunity to commune with other people in these friendship centres in the same way that anyone else would and they certainly have a right to. Obviously, there are not any of these facilities available to them, so they end up in the beer parlour and, of course, the inevitable happens.

I think another way in which this department, certainly with the cooperation of the liquor control board, could help and remove some of the frustrations is in the way that we treat our Indian population with regard to enforcement of the liquor laws.

In one particular case in my riding where they have one of these retail outlets in a store, an Indian cannot go in and buy more than one bottle at a time, yet any other citizen in the community can go in and buy as many as he wants. So you are discriminating against them and you are saying, "You are a second-class citizen. You do not know how to hold your liquor, so we will only give you one. Come back and see me tomorrow and maybe we will consider giving you another one."

There are many cases of this where we are discriminating against the Indian for the simple reason that we continue to do his thinking for him. We have not allowed him to exercise any responsibility—to be a judge of what he should do and what he should not do, certainly within the law. I think we have, throughout the years created second-class citizens and I can assure you it is not contributing to our rehabilitating a man and moving him into the mainstream of society, which I think is our ultimate objective.

I think this department, more than any other in this government, is in a position to see what the causes of these frustrations are. Over 80 per cent of the convictions that the Indians find themselves with are convictions under the liquor laws of the province, and I think this department could take the lead in contributing towards the rehabilitation of our Indian population.

I was just wondering if the Attorney General would cooperate toward this end and indicate that he would be in a position to foster this kind of a programme?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this whole question of the position of the Indians —the way the law has to regard them, what may be done to take away some of the frustrations they suffer and perhaps, in that way, improve their performance in our society—is a very broad and wide question which I am sure the hon. member knows has received a lot of study.

The Department of the Attorney General plays its part in the committee of Cabinet which is chaired, I believe, by the hon. Minister of Social and Family Services (Mr. Yaremko), and which is one of the functions co-ordinating the efforts of all departments. While we would like to be helpful, I do not think it really falls within the function of the administration of justice to provide some other programme any more than to assist as we can.

I agree with the hon. member that simply locking up Indians for being drunk—or any other citizen; I do not think we should speak of them in different terms—I do not think that is a good policy in any event. I do not think that meets the problem of the drunk. I do not think it is good for society. I do not think it is good for our approach to the administration of justice, but so far we have not come up with a very complete answer to that, or any real programme as yet to deal with that, which is a problem of our whole society. The Indian seems to be prone to it more than others, for one reason or another. The hon. member says it is because he is frustrated with the failure to understand our approach to meet it. But are we to discriminate against him and treat him differently? He wants to be treated with all the privileges of any other citizen and I think perhaps we must go either one way or the other, not half way, or any different way.

I was interested in the incident, or the situation, where the hon. member says in some municipality he is offered one bottle, but that is not law. That is not the law, that is somebody's local practice, with or without reason. But the Indian does not have to accept that, actually. It is something that local practice has brought about. It is the first time I have heard of it.

I do not know that I can offer anything, other than to say that I, as Attorney General, sit as a member of the committee of Cabinet dealing with Indian affairs. One of its function is to coordinate the efforts of all departments and we have had a number of meetings and it has liaison with the federal government departments and the problem is one which is not capable of easy solution.

Certainly I do not know that it should be devised in The Department of the Attorney General, although I would be most anxious to cooperate in any way that would be suggested. I do appreciate the comment that the Ontario Provincial Police take into account—I think they do this very capably—they take into account, in those areas of northern Ontario, particularly, where they police and have much contact with the Indians, they take into account the proclivity of the Indian to get into trouble, particularly with offences against our liquor Act. They are not the most serious offences, and they are treated with consideration and the provincial police try to return them to their jobs, or to their families, without getting them involved too much in court.

But, as the statistics show, the great percentage of the offences that the Indian gets involved in are caused by liquor, or they are offences against the liquor Act, or if it is an offence of violence—assault, disorder—it is usually caused by having imbibed quantities of liquor. I do not think I can say more than that we are, on the one hand, required to treat the Indian as a citizen the same as any other without any discrimination, but if there is any consideration that is given at all, that given to him by our police forces and by our courts is in the way of a consideration because of this apparent proclivity of being involved with liquor offences.

What programme one might devise I think is beyond the purview of my department. I think there are programmes of work, particularly in northern Ontario, programmes of supervision, programmes of recreation, all of which we would support, but I think it would come certainly under some other department to initiate it. We can only do our part in the enforcement of law, having consideration for the Indians coming in the hands of the law, or through the courts.

Mr. Sopha: I want to raise a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that may become important tomorrow.

I think of this vote 206 as being the framework of the personnel within which the criminal law is prosecuted in this province. It deals with the office of the director of public prosecutions and the Crown attorney's branch.

I take it, Mr. Chairman, that you will rule that, under vote 207, we deal with the substantive law and the methods, the premises and the basis upon which the criminal law is enforced under the Attorney General.

I have no wish to interrupt my friend from Thunder Bay in that important matter he raised but it was, after all, a matter of substantive law. I take it vote 207 deals with the whole framework of the administration of justice in the province?

Mr. Chairman: I would think that vote 207 was detailed quite extensively as to the various branches and they do appear to be exactly what the member suggests—the administration of justice.

Mr. Sopha: Vote 206 is the administration.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 206 is the criminal law division, the two separate offices; but the administration of it is under vote 207.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, well, I would not want you to rule tomorrow if we take up a matter of the enforcement of the criminal law—I would not want to be met with your ruling that it should have fallen under vote 206.

Mr. Chairman: I do not see how the Chairman could rule in that manner, because if it falls within the purview of vote 207—any one of the branches—it would be in order.

Mr. Sopha: There will be things we have dealt with tomorrow that have not got a specific head.

Mr. Chairman: If you have a specific example, the Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: For example, I intend to take up tomorrow the question of the continuance of this inhuman and bestial practice of putting the prisoner in the prisoner's dock. You find no vote for prisoner's docks in vote 207, no item for it, but I think it appropriate to take it up under vote 207 instead of this which is after all only the bureaucracy for the enforcement of the law.

Mr. Chairman: Well, since the Chairman is such a lenient and flexible Chairman, I am sure there will be no restriction on it.

Vote 206: The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Chairman, I would not want to leave this House with the impression that the Indians feel that they are getting complete justice and complete equality before the law with regard to convictions generally, let alone to say that they feel that they are being treated equally with regard to the convictions under The Liquor Control Act. If I might quote again what I quoted earlier from The Indian Act:

> Because of the high involvement of Indian people with liquor infractions, a close look was taken into the provisions of The Indian Act as it relates to liquor control. Most police officers, magistrates, Indian affairs branch officials, Indian leaders and inmates, felt strongly that the liquor provisions of The Indian Act should be deleted, and that for purposes of liquor control Indian people should be dealt with the same as other residents under the terms of the provincial and territorial liquor legislation. It was apparent from observations and statistics that many Indian people are being convicted under sections of The Indian Act for behaviour that is not an offence under the provincial legislation.
> A recent indication of dissatisfaction with this aspect of legislation affecting Indians is provided in the following newspaper stories.

It gives specific instances.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do those remarks apply particularly to Ontario?

Mr. Stokes: Well I think they do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not believe The Indian Act is used very often.

Mr. Stokes: Well, it does apparently in some jurisdictions where the Indian runs afoul of either one or the other. Now, just to show you how incongruous it is, you have many reservations in Ontario where they have not taken a referendum with regard to whether or not they want to take liquor on to the reservation. It is quite possible where you have Indians living on separate reserves, possibly on opposite sides of the road, where they have taken the referendum on this side, and they have not taken on this side, and the officer will follow them on to the reserve.

It is an indictable offence if they happen to live on one side of the road, and it is not an indictable offence if they happen to live on the other side of the road. This is just how ridiculous some of our liquor laws are.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would just like to interject. I may be wrong on this, but my impression is that our provincial police officers seldom charge under The Indian Act. I think that this quotation the hon. member is giving must be from the activities of the RCMP on the reserves. I doubt if our people charge many offences at all under The Indian Act. I do not think they get into that area at all.

Mr. Chairman.: Vote 206 agreed to?

Mr. Stokes: No, I want to pursue this further.

It further states that police relationships with Indians appear to be more positive and healthier in the Maritimes and Quebec than in the rest of Canada, so I assume from that that they do not consider the relations between Indians and our police forces as good in Ontario as it is in the Maritimes and Quebec. It must be remembered that the incidence of crime among the Indian people in these areas is relatively low, not only on comparison to other parts of Canada, but also in relation to the non-Indian crime rate within the area.

It must be obvious to everybody that the incidence of crime among our Indian population is much higher than it is among the people of Canada generally.

Mr. Sopha: I do not agree with that for one minute.

Mr. Stokes: Well, statistics prove it. I quoted earlier—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Stokes: The rate of crime is higher!

Mr. Sopha: Being drunk? You call that a crime, being drunk?

Mr. Stokes: I do not call it a crime, it is what the court says. If you do not believe me listen to an Indian. "Canadian taxpayers are paying millions of dollars to keep Indians in jail because governments have failed to establish policies to help them," an Indian who is a Toronto school principal charged last night. A. E. Bigwin, an Ojibway, said that about 2,500 Indians are now in federal penitentiaries.

He says that we must get at the root of the problem. We cannot keep putting Indians in jail just because they happen to run afoul of the law because they vent their frustrations by taking a few drinks. You are just aggravating the situation. Now, I did not say that—

Mr. Ben: Do you accept those figures that 2,500 Indians are in federal penitentiaries? Do you accept those figures?

Mr. Stokes: I did not say that. No, I did not.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Ben: If you quote you are responsible for the figures.

Mr. Stokes: If those in provincial jails were added to this figure, he said, it would show that more than 30 per cent of inmates are of Indian ancestry, although Indians only make up about three per cent of the population.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Stokes: Well he must know.

Mr. Ben: But you are saying it.

Mr. Stokes: It backs it up in here too. Here is a federal study, "Indians and the Law," a survey prepared for the hon. Arthur Laing, Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It was put out by his department—

An hon. member: Is that federal or provincial?

Mr. Stokes: Well, if he is a good man you must accept his figures—

Mr. Sopha: Probably put out by the man who beat Davie Fulton.

Mr. Stokes: All I am trying to say, Mr. Chairman, is that I do not accept for a minute that Indians are more lawless than any other segment of our society. But I do not go along with the idea that they are getting equal justice before the law. I am saying that if they run afoul of the law because of an infraction against the liquor laws of the province they are dealt with in a different way because they do not have the wherewithal. They do not have the finances behind them to pay a small fine. They end up in jail, their families suffer, the whole family breaks down as a result of it, and as I say they are not getting equal justice before the law.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to add, of course, that there is no province in Canada that is more notorious than Ontario in desiring to put people in jail. Ontario leads the way.

I sought and obtained the figures from the Dominion bureau of statistics and they arrived only a couple of days ago—I am going to sift them overnight—in respect of liquor offences.

But tonight I want to deal only with that aspect raised by my friend from Thunder Bay, and I want to say very quietly and very firmly that it is a shocking disgrace on the administration of justice in this province the number of Indian women who are incarcerated in our institutions for being drunk, being arrested in public places and hauled into magistrate's court. Being economically disabled they cannot pay the fine meted out to them and they go to be incarcerated in our institutions.

The Attorney General says, "I sit on the committee, we sit on the committee, and we are trying to figure out ways of obviating this."

Well, I say to him that if our society is truly built on a religious base and is motivated by human instincts then, let him take that $75,000 we give to the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), and let him take that $1.8 million we are going to give to the horseowners, and build some hostels.

Instead of throwing these Indian women in jail as his law officers of the Crown are prone to do in their participation of process, send those Indian women to some domestic environment, let them make quilts or pick blueberries or engage in some other pastoral pursuit, knit socks or do any of the multiple things that women can do rather than jail them.

Every time I go to the district jail in Sudbury I automatically look at the board to see what the count is, and I look at the number of women. If it is 11, 12 14, 13 or 6, I say, how many are Indians? Invariably the great majority of them are Indian women.

White women, Anglo-Saxon Caucasian women are not thrown in in that way because if we ever did it you would hear such an outcry in this province of wounded sensitivity to the way we treat our women that it would not be tolerated. And white women, of course, have the advantage that somebody will come forward and pay their fine.

But they march the Indian women in, and I have seen them Monday mornings, I saw some this morning in magistrate's court, beaten up, downtrodden, alcohol soaked, inarticulate, undefended. They get up and read the record, as many as 10, 12, 15 convictions in the calendar year and the magistrate groans out the automatic 30 days or three months. Nobody, I notice, gets up and says to him, can she have time to pay. It is useless. How would she get the money to pay? Where would she get it from? Even an Indian male will not come forward and put up the money for them. The Indian male being addicted to alcohol himself, he would not part with his money to bail an Indian female out because that would deprive him of the facility to get some more wine and the fact is, of course, that sociologically, psychologically, physiologically, our Indians are not able to drink. They are not able to drink in the way Caucasians can drink and handle it. There is something chemically wrong with their bodies that they cannot—

Mr. J. L. Brown (Beaches-Woodbine): You are wrong.

Mr. Sopha: That is true!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: From my own experience—

Mr. M. Makarchuk (Brantford): Your prejudice is showing.

Mr. Sopha: From my own experience—just a moment—I will take them all. I have personally been engaged in criminal trials with Indians where alcohol has been involved, I say to my friend from Beaches-Woodbine, if he will remain silent for a moment, and where the psychological manifestations are completely and utterly different than you encounter among Caucasians, just completely and utterly different.

Mr. MacDonald: Nonsense!

Mr. Sopha: Let me give you an illustration—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Oh no, you do not trap me into that.

Mr. J. Renwick: That is a shocking remark.

Mr. Sopha: Go ahead with all your adjectives, get all your adjectives over.

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, we cannot help it, when you talk such—

Mr. Sopha: Are you finished then?

Mr. Ben: Even at university we were taught that the Jews, Italians and Poles had a greater tolerance to alcohol than the other Caucasian races.

Mr. J. Renwick: Oh sure, no difference!

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: Are you all finished? Now let me relate my own experience in this regard and I will draw on one illustration. On two occasions I have been involved in homicide trials where the alleged, comparable homicide resulted from, at the end of a long period, indulgence in alcohol, a long period lasting over several days. In each of these occasions, there were four or five Indians involved and they came to the point, after several days of imbibing of alcohol, where they engaged in conduct accompanied by almost a total amnesia—behaviour where they simply were not able to relate at the end just what their particular involvement was. I have never encountered that set of circumstances with Caucasian people.

Well, look at the manifestations of it. Indians on—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: Look, will you just keep quiet for a moment?

Mr. White: Your racial prejudice is showing now and you sound so sanctimonious.

Mr. Sopha: The Indian—no, I utterly repudiate that!

An hon. member: It does not matter whether you—

Mr. Sopha: In the face of that canard—

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sopha: In the face of that canard, I merely dig my heels more firmly in the rug and tell you that that canard—that imputation—is really unworthy although you can really strike low depths—

Mr. Chairman: Let us return to the vote and proper debate. The member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: Look at the manifestations, I point to my own experience with Indians. The Indian, on repairing to the source of supply and getting the half dozen bottles of wine, comes out, goes behind the nearest signpost or rather a place where he can obscure himself and drinks the whole bottle down without stopping, a manifestation of the—

Mr. MacDonald: Whites can do the same thing too!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Sopha: A sociological manifestation of the fact that the police, for generations, were leaning over the Indian's shoulder and would wrench the bottle out of his hand before he had a chance to drink it. The Indian has learned, through this conditioning behaviour, get the stuff in your stomach before the policeman can come and take it away from you. The accompanying drinking bouts—I have seen drinking bouts among Indians such as I defy anybody to say that they have encountered among the Caucasians.

I want to encapsulate this. You have heard all the hearty cries from the left—the very same things about the Indians' inability, psychologically, socialogically and physiologically to handle alcohol. The very same things were heard at much greater length and more extensively last October when I went to the continuing centre of education at Elliot Lake where they had a conference on Indian affairs.

There were several hundred Indians, and I made the same submissions as I have made here tonight. There was not a shred of disagreement from the Indians. But the experts here, who pretend to speak for the Indians and are such experts in their behaviour, they sound like a bunch of wounded seagulls when one relates the facts.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: And having said this, all I have really said is this proposition that alcohol affects the Indian differently than it does the Caucasians. That is all I have said.

Mr. MacDonald: I have seen different cases where white people acted just as badly as the Indian.

Mr. Sopha: But some people cannot stand the truth, and my friend from London South says I am guilty of racial prejudice and the wounded seagulls over here start to rant and rave and that is all I have said. It is all I have said and I rely on my own experience.

Mr. J. Renwick: The cheapest form of racism that we have heard in this House.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Mr. Sopha: The greatest disservice the white man ever did to the Indian on this continent was exposing him to the C2H50H. He taught the Indian to drink and wreaked havoc with the Indian down through the generations and now my friend from Riverdale, a very intelligent man, in the face of that sociological fact, he says it is racism. How ridiculous can you get?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: How ridiculous can you get to revert to that basic fact?

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Chairman, what has this got to do with the Indians' ability or inability to cope with alcohol? That has nothing to do with these estimates.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Thunder Bay mentioned it in the first place.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Stokes: I made reference to it with respect to his treatment in the eyes of the law. We are not talking about his ability to cope with it.

Mr. Chairman: Well, the member mentioned the Indians' inability to cope with it, in the same manner as other people. He mentioned this himself.

Mr. Sopha: I want to make just two more points. I want to reiterate to the Attorney General, and to plead with him, let us stop putting these Indian women in jail for liquor offences. Let us find an alternative method of dealing with them and perhaps the hostel method of some less incarcerative environment is the place where they ought to be sent.

Second, it is interesting to note that the Indians themselves, and I will inform our friends to the left, recognize their weakness in respect of alcohol because it was very informative when we went to Big Trout Lake a couple of years ago to be informed of the rigid restrictions in respect of alcohol on the reservation. None was permitted at all. They simply would not tolerate its introduction on the reserve.

They went to the extent, we were told by one of the principal men, that the pilot or co-pilot or both of a commercial air service coming into Big Trout Lake were found by the principal men to be imbibers of alcohol and had dropped some on the reserve, and they told that commercial service that they would not deal with them any more. In other words, the attitude there among those Indians was total isolation from alcohol. They simply did not want it as part of their culture.

Some of these people have simply never been to reserves. I act for six Indian bands and I will stand by what I have said here tonight. I act for them and the chiefs and principal men, on many occasions have indicated their distress to me that the ravages of what alcohol can do.

Mr. MacDonald: The reserves should get a new lawyer.

Mr. Sopha: Do two wrongs make a right?

Mr. MacDonald: No. But why are you compounding the wrongs?

Mr. Sopha: We know that and I am merely saying that it has a special sociological and psychological effect upon Indians, that is all I am saying. The reaction to it—and finally, here is the great sin—is in the enforcement of the liquor provisions of The Liquor Control Act, there is always discrimination against the poor. It is poor drunks that are picked up by the police. Indians are invariably poor, so the rigours of law enforcement descend more heavily upon Indians. They are the ones.

In many cases I suppose—it is true one can only conjecture—that a policeman making his rounds and seeing a drunken Indian, whereas he might make an exception, say a friendy word or guide the white man to his home, the Indian does not get the benefit of that. He is considered to be homeless, an itinerant, a drunken vagabond and he is picked up and put in the hoosegow, and very frequently sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

All the self-professed experts are here, and I would like to hear from them, and what—

Mr. White: The causes are environmental and not genetic.

Mr. Sopha: What is the matter with you? All right? Sociological, psychological and physiological—all three!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I will tell you why I think it is. It is because for many hundreds of years, back to the beginning of civilization, Caucasians have been exposed to alcohol and become endemic to it. But Indians just have had complete disinterest. Their exposure to alcohol would be only 500 years. They have not become endemic to it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Let us not overlook, in our attitude and reaction to alcohol, the difference to attitude to it expressed on the North American continent in contrast to the attitude in the European country. The outlook on alcohol has been entirely different. The European countries never experienced the Puritan aversion to it that we have in North America with the temperance drives.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 206? The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. Stokes: Mr. Chairman, I just want to refute one statement that the hon. member for Sudbury made when he said that his remarks that he made in Elliot Lake were completely endorsed—

Mr. Sopha: I did not say that. I said that there was no objection.

Mr. Stokes: Here is a table showing the number of Indian bands in Canada which have held a referendum of liquor privileges.

In the province of Ontario 55 reservations held referendums and 50 of them voted wet and five of them voted dry, so that they do not accept the premise that they cannot handle it. They think that they have every bit as much right to have it as you and I and I agree with them.

Vote 206 agreed to.

On vote 207:

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Chairman I would assume that there will be discussion on vote 207.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee rise and report.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed, Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report that it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I would like to deal with second readings with the House in the committee of the whole; and then the third readings. Then we will return to the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11:30 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, JULY 3, 1968

The House resumed at 2:00 o'clock p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, yesterday afternoon the hon. member for Huron-Bruce (Mr. Gaunt), in the absence of the member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), asked a question of me to which I did not have the answer. It was relative to the report of an ambulance having been called from Pembroke to attend an accident on the Quebec side, and the request had been refused. I have been advised by the operator that two calls were received by his office.

One came from an unidentified caller with little or no particulars of the accident, and very shortly thereafter, a further call came from the Quebec Provincial Police to the Ontario Provincial Police, advising them to disregard the call and that they had already sought an ambulance from Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: The member for York South has a question for the Provincial Secretary.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Yes, Mr. Speaker, what basis, if any, is there in the allegation that there was favouritism in the rationing of beer to hotels in the period before the strike of brewery workers?

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I have been advised by the officials of the liquor control board of the province that they have satisfied themselves that there is absolutely no basis to such an allegation.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park has a question for the Minister of Reform Institutions from yesterday.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a five-part question for the Minister. Was Clyde Roger B. of Ottawa imprisoned in Burwash reformatory last fall? Why was he transferred this year to Millbrook? Why was he transferred this year to Sarnia jail? Why was he transferred this year to Guelph county jail? And lastly, if the Minister agrees that family visits are an important factor in reform, why does his department make it so difficult for some families to visit prisoners by placing them so far from their homes?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will assure himself of going down in the annals of this Legislature, if he addresses the question to the proper Minister, the first Minister of Correctional Services, and I am sure that it surprises no one that he has asked me the first question.

In answer to the question, Mr. Speaker, the answer to question one is that this man was admitted to Burwash industrial farm in 1967. The answer to: "Why was he transferred this year to Millbrook?" is that he was a serious behavioural problem and had threatened staff at Burwash. Incidentally, this man, whose lengthy record includes a recent penitentiary term, sir, has been a consistent behavioural problem in our institutions during his numerous incarcerations over the 12 years since his arrival in this province.

The answer to the third part: "Why was he transferred this year to Sarnia jail?" He was one of the ring-leaders in the disturbance at Millbrook reformatory on May 7 of this year. Part 4: "Why was he transferred this year to Guelph jail?" Mr. Speaker, it would not be in the inmate's best interests or in the public's interest to reveal publicly the reasons for transferring this man to the Guelph jail. I am prepared to give the reasons to the hon. member verbally if he will respect the confidentiality of the information I am prepared to divulge under those circumstances.

Part 5: "If the Minister agrees that family visits are an important factor in reform, why does his department make it so difficult for some families to visit prisoners by placing them so far from their homes?" The answer is that the proximity of an institution to an inmate's family is one of many considerations —safety of the public is another important factor—in determining to which institution an inmate will be sent. In any event, to the best of our knowledge, this man has only one relative in the province. This relative lives closer to the Sarnia jail than to any reformatory or industrial farm in the province, and recently visited the inmate there. I think that this is all I can give the hon. member at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The member for York Centre.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. The first is what steps were taken by the Ontario securities commission to verify the accuracy, and determine the adequacy of the information provided by the officers and directors of Prudential Finance Corporation, in the prospectus dated June 14, 1963?

Second, did the Ontario securities commission receive any indication of sales or debentures being made to other than existing holders of the company's debentures after June 30, 1964 when the June 14, 1963 prospectus went out of date?

Third, what caused the Ontario securities commission to issue an order in March 1966 to discontinue sale of debentures which, under regulations of that date, did not require a prospectus when sold to existing debenture holders?

Fourth, did the Ontario securities commission receive any indication of sales of debentures being made by the company after March, 1966, when it issued the order to discontinue such sales? Did it make any effort to check whether such sales were being made?

Fifth, what breaches of the Act or code occurred in the case of the sale of securities of Prudential Finance Corporation Limited? What action did the Ontario securities commission take to enforce these breaches? What has been the result of the action?

Sixth, what steps did the Metropolitan Trust Company, as trustee for the debenture holders, take to ensure the company was maintaining its covenants to the holders of the unsecured debentures? Were such steps adequate?

Seventh, is there any claim in law on these grounds or others by the debenture holders against Metropolitan Trust Company to compensate the debenture holders for their losses?

Eighth, what were the principal causes of the loss of $20 million between June 1963, and November 1966, as shown by an examination of all records, including those of third parties, to ascertain whether the costs recorded in the company's records contained any amounts of assets delivered to insiders?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will take the questions as notice.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I would like to raise this point of order related to the questions before the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the member for High Park, has run on two occasions now into the situation where you have not accepted a written question submitted to you, prior to the opening of the House, and which was in conformity to the time limits which have been prescribed, and I would like your clarification, Mr. Speaker as to the reason why a question framed in this way was refused, because it appeared to be of topical and immediate current interest.

Mr. Speaker: It does not need comment; if the member would read the question, I will give my reasons.

Mr. J. Renwick: The question which my colleague, the member for High Park had submitted, and which was refused by you is, as follows: "Has the Ontario securities commission investigated trading in the stock of Lynbar Mines in view of—or as it was suggested as a substitute—following action by the securities and exchange commission to prevent sale of that stock in the United States?" And then there were the usual concluding questions, "if not, why not; if so, what were the results of the investigation?" The point that I would like clarification on in this continuing debate is: What questions are admissible? Is it possible that question could have been phrased in such a way—having reference to the securities and exchange commission of the United States—to make it topical and meaningful to the Minister, so that it would have been acceptable by you as Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I can answer the member's question very simply. The member for High Park was asking a question as to whether there was any investigation into the sale of certain shares, and the question should have ended there. What is done by the American securities exchange control board—or whatever it is—is certainly not part of the question. It is merely icing added to the cake. It does not add anything to the Minister's knowledge, because I am sure his people know about these things. It is, I presume, advertising and not a point which the member wishes to make, and which perhaps later he can make by a supplementary question. Certainly it did not form part of a proper question in my opinion, and I so rule, and I rule again.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, if I may comment upon your ruling—

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the member that the Speaker's rulings are not debatable? If the member wishes to move that the ruling be reversed he may do so. Otherwise the incident is closed.

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, Mr. Speaker, I may so wish to move but before I do move, and because we are not anxious to appeal the Speaker's ruling, I would like if I may, to have a further clarification of the ruling that you have made.

My understanding is that a member wishing to place a question to the Minister is entitled to point out to the Ministry the reason why he considers the question to be of a topical nature. To ask a generalized question such as, "has the Ontario securities commission investigated trading in the stock of Lynbar Mines," is neither informative nor topical unless there is included in the statement, the reason why it is of current and topical interest. In this case, it was because the securities and exchange commission of the United States had made an order prohibiting sales in the United States.

It appeared to me to be an essential part of the topicality of the question that that reference be made, rather than the bare statement without any other informative material in the question. If this is not accepted, it would appear to me that we are making an unsatisfactory question procedure even more unsatisfactory and I would like your elucidation, not just of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but the reasoning behind the exlusion of this proper reference in the ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I would like to point out to the members that during this rather lengthy session there has been a great deal of tolerance and leeway given to members, and particularly to the member complaining through his deputy leader today, and questions have been allowed, which by the rules, really should not have been allowed. There is nothing in the rules that I can find that says a question must contain the matters which the member states. The rules say that the questions must be of immediate and wide importance, but that does not mean that the question has to contain that background. As far as I am concerned, I feel that a proper question is a question which the members wish to ask of the Ministry concerning something under that Minister's jurisdiction. It can be asked without endeavouring in asking it to impute to the Ministry failure to do something, as some other jurisdiction has done. That actually is the case, in this particular instance, I would say.

So far as I am concerned, my ruling still remains. I have tried to explain how I feel about it and why I made it and, since these rulings are not debatable and we have allowed a considerable amount of debate, unless the ruling is to be appealed it stands without further debate.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not intending to debate what you have said. I believe I now understand the reason why you rejected the question and that is, because there was the implication—

An hon. member: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

There is no debate and the member is endeavouring now to comment or debate upon the Speaker's ruling. I will be glad to discuss it with him in my office, or with the member for High Park, and he can explain to me these matters and I will go further into it with him. But I will say that I have tried, and the Deputy Speaker, the Chairman of the committee of the whole House, assisted me, to be more than fair to the members from the Opposition side of the House with their questions and the matters which they raise and the manner in which they raise them. Perhaps I was not proper in doing that —I should have been more strict and perhaps that is so. But I felt then and I feel now that a great deal of leeway is to be allowed, but it must not go into other areas.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that anyone on this side of the House has asked that you be either more or less strict or more or less fair to us. All we are asking is, if the question period is to have any meaning, that we understand the rules under which questions are to be rejected by you as Mr. Speaker.

My understanding and I was asking if you would simply clarify it, is that the reason this question—

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

This is debating, or bringing into debate, a matter which has been decided—for which there is no debate. As I say, the rules of the House will not prevent us from discussing it privately if he wishes to do so and receive all the elucidation which it is possible for me to give him. But the incident at this moment, unless the proper procedure is followed, is closed.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand why you think that I am debating your ruling.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Speaker, I object to this member addressing one more word in this manner to this House on the question of your ruling. I make that statement having in mind that I now understand the question was one which was intended for my receipt as the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. I had no knowledge of the question until I came in the House.

I must object and insist that the member for Riverdale adhere to the rules of this House. He has a proper method of relief—he can appeal the Speaker's ruling, but he cannot debate it by indirect any more than by direct means. There should be no member more familiar with the rules of the House than the member for Riverdale, with his great experience.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interjection of the House leader for the government in this question. What I wanted to understand was the reason and to understand whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The member will persist until some further action will have to be taken. I have given the member much more leeway than is proper under the rules of the House. I have suggested to him that he is quite at liberty—and I will be delighted—if he wished to engage in a dialogue, to do so outside the House where we can talk freely, and I perhaps can further explain what I have said. I do not think it needs further explanation but if it does I will be glad to do so. Otherwise, this matter is very definitely closed so far as debate on the floor of the House is concerned.

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, Mr. Speaker—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You always want to break the rules of the House.

Mr. J. Renwick: I will discuss the matter with you outside.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: But not in the House.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Quiet! He just asked for a point of clarification.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Speaker, if the members have completed their interjections, subject to discussing this matter with you outside the House, I would like to reserve our position as to whether or not in this instance we would then raise the matter to challenge your ruling.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Last night this House listened to, in my view, as shocking a statement of pseudo-scientific nonsense with regard to the Indians, from a spokesman of the Liberal Party, as I have ever heard in the House. Now, when I read the record, I find that most of the interjections which we attempted to make to express our dissension did not get to the record; I do not say this in criticism because it was a very hectic session. I just want, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, to dissociate ourselves most emphatically from what was stated, because inevitably it is going to go out as a view of this House.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know that that is in order either.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Speaker, as one of those who interjected last night, I would like to say that I concur with the leader of the NDP and I think I speak for my colleagues in the caucus when I say that we hold no brief for the racist point of view presented by the member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha).

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not know what took place in this House last night but surely under the guise—

Mr. White: The member for Downsview was not even here.

Mr. Singer: That is right, I was not here.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: How can the member speak then?

Mr. Singer: Well, if the House leader would keep quiet he will listen to how I can speak and what I am going to have to say.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh, we will get more of the same thing.

Mr. Singer: Well, if the House leader would pay attention he would perhaps absorb a little education on the way.

Mr. Speaker, surely under the guise of comments on remarks that took place in the House at a previous time, dissociating or associating oneself with them is not a matter that should come up at this point, either as a point of privilege or a point of order.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order!

I am inclined to agree with the views of the member for Downsview that this is not the place for that particular matter. But since anything that offends or pertains to a member of this House is quite in order on the floor of the House, the remarks, as far as I am concerned, were in order, but perhaps not in the appropriate forum, in view of the discussions which took place last evening in committee of the whole.

Mr. Singer: If they want to say them in the committee of the whole that is their privilege.

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to agree with the member.

Orders of the day.

THIRD READINGS

The following bills were given third reading upon motions:

Bill 53, An Act to amend The Lord's Day (Ontario) Act, 1960-1961.

Bill 118, An Act to amend The Mining Act.

Bill 140, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Bill 141, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Bill 144, An Act to amend The Ontario Municipal Employees Retirement System Act, 1961-1962.

Bill 146, An Act to amend The Fire Departments Act.

Bill 147, An Act to amend The Police Act.

Bill 151, An Act to amend The Art Gallery of Ontario Act, 1966.

Bill 157, An Act to control the content and identification of stuffing in upholstered and stuffed articles upon their manufacture, sale and renovation.

Bill 160, An Act to amend The Air Pollution Control Act, 1967.

Bill 161, An Act to amend The Public Health Act.

THE POWER COMMISSION ACT

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management) moves second reading of Bill 158, An Act to amend The Power Commission Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 16th order, committee of the whole House, Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

THE CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT, 1966

House in committee on Bill 135, An Act to amend The Consumer Protection Act, 1966.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I move that subsection 2, of section 2 of the bill be amended by striking out "rate of interest" in the tenth line of subsection 3 as contained therein, and inserting in lieu thereof "percentage rate by which the cost of borrowing is expressed, the total number of instalments required to pay the total indebtedness", so that the said subsection 3 shall read as follows:

> (3) Where the amount to be paid by a buyer under an executory contract was determined after an allowance for trade-in, and is stated in the contract to be subject to adjustment after the existence or amount of liens against the trade-in is ascertained or confirmed, the statement of the terms of payment and the statement of the cost of credit shall be based upon the amount as determined upon the information provided by the buyer; but upon any subsequent adjustment, the percentage rate by which the cost of borrowing is expressed, the total number of instalments required to pay the total indebtedness, or the price shown in the contract shall not be changed.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the Minister's motion carry?

Motion agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Section 3 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 135 reported.

THE CORPORATIONS ACT

House in committee on Bill 153, An Act to amend The Corporations Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Chairman: The member for York Centre.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, in both this Act and The Securities Act there is a problem of insider benefit, or actually it is outsider benefit that I wish we could in some way include in this and The Securities Act.

The definition of an insider is described here, but it does not give any protection in cases where an insider uses his information to pass along the benefit to a friend by telephone, or some other indirect means where a friend, completely outside the family or the aegis of the insider, gains a benefit.

In the United States under the SEC regulations they do have provision whereby an insider is liable as is the person who benefits from information given that enables such person, even though he be no relation or no connection particularly of the insider whatsoever, to be penalized. So the insider who gives the information and the person who benefits are both penalized.

In this clause 1 in the definition it seemed to me the point where this matter should be thought about. I did not know whether the Minister had any thoughts on this matter.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary and Minister of Citizenship): Mr. Chairman, the amendments to The Corporations Act are complementary to those already made in Bill 50 in order to make them consistent. The intent, of course, is to broaden this whole principle to be applicable here as the member can read. We are, in fact, attaching this definition to any person who exercises control, which is set out here, and I would assume that the person to whom he is making reference would, if he has a type of control, be under the same obligations that are required here by the extended Act.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, what I am referring to is the director of a company leaving a board room, having access to privileged information concerning a company that might be about to be acquired by his company, and which at the time is quoted and available in the market at a price well below the price that they will be offering for it.

We have seen many examples of this occurring in the past, where if the director himself does not get a benefit, he, in effect, gives favour to those outside and that person outside buys in the market place with special knowledge and, therefore, is depriving the selling shareholder of an advantage.

Has any consideration been given to this situation and how it could be covered in this Act and The Securities Act?

Hon. Mr. Welch: At the moment I cannot comment except to assure the member now that he has raised this point we would be glad to take it under consideration if, in fact, there is anything to be done further, in consultation with the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, that matter is covered under the SEC regulations.

Sections 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 8:

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Chairman, I move that clauses c, d, e, f, g, h, and l of section 85(b), as contained in section 8 of the bill be amended by striking out "securities" where it occurs in each such clause, and by inserting in lieu thereof the word "investments" in each instance.

Section 8, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 9 to 13, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 153 reported.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee rise and report.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed, Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs leave to report two bills with certain amendments, and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 27th order, the House in committee of supply.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

One vote 207:

Mr. Chairman: If the committee feels that there would be any advantage in dealing with this bill by branches or departments it might be desirable. Does the Minister wish to do it in this way, or take the whole vote in full?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Perhaps we could take it in total, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: I do not think that we will restrict any debate between the branches. We will take the vote in total as we have been doing.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): My suggestion is that this is a substantial part of The Attorney General's Department, Mr. Chairman, and as there are some 12 to 14 titles, I thought that we might make more logical progress if we do it title by title. It would be foolish, for example, to embark on a discussion of the Supreme Court of Ontario and intermingle that with something about probation service and jump all over the place. It would seem to me that if we did it title by title we would conduct the business of the House in a more orderly manner.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if it will facilitate discussion, I am most agreeable generally to the suggestion of the hon. member for Downsview. I have no objection to taking it title by title.

Mr. Chairman: I might say that for the last several estimates, we have taken the various estimates of the different departments by total votes. As Chairman, I have no objection if I have the concurrence of the committee that we deal with vote 207 by the branches as set forth herein. Do I have the concurrence of the entire committee? We will, therefore, take vote 207 by titles.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if I might be permitted before we proceed with the vote? Yesterday, in the evening sitting of the House, the hon. member for Humber (Mr. Ben) was quite persistent in charging me with expressing an attitude, and that it was my personal attitude and the attitude of The Department of the Attorney General, of determination to convict, which, he said, were my words. I denied them because it was not my attitude and I think that he agreed that we would look at Hansard today.

Now, I do not know if he has had an opportunity to see Hansard or not. Perhaps he would be good enough to allow me to speak to the matter. I have the Hansard, which was delivered to me just recently, and it appears on the copy on page 2917-2. I note that the words which he attributes to me were in reply to a question from the hon. member for Riverdale and I was saying that if the charges were laid singly and then you had to dispense or dispose with one, or dispose with one and then consider laying another, I said that the accused person would have a right to be critical of that approach, rather than having whatever possibility you might prove dealt with in one or more charges laid at the same time.

What I said, as it appeared in Hansard is this:

> We say we would select this charge and prove it, and having failed in it, we would either have to forget about the matter or start afresh next week or at some future date. That is not a good practice. This is not a very good way to conduct the criminal side of the administration of justice. There will be delay; there will be expense; there will be the calling back of witnesses.
> You can understand all the objections which could be raised at that type of thing. You could be bringing the accused person back and he, I am sure, would complain. He would say "Well, you had me in court last week on a charge which has been pending for three weeks. Then it was tried and you lost it. You lost on that and now just because you are deliberately determined to convict me, you lay another one".

I was saying that these would be the words that an accused person freed on one charge might use against you, and say, "No, you lost that charge but you are determined to get me and you come back and lay another." These were not my words, I think that the hon. member will agree. I was not saying that this was our attitude; I was saying that it was the attitude I think an accused person might justifiably have to say critically of us, "You could not succeed on the one charge; now you wait and try to get me on another and you are deliberately trying to convict me." I think that is plain and I am happy to clear it up and I hope the hon. member will look at it.

Mr. Chairman: I must point out to the Attorney General and the committee that vote 206 has been carried and that the Attorney General has simply clarified the accusation that was made against him last night, in which the Chairman had suggested the member should accept the words of the Attorney General.

We are now dealing with vote 207.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Mr. Chairman, I want to refer myself first, in connection with this vote, to the contributions to the legal aid fund of the law society of Upper Canada in the amount of $6.7 million.

Mr. Chairman: Pardon the interjection, but we are going to deal with these by headings, as pointed out, and we are dealing with the office of the assistant Deputy Attorney General.

Mr. Bullbrook: I am sorry, sir, I did not understand your rulings.

Mr. Chairman: Well, perhaps the agreement was reached before the member was here, but we agreed, with the unanimous consent of the House, that we would take vote 207 under the various sub-headings.

Mr. Singer: Except that he is right, sir, because if you look at that item it includes a contribution to the legal aid fund of $6.7 million—

Mr. Chairman: Is this the matter to which the member for Sarnia is speaking?

Mr. Singer: That is right.

Mr. Chairman: Well then, the Chairman is out of order. The member for Sarnia may proceed.

Mr. Bullbrook: I can tell you one thing, Mr. Chairman, the member for Sarnia is really confused right now.

In connection with the contribution to the legal aid fund, I am not going to go into dollar and cent detail in connection with this. I think the hon. Attorney General agrees that there has been a considerable elevation in connection with the expenditure relative to this fund since the original conception of the idea. We in the profession, I imagine we in the House, and the majority of the people of the province of Ontario have accepted this overall concept as being beneficial in connection with the administration of justice in the province of Ontario.

But I want to make several comments relative to it that come to my attention in connection with the operation of the plan in the Sarnia area and throughout the province.

First of all, Mr. Chairman, I have always been concerned with the intrusion initially of the adversary system in the family courts of the province of Ontario. This is a problem of delicate grounds, because one must recognize that each citizen is entitled and should be entitled to representation by counsel, where any litigation of any kind is confronting them. But I found, in my limited experience, that in connection with domestic problems—marital matters—at this level of the courts that sometimes the intrusion of counsel really has other than a beneficial effect.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that so many times the fact the lawyers are brought into it at this level of the problem causes a polarization of attitude, a stiffening of the spine so to speak. So that we find, in effect, that rather than carrying out of the bound duty of the profession—that is, an attempt at reconciliation—we find, in effect, Mr. Attorney General, through you Mr. Chairman, that we are separating the people, rather than bringing them together.

I would ask you to comment on this aspect of it, because I find now that with the legal aid plan there is even a greater professional intrusion in the family courts than there was previously.

I want to temper what I have to say and again, record it that I am not, nor of course is our party, against the concept providing adequate counsel to all persons at all times. It seems to me that sometimes this very plan is doing a disservice—is taking away from the very intent of the plan itself.

A second thing causes me concern. I am happy about divorce reform—I mentioned in my opening comments relative to these estimates, how proud and pleased I am as one legislator that we are really, as I say, coming into the 20th century. But we read in the paper yesterday the possibility of some 20,000 actions this year. Perhaps this is enlarged, but I know the experience thus far in the Sarnia area. The director has been absolutely deluged with applications for assistance in connection with marital matters. I comment here that I think that, in connection with certificates of approval relative to these marital matters, there should be possibly some direction to the area directors that these applications should be scrutinized even more diligently than those relative to criminal matters.

The next thing that causes me concern in connection with the plan is the fact that we seem to be unduly servicing repeaters. Many of the profession who act in the criminal field themselves, will not service repeaters as a matter of what they consider professional ethics.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I would like the Attorney General to comment on his attitude in connection with the servicing of repeaters. I frankly was under the impression that repeaters should not be serviced. I know of one young man in our area who has been serviced four times through the legal aid plan and I really feel frankly, perhaps by way of exaggerating, that we are really servicing somewhat of a criminal element here.

Basically, my concern in speaking of the plan, is that I want to have the comments of the Attorney General in connection with the function and purpose of the plan relative to the family courts. It has caused me not only sincere public concern, but I have had the opportunity of discussing it with you privately before.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this was one of the matters which gave us, perhaps not concern, but reason to study and consider in framing the legal aid plan. It was hoped, I think, that it would not be so prevalent in its use in the juvenile and family courts as in the magistrates' courts, where persons were coming forward charged with an offence. However, we could not see our way clear to deny to cases in the juvenile and family courts the right of the persons brought before that court to have counsel under the legal aid plan.

It is to be borne in mind that the juvenile and family court is a court presided over by a judge and that the rights and liberties of people are dealt with there. Primarily we like to think of it as a family court dealing with juveniles, which it does in large part but many of the cases that come there involve the rights of parents. Orders are made for support—orders of punishment can be issued out of that court by the juvenile and family court judge.

And to say that persons brought before that court to be dealt with know very important matters affecting their rights and liberties—that they could not have counsel under the legal aid plan. I think it would have been something we could not maintain. I may say this, that some of the judges who have spoken to me—juvenile and family court judges—have expressed the view that they are very gratified that they have the assistance of counsel there. Quite often, I am informed, they do not go in with an adversary approach. It is more a matter of trying to assist the parties, particularly in those cases where settlements may possibly be arranged, or some agreement reached that they can present to the court.

The judges I have spoken to, while they do not always appreciate some of the cases where the counsel get into an adversary approach, are generally, I think, happy that the legal aid plan has assisted them in dealing with the cases before the court.

One of the points that is made to me is that if a judge has to, in his honest endeavour to try and, say, bring parties together or reach an agreement even though they are separated—to make something work, as it were, for both parties and try and be a mediator, to bring them together—then, if his efforts fail, he is then put in the position of having to judge. It is very difficult for him even to appear to be impartial, where he has sat with the parties and heard one attitude and the other and tried to reach some concensus between them.

Then he has to return to his function as a judge and make a decision against one to some extent, or against the other. The judges assure me that the legal aid plan has been a great assistance to them in their courts. Then of course there is the great field of advice and law, which applies to some of the more serious cases which get into the family court; the judges are appreciative of this.

I do not think we can, having gone to this point—and I think, rightly, having gone to the point—of allowing the assistance of the legal aid plan to be given to the juvenile family court—I do not think we could back up even if we wanted to. But my remarks are to the end that it has been a good thing in the juvenile and family court.

What was the other point that the hon. member raised?

Mr. Bullbrook: The fact that we are going to be involved with a great increase in the divorce litigation, and, secondly, repeaters.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have made every preparation generally in the administration of justice—preparation of the new rules ready for July 2, when the new federal Divorce Act came into effect.

I think that the immediate rush, which apparently has not been quite as great as it was anticipated, it would be that that immediate rush will probably level off shortly. I think that the provisions we have made to contend with it and meet it will be adequate. If they are not, we will be aware of it at once, and we will move to provide assistance.

I think that, while it was to be anticipated —and we did anticipate it—that there would be an initial rush of cases held back to be entered on July 3, or whatever or as soon as possible. This is happening, but it is not as great as was anticipated, and I think it will level off very shortly. We can only watch it and do our best to meet it.

Mr. Bullbrook: There was the matter of providing legal aid to the repeaters.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, yes. There was the question of the repeaters, and I just wanted to say that I have not formed any firm thought on that. But if I were to express my view, as I would think about it, we know that many of these people that come before our courts have been there before, particularly in the magistrate's court, the criminal jurisidiction side. And because a person was convicted once of an offence last month or last year, two years ago, when you say that he is not to be given legal aid on this occasion, you are in effect saying he is guilty, or you are almost approaching that. You are saying that because, you see, he may have been an offender a year ago on the very same type of offence, and there might be every reason to think that he is likely to have committed this offence. I do not think you can say that because a person offended once he is not entitled to a fair trial on this occasion when he may be completely innocent. To deny him legal aid would be to condemn him out of hand, to say, "Because you offended once, or twice, this time, although you may be perfectly innocent, you are not going to get any help." If you accepted that idea—

Mr. Bullbrook: I agree with you on that, I would not go that far.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. All right, perhaps for a certain type of offence, perhaps some of these offences where a person has a long record, I think it might be fair to say, that after a long series of offences a repeater of that nature—you might draw a line somewhere and say, "Here and no further." But I think one would have to be careful where one drew the line.

Mr. Bullbrook: In connection with your remarks regarding repeaters, I agree; it is a delicate balance. I must say though, on behalf of the public pocket, you sometimes find it difficult to accept legal aid servicing for example—somebody for the fourth time on breaking and entering, something of that nature. But I recognize the tightrope that you must walk as far as justice is concerned.

In connection with my first remark, I just put this on the record by way of a thought: In connection with the adversary system in the family courts, I perhaps would like to see—and I am not too knowledgeable—I would like to see the possibility on the first call in these matters, what we call in Sarnia, the first call. Apparently they are adopting it in the Metropolitan Toronto courts. In other words, if a man is summonsed for July 8, we expect to go on July 8, and we usually have our trial on July 15.

I was just thinking that when these matters come up on first call, in many cases, Mr. Chairman, more good can be done without counsel there. It is just a thought that you might discuss this approach with your juvenile and family court judges. I entirely agree with the proposition that there should be an entitlement to assistance. And one other thing: I take it that it goes without saying, in connection with the possibility of the divorce matters, that we are going to be dealing primarily, I would think, with the female plaintiffs really, in servicing through the plan —and I imagine on an order for party and party costs. Then, of course, these costs are attributable to any solicitor, and client fees are paid out of the plan to the solicitor assigned. Would I be correct in that? Provided they were coverable? Do I make myself clear, sir?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not sure that I am clear on what the hon. member—

Mr. Bullbrook: I hypothesize that the plan servicing a lady in a divorce action—she is successful and costs are awarded against the defendant husband on a party and party basis. I take it that it goes without saying that the party and party costs, if they are recovered, are received and paid over to the plaintiff's counsel, as against the solicitor and client bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is the way it is designed.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman, may I make, I trust, a few pithy, pertinent and profound remarks?

The scheme of legal aid, as you know, has completed its first full year of operation. While the cost has jumped considerably to $6.7 million as estimated for this year, from $2 million last year, it is supported wholeheartedly, as the hon. Attorney General knows, by this group in the House. I noticed—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit me to interject that we are not comparing a year against a year. We did not jump from $2 million for one year to $6.7 million for another year. We are not comparing comparable periods, you understand.

Mr. Lawlor: I can appreciate this is the first full year of operation, and I notice in a brochure sent around by the director of the scheme, Mr. Andrew Lawson, called "A Milestone for Justice", speaking of the legal aid scheme which came into our hands a few weeks ago, at the bottom of page 1 he says: "The legal profession has, in fact, put a great deal of effort into the plan, and the government is arching an eyebrow as to cost." I started out by saying that we are wholly in favour. I trust that no eyebrows are being arched over on that side of the House. I cannot see the Attorney General's eyebrows for the moment, but—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: At least they are wide open. I will say that as to the cost. We keep our eyes carefully on the administration of that plan. Maybe I do not arch my eyebrows but we are watching that very carefully.

Mr. Lawlor: I would trust that would be so within the internal operation of the plan, with no view to cutting back its actual scale of operation. The plan is conducted as the members, I trust, know on an enlightened social benefit basis, on a contributory costs set-up in which someone who can contribute in whole or in part for a period of time to the costs of his legal aid—criminal or civil—makes such a contribution. One of the questions I will be coming to, Mr. Chairman, is to what extent at this stage moneys have accumulated. How much is owing to the fund by individuals, and arising out of that, with what success is the fund collected?

My understanding is that while considerable sums are owing, the tendency is to fail in collection of the accounts, or to have considerable difficulty in doing so, at least. I suppose you take a regular civil action in any of the levels of the courts, depending upon the jurisdiction, and seek to use the regular means of collecting. I am just wondering if the fund might not consider adopting rather a more arbitrary power of collection, such as the federal government has on their income tax procedures. After all, this is a charge on the treasury, and the people in question have the wherewithal, and there is no reason why they should not contribute, thereby alleviating the costs of this plan. Because of the difficulties of installing it, of the recruitment of the necessary task force, I dare say that at this stage you may be encountering some difficulties in that regard. Where better are we going to initiate a scheme for a just society, which even the Conservatives are interested in doing, if not in the realm of justice itself?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have done it.

Mr. Lawlor: It is also the Conservatives arguing in this particular area. I would think that the two keystones of the plan—and perhaps the Attorney General would agree with me—the two keystones at least in this stage of the operation, are firstly the area directors. Terribly important is the quality of men there, and the quantity of stimulation and encouragement that they can give to their people in the 46 different areas in which this plan is operative. The second major focal point of the plan is the duty counsel which, if it falls down or weakens or fails in any respect, will send the plan completely awry.

Now, the duty counsel business bothers me a little bit. Being a denizen largely of this House now, I have not seen a great deal of its operation, but in the past couple of months I have been in court of couple of times, and it bothers me a little that on two of those occasions, duty counsel were not present. This was in the Etobicoke magistrate's court, and on one occasion he seemed to be missing. I wanted to speak to him about something, and on the second occasion he turned up rather late.

I trust that they are taking it with due seriousness, that while the benefits compared to what one might earn otherwise are not great, they are not out of proportion. As a matter of fact, it is a godsend to a good many lawyers that I know and they are doing better now than they have done previously.

Under this particular head, some benefits are accruing to the province out of this duty counsel work. We are training finally and at long last a criminal bar of younger members who have taken a decisive and direct interest in this. In the past we had a kind of—I do not want to be too harsh about this—a kind of sleazy effort, at least in its lower ranks, and not among the top brass of the criminal field, the first rate people. But then the lower dimension of that bar was very questionable.

I do not say that they were actually ambulance-chasers, but they hung around the cells, some of them trying to pick up a client and an odd $50. They did their business out of their back pocket as they said, and there was a considerable number of them.

Now, they are all bright young men, willing to take on this responsibility and handle 20 or 30 cases per day. Certainly they become well acquainted with the procedures and are at ease in handling a diversity of cases and giving advice right from the word go.

The next thing that is of benefit to the plan which should be pointed out is that it does have a considerable effect in counteracting recidivism, because they are given advice and not allowed in the first instance to go immediately before the magistrate or the courts and plead guilty, although they may do so after consultation through duty counsel, and when they feel that there is someone who is taking an interest that their rights are not left to the four winds. This is, I suggest, establishing a mentality where at least first offenders are given enormous benefits.

Arising out of that, I understand that the rate of acquittals and withdrawals of charges by the Crown has gone up. I do not know whether it is considerable or not. I notice that in the report of the New York State plan that a remarkable rate, 60 per cent convictions and 40 per cent acquittals in 1964 resulted. I would think that our rate would be nowhere near comparable. I do not know quite why.

Maybe it is because they lay charges more off-handedly over there. Whatever the reason, I would like to know if they have any figures for us as to what effect the operation of duty counsels actually is having upon at least the operation of the magistrates' courts, which again as far as the average citizen is concerned, is 95 per cent of the courts of the province.

The work of the area committees, these good people serving without charge, some of them being lay people, which is all to the good, and completely in line with the newer lights that we are trying to turn on in the administration of justice in the province. I think that honourable mention ought to be made of such area committees, who I understand, are working and attending a number of meetings of the groups coming into Toronto here. Some of them are working very long hours, and take a great deal of time off and have to travel, sometimes at personal cost and expense. They are quite prepared to do that. From that point of view I think that the thing is standing up well.

Another question that I would like to direct in no invidious spirit is that I understand that there are about 3,000 registered members of the Ontario bar presently in the plan, and when I look at the legal guide for the city of Toronto, there is presently practising around 3,217 lawyers in Toronto. Now, for many many reasons, such as being tied up in corporations, and having a very specialistic type of work to do, some of these would not participate. I wonder what percentage of total lawyers in the province really do participate and have offered their services under the plan?

I think that it would be in order to mention certain statistics. At the end of the first full year of operation, on March 31, there were 54,760 applicants to the plan and 67,204 people were represented by duty counsel of one kind or another. I would take it that that would include civil duty counsel, as well as the criminal duty counsel in the magistrates' courts every morning. I have no figure before me, and I would like one if I could, of the numbers that were rejected out of the total number of applicants of 54,000. Fifty-five per cent of the certificates issued were for civil matters and 45 per cent were for criminal matters. Out of this 14 per cent, or 5,288 people, made partial contributions into the plan in the province.

The amazing figure, or perhaps it should not strike us as too great considering the general problem, and it may be an index to the general economic health of the province for all our boasting on occasion, is that 86 per cent of the people under that plan were unable to contribute towards the costs whatsoever. That sort of figure sort of shakes you over against the affluence that is supposed to exist.

It either proves that those who are non-affluent are the ones most in trouble, which is I suppose up to a point is the truth of the matter, but I notice that in the New York scheme, sir, the figure was considerably lower, that is in 1964 at least. It was around 65 per cent.

The other area in which great benefits are accruing to the plan and I do not speak in any way adverse to my friend over here, is to the family courts. Perhaps not so much on the juvenile level, although I think that even they are accruing great benefits, but there are actual substantial savings to the province by the utilization of counsel, particularly in the family, or adult section of the court.

As was pointed out by Lawson, they have been able to locate numerous husbands and finally got the delinquent fellows paying. That has taken a load off the welfare costs of the province.

This apparently has had some import and is of some benefit. So the plan to some extent, I suppose no one could really estimate it, helps to pay for itself. In other words, there are benefits coming back into the Treasury of this province out of the indirect benefits out of the operation of this plan as a whole.

Now, just one final point; the basis upon which the area director accepts or rejects applicants to the plan. There was some talk at the initiation, I remember of questioning not only repeaters coming under the plan—bear with me. What I am after is under section 13, I think, of the Act, where there is discretionary powers over against section 12 where anyone under an indictable offence punishable by imprisonment is entitled to the use of the plan.

The subsequent section says something about it being discretionary as to whether or not under summary conviction offences that in non-indictable offences, where no punishment of imprisonment might be involved, he has a discretion. Does he use that discretion adversely to your knowledge in any problems to reject certain applicants from the benefits of the plan?

Mr. Singer: You have lulled the member for Riverdale (Mr. J. Renwick) to sleep.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not fool yourself, he is not asleep.

Mr. Lawlor: Well, as long as the member for Downsview is still awake, I suppose we can proceed.

I think that pretty well covers the ground for the moment, Mr. Chairman, as to the operations of this plan.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Minister want to reply to the member for Lakeshore at this time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think I could answer a number of the enquiries. The first question that the hon. member asked was some information as to what amounts had been collected from persons receiving the benefits of legal aid. Client contributions collected have amounted to $107,166. There is a balance of commitments outstanding owing to the fund, of $508,088. Now, that is the assessment over an 11-month period ending February 29 this year.

I would point out, in presenting those figures, that many of those accounts, the bulk of them, would come in during the last months of the plan's operation because the first period of the plan was taken up with the presentation of cases, the hearing of charges and so on. The assessment of costs, the solicitors' accounts and so on have been coming in but a great portion of those figures is late, so even of the outstanding amount, there has not been much time yet to collect.

Perhaps I might take a moment here, Mr. Chairman to point out that under The Legal Aid Act, it is required in section 9: "There shall be an advisory committee on legal aid" and then it sets out the persons who shall form that committee, comprised of a judge of the high court, a judge of a county or district court, a magistrate, two members of the bar of Ontario, a person holding a responsible position in the field of public welfare and such other persons as the Attorney General may appoint.

And then it sets forth their terms of office and requires, in subsection 3 of section 9: "The committee shall report at least once in every year to the Attorney General (a) on the operation of the legal aid plan and (b) on the annual report of the law society to the Attorney General", mentioned in section 10. And section 10 goes on to require the law society to make a report: "The law society shall make a report annually to the Attorney General for the 12 months ending on the 31st day of March of the year in which the report is made", and specifies the particulars which shall be set forth in that report.

Due to the fact that the plan has been operating just now for over a year, it has just completed its first year of operation and I have not received a report from the law society. It has taken some time in the past months to name that committee and I think we have selected persons where we have some discretion and I would like to give them to the House: The Chairman, who would be appointed under section 9, that would be a judge of the high court is the hon. Mr. Justice Brooke, as chairman of the committee. The judge of a county or district court is our Judge Willmot, who is the chief judge of the county and district court. And the magistrate under subsection (c) is Magistrate Johnson Roberts. Then we selected members of the bar, a Mr. George Wallace, QC, of North Bay, and Mr. Patrick S. Fitzgerald of Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Both Conservatives. Any Liberals on that committee?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Francis Wigle of Hamilton, a person holding a responsible position in the field of public welfare; Professor Hendry, of the social services department of the University of Toronto; and the one other person is Mr. Elliott Stedelbauer of Toronto. We appointed him, and if I were to classify him, I would say he is a citizen who has given much of his time to the public service — a capable, highly regarded and highly respected individual.

Mr. Sopha: Who is that chap Fitzgerald?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He is from Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Sopha: You show a great preferment for your colleagues from Sault Ste. Marie.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Can the member name others?

Mr. Sopha: Well, you certainly drop these QC's around in Sault Ste. Marie.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now, name another.

Mr. Sopha: Well do you not?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No!

Mr. Sopha: You drop the QC's around pretty liberally in your home town.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not any more than anywhere else.

Mr. Sopha: I am only saying you have a great preferment for your own colleagues.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I know them very well, of course.

Mr. Sopha: You do not know any in Sudbury.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They all have them there.

Mr. Sopha: On the contrary there are several Conservatives eligible and waiting.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: While I enjoy this, Mr. Chairman, it is a bit irrelevant to this discussion.

Mr. Sopha: It is interesting, though.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I agree with the hon. member for Lakeshore that the legal aid director is, perhaps, the most important functionary in the whole scheme, and I think it is fair to note that in their appointment, without exception across the province, every district and every county, we left that in large measure, I think almost in entire measure to the consensus of the local bar.

In many of those cases they had been carrying on a form of legal aid, imperfect as it was, and those persons who had shown interest and activity in the field of legal aid generally became those persons who were appointed as legal aid directors. But the nominations came, may I say, without any political suggestion whatever, from the local bar. And I think this was a good thing. Likewise, I think that holds for the sentiments and attitude extended down through the scheme to the appointment of duty counsel, and so on.

I know that the legal aid plan has some imperfections. It was a subject of study, as I think members of the legal profession in the House are particularly aware. It was the subject of two panel discussions, I believe, at the mid-winter meeting of the Ontario bar, and they were very helpful and illuminating, and gave us some direction there. We have the benefit of the magistrates' opinions as they see it operating before them and of judges where cases have come up for appeal.

I think we will be able to achieve some improvements, but when we speak of the cost, I can recall that there were speculations and even estimates by some members of the public, members of the bar association, and by the press, that the cost would be $20 million to $25 million per year. Of course, I tried to indicate that they were most unrealistic and I am glad to be able to stand here and say that they have been.

The costs are not really out of line for the great social justice that is being afforded by this plan, and while I have just said that there were no politics involved in the establishment of this plan, since the hon. member for Lakeshore mentioned the just society, may I just say that at least, rather than talking about it, we have done one of the things which goes a long way towards establishing a just society. This is something achieved, not just suggested or spoken about.

I think the hon. member asked a question about the percentage of lawyers who are taking part. I do not have any figure that would be accurate. I can only say that it is very large. It comprises not just the majority but most of the members of the Ontario bar have originally indicated their willingness to take part, and have done so. I could, perhaps, find out from Mr. Lawson something close to the percentage but I do not have it to hand.

I am not sure what other question the hon. member wanted me to answer at this time.

Mr. Lawlor: Only the other one which was mentioned by the member for Sarnia regarding the business of the basis in which his discretion is used in rejecting people from legal aid. My understanding is that no one is rejected at the present time whether they are repeaters, or whether, under the summary convictions sections as to what kind of a record they have or anything like that, except for pure monetary reasons.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: As long as they come within the terms of the Act, they are eligible to obtain legal aid. Now, I think this is something I could suggest is being studied, being looked at. As I said we have had a year of operation, I think a good year. I am not suggesting for a moment the plan is perfect. I think there are places where we can improve it, perhaps tighten it up in some places, enlarge it in others; but as long as a person comes under the terms of the Act he qualifies for legal aid, yes.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, just one point that arises. There is some talk too about requiring people to take statutory declarations as to their earning power. Have you given consideration to that? Personally I am "agin it" because I think the sections of your regulations are stringent enough with respect to fraud in the matter, but it is mooted in the profession that this might be an added curb upon people making application who know they are not qualified. I know there has been at least one case that has been proven.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have heard this proposal. I would say it has not been proposed to us. I have heard of it. I have heard of discussion about it from the law society, and I should not be surprised if some day it is placed on whatever committee may be studying the matter, or considered by those who are directing legal aid, and at that time I think it ought to receive very thorough study. At the moment my feelings are somewhat like the hon. member for Lakeshore's, but I think if we were to find that there was deception or fraud being practised on those who are trying to administer this plan, and that the taking of statutory declaration, a sworn statement might help to reduce or prevent, people from hiding assets, or failing to disclose information, or giving deceitful answers, then I think it might have some merit. But we have not had that proposed to us yet. It might come forward soon.

Mr. Lawlor: One further matter, Mr. Chairman, then I will be finished. I did suggest, and I would like to hear your comments, if you care to, sir, touching the business of having a higher enforcement procedure in collections. Maybe it has not been tested thoroughly, but as I suggested, you know how effective the income tax is in collecting.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, this has been mentioned, suggested, it has not been proposed. I would just like to say that as we see how our success goes towards the collection of accounts, we may find it possible or necessary perhaps to take steps to bring about more stringent means of collection. At the moment that is not proposed.

Mr. Sopha: Well, may we hear from the Attorney General whether it is the law society that has the responsibility of collecting the moneys?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is the whole plan that is under the law society.

Mr. Sopha: I see. Well, sir, the Premier (Mr. Robarts) earlier this year—I believe it was in the early days of February—went down to address the mid-winter meeting of the Ontario section of the Canadian bar association, and the Premier at that time indicated some concern on his own part about the cost of the plan. I think that phrase dropped here today "raising an eyebrow" emanated from the Premier himself about the cost.

I do not suppose the Premier knew or had any intimate knowledge at all of the operation of the plan. Unlike some of us he has not the time to participate in the plan, and probably he was only repeating hearsay that had been told him by the Attorney General or some of the senior law officers.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot speak for the Prime Minister.

Mr. Sopha: I did not invite a speech from you right now.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not going to give a speech, but you make a statement that he was told this by me. Mr. Chairman, I think, although I cannot speak for the Prime Minister, it was just before the meeting of that mid-winter section of the Ontario bar that some of the leading press and media of this city and out across the province, were speculating that this bill, this plan, which had just been well under way, was going to cost the province $20 million to $25 million. Well, that was naturally enough to make any of us say that is a situation we want to cock an eye at, not only that, we will examine it very carefully. My own reaction was from my knowledge it was not going to cost anything like that.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I am rather disillusioned to hear from the Attorney General, if I comprehend him correctly, that the Premier of the province adverts to matters of public concern from what he reads in the press. I take it that is what the Attorney General meant to imply?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No.

Mr. Sopha: That he had read in the press that the plan—though the press is usually correct, especialy the Toronto press, I hoped the Premier had more factual information than that. Anyway, I have not got a copy of the speech, but I remember it very well. The Premier went down to tell the lawyers that the plan was costing too much.

Mr. Singer: Yes he did. I remember, I was there.

Mr. Sopha: He dropped a rather broad hint that unless the cost of it came down—I do think he said this—that unless the cost was constrained within narrower limits, the government of Ontario would have to take steps—

Mr. Singer: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. Sopha: —in order to restrict it.

Mr. Singer: And he was told off the following day by the treasurer of the law society, Mr. Arnup.

Mr. Sopha: A very articulate and able man; an excellent lawyer. And Mr. Arnup would be able to tell him in no uncertain terms. However, I want to point out one illustration of an example of why I think the plan costs a good deal more than it should, and I recite the following facts.

Two separate individuals, both bearing legal aid certificates, elect trial by a judge alone. I am glad the Premier is returning to his seat because he demonstrated some expertise in this field. These two individuals, both charged with indictable offences, elected trial by judge alone. For reasons better known to the Crown than to anyone else—that is to the Attorney General, servants and agents—the trials do not take place for a year —a year after they are committed for trial. They get the certificate at the very earliest stages of the legal aid system.

A year later in the spring of this year they are tried. One individual, during the intervening year having been on bail, had removed himself to Resolute Bay or some place up in the Northwest Territories where he worked at very high wages for a construction company. His wife taught school during that year. They had no children.

A year later, as I say, still bearing the legal aid certificate—it is in the file of the lawyer—he returns for his trial. An enquiry is directed to him. "Have you paid the legal aid?" "No, I have not. Nobody asked me to pay them." "Well you have been getting an income," the conversation goes. "You have been getting an income in the intervening year. You tell me your wife is working." "Well, nobody asked me and I just did not enquire."

The result, the individual is charged with an indictable offence of which he may or may not have been guilty. Let me assume he was guilty of it. That is not an unfair assumption. I have named the individual. So he can break the law. He can work and he can have a free lawyer.

Now, there has got to be something wrong with a system like that. The other individual, again charged with an indictable offence, he comes from Oshawa. During the intervening year he works in Toronto. He arrives on the day of his trial with his father, a man who is in turn employed, owns his own home in Oshawa and the same enquiry is directed to him: "Have you paid the legal aid?" "No, I have not, nobody asked me to do so."

Well the simple solution must be that when a long period elapses like this between committal for trial and the trial, somebody in the legal aid system might suggest to these individuals that they defray the cost otherwise, they are getting a completely free ride out of the system, and surely, that is not intended.

I am not talking about a means test. I am not talking about a needs test. I am not talking about any kind of test at all. All I am advocating is that the machinery be elaborate enough to include some type of clerical staff where a letter might go out to the holder of the certificate some time along the line to ask if the economic circumstances have changed in the meantime and whether they can contribute to the defrayment of the expense of the certificate.

Maybe the responsibility ought to impinge upon the lawyer. That might be where it ought to be, that the lawyer—well my friend the hon. member for Lakeshore says the obligation is theirs by statutes. If that is so, and I have no reason to disagree, then I point to the lack of any communication from the director or anybody else in the system. There is no communication to the lawyer, telling him to keep check on the holder of the certificate in order to make a return or to collect some money from him. The lawyer would not object in reviewing the circumstances of the applicant, the certificate holder. He would not object to saying to him, "Can you put up some money?" and the lawyer in turn, could then send that on to the legal aid people in payment of it.

But as I see it, there is no system at all in respect of that, and surely the system is not meant to provide free legal services helter-skelter to any person who happens to qualify at a particular time for his certificate and, having the magic certificate, from then on he gets a free ride. What I am advocating, of course, is entirely different from ex post facto collection of the amounts that have been expended. That is a different thing entirely, and the Attorney General will have to set up, in that regard, some kind of a collection system to attempt to recover a part of those amounts.

The government has considerable experience in this because for years they have been collecting money owing to the motor vehicle fund and the unsatisfied judgment fund. In that regard, of course, they always had the right to suspend the driver's licence until the person paid. I do not know in the case of the criminal what you would suspend or what coercion could be used to stimulate him into paying the cost of legal services that the state has provided.

Now then, the other aspect that I have encountered about this is, I suppose, not properly attributable to this department. At the other end of the system it just seems to me that on occasion certificates go to some very strange people; very strange people from the most cursory interview. You wonder how they got the certificate, and you wonder just what form of screening process is exercised by the director of legal aid. For example, it is hard to understand how an individual can come in with a certificate giving him the right to counsel to defend a charge of impaired driving when he owns the car that he was driving. He owns that car you find upon enquiry. You look at the certificate and say, "Whose car were you driving?" "My own." Of course, the car is probably financed to the hilt but, by George, it is hard to understand how a certificate could be issued in that case. Is it an unreasonable observation to make that, if a fellow can drive a car and get himself into the position where he comes under the purview of suspicion of the state in respect of his ability to drive it, that individual, when confronted with the necessity, cannot also afford to hire a lawyer to put his case before the appropriate magistrate?

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order; the terms upon which the certificates are issued are outside the purview of this department completely. It is the duty of the Cabinet Minister in charge of Social and Family Services. We have discussed that previously.

Mr. Sopha: That is what I already said.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): That is not a point of order, it is an argument.

Mr. Lawlor: It is out of order.

Mr. Sopha: A point of order is becoming a disease with my friend from Lakeshore. He was bitten by a point of order.

Mr. Lawlor: May I have a ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether he is in order or not, please?

Mr. Sopha: His mother was frightened by a point of order.

Mr. Lawlor: You are always out of order and using the time of the House wastefully. You should not be allowed to speak.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): You are always out of order, I agree to that.

Mr. Sopha: Well, yes, he is right. Yes, by George, he is right. By John White he is right.

Mr. Lawlor: Well, you come on down—

Mr Sopha: The issuer of the certificate, of course, is the director of legal aid and notwithstanding that enquiries are carried on—

Mr. Lawlor: Under the advice of the welfare offices.

Mr. Sopha: Oh no, the director of legal aid is the final determinant. There is an appeal from him but he determines finally, subject to appeal, whether the certificate will issue; and he is not beholden to The Department of Social and Family Services in respect of it. They are adjunct and they assist him in it.

Mr. Singer: One would have thought the member for Lakeshore would know that.

Mr. Sopha: You would think he would have known that.

Mr. Singer: I would have thought so.

Mr. Sopha: But, like the first Attorney General, he talked when he should be listening.

Mr. White: You have got to be out of order.

Mr. Lawlor: The usual skinflint technicality.

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Sopha: It is unfortunate. It is unfortunate when you try to draw serious attention to what I conceive to be defects in this plan—it is not perfect. We want to improve it. Conjointly, the bar and, of course, the Attorney General and everyone else in the administration wants to improve this system to make it work as efficiently and economically as possible for the benefit of the taxpayers. And I draw these things to the Minister's attention, but I emphasize that there must be introduced, at the earliest time, some form of system whereby a periodic review is made of the ability to pay, and the litigant, whether criminal or civil litigant, he must, if he is able to pay for legal advice assistance, he must then re-transfer the burden from society unto himself. And I am quite sure some study within the department, of this aspect of the problem can bring about a reform that will save us a good deal of money.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder —I was about to rise when the hon. member for Sudbury presented those two cases which he recited, and say that I thought it was a great responsibility on the lawyer, the member of the legal profession acting for him, who is using that certificate to get his remuneration in whole or in part. I am not sure whether the hon. member—I presume he has acted for persons?

Mr. Sopha: On many occasions.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And in this certificate form 8 as set forth in the Act, subject to regulations, the certificate is spelled out at length. It is set forth in the Act. It has eight paragraphs, and number 6 reads this way:

> Notwithstanding the issue of this certificate, if at any time it appears to the solicitor accepting it that the client may not be entitled to the legal aid, by reason of section 39, of 64 of the regulations or otherwise, he shall report to the area director before instituting or continuing with proceedings.

Not only is there a moral, ethical obligation on the solicitor, but it is right in the Act in the sense that it is in the certificate laid down in the regulation that the solicitor has an obligation. He shall report the changed circumstances to the area director. Now, I am sure that the remarks of the hon. member for Sudbury are important, and I know that, as they appear in Hansard, I am sure they will come to the attention of the people who administer legal aid, and we shall take occasion to discuss these situations. I do not for a moment stand here and say there are no situations that could not be improved and tightened up. This is our object, and as the plan progresses with our committees and our studies, we are doing that.

Could I take a moment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Sopha: Before you go on, may I say this to make the record more complete? I reported both to the local director. I did one thing further: I asked the individuals for the money, so that I could send it to the local director. They both said they did not have any, but on persistence one of the fathers of the boys, who was there, in the spirit of good citizenship undertook to pay. Then I asked the local director how he did that, and he said, "You send him a copy of the bill that the accounts officer gets, and if he wants to send in the money he may do so", and the father did.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I commend the hon. member, if I may do so. The point I make is that there is an obligation on every member of the profession to see that this plan works. I think generally they are doing that, and as we are surveying that plan—and surveying it, may I say, with the assistance of computerized information—we will find ourselves able to determine where it is failing and by whom it is failing, if it fails.

The instance of the car, the man who comes up with a charge of impaired driving, and because he owned his motor vehicle—I do not think that perhaps I am called upon to judge that. There might be situations where he owned a car and it is mortgaged. Even if it were not, is he supposed to sell the car if he has not any income sufficient to meet his ordinary expenses?

Mr. Sopha: Either stop drinking or stop driving.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, yes, I agree with that. But that is not the way the hon. member was arguing about those chaps who come up before the magistrate.

Mr. White: I think he hates the poor people.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I say that I have looked up the remarks that were made by the Prime Minister to the mid-winter meeting of the Ontario bar, on February 2, and this is what he said on that occasion:

> It is incumbent upon both the government and the legal profession, in a forthright expression of co-operation and partnership, to ensure that costs are held to reasonable levels, otherwise one of the great social advances of our time will collapse. The attitude and conduct of the profession is extremely important.
> Great care must be taken to ensure that legal aid will not be regarded as legal care in which everyone has a right and entitlement to subsidize his counsel. Legal aid is designed to help those who need to be helped. This must be borne in mind by the government, the legal profession and the people of Ontario, if the legal aid plan is to enjoy a long and successful future.

Mr. Singer: Have you got Mr. Arnup's speech there?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Surely there is nothing wrong with that attitude. Certainly we must look at it as a government and as a profession to make sure it works, and—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Arnup was most critical.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I know what Mr. Arnup says.

Mr. Singer: He was concerned very much about what the Premier said about the future of the legal aid plan. You were not there, you do not know.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): How do you know I was not there?

Mr. Singer: Because I was there and I did not see you, and if you had been there I would have seen you.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could reply to that, but I will not.

Mr. Sopha: And you would have seen him.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on the office of the Deputy Attorney General? The member for High Park on the Deputy Attorney General?

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Yes, just one question on legal aid. I have had very little experience with legal aid until a few weeks ago, but I did have one experience and I would like to ask the Attorney General if he can assist me. The case I brought up yesterday was a chap called Ferguson, who was charged with breaking and entering down in Belleville. He brought the letter, of which I sent a copy to the Attorney General, to me and I was not really impressed with the legal help he was receiving.

I suggested to him he might be better to get another lawyer, so I sent him down to legal aid to have his certificate or stamp or whatever it is they give him changed so that he could get the help of a Toronto lawyer. When he went down, he was told that he could not change for a Toronto lawyer. If he wished to change, he could do so but it would have to be another lawyer from Belleville. Now is that a ruling of legal aid, or was it some restriction as to the location from which one must get one's lawyer?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that is generally the rule and I think there is reason for that. To state it generally, the person requiring legal assistance is not limited as to his choice of counsel, but I think the hon. member will surely realize that it could hardly be expected of the legal aid plan, which is using public funds, to provide counsel to allow someone in Belleville to select counsel in Ottawa or Toronto as a general rule.

If this were the case, I think the plan would become unmanageable and unworkable. Generally, the rule is as is the rule for those of us who have to obtain counsel at our own expense—that we get counsel in our own locality. To say, as a rule, that a person living in Sudbury could select counsel in Toronto would be tremendously expensive and would make the plan unworkable—so generally this is the rule. There is a wide choice of counsel in most localities and to that rule we adhere. There is nothing in the Act to that effect, but in the working of the plan, it is a practical consideration.

Mr. Shulman: I fail to see why there there would be further expense. Does not the legal aid pay so much per day to a lawyer? Is that not how it works?

Mr. D. M. De Monte (Dovercourt): Why do you not find out?

Mr. Singer: If a doctor from Toronto treated a patient in North Bay, it would be more expensive than a North Bay doctor.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think I need expand on that. The lawyer would be travelling from his own place of residence to a place some distance away and this is going to be more expensive.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Attorney General, I hate to press you on this, but it is not going to be more expensive for the legal aid plan. If I am able to supply this man with a lawyer in Toronto who is willing to travel up, this is not going to cost legal aid any more. I presume you are paying so much for the case.

Mr. Singer: Of course it is.

Mr. Shulman: No, it is not. It is going to cost the lawyer some time, but he is not being paid for his travelling time, and there is no reason in the world why this man should not be able to get the benefit of a lawyer in Timbuctoo if that lawyer is willing to come there. Now it is not going to cost any more; it is not going to be any more unmanageable and I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that there should be a free choice.

Obviously, very few lawyers are going to be willing to do the travelling, but there are not going to be very many cases where it will be necessary. In the particular case which I am thinking of, and which I have already drawn to the Attorney General's attention, it seemed advisable not to have another lawyer from that particular area where there is a certain limitation of choice but to have someone who had more experience in this difficult type of problem go out there.

The particular lawyer involved was prepared to travel up at his own expense and I fail to see how it could cost the legal aid plan an extra penny. I think this is a wrong premise that you are working under.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to spend much more time on this. If the hon. member fails to see, I do not think I can make it more apparent. The legal aid director in his own community has a panel of the lawyers who are prepared to act in that area, and from those he is expected to choose his counsel. If the hon. member cannot realize that there would be additional expense involved in going outside or going distances away to get counsel, I do not think I can expand upon it.

All I can say is, in the practical working of the plan, that is the way it works; he would be expected to get a lawyer of the local panel. Just before I finish, in section 54 of The Legal Aid Act, or the regulations within the Act is set forth:

> Where it appears to an area director that the legal aid applied for can be rendered more conveniently and economically by a solicitor in another area, or for any other reason he deems proper, he may send to the area director of the other area the application, the welfare officer's report, the understanding of the applicant to pay the contribution, if any, in accordance with the report, and if the legal aid applied for comes within section 13 of the Act, advise him that he has exercised his discretion in the applicant's favour.

Now that is a provision which permits one area director to say, "You may get counsel from another area." He can refer the matter to the other area director, who exercises his discretion.

But generally, I think the plan works pretty well in the practical way that there is the local panel, and from that panel you have a wide choice of counsel.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further under legal aid or office of the assistant Deputy Attorney General?

Mr. Shulman: Earlier I asked under what vote the inspector of legal offices should come up. I was told 207, and I just wanted to know under what subdivision this should come under. I do not see the words here anywhere.

Mr. Chairman: What was it?

Mr. Shulman: Inspector of legal offices.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That would be under this present item, Mr. Chairman. It is an assistant deputy, so he would be in the deputy's branch.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, through you to the Attorney General, to what extent is the legal aid fund being used to provide representation in regards to workmen's compensation claims? Have you any knowledge to the extent it is being used to provide representation in regard to workmen's compensation claims?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know actually, Mr. Chairman, whether it has been used in providing counsel in workmen's compensation board cases or not. I know some time ago this matter was discussed in a general way with us. We did not make any decision on it, and I am not sure that there have been any requests. I simply cannot answer the hon. member.

I do not think it originally was intended that legal counsel under the legal aid plan would go to various boards, and I do not know of any policy in that direction that has been firmly established. As far as I am aware, we have had no requests.

Mr. Gisborn: I would say to the Attorney General that I recollect I have had two cases brought to my attention where I was under the impression that they have had a lawyer and he was being paid through the legal aid fund. I will check them, but I would ask that the Minister's department would make a check and perhaps let me know at any convenient time as to whether or not the fund is being used in this regard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will undertake to find out and let the member know.

Mr. Chairman: Is there anything further under legal aid?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, one final matter. What is the position of Mr. R. E. Priddle?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. R. E. Priddle is in the office of the assistant Deputy, the inspector of legal offices, and his functions and duties are particularly concerned with the land titles offices and the registry offices.

Mr. Shulman: I thank the hon. Minister.

The matter to which I am about to refer has to do with this particular office and, strangely enough, the matter of docking of horses' tails. To set the matter in its proper perspective, I would like to quote from the Globe and Mail of Friday, November 10, 1967. It is an article by a leading Toronto columnist—her name is Zena Cherry. She is referring to docking of horses' tails:

> A couple of years ago I wrote about this excruciatingly cruel practice, and hundreds protested to Prime Minister Lester Pearson. It did about as much good as giving a fish a bath.
> Mr. Pearson answered the letters and said he was referring the matter to the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Agriculture wrote to say it was in the hands of the provincial government. Premier John Robarts wrote to say he was referring the matter to the Attorney General. The Attorney General wrote:
> "The matter of docking horses' tails is not one that is specifically covered by Ontario legislation."
> But in the letter to one reader there was enclosed by mistake, I guess, an inter-office memo to the Attorney General from R. E. Priddle, who is assistant inspector of legal offices, and it reads:
> "Section 387 of the criminal code deals with cruelty to animals and creates an offence punishable on summary conviction. I thought it wiser not to mention this in your reply."
> Now how do you like that? The law is there, it should be enforced. Canada is the only country in the British Commonwealth that allows the showing of horses with docked tails. All I can say once more is that which was said in 500 B.C. by Aeschylus: "If one condones brutality, one shall suffer brutality."

I would like to ask the Attorney General—we have had a new Attorney General since this last letter was—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I was going to ask that, that was not in my term, I hope.

Mr. Shulman: This article was written November 10, 1967, which was in the Attorney General's term. But the incident in Mr. Priddle's letter was written to his predecessor, and now that we have a more enlightened Attorney General, I was hoping that he would look into this matter and—

Mr. Singer: Do you agree with that last remark?

Mr. Shulman: —and I would like to have the Attorney General's comment on this particular matter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I had been Attorney General that clipping would not have gotten in the letter.

I can only say to the hon. member I would like to look into that matter. It is all news to me.

Mr. Shulman: You will look into it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I will look into it.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on the matter of docking horses' tails?

Anything further in connection with the office of the assistant Deputy Attorney General?

The Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Attorney General would have available for us statistics on the work load of the Supreme Court? I did not pose my series of questions this year in the hope that the Attorney General, being aware of the sort of questions we might ask, would have this information.

How many cases came before the court in the last year? How many cases are pending? The length of time it takes from the issue of a writ to get to trial and so on?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have the information here, but it is a bit difficult to relate from the statistical record. I would like to suggest to the hon. member that if he has some other comments he would proceed to make them and give me a moment to put this material in a form that I can give it as intelligibly as I read it to the House. I would be glad to give him full information.

Mr. Singer: Well, anticipating what the Attorney General's answer might be and particularly in view of the fact that we have the new Divorce Act which came into force on July 2, which is going to add very substantially to the burden of the justices of the Supreme Court, and recognizing as well that as of July 2 the Supreme Court of Ontario embarked upon, what is called the long vacation, I am going to make my annual plea for some system whereby we can make better use of our court facilities 12 months of the year.

I recognize that the task of being a judge of the Supreme Court is an onerous one, and that these gentlemen have to be given long vacation periods at reasonable intervals. They have to be given time to catch up with their studies, to ponder on their reserved decisions and that sort of thing, but it would seem to me that the cause of justice in this province would be well served, if our courts functioned 12 months of the year. I think with the magnificent buildings that we are building—the Toronto courthouse is certainly an outstanding example—and the magnificent new buildings that we will undoubtedly be building in places like London and others and since the province has taken over the cost of the administration of justice, once all these buildings are functioning, it would only be reasonable and logical that they function around the clock and through the whole of the year. Because it is a trite saying, Mr. Chairman, that justice delayed is justice denied. Certainly it has been my experience at all levels of the court system here in the province of Ontario, that by and large in the Supreme Court in this province, in the county court and the magistrates' courts that the workload is too large, that often cases have to sit on the list an unreasonable length of time before they are dealt with, and at the magistrate's court level —and we will deal with that a little later on today—the volume of work an individual magistrate has to deal with, denies to him the opportunity to properly and fully consider all the ramifications that are involved in each case.

All these things put together, Mr. Chairman, would indicate to me, as I have said in other years, that it makes reasonable sense that these courts should operate on a 12-month basis. It may well be that we would need additional judges so they could be put on a rota basis, that while judge A is going on his vacation judge B will sit in his place and it may be that the answer is to have a few more, or several more judges. It seems to me that we are running an inefficient system that is based on the old, old tradition that courts and lawyers—the whole judicial process stopped at the end of June, is picked up again after Labour Day, stopped again for a week or two at Christmastime and a few days at Eastertime and if people were delayed it was just too bad.

I think that by now we should begin to be moving away from that and be able to operate our courts on a more regular basis and to deal with the volume of work that is before them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, perhaps before giving the statistical figures, I might speak generally to what the hon. member has been saying.

I recall that he has raised it before in my estimates. True, it is a traditional thing but I think there is some good reason behind it. At least, the judges presiding in courts need time, I think, from their duties. Their duties are not easy. It is a matter of sitting in judgment. They need time to consider their judgment, to write their judgments. They need time, I think, to keep themselves abreast of the law as it changes and I think the judges need a very substantial time to renew themselves, to prepare themselves, to fit themselves for the onerous duties they carry on.

The legal profession—I think the hon. member, perhaps, has some friends, some eminent gentlemen, I know them—who close their offices, I believe also in July and August—

Mr. Singer: Well, that is their choice—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What I am saying is this, that it is very difficult to get judges or to get lawyers to take cases in the months of July and August and it is extremely difficult to get the witnesses to attend in those months, for the hearing of cases. This is well known. I do not need to support that with anything more than a statement, that it is most difficult to get the cases in July or August even if you had the judges there to hear them. I grant you there is also a goodly number of cases going through our courts, and whether trying to maintain the courts in July and August could be done with the present number of judges or whether you would need to ask the federal government to appoint additional judges, I do not know. But if these statistics are meaningful at all, I am glad to make them available to the House.

This is the report of the registrar for the 1967 calendar year and it is broken down to various types of cases and totals given.

Writs issued, a total of 18,684. That is almost the same as 1966, which was 18,926. In 1965 there was a greater number, 19,091. Those are broken down into motor vehicle actions, other generally endorsed actions excluding divorce and then divorce action, mortgage foreclosure action and other specially endorsed actions. I could give you the detailed figures. I do not know if reading them here would help—

Mr. Singer: Perhaps if you would table them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will table them, yes. Total writs issued at Toronto in 1967, 8,149. No, I am sorry that was 1965. In 1967, 7,875; and in 1967 elsewhere 10,809. The total which I gave is 18,684.

Jury actions set down for trials in Toronto were 585; elsewhere in the province 669; a total of 1,254.

Non-jury actions including motor vehicle and defended divorce action and other non-jury actions in Toronto set down for trial, 3,154; and the rest of the province, 5,079; a total of 8,233.

I have some additional statistics here which I think I will just table, and I will make copies to the hon. member if he would like them.

Mr. Singer: Yes, I would.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps that is the best way to handle it because I think reading them into the record here is not much help to—

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, would the Attorney General agree with me that we are not really getting further ahead, that the backlog is increasing? That it takes quite a long time—even in the most quickly proceeding action—from the date the writ is issued until you are able to get on to trial. The time lag—and we had those statistics two or three years ago—the time lag, rather than decreasing, I would suspect, is increasing, and the backlog of cases is increasing as well. Would I not be correct?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I do not think that is right and I cannot agree with the hon. member. There always, I think it is fair to say, will be a backlog. There will always be some cases and I am not even sure that that would be the best way to have the courts operate without something on the backlog list, as it were, for their attention. If you ever caught up, surely the argument would be the courts have not enough to do.

Mr. Singer: You will never have that worry.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. I do not think we will ever have that worry, and I do not think, in the operation of the courts, you will ever be without a backlog. But I recall —and we have discussed this before—that the backlog is not increasing, at least to any appreciable extent, and the extent of time between the setting down of cases and the trial is not increasing. Many of the cases on the list are there because you cannot get the lawyers down to trial.

Mr. Singer: Oh, I know, but that was so when you gave the statistics two years ago.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And it will always be so, that their lawyers will set them down and adjourn them, and adjourn them, and they will wait and hope for a settlement. They hope to tire somebody out, or the witness is in hospital and it takes a year to get him there to give evidence. Mr. Justice McRuer, when he was chief justice, was concerned about this problem and he took action.

He said, "I am going to set a day peremptorily and I am going to put these cases on and you be here to have them tried." The result was that they just did not come forward at all; they were disposed of; they never did go to trial, almost without exception. He found that doing that did not clear up a backlog but at least they were not ready to go to trial—it was not a case that the court was not ready to hear them, the cases were not ready to go on. I do not know what the final upshot of that was but I know he did not succeed in disposing of those cases.

Now I agree with the hon. member that we can improve the operation of the courts; perhaps we can get more speedy trials. But it is not all the fault of the courts; it is not the lack of judges. It is largely the attitude of the profession and sometimes the attitude of their clients, their clients' instructions that they want the case delayed. I do not think an Attorney General or a department of government, or even the court system, can do a great deal to change this because a lawyer has the freedom to go into court and say if he has the consent of his opposing counsel, "We would like to put the case over," and this happens time and time again.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the Attorney General is talking around the subject rather than meeting it head on. When we had the statistics—and they were detailed after a list of very specific questions, these things were all spelled out. We know there are lawyers who are sometimes a little lax in pushing forward. We know there are clients who sometimes are not so anxious to get into court as they first appeared. We know all these things happen but we also know there is a backlog and I know here in Toronto, as a practising lawyer, that it takes and awfully long time to get down to trial no matter how eager you are to get on.

There is just nothing you can do about it. The list is a long one. The Attorney General is not going to convince me, Mr. Chairman, that if the courts were operating 12 months of the year they could not do more work than they get done if they operate 10 months of the year. It just does not make sense. The courts, in effect, are closed down for two months of the year and I would think that in this day and age there must be a better way of doing business. It may involve the appointment of more judges, but if they operated 12 months of the year surely it stands to reason that they would get a lot more work done than they can get done in 10 months of the year.

You talked about lawyers not being anxious to go on to trials in the summer months. We are a very adaptable profession, Mr. Chairman, and if the courts are open in the summer months, there will be lawyers who will go to court in the summer months; and if the trials are there, if the court days are available, those trials will go on. He says it is well known that it would not happen. How can it be well known that it would not happen when it has never been tried? There is the point.

We have never tried opening our courts 12 months of the year, certainly within my memory as a lawyer and a law student, and that goes back, unfortunately, too many years now. It has never been tried, and as I recall, talking to my seniors in law, there always was the long summer vacation, the Christmas vacation and the Easter vacation, so how can the Attorney General say in good conscience that it would not work, and it is well known that it would not work? It seems to me just obvious and logical that it has to work. You have to get more work done if you are open 12 months in the year, rather than if you are open 10 months of the year.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am just going to speak briefly. I wonder if the hon. member has ever had a resolution from his colleagues in the bar to the chief justice or to The Department of the Attorney General that we have the courts open 12 months a year? I do not know what attitude might be taken if the bar were to seriously propose this.

Looking at some statistics that I have been examining while the hon. member was speaking, I notice that, for instance, in civil actions on list for trial and the disposition of same, it shows—and I think it is significant—non-jury cases, tried and judgment delivered, in Toronto, 444; settled, 344; struck off the list, 13. Then elsewhere, tried and judgment delivered, 544; settled, 543; struck off the list, 43.

Now when these cases are coming up in that way—these will be motor vehicle accidents, negligence cases of one kind and another—when these cases come up and approximately 50 per cent of them are on the list and are eventually settled, how can you ever say that there would not be a backlog? These cases do not go to trial—50 per cent of them almost do not go to trial at all, but they just get on there; they carry on for a time and eventually they are settled.

I realize the point the hon. member is making that perhaps you could clear up some of these cases. But the point is that a great number of those cases—you say the judge is available today and they will not be there to be tried; that is not the way they are going to get that case disposed of.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General, so often when we get him on a point like this, says, "Has the legal profession ever petitioned for this sort of thing?" This brings to mind a very excellent quotation that I think is most apt here and it was said by Alexis de Tocqueville who wrote this:

> Some of the tastes and habits of the aristocracy may be discovered in the character of the lawyers. They participate in the same instinctive love of order and formality and they entertain the same repugnance to the attitudes of the multitude, and the same secret contempt of government of the people. I do not then assert that all members of the legal profession are at all times the friend of order and the opponents of innovation, but merely that most of them are usually so.

I think that is a very appropriate quotation to put before the House at this time, Mr. Chairman, because I think what we have been trying to get at in our criticisms, year after year of The Attorney General's Department is that if he is looking to reform, suddenly to emerge as a ground swell out of the members of his profession who are quite happy to have the courts close for two months in the summer time, it just is not going to come.

But if he is looking to serve the public who are inconvenienced by having to wait a long time before they get on to trial, then he will work out a system whereby the courts are open for 12 months of the year, and the lawyers will adapt themselves, perhaps not happily in many cases, but they will adapt themselves, because if the courts are open and their cases are going to be tried, it is in the lawyers' interest that they will be there to try them.

So all I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, is that we do not look quite so long and so far for excuses as to why there should not be reform. If necessary, we will pose the same kind of questions that we did two years ago, and in the same detail, and we will engage all the staff of The Attorney General's Department in countless hours of research so that they can be answered. I am sure that the answers to those questions will reveal that the backlog is growing greater and that the time elapse from the issue of a writ until the eventual trial of an action is lengthening.

What I am suggesting, sir, is that there be some innovation, some system whereby we can speed up and modernize the use of the facilities that we have, because as I say again, justice delayed is justice denied, and our system is more and more delaying justice, and if that saying means anything, it is more and more denying justice.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to dispute the hon. member's general thesis but I do want to say that to quote de Tocqueville—that quotation, I think, was probably written at least 100 years ago.

Mr. Singer: Yes, but I think it is very apt today.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. It was written in a society where the lawyer was the aristocrat. He came from an aristocratic family; he was a wealthy son of the aristocratic family but look around at our society today, the lawyer is no aristocrat.

Mr. Singer: He becomes one very quickly.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He is of the people.

Mr. Singer: He may not have started as one, but he adapts to the system.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have no class. I think most of the lawyers I know have come up from the very common people, as I did myself, and as I think the hon. member did and most of the lawyers in this House. So de Tocqueville's remarks about lawyers being aristocrats do not apply at all today.

Mr. Chairman: The Supreme Court of Ontario. Carried?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, there is just one point I wish to discuss today about the Supreme Court and county court—the question of bail.

Mr. Chairman: I believe that the matter of bail was discussed previously.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We discussed that yesterday, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: This is the vote on the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Chairman: The county and division and district courts.

Mr. Singer: Well, the same thing applies to county, district and division courts. I was perhaps going to relate this either to the Supreme Court or the county court, the question of chambers, motions and so on. The same procedure prevails and I have complained about this in previous years. In the daily reports from Osgoode Hall that are published every morning in the Globe and Mail at the beginning of July, the usual notice appears that a judge will sit in chambers and in court for two or three days a week and he will deal only with emergency matters. This by and large is the practice in county courts as well, and again it is the plea to have the courts open and serving 12 months in the year, so that not only the trial matters, but the matters that come before the judges in court and in chambers can be dealt with expeditiously and on a full-time basis.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Dovercourt.

Mr. De Monte: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Attorney General has ever gone down to some of the division courts that we have in the city of Toronto and in some of the suburbs. I suggest that they are in a pretty poor shape. Some division courts are held on the second floor in a veterans' hall, while on the first floor they serve beverages. I am wondering, since the province has taken over the costs of division courts, whether he is anticipating taking over and improving the facilities of division courts. For that matter, some of the magistrates' courts around the city and in some of the county towns could be improved.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, first of all—and this is not by way of excuse, or anything like that—we have just taken over in southern Ontario outside of the districts, the administration of justice, for which the division courts are one portion, and we have not had an opportunity to do complete assessment of the facilities. I think that the hon. member knows we are attempting to acquire existing facilities and to improve and build others. This is a big, time-consuming, expensive task which we moved to promptly early in the year. Now, I would like to say this about the division courts: This is the court for small claims, where, if I may use the phrase in an undisparaging way, the little people have their cases fought out. I do not think that we are called upon in that court to provide a very palatial accommodation for that type of court.

We go, in other words, where the people may be found with their small disputes. I have practised in the small division courts and gone in the upstairs room of the town hall, or a vacant store and I do not think that it cut down on the quality of justice that we got in the small claims court because we had to do with a small court and not a palatial court. The public, I think, are mindful of the fact that they in the end pay for the facility which we provide, and if you are going to provide for the $50 or $150 claim case, some palatial palace of justice, the public is aware that they are going to pay for that facility in the end. And I must say frankly that as we look at our courts, I think that we must have in the Supreme Court, the county court, and magistrates' courts, which will now be provincial judges' courts, a clean, proper adequate space with good facilities free of disturbances.

I do not think that I am going to be led into suggesting that for the division courts, we are going to build new courthouses. I think we will have to find adequate, clean space where a trial can be heard without disturbance, and I think that the public will accept my approach. We have just had a short time to attack this question of courts and administration of justice, and the provision of facilities, which has up to now been the responsibility of the municipalities, is now ours and we are studying it. But, when one thinks back about this and thinks, "Here are the people in the local government providing their own facilities, that was what they considered adequate," should one now be persuaded that because the province of Ontario and the government at that level has now assumed this responsibility, should it say to the people who go to division court, "Oh you need something better than you provided—"

Mr. Bullbrook: But you are going to do that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I just say, if one should be persuaded to take that action—

Mr. Bullbrook: But you promised us in London.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have not had time to do things in London.

Mr. Singer: Who is winning the priority race? I am still betting on London.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The city of London, when it was its responsibility did nothing. I think that they should have done something, but that is one of the situations that we are studying.

Mr. De Monte: Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that the hon. Attorney General should supply a palatial room for division court; I am merely suggesting that some of the facilities that are being provided are not quite adequate, and I would also suggest, with the greatest of respect, that some of the magistrates' courts are not quite adequate. I think the Attorney General realizes what I mean. He should improve the facilities on the basis that about 90 per cent of our population which appears in any case of litigation that comes up, appears in a division court, and this is the impression that our citizens have of a court room and of the courts. I suggest that there are some division courts that are not fit to be used as such and should be changed but I am not suggesting that he should build a building. I would think that it would be quite reasonable to rent other accommodation that would be better and, perhaps, in some cases, cheaper.

I have a question for the Attorney General: Are the bailiffs in the city of Toronto paid on a retainer, salary, or by each writ they serve or each seizure that they make?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: In Toronto?

Mr. De Monte: In division courts, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Those bailiffs that serve the division court are on a fee basis depending on the service that they give, the summonses and claims that they serve, and mileage and so on. There is another bailiff, or another definition of bailiff in The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs; those are the bailiffs that are not concerned with the administration of justice.

Mr. Bullbrook: I wonder if I might ask a question. Is it a condition or precedent that to become a justice of the peace or bailiff you have to have done something for the Conservative Party?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I never heard of that.

Mr. Bullbrook: Maybe it just pertains to the city of Sarnia, but it certainly pertains there. Everybody who has anything to do with justice, JPs, bailiffs, are all former ward heelers of the Conservative Party. Let me put something else to you—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bullbrook: Let me put something else to you. One moment; perhaps it is off the vote, but let me get it out. I want to say something to you about queen's counsels. This is an iniquitous thing you know, really. It is just terrible. I practised law with a gentleman, now a justice of the Supreme Court of Ontario. He has done several murder trials and he still was not a QC. Yet some of them are given out—honestly, I have actually seen QCs come in to borrow their gown because they did not want to buy one. They had never been in court and there was no use in wasting the money.

Mr. Chairman: County, district and division courts.

Mr. Sopha: I would like to say something on this. Is it appropriate to say something about queen's counsel?

Mr. Chairman: We are on the county, district and division courts.

Mr. Sopha: Well, my friend raised this and, of course, the relic of the colonial area ought to be abolished entirely. The Attorney General has brought the granting of the order to a fairly low state—

Mr. Chairman: I do not think that this is the place to discuss this—

Mr. Sopha: You said last night that you would be very lenient.

Mr. Chairman: Oh yes, but this is hardly the case which the member raised last night.

Mr. Sopha: Well is there an appropriate vote—

Mr. Chairman: No, there is nothing in connection—

Mr. Sopha: This is a matter within the discretion of the Attorney General.

Mr. Chairman: Not in connection with county, district and division courts.

Mr. Sopha: Well, is there an appropriate place? I am asking most courteously.

Mr. Chairman: I would ask the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There was an appropriate place. That was the main office.

Mr. Sopha: Well, it is not for the Attorney General to say where we discuss matters.

An hon. member: He was not here then.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You were not here?

Mr. Sopha: It is not for the Attorney General to say. And it is very strange to see the member for York South, who is capable of such scurrilous language in regard to other members, siding with the government to limit discussion, because all during the discussion he has been doing precisely that.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): If you would keep in order—

Mr. Chairman: The Chairman can close the discussion, and I would say to the member for Sudbury that there is nothing—

Mr. Sopha: Speaking about not being here, I was not here when the member for York South addressed some very improper remarks about me.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald: You are out of order again.

Mr. Sopha: Very improper remarks about me in very scurrilous terms, dishonourable terms, when I was not here which I utterly repudiate, especially that word "racist", that was ascribed to me.

In the many years that I have been associated with the Indian people of this province—

Mr. Chairman: The member is out of order.

Mr. Sopha: —Indian people of this province and have acted for them, tried to assist them, I resent very much to be the object of such vituperation.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Mr. Sopha: I resent very much to be the object of that invidious vituperation from these two.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order!

County, district and division courts.

Mr. Sopha: Now I ask you, will you not look at the member for York South? I ask you, is there a place that this might be discussed?

Mr. Chairman: There was, under the main office vote.

Mr. Sopha: Well do I infer correctly, because the Attorney General says that that is so, that you are going to abide by his discretion?

An hon. member: Right.

Mr. Chairman: In the absence of any definite indication regarding the awarding of the annual QC designations and, in view of the fact that the Attorney General has indicated that it might possibly have come under the main office vote, the Chairman has no alternative but to rule that it does not come under this vote and is therefore, not debatable.

Mr. Sopha: Point of order!

Mr. Chairman: Point of order?

Mr. Sopha: I want to raise a point of order. I want to say, in regard to this point of order, that I have never been one of those who spring to my feet to in any way limit or inhibit discussion of the freest range in this Legislature.

Last night, when the member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Stokes) very improperly and out of order, raised the subject he did raise under the criminal law division, I rose and directed your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that the whole ambit of administration of justice ought to be covered in vote 207.

You will recall that. And I said that I thought that vote 206 was the proper vote to discuss the personnel in the department—Crown attorneys, director of public prosecutions and the others in the administrative side.

At that time, you said to me that under vote 207 you would permit the freest range of discussion.

Mr. Chairman: In connection with votes 206 and 207.

Mr. Sopha: I am saddened to hear you today now limit the discussion.

Mr. Chairman: I must point out to the member that he was referring to vote 206 and he wanted to know why he could not raise matters that probably came into vote 206 instead of vote 207. The Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: Fine, I can understand the Attorney General's reluctance. I can understand his reluctance—

Mr. Chairman: Without repetition.

Mr. Sopha: —I can understand his reluctance to permit discussion because he has brought this practice to the lowest ebb probably in the history of the province—of granting queen's counsel—I can understand that he does not want it discussed. He has been very preferential toward his friends and associates in Sault Ste. Marie, but he has not ascribed the honour much more widely than that.

Mr. Chairman: The discussion is entirely out of order. County, district and division courts carried?

Magistrates' courts. The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

On magistrates' courts I wish to express my dissatisfaction and I am sure that of many members of this House on both sides, with a great deal that has to do with magistrates' courts.

I do not wish to go back into the Bigelow affair. That has been discussed at some length here, but matters relating to other magistrates have been brought up during the session and I find it extremely disturbing that the Attorney General, at that time, refused to intervene.

I give two examples. A matter which I brought up here, earlier in the session. In front of Magistrate Gianelli, I believe, was a situation where two people were charged with the same offence. The only difference between the two people charged was the older man had been found in possession of the stolen article and he had a long record. The young man, without a record, had not been found in possession of anything stolen. Yet, in his wisdom —and I can find no explanation whatsoever either from the Attorney General or elsewhere—bail was set for the boy at $2,000 and for the criminal with the record at $200.

When I questioned the Attorney General about this he answered, basically, by saying the boy raised the bail and did not have to spend any time in jail, which was not entirely correct but it was completely beside the point, in any case.

Magistrates should, I believe, behave in a rational way and this was not a rational act. We are now having an investigation into certain matters relating to two other magistrates. I do not wish to go into this at all, but it would appear to me that this particular case is a very glaring one for which either there is some explanation which I would like the Attorney General to bring forth. If there is no explanation, I would believe that this particular magistrate has not been properly instructed in his duties.

This is not an isolated thing. I wrote the Attorney General last February about another magistrate, Magistrate R. B. Baxter, who fined a 21-year-old Toronto man $500 for illegal possession of beer at the Mosport races. This man who was convicted could have pleaded guilty out of court and sent in his cheque for $28 for a summons issued against him. Here again, if you go along and plead not guilty to a minor offence, and insist on your innocence, the attitude is: "We will show you; we will fix you." I mean that the fine here was so out of line with the offence it is just incredible.

I wrote the Attorney General, thinking that something was wrong here and something should be done. The director of public prosecution replied to me that the accused had appealed to the county court judge against his conviction and sentence and the appeal against the conviction was dismissed, probably quite rightly. The fine was reduced to $75, which is still far more than he could have paid in the first place, if he had just been willing to pay and not insist on his innocence.

I suggest to you that there is something seriously wrong in the magistrates' courts when something of this nature can occur. I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that it is his responsibility to intervene in cases which are so glaringly against the public interest. The reason they are against the public interest is they reduce the faith of the public in the justice of our courts. Funny things happen in our courts—magistrates' courts. The magistrates, some of them, do not know the law.

We have one magistrate saying, "In no case of liquor offence am I going to give time for payment, even though the law states exactly the opposite." We have another magistrate who seems to have gotten two people mixed up and charges the higher bail against the man who should have received the lower bail. When it is drawn to their attention, nothing is done about it. The fact that the boy was ultimately able to raise the bail is irrelevant and I should have expected better of the Attorney General; I really would.

Here we have a case where a man is fined some 20 times what he could have paid without going to court, because he insisted on his innocence. These are glaring things. They have all happened within the last few weeks.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is time the Attorney General looked into the matter of the justice that is being meted out in our magistrates' courts. I may suggest to you that this is a far more serious and far more important matter than who our magistrates consort with.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, on the matter of Magistrate Gianelli, in the case the hon. member reports. As he says, he questioned me very thoroughly I thought at the time and asked his questions very pertinently and very pointedly and I answered them, I thought, fully and I do not intend to say any more on that subject.

Magistrate Baxter—I do not particularly recall the matter and the hon. member points out that his letter was answered by the director of public prosecutions in my office. I only know that Magistrate Baxter has been a magistrate for, I think, some 27 years on the bench for the magistrates' courts and, perhaps, I suppose could find in the record of performance of any magistrate some cases which one might take exception to or be critical of.

That is why, I suppose, every judge up to the highest court in the land is subject to appeal on his decisions and on sentences which he may give. I could not attempt to defend every case and to say that it was perfect, nor do I think the presiding judge would attempt to say that himself. Generally, I would say this, that as the House is aware, we have brought in a new Act which was passed in this session and has gone right to its last stage in this House, to establish the provincial judges' court which will be our present magistrate's court, upgraded by the provisions of that Act.

In that Act, I would point out to the hon. member, there is provision for the appointment of a judicial council to review and assist the government in the appointment of magistrates, and then we have retained the provision for enquiry in cases where the complaints are so serious that it may need enquiry on the question of whether the magistrate should continue to perform his duties or not.

But I think the hon. member might accept from me the fact there is, in the legislation which he saw and which was presented to this House this session, a provision now for a review of complaints, and they do not have to come from the Attorney General. They can come from a citizen or anyone before that court and the conduct of that magistrate can be reviewed in, I think a quiet and proper way, before a judicial council, which perhaps may go some distance to satisfy what he is saying—that something is wrong with our magistrates' courts.

I think perhaps if I could say it this way—the fact that we have brought in a new bill, a new Act; the fact that we have incorporated in that legislation the recommendations of the hon. Mr. McRuer, set out in his enquiry into civil rights; the fact that we have done that must, perhaps, imply that we were not satisfied with the quality of justice we were getting in those courts and that while I think our magistrates generally have been doing a service within the limits of their abilities as we have designed that court—and, if I may use the term, I fell heir to that situation, but I think, admitting that—the fact that we brought in new legislation to establish what we hope will be a better court with a higher status and one which will command respect and which will be subject to better review and, I trust, one that will have the ability to furnish a better quality of justice, is the answer to the hon. member's complaint that we have not been getting perhaps all we should have.

But to pick out the individual instances here and there is something that I think I could do perhaps, too; I do not attempt to say that every case that is heard before a magistrate was the decision of Solomon at all. They are human, they are fallible, and we try through discussion, through seminars, as I pointed out, to educate and encourage our magistrates to reach a concensus on principles of sentencing and on how decisions should go, to give them the benefit of the best people we have in the administration of law and justice.

I think if the hon. member will be willing now to give us an opportunity to bring into effect the provisions of our new Act, he will see a considerable change in the status of that court.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly this new Act is going to be an improvement and undoubtedly we are going to get better magistrates, but that is not the substance of the point I was attempting to make. The substance of the point I was attempting to make is that the three cases which I have drawn to the attention of this House, all recent cases, all involve magistrates with considerable experience; magistrates who have been on the bench for a long time; magistrates who should have known better and, of course, we are not going to get the wisdom of Solomon, but that is not the point of my complaint.

Here were complaints that were brought to the attention of the Attorney General, who should be the man responsible, and the Attorney General did not take any action. Now I come back to the Gianelli case again; it is not good enough for the Attorney General to say he is not going to talk about it, because I am going to talk about it. Surely the Attorney General will agree with me, whether or not the boy raised the bail—which is what he answered when we go back to the question—is irrelevant.

The point which I raised with the Attorney General, and I will attempt to raise it again now—and if he refuses to answer that will speak for itself—is that the magistrate made a grievous error. Now, when a grievous error is brought to the attention of the chief law officer of this province, he should do something about it. The same thing occurred with Magistrate Bigelow. Here, we members of both Opposition parties are bringing a grievous error to the attention of the Attorney General. We do not expect him to get up and apologize for the magistrate; we expect him to get up and say, "Yes, there was an error. Yes we will see this will not happen again. Yes, I will see that those particular cases are rectified." That is what we expect from the Attorney General.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): The member is oversimplifying.

Mr. Shulman: Yes, I am oversimplifying because you have to oversimplify these things; you cannot understand anything complicated. But this is a simple matter—

Mr. Kerr: It is to you.

Mr. Shulman: It is a simple matter. Well, it is too bad the Conservative lawyers still cannot understand. But it is a simple matter, Mr. Chairman, and I know the Attorney General understands it. And this is really what the people of Ontario expect from the Attorney General, just as much as the members of this House. When something wrong is brought to his attention—and this should apply to every Cabinet Minister—it should not be their idea to try and protect and cover over and gloss. They should try to correct the situation, and this is not what has been done with the magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: He is right, the Attorney General misconceives his function.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Who does?

Mr. Sopha: The Attorney General does. It is as simple as that. A misconception of his duties.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the hon. member for Sudbury is speaking of—but I would say this to the hon. member for High Park, I did not want to say more than I had said about the incidents he raised, but if he is suggesting, if he thinks it is simple—he said I understand it is a simple matter—I think I understand that he has a wrong conception of my function. The Attorney General is not going to tell a magistrate what to do.

Mr. Shulman: If a magistrate makes a mistake, the Attorney General should.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The Attorney General has no power to do that.

Mr. Singer: The Attorney General told Magistrate Klein what to do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I did not, not in a court.

Mr. Sopha: He was told what to do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not in a court hearing.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not misconstrue and suggest that I told Magistrate Klein what to do in a court case because that is not so.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Let us keep the record straight. The Attorney General does not, nor has he any power, to interfere and tell a magistrate what bail he shall set. And heaven forbid that we reach the day when an Attorney General of any party in this House which may form a government will take that power into his hands. Magistrates set bail at their discretion.

Mr. MacDonald: We are not suggesting that any correction should be made except within the framework of the law.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The law provides the terms upon which bail can be granted, and the law gives to the presiding judge the discretion as to what bail he shall grant. Now he may be wrong—

Mr. Sopha: If he is wrong, the Attorney General will defend him.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member for Sudbury would permit me to say, the Attorney General will defend his independence on the bench.

Mr. Shulman: Even if he is wrong.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And the Attorney General will point out that there is a right of appeal from bail as well as from sentence, as well as from conviction. The Attorney General, I think, would be wrong to start interfering with the judiciary at any level and say: This you cannot do.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I need not say more. I simply will not contemplate the Attorney General interfering. Partly as I pointed out in my opening remarks, he is a political person, but he must, in the administration of justice, hold himself apart from interference as a political person in the administration of justice. You pick out an individual case, and say this was wrong, and I could agree with you. But once you open the door to that type of individual case, where do you draw the line, where do you stop? The thing is you never open the door, you leave the administration of justice to the law as it is set forth on our statute books; you appeal. You do not interfere; the government does not say to the courts, "This is the way you must administer our laws."

Mr. Shulman: But what do you do about bad magistrates?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not bad magistrates. If you get judgments that are not correct, you appeal them. You can appeal bail, you can appeal conviction, you can appeal sentence, but you do not interfere. You might get a bad Attorney General—

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, he could do a lot of damage. You could get a bad Attorney General who could say, "I do not like that decision. It is my friend that is involved and I am going to tell the magistrate to change the law." Think that over. How far could that go? I can see that once you open the door, it is wide open.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: The Attorney General has now opened the door about this whole discussion and I am delighted that he has. I hope that the new Act that he talks so fondly about will be a rose that will smell sweeter than a rose by the other name. I suspect that it will not. I suspect that nothing is going to change.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You are always willing to think the worst.

Mr. Singer: Yes, I am, because I am just not satisfied, Mr. Chairman, with the system of magistrates' courts as it operates in the province of Ontario. I think it is a disgrace and I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the new Act is going to change things unless the attitudes of The Attorney General's Department begin to change.

I do not think that the Attorney General has taken the advance step that he says he has, merely by changing the names of these gentlemen from magistrates to provincial judges, and by paying them a few more thousand dollars a year. That is not going to change it.

Mr. White: On a point of order, the rules very specifically forbid debate on this subject because it has been debated on second reading of the bill, and I would ask that you rule the hon. member for Downsview out of order when he attempts to repeat all of the arguments that were posed here when the bill itself was being debated.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The rules are very clear.

Mr. Singer: If the member has taken his seat on a point of order, and I arise to address you on the point of order, the member for London South is not known for his courtesy but perhaps he could keep quiet and listen to my point of order, as I listened to his.

I carefully refrained from entering this discussion until it had gone some length, and the Attorney General in reply to some of the remarks and questions posed by the hon. member for High Park referred at some length to the effect that he hoped that The Provincial Courts Act would have. Now, because of the Attorney General having introduced this subject into his own answers on this vote, surely I am entitled, Mr. Chairman, in fairness and in reasonableness to reply in kind, and that is what I propose to do.

Mr. White: No, you cannot debate the bill all over again.

Mr. Singer: Now, Mr. Chairman, all I am saying is this and if the member for London South will listen carefully—

Mr. Chairman: My ruling is that he be allowed to continue.

Mr. Singer: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have no intention of debating the bill as it went through. I was just going to say—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): I think we ought to clarify that, he said there are no rules in this chamber.

Mr. Singer: Did the member for London South say there were no rules in this chamber?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Nixon: That is a very serious thing to say.

Mr. Singer: No rules!

Mr. MacDonald: If that statement were made on this side of the House, we would be hooted out.

Mr. Singer: Yes, indeed.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, if the obstructionist members—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General's fond hopes for this new Act are not well founded, I think. There has to be a change in the attitude within The Attorney General's Department and within the minds of this government before we are going to see real reform come to our magistrates' courts. I do not think that there is a real belief in the minds of those charged with the responsibility of administering justice that magistrates' courts in the province of Ontario are important, notwithstanding the fact that 95 per cent of the people who come into contact during their lifetime with the criminal laws of this country are dealt with by magistrates. I have invited the Attorney General on many occasions to come with me and tour the magistrates' courts in the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Unfortunately, we have never been able to arrange a mutually convenient appointment so we have never gone together. He has probably been by himself, but I do not know.

I would ask him if he has ever been in courtroom No. 23, in the city hall of Toronto, the old C court, the one down in the basement that is about six feet wide, and ten feet long where, in the summertime, some kind of a machine—apparently changing the air—vibrates so that the whole room is vibrating—where there is not enough room for the lawyers or for the witnesses to sit down. There is room, nevertheless, for the yelling and bawling policemen yelling, "Shut up and sit down and take your hat off, and take the gum out of your mouth". That happens in that court.

I wonder if the Attorney General can tell me what in his mind is going to bring the change to that kind of a system. He was telling my friend from Dovercourt a few moments ago that he has the responsibility to make sure that clean, proper and adequate court facilities are provided and if he wanders into the nether regions of the old city hall in Toronto, he must be able to see that clean and proper adequate facilities are not provided.

What is provided there is a disgrace to any society that believes that it lives by the rule of the law. Because unless you begin to provide facilities that add dignity and decorum to the law, then the law is not going to be respected, and in those courts, Mr. Chairman, the law is not respected because of the facilities, because of a myriad of things, because of the changeability of magistrates' views from magistrate to magistrate.

I, on occasion, have brought before this House specific charges, and I agree with the suggestion that was made earlier that in every case, no matter how well documented they have been, and no matter how obvious they have been, the Attorney General has acted as the apologist for the magistrates' actions. There is no point in reviewing them. There is no point in bringing back all those transcripts. There is no point in arguing with the Attorney General about obscure interpretations of sections of the criminal code.

One comes to mind particularly—where the magistrate changed what he had written on a licence after he had made a conviction, and the Attorney General dug back into—I do not know—some old English tome to say that once it had been done before. He knows, and I know that it was wrong, but he is the constant apologist for sins of omission and commission that occur in those courts, and I say, notwithstanding a new Act, unless there is a change in attitude in that department, we are not going to get a proper and adequate system of magistrates' courts.

The bail system that has been talked about—everybody who practices before those courts at any time in Metropolitan Toronto knows that we have a system of professional bondsmen. Everyone knows that the operations of professional bondsmen are against provisions of the criminal code. This has been brought to the Attorney General's attention time after time and he does nothing. There is sitting still in the records of Hansard a question posed by me earlier in this session about what appeared to be an obvious case of professional bondsmen acting against the law.

The Attorney General took it under advisement and he has never yet answered me. He knows and it will take him, if he does not know now, only five minutes to enquire from anyone who goes into those courts of names of those professional bondsmen and who they are. There is no trick to that, they can be identified, everyone knows who they are. Some of them are lawyers and I think it is a disgrace that the Attorney General has not moved against this illegal system.

We have talked about providing a better system of bail and he says, "I am not going to advise"—he beats his breast in righteous indignation—"I am not going to tell magistrates how to deal with bail." Surely, Mr. Chairman, an Attorney General who was concerned about the bail system could run a series of seminars where the magistrates would say what their views are as to the granting of bail—that the object of bail is not to punish people in advance of conviction but to secure their attendance in court to face trial. That is the only purpose of bail, but day after day we pick up the papers and we see magistrates who punish people by making bail high enough that they cannot get it. Bail used to, and still does, mean jail for the poor and it does not mean jail for the people who have facilities and access to professional bondsmen or people who have enough money to buy their way out of court. We have had experiments, we have had talks, we have the Amicus foundation here operating in Toronto, fashioned after the Vera foundation that operated in New York city and in this foundation the experiment was excellent. It proved good enough that the city of New York and the state of New York have taken it over and made it a public service.

But here we are still struggling with a charitable foundation, the Amicus foundation, sponsored by a service club and sponsored by a couple of estates to try and provide some service that the province of Ontario should be providing. It is not doing a bad job, but it does it in maybe one of ten cases. The people who are unable to benefit from it, or the people who come before the magistrates and who are going to be punished in advance of their being tried by fixing high bail, do not have any such facilities.

These are the things, Mr. Chairman, that make us wonder about the effectiveness and the functioning of the system of justice in our magistrates' courts.

Mr. Chairman, I referred earlier to this book and I commend it to the attention of the Attorney General and to every hon. member of the House and particularly to my friends up there in the fourth estate, because I have urged their bosses in every case, and certainly in the case of the three Toronto dailies that this is the kind of service that the Toronto dailies should be doing for us.

Unfortunately, we in Opposition are hampered in this regard. We do not have the research facilities that a big city newspaper has. But in the United States the Christian Science Monitor saw fit to detach one of its reporters, a man named Howard James, from his regular duties for a period of over six months and instructed him to write a series of articles on what he found out about the courts in the United States, and he did.

He wrote a series of 13 articles and subsequently followed it up with a second series of 13 articles on a different phase of the system. The first series of 13 articles were sufficiently highly regarded by those people who decide those sort of things; they gave Mr. James a Pulitzer prize for unusual and excellent reporting. The matters that he refers to in this book—I am going to deal with them at some length in a few moments—are applicable to an amazing extent to the province of Ontario, not in all its aspects but to an amazing extent.

And so, Mr. Chairman, just before I start on that, I do want to say to my friends up there in the press gallery: Please go over to your bosses and get them to do the same sort of thing with one of you. There are a lot of newspaper reporters in this province that could do this job and do it properly.

It is only going to be with a proper and full exposé of what goes on in our magistrates' courts that we are going to get real reform. We are not going to be able to get it out of this Legislature under the present circumstances, no matter how long we talk, no matter how seriously we research this subject, because we just do not seem to be able to get it through to those responsible for making these changes.

So I make my plea, Mr. Chairman, to the members of the newspaper world to embark upon this kind of a study and to give adequate publicity to the faults—and they are myriad—in our magistrates' courts system, so that we will bring about reasonable and proper change. Some of the things—

Mr. Chairman: Before the member proceeds, I wonder if he would permit the Chairman just a very slight interruption?

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: I am sure the members of the committee would want me to draw to your attention the fact that we have with us a visitor today who is not unknown to many of us. Mr. Ross Whicher, MP, is in the gallery to the left of Mr. Speaker's chair.

An hon. member: Great fellow. Great victory.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I welcome that interruption.

An hon. member: I never knew he was a kisser of girls.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, when these—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Well, the member for London South is back again. What was the party affiliation of the fellow Mr. Whicher defeated? What happened in London?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: You fellows did not do so well, as I recall.

An hon. member: Are you sure you did not win one of those seats up there? Not one?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, back to the magistrates' courts.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: In the prologue to the collection of articles as it is written in this book, there is a quotation from Daniel Webster which, I think, deserves to be written into the record here. Daniel Webster said:

> Justice is the great concern of man on earth. It is the ligament which holds civilized beings and civilized nations together, wherever her temple stands; and, so long as it is duly honoured, there is a foundation for social security, general happiness, improvement and progress of our race. And whoever labours on this edifice with usefulness and distinction, whoever clears its foundations, strengthens its pillars, adorns its entablatures, or contributes to raise its lofty domes still higher in the skies, connects himself in the name and fame and character with that which is and must be as durable as the frame of human society.

And I think this could well be the watchword of the administration of justice by The Department of the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice in this province.

Mr. Chairman, in this series of articles, James deals with a number of matters. He talks about judging the judges, and I am going to deal with that one a little more fully. He has full comment on the dangers of delay. The delay in some of the American jurisdictions are just beyond belief. It is not as bad here, but it is bad. Courts for the common man; children in trouble; prosecutors and police power; the use of police in our courts.

The use of police as prosecutors—it is hard to understand how in this day and age we still have policemen prosecuting in minor cases. Sitting beside the Crown attorney, in other cases advising, in fact conducting the case. The unfortunate use at the present time of untrained assistant Crown attorneys in so many cases. The assistant Crown are so often bright young men just out of law school, just beginning to learn their way, who use the appointment as assistant Crown as a way station on their way to bigger and better things. Why can we not have, as our assistant Crowns, lawyers of more substantial experience? Lawyers who have been at it a little longer and lawyers who we are prepared to pay a good enough salary to keep them there as Crown attorneys and assistant Crown attorneys. Unfortunately we do not do that and unfortunately the cause of justice suffers because of the inexperience of many of these young men and because of their direction by, on many occasions, police officers who have no business advising them.

Jail or bail—I have dealt with that and I will not say much more about that.

If you are poor, the difficulties that you have. The sentencing wonderland of Ontario. The magistrate whose name was bandied about here a little while ago—you remember he sentenced a man named Roberts, I think, to 40 years? Roberts was an incendiarist who came before the courts, and said, "I am sorry I am an incendiarist and I give myself up because I need treatment". The magistrate said, "Yes, sir, we will give you treatment. We will sentence you to 40 years". It was only because of the outcry of the press that a new trial was ordered and eventually the court appeal reduced that sentence.

But this is the sort of thing that happens in our courts, unfortunately, Mr. Chairman. And this is the sort of thing that I am not satisfied that we show sufficient concern about. Lawyer troubles—because our profession is not blameless as I indicated to some extent this afternoon—a question of jury—who owns the courts—the press conflict—judges go to school; and then finally, a long series of suggestions for reform.

Here are some of the things that he has to say about judges—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, it is always a pleasure to hear the hon. member for Downsview, but we are talking about magistrates' courts here. To make this an occasion when he can get up and quote from this very eminent compendium of the articles which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor, many of which I read, I think is out of order.

It is true that anyone who writes a book on the administration of justice, or how law should be carried out, is applicable to any court, I suppose. But to read this very learned author, with his very learned comments on law in general and in some particulars in his native country, the United States, is not related to the magistrates' courts of Ontario. I think that it is just an occasion for the hon. member to display, or get on the record, some very admirable sentiments expressed by this learned author.

I would like, sir, that you might confine him to constructive criticism of our magistrates' courts and I would be glad to hear him, and I think that it would be more profitable than to have him reread this article which I have already read.

Mr. Singer: I had no intention of reading this book, it runs far too long. It runs 260 pages.

Mr. Chairman: I am sure that the member–

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, nothing was further from my mind than to say this author had discovered something wrong in California and why did the Attorney General not do something about it. I am only going to refer to those things which this author referred to, which I think are applicable here in Ontario and ask the Attorney General why he does not do something about them. That was the only intention I had in producing this book. I was just laying the ground work and I thought I would bring the Attorney General up to date about this book so that he can get a broaader knowledge just in a few words this afternoon.

Some of the things that he has to say about judges I think are applicable here in Ontario and we can use the word judges and magistrates interchangeably now. The Attorney General has done this in his statutes now. The acute shortage of judges, I think, would be somewhat eased by the raising of the salary. But I would say that the acute shortage of judges or magistrates is going to be remedied if the facilities are reasonable, logical.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We got it only this year you know.

Mr. Singer: How long?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have only had the responsibility for the provision of facilities for the administration of justice in southern Ontario since the beginning of January, and we just got the Act through in April. Now, you do not expect us to wave a wand and create new courthouses overnight?

Mr. Singer: No, I do not expect you to do that, particularly when I look at the record and see how many years it took for this system to grow up. I do not expect it to be completely reformed over night, but my complaint is that the change comes far too slowly. We have asked for that for nine years; my colleague from Sudbury and I have stood here in our places and complained about these very things and it is only this year that we got a new Act.

As I say, I do not bring the same feeling to that Act that the Attorney General does. As I read it, it is going to be more of the same with a little more money, but hopefully I am wrong. But, Mr. Chairman, when the Minister says, "Give us time," he has had 25 years of time.

You have here the member for Sudbury and myself who have been talking on this for nine years, as have some of the newer members of the House, and you are still asking for time. How long is enough time? How long is it before we are going to bring changes?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the hon. member was a member of a municipal council whose responsibility it then was. I wonder what he did about providing the facilities then?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I did no more as a member of municipal council than did the present Premier of the province, who, if my memory serves me correctly, began his career in politics as an alderman in the city of London. The city of London still has not got an adequate courthouse. It is probably the worst one in the whole of Canada.

So, Mr. Chairman, the money available at the same time that the Premier and I were members of municipal council was far from adequate. This was why, when my colleague from Sudbury and I came into the House together, and began to discuss these things, high on our agenda, first on the list, for reform of the system of administration of justice was that the province should take over the cost of the administration of justice. You can go back through nine years of Hansard and read that and that is what you will find.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, now it is done.

Mr. Singer: Yes, it is done, but it has taken nine years of our time and 25 of this government's time before finally there is a bit of rustling, and maybe hopefully, something is going to happen.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the thing that Howard James is perhaps most critical about concerning judges and magistrates is not the corrupt ones, and not even the ones who are physically incapable of carrying out their duty. The corrupt ones can be dealt with and the physically incapable reasonably soon identify themselves and, for a variety of reasons, cease to function. It is the mediocre ones that are the problem.

The ones who are lazy, and lack compassion. Those who refuse to study any more and those who are anxious to leave in the summer to go out and play golf. The ones who are too busy about other things to pay proper attention to the dockets that come before them, but perform a kind of job. So that there is really not enough to put your teeth into; they have not stolen anything and they are not senile. These are the judges that we have to worry about and this is one of the very important ones.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is covered in my new Act.

Mr. Singer: Well, I do not know that you have got it covered in your new Act. Do you have it covered in your new Act when you allow the committee to have three heads of investigation, but the disciplinary power is reserved to two heads? Now, you know that and we pointed it out to you when the bill was on its way through the House. You still have only the two heads for removal and the enquiry that you initiated the other day, Mr. Chairman, under section 3 of The Magistrates Act can only deal with the provisions of the old Act which are the same as the new Act. Mr. Justice Grant would have had no more power had he been acting under the new Act, than he would under the old Act.

Those are the two criteria. What I am concerned about is mediocrity, the judge who lacks compassion, the judge who is just too busy to listen to Mr. Sidney Linden when he says, "Let me talk to you about time to pay." The judge that feels that, "You are a terrible person and I am going to make an example out of you and it really does not matter." The judge who brings into court his personal prejudices, which come from his own background, about any one of a variety of subjects.

These are the kind of judges and magistrates that we have to worry about and our court records are just rife with unfortunate instances of poor judicial performance. Look at the docket on any one of those magistrates' courts in one day, and look at the impossible task that those magistrates are assigned every day. You perhaps cannot blame some of them too much for saying, "Let us get the thing over with as quickly as we can. Let us dispose of all these cases just as quickly as we can so we can get out of here. Let us get out of this miserable courtroom with the compressor machine vibrating and making the whole place jump. Let us get out of this place where the prisoners are confined like cattle in the dock. Let us get out of this place where we cannot deal in any other way with the chronic alcoholic except to send him to jail. Let us get out of this place where we cannot deal in any other way with the recalcitrant child who cannot get along with her parents but send her to jail."

This is the kind of reform, Mr. Chairman, that we are talking about, and this is the kind of reform that unfortunately does not seem to be in the minds of the people responsible for running the system of justice in the province of Ontario.

Let me turn now—I think I have done enough at that point—to some of the recommendations here.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman I would like to have from the hon. member something more than just critical remarks. Now he says I am concerned with the mediocrity of the magistrates. I would like to ask him now —he says he is concerned about this—what would he do to get rid of what he might consider "mediocre" magistrates?

Mr. Singer: I was rather hoping you would ask that question. I would have taken the advice that I so freely offered to you at the time the bill was going through. I would have appointed these judges and/or magistrates for a probationary period so that you could ascertain—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Over a period.

Mr. Singer: Yes, so that you could ascertain over a reasonable period of time—one, two, three, five years, whether or not these people were tempermentally suited to being judges.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: All the present ones?

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I think if you are going to do it you are going to do it properly. I would think that the Attorney General, who is charged with the final responsibility of making these appointments, would consider that.

I do not care how brilliant a talent you have for assessing the capabilities of people who are potential magistrates, you are not going to be able to tell in advance how they they are going to work out once they are given those appointments. What my friend from Sarnia was talking about was the idea that some of them are charged with just a bit of deity once they get this exalted appointment; this happens in so many cases.

You have to study these people and you have to have a system of reviewing them, and you have to have a system of charts, and so on, to understand what they have done. If it became apparent, in a three-year probationary period, that bail was set too high, or that the sentences were too great, without a reasonable comparison. And if it became apparent that their court was through every day at one o'clock, no matter what was on the docket. And if it became apparent that they came in late. And if it became apparent that they were rude to counsel and to witnesses. And if it became apparent that policemen were yelling and shouting in their courts and they let them get away with it—these are the criteria that could well have been applied to not confirming their appointments at the end of the three- or five-year probationary period.

This, Mr. Chairman, would have been an advanced step, but the Attorney General was not prepared to do that. He is prepared to gamble on his ability to size up, after a short interview, and perhaps—not necessarily, but perhaps—with the advice of a judicial council—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Where are you going to get a probationary judge?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Are you going to put magistrates on probation and call that justice? Do you think the people are going to accept going for three years before a bench that is sitting on probation—the whole bench? What kind of justice do you think they are going to think they are getting?

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out when the Attorney General said, "how is it going to work?" you have had it in your statutes for a long time. You say you never used it, but you still have at least two deputy magistrates sitting on the bench in Metropolitan Toronto to whom you have never seen fit to give full status. You are saying they are not quite good enough to give full status and full pay, but we are keeping them there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The magistrate who is serving on probation with an Attorney General, a government—who can dismiss him? Who is he going to serve if he has any weakness? Is he going to be independent, or is he going to be careful in his handing out of justice so that he does not get dismissed because he does not suit the Attorney General?

I would not for a moment—and I said it in the debate on that bill, and perhaps we are talking about the bill, Mr. Chairman, and maybe we should not be—but I think that would destroy the independence of your bench, to have a bench on probation.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it would destroy the independence of the bench, any more than the present system of appointment destroys the independence of the bench. Who do they go to if they want to be magistrates? Who are they going to go to if they want to be provincial judges? They are going to have to satisfy the same man who says, a little later on, it would not be nice if they had to satisfy him. He does not just pull them out of a sterile box and say: Here is a good magistrate and we are just going to pull out the next one and there he is.

Mr. Sopha: Up to now they had to prove they were Conservatives first.

Mr. Singer: What is the difference, in that case? If the Attorney General is going to be political at all, surely he is going to be as political in the first instance as he is going to be at a later date?

If the Attorney General can be trusted in making these appointments in the first instance, surely he can be trusted in exercising the same kind of discretion at a later time, after he has had a record of their performance for a period of a few years, so he can check it out. Surely that makes sense? If it does not, then the Attorney General and I just do not think along the same lines.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Singer: I do not care what the federal government thinks about this. We are talking about a responsibility, Mr. Chairman, of this government. We are talking about the responsibility we have to clean up what I call the mess in our magistrates' courts, and I charge that this government has not set about it in a proper way, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lawlor: I settled all that two months ago.

Mr. Singer: And if the member for Lakeshore who has finally come awake again would just stop nattering, he can talk in due course and express his views.

Mr. Lawlor: Make your point.

Mr. Singer: Perhaps I have not made my point because some of the more obtuse members, like the member for Lakeshore, are not sure what I am talking about yet, so I will talk on for a while in the hope that I can convince him as well.

Mr. Chairman, it is pity that this little left wing minority group which has been further reduced to what—five seats now in the province of Ontario?—gets very unhappy when something is being presented here that has some real value to the public's business. But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all the nattering that is going on, it is not going to deter me one whit and I am going to continue until I am finished.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: What did the hon. member say about courtesy?

Mr. Chairman: Back to the magistrates' courts.

Mr. Singer: Back to the magistrates' courts.

Mr. White: The member for Downsview is trying to get even with the hon. member for Sudbury—

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Mr. Sopha: Can you understand why he picks on me all afternoon?

Mr. Chairman: I cannot hear him. The chairman does not hear him. Magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: He must have had a distorted childhood.

Mr. Chairman: Would the member for Downsview please proceed?

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am just reviewing and cutting down some of these matters. Some of these suggestions taken at random—the treatment of police, insofar as their giving evidence. Surely it makes abundant good sense that police should be paid for the time that they have to go into court and give evidence? This is one of the very unhappy things—it does happen here—the police, unfortunately, are penalized for the times that they have to go into court. They lose their time off, and so on.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Where is this?

Mr. Singer: In Toronto, in Metropolitan Toronto, in the province of Ontario the same way. One would think that giving evidence in court is an integral part of the whole system of the administration of justice. One would think that this is a pretty obvious thing. The whole process of education of these magistrates, Mr. Chairman, once they have been chosen. I would think that no magistrate should be allowed to sit on the bench until he has been given a period of training, because what happens here is that one day he is a lawyer and the next day he is a magistrate and the next day he is sitting in judgment. I would think there should be an established system of training for magistrates, whereby they could be told the procedures that exist in their courtrooms, informed of the particular laws that they are going to be called upon to deal with—a study course. I think we could well begin to examine, perhaps through our law reform commission, a system of streaming within our law schools and perhaps directing some of our lawyers, or law students to the task of becoming, in due course, magistrates and judges.

I would think we have to make a real study of how we get people appointed who are going to be in the position of making judgments. Mr. Chairman, apparently I have tried the patience of a few of the members —London South, Lakeshore, and so on. That does not bother me very much and perhaps I have made this point about as well as I can for this year. I will be back to it again next year, as I have been back to it for the last nine years.

I say that the time is long overdue that we should have a real reform in our magistrates' courts. There is nothing that has come before us in this session that, to my mind, gives us any reasonable hope to expect that the situation is going to be substantially improved. I would hope that the Attorney General, with the help of all the members of the House and, particularly, with the help of an alert news media, will begin to pay attention to what is going on in those courts and will begin to clean up the mess that exists.

Mr. White: On a point of order Mr. Chairman. I think the member for Sudbury is now entitled to a 15-minute rebuttal.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I want to advert to the comments of the Attorney General, wherein he put his views most laconically. One would have wished that he would have expanded on his views at much greater length, in relation to his duty as he conceives it in respect of any supervisory jurisdiction over the magistrates' courts.

What depresses me about his statement of his duty is that I contend—and I am making argument now as opposed to what he said and what he wanted to imply—I want to make argument.

As I see it, where he goes wrong is his departure from the first principle. That principle must be that in our constitutional system this Legislature is supreme. This is the supreme body within the state and one must state, very delicately indeed, one must approach with a good deal of caution in saying that in respect of all other arms of government, including the courts, this Legislature being supreme has something of a supervisory jurisdiction. How could it be otherwise, when the Legislature decrees, from time to time, how the business in the courts will be managed? The approach to the handling of the business that shall be the order of the day. So it is that, this year the Legislature decrees that the constitution of the most inferior courts—that is not a term of opprobrium—the courts lowest in the scale, shall be thoroughly revised.

I am not going into the merits of that but I am using it to illustrate the supreme supervisory jurisdiction that the Legislature has over all other arms of government.

Therefore, it follows that where the Attorney General goes wrong is in his strict and erroneous adherence to the principle that it is his duty when the Legislature criticizes a magistrate, the Attorney General concedes it to be his duty without departure on any occasion, to rush in here and defend the magistrate. I say that is completely wrong.

The Attorney General has no such duty at all to rise in his place and protect the magistrate and defend him in his error and so it was with Magistrate Bigelow. There is no question of that in law. There is just no question and it is hardly open to argument that in respect of allowing time to pay a fine, the magistrate has, by the law, a duty to enquire into the circumstances of the individual offender. There is no doubt about that at all, and yet, when Magistrate Bigelow announced, as he did, that he had a policy that people convicted of liquor offences were never given time to pay and we raised that here and complained about it, the Attorney General rushed into the House with a prepared specious argument seeking to defend that magistrate in his error. I ask if the Attorney General is going to do that on every occasion? What hope have we got that there will be a corrective supervisory jurisdiction exercised over the perpetuation of error in the magistrates' courts. We have no hope at all because the Attorney General then becomes the defender of magistrates, right or wrong. He will rush to their defence and on the other hand, what is wrong with the Attorney General of today standing in his place, answerable to this Legislature? What is wrong with him in agreeing when justified criticism is tendered in the House about conduct of magistrates? What is wrong with the Attorney General acknowledging the criticism and saying, "I agree with it"? And what would be wrong for the Attorney General, as the intervention of my friend from York South indicated his thinking of the matter, going to the magistrate in chambers, in private, and pointing out to him upon good and valid grounds, supported by evidence, errors that he conceived the magistrate had indulged in. What would be wrong with that?

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Supposing you did not agree with those grounds?

Mr. Sopha: It would work toward the amelioration of the system and would apply a corrective influence so that the public might expect the very best efforts, the most detached and impartial and objective attitude of mind of the magistrate, in the dealing with the cases that come before him. But I think what has gone wrong here historically is that this department, over the years, under successive Attorney Generals, has considered itself to be a prosecuting department. It has become imbued with the carrying out of its function in the prosecution of criminal law.

In that sense, it has been more of a law enforcement department than it has been a justice department and we hope to see a departure from that attitude of fidelity to the prosecution side. As I said last night and it bears repeating, there is no question about what the first Minister of this province, the Prime Minister, had in mind when he changed the name, when he put a new label on this department. He had in mind the conveyance of the notion to the public that The Attorney General's Department hereafter would concern itself more with the quality of justice in the province and concern itself less with the harrying and the prosecution of the felons before the law.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister) Precisely why it was done.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, and now that is a very appropriate time for me to back up, statistically, the statement that twice here before I have said that the province of Ontario leads the way and is notorious in wanting to put people in jail. I have the statistics before me. Most of the people go to jail in this province as a result of being called before the bar of justice in the magistrates' courts. My friend from Downsview very accurately pointed out that 95 per cent of people in trouble with the law are dealt with in the magistrates' courts.

Now I want to put a few figures on the record. I want it remembered in relation to the figures and I am going to make comparisons between the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, the two largest provinces—and I ask you to accept that the province of Quebec is about 80 per cent, Mr. Chairman, of the population of the province of Ontario, it is roughly the ratio as four is to five. We find that in the realm of convictions for intoxication, and I am going to refer only to the year 1966, the offence, Mr. Chairman, under our Liquor Control Act of being drunk in a public place, intoxicated in a public place and we find that the convictions in Ontario totalled 56,290. In the same year, the convictions in Quebec totalled 15,440. Now I would not, for a moment, stop. I suffered enough last night.

I would not stop to make any comparisons between Ontario and Quebec in respect of drinking habits except to say that people live in Quebec and people live in Ontario but it is interesting to note that four times the number of convictions for that offence occurred in Ontario as in Quebec in our magistrates' courts and that is what I mean when I refer to the notoriety of this government, through The Department of the Attorney General, in prosecuting people with the end result that the people end up in jail.

These figures are from the Dominion bureau of statistics. Convictions for other offences under The Liquor Control Act in the same year—and I ask you to remember, Mr. Chairman, that under The Liquor Control Act there are a number of infractions that are set out, such as being found in a place where an offence is being committed, keeping for sale, and so on—there were 44,802 convictions in Ontario and in the same period 14,215 in the province of Quebec. Now, Ontario leads the way, as the Premier is so wont to say, he likes that phrase, "Ontario leads the way." Ontario certainly leads the way in putting people in jail, especially for convictions under that statute. And here is the point of making reference to that: I do not make reference to it, I assure you, Mr. Chairman, in order to cudgel or berate the administration on this side, but I make reference to it to associate myself with the remarks of Professor Morton of Osgoode hall when he wrote in the Globe and Mail, at the time of the Bigelow affair, when Mr. Bigelow said that it was on his policy—and the Attorney General defended it—that no one convicted of a liquor offence gets time to pay.

That was all right that day, be it noted, with the servant of the Attorney General who stood or sat in his place in that court; the servant of the Attorney General never at any time rose to his feet, it is recorded, to make any kind of protest in support of Mr. Linden. And let us remember that Mr. Linden on that day, notwithstanding the injunction laid down in an umbrella-like fashion by the magistrate, Mr. Linden carried out his duties in the best tradition of our profession in that in every case after Mr. Bigelow let it be known what his policy was, Mr. Linden, so the Globe and Mail recorded, got up and made representations on behalf of each offender.

But the servant of the Attorney General—and happily I forget his name—he remained completely silent throughout the whole piece. In that way it is valid to say that the semantic approach of The Department of the Attorney General is that, if they are not actively engaged in putting people in jail, then they are certainly content and remain passive in the courts when the sentence of imprisonment is imposed upon them.

And I can say over a period of 15 years' experience, that invariably when the drunks are dealt with, they are dealt with first. As I said before, drunks come before QCs and they come before people who plead not guilty. The drunks get preferential treatment. They are dealt with at 10 o'clock at the opening of the court and, invariably, in my experience—and I have appeared in magistrates' courts all over this province—invariably the agents of the Attorney General scarcely ever say a word on behalf of the drunks.

In fairness, they do not say anything against them. But they just sit there and the magistrate—this is a very mechanical process, mechanistic in the extreme—the magistrate deals with the drunks with the assistance of the police officer. The Attorney General's agent sits passively by. The situation has only been corrected with the introduction of legal aid in that now duty counsel will say a word on behalf of the people charged, as Mr. Linden did on that celebrated occasion.

So The Attorney General's Department is very much a party to putting people in jail in this province and those statistics that I have cited are certainly alarming. Now I return to what Professor Morton said, and I associate myself completely with it—a very progressive attitude which I am glad to adopt and share. He said our present system is inhuman; what we ought to do is make the process a revolving door process, but the revolving door should not be situated as a door to the magistrate's court. It should not be—and I am glad the Minister of Correctional Services is here—he said it should not be a door to the magistrate's court at all.

The courts should have nothing to do with dealing with this offence, but the person who is found in an inebriated condition, said Professor Morton, should be brought in, his safety maintained, be dried out, and released —released without any further dealing with him by the process of justice at all. That especially appeals to me when I remember that it is the government of the province that supplies the liquor in the first place. They are the ones who make it available; they are the ones who make a profit out of it—we are the ones who make a profit out of it.

I have always thought it to be somewhat hypocritical that this stuff is sold to the inebriate, he consumes it, and then the state descends upon him and takes him in for drinking it—very discriminatory.

One need only mention, in passing, that very discriminatory piece of legislation. It is only the poor drunks that are picked up. If you are a well-heeled drunk, you do not get picked up. The police could station themselves outside some of the best golf courses in Ontario and could pick up an equal number of the people who have made egress from the premises at an appropriate time. But they do not. They do not stand there; they stand down in the places where the economically disabled people are likely to congregate. They are the ones who are picked up and put in the hoosegow to come up before the magistrate the next day.

On the validity of the figures, I have said that Ontario is notorious for putting and keeping people in jail. That statement is further verified when one looks at the statistics for the year 1967 in the correctional institutions. I am not talking about penitentiaries at all, I am talking about the provincially administered institutions, and I make reference to one statistic.

In the province of Quebec on March 31, 1967, there were 1,631 people in correctional institutions of all forms. In the province of Ontario on the same date, March 31, 1967, there were 4,700. So, whereas the population of Ontario is one-fifth more than that of Quebec, we find that precisely three times as many people were in institutions. And I allege—and I suppose the Minister of Reform Institutions would not dispute me—I allege that those figures reflect the large number of people in for liquor offences.

My point is this—let us stop this misuse of our magistrates' courts. Let us stop it; let us make them environments of decency and humanism, and let us cut out this traditional archaic and ridiculous practice of hauling these people into those courts and dealing with them for infractions of this statute.

And let us, at an early time, set up a different method. I have taken my place here and said that I would be quite content to let them go free. If the magistrate says $10 and costs to the fellow on the first offence, as he always does, that does not help the fellow not to be a drunk. That does not cure him, it does not assist him in any way.

If he has the $10 and costs, which are usually $13, he will pay it and he will be drunk that night. If it is five days, as they humanely say in most cases—$10 and costs, or five days—then in five days' time, after getting dried out at public expense, he will be down at the nearest bistro getting another tankful and he will likely be back. What is the sense of this ceaseless repetition of bringing these people through these courts?

There is one other matter I want to deal with if I may.

Mr. Chairman: Does the member have more to say on that—

Mr. Sopha: One other. Not on that, I have finished that. I have one other point on magistrates' courts.

It being 6 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, JULY 3, 1968

The House resumed at 8 o'clock, p.m.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Chairman: On vote 207, magistrates' courts, the member for Sudbury.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, the question remains after the dinner adjournment in the same form that it was before the adjournment, and that is that we are left in a state of wonder over here. Now, sir, if the hon. Attorney General refuses to exercise his supervisory function over the operation of the magistrates' courts, then who is going to do it? My friend from Downsview (Mr. Singer) is perfectly correct in reciting some of the inadequacies and sins of commission or omission—as it is in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer—of which he has informed the House. I do not propose to repeat them.

One does not have to be in a magistrate's court for a very long period of time before he concludes that in many magistrates' courts, the office of magistrate is a sort of partnership with the office of Crown attorney. In far too many cases, the magistrate presiding considers himself to be something of a second prosecutor, and sees at least part of his role to be that of assisting the Crown attorney. In many cases, of course, where the ability of the ingenuity or the energy of the Crown attorney is diluted, the magistrate will go out of his way in order to fill the gap. And directed, no doubt, toward the good end that the guilty shall be punished, I have seen some startling illustrations of that.

I recall going into a magistrate's court in Windsor where a magistrate, who was very highly thought of in this province, was presiding. I was visiting my former colleague from Essex North, and I dropped into the court to see how business was conducted and spend a morning in observation. I recall that they were dealing with a case where the Crown proceeded on a charge of theft of gasoline from a car left in a parking lot. At the end of the Crown's case, they had failed to prove the ownership of the car from which the gasoline was taken; it was an essential ingredient to call the owner to testify that he had not given his consent for the person to take the gasoline from the car. I should point out, too, that the accused was not represented by counsel.

At the end of the Crown's case, they had not proved that very point. This young chap was probably 18 or 19, defending himself, and quite a decent looking young chap. The magistrate, at that point, instead of dismissing the charge for failure to prove the case beyond reasonable doubt in all its particulars, propio motu, and on his own motion, suggested to the Crown attorney that they adjourn the case in order to summon the owner of the car, on another day.

Of course, had the chap been defended by counsel, that would not have been permitted. But that is an illustration, and I have no doubt that it has been many times repeated, of the partnership between the Crown attorney and the magistrate in the administration of justice. Now, the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) sees his role as being to defend magistrates, even when they are wrong, and he adheres to that very strictly, in what he says to us. It is left to the Opposition from time to time, currently and contemporarily; it has a duty to raise these matters in the House and ask for the necessary redress. It is very interesting to note that the English court of appeal—which is a great organ of innovation, with people like Lord Justice Denning having sat on it, Lord Devlin, and other very strong judges—has recently laid down the principle of English law, a new found principle, that courts are not immune to criticism even when the criticism is erroneous or misguided. I think that all those point to the extent of saying that they are not immune to criticism that is mischievous or malicious, that the right of free speech overrides all else.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Do we have those in Ontario?

Mr. Sopha: It is left to the press and the Opposition to call attention to this arm of government, which cannot be perfect, and the posture the Attorney General could adopt toward Magistrate Bigelow. As an illustration of this type of thing, he could go down and say to the magistrate, "Look, I am criticized every day, I get all kinds of criticism sitting in the place I sit in in the Legislature. I have to face it and I have to answer it and sometimes I feel that criticism is unjustified, that it is ill-founded, that the criticism might be mischievous, but I have to take it and I have to withstand it in the democratic forum in which I operate as the chief law officer of the Crown." And he can say to Magistrate Bigelow, "You are not immune to criticism, either, and I am here to ask you to correct your practices."

Now that we are dealing with that man, he is a good illustration. I went down looking for the duty counsel two or three months ago in relation to a case, a former employee of the Attorney General, a very able lawyer. I went down looking for him and while I was waiting his appearance, dropped into the famous Court 23. The word "infamous" might be more suitable to describe it. I dropped in there and who was presiding on the bench but Magistrate Bigelow.

I am telling you I had never seen anything like this before. He sat up there in his regal majesty and he had a court clerk sitting down in front of him, and as the docket proceeded, every once in a while the clerk would shout in the loudest possible voice to some person attending upon the court, something like, "No reading newspapers in court; no chewing gum in court; no leaving the courtroom while a case is in progress." And he would interrupt counsel. Counsel would be asking a question of a witness and this clerk fellow, who thought it was his mission in life, would sit there and at regular intervals bellow out something at the people in the body of the court. Well, I said to myself—

Mr. Lawlor: Was this the Attorney General?

Mr. Sopha: I hope I would have the courage, if I were appearing in that court—I repeat that I have appeared in magistrates' courts in most parts of this province—and if I were defending a person and that fellow shouted in that fashion when I was asking a question, I hope that I would have the courage to stop and say, "Look you, why do you not shut up for a while? Why do you not dry up?"

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: I cannot deny the validity of the interjection.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I think that is when you are said to be "hoist with your own petard".

Mr. Sopha: I would be the last to deny the appropriateness of that last remark.

An hon. member: If the Attorney General was there, why did he not say it?

Mr. Singer: Great fellow for a Cabinet Minister. You should keep him. You need more fellows like him.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, the point I make, and I hope it is a very valid one, is that I am deeply concerned that we have an institution here where, from time to time, activities occur that are thought important enough for someone in this House to get up and refer to them.

The member for High Park (Mr. Shulman) has made a very pertinent observation about instances where he appears to have the evidence which shows some impropriety in the administration of justice—a departure, let us say, from what we conceive to be in the tenets of natural justice. I see no reason whatsoever that in those circumstances the Attorney General ought not to send his emissaries down to the magistrate. He could send a person like Mr. Cormack down to have a word of prayer with the magistrates in order to improve the situation.

I say that in the recognition that all human institutions are attached with human frailty. They all make the mistakes that humans are prone to make, and what is more appropriate for someone here, in this body, where we are subjected in our daily lives to the criticism of others, both in the way we say it and the content of what we say, what is more justified than for us to say to the Attorney General that as the chief law officer of the Crown he is the protector of the administration of justice. I hope, as long as he occupies that office, which in so many ways he so ably occupies, that he will depart from this attitude of coming in here to justify error and will feel free in appropriate cases to say, "I conceive this to be wrong and I shall write a letter to the magistrate concerned and draw it to his attention". He might send him a copy of Hansard, with all the remarks, for his persusal in the midnight hours.

One further thing—an observation that attaches to this court as well as it attaches to all the others in the hierarchy, in the trial side —I would hope, in 1968, that we might, at an early time, depart from this business of the prisoner's dock, being a relic of a past age.

In saying that, I want to make it perfectly clear that I have no undue sympathy for those who live their lives skirting the line between lawful conduct and the unlawful. I realize there is that element in our society who, through choice or other reasons, have embarked on a life of crime. I say these things out of no maudlin sentimentality for that group. But I am also conscious of the knowledge, that in our magistrates' courts, of the people who come in there, the overwhelming majority of the people are those who are there on one occasion only in their lives. They come into that court—that 95 per cent that my friend from Downsview speaks of—in reference to one brush with the law and having completed that and got the decision of the court, that is it. Those who keep returning are a very small minority.

Accordingly, it should follow that the atmosphere of our courts and especially the magistrates' courts should be as consonant with human dignity as we can possibly make them, so that the person coming in is dealt with in the way that human dignity demands, in an atmosphere that is the optimum that we can make, and he goes away with a feeling that he was dealt with fairly.

Now the one thing that detracts from that, to me, is the inhuman practice of putting the prisoner in the prisoner's dock. That was all right back in the 15th or 16th century, where the criminal did not have many rights to start with, and was usually presumed to be guilty in the inquisition that was conducted. But not so today. A great number of people who go into our courts and have one brush with the law, walk away with an acquittal in their favour, and certainly they must look back in retrospect. If they are bundled into the prisoner's dock they must feel they are being treated as something less than humans.

I am speaking of the fact where, throughout the trial, the prisoner is segregated and kept confined in the dock with a guard at his side. I can recall in a case where I had to be quite vociferous to the trial judge to persuade him to make the guards take the manacles off. They wanted to keep the fellow manacled throughout the trial.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): It is hard to make the jury believe he is not guilty.

Mr. Sopha: It is difficult. Oh yes, and the focus of the jury on this person with he guards around him gives the impression of guilt from the very outset. Why would it be too much of a trend toward republicanism —with which the Prime Minister (Mr. Robarts) would shudder—if we allowed the prisoner to sit at the table with his counsel throughout the trial where he could readily instruct his counsel.

They could be in constant communication, the one with the other. During the course of the trial many situations arise in which the counsel needs immediate instructions. He needs to consult with his client, as the story unfolds, and he has to get up very conspicuously and he has to walk the number of steps over to the prisoner in the dock and carry on a conversation which attracts attention to him, and to the accused. No doubt the jury is sitting there wondering just what the nature of the communication is between them and are they making all sorts of unfair inferences.

So really, in this enlightened age, I do not see that we have, in order to secure justice, to perpetuate this archaic method of handling the accused. A great service would be made to the administration of justice if we did away with it at a very early time. I feel that that manner of treating the accused is rather connected with a lot of the majesty and trappings that have surrounded our courts. They are far too many, and they lack utility. They are the relics of a bygone age, and I completely agree with my friend from Sarnia about this Alice in Wonderland atmosphere of the sheriff coming in with that sword and the tri-cornered hat, and mouthing these words that no one understands. What do they call it? Oh, yes "The sittings of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery," and all that mumbo jumbo; of course, it is completely lost upon the spectator.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): If the hon. member is discussing magistrates' courts, this is completely irrelevant, because we do not do that in magistrates' court. That is British custom.

Mr. Singer: You are so sensitive.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Do you want an insensitive Minister of Justice?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am just saying it is not relevant to this item of my estimates.

Mr. Sopha: It is not entirely. There was a retrograde step in the magistrate's court taken —it may have been during the tenure of this Attorney General; certainly, if not in his time in office, in that of his predecessor—in that magistrates came to be gowned. Now they wear the flamboyant gowns in presiding on the bench. It always seemed to me, and perhaps I am far too pragmatic and utilitarian about this, that the real atmosphere of the purveying of justice flows from the quality of the person who dispenses it.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not angry. I just want to ask the hon. member if he would permit me, through the Chairman, to ask him when he goes into Supreme Court, does he wear his gown and his tabs?

Mr. Sopha: I do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do you wear your QC gown?

Mr. Sopha: I have no choice.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member for Sudbury has the floor.

Mr. Sopha: But we have people in the benches of the law society—Joe Sedgwick, for example—who would have us wearing wigs if he could get away with it. He would go back to wigs. I want to get rid of all that and I am completely up to date with my friend, the member for Sarnia, in drawing attention to it. In a modern society, I would think, Mr. Chairman, I plead with the Attorney General who is very progressive in some of his ideas, I am merely making the point that the modern outlook is that you do not need this mumbo jumbo, you do not need it. You do it by quality. We live in a world where we are dedicated to excellence and if we have excellent people on the bench in magistrate's court they do not need all this folderol to help them. So we are talking in terms of improvement.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I am going to sell tickets to this.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): You would not sell any.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: I am going to sit down before I tax the patience of the House, but before I do, I want to go back to the earlier part of my remarks and I just want to refer to them. The Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) was not here and I want to acquaint him with what I said.

Mr. Chairman: I would remind the member that repetition is out of order.

Mr. Sopha: I do not want to be repetitious.

Mr. Chairman: I am sure the member does not.

Mr. Sopha: And if I am—did somebody ask the Premier what happened back home on Tuesday?

Mr. Chairman: I am sure that has nothing to do with magistrates.

Mr. Sopha: I want to ask the Attorney General—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: In the light of the statistics that I put on the record, what explanation does the Attorney General make of those truly alarming differences? I have not compared Ontario with any other province in the country but if we can take one—Ontario is 7 million—take Alberta, for example, which at 1.4 million is one-fifth the population of Ontario; the figures for Alberta show 16,291 convictions as against Ontario's 56,290. I want to know, what is the explanation?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: One-fifth of the population.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): As a matter of fact, Alberta is worse.

Mr. Sopha: They are worse, yes, they are worse. All right, let me return to the—

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Let us forget about that one.

Mr. Sopha: All right, let me return to the Quebec figures.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sopha: All right, let us put it this way. Supposing, accepting that Alberta is worse but returning to the Quebec figures, what is the explanation of the alarming difference between the number of convictions—56,000 in one province and 15,000 in the other? The population of Quebec is four-fifths that of Ontario, but Ontario has four times the number of convictions. Then the other side of the statistics that I recited: As of March 31, 1967, three times the number of people in our houses of correction, provincial institutions only, as there are on the same date in the province of Quebec. Well, here he comes, QC.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of difference in the manner in which jurisdictions compile their figures. One in particular—

Mr. Sopha: The figures supplied allowed for that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I am offering this explanation and it might help the hon. member. If he does not want it that is fine and I will sit down.

There is another matter. The province of Ontario for example, in its correctional system, has clinics for the treatment of alcoholism and many magistrates use the conviction method of getting them into these alcoholic clinics which they do not have in other jurisdictions. I say that generally, and over all you will find that where there is a more affluent population, there is a much larger percentage of people consuming hard liquor. This is one of the facts of life. I do not want the hon. member to feel that I do not agree with him that too many people are being sent into correctional institutions. I agree with him generally in this respect, and I, too, would like to see a lot fewer being convicted, particularly for drunkenness.

But he was bringing in the matter of using the statistics. They are really not comparable for at least the three reasons that I have given.

Mr. Sopha: That is not what the Dominion bureau of statistics indicates. I wrote especially to ask them for their figures, and pointed out to them that apparently in some provinces, there are convictions under municipal bylaws which we do not have in Ontario, and asked them to very carefully winnow those out of them so that the figures would not be distorted. So they took time to consider and sent me the list, and from what they say in their letter I must infer that they were looking for comparable statistics. Now, I accept the explanation offered by the hon. gentleman, but I was disturbed at him relating it to the drinking of hard liquor because he stands on dangerous ground, if he starts to talk about affluence and drinking hard liquor, the Marxist over here will say that you are discriminating against the poor.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with a couple of points made by the hon. member. He started out by basing his argument on the proposition that the Legislature is supreme over all other forms of government. It is indeed. With this I will agree. He went on, using that as his premise, to argue or submit that supremacy as the highest court in the land gave the Attorney General or any department, or the government, the right to interfere with the independence of the judiciary. The Legislature is the highest court in the land. It is supreme in the sense that it may make any law within its jurisdiction that it wishes. It may change or repeal any law that is found within its power to be dealt with. It therefore is the highest and the supreme lawmaker in the land.

Mr. Singer: Where do you find the law? In the Attorney General—

Mr. Chairman: Order. The Attorney General listened very carefully and quietly. Surely you can afford him the same courtesy.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But when the Legislature makes one of its laws that says that the court or the judiciary shall be independent or shall be operated in such a way, and a magistrate shall not be removed except for misbehaviour, or inability to perform his duties, that does not mean that the Legislature or that a department of government, in its supremacy, can interfere with the law that it has made itself. If it wants to interfere with the judiciary, if that is what my friends opposite are arguing, then it must pass a law saying that when a magistrate's decision does not suit the government, or meet the approval of the Attorney General, then the Attorney General can do such and so.

But when the Legislature makes the law in its supremacy and says that the judiciary shall stand apart, and shall not be interfered with, then the Legislature itself must abide by that law until it changes it. We have been very jealous all through our history to keep the judicial arm away from the control of the government, and for the hon. member for Sudbury to go on and attempt, I think, to delude his listeners and to delude the public in saying that that gives the Attorney General the right to interfere with the magistrate, is either intellectual dishonesty or he is guilty of fallacious reasoning.

Mr. Sopha: Not all, I am not saying any such thing.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Either one or the other.

Mr. Sopha: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I cannot let this pass unanswered. I am not suggesting any such thing at all. I am not even talking about interference with the courts. I refer to the fact as an extreme case; in an extreme case the Lieutenant-Governor in council passes the necessary order-in-council to set up a committee of enquiry as they have done in the case of these two magistrates. But this suggestion is far short of that. The Attorney General might exercise some supervisory jurisdiction in calling it to their attention.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What is the point of order?

Mr. Sopha: That is the point of order, that you are distorting what I said.

An hon. member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Sopha: All I am asking you to do is to draw to their attention errors of judgment and minor infractions in the conduct of the courts, that is all. I am not talking about passing laws.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, not on a point of order but in the spirit of this debate, let me say this—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But this is not a point of order.

Mr. Sopha: Now do not distort what I say.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member went on to say that, because the Legislature is supreme, the Attorney General has the right, the government has the right not to defend the magistrates but to discipline them.

Mr. Sopha: I did not say that at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, you did not use the word "discipline" but to reprimand them, to scold them, to tell them where they are wrong.

Mr. Sopha: That is a good word—scold.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, quite.

Mr. Singer: Is that a point of order, Mr. Chairman?

An hon. member: No, it is not a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Attorney General wish to speak on a point of order concerning the member for Sudbury?

Interjections by hon members.

Mr. Sopha: I do not think you listen.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, I listen.

An hon. member: The member for Downsview is very plain.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He said the Attorney General is the defender of the magistrates, the defender of their errors. I simply say as I have said before and I will say again, I would not interfere with the judicial independence and their decisions.

Mr. Bullbrook: You say they are right but they are wrong.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: When they are wrong they may be appealed from.

An hon. member: You are talking about gold-diggers; talk about simple people.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order.

An hon. member: He is out of order.

Mr. Singer: He is not out of order at all.

Mr. Chairman: Order, the Attorney General has the floor. Any interjections are entirely out of order. If the member wishes to enter the debate he will rise and address the chair or raise a point of order. The Attorney General.

Hon. Mr Wishart: When they are wrong in judgment they may be appealed from. When they are wrong in conviction they may be appealed from. When they are wrong on sentence they may be appealed from. When they are wrong, even on the matter of bail, their assessment of bail or fixation of bail, that may be appealed and the Attorney General has no right to interfere in those matters. This Legislature gives him no right. The law that the Legislature passes determines his rights and his powers as well as those of the judiciary.

To say that the Attorney General is the defender of the magistrate—I would only say this, that the recent actions of the Attorney General in attempting to maintain a respect and proper administration of justice in his dealings with magistrates, I think, should answer that accusation. I agree that the courts are subject to criticism and they receive wide criticism by the public, by the press, by members of this House and by all of us, I think, but there is a proper place where we deal with their judgment—

Mr. Sopha: May I be allowed to ask some questions?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Sopha: Let me pose a set of circumstances. Supposing one of your servants out in the province informed you that he had become aware that a magistrate was trying people in his chambers without the presence of the Crown attorney, that he adjudicated the case in his chambers—something that conceivably could happen—and he asked you for advice, would you go to the Prime Minister, would you go to the Premier and say, "Look, let us appoint a committee of enquiry", or would you yourself get on the phone or have your deputy get on the phone to the magistrate and say, "Look, this is most improper and it must stop"? Would you not do the second? If you would, then you are doing what I suggest you ought to do.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Before the hon. member asked the question, which I shall answer, Mr. Chairman, I was coming to the point of saying that we have numerous occasions, quite numerous occasions, where through the Deputy Attorney General and particularly through the chief magistrate—who is appointed for the purpose of conveying our sentiments, our views, our critical comments to the magistrates—this is done. Through the chief magistrate we have quite a number of occasions where we have had to ask him to convey to a magistrate our views that such and such a conduct was perhaps not in keeping with the way that his court should be run.

Mr. Sopha: Why did you not tell us that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, this is the first opportunity I have had.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, do not give us that story.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have been listening for two hours to these critical comments and it is the first opportunity I have had.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Nonsense, I asked you that this afternoon.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, one only has really—one should only have—I did not realize the hon. members did not know that one of the functions of the chief magistrate, the purpose of his appointment was that he was our man, not a sitting magistrate.

Mr. Sopha: "Our man".

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Our official to convey our views to the magistrates, as we have a chief Crown attorney and as we have a chief judge of the county and district court to express our view to that body of the judiciary over which he is the chief. We convey our views to him on frequent occasions and he passes them down and has interviews, goes and visits the courts, observes the conduct and conveys our views to the magistrates.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I am not—

An hon. member: You are reckless.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I am not going to worry—

Mr. Singer: You are not going to worrry?

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not going to worry about the views of the members for Sudbury and Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Why do you not say what you are doing?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. The Attorney General has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You are going to lose your QC tonight, as sure as anything.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not going to worry about these quibbling semantics.

Mr. Singer: We are going to take him away—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not like to interrupt the hon. member for Downsview if he has something more to say.

Mr. Singer: You do not want to interrupt but you do.

Mr. Chairman: Go on.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not going to concern myself with what interpretation the hon. member for Sudbury places on my expression. Our man conveys our views to the magistrates over which he is the chief. But I do point out that we do this frequently and continuously. That is one of his main functions, to supervise.

Mr. Sopha: I am a reasonable man, but you come in here and defend him unreasonably.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will defend their position, I will defend their independence. When I feel that they have downgraded or impugned the administration of justice then you will not find me defending them.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman I have a series of quotations tonight. It is unusual for me to resort to this kind of tactic in addressing the House but I refer at the moment to a quote from G. K. Chesterton in one of his books in a chapter called "The Twelve Men" in which he describes the jury trial through the eyes of a layman:

> And the horrible thing about all legal officials, even the best, above all judges, magistrates, barristers, detectives and policemen, is not that they are wicked—some of them are good—not that they are stupid—some of them are quite intelligent—it is simply that they have gotten used to it. Strictly they do not see the prisoner in the dock; all they see is the usual man in the usual place. They do not see the awful court of judgment, they see only their own workshop.

And I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that G. K. Chesterton could have had a better example in mind than the system of administration of justice in the province of Ontario. I do not think that any one of us on this side of the House would accuse the Attorney General of being wicked. I do not think that any one of us would accuse the Attorney General of not being intelligent. I think our accusation is that he has gotten used to it. He has become accustomed to defending the status quo and this is the most heinous sin of all. He has become accustomed to being the apologist for all that goes on in our courts.

He has to defend a Bigelow, he has to defend a—well I will not go on through the list of six or eight or ten magistrates whose names have been brought before this House. He feels that it is his duty to defend them. Surely, Mr. Chairman, in this day and age, the Attorney General would have gained status, he would have enhanced the opinion of the people of Ontario about this government if he said, "I am sorry, occasionally a magistrate makes a mistake." And surely he could have said that, when a magistrate makes more than one mistake, when he makes two or five or ten or 15, "Somewhere along the line it is my responsibility as the Attorney General and as the Minister of Justice to do something to see that he no longer continues to be able to make a series of mistakes."

Surely it passes the bounds of realism and the bounds of a sense of administration of justice to insist that they are the government, and everyone else is lesser than being part of the government. Surely there comes a point, Mr. Chairman, when the man who is charged with the senior position of law enforcement in the province of Ontario should say, "I am going to try to do better." No one is accusing the Attorney General of being a man who is lacking in integrity, or honesty or diligence. What we charge him with tonight, and I think it is a very valid charge sir, is that he tries to defend people who are indefensible. He tries to say that we do have a system of justice that is equal for all of the people in Ontario, when in fact it is not equal. Some people are more equal before the law in Ontario today than others. This is the charge of which I think the Attorney General is accused.

We are not accusing him of venality; we are not accusing him of dishonesty; we are accusing him of lacking the ability to stand before this House and say, "On occasion, some of my officials have made a mistake." I do not believe, as the Attorney General does, that all of these men are beyond complaint, that all of them are beyond condemnation.

On occasion, when the member for Sudbury or the member for Sarnia or the member for Lakeshore or the member for High Park brings before this House an incident, regarding which with justifiable evidence, ordinary people can say something has gone wrong with our system of administration of justice, we would expect that the first person on his feet would be the Attorney General of the province of Ontario to say, "I agree; magistrate X has made a mistake and I condemn him."

We are not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General has a task of removing arbitrarily anyone who says, "I am not a Conservative, I am not a Liberal, I am not an NDP supporter." We are suggesting that the one feeling that should come out of this Legislature is that the Attorney General should be the man of justice in this province and I just do not get that concept of him. He is the defender. He is the defender of the establishment and this is the thing that sits badly with all of the people of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: Magistrates' courts? The member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Some of us come from areas where there are a great many French-speaking people in the ridings and we also have a unilingual magistrate. Many of the people who come before the magistrate's court get confused; they do not understand the directions and so on. I understand that this government is moving in the direction of bilingual magistrates and making use of French in the magistrates' courts. I wonder if the Attorney General could report to us what progress has been made, and when we could look forward to bilingual magistrates' courts in the ridings where there is a large proportion of French people, possibly 40 to 50 of the people in my riding would be French-speaking. I wonder if he could give us some idea about that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We are aware of the situation, particularly in the northern parts of the province, and we have sought and have appointed a number of magistrates who are bilingual. Certain of the proceedings in their courts may be conducted in French at the discretion of the magistrate. By the law of the land, by our criminal law, if a transcript is required it must be produced in English and until that law is changed we are not at liberty to transgress it. But we do everything possible and there is always, of course, the interpreter provided where that is necessary so that no one suffers by reason of the fact that the presiding magistrate may not be able to understand the person. If they speak any language—any one of several languages—an interpreter will be provided so that they may have a full hearing and full understanding if they cannot understand English in the court.

A number of our Crown attorneys and a number of our magistrates in northern Ontario are bilingual. I am not certain but it seems to me that I have heard of some courts where all parties—the magistrate, the Crown attorney, and the accused person and the witnesses spoke French and the proceedings were so conducted. I am not certain of that, but I believe this has happened occasionally. I think that is all I can say to the hon. member. I could get him further detail on it if he wished.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sarnia addressed the chair.

Mr. Bullbrook: Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the Bigelow incident and I do not want to dwell unduly on it. In my opening remarks I mentioned at length that incident. Now I read again into the record the concluding remarks of the hon. Attorney General in connection with that incident. He said as follows:

> The magistrate in these cases acted completely within his jurisdiction and in accordance with proper principles which he applied with proper reason and understanding.

The question I put to him right now is, does he still subscribe to the statement he made at that time?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, at the time the hon. member—I am not sure whether he asked that question at the time or not—I was asked a question in the House about the conduct of Magistrate Bigelow, I answered it and my answer stands. It is in Hansard. Now this is twice that the hon. member for Sarnia has read it into the record, so I think it is pretty permanently inscribed on the records of the House and I certainly do not intend to change it. I see no need to speak further because at the time I answered the question I read the section of the code which gives the magistrate discretion to weigh the matter and decide whether he should allow time or not.

Mr. Singer: But only after he has heard the argument.

Mr. Sopha: Only after he has heard the evidence.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: So I spelled it out by reading the section of the code. I interpreted it as I thought it should be interpreted and I make my answer the same.

Mr. Bullbrook: If I might, Mr. Chairman, at that time you read to us section 694 (4) a, b, and c. You did not read subsection 5, which I read into the record last Thursday night which places an unequivocal responsibility on the magistrate. It says, "He shall listen to representations by the accused." It does not say "he may". Sir, the point I make is this and really, I recognize we are all at the end of our line in connection with this, but I think in fairness that we must say this. We must have some direct response to this. My understanding of your responsibilities, and I do not always agree, really, with my colleagues, and I do not always agree with you, either, but really you could have done one of three things in connection with this incident. You could have sat silent. There was no responsibility legislatively on you to make any reply at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But I would not.

Mr. Bullbrook: You might not and perhaps I think the better of you because of that. I do; in fact, I think the better of you because of it.

You are a man who will not sit silent. You put forward your position. But secondly, you could have had that man in and discussed his position with him. In effect, Mr. Chairman, what you have done, as I said the other night, is to become an apologist for this man who was most blatantly wrong.

The only time that it really came to my attention was when I sat in my living room at home in Sarnia and read your release, which I was fortunate enough to get. I read those final words that he acted with proper reason and understanding. Does reason mean rationale? Does understanding mean compassion? I suggest to you they mean nothing of the kind. I suggest to you, most respectfully again, you are wrong in law, and secondly, there was no necessity to become an apologist for a magistrate who was blatantly wrong.

Mr. Chairman: On the magistrates' courts, the member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, I have two very short and poignant matters I am sure. Before launching into them, may I say that there are many strange diseases among the human race unknown to medical science. However, I discovered one of these diseases while sitting in the House here this afternoon. The disease in question has alternative names, Mr. Chairman. One of them would be called logomochia of the larynx, and in the alternative it could be called diarrhoea of the diphthongs. To whom it applies let it apply.

The questions are short and poignant in this matter. Do not fall into the disease now; stay away, innoculate yourself against its advancement. I would like to know what impact, if the Attorney General feels there is any, what impact—

Mr. Chairman: Order.

Mr. Lawlor: —what impact the legal aid scheme had upon the magistrates' courts in this province. Have you been obliged to expand the number of magistrates under an increase in allocation of legal aid, or what effect has it had, if any?

The second matter that I would wish to bring to your attention has to do with a trial which came before the magistrate's court. This was reported in the Globe and Mail of June 11 this year. An 18-year-old lad, his name is not important, ias been in custody for seven months awaiting the hearing of an appeal to reduce his sentence, because the court reporter has not transcribed the proceedings at the youth's trial. The report goes on:

> When it came before the Ontario court of appeal, Mr. Justice Arthur Kelly, head of the three-man court, suggested that the Attorney General's lawyer, Gordon Hachborn, bring some pressure to have the court reporter quickly produce the transcript. He went on to say, "Perhaps some court reporters might probably be summoned before this court for contempt,"

This arises out of your duties in the administration of justice, touching not only this court, of course—the magistrate's court—but others also. This is a particularly blatant example of the activities of court reporters and how they are carrying on their responsibilities. Seven months this lad has been sitting around locked up because he could not obtain bail, and because of some court reporter. The trial lasted 30 minutes. That is far shorter than it takes my friend from Sudbury to hiccough and you would think they would be able to get it down properly. Is this common or what is the role of these court reporters?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, to answer first the question of the impact of legal aid on the magistrates' courts. We have felt it to some degree, but not to any great degree. We have increased the number of magistrates. I believe the number now is five in total—more than existed at the time the legal aid plan came into effect. We are watching the cases and the length of hearings and the impact of the plan. As additional magistrates are required, we appoint them. Of course, I am hoping that the new Provincial Courts Act, which has been passed, will be proclaimed shortly and I would hope to make most of the future appointments under the terms of that Act. The impact of legal aid has not been sudden or overwhelming in any way.

The case of the unfortunate lad who was kept in custody for so long awaiting appeal because the evidence had not been transcribed, was never brought to our attention until it came to the attention of the court. As the hon. member has pointed out, Mr. Justice Kelly quite properly, and I think, if I may say so, very rightly reprimanded those responsible for the situation and that was the first we learned of it. I would say this: Had the situation been brought to our attention we would have acted as we do in cases of this kind and seen to it that there was no delay, that the reporter attended to his duty.

I have here, as part of our report on the matter, a letter to the assistant Deputy Attorney General, Mr. Russell. It is dated June 20, 1968, and the reporter writes, and I think I should read this into the records:

Re Regina vs. Noelle J. Braeole

Dear Sir:

The above mentioned is the appeal that was mentioned in the press about a week ago. I am now able to inform you the evidence was completed last Monday and picked up by the lawyer, Mr. Burke, on Tuesday. It is most unfortunate that these matters do not come to my attention before the zero hour, so to speak, so that I could arrange to keep the reporter out of court to transcribe, and if that did not produce the desired results, I would not hesitate to bring the matter to your attention.

The counsel for the accused only spoke to me the day before the appeal was to be spoken to in the court of appeal, which was too late for me to do anything.

Since the introduction of legal aid, the criminal fields have increased considerably, as well as the court sittings, and I would respectfully suggest consideration be given to increasing our staff. Thank you for the two reporters you sent for temporary relief. They are in court every day relieving other reporters who are loaded with transcription work.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

This is the senior county court reporter, Mr. Gordon McCowan who gives us this word.

I would just point out that from the content of that letter, it is apparent that that lad had a lawyer. He was represented by counsel and it would appear, and I think this is fact, that the lawyer did not apparently order the transcript—the letter does not use the word "order," but he said he was notified of the need for it just a day before. He only spoke to me the day before the appeal. I take it he was spoken to and asked to have the evidence. Even if it only took a few minutes in court, I think that was too late for a responsible counsel to leave a request for the evidence. I do not think these things occur frequently and if they do and are brought to our attention, we are prompt to act.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Is it not a fact, Mr. Chairman, that when you file an appeal you must file proof from the court reporter that you have ordered the transcript?

Mr. Sopha: That immediately struck me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is right. As hon. members know, you must file proof that you ordered it. But you know what that means.

Mr. Ben: It means that you ordered it and the Attorney General knows that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The Attorney General knows more than that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: I would point out that only one member may have the floor. The member for Humber wishes to ask questions?

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General says he knows more than that, and I say, according to your ruling yesterday, we have to accept whatever the Attorney General says.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member wants to know, I will tell him.

Mr. Chairman: Is the Attorney General on a point of order?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I guess he does not want to know.

Mr. Ben: I want to discuss something.

Mr. Sopha: Do not leave this, he wants to tell us.

Mr. Ben: Does the Attorney General want to answer? I think that we know that the Attorney General erred in his supposition. Of course he did, because every lawyer in this House—and as my friend here said to me, perhaps everybody except the lawyers ought to leave here tonight, and just let the lawyers fight out these estimates—knows that part of the rules of practice are that you must order the evidence and produce a letter from the court reporter to the court that the evidence has been ordered and you are awaiting it.

Mr. Sopha: That gobbledygook in the letter does not mean a thing.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, all last evening and most of today, I have been troubled by something that arose out of what the hon. member for High Park drew to the attention of the Attorney General yesterday. That is the letter he read here about the ostensibly different sentence received by a person pleading not guilty.

The hon. member for High Park looked at it from one point of view and it may be that he missed the other point of view. He took the attitude that those who plead not guilty, and are found guilty, receive a higher sentence than those who plead guilty. Whereas it could be that those who plead guilty receive a lower sentence than those who plead not guilty. It could be that the ones who plead guilty receive a lesser sentence, because all the facts touching their offence have not been brought to the attention of the court.

Not being a lawyer, he may not appreciate that, at least in the jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Toronto area, if a person pleads guilty, usually the Crown simply recites from what is called his "dope" sheet or confidential instructions to the Crown as concisely as possible the facts relating to the offence. And in most cases—

Mr. Sopha: It is a real comedy to watch that too.

Mr. Ben: —because the accused did plead guilty, and he is, in essence, accommodating the court, whether one wants to look at it that way or not, they minimize the offence which took place. Whereas where a person pleads not guilty, the police have to bring forth all the evidence that is at their disposal. And I saw that take place, Mr. Chairman. And this may interest the Attorney General, I was in Oakville magistrate's court about a week or two ago where they have a new Crown attorney, formerly with the RCMP, connected with prosecutions. There the sentences are considerably higher for certain offences than they are in this area.

Mr. Sopha: That does not surprise me.

Mr. Ben: The difference there is that this particular Crown attorney in Oakville—and I do not think this is proper, Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Attorney General will understand why—when informing the judge of the circumstances of the case, went through the whole "dope" sheet and he said, "Mr. So-and-So, a witness, would have said—" and then he would recite a series of facts. Then he would go on, "Another witness, Mr. So-and-So, would have said this or that." I think that is a very dangerous procedure to follow.

I could not interfere there because I was only a counsel waiting to hear my case called, but in essence, he was guilty of giving hearsay evidence, because we do not know whether in fact those witnesses would have said what was on the "dope" sheet. They may have had second thoughts about it and come to the conclusion that they did not see what they reported as having seen and what the "dope" sheet says they saw. Furthermore, there would be someone to cross-examine or contradict the witnesses. So now we are caught in this position, that in one instance, because all the facts do not come out, a person receives a smaller sentence than he would have received or could have received if the magistrate was aware of all the circumstances.

On the other hand, if a person pleads guilty, in many instances he admits his guilt and he wants to expedite his trial. He does not want all the facts to come out because it would paint the picture blacker and make him look blacker in the eyes of his fellow citizens in the community. So where do we draw the line, Mr. Chairman? Somewhere we must draw the line because it is making justice look as if it is not equal, when, on the one hand, a person pleads guilty to careless driving and he receives a $100 fine, and in the next case, a person pleads not guilty to careless driving and there is a hearing and he receives $150 fine or maybe a week in jail. Obviously, it denigrates justice. People do not understand these distinctions. They say there are two laws, one for the rich and one for the poor, one for the pleaders of guilty and another one for the pleaders of not guilty.

Should there not be some rules of conduct to govern the Crown attorneys so that when a person pleads guilty there is a certain type of evidence that is adduced? Perhaps you might follow the system of giving a summary of what all the witnesses would have said, although that again is a dangerous precedent. But something must be done so people do not rise and intimate that there are two forms of justice.

Mr. Shulman: I am sorry, I must rise on a point of order. There has obviously been a misunderstanding of what I said yesterday. What I was objecting to was not the fact that the person pleading not guilty received a greater sentence; what I was objecting to was Crown attorneys threatening a person if he pleads not guilty, they will ask for a longer sentence. This is the point I was objecting to.

Mr. Ben: I think, with respect to what the member for High Park is saying, perhaps he did not read his letter with the due care and attention that he probably gives to a patient. I think what the Crown attorney said was: If the man pleaded not guilty, he would not raise objection if the counsel suggested a sentence of only three months.

Mr. Shulman: And he went on—

Mr. Ben: He said if he pleaded not guilty that he would have to ask for the proper sentence.

Mr. Chairman: Can we get back to—

Mr. Ben: So in one instance he would be carrying out his function and in the other instance he would be neglecting to carry out his function properly to the benefit of the accused. So I do think, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General ought to give some consideration to the circumstances raised by the member for High Park, so that it does not appear, as it would appear from that letter, that there are two forms of sentencing and that the Crown attorneys are in a position to sway the magistrate, because that would go against the grain of what the Attorney General said: that Crown attorneys neither win nor lose. So I think something must be done in this regard.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make a remark about this letter read by the Attorney General in the matter of appeals, and put on the record what I conceive to be the accurate procedure. I am sure the Attorney General does not understand this branch of procedure in the court of appeal. I must come to that conclusion, having listened to him.

What happens is that when an appeal on a criminal charge is made to the court of appeal, you must take in with your notice of appeal a certificate of the court reporter that the evidence has been ordered and filed, they will not accept notice of appeal without it. Then after that, the only communication with the court reporter is to nudge him along so that he will complete the evidence. Any communication between counsel for the accused and the court reporter to delay the evidence would be most improper. I would be surprised if the inference to be drawn from that letter is that. You see, I am rather resentful that when I make a point out of personal experience, it so frequently causes an exchange between the attorney and his deputy that provokes great humour in the Attorney General. One does not like to be laughed at.

I make the point that any communication to delay the evidence would be most improper and I cannot understand McCowan's illusion that "defence counsel only spoke to me that day before" about this evidence. The duty of the court reporter, after the evidence has been ordered from him, is to exercise due diligence to complete the transcript. There is no necessity for communication with the court reporter. Having completed the transcript, notice is given to the appellant, that the evidence is completed. It must then be paid for and it must be filed in the court of appeal, a copy delivered to the Attorney General who is responding on the appeal, and that is it. It has nothing to do, as Mr. McCowan says, with a communication on the day before. Mr. Justice Kelly properly reprimanded them, because apparently due diligence had not been exercised in completing the transcript of evidence in this case. Now the one group that fools around with transcripts is the Attorney General's department, in the ordering of them.

Not long ago, months after a case had been disposed of in the high court, a person went to jail for 30 days, and he had served the sentence. The matter was put away, he had rejoined his employment. He was once again in society. Suddenly, across my desk, came a notice from the registrar of the court of appeal, "that the evidence in his case had been completed, and would I send my cheque for $116.30, and the evidence would be sent to me." I was rather astonished at this, but when I discovered what had happened was that the Attorney General's department, long after the case was completed, had ordered the evidence. No doubt it was a collector's item with them. They wanted it for the archives or something. Having ordered the evidence, I got the bill for it, and they asked me to send my cheque in. I suggested that they bill the Attorney General, and maybe in his estimates he can find the money somewhere to pay for it. I hope he got that evidence. I hope it is in a suitable place in the library. Maybe they are collecting a dossier on me. I do not know. They want all my cases in there, maybe. I will never know what the reason for that was, that they ordered the evidence in the case. I will tell you the name of the case so they will not be scrambling around, Regina and Dionne.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Was the client not released while you appealed?

Mr. Sopha: I was not appealing.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What did you want the evidence for?

Mr. Sopha: I did not want it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Who ordered it?

Mr. Sopha: You did.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We got it.

Mr. Sopha: I got the bill.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You did not pay it.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, I did not pay it. I said, "Sue the Attorney General." You have the evidence; I have not even got a copy of it, so I merely say this—it is indicated what the Attorney General has said in reference to this case raised by the hon. member for Lakeshore. That he is totally misinforming and misunderstands the way these things work in the court of appeal in relation to the ordering of evidence.

Mr. Chairman: Juvenile and family courts.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, we are not through with magistrates' courts, yet. I do not know about the error that somebody sent to the member for Sudbury, who happened to be on the defending counsel. I do not know that I need to discuss that. Errors of that type can happen, and perhaps the Attorney General's office did order the transcript for some reason or other to observe it and this is done not infrequently.

On the question of the ordering of the transcript on an appeal, I am sure, I am certain, that the hon. member for Sudbury and the hon. member for Humber and the hon. member for Downsview and any other lawyer who has any practice, knows that it is not at all infrequent. In fact, it is very usual for the counsel to speak to the reporter and say, "I am going to appeal. I will be needing a transcript of evidence." He gets a certificate that that has been done, and many, many occasions he says, "Now do not hurry with it." This is right.

Mr. Sopha: My goodness!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, you are not shocked?

Mr. Sopha: I am indeed deeply shocked.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not give me that. You know very well, that quite often it is said: "You do not need to hasten the preparation of that transcript." This happens very frequently; it is done quite often. I know it and I am sure that my friends know it.

Mr. Sopha: I want to assure the House without equivocation that this is the first that I have ever heard of this practice. I have never heard of it. I have, of course, never prosecuted an appeal that it did not go forward bona fide with the intention that the appeal be heard. I have, on many, many occasions, heard from court reporters that they were deluged with work and they were not able to get around to the transcription of this particular case and they apologized for not being able to provide the transcript.

I will tell you what I have heard of in the magistrate's court in Toronto, and that is that people who are convicted of impaired or drunken driving and lose their licences automatically under The Highway Traffic Act, arising out of the conviction, file a notice of appeal in the county of York for a trial de novo, with the intention of not prosecuting it, knowing that the county court of York is so deluged with this kind of work that it will be a long time in the future before it will be heard.

But, of course, being a country, boondock, yokel type of lawyer, we hear of the esoteric practices that happen in Toronto that do not occur in the boondocks. It has always seemed to me one of the fortunate things about living out in the broad expanse of this province that many things that apply in Toronto do not apply out there, to our benefit and betterment.

Maybe, in that sense, there is a different law in Toronto from the other areas of the province.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Now the hon. member for Downsview must get 15 minutes for rebuttal.

Mr. Singer: I am going to get the floor—

Mr. Sopha: For one thing, and in that connection I am not trying to be frivolous, it is well known that the system of legal aid in the province worked fairly well in the boondocks and it served those unable to provide counsel. Where it broke down was here, in Metro Toronto and Ottawa and some of the larger centres. But as a result we had to revamp the whole system because when something goes wrong in Toronto in the administration of justice, the whole system has to change to accommodate Toronto. That is not always to the good.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Perhaps the good lawyers are out in the boondocks?

Mr. Sopha: Maybe they are. Good ones like the Attorney General, and the Chairman of the House.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Mr. Sopha: There are some good ones in Toronto, too, such as my friend from Downsview. But I would say finally to the Attorney General that if he is aware of this going on in the court of appeal, then it is certainly his duty to put a stop to it. I am not at all certain that knowledge of the practice by any person who uses or misuses the court of appeal in that way, is not a proper case for report to the law society.

Mr. Chairman: You are out of order when you reach this point.

Mr. Sopha: We are reverting to the very thing raised by the Attorney General.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Sudbury has opened up a very good avenue for discussion. One of the things that we have failed to recognize in our whole system of administration of justice is the difficulty of being able to cope with the technological advances that we have made in transcribing or inscribing of the words that are spoken in the court room onto a record and the processing of that record so that it is made available to lawyers and superior courts.

As this technology has developed it has been very difficult, if not impossible in recent years, to do the job efficiently and promptly. Certainly in the metropolis of Metropolitan Toronto — apologies to my colleague from Sudbury—the task of attracting to the occupation of court reporters bright young men and ladies who are prepared and able to transcribe the records promptly and accurately, and being able to transmit them for use in appeals at a later date, is a difficult one. One of the most serious delays in the processing of appeals, and I am surprised that the Attorney General did not point this out earlier, is the inability to provide the transcript of evidence that has to go forward in an appeal.

Somewhere along the line I would have hoped that the Attorney General would have been able to say—either as a result of the technological advances that we have been able to make in the province of Ontario, in Canada, in North America, in the world—that there are new techniques which will allow the processing of transcripts of evidence or records of what has happened in the lower courts to make them available for the superior courts by a better method than now exists. Unfortunately this is one of the hurdles that has faced lawyers who are anxious to proceed on to appeal and that is the delay in this supply of evidence.

This has resulted on many occasions and in the incarceration in our jails of people who are placed there pending the hearing of an appeal. And I would have hoped that the Attorney General, with all of the facilities available to him, would have been able to tell us either that he has evolved a system of attracting to our judicial system a group of young people who are anxious and eager and able to participate in the profession of being court reporters, or he was able to advise us that the new technological advances have proceeded to the stage whereby we could produce the report by other means than transcribing by written hand of the efficient and skilled court reporter. Or that he has evolved some other system which would enable us to process this kind of legal procedure—a most important kind of legal procedure—more efficiently and more capably. This is one of the matters really, that does not just touch on our criticism of the efficiency of our judges or the efficiency of our administrative procedure or the efficiency of our sentencing procedures, and that perhaps one could describe as a mechanical matter. But it is a most important mechanical matter, and we are unable today, insofar as my experience indicates, to produce either a sufficient core of capable court reporters who are able to turn out reports with speed and alacrity and accuracy, which are available in a reasonable time to the superior courts, or to provide an alternative means as a result of our technological advances to replace this. I would hope that the Attorney General, being the Attorney General of an advanced province as he is, would have been able to tell us why this delay has to continue and perhaps become aggravated.

I am sure he is aware that there was a threatened strike of court reporters. I do not know if the strike actually took place. It took place maybe for a day or two here in Toronto. The reporters who were serving the special examiners, went on strike and lo, and behold, our whole court procedure had to be packed up. Eventually the special examiners—the people who went on strike were not the special examiners, they were the reporters for the special examiners—arrived at a settlement with their reporters and the judicial process continued, but the strike lasted for those few days here, and it was not too long ago here in Toronto. The whole procedure of the courts packed up because we were unable to produce examinations for discovery and all the other transcripts that are so important to our legal process, because there was no one to transcribe them.

Hopefully with all of the facilities available to the Attorney General, he should be able to tell us, perhaps now, that there will be some new system evolved either for replacing this manual process by new technological advances, or that there would have been some system evolved for training new court reporters who would be available and anxious and eager to do this job that is so important to the whole administration of justice.

Mr. Shulman: I would like to make a suggestion from my own experience with the different courts, that perhaps there is a solution to the problem. The problem, as I understand it, is that court reporters are overwhelmed with work. They are busy during the days in the courts and they find difficulty in getting the transcripts produced as rapidly as is necessary. We ran into the same problem with the coroner's office, and solved the problem to a large extent by going over to a tape-recording machine. I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that perhaps the solution in the courts would be to use tapes.

Tape can be duplicated in three or four minutes and you could have a certification from the court reporter that this is a certified copy and then the lawyer involved could have it typed up in his own office, so that he would have the information available to him. If there was no rush, of course, the court reporter could type it up, but when a transcript is needed in a matter of a day, it could be done that way very quickly. I would like to pass this suggestion on to the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I might perhaps make a brief comment here, Mr. Chairman. We have given this matter study and I do not know whether the hon. member for Downsview would be interested in what I have to say or not.

Mr. Singer: Oh yes. Yes, I certainly am.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have given this matter considerable study and Mr. McRuer has made some suggestions for the training of court reporters. We have looked at the automated types of transcription that can be used and in several of the magistrates' courts they are now in use. Some of the judges have resisted the installation of these aids in their courts. I noted when I was down in Ottawa before the national energy board that there they are using the stenomasks, which combine the person with the mask and a dictaphone type of arrangement, not the tape. The tape alone, our studies indicate, does not work satisfactorily, because it does not pick up the interjections, and that is why we have this young lady sitting here in this House—because the mechanical system does not pick up everything. You have to have a person as well. That is our conclusion and we have some plans to assist the courts by providing some good system as soon as we can work it out and get the court to go along with our system. I think that we will be able to report progress. As I say, it is used in a good number of court rooms now.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Port Arthur—

Mr. Shulman: I would just like to remark, in light of this suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that the operator of the tapes of course sits beside the tape, and if there is an interjection from some other part of the court, he can push a button which puts a little jigger in the tape and he writes down the interjection which is later added to the tape.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest to the hon. member that he should listen to the mechanical reproduction of the proceedings of the House at a time when there are six interjections at once; I do not know how they get them all. But the person speaking in the stenomask can pick up nearly all of that and get it on record if necessary.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Port Arthur.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am not a member of the exalted legal profession but I have been a member of the exalted news corps of the province for some years, and as such I have had the opportunity to sit through some hundreds of hours of magistrate's court hearings. One of the things that has bothered me has been the inequity in the punishment that is meted out for impaired driving in this province. I do not think that it is right that a person should be deprived of his livelihood for the crime of impaired driving. And yet we find that two men convicted or pleading guilty of impaired driving do not necessarily get the same punishment. I think this is contrary to the basic policy of equal punishment for equal crime.

The man who uses his driver's licence simply to drive a car for pleasure or to work will not feel the pinch as much as the man who must have a driver's licence to earn a living. I think that it is about time that we found a way of equalizing that inequity. I would like to propose that a driver who must use his driver's licence to earn his living be deprived of his general driving privilege but that he be given as a substitute a licence permitting driving only to make his livelihood. In other words, if he is a truck driver, he gets a licence that says you can only drive while you are working. I do not know whether this has been considered, but it is definitely worth it, because the law as it now stands is unjust and unfair, that one man should lose his livelihood, while another man merely loses his driving privileges, for the same crime.

I have been wanting to get up and say this in an arena where it would do some good for quite some time. I have seen it happen within my own family and with good friends, who were punished far more for the same crime, than another person who is not dependent upon the right to drive for his living. I think that this does not hold water, this business of depriving a man of his driving rights, unless you put in this equalizing factor. I would like to reiterate that I think if a man needs his licence for his living, then he should be permitted to drive for his living, but be deprived of the other general driving privileges that the other drivers are deprived of. I wonder if the Attorney General would comment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is some merit in the suggestion, but there is now, on the second half of the suspended term, the right to obtain a restricted licence. The magistrate may grant that under The Highway Traffic Act. The right is often applied for and obtained. Just to argue that because one man uses his car for work,—

Mr. Ben: Is the Attorney General not misleading the House? Is it not a fact that you can only apply for a daylight licence if you have already had your licence suspended for three months mandatory? Perhaps the Minister will correct the record?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I said for the second half, or part of the term.

Mr. Ben: What if your licence was suspended for three months?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, you can only get it if your licence is suspended for more than three months. Now, to argue that because one man uses his car in his employment and the other only uses it for pleasure, that the sentence is inequitable, perhaps in fact, the result is that it is the same sentence that is delivered by the court in the application of the law and one could use that argument to say that perhaps the professional man—if I may take a lawyer—convicted of an offence, let us say a theft, is, let us say, given a sentence of six months or a year, and a person not employed in that profession, who is employed in some other way, can go back to his employment. The lawyer is ruined as a professional man, probably for life, in that profession, so one can make out, if one pursued that line of argument, that there is no perfect equity or justice, it depends on who gets the sentence.

I do not think that you can achieve a perfect answer to that question. I do not know how one would say that you could frame a law to say that if a person uses his car for his employment he is to be given one sentence, although he was impaired, and the fellow who uses the car for pleasure only should get a more severe one. I think this would be a most difficult and impractical thing to achieve and I do not think it would be justice.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Chairman, if I could just pursue this a little bit further. I think if we checked the welfare lists in this province and find out why people are there, I think you will find an awful lot of cases where a man who is possibly going along quite well in a job, suddenly was convicted of impaired driving and lost his driver's licence for three months and thereby lost his job and did not get back on his feet again. That is just how severe this punishment is and this is why I say I think it is worth singling out—I do not care how it looks in the books or in theory or anything else—I would just like to look at it from a plain practical point of view.

It is not right to take a man's livelihood away. You take away the livelihood of one, the other you just take away his driving privilege, and I do not see where any harm can be done where a fellow is allowed to have a special licence just to do his work, to bring home his bread and butter, because otherwise you are not just punishing the driver, you are punishing the whole family, and the worst part about it is that the court, the magistrate does it in full knowledge. He knows, at the moment he is depriving this man of his driver's licence, he is depriving this man of his livelihood. He may now be condemning this man to a whole life of welfare because once this job has been lost, and the notoriety that is connected with it, he may never get on his feet again.

I know cases like this and I think the matter should be looked into very seriously and I think we should bend over a little—backwards if we can—because if a man goes on the welfare list, he is not going to pay for his crime, we are. Society is going to pay for it, and I think there should be some area of justice where we can give him a little break, at least to have his licence to do his work.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there is a great outcry which has been prevalent in our society and is growing every day, about the person who drives under the influence of liquor, who is impaired by alcohol. We have debated in this House, and it is debated in our publications, about the danger of allowing this situation to continue and we debated the question of taking blood tests.

In Britain, which the hon. member for Sudbury says is ahead of us in many respects in its approach to these matters, they have the compulsory test and they have made the alcoholic content which indicates impairment quite low—lower than we have perhaps considered thinking about in this country. I would ask the hon. member to remember that the man who drives in an impaired condition is threatening, by the use of his motor vehicle, the lives of other persons; the public are concerned. He is committing what is considered a very dangerous act.

I do not believe we are going to meet with much approbation if we say that because he uses the car to make his livelihood he is any more entitled to endanger the lives of the public on the streets and highways of this country. I do not think we can start to give him consideration in this serious type of thing when we are seeking means to prevent that sort of act being committed on our highways.

As I said before, I do not think you can distinguish between the condition of persons who come before the courts—the wealthy man or the poor man, the man in one profession or the other, or the man in one avocation or the other—and say that the one profession shall be treated differently; the man who makes his living as a clerk or a steelworker or a miner shall be treated differently from the man who makes his living as a lawyer going downtown. I do not see how you are going to draw laws to that effect, but I think that the whole matter is too serious to start letting down our approach to this very serious problem.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, if I may dwell on this matter of ability impaired for a while as it appertains to magistrates' courts. I am sure the Attorney General knows, Mr. Chairman, that there is a misconception among the public as to what the offence of driving while one's ability is impaired involves. Many people will argue with you until the moon does turn blue or to cheese that they were completely capable of operating the motor vehicle. They do not understand that a person can be convicted of driving while his ability was impaired even though while under that impairment he was still a better driver than 75 to 90 per cent of the populace.

The fact that his ability was impaired simply means that he could not drive as well in his condition as he could if he had not imbibed alcohol. There is always the possibility that a person who has imbibed, or who has even taken a test and come out with a reading of 1.5 that it is not necessarily dangerous because a person who does have a reading of 1.5, and who is, in fact, impaired according to our law as it now stands, could still be a better driver than many nincompoops that are on the road.

I challenge anyone here to get up and say that he has not had a complaint such as this, and that is that he was proceeding along—he had been drinking, but one of his lights was out—and a policeman out of courtesy, stopped him to warn him that one of his lights was out. When he spoke to the policeman, the light being out no longer had anything to do with the situation. He was now charged with ability impaired because he smelled of alcohol.

When you get into court the policeman will repeat those magic words, "Your Honour, his speech was thick, his eyes were glassy, he smelled heavily of liquor and he was unsteady on his feet." You cannot beat that combination, it is like abracadabra poof.

An hon. member: Like presto chango.

Mr. Ben: That is the magic word; you just cannot beat it. The policeman will get up and say, "Your Honour, his pupils were dilated." I do not see how they could help but be if they had the guy in dim light, because normally if you put a person in dim light it is natural that his pupils will dilate. If you put him in strong light the opposite effect takes place, and I have never known the police to turn a spotlight on a person to check to see if his pupils were dilated or not. They give you these tests of touching the finger to the nose and it strikes me that very often he will get up there and say, "He was expert with his left hand but he was no good with his right hand," or vice versa. One would suppose that if his ability to touch his nose with his finger tips was impaired, it would be with both hands.

Mr. Sopha: No. no. That proves he is left-handed.

Mr. Ben: Well, if he could touch it with one hand, then there might possibly be some reason why he cannot touch it with the other hand. Perhaps the other hand does not have as much dexterity. But it does not make any difference; as long as he made an error with one hand, the policeman is happy.

Unsteady on his feet? The poor guy may have been working all day. I recall one instance where, in an appeal by way of trial de novo, while a policeman was giving evidence of these tests, the counsel for the accused asked the policeman giving this evidence to walk heel to toe and he could not. He asked him to touch his nose to carry out this test and he could not. Now, there was no evidence whether counsel went up to the witness and smelled his breath, or whether his pupils were dilated.

In Detroit, Mr. Chairman, the police department purchased a camera and they took motion pictures of the accused carrying out the series of tests. I think that what the Attorney General's department must do is purchase these cameras for every police department in this province. Too many citizens say, "I was able to pass the test; I walked straight, I did the turn test, I was able to pick up the coin, I touched my nose, I did everything perfectly," but he has not a snowball's chance—he has not the chance of a calico dog with elephant's legs trying to catch an asbestos cat running through a fire.

If a policeman says he could not do those tests—amen, that is it. Just as my word is no good against the Attorney General's word, according to the Chairman in this House, so the word of a citizen is no good against the word of a policeman in a magistrate's court. There must be some protection for the citizen and I suggest that a motion picture camera taking a picture of these tests and flashed on the screen in a magistrate's court would settle the argument.

As a matter of fact, in Detroit, they have found out that many citizens, when they were shown films of the tests, simply pleaded guilty because they said, "Oh, my God, it cannot be me." They also appreciated how they did look to somebody else's eyes in their state of intoxication. So it has a two-fold purpose. It would protect the innocent and it would teach the guilty a lesson.

I would suggest very strongly, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General give consideration to doing this. I suggest that the Attorney General's department do that because there are many small departments who cannot see their way clear to purchasing these cameras and that is why we suggested it be done by the Attorney General's department.

I could say that in a city like Metropolitan Toronto, perhaps the metropolitan police department could supply its own cameras for certainly it would be a safeguard of the accused's rights. I would also say with reference to the breathalizer tests, may I have the comments of the Attorney General now?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am interested in the remarks. All I can say is that I will make a note of it and take it into consideration. It is a new thought to me, quite frankly.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask the Attorney General, for those of us reading the press, who cannot understand what is going on, what the situation is in Great Britain right now in respect of the application for the extradition of Myer Rush?

An hon. member: The what?

Mr. Chairman: The matter has been returned.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not obstruct. Why should there be obstruction? It is a perfectly legitimate question.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Under the debates of the supply committee, we are dealing with The Department of the Attorney General, magistrates' courts, and the member is suggesting that there should be no restriction and that we should permit any sort of a question. I rule the member's position entirely out of order. Magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: I want to rise on a point of order, now and respectfully draw to your attention that vote 207 deals with the administration of justice, including the prosecution of the criminal law.

Mr. Chairman: We are dealing with magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: Well, the vote—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Sopha: Can I not appeal to your good sense to permit this question under this vote?

Mr. Chairman: I do not see how in the world it can possibly come under the magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: It deals with the administration of justice in the province. The Attorney General was about to reply when you successfully intervened to prevent him.

Mr. Chairman: Not with magistrates' courts.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, may I ask how much money has been allowed in the estimates to pay the fees of the counsel in Great Britain who is acting on behalf of a government department of Ontario in the matter of the extradition of Myer Rush who is a fugitive from the magistrates' courts of the province of Ontario? May I also ask what progress this counsel, who is being paid by the money of the taxpayers of Ontario, is making? Now do not tell me that is out of order because it deals right with this topic.

Mr. Lawlor: It is completely out of order.

Mr. Chairman: It has nothing to do—

Mr. Ben: That is what I am asking. That is exactly what I asked. How much money is being allowed in these estimates for that?

Mr. Chairman: That is entirely out of order under magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: Presumably, when he gets here he is going to be tried in a magistrate's court. He is a fugitive from a magistrate's court. Is that not so?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He is a fugitive from the high court of justice.

Mr. Sopha: He has absconded his bail in respect to the charge now pending in a magistrate's court. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I prefer to respect the ruling of the Chairman, much as I will be glad to answer the hon. member. I think that is fair and proper.

Mr. Ben: You think the ruling is right?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Certainly this has nothing to do with magistrate's court.

Mr. Chairman: I do not think it is up to the Attorney General to indicate whether or not he thinks the Chairman's ruling is right. In the opinion of the chair, the member for Sudbury asked—

Mr. Ben: The Minister is the servant of this House and should advise the Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please! Surely to goodness the members will at least recognize the fact that there is a Chairman and when he is trying to straighten out a matter of order will they surely let him attempt to do so.

Mr. Sopha: Could I make this suggestion, that when we finish all the items and we get down to the end of this vote, which is probation services branch, before the whole vote carries, any questions outstanding in respect of the vote—the administration of justice in the province—might properly be asked as long as they are not repetitious.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): No.

Mr. Sopha: I will go even further; I say to my good friend, the Minister of Tourism and Information, through you, that I am willing to qualify it—as long as they relate to matters not heretofor raised.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Yes, but you were not here—

Hon. J. A. C. Auld (Minister of Tourism and Information): Mr. Chairman, Myer Rush may become a tourist; we will go back to my estimates.

Mr. Sopha: We cannot allow that to pass, that interjection of the Minister of Energy and Resources Management.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: What is the point of order?

Mr. Sopha: I am now raising a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The interjection is entirely out of order and there can be no point of order on—

Mr. Sopha: Yes, it was scurrilous; beneath the dignity of an hon. member.

An hon. member: Nonsense!

Another hon. member: Also a Minister of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Was I wrong in my statement?

Mr. Chairman: As far as the Chairman is concerned, I have ruled that the matter introduced by the member for Sudbury does not come under this estimate, magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: You did not respond to my query which I most courteously addressed to you. Could it be raised at the end of the vote?

Mr. Chairman: No. This point was raised earlier in the session, in committee of supply, whether or not questions of this nature could be left until the end of a particular estimate. The Chairman quoted the authority and ruled that this was not in accordance with the rules of the House and that we would take the votes in order as we came to them. So if it does not come under magistrates' courts, I see no reason or no manner in which it could be introduced at the end of the estimates.

Mr. Sopha: All right. Let me just say this again. As I understand it, Myer Rush presently is a fugitive from a magistrate's court, where the Attorney General properly wishes to bring him. Now, is that not a sufficiently cogent connection with the voting of money for magistrates' courts in order to raise this query?

Mr. Chairman: I do not see how it has any relation to the general operation of the magistrates' courts.

Mr. Sopha: What they do in the courts is certainly relevant and one of the things—

Mr. Lawlor: You can get it under vote 210.

Mr. Sopha: Vote 210, yes.

Mr. Chairman: If there is a place in the estimates in which it may be discussed, the Chairman would like to assure the members I do not want to restrict it but surely we can keep order—

Mr. Sopha: How about vote 210?

An hon. member: Police commissions?

Mr. Sopha: He escaped from the police.

Mr. Chairman: I ask the Attorney General if there is any place in the votes beyond magistrates' courts wherein this matter could be introduced properly?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, my opinion would be that the only place this could have been raised properly was in the vote on criminal law division which was vote 206.

Mr. Sopha: Crown attorneys allowed him to escape?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. As the hon. member knows, I am quite willing to answer but I want to abide by the ruling of the Chairman. He has asked me where it should be asked, I tell him in my opinion, vote 206.

Possibly vote 211—the provincial police. I do not know whether we could relate it there but possibly we could. I hope we can get there tonight, to that vote, you might get the answer.

Mr. Chairman: In other words, the Attorney General has indicated that there is no place properly other than possibly under the criminal law division where the matter might have been raised. Now if the member would just permit the Chairman to proceed.

I recall that last evening the member for Sudbury did put a point to the Chairman whether or not he would restrict the debate on vote 206, which is the criminal law division. It seems to me that in view of the Chairman's suggestion last night that he would not restrict anything that properly came under vote 206 or vote 207 as long as it was not repetitious, perhaps it could be permitted.

Mr. Sopha: Fine. Thank you very much. Could I ask the Attorney General to inform the people of Ontario just what is happening in respect of this application before the courts of the United Kingdom?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that our approach was to seek to bring Myer Rush back here with proceedings under The Fugitive Offenders Act, which is akin to the extradition proceedings between foreign countries—between countries that are foreign. The matter has been adjourned until July 15. I read in the newspaper today that Myer Rush is in custody, having been unable to raise bail.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, just one point on this matter since it has come up. I note in the newspaper that Mr. Rush offered to return voluntarily and the Ontario government refused this. May I ask why?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: He only offered; we did not refuse to have him come back. We were glad to have him come back but he only offered to come back if we would withdraw our proceedings and we did not feel that we had quite enough security in his word to accept that proposition.

Mr. Pilkey: Mr. Chairman, I would like to get back to the question that was raised by the hon. member for Port Arthur. On this question of an employee losing his job because of court action. I think that it goes just a little further than the question of taking a licence away from an employee who is employed in the trucking or in the driving industry.

In many cases, in my opinion, workers in this province are placed in double jeopardy because of the implication of the sentence that they may receive in a magistrate's court and not just the question that the hon. member raises here. In some cases an employee or a worker is found guilty of drunkenness and given seven days in jail and his job is in jeopardy there, too. He does not show up for work. He cannot show up and so his job is in jeopardy and in many cases he is discharged, where a person with a more serious crime could receive a fine.

Not only does he have to pay his debt to society as we know it under the law, in addition to that, there are many areas where he loses his employment because of it. I know of many cases where employees have lost their jobs.

It seems to me that there should be something done in terms of the law in the province of Ontario, where there are implications or complications involved when a person is given a jail sentence. I think this is the point that the member for Port Arthur raises. I would think that if the law was going to be meted out on some basis of equality, then these implications should be taken into consideration. Because I do not think firstly, that these employees or these workers should be placed in this position of double jeopardy. I have got no brief for people that are driving in an intoxicated fashion, because many lives are lost in this province and there have been some very serious accidents because of people driving in an intoxicated fashion. So, I have no brief for that, but, by the same token, I do have some compassion for those people that find themselves, as I pointed out, in a position of double jeopardy.

I would think that this province, through the law, ought to be taking some position or some action to protect the jobs of the employed. Because, as I have said on previous occasions, in this House, it is not only the worker that suffers because of this crime or the jail term or the fine that he receives, but it is also his family. His family suffers and so that if there is some area of compassion that can be used, and at least preserve the worker's equity or the citizen's equity in terms of his job, then we ought to be looking at it.

This government should be looking at that aspect of it, not relieving him of the penalty that he has to pay to society. I think that he owes that debt and we all have to pay it if they are found guilty. But by the same token I think there ought to be some areas where his job is preserved.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, I was looking through some notes that I have, for I too, was, for a while, engaged in the same occupation temporarily as my friend from Port Arthur.

I had occasion to do a little editorial on this question of sentences. I quite appreciate what my friend from Port Arthur and the hon. member for Oshawa are trying to say. But they must, however, keep in mind that at one time suspension of a licence was not mandatory. But the number of offences involving the use of liquor, and then the subsequent driving of an automobile, and the injuries and deaths resulting for such operation, came to such a scandalous number, that the law had to be changed and more strict sentence imposed; not just for the protection of the public, but also for the protection of the family of the operator, in that, if he got killed, his family would suffer.

It is quite true that the family might suffer if the man goes to jail, or if he loses his licence, but they suffer a lot more if he kills himself by driving while his ability was impaired. In Detroit for instance, a jail sentence was mandatory—the first time the person was convicted while ability was impaired. In Sweden if you have a blood/alcohol reading in excess of .5 per cent you go to jail.

Now that may be a strict penalty, but in this little talk I gave on radio, Mr. Chairman, I also pointed out that in many instances, sending a person to jail punishes his family in society more than it does the miscreant. I suggested at that time, that perhaps what we ought to have is weekend jail sentences. In other words, the accused, when convicted, could be sentenced to spending so many nights and/or weekends in jail. If he got a 60-day sentence, he spends his nights in jail and in the morning he leaves the jail and goes to work and in the evening he comes back and goes to jail. He could do that over a weekend and this way he is punished. His job is preserved. His family still gets their bread and butter. He is still a breadwinner. He has got some respect among his children. He is still earning their bread and butter and they are not on welfare.

The Attorney General should give some consideration to permitting magistrates to hand out sentences of incarceration—overnight and during the weekend.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member will permit, has he read the new Correctional Services Act? If he reads the new Correctional Services Act which was proclaimed July 1, two days ago, he will find that just as soon as the federal government re-enacts the legislation which died with the dissolution of the federal House under Bill C195, this is precisely the kind of an operation which we will have in Ontario.

Mr. Ben: I am aware of that but would point out to the Minister of Reform Institutions that The Correctional Services Act will not automatically bring this situation into being. It is predicated on certain other legislation being passed in other jurisdictions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It would have to be—

Mr. Ben: No. The Attorney General here, I think, could give the lead to the magistrates to impose such kind of sentences.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, would not the hon. member agree anyway that magistrates do not have the machinery to go into the background of persons before them being charged before them. Whereas the correctional services branch would be set up for this sort of thing and be able to judge the background of a person and whether he in fact could be trusted with this sort of a programme, and so on. This is precisely what is planned under the new Act and I hope the hon. member will read it in detail. We hope that the federal government will re-enact this just as soon as they meet and perhaps have this under way before this year is out.

Mr. Ben: I could not care a tinker's damn, Mr. Chairman, who exercises this function, provided it is done—whether it be part of the correctional services or the Attorney General's department or The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs or The Department of Health or The Department of Transport. For me, it is immaterial, as long as it is done.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, the point I was making, Mr. Chairman, is that provision has been made in our legislation, but we must have federal approval.

Mr. Ben: It is permissive legislation providing something else is done in another jurisdiction and maybe it will not be done for years.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sure that the hon. member realizes that we cannot deal with a federal offence in the type of sentences given —and impaired driving is that—we cannot do that as a provincial jurisdiction without the federal legislation to complement and permit it; that was what the bill in the federal House was going to allow when the House was dissolved. I feel confident they will get back at it and do it very quickly when the House is resumed, but the province has no authority to start tinkering with or amending, federal legislation, which is the criminal code, that makes this offence and which affixes the penalties. We have no jurisdiction to touch that, unless we have a permissive act from federal jurisdiction.

We could do it with a provincial Act with a provincial offence, but only within that jurisdiction. That is as far as we can go.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, on that point I appreciate that you cannot legislate in the field of criminal law, but the suspension of a person's licence upon conviction for certain driving offences is a provincial penalty. It is not a federal penalty. The suspension of a person's licence for operating a motor vehicle while one's ability is impaired is a penalty that is imposed by The Department of Transport, not by the federal government. This is what gave rise to this discussion, a statement of my colleague from Port Arthur, pointing out that a person who depends for his livelihood on his licence, is, in the words of the member for Oshawa, "in double jeopardy." Now there are many instances, and many driving offences where the penalty imposed is a provincial penalty; failing to report, careless driving.

I am suggesting that it might be possible in instances of convictions for driving while one's ability is impaired, or for other offences where The Highway Traffic Act provides for the suspension of one's licence, to empower the magistrate to impose a sentence of overnight imprisonment in lieu of suspension of licence, where the person who holds the licence depends on it for his livelihood. This is the point I am trying to make. Now, I may be wrong. The Minister of Correctional Institutions wishes to make a comment. I am listening with both ears.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Correctional Services.

Mr. Ben: Correctional Services.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, I am glad I walked in at this stage, because it gives me an opportunity to explain to the hon. members some of the implications of the new Act which I think still are not clear to some. We could have in The Correctional Services Act provided for some of the things we want to provide for those people who are convicted of provincial offences. But we deliberately did not do this because one of the problems we have had—and the hon. members will recall some of the instances; for example, the difference between statutory remission in the federal system as against the lack of it in the provincial system. We did not want to provide for two different types of inmates, perhaps even in the same institutions.

We have that problem now in respect of, as I said, the statutory remission, where you have two people coming up before the same magistrate. One gets two years, and one gets two years less a day, and there is a great deal of resentment on the part of the inmates, a great deal of hostility, because one feels that because the other person got one day more, he serves four months less, because of the difference in statutory remission.

As a matter of fact we just had some recent trouble in the last couple of days at Burwash. One of the reasons given by many of the inmates was this dissatisfaction between the way the person, in a sentence to a federal penitentiary is handled, as against a person in a provincial institution.

So we did not want to provide for a different type of programme for a person who is sentenced to an institution because of a provincial offence, as against one who is sentenced to an institution for having committed a criminal offence against the federal criminal code because that would even intensify the problems that we have now in a particular institution because of the difference of treatment as between inmates. What the hon. member is suggesting would provide precisely for that. Not only would it continue an already untenable position that we have to maintain, but it would make it even worse.

I think it would be much better if we waited for the federal government to re-enact that legislation, and let us handle it in the correctional services branch so that we can deal with them all in the same fashion. I hope I have made my point clear.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member for Port Arthur brought up a very valid point concerning the conviction of an individual for impaired driving and losing the right to earn a livelihood. Now, that individual may never drink on the job. It may be a truckdriver or some other person operating some type of vehicle. He may never drink on the job, but in the evening he goes to a party, gets drunk and is caught, and as a result loses his right to drive for some stated period of time.

Mr. Attorney General, in your own office, if some employee came to your office impaired you probably would warn him; the second time you may fire him, but if you met that same individual at a party somewhere and he was impaired he would not lose his job, would he? The individual now driving a motor vehicle is denied the right to drive again simply because he happened to be impaired in his off hours. There should be some consideration in legislation to permit the individual to drive during his working hours, and deprive him of the right to drive in the off hours. In other words, give him a limited privilege so that he could still earn a livelihood. A man may have a record of never having drunk on the job, and simply because he was trapped once now he is penalized for a period of three months or for six months. Some consideration should be shown. I hold no brief for these fellows who are caught for impaired driving while under the influence of alcohol. I think that the penalty should be severe. The case that the member for Port Arthur brings up, Mr. Chairman, is very valid. Here the fellow has his livelihood taken away. You have punished his family. You have punished everyone, when you punished the individual. Some consideration should be shown so that the person could still maintain his source of livelihood, and that is the driving privilege.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I see the merit in the points being put forward by the hon. member for Oshawa, and the others who have spoken on this, and we will take it under consideration to see if there is some approach that might be made to it, but I would just point out that a few fallacies exist, I think, in some of the remarks that have been made.

The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville says: "You meet him in your office, or you meet him at a cocktail party and if he is impaired he would not lose his job." He said, "Because he is found in that condition in his off-hours he is convicted." Now, it is not because he is in that condition in his off-hours. It is because he is driving what becomes in his hands in that condition, a dangerous weapon. That is what it becomes. That is why he is convicted. For the protection of the public. For the protection of himself. That is one point I would make.

The other is that with every person—the thief, the burglar, whatever the crime for which he is incarcerated—you punish his family too. You deprive his family of his society. You prevent him from working. Everyone who comes before the bar of justice and is convicted for a crime, a great many people suffer along with them, particularly his family, his relatives, his friends and so on, and particularly those who depend upon him for a livelihood, so that while I realize that, I think the point here is that this is a more common offence today and it touches particularly the people, because the motor vehicle is a necessary implement of employment in so many walks of life. I have noted the remarks of the hon. members, and I would like to study and see what approach might be made, if there is an approach that is possible.

Mr. Pilkey: Mr. Chairman, I am not just talking about the situation of an employee or worker losing his job because of the lack of opportunity to have a driver's licence, because you raised the question of theft and many other crimes, and those same people find themelves in double jeopardy as well because they lose their jobs. Let me give you an illustration—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is right, I would like to consider it.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: That is the risk they take. If they want to protect their job they should not run the risk of throwing it away.

Mr. Pilkey: All I am pointing out is that, okay, so a fellow gets a term—seven days—and he is working in the auto industry, as an illustration; his job is in jeopardy. I know what will happen to him; he is going to get a removal notice.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Well, he should not have gotten into trouble.

Mr. Pilkey: But he is paying his debt to society, he has paid his debt to society and now—

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He cannot have jam on both sides.

Mr. Pilkey: In other words, you put him in jail and incarcerate him for a period of time and then you take him out and string him up. I mean, you are going to hang him after that. It is worse than the crime that he was incarcerated for and the penalty that he pays to society or his debt to society. And then in addition to that, he is denied his place of employment.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He denied himself his place of employment.

Mr. Pilkey: What does the Minister mean, denied it himself?

Mr. MacDonald: The Minister sounds like Leslie Frost. Anybody who gets into jail deserves it.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: He does not have to get in jail.

Mr. Pilkey: Well, we are not suggesting for a moment that he should not serve the term if he is guilty, all we are saying is that the law ought not to put him in double jeopardy. You say that he put himself in jeopardy, but he is paying his debt to society; why should he in addition to that be denied his place of employment? And you could find someone with the same crime in a different court in front of a different magistrate who gets a fine, and he can report back to work on Monday morning. Nothing happens to him. It is only the fellow who is incarcerated, who is put behind bars who loses his job. And it is not only the crime of drinking; it is any crime, and he could lose his job.

Obviously, through representation, a great number of them get their jobs back but there are still people who lose their jobs. All I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, to the Minister is that there should be a study made of this to see what all of the implications are. I do not think the employers in this province should have the opportunity to take unilateral action by saying, "Okay, you were seven days in jail, now your job is gone." I just do not happen to think that that is fair.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, if I may, this was provided for in the new Act. These things will be taken into consideration. If I may just read sections 18, 19 and 20 of the new Act:

> Where in the opinion of an official of the department designated by the Lieutenant-Governor in council for the purpose, it is necessary or desirable that an inmate be temporarily absent from a correctional institution for medical or humanitarian reasons or to assist him in his rehabilitation—

Which I might say parenthetically covers a great deal—

> —the temporary absence of the inmate may be authorized by such official on such terms and conditions as he specifies.

Subsection 2:

> Any inmate temporarily absent under subsection 1 shall comply with such terms and conditions as are specified and shall return to the correctional institution at the expiration of the period for which he is permitted to be at large. And if he fails to do so, and so on.

This is precisely the situation we are thinking about. If, in fact, a man can be trusted to go back to work on his job and we can make arrangements with his employer; if it is felt that it is better for him to be employed, this is precisely the arrangement which will be made.

He will, in fact be on some sort of parole. This is what is envisaged in this Act and, of course, as I mentioned, when the Act was discussed in the House, it is going to be put into effect. We are studying it where it is in effect and when we are able to get this legislation. This is one of the clauses which we have not proclaimed awaiting the federal legislation on it, and this will cover the situation, I think, that the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Pilkey: I just want to point out some of the things that go on in this province in terms of people who are charged. There are employers in this province, when an employee is charged, before he is found guilty, he is suspended from his job; he waits until the court adjudicates that charge and if he is found not guilty he gets his job back, but if he is found guilty he is gone. But there are employers in this province—and this is a fact—and some of the biggest employers in this province who have just let their employees go.

I am not suggesting that the Minister can do anything about that, but I just make this comment, that it is even over and above the question of being convicted. I make this point because everybody in this province thinks that most of the employers are holier than thou. Let me tell you that there are many conditions existing that many of the members of this House do not know about. And they need correcting.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Nobody is holier than thou.

Mr. Ben: It is quite true that many employers fire employees for drinking, but nowadays there are many firms—the Bell Telephone Company is one of them—which have special departments to handle the serious alcoholic problems that are experienced amongst their employees.

I thought I would just rise to applaud the firms which are broadminded enough and are up with the times to realize that drinking now has become a social problem. Alcoholism is more of a disease than it is a crime, and they are taking the trouble to keep alcoholics, not just drinkers but alcoholics, on the staff and trying to set them on a straight and narrow path.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to pursue this at great length but there are many consequences flowing from the administration of justice, which may stray from this estimate but which, I join with the plea of my colleague, the member for Oshawa are worthy of study. He has cited what happens to employment opportunities of convicted.

In another context in this House, if I may just mention it in passing, in the instance of car insurance, I can cite you a chap up in the Downsview area who was charged with impaired driving and his car insurance was cancelled. When he came before the court, he was exonerated, he was acquitted. He never got his insurance back. He was blackballed by the insurance company. This is the kind of thing that sometimes goes on and the ramifications that flow from a court decision, or something that is going to come before the courts.

However, Mr. Chairman, what provokes me to rise—and I do not want to get into an argument with my fellow Scot—is the philosophy implicit in his comment, "The man was himself responsible for getting in jail and therefore let him suffer the consequences.

I say to this government and to the Minister of Health, that this is precisely the kind of outmoded philosophy that we have to attack.

When the hon. member for Sudbury puts on the record the scandalous number of people that we jail, as compared with many other jurisdictions, surely in our own interests we should look for more compassionate, humane ways to deal with a person who is guilty of an offence before the law, other than the automatic throwing him in jail. We have made a move in that direction with probation, but we have not gone as far as we should. If you compare the figures in Great Britain—I have not looked at them for some years – but Great Britain had fewer people being put in jail with a population that was eight or nine times the Ontario population. So the probation, or some alternative to putting a person in jail, is the sensible approach if you really want rehabilitation of a first offender, or anybody who has not become an habitual criminal.

Mr. Chairman: Juvenile and family courts?

Mr. Singer: No, Mr. Chairman, on this vote before you get too much further, I just want to ask one very simple question. There was a fellow named John Campbell, who was an official of the Ontario securities commission; he was acquitted at his trial. There was an appeal, a new trial was ordered. I just wondered if the Attorney General could advise us what the present status of the prosecution is?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That appeal is pending in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Singer: It has gone on from the court of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Singer: So there is no determination as yet as to whether or not it is going to be tried?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is pending, yes.

Mr. Chairman: Juvenile and family courts.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the representation that has been made by the Elizabeth Fry society to the hon. Attorney General in relation to the juvenile age limit. I think it has been well put by the society itself and I wou'd like to read their letter into the record, because I think that they have a very legitimate point of view. Perhaps the department has made an error in not listening to their representations.

On February 28 of this year, Mrs. Ruth Bruce, president of the Elizabeth Fry society, wrote to the hon. Attorney General as follows:

> It was with distress that we read in the newspaper that your department is not in favour of raising the juvenile age to 17 years as recommended by the draft Children and Young Persons Act proposed by the federal government.
> In the work of the Elizabeth Fry society, our case workers are convinced that there is a great difference between the 15 to 18-year-old and the 18-to-21-year-old. The younger group is at a rebellious age, often acting out their inner conflicts. They are at the stage of trying to decide whether they want to be part of the downtown crowd, or to be responsible citizens. If once while in the turmoil of decisions they get a criminal record that at the present time remains with them for life, it is very difficult for them to make a constructive choice.
> In recent reports we have seen the increased costs of increased services in the juvenile courts was a large factor in your department's statement concerning raising juvenile age. It is difficult to understand this thinking. In the first place, if the person is handled in the juvenile court there will be a corresponding reduction in numbers in the adult courts. If the youngster is helped at this critical and approachable age, and does not see himself as a criminal, he is much more likely to become rehabilitated than if he is officially labelled as a criminal by conviction in an adult court, a factor which will sharply reduce the overall cost to the community. The Elizabeth Fry society strongly advocates raising the juvenile age to 18 years, and at the minimum, 17 years. We do not feel that the cost should be a deterrent.
> Yours very truly, Mrs. Ruth Bruce.

That is the end of the letter, and I would like to say that I agree with the submissions of the Elizabeth Fry society. I would like to ask the Attorney General if he would like to give consideration to the suggestions that were made by the society?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Has the hon. member got a copy of the letter that I wrote to the Elizabeth Fry society?

Mr. Shulman: No.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I thought not, because we did not say that we were not in favour of the proposal. We did not say that. We have their representation, and then the Cabinet was attended by the Ontario council of women, who put forward, as one of their proposals, this same matter of raising the age of the juvenile offender. I am sure that my colleague, the Minister of Correctional Services, will have something to say on this because it really falls mainly within his area. We took the position that there were some considerations that had to be weighed very carefully before one could implement this suggestion of raising the age.

Mr. Shulman: What?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, there are two at least. One is that your offender is now under 16, if he has not reached his 16th birthday! That group, if diluted, or infected or mixed with the 17- and 18-year-olds, leaves you dealing with a very difficult group to handle. You would have to change your programme for training. My colleague can expatiate more on that than I can. The other thing is that to bring in to the present numbers that we are dealing with, the very substantial numbers that would accrue from the age extension, would mean that we would not have the facilities at the moment to handle them.

It would require a new programme of construction of facilities, and a new programme to train and deal with them or rehabilitate them.

These are two of the very large problems in terms of money, effort, time, and in terms of approach of the training of the larger group of people who would come in to dilute or affect what is now a very good, and well-organized programme for our present juvenile offender in Ontario.

Mr. J. B. Trotter (Parkdale): That is questionable.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps that is the member's opinion, but I think that my opinion, or what I have set forward, can be substantiated very firmy and those that have to do with the rehabilitation of young people will tell you that the hard and tough group to handle or control or rehabilitate are those of the group 16 or 18, or older. But I would ask my colleague to add to the remarks that I have made. We set forth our position, and as I say, we were attended upon quite recently by the Ontario council of women and they discussed it with us, and I think that they understood our position and realized that, while it might be an objective to be reached when possible, it was definitely not something you could do overnight. That was the position that we took with the Elizabeth Fry people.

Mr. Shulman: It is still under study? Is this the situation?

Before you go, I would like to ask the Attorney General, if he would consider as an initial step, raising the age at which a young person develops a permanent record, by one or two years? Then these people in the intermediate age would not be labelled for the rest of their lives with a record that causes them a great deal of difficulty?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is a great deal of merit in that and we will consider it, but I should perhaps have said, when I was on my feet, that here is a programme suggested and practically laid on or originally designed by the upper level of government, the federal government. Now, while it may have great merit, to simply pass it on to the provinces, some of which have the age of 18 years as the top juvenile level, while some have 16, and if we pass that on to a province which is in the situation that Ontario is in, without any consideration of making provision for facilities, or money and time available for the implementation of the programme, would be something that simply is of the most difficult effect and frustrating nature imaginable.

If this type of programme is to be brought about, it must be on a cooperative basis, with time to plan it and with assistance. I am speaking really of things which, while they do affect my department, since the juveniles move through the courts, they, and the great problem, rests with the Minister of Correctional Services, because if the court sends them to his department, then he has the problem of dealing with and rehabilitating them.

All that I am pointing out is that it is just not something that can be accomplished by the province alone, and certainly not in a short time, because it entails those two great efforts of the provision of facilities and programmes. The hiring and training of staff to deal with them and people to deal with them and teach them and all the things that follow are important.

Mr. Trotter: How is it that other provinces do it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, well, I am sure that the hon. Minister of Corrections will deal with that.

Mr. Shulman: Just before the Attorney General passes the matter on to the Minister of Correctional Services, I would just like to stress again this one point. This would require neither preparation nor money, and which could be done by the province by a stroke of the pen, and that is to raise the age at which the record of the person becomes permanent. I would think that this could be done by the Attorney General tonight if he so wished, with very little trouble and again I would like to direct this to his attention.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a matter of federal jurisdiction, Mr. Chairman. I know it is being studied and we are being kept aware of it, but is their jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet—I gave information to the hon. member for Downsview which I find is not correct, in answer to his question. I have passed a note, that in the Campbell matter and his appeal to Ottawa, his appeal was dismissed and the Ontario court of appeal had ordered a new trial. I understand that he appealed from the new judgment to the Supreme Court of Canada, and his appeal was dismissed, and the new trial which the Ontario court of appeal had directed, will take place on September 9, 1968. Now I am sorry that the hon. member for Downsview is not in the House, but if he returns I will get this information to him.

Mr. Chairman: I would ask the member for Humber if he would yield the floor to the member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: Could I ask the Attorney General when the trial of Viola and George MacMillan will take place on the indictment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know.

Mr. Sopha: Well, that is very strange.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. Ben: If you may recall—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have just been passed a note and November 19 is the answer to the hon. member for Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: I am delighted to hear it.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber has the floor.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, you will recall, as will the hon. Minister of Correctional Services, and the Attorney General, that last year when the federal government came down with the results of its Royal commission on youth, I came out strongly in favour of increasing the maximum age of juveniles to 17. In fact, I had spoken of this matter the year before that when I was a critic of the Minister's department and even when I was on city council. I make that statement because in the interval I have made a complete about face.

Now it is very easy to just pick up reports and because they are done by the establishment, by judges and so on, to accept them holus bolus. This House, I say, has been guilty of doing the same thing with the report on education, "Living and Learning." I think that many people six months hence are going to have second thoughts on a lot of the stuff that is in there, but the fact is that we have a bad habit of just accepting as gospel, any report that comes down without the majority of us having read it.

What bothered me about this business of juvenile delinquency and juveniles, is the fact that we continue to have more so-called juvenile delinquents and I came to the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that we are making juvenile delinquents by making and keeping people juvenile. Now that may sound like a very facetious remark—it is like saying, "well, you cannot have juvenile delinquents unless you have juveniles." I say that we are deliberately creating juveniles so that we can have juvenile delinquents.

You know if you go back in history people started out to conquer the world, as it was then known, at the age of 22. Some, like Julius Caesar, started their careers earlier, at 18. The fact remains that children now attain biological maturity a lot earlier than they did at one time. My brother is a doctor and perhaps the Minister of Health may be interested in this. I picked up one of his medical journals in which an article pointed out that girls attain puberty six months earlier every decade, so that in essence, young girls are now attaining puberty two years earlier than they were at the beginning of the century.

In other words, they are ready to become mothers that much earlier, and yet our morals, our social values, say that it is improper for girls of that age, of those tender years, to be mothers.

Yet everywhere, on television, we show them pictures of family living and so on. Furthermore, we treat them as children when on the other hand we admit that they know a lot more than we did at their age. For instance in "Living and Learning," this report that came down, it said that children are now learning more about living from watching television than they are in school; they see the problems in the United States with reference to segregation; they see the poor marches; they know the results of poverty; they know all the results of war.

They do not have to be taught that the first world war was an awful thing and that people got killed, because they see people being killed in Viet Nam right now. So they are now living, you might say, in an adult atmosphere, and yet, we still treat them as children.

It is strange what the Minister, who is charged with the responsibility of looking after juveniles, belongs to a faith where they determine that an individual attains manhood at the age of 13. He has his bar mitzvah. He has been called to the law so to speak but in essence he has become an adult. So for 5,000 years, by the Jewish faith, a boy becomes a man at the age of 13. Now that applies to a woman who could do the same thing, she could become bar mitzvah.

I question, Mr. Chairman, whether we have been right in trying to repress our youth, in keeping them in a juvenile state when in essence they have matured more than we suspect. They have become more men and women than we would desire. In essence, because we do not want to sever the so called "apronstrings", we are keeping them tied to us.

We all admit that many of these co-called juveniles are now showing a much more mature attitude in the protest movements that we have; the placards that they carry. So on the one hand we applaud them for their maturity and their sense of social values, and on the other hand we say that they are children, and this is what is upsetting youth. They want to be adults, they want to act like we would want them to act, and yet we do not let them.

You know, parents have a bad habit. If a child cries, we say, "Do not cry—act like a man." If he want to do something that we think he should not be doing we say, "Do not do that. You are not old enough. A young boy or a young girl like you should not be doing this."

Is it any wonder that these kids end up with a split personality not knowing whether they are grown up or children, whether they are coming or going? I think that perhaps if we followed the Jewish concept and gave these children more responsibility and let them exercise the responsbiility of adulthood at an earlier age, I say to you that they would act more like adults.

Children, I have found, are inclined to act in the manner that you expect them to act. If you expect them to act as well-behaved juveniles, they are more apt to act as well-behaved individuals; if you expect them to misbehave, they will misbehave. A child will usually behave in a manner in which you expect him to behave.

It is easy to say that if you increase the maximum age of juvenile delinquency to 17, then the child will attain a record that much later in life. To follow that argument we can say raise it to 18, to 19, to 20, to 35 for that matter, and there will always be fewer people who have criminal records. What we want, Mr. Chairman, is not so much to prevent them acquiring a criminal record, but to prevent them from doing the act which will result in their obtaining a criminal record. This is what we are trying to achieve and I do not think that simply by increasing the age to 17 as being a maximum age of juveniles that we are going to do that.

Now as I said when the report of the Royal commission on juveniles first came out, suggesting that 17 be the top limit for juveniles, I thought it was a splendid idea and that the government was finally smart enough to start advocating what I had been preaching for years. But I have had strong second thoughts on this and I think that perhaps we have been wrong; that we have too long been treating our youth as children when we ought to have been treating them more as mature individuals who are a lot smarter than we give them credit for.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Humber made some very good points with which I agree but I will not go into the details of those because I do not want to usurp the time of the Attorney General, who has asked me to comment on some of the other aspects of the representations made by the Elizabeth Fry society and others with which I am familiar.

In the first place somebody has asked how is it they do this in other provinces. The only other major provinces that I know of who have any training school systems at all, to speak of, are the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia. In British Columbia, the juvenile age, I believe, is still 16. In the province of Quebec it is 18.

Now if one of the reasons why their problems are not going to be as great as ours under a changed system, or would not be, is that—and this is something that will probably surprise most of the members of this House—I would suggest perhaps they should go to Quebec sometime and visit the training school system generally and ask some very pertinent questions.

They will find that if a juvenile and family court judge commits a child to a training school, they have got to find a training school which will accept the child. A child could go from training school to training school and unless that particular superintendent of that training school is prepared to accept the child, he just does not get into a training school. When we tried to follow this through —that is what happens to a youngster like that, we came up against a dead-end.

One could easily imagine that training schools are not going to accept the more difficult children. So it is not really the same problem for Quebec, for example, as it is for us. We have the most advanced training school system on this continent, certainly in Canada anyway, and it would be a great problem for us.

For example, if we just accepted the recommendation of the committee, of the federal committee for age 17, let alone 18, we would immediately require at least three new training schools, which would cost in excess of $10 million, just to build. It would cost approximately that and I do not have the file before me; I have all of the information on this in my office. I think if we are just looking at these 17-year-olds, it would be an annual cost to this province of over $2 million. Now, if it went to age 18, it would cost a much larger amount—I forget what the figure is—in an immediate capital cost and a much larger figure in respect of annual costs.

As the hon. Attorney General has pointed out, this age group between 16 and 18 is the most difficult group to handle. That is one of the reasons we have problems at Guelph, because this is the most difficult group. To bring them into the training school system is going to require not only new training schools, but a completely revised system where we can sort them out in a much more elaborate manner so that they are not mixed with the younger children.

There is another ancillary problem which is added to this: While a youngster under 16 is considered a juvenile and is sent to a training school — admitted to a training school, we can retain the wardship and quite often do, until the child is 18. In other words, we feel that it is necessary to have the authority to look after that youngster well beyond the age of 16 so that he can be placed and supervised. Obviously if we get a child six months before the child is 16 years of age, there is no point in letting him out of the training school in six months — or perhaps it was a week before he was 16. So we retain the wardship for two years after. Now, if we were to take 18-year-olds, we would have to retain the wardship until they are 20. So the hon. members can see the problems involved in this.

I think as a general principle, one could argue that the juvenile age limit might be better if it were higher. I am not convinced of this. We are prepared to look at this, we have been discussing it and we have been studying it, but there are all these problems. One thing that the hon. Attorney General did touch upon, and I think needs repeating: The federal government in fact — and this is something I hope, and I am sure our government will discuss with them at federal-provincial conferences — the federal government, is, in fact, affecting the fiscal policy of provincial governments by passing if they do pass, this kind of legislation.

What is the use of saying that you have certain jurisdictions when in fact you cannot afford to do what the federal government passes what is in it power to pass? What is the use of the federal government saying that we, the provinces, control our own fiscal policy, when by the mere passing of some federal legislation — as we are in this particular case for example, where we are faced with $10 or $15 million immediate expenditure from a $2 to $5 million annual expenditure. Of course, it is important to consider these matters.

Mr. Singer: Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. What about the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I do not know that that proves anything. I am not throwing any stones. I am just suggesting to the hon. member what the problems are, inherent in this. It is not quite as simple as just saying "take 17-year-olds". I say it may be a good principle, but it takes a lot more detail and study and co-operation on the part of the federal authorities if they want to put this into effect. One should also realise that by this they would in fact be costing the government of Ontario, the taxpayers of the provinces of Ontario, a great deal more money while reducing the cost to the Quebec government. Because where their age limit now is 18, they would be reducing theirs to 17, if the federal principle were followed. And they would, in fact, require fewer training schools than they have now; and training schools are much more costly to maintain than adult institutions.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Chairman, one of the recommendations of the select committee on youth, No. 235, recommended that The Deserted Wife and Children's Maintenance Act be amended to provide for adquate enforcement of court orders. Now, under this Act there appears to be no way in which the family courts of this province can enforce their own orders of maintenance against any erring husband. As a matter of fact, a speeding sumons is given higher priority in respect to the enforcement of provisions than a family court order has for the maintenance of the wife and children. It appears that many family courts in the province seldom enforce their own orders of maintenance against an erring husband. It was felt by the committee—and I certainly concurred in this as did all the members of the committee — that once an order has been made by a family court against the husband for the maintenance of the wife and children, the court should take the necessary steps to enforce the order, if a husband fails to comply with the order.

I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General if his department has taken any steps to make certain that these orders are properly enforced by the family courts?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I have before me some figures which I might give in response to the inquiry.

Last year the juvenile and family courts collected on maintenance orders the sum of $7,139,391.87, a very substantial amount. Restitution orders – the amount collected was $23,358.01. Fines – $17,961,72. But I stress the maintenance order; the amount collected was in excess of $7 million. We have directed our attention to this matter and particularly with the impact of legal aid, the assistance of counsel – one of the things we discussed earlier today – and I think it was pointed out by the member for Lakeshore, which I can confirm, that the addition of legal counsel under the legal aid plan to the juvenile family court situation had resulted in a follow-up of the orders which are made by the court, and that much better results are being achieved.

Mr. Apps: Well, Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the amount of money that has been collected, it is not very good unless you know how much money was awarded. You may have collected $7 million, but you may have awarded $14 or $15 million.

Mr. Singer: I hope you are more constant in this than you were about Sunday racing!

Mr. Apps: Just let me look after myself and you look after yourself.

Mr. Singer: Great speeches but no votes.

Mr. Apps: I am sure that at the present time, if the court makes an order of maintenance on behalf of a wife, or her children, and the husband fails to obey the order, the wife in practice must initiate the application to the court for a show-cause summons to be issued to obtain a hearing respecting an order already approved by the court. Now this – and I am quoting from our report – leaves the deserted wife with no assurance she will receive a court order of maintenance payments or further that anything will be done by the court if such payments are not made. It leaves the deserted wife at the mercy of intimidation by her husband who has nothing to fear from a court, which does not enforce its own orders, and has only to deter his wife from asking for the issuing of a show-cause summons, and it leaves the deserted wife no recourse but welfare if her husband chooses to move about the province or the country whenever her show-cause sumons is received. The onus is again on the wife to locate the address of the husband before the court will act. In some municipalities her welfare maintenance is held up on the presumption that she has an order of maintenance from her husband through the family court. "Now, Mr. Chairman, regardless of the fact that a great deal of money is recovered, the fact still remains that a great deal of money is not recovered and that the deserted wife is left to her own resources to go and charge the husband again and again and again.

It seems to me that we should be doing something to enforce these court orders in the same way that we would enforce the speeding fine or any other fine that lapses, and I would hope that the Attorney General would take this under very serious consideration, because it creates a very great hardship on many deserted wives who are not able to collect and their husbands have no real intention of paying in the first place.

Mr. Singer: Hear, hear, hear. Very well said. Very well said.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, I would have liked to continue to speak on the juvenile and family court, but because I wanted to give opportunity to some other members to exhaust the topic we were discussing, I sat down. But it is interesting to hear the member for Kingston and the Islands rise on the question of wives not collecting from husbands because, if my memory serves me correctly, I raised the point last year and the year before, without a murmur from the hon. members. I pointed out that the government and the party which he represents had, in the welfare department, a special unit whose job was to track down husbands of deserted wives where those wives were on welfare.

Now, I complained about two things at that time. First, there were not enough funds allocated to that special unit, nor did that unit have enough employees to trace all the husbands who had deserted their wives causing them to go on welfare; and secondly, they restricted their activities to tracing down those husbands whose wives were on welfare and completely ignored those wives who managed to struggle along without going on welfare and whose husbands had deserted them. I thought that that was grossly unfair, no one on the government side at the time rose to say: "You are right, Mr. Member, we ought to have a more expanded unit, and we have got to track down all husbands who have failed to comply with an order of the family court to pay their wives and children maintenance."

I also pointed out a lot of the abuses that are permitted in the family court when the court to which payments ought to be made, or which ought to keep a record of these payments, permits these payments to go into arrears for months and months, and years. Subsequently, when the wife is really destitute — the man who thought in the first instance that his wife did not want his money, that she just wanted him to absent himself and stay away so that she could lead her own private social life, finds she comes after him for all those arrears, which she was once willing to sacrifice for her own personal privacy.

I suggested at that time that the family court, which has all the bookkeeping facilities at its disposal, and which is charged with keping track of the payments, ought, when the payments fall into arrears for one month, to summon both the husband and the wife and compel them to explain to the court why the husband was not making the payment, and why the wife was not pressing the court to have the husband come to tell the court, to give reason why he was not making payments. The payments ought not to fall into arrears more than one month without a justifiable excuse on the part of the husband of the wife. There are many reasons why the payments could fall into arrears that should not be permitted without the knowledge of the court.

Too many of them use it as a weapon over the husband. While they are doing fine they say, "You keep away from the children and me and you do not have to pay," and so he does not. Suddenly the wife needs money and she does not know where to turn and then it occurs to her that she ought to have been getting money from the scoundrel for over a year. Down she goes to the family court and a show summons is issued, the husband finds that he has got to pay $1,000 or $1,500 suddenly, which the wife rejected because she preferred her privacy to him coming to see the children and having him make the payments. I think that this is iniquitous and something has to be done about that.

Another aspect — and I had such a case — where the wife was living common law and she did not want the husband around or to come and see the children. The child had to go to see him and she did not want his money. But then she had to go on welfare and welfare, in this particular instance, mother's allowance, compelled her to go and lay a charge against her husband. She did not let the welfare know that she was living common law, or they would have disentitled her to any payment.

When the matter came up in court, it turned out that the husband had been paying her indirectly through the child. This situation would not have arisen, as I say, if the court had kept track of those payments as it ought to and had compelled the parties to give legitimate excuses to the court as to why the both of them, in essence, were disobeying the court's orders. I think that when the court orders the husband to pay so much a week for the support of his child, it is just as much the responsibility of the mother to see that the father pays as it is for him to pay. It is money for the child and the feelings of the parents in this instance are immaterial.

Another matter that disturbs me in the juvenile courts is The Juvenile Act, which reads that a juvenile shall be deemed a delinquent if he has been guilty of any of a long series of offences; is incorrigible, stays out late and so on. Now when you go to juvenile court — and since legal aid there are more lawyers going to juvenile court — you find a very funny system running there. The judge, before declaring the child delinquent does not bother to find the child guilty of the offence with which it is charged. In other words, a child may be brought up in the family court and charged with being delinquent in that he did steal a bicycle. That is the act of delinquency, but the judge does not first determine whether the child is guilty of stealing the bicycle. The attitude of the judge in family court is, or appears to me to be, that since the child will not have a record anyway, after it has turned 16, to find him guilty, because he is not going to get a record, and since he is going to give him a suspended sentence anyway, what is the difference? At least it will scare the child. That to me appears to be the attitude of the juvenile court. But getting back to that fancy report we have here, "Living and Learning". What kind of a lesson does that child derive from that particular thing? Is that child taught that we do have a system of justice? A system where everybody is treated equally before the law and that there will be a determination of whether or not you are guilty?

I asure you that that is not the lesson our tan Toronto juvenile and family court, and I speak only for that institution because I have not had any experience with juveniles in any other. One of the things that they undoubtedly learn in the metropolitan juvenile court is that there is no justice. They do not find the child innocent or guilty but they just declare him to be a deliquent because that is the safest course to follow. The judge has nothing to lose. The child does not have a record; give a stern lecture; give him a suspended sentence and who is hurt? The parents are happy, the child goes free, the police are happy because the child goes free, the police are happy because the child was found guilty; so who suffers? Nobody, except the child. And after all, what is a child? Nothing in the juvenile and family court, I will tell you.

This is on thing that must be changed. If there is anywhere that they should follow the full letter of the law and really have a court of law so that the children can in effect learn through living it is in the juvenile court. That is where you should start the education. May I have the Attorney General's comments?

Mr. Chairman: Yes, the Chairman is just waiting for the Attorney General to rise and make his comments in reply to the member for Humber.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have made some notes of the comments of the hon. member about the enforcement of orders in family court and those of the member for Kingston and the Islands. I do not think I am going to make any comment on how a particular judge operates in a particular juvenile and family court. I have noted the comments which the hon. member has made and they will appear in Hansard and I will study them again. I have no comment at this time.

Mr. Sopha: In the operation of family courts my experience teaches me that these are the least efficient courts in our system. My observation tells me that the servants of the Attorney General out in the province, those upon whom he must rely, his Crown attorneys, take indeed very little interest in the operation of the family courts. As far as I can tell, they go there on an ad hoc basis; they go to represent the Crown in the prosecution of serious offences that are tried in the family courts. But their attendance, as far as I can see and this applies to various parts of the provinces, their attendance is by no means a matter of routine. Frequently one becomes aware that the presence of the Attorney General's servants in the family court is at the request of the judge. The judge has made a request that one of the Attorney General's agents come and prosecute. So the remarks of the hon member for Kingston and the Islands might be explained by the disinterest of the agents of the Attorney General in the operation of the court.

And one is bewildered – now, here is the thing, you have to see it in this context – in the laying of information in respect of an indictable offence by a private citizen; of course, that matter comes under review by the agent of the Attorney General. He passes upon whether the information shall be laid. He reviews it. He might ask for a police investigation in respect of an indictable offence. But in the laying of information by a deserted wife under The Deserted Wives and Children Maintenance Act, there is no review at all by the agents of the Attorney General.

As far as I can tell, it is not brought to their attention. Therefore, one is bewildered ofttimes when women arrive in the office, complaining about lack of support and one queries them, "Have you been to the family court?" and they say "Yes, we have, but they will not do anything about it." I say to my friend, the member for Kingston and the Islands, that he would be surprised at the number of complaints of that nature that one gets. They decline, and frequently one has to make a personal intervention, either by a telephone call or by going up or sending someone up with the woman to the office, to insist that information be laid in the matter.

If the information is laid, you can run into another obstruction which is very frustrating. That is the reluctance of these courts to bring back errant husbands from a distance. And, indeed, at times they impose the necessity upon the woman to defray the cost of bringing him back. She is entirely without the means to send a police officer, as an escort, to bring him back from Atikokan or some distant part, and it indicates an almost detached disinterest in the enforcement of the law.

I have always been one of those who have felt a sense of futility about the lack of vigour of prosecution in that court, though I would not go so far as the hon. member for Cochrane South who used to sit here with the third party. He advocated that all husbands who failed to support their wives should be flogged with the cat-o'-nine-tails to teach them a lesson and to get them back in the path of virtue; he used to protest most vociferously here, I am told.

But certainly – and I had one occasion, to show the difference in attitude, if I may use this illustration – a husband was up at the Northwest Territories somewhere and for a long time had taken himself away from his responsibility to his family. I thought just as a shot in the dark, I wonder what a letter to the Minister of Justice at Ottawa would do. I wrote the Minister of Justice and indicated to him where this errant husband was and, by Jiminy, if he did not send the mounted police from Winnipeg in an aircraft to go up and get him from the Northwest Territories; bring him back to Winnipeg, bring him before a magistrate, incarcerate him in jail and then signal to Sudbury that they had him, in Winnipeg in jail.

That case was settled very neatly and very easily, he had enough money in the bank to pay all the arrears for several years and he just sent a cheque and effected his release. But one on behalf of these women, as my friend has pointed out here, it is perfectly correct that before they can draw welfare they are supposed to exhaust the remedies in this court that operates under the Attorney General. It is a very inefficient court, indeed, because they do not pursue with vigour, and experience teaches that if a husband is continually delinquent, if he persists in delinquency, really grits his teeth and says, "I won't pay that woman", then they tire easily; the staff tires easily of that—the husband and his perseverance—they stop prosecuting him, and the reply they make to the woman is, "Well, the prosecution does no good at all" which means, of course, that the intent of this Legislature is frustrated. In many ways, it is frustrated in the operation of this system of courts.

All right, now what is the remedy, because we always offer constructive criticism from this side? The remedy, of course, is to put an agent of the Crown in those courts, at least in the larger centres; they may have them in Toronto, I do not know. The remedy in the larger centres is to put an agent of the Crown in there, a lawyer, to exercise a general supervisory jurisdiction over the operation of that court.

Too frequently, I suspect, the operation of the court is left in the hands of people untrained in the law; they do not understand the remedies that may be available for prosecution of delinquent husbands. Frequently, they are social workers who, of course, are very expert in their own field, but totally oblivious to the procedures under the law. If the Attorney General wants to undertake some constructive reform, a good place in the system of hierarchy court to start with is the so-called family court.

The other thing that I seriously question is this business of the transference, the automatic transference, of the file of indictable offences that arise out of family relations to the family court. Invariably, the practice seems to be – and has grown up – that the moment an indictable offence is encountered that arises from the family connection, it goes to the family court for trial and that has its disadvantages. An individual, I would think, has the right to be tried in the ordinary courts of the land, the ordinary courts of criminal jurisdiction, and that automatically transfering it to the other court leads to this disadvantage. I have no doubt that human nature, having the frailty with which it is endowed, you frequently run into judges of the family court who have a predilection in favour of the distaff side of the family. I know of one, a great friend of the Attorney General, who said the woman can do no wrong. The woman's side of the family can do no wrong in a northern Ontario community, not Sudbury. Any husband, of course, who runs afoul of him in respect of an indictable offence because of his intellectual investment, his predilection in favour of the distaffs, has a small shred of chance of escaping conviction and the appropriate penalty. If on the other hand, these remained in the ordinary courts, these offences, as surely as the individuals entitled to have them tried, would not encounter the same magistrate, the same judge.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You mean a lawyer can choose his own judge?

Mr. Sopha: Oh, no. If you stay in the ordinary courts you have a choice of them. You have a choice of judges. There is a variation. Variety is the spice of life.

Mr. MacDonald: Some are good, some are bad.

Mr. Sopha: Some are good and some are bad, indeed. But once—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I did not know you could choose your own judge.

Mr. Sopha: But once you get into the family system invariably, except in Metro Toronto which I know nothing about at all in its staff, but in the other centres you have one. I say to my friend, the hon. gentleman, there is only one who always sits in that court, heavens, it is characteristic of our system of justice, is it not much heralded that the variety of judges who may try a person is one of its strongest features? Lawyers, even the judges, resist change in that regard but they want to have a panel available and, of course, it ought to be said about the juvenile courts. I make one comment in addition to what has been said, that in almost all circumstances where a juvenile faces a serious criminal charge laid in the ordinary courts – and this includes homicide, especially homicide – that charge ought to be tried in the juvenile court. There is a discretion, of course; there is a discretion in the juvenile court judge to direct that it be tried in the ordinary criminal courts and that is where we fell into trouble in the Truscott case. That is precisely where we got into the trouble in which we got. Truscott ought to have been tried in the juvenile court. I say that ex post facto, and we would not have had the mess that rose out of it. So I would like to see the adoption of a policy—my final comment—whereby in relation to serious criminal offences, indictable offences, the discretion was exercised in favour of trying the juvenile in the juvenile court and not sending him over to the ordinary court. Mr. McRuer, to cite an example, when confronted with that situation, when he had the power to intervene by way of review, indicated that invariably the discretion ought to be exercised in favour of trial in the juvenile court. It is the most humane and the most rational thing to do in respect of the handling of offences against young people.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, I have been listening with interest to what the member for Sudbury just finished saying and I do not, for a minute, question one word of what he has been saying as anything but the truth. But the fact remains that in Toronto, the complaint is diametrically opposite to what the complaint is in Sudbury.

Mr. Sopha: I said several times that I do not know what—

Mr. Ben: Yes, so that is why I got up because you know now that as we have, as I said, legal aid, there are more lawyers appearing down at the family courts; more people are represented and as things drag out so slowly down at the family court, the lawyers have a lot of time to sit around—stand around rather—leaning on the rail and discussing cases. And do you know what, Mr. Chairman? We are still trying to find a lawyer down at the Toronto family court who can recall a husband who had assaulted his wife, having been convicted in the family court.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: We just have fine gentlemen in Toronto.

Mr. Ben: Nobody can recall having had this happen in his memory and this is something that perhaps should be checked. The courts take the attitude that they do not want to pin a conviction on the husband because then he will go and clobber the wife when he gets home or the children are going to have to go through life saying their father is a criminal.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Men in Toronto do not beat their wives.

Mr. Ben: That seems to be the attitude down there. So here, in Toronto, it is different. The lawyers are fighting with the magistrate's court trying to compel them to exercise jurisdiction in assault cases because they are criminal cases, and the magistrate's court is trying to shove these so-called domestic cases to the family court.

I do agree with my colleague from Sudbury that if it is an assault case it ought to be heard in a criminal court, albeit for a reason different from the one given by my colleague for it shows that there is just no consistency in justice in this province. No, there is not, there is no consistency because my friend argued that assault cases should not be heard in the family court because invariably the court leans on the side of the wife, whereas here in Toronto, as far as assault cases are concerned, the court invariably leans on the side of the husband. So where is the middle ground? I suggest that you go back to the magistrate's court, that is where those charges ought to be laid.

Mr. Chairman: Juvenile and family courts. The member for Sandwich-Riverside.

Mr. Sopha: Well, let us go home.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: It is going to be a long hot summer.

Mr. Sopha: We are paid to make these observations.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, you are not paid that much.

Mr. Chairman: Order please. The member for Sandwich-Riverside.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Chairman, I heard the figure of $7 million for the amount collected by the family courts but I did not hear the answer as to what percentage this represented of the awards that had been made.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have not got the figure, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on juvenile and family courts?

The member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Mr. B. Newman: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will not go through the youth report and read the recommendations submitted by the committee—

Mr. Sopha: Go ahead, read it all.

Mr. B. Newman: There is no need. The Minister is fully aware of all of them, I would say.

An hon. member: You are being presumptuous.

Mr. B. Newman: Well, maybe I am presumptuous but at least, the Minister can read them for himself and for the sake of expediency I will bypass them but suggest to the Minister that he implement as many of these as quickly as he possibly can. One of them was the one that the member for Kingston and the Islands had brought up earlier.

There are quite a few others that merit serious consideration and implementation. However, in spite of all this, Mr. Chairman, we still have the problem of juveniles, and how do we overcome the problem or make the problem less serious? My own community had wilful damage of approximately $100,000 as a result of—I would not say solely juveniles—but as a result of mischievous or malicious damage. The separate school board, the public school board, utilities commission lose approximately $250 a day as a result of wilful destruction. How do we overcome this, Mr. Chairman? We find this problem becoming more serious each year. Surely, we have to come along and take the bull by the horns and attempt to solve the problem. One of the recommendations in the youth committee report was a detached worker programme.

Mr. Chairman, should you not undertake some type of pilot programme in some community in the province of Ontario, to see if we can lessen the incidents of juvenile delinquency? For example, car stealing in the city of Detroit on which I happen to have statistics: 13,260 cars were stolen in one year, 85 per cent of these by juveniles. Only 15 per cent by other than juveniles and the problem seems to be becoming more acute year by year. Surely, we are not just going to sit by, Mr. Chairman, and allow this to increase in severity. We have to come along and do something. I do not know the answer, but maybe, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General and his staff could come up with some answers for it.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Minister wish to reply at all to that?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will just say briefly, Mr. Chairman, that there are detached worker programmes and—I think one in The Department of Social and Family Services, some there and in some of the cities, in Toronto—but they are not strictly related to juvenile and family court, I think, except that we get the respect of them, at least of juvenile offences. We have attempted, through some of our police forces to create programmes and assistance and direction to juveniles. I do not know that it really lies within The Department of the Attorney General to initiate this type of programme that the hon. member has in mind, although they are good and worthwhile. I would like to say that I would consider that, but I really do not believe that I should suggest that it be within The Department of the Attorney General.

Mr. B. Newman: It would not be within your department?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I should not think that this is where it should be properly carried on, although if the government saw fit to say that this is the department for it, I think the programme is a good one to expand.

An hon. member: Usually one of the private agencies.

Mr. B. Newman: Well, Mr. Chairman, surely something has to be done with the problem. Simply by talking about it and doing nothing is not solving the problem. I do not know what department would be responsible for it but we have to find an answer to this or we are going to live in anarchy.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, I feel that the trouble is right in their own homes. There is a lack of discipline, and maybe some of the parents ought to be punished in place of the juveniles.

Mr. Apps: Mr. Chairman, one of the things that concerns me is the fact that there are many good suggestions made from time to time which really do not fall within any one department. I would hope that a section of The Department of Education with their department on youth would have someone there who could pinpoint these areas and make sure that the problem is looked after. In other words, push whatever department should be looking after them, make certain that they look after it.

This is one of the key points in our recommendations of the select committee on youth. One of the good things that would develop from a department of youth would be that there would be a responsible person in a responsible position who would be able to push those points that are now sort of fringes on other departments. I would hope that when this department of youth gets functioning, within The Department of Education, that they would certainly have someone there who would be able to pick out these areas, fringe areas, where nothing really is done—because it is really not that important to the overall running of any one department—that they would push those particular things to make certain that something is done. And I think the suggestion that the member for Windsor-Walkerville made is one of those things that should be the responsibility of one department. Say, "You look after this and go ahead and do it with the co-operation of the other departments if necessary."

While I am on my feet, Mr. Chairman, might I mention here that we ran into a rather sticky situation in Kingston not so long ago when a juvenile was apprehended and had to spend the night in jail. This, I think, is bad, because there should be special detention facilities made available for juveniles so that they will not have to spend any time in adult institutions. There were charges of mistreatment and so on, and I would like to ask the Attorney General if, when they take over the administration of justice, they are planning to make certain that in larger areas particularly, that special juvenile detention homes are available so that juveniles when they are apprehended for one reason or another will not have to spend the night or two or three nights in jail, but they will go to separate detention areas.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is definitely a part of our programme. There are detention centres now in quite a number of places. Where these are not available—and they are not available everywhere, it is quite well known—we attempt to see, if the juvenile has to be kept in custody, that he is at least confined in an area apart from the older prisoners, and this is carried out. Now, I think members will understand, Mr. Chairman, that we have taken over this responsibility, but as money becomes available we can provide additional detention centres. It is certainly part of our thinking, part of our programme to do it, and we do as much as we can with the present facilities which we have fallen heir to, to keep the juvenile away from the hardened offenders.

I should mention perhaps while I am speaking to this matter, that there is a committee of Cabinet studying the recommendations of the committee on youth, to determine what can be done to implement those.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on juvenile and family courts?

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Chairman, one year ago I brought up the problem of the detention centre for my own community and at that time the reply was that it was the responsibility of the community to provide the detention centre. The responsibilities of a community are very onerous and funds quite often have to be put to other uses. Now that the department has taken over this responsibility, when can we foresee the department taking over some facility in the community, some home, and transforming it into some type of centre for juveniles? There is no need to develop a new facility when an ordinary residence maybe could be adapted to take care of the juveniles.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that I hope we will see our way clear to be able to do that sort of thing soon. It was the responsibility of the municipality last year at this time. It is not the province's responsibility and I know something of this situation. I know in my own community of Sault Ste. Marie, the community some years ago acquired a building and improved it, made it fireproof, safe and secure, and it was used as a detention centre for juvenile offenders. This could have been done by many communities. It is now our responsibility, and as I said before, we can get to it as quickly as possible.

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Chairman, we are not talking about large sums of money at all in this. This is really a minor amount.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Add them all up and they become large sums.

Mr. Chairman: Anything more for juvenile and famliy courts? Agreed to.

Office of the director of land registration.

Mr. Sopha: I should like to ask whether any—

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves that the committee of supply rise and report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report progress and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I would like to deal with second readings and then we will return to the estimates.

Hon. Mr. Robarts moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11:40 o'clock, p.m.

Presenting reports.

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present to the House the tenth report of the Ontario parks integration board for the period ending December 31, 1966.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to present the second report of the standing committee on labour and move its adoption. Your committee begs to report the following bill without amendment: Bill 150, An Act to amend The Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

The Minister of Agriculture and Food has a statement.

Hon. W. A. Stewart (Minister of Agriculture and Food): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day I would like to advise the House, through you, sir, that extensive wind damage was sustained to several farm buildings in eastern Ontario, particularly Carleton and Russell counties, on Sunday afternoon, June 30. Inasmuch as we have a policy of providing, on a matching basis, any money that is raised locally on a dollar per dollar basis, the same policy would apply in that part of the province.

The term of the condition of this grant is, of course, that the local people set up a committee to collect donations to assist those who have been so unfortunate as to be affected, and set up a committee to explore and examine all of the damage and to make some list of the losses sustained, and then to administer the disbursement of the fund. We would like, of course, that on the committee being set up they make application to the Canadian disaster relief fund, for assistance from the federal government as well.

Mr. Speaker: The Provincial Secretary.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, in my capacity as registrar general of the province, I would like to recall that yesterday the records of the province show the arrival of James Grant McKeough, second son of the Hon. D'Arcy and Joyce McKeough.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the Opposition would perhaps like to place his question from yesterday, of the Minister of Highways.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know in which order you wish them, Mr. Speaker, but I was wondering if the hon. Provincial Secretary, in his other capacity, could see that a birth certificate were made available without the usual charge.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, in view of the questions about birth certificates raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition a few weeks ago, we would of course like to examine the application with great care.

Mr. Nixon: In this case, it should be!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the leader would ask the question left from yesterday?

Mr. Nixon: Yes, I will do that, Mr. Speaker. This is a question for the hon. Minister of Highways, and I would like to ask what plans the department has for the completion of the bridge on Highway 522 over the Pickerel River Narrows? And when will Highway 522 be extended to Highway 69?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister of Highways): Mr. Speaker, the answers to both of the questions asked by the hon. member are contained in a letter I wrote to Mrs. A. Bottrell, secretary manager of the Parry Sound chamber of commerce, dated June 26, 1968. It reads as follows:

Dear Mrs. Bottrell:

This is to acknowledge your letter of June 5 in respect of Highway 522.

The need for eventual completion of the link between Loring and the Highway 69 has been recognized. A programme of construction is under study. It would have to consist of a bridge structure over the ESS narrows at Kawigamog Lake and a new road section between the narrows and Lost Channel, and rehabilitation of the existing road between Lost Channel and Highway 69. The work would be given a tentative priority in relation to overall provincial highway needs.

Sufficient preliminary investigation has been done to determine that the cost be about $1.7 million.

To be realistic, a schedule of construction must be consistent with the relative priority of work and the availability of funds. I must confess that already heavy commitments and a restricted budget do not promise well for an early implementation of such a programme.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I might ask the Minister a supplementary question. Has there been a reassessment of the priority with regard to that bridge and road?

Hon. Mr. Gomme: There has been, yes.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Provincial Secretary if the liquor control board refusal to let licensed hotel owners truck beer for re-sale from independent breweries still operating?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Mr. Speaker, the liquor control board of the province has adopted a policy of not allowing any licensee to secure draught or bottled beer from any source other than those used prior to the strike. There is one minor exception in northern Ontario where, through prior arrangement, the licensees serviced by Dorans Breweries can receive their supplies of draught beer from independent union approved truckers. This is the only exception that I know of to that general rule.

Mr. Nixon: I wonder if the Provincial Secretary could explain the reason for that decision. Surely, those people who operate licensed premises should have the right to use what facilities are remaining in the province for the provision of this product.

Hon. Mr. Welch: I think the simplest way to answer the question, Mr. Speaker, is that to change this policy would, in fact, be placing the liquor control board in a situation of interfering with what is a labour-management dispute at the moment. The liquor control board assigns to all the licensees the source for their particular supplies. Those sources are now on strike and to allow any change in this plan would be, perhaps, to place the board in a position of attempting to interfere in these particular negotiations.

Mr. Nixon: So, Mr. Speaker, if I may? Under present regulations each hotel outlet gets its beer from one specified source.

Hon. Mr. Welch: It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, from my consultation with those officials of the board that in southern Ontario all beer is supplied to these licensed premises through the Brewers' Warehouse Company in a regular way. All those particular sources are now closed as a result of this labour-management dispute.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, this question might be asked during the estimates this afternoon but I thought it would be more appropriate before the orders of the day of the Attorney General.

Has the riot control chemical Mace, as used in London on July 3, been tested and approved by The Attorney General's Department?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member for York South would place his similar question.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question was in the context of a reply that the Minister gave on May 23, to a question regarding Mace, in which he stated that we had no plans for the use of Mace by any police force in Ontario; that the police commission was not satisfied that the substance was not injurious to the human body and that we had no training and no plans to use it at that time.

In light of that, I have four questions:

1. At what point of time, and on what grounds did the police commission conclude that Mace is not injurious to the human body?

2. When did the company in Preston, Ontario, start supplying Mace to Ontario police departments, and was this done with the Minister's knowledge and approval?

3. When was training in the use of Mace for riot control begun in Ontario?

4. Did the first use of Mace in Ontario, on the occasion of a teenage disturbance in London, take place with the Minister's knowledge and approval?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, before answering the specific questions from the hon. members may I point out that the Ontario police commission has no authority to direct municipal police forces as to what devices they may or may not use in discharging their duty. The commission does have the authority to consult with and advise the governing bodies of police forces on matters relating to policing under the authority of The Police Act, section 39b(b).

As I indicated on May 23, the commission had no plans for the use of Mace and it was not satisfied that the substance was not injurious to the human body. The commission is still of the same opinion. It has not been able to determine that question as yet. It is still the responsibility of the local police governing authorities to decide what equipment will be used by their forces and they are not required to have our approval or advice nor need they advise us as to what equipment they may intend using. If our advice is sought, we will give it but we have not assumed responsibility for the equipment of local forces as these responsibilities have been given by this Legislature to the local boards of police commissioners under The Police Act.

In this light, Mr. Speaker, may I answer the questions as follows:

1. The commission has not come to a conclusion that Mace is not injurious to the human body.

2. We have no knowledge as to when the company started supplying Mace to police departments, and it was not with our knowledge or approval. We were aware that some local forces had this product but we were not consulted by them.

3. We are aware of no programmes for the use of Mace and we certainly have no such programme; but some local forces may have been doing so without knowledge or approval.

4. The use of Mace by any force, including that in London, was without our knowledge or approval.

Mr. Speaker, the Ontario police commission has been attempting to obtain technical advice on the effect of this product as I pointed out in my answer on May 23. The local facilities, including our own laboratories have not had the animals necessary for the appropriate tests.

The situation is that in order to conduct a satisfactory test as to the effect of Mace on human beings they have to have an animal of the ape family—a monkey type. The skin will show the same effects or similar effects as would be shown on humans. Those animals have not been available to us, but the RCMP have advised us that they are having tests made by The Department of National Health and Welfare at Ottawa, and we will have the benefit of their advice. Until these tests have been properly assessed we are still of the view that the Ontario police commission will not advise the use of Mace.

I would like to say for myself that in my answer on May 23 I expressed serious reservations as to the use of this product by any police force—certainly until it had been established beyond all doubt that the effect of it, or that the use of it would not have a permanent or serious effect on some person who was sprayed with it. And I pointed out further that if a police force used it and such damage occurred the force would be subject to an action for damages. I do not know whether I expressed it at that time, but I would now say that I read that some police chief had said he felt it was more humane to use it than to use a billy, and I do not think I could agree with a general statement of that kind.

If there is any question of injury, particularly to eyesight or some of the organs of sense, or to the body generally, I would far rather, in my own view, be struck with a billy or beaten with a stick than be sprayed with Mace. My whole attitude is that until this substance has been proven beyond doubt to be noninjurious in its effects then police forces should not be using it. I hope my words will be taken note of. I express the most serious reservations about its use by police forces.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, surely in the light of the statement made by the Attorney General, if I might phrase this as a supplementary question, would he not agree that over the past few weeks, when he was aware that some municipal forces were equipping themselves with this chemical, he should have made known his official views in this matter, so that it would not have come to such a situation where it was used without the research and approval that really, I believe, is necessary under these circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Perhaps the hon. leader of the Opposition has a point. I think my remarks were widely disseminated in the press; they were known to the police forces, I am quite certain, and in fact some of them commented and indicated that they had it, but they did not intend to use it except in the most desperate circumstances. I had expressed the view at that time, I think, to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent) that I did not think we needed to follow the example of some of the forces in the United States, because we did not generally have situations of a riot nature here.

I would accept the suggestion of the hon. member, and I think I asked the police commission if further dissemination of my views is necessary to express them and to see that they are brought to the attention of police forces. But I do point out that they do not have the force of a directive, or an order; it can only be advice or counsel.

Mr. Nixon: Did I understand the answer the answer to the question correctly, that the Attorney General, even though he holds the view that he has expressed this afternoon, knew that these forces were equipping themselves with the chemical Mace, but did not feel he should offer them his opinion unless it was solicited?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think my opinion was well known to those forces, because it was commented on and I saw comments in a number of newspapers. I did not make a directive because I had no authority to do so. And to express a view would be nothing more than my own personal view on the matter.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, by way of a supplementary question, I assume from the Minister's answer that the police commission shares his apprehensions with regard to its use because he indicated that they still do not advocate its use. If the police commission has not the power to say, in effect, to local police forces, "You cannot use this," or "You should not use it now", has the government not got the power—and why does it not use it—to forbid its dissemination from the source in question? There is only one source which is manufacturing it. Have we not got the power, directly, or through the federal government, to stop the dissemination of something that we think is dangerous?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: While it might be dangerous—we do not know that it is dangerous; we are having tests done to see if it is dangerous—I am advised that tests which have been done in the United States have indicated that the substance has not proven to have any injurious effect, but we want to make certain of that on our own account. As to stopping its distribution, I think we would have to prove that it had an injurious effect, and this we are trying to find out.

Mr. MacDonald: We will have an opportunity to pursue so many ramifications of it at a later point — perhaps today.

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Education which I submitted yesterday. What role, if any, will the Minister or the council of regents play in resolving the situation created by the resignation of the president of the Lambton college of applied arts and technology over the alleged dictatorship of the board of governors?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the regulations state very specifically that the board of governors has the power to make appointments to staff. This is one of its prime functions and it is not the intention of the Minister — and I have not had an opportunity to speak to any members of the council — but certainly as far as I am concerned we are not becoming involved in this particular situation in that this is an area of responsibility for the board of governors.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Timiskaming has a question from yesterday.

Mr. D. Jackson (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I have a question left over from yesterday, of the Minister of Agriculture and Food. When will the fruit and vegetable inspector be appointed for the New Liskeard district?

Hon. Mr. Stewart: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to advise the hon. member that a fruit and vegetable inspector has already been appointed. His name is Davis Reeves. He is a very highly qualified and very capable and experienced inspector. He will be working out of Timmins and will serve the New Liskeard-Cobalt area.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Lands and Forests has answers to questions.

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday the hon. member for Cochrane South (Mr. Ferrier) asked me this question:

> What action will the Minister take to restore Leach Lake in Beatty township to its original condition after having been drained by the carelessness of an adjacent gravel pit operation? What steps will the Minister take to prevent any future destruction of our natural resources in this manner?

In reply, Mr. Speaker, to this question from the member for Cochrane South I would like to advise that of the 26 acres covered by Leach Lake, 23 are patented under a town grant in 1912, the patent issued in 1929. This lake appears to be spring fed and it has no inlet and no outlet. Leo Alarie and Sons, Matheson, Ontario, have a gravel pit on privately owned land in close proximity to the lake and the lake breaks through and seeps into the pit. However, beaver dams have assisted in retaining some water in the north end of the lake.

Although the federal Navigable Waters Act comes under the jurisdiction of The Department of Lands and Forests it is doubtful that this lake can be considered to be navigable water. Ninety per cent of the lake bottom is owned by the patentee. The Lakes and Rivers Improvement Act, also under the jurisdiction of the department, deals with the matter of diversion of streams. It is questionable whether there has been a diversion in the case of Leach Lake. Since the area is of no use for recreational purposes, the department has no intention of taking any action in this matter.

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the Minister of Education, in two parts.

What immediate steps is the Minister of Education taking (a) to establish criteria for deciding what kind of information on pupils is to be recorded on their personal school information files and what kind of information shall not be permitted to be recorded; (b) to establish which teachers, school officials and Department of Education officials shall have access to a specific pupil's file and which teachers, school officials and Department of Education officials shall not have access; (c) to establish guidelines for teachers, school officials and Department of Education officials concerning the use of such personal and often subjective information to institutions of other levels of education, prospective employers, family services agencies, local police, RCMP, parents, and so on?

Secondly, what steps are other educational jurisdictions, such as the United Kingdom, Sweden and the state educational authorities in the United States, taking with respect to the three areas noted in part one of this question?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, directions for Ontario school records have been issued to schools for some 15 years and in the last several years a manual has been issued to principals and heads of guidance within the system. An additional publication will be produced in the near future to supplement this manual and in addition, as perhaps the hon. member knows, the department publishes a curriculum guide which includes information for the teachers. I should be delighted to make these publications available for the hon. member.

It is stressed that records are kept for the benefit of students and confidential information should be treated with discretion, and in this regard the principals and teachers have a heavy professional responsibility. In my view, the schools have acted in a highly responsible manner and there have been very few complaints regarding the improper use of confidential material over the past number of years.

The question of information and the law is a very complicated one and I do not think I am qualified, Mr. Speaker, to get into that aspect of it. But I would refer the hon. member to a book entitled "Law of Guidance and Counselling", edited by M. L. Ware, published by W. H. Anderson Company. As this book indicates, final answers have not been found in other jurisdictions. If the hon. member cannot obtain this is the legislative library, I have a copy and would be quite prepared to make it available to him.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, we are really quite aware of the problems, we are interested in the developments in other jurisdictions and we are continually seeking to improve our own system within this province. A continuing committee representative of teachers and headmasters has been meeting regularly since 1965 and is continuing to make valuable contributions to this very important area.

Mr. T. Reid: If I might ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the Minister consider letting the Attorney General have a copy of the book "Law of Guidance and Counselling" for his good use?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Knowing that the Attorney General, Mr. Speaker, is the kind of individual who is quite prepared to read and listen to any constructive suggestions on any subject, I would be delighted to make this book available to him. Perhaps, when he has a few leisure moments when you gentlemen are finished asking all your relevant questions, he might have time to pursue it. I would be delighted to make it available to him at that time.

Mr. T. Reid: Mr. Speaker, a short supplementary question: The question is based on today's letter in the Globe and Mail, in the letters to the editor column, by Lawrence Daub—from Ottawa. No doubt the Minister has read this letter.

My question is: Does the Minister think that the usefulness of the cumulative record card is somewhat defeated by the attitude of this person from Ottawa at least, to be very careful not to write anything that might possibly, in any way, be to the detriment of the pupil concerned? Mr. Speaker, the comments are made with reference to the Attorney General's comment about the use of such information in the courts. I was wondering whether the Minister of Education feels therefore, Mr. Speaker, whether the record might become less useful for the purposes of education now that we have had this most unfortunate incident to which the letter refers.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I assume this is a supplementary question. I am still of the opinion that the records that are being kept and established and becoming more sophisticated cannot help but be beneficial to the educational programme of the students involved and I do not think one single incident where, perhaps, there was some question related to them, should in any way reflect on the total availability of the student records as a beneficial part of the educational process.

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, a question before the orders of the day for the hon. Minister of Labour:

1. Will the Minister cause a special investigation to be made into the elevator failure at the Beverly Hills apartments, Hamilton, on July 1?

2. When was the elevator last inspected?

3. Will the Minister attempt to assure apartment dwellers in Ontario that their elevators are accident-proof?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Hamilton East, an elevator inspector from The Department of Labour is carrying out an inspection today of the four elevators in this particular apartment building.

The second part: The elevators were inspected and passed on September 29, 1967. In the normal course, their next inspection would have been in September. No piece of mechanical equipment is accident-proof; for this reason we have rigid safety standards and a system of elevator licensing and regular inspections throughout the province, as well as a system of licensing contractors who install and maintain elevators. These programmes are designed to attempt to ensure that elevator accidents do not happen. They have proven their worth because we have a very low accident record in this field in this province. The assurance that I can give apartment dwellers and others in the province is that we will continue to carry out these programmes vigorously to attempt to ensure that elevators are as safe as possible.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Education. How many teachers were there at the Porcupine campus of the Northern college of applied arts and technology in the 1967-1968 school year? How many of these teachers have resigned and what were the reasons for these resignations?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the answer is somewhat comparable to the answer given to the member for York South. Once again, the question of appointment of staff is under the jurisdiction of the college concerned. I was able to ascertain that at the Porcupine campus in October there were some ten teachers. If the hon. member wishes to make further enquiry he should contact the Northern college of applied arts and technology, and he might communicate with the president Mr. O. E. Walli, post office Box 1062, Timmins. If you are in a rush, the telephone number is 264-9413; unfortunately I could not get the area code.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have my second question this session for the Minister of Correctional Services.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: What were the various reasons, other than the one mentioned by the Minister yesterday, for the inmates' disturbance at Burwash this week?

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Mr. Speaker, the matter is still under investigation and I will have to await the report of the investigating team before I have all of the facts. When I have them, I will be in a better position to advise the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THIRD READINGS

The following bills were given third reading upon motions:

Bill 135, An Act to amend The Consumer Protection Act, 1966.

Bill 153, An Act to amend The Corporations Act.

THE TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves second reading of Bill 162, An Act to amend The Teachers' Superannuation Act.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as I read the bill that the Minister has put before the House, I see it is tidying up some difficulty that has been under discussion for some time between the commission and the teachers concerned. But an omission in the bill, that I want to bring to the Minister's attention, is that we still are very seriously lax in meeting our obligation to those citizens of the province who have been—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! Will the members please give the leader of the Opposition a hearing?

Mr. Nixon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I know that the Minister of Education is interested in these matters, as all members should be. We have all of us, surely, been very formally approached by those teachers who, having retired for some years after 40 years of service and contributing to the pension fund for most of that time, now find themselves receiving the minimum pension provided by law of $50 per month.

There has been the feeling on all the sides of the House for some time, certainly since 1961, that the government should move to apply the credit of and the funds of the province to assist the teachers in getting justice for the service that they have rendered; and in the light that they now face changes in the cost of living.

We have to relate this, of course, to the fact that the pension fund is operated by the province of Ontario and that it is the province's responsibility to see that contributions are at a level which will permit payments of pensions in the future that will meet the requirements of the cost of living. It is certainly required by all of us here to take the steps to see that the pension is payable now and is commensurate with this responsibility.

I have been approached personally by a former head of the science department of one of the collegiates that I attended, and I know him to be an outstanding teacher. He has been a leader in his profession across the province, and he taught with gratifying results. For 40 years he was a leader in the community and still is in many ways. The story that he put before me is one that really I felt was completely unconscionable. We in this province are bolstering the teachers' superannuation fund with large infusions of capital, which are basically bookkeeping entries as I understand them, to compensate for the improper way—and I can use the word under these circumstances—that the fund has been handled over the years.

Surely it is time that we took the steps necessary to see that those people who have been superannuated from this profession are going to be treated in a fair and just way. It has been said so many times on this side and felt by members on all sides, that apparently the government is waiting for the grim reaper to solve their problems. Undoubtedly he will, but we still have to have a superannuation fund which will meet these needs, and which will be up to date. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister responsible take the opportunity to amend the bill so that we can see this justice granted to the teachers of the province.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commence my remarks by associating myself with those already made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I think that this Legislature does have a very singular responsibility to those teachers who led the youth of this province some years ago and who now find they must support themselves on pensions that are so obviously inadequate that they are really a shame to the entire province. The Minister has stated that when we can do something about all the other civil servants, then we can turn to the teachers. I think that this was the import of his comment when he was questioned on this some weeks ago.

I suggest to the Minister that we have taken action in the past, I think we took action a few years ago. I do not think we waited until we had looked after every other civil servant. I am not, in any sense, suggesting that the griefs of the other civil servants are any more or less necessary for us to consider, but I do think that this should be looked upon on its own. I do not think that it can be linked to the needs of all the other people in the province.

I think that this is a matter which has come before the Legislature on at least four, five or six occasions, and I think that every member of the House has met with superannuated teachers who have brought to them, I am sure, stories of some very real hardship. I would hope that very, very soon we will see an amendment to the bill which will allow us to deal more generously and justly with those who have taught in our schools in the past.

I want to make one or two other comments in relation to this legislation. It is my understanding that the securities which are sold to the Ontario government are sold at something like 5 per cent. That is to say they are sold by the teachers' superannuation fund to the Ontario government. I think that just two days ago we passed a piece of legislation in relation to the Ontario municipal employees' fund which is paying the percentage at 6.5 per cent. I am wondering why the Minister has not taken the time or this opportunity to give the teachers a more just return on the money being lent to the Ontario government. Why are we not pegging it at least at 6.5 per cent? In fact, there are those who stated in view of the interest rates now being paid that this is not overly generous. But I think that at 5 per cent there is a very real source of injustice in relation to this particular bill.

There are other items in this bill which I think are significant and which I think will probably come forward as we deal with each section individually. There is one aspect of it that does bother me. I notice that we have set apart those people who may be going to the teachers' colleges which will hereafter be part of the university. Here again, I think there may very well be, in this effort to be just to those who are going to teachers' colleges and find themselves in the employ of the university, there very well may be a source of division between those who are in the teachers' colleges and those who are a part of the university staff. I am wondering if the Minister might not consider, at some time in the future, the whole question of the movement of people within the educational system all the way—not just from kindergarten to the grade 13, but from kindergarten right through to the college of applied arts and technology or to the university.

In other words, is it not time to consider ways and means of making it possible for people to move in and out of different levels in the educational system so that there may very well be an opportunity for a person to move, either from the university or the secondary school fields to the elementary school easily and also from the secondary school field to the university without this problem of losing pension rights and losing advantages in one's pension.

I bring this matter to the attention of the Minister because I think that this is a part of a general philosophy which we are trying to extend in Ontario. There is no particular division of education, whether it be carried on at the university level or at the kindergarten level and we may very well find a need for people with perhaps MA or Ph.D. degrees at grades 1, 2 and 3 as well as at the university level. I think that anything we can do to make it possible for people to move in and out and up and down in our educational system is to the good.

On the whole, I think that this bill is a good bill. It is, as the Minister says, a housekeeping bill but I would think that good housekeeping is one of the responsibilities of this Minister as well as new flights of educational imagination.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps, the Minister would wait until other members who wish to engage in the debate have done so.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, to the Minister, being rather new to the House I am not too familiar with this superannuation fund the teachers have, but a few weeks ago a delegation in my home town appeared at my place and wanted to discuss the superannuation fund with me. So I invited them in and the position that they took was that they were being short changed, if I could use that term, in regard to their pensions, through this superannuation fund. They went on to give me the history of the fund which started in 1917. Originally, they took the best 40 years or the last 40 years of teaching—I do not know how long a teacher had to teach in those days but they took 40 years—and calculated their pension. Then it went to 15 years and then it went to 10, as I understand it, and presently they use the best seven years to determine what the benefit should be.

First of all, I would like to say that in my opinion, if they are going to make the calculation on the best seven years—and I understand that started in the year 1966—it would appear to me that we should have incorporated all of the teachers who were on pension at that time and used their last seven years in making the calculation. Obviously, this would have increased the pensions of those who have retired prior to 1966 or the date of that calculation.

In addition to that, I am sure that there are many teachers in this province who must be existing—I honestly was not aware of this but I am now—on a very minimal pension and it would appear to me that this province owes something to those teachers who gave a great portion of their lives to the people of this province in terms of the teaching profession. They have only one place to come to, and that is to this Legislature, to at least get some equity in terms of the cost of living today. This is the only place that they have appealed to, and I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the teachers of this province who have retired and who are living on this minimal pension should be given the consideration that would be necessary to bring their standard of living up to today's level.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other member who wishes to speak before the Minister? The Minister of Education has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, just to reply very briefly, because we did discuss this in some detail during the consideration of the estimates of the department, I should point out about the group of teachers that has made representation to the government for, I believe, some 16 to 18 months, that its submissions or requests to the government are under consideration.

But as was pointed out during my estimates, sir, I do not believe these things can be done in isolation. I think the government has a responsibility to people other than the teaching profession, much as I may feel some relationship to that profession. I think the government has a total responsibility and if we were to make a change in policy in one area, I say with respect, Mr. Speaker, I think it is necessary to consider other people who perhaps have similar requests to make. I should also point out to the leader of the Opposition, that while this matter has been discussed—

Mr. Nixon: That is what your predecessor said in 1962.

Hon. Mr. Davis: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, the problem that the hon. leader of the Opposition referred to was in fact resolved two years ago, dealing with that particular group of teachers. This problem arose in 1966 when the Canada pension plan came into being and the decision was made then to integrate it with The Teachers' Superannuation Act. The seven-year period was used and those teachers who retired prior to that date are the ones who feel that they now have been prejudiced to some degree, depending on the amount of pension they are receiving. It is not the same situation that the hon. leader of the Opposition refers to as existing, say, from 1961.

Mr. Nixon: You have made some changes just the same, it is the same attitude of the government.

Hon. Mr. Davis: It is not the same attitude of the government, Mr. Speaker. The attitude of the government is a very responsible one, recognizing we have an obligation to a large number of people not just in the teaching profession.

I would also point out to the member for Peterborough, and I know that he has some very genuine interest in the teacher's superannuation fund, that I think, looking at it very logically, the interest rate being paid by the province to the teachers' superannuation fund does not tell the whole story. I think one must accept the fact that there is a fairly high degree of subsidization going into the fund from the public of the province of Ontario, and surely, if we can obtain money from that fund to benefit the total public, this is quid pro quo. I do not think that the teachers, and they have not raised it in any serious fashion with me, can have any objection to the rate of interest being paid when there are many millions of dollars being contributed into the fund every year by the general taxpaying public to assist in the payment of pensions to the teachers.

I am interested in the other observation made by the member for Peterborough. Perhaps, sir, he is suggesting that the government should determine and have a uniform pension policy for all universities in the province of Ontario so that they could relate to the teachers' superannuation fund. If he wishes to pursue this further, he could send me some information and thinking on this over a period of time. I think it is a matter that really does not relate to the principle of this bill and I think that perhaps I am not prepared to carry on that aspect of the discussion at this particular moment.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE ONTARIO SCHOOL TRUSTEES' COUNCIL ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 163, An Act to amend The Ontario School Trustees' Council Act.

Mr. Pitman: I would like to ask a question, Mr. Speaker. It is my understanding that the various trustees' groups across the province at present are considering uniting. There are a number of these groups listed on the first page of Bill 163, and I am wondering whether passing the bill at this point is filled with wisdom in view of the fact of this unification taking place. Does the Minister see the necessity then to pass another bill as soon as these changes have been made?

As the Minister is well aware, the creation of large units of administration across the province has had a very real effect upon the trustees and upon their decisions in relation to their own organizations. I would just like a comment from the Minister in relation to that matter before we pass this bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that perhaps I had mentioned that during the introduction of the bill, but perhaps I did not. If the hon. member would read the bill closely, it refers to the Lieutenant-Governor in council being given the right to determine the representatives to the trustees' council. If this right then exists if the trustee groups come together, which I anticipate they will do this fall, then the trustees' council can continue and the Lieutenant-Governor can make regulations as to just which group appoints whom to the council, and really it has been passed with the consolidation in mind. This was their request that it be done in this way, so that they would have this power.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE TEACHING PROFESSION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 164, an Act to amend The Teaching Profession Act.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, this again is simply a housekeeping measure. However, I did want to comment on this because I think that a number of members in the House received letters from constituents across the province which seemed to have been initiated by a purported piece of legislation which the member for Eglinton (Mr. Reilly) is introducing into the House in opposition to compulsory unionism.

I did want to make the point at this juncture that this is a piece of legislation which obviously goes directly against the desires of the member for Eglinton, and seeing I have written about 30 or 40 letters to people in relation to this particular purported legislation, I would like at least to make my comments clear on this point, and be able to send these individuals a copy of this Hansard which will record either his acquiescence in this particular piece of compulsory unionism or will record his silence.

Personally I think it is a good piece of legislation, but I think that this should be put in the context of what the member for Eglinton has been writing to people across this province.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other member with a question for the Minister?

The motion is for second reading of Bill 164. Is it the pleasure of the House that the motion carry?

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 165, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I might point out that in case the members have some general observations, these bills will all be going to the education committee.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 166, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I think this is the first day these bills have appeared printed; I was trying to get copies of them previously, and was unable to read them—

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the member before he proceeds, the Clerk advises me that this bill was in the books yesterday.

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will say there is no desire on the part of the government to push any of these bills through. If the members have not had a chance to examine them we could hold this out probably until next week. I was going to call the 14th order, the 15th order and the 16th order. If you want any of these held until the beginning of the week, I would be happy to do so.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, if I might speak to the comment of the Prime Minister. I think that these are essentially housekeeping bills, and I think we would be quite willing to allow these through on the assurance that they will be coming before the education committee in the near future, and we have an opportunity to comment on them at that time.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: They will go to the education committee. Quite frankly, that is why I wanted to clear them, so that they may be in a position to go to that committee.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SECONDARY SCHOOLS AND BOARDS OF EDUCATION ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 167, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

THE SEPARATE SCHOOLS ACT

Hon. Mr. Davis moves second reading of Bill 168, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I hardly agree with the member for Peterborough that this bill is a housekeeping bill. I think it undertakes a very far-reaching reform in the education system of the province in that it implements for the separate schools the same sort of county jurisdictions that were implemented for the public schools under Bill 44 which is presently before the House in committee. The provisions of this bill are very similar in many respects in that they are designed to meet the special needs of larger areas of jurisdiction which we, of course, have supported for some time including Bill 44, which was of a similar nature. Our objections at that time were made to the House, Mr. Speaker, and to the Minister.

I am quite interested to find, however, in this particular bill, that the Minister has reserved for himself—immediately upon passage of the bill, and when it goes into effect through proclamation—the right to alter the boundaries of any area as he desires. This is not a right that he has asked for in the companion Bill 44, and it is an area that has brought forward some considerable discussion among those interested in the legislation. I personally believe that this is the sort of freedom of action that the Minister of Education or the government of the day must have in order to see that the boundaries meet the needs that are bound to change—not just in the distant future, but may in fact require some changing in the immediate future.

This is particularly true of Bill 44, and I am sure that those people who are served by the separate school system, and who will have the responsibility of being elected members of the separate school boards will soon find that the rigidity of county boundaries does not meet modern needs. I would think they would petition the Minister in short order for some reasonable changes that would allow these boundaries to adapt themselves to the school community as it has been developing over many years. The bill, of course, is one that was considered, no doubt, by many people in education. I had the impression that the Minister was going to postpone its enactment for some months, perhaps a year or two, until some more experience with the revisions brought about by Bill 44 had been experienced.

However, it is now before us. I think it is an excellent piece of legislation—in its principle. I have enquired among those who are going to be most directly affected by it—those of the trustees of the separate school boards presently, and among parents in my own area—and all of them agree that this is something they desire. They desire as well as this, of course, a continuation of a public authority over separate school affairs through the whole range of education from kindergarten to grade 13. When we read the recommendations of the Hall report, we can see, that the members of that committee wrestled with this problem for a period of probably three years, and the obvious problem that is presented to us so frequently by many people in the province, that the separate school boards should be given this jurisdiction over a larger area, sir. The Hall recommendations broke down simply to the urging to the government that a select committee of the House examine the matter.

So we can see that it is a knotty problem for anyone to solve; whether from a political standpoint or from a completely objective educational standpoint, it is a very difficult problem indeed. However, they do present some recommendations that I think are going to have to be considered by the government—perhaps not in this bill but as a companion to it in the future—and one is the recommendation that facilities beyond grade 10 be established on a sharing basis. I think this is generally accepted by many people, that this is one way whereby the expensive facilities for secondary education, which are presently being provided privately by the Roman Catholic schools, can be made available on a shared basis so that we can approach equality of opportunity more readily than we have in the past.

Mr. Speaker, you were in the chair, I believe, last year when I brought to the attention of the Minister of Education my views in the provision of textbooks, for example, that the grants for textbooks should be made available to the individual student without regard to the school that he attends. I think there is some considerable movement that can be taken by the Minister in meeting the needs of continuing separate education. The bill as it is before us is one that sets up a parallel system for county jurisdictions.

I have the same objections as I had in Bill 44 as to the rigidity of these boundaries. I am delighted that under section—I do not know what it is but it is listed as section 75 on page 6 of the bill—the Minister reserves to himself, and to advise the Lieutenant-Governor, to alter these boundaries in such a way as would improve the situation and get away from the rigidity that is built into Bill 44.

Mr. Pitman: Well, Mr. Speaker, once again I think this is an excellent piece of legislation. I too have been in touch with the chairman of the separate school board in my area and also with other people who are closely associated with the separate school system. I have the same reservations as have already been expressed with the larger units which we find in Bill 44—that is, the much larger units than perhaps were necessary in terms of school population in Bill 44. Rather surprisingly this bill turned out to be a better bill than Bill 44 simply because there were fewer separate school pupils. Therefore, I do not think you have the—I do not like to use the word "monstrosities"—but you might say the unfortunate number of students that you find in some jurisdictions under that very hardened piece of legislation. I think in the Hall-Dennis report it suggests that really, after one reaches 20,000 students, there is a levelling off, that you really do not appreciably improve the system but you do lose the sense of intimacy which people have with the education of their own children.

And I hope that possibly the attention which the department has given to this bill will perhaps lead the department to have new insights into their treatment of the public school system in Bill 44 and will allow certain changes, possibly amendments, when Bill 44 comes before this House in committee, which will, as it does in this bill, allow the Minister to use his power, his wisdom, to provide the best possible education system rather than the most inflexible one which, unfortunately in some cases exists at the present time.

The second observation I have to make on this piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, relates to the method by which it was accomplished. I come up with the question, why? Why was it not done this way in relation to Bill 44? Why was it we had to have a kind of war with 1,600 school boards—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member would keep to Bill 168, because that is the bill the principle of which is under discussion now. Bill 44 has been passed.

Mr. Pitman: Yes, well, I shall certainly take the admonition of the chair in relation to my comments. However, I do want to congratulate the Minister on the method by which he has brought together the separate school trustees across the province, has negotiated with them and discussed with them, has had an interchange of opinion, an interchange of wisdom, and come up with a bill which has not only been agreeable in its implementation but has also been an excellent piece of legislation. May I also finally suggest that this may very well be the beginning of a new role in our relationship with the separate school system across the province. I would hope that by the imposing of larger units we will be able as the Hall-Dennis report suggests, to find some acceptable method of financing the separate school system to the end of grade 13.

Now, I know this is a matter of great delicacy and I realize it is a matter of some very real political poignancy in some ways, but I think we are surely reaching a period in our history when, with the use of computers, with the existence of, I think, a much less heated kind of religious atmosphere, we can assess what are the real public contributions of our separate school system, where we can, I am sure, show where there can be a sharing of not only human resources but of physical resources as well. In such a way I hope this is the first step towards the removal of this whole matter from public discussion, as the Hall-Dennis report suggests. I think this is a good piece of legislation; it is more flexible; it was carried out, I think, in a proper way, and I hope it is the first step to a new kind of future in the relationship of the separate and the public school systems in this province.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other member who wishes to speak to this bill? Does the Minister wish to make any comment?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Just one or two very brief comments, Mr. Speaker. When I introduced the bill I did express my appreciation to the separate school trustees association. They were very helpful in the discussion period of this legislation. I might point out to the member for Peterborough and the hon. leader of the Opposition, that they feel this has greater flexibility. Actually, when the regulations are provided, particularly in southern Ontario, I think you will find that the recommendations from the separate school trustees themselves involve larger geographic units that are involved in Bill 44. There will be smaller number of students but large geographic areas. I think it also should be pointed out that even under existing legislation referring to the Hall commission report, there are now legislative means whereby the public school system and the separate school system in some areas of special education can relate their programmes, thus providing broader educational opportunities for all youngsters within the system.

This, Mr. Speaker, has been—as I am sure the hon. members opposite who are dealing with this—recognize, because of the historical background behind the separate schools in this province—it has been rather difficult legislation to develop and to document, and I personally am very pleased with the way it has turned out. I think we can look forward to the same growth and the same benefits in the changed administration for the public school system now accruing to the separate school system of this province as well. It will not be—I should make this very clear—an easy task for the separate school system to have this in shape by January 1, 1969. But they themselves pursued it, they wished this to be done this current year and we co-operated to the best of our abilities to see that they could start on January 1, but I want to make it very clear that there are real problems. Yet they feel—and I have confidence in their abilities—they feel they can cope with them by January 1, 1969.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 7th order, committee of the whole House; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

The Honourable the Lieutenant-Governor recommends the following:

RESOLVED:

That where a corporation that is not subject to taxation under section 31 of The Income Tax Act (Canada), or that has elected to be taxed under section 31 of The Income Tax Act (Canada) pursuant to the provisions of section 110 of that Act, owns land in Ontario or owns land in Ontario and other provinces and territories of Canada and does not otherwise have a permanent establishment in Canada, it shall pay to Her Majesty for the use of Ontario the taxes imposed by The Corporations Tax Act, in accordance with that Act, as amended by the provisions of Bill 143, An Act to amend The Corporations Tax Act.

Resolution concurred in.

THE CORPORATIONS TAX ACT

The House in committee on Bill 143, An Act to amend The Corporations Tax Act.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): I wonder if the Provincial Treasurer would give us an example of the kind of corporation which is now brought within the taxing net of the province of Ontario under this section?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I have a somewhat broader explanation than appears in the marginal notes, and with your permission I will read it. Section 2 of The Corporations Tax Act defines the circumstances under which a corporation has a permanent establishment in Ontario and is therefore liable for corporations tax. Subsection 7 of the Act firstly provides that where a corporation otherwise having a permanent establishment in Canada, owns land in a province, such land is a permanent establishment.

It is now proposed to add a further definition to that Act in the form of subsection 7 (a) to widen the permanent establishment to include land owned by a corporation which does not otherwise have a permanent establishment in Canada, where that corporation has been incorporated in the jurisdiction outside of Canada and which jurisdiction has not entered into a tax convention or treaty with Canada. There are so-called tax haven corporations which are incorporated under the laws of a foreign jurisdiction and which corporations are subject to little or no income tax, in the jurisdiction in which they are incorporated.

The tax haven corporation can own land or beneficially own land through a trust arrangement in Ontario and earn profits in Ontario, and yet pay no income tax in Ontario and little or no income tax in the jurisdiction in which it is incorporated. As the Act now stands, non-resident corporations of this type cannot be taxed in Ontario. The intention of subsection 7(a) is to tax a tax haven corporation unless such corporations otherwise pay base tax, and have entered into a convention or treaty with Canada.

Once having widened the permanent establishment concept, other sections of the Act have to be amended to provide for allocation of income for purposes of assessing tax. These amendments are set out in the following sections and subsections of the bill. Section 31 provides for allocation of income between provinces of income of so called tax haven corporations. Section 35 provides for the taxing of corporations which would otherwise not be liable for income tax, and provides for the taxing of other non-resident corporations which own land in Ontario, for such corporations elect to be taxed on taxable income rather than a 15-per-cent holding tax on gross revenue. Section 4 provides for extending the definition of paid-up capital to include those corporations covered under section 35 of the bill. There is no corresponding provision presently in the income tax of Canada for this purpose.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I believe that I understand what the Minister said. Could he please assist me by giving me the name of any such corporation which would now be subject to tax in the province, not previously subject to such tax, or is that possible?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, it would be possible, but I cannot recall from memory a corporation that I could identify by name at the moment. Of course the information is available. I doubt very much, on the other hand, that if it is available, it could be disclosed.

Mr. J. Renwick: I am not attempting to pin the hon. Minister down, but perhaps at some point he could let me know the number of such corporations rather than the name of one which will now be subject to tax. The reason for my question is obvious—that I am curious as to the extent by which companies incorporated in so-called tax havens are in fact now recognized for tax purposes, if they want to have that kind of tax recognition in the province of Ontario, by reason of the ownership of land. The corollary question is: Who are the people who own the shares in a tax haven corporation owning land in the province?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think that the hon. member will understand that the general information can probably be provided, but specific information as far as taxpayers are concerned, is not disclosed for obvious reasons.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): May I enquire what are the names of the principal jurisdictions which the bill contemplates, and which do not have a convention with Canada?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I do not have that precise information here, but it is available and I can make it available to the hon. member. I will get it. It is sufficient to say that this tax haven situation does exist and it is reasonable to assume that it may continue to exist even in broader terms or the amendments would not be proposed here today. I did not come armed with the specific information that is being requested.

Mr. Sopha: You should have.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Obviously, of course, the Bahamas, Panama and Lichtenstein are the ones that would come to mind, under any circumstances, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Sopha: The migration of the people who thought so little of their Canadianism that they gave it up, started some years ago. Might we enquire why it is only in the latter days that some curative provisions are sought from the Legislature? Is that a fair question?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Better late than never.

Mr. Sopha: Yes, but make it retroactive. It should not fail to escape notice that when we are dealing in the field of corporation tax, the language always becomes so sophisticated and complex. In order to bring about a state of equity, the people should pay the taxes that they ought to pay. With the workman, of course, the tax is deducted at source and he never sees it and everything is so infinitely simple. He just never gets the money because the employer deducts it for the state, obligingly, and transmits it, and suffers severe penalties if he does not transmit it, and has to pay the tax.

But in the world of corporations, with all the experts that they have, the Provincial Treasurer and his assistants have to get involved in such complex language to accomplish equity. All that will be cured, of course, when and if the Carter commission recommendations are adopted, and a dollar is treated as a dollar.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Do you think that there is some possibility of that?

Mr. Sopha: Yes, that is their responsibility.

Mr. MacDonald: Is there some possibility of that in the next few years?

Mr. Sopha: I do not know. Do not ask me, I am the last one that they will ask.

Mr. MacDonald: If you want to know where the pressure is coming from, I will give you one guess—the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Sopha: The other observation that I want to make is in relation to this phrase "permanent establishment", and here I want to indulge in some, I suppose, heresy. I see no reason at all why Ontario should not say to corporations who are taking advantage of a tax haven that if they want to own land in Ontario and part of the assets of the province, then we insist that they erect a permanent establishment in Ontario of some form. I do not think that that is too unreasonable on the part of the government in Ontario. I am talking about the actual erection of a building instead of leaving it in the way that this statute leaves it, in the world of fiction. This statute speaks of "deeming it to have a permanent residence". What is really wrong, I ask rhetorically, with instead of the fictional "deeming" of a residence, that we actually see one at the corner of Bloor and—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We are on section 3 now.

Mr. Nixon: At College and University.

Mr. Sopha: College and University—we should actually see it. Other jurisdictions that would deny they are less democratic than we are, have made such a provision. The government of Quebec has moved in that direction, has said to corporations, "You are doing business in our province, you will have a head office in the province." But Ontario lags behind other jurisdictions, like the Benelux countries and even Mexico. Mexico and Argentina have similar provisions, but the attitude of our government is that it is consistent with the Premier's trek to Los Angeles and the blue sky and the free rain: "Come into Ontario and we will make life comfortable for you." That is the message he seems to purvey down there, that there are very few restrictions on the manner in which you do business in Ontario and the branch plant economy. It is implicit right in that section.

An hon. member: Section 2?

Mr. Sopha: Right in that section of the bill—that blue sky policy is implicit there, and it is the one against which I complain. If you want to look at the very words, it says: "—shall be deemed to be a permanent establishment." Section 2, page 2, second line. Have you got it? Have you focused on it?

Mr. Nixon: Second word.

Mr. Sopha: No, it is the first word on the second line, "deemed to be—"

Mr. Chairman: It is not on page 2.

Mr. Sopha: Oh, yes.

Mr. Chairman: It is on the inside cover of—

Mr. Sopha: Page 2.

Mr. Chairman: Inside the cover. We are dealing with section 2.

Mr. Sopha: We are on page 2. Maybe we are dealing with a different bill.

Mr. Nixon: Section 2 runs over to the next page.

Mr. Sopha: You located it?

Mr. Chairman: Will the member repeat the words?

Mr. Sopha: Deemed to be a permanent establishment in the province.

Mr. Chairman: All right. I am referring to section 2; it does not say "Shall be deemed to have" but it does say "deemed to be". That is right.

Mr. Sopha: How am I ranging far afield when I say instead of deeming to be a permanent establishment, you insist that they build a permanent establishment?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I am talking about these references.

Mr. Sopha: If I say that you insist they build one in Ontario, that they have an office in Ontario, made of concrete, cement blocks, steel and everything else, you say that it is.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: How many storeys?

Mr. Sopha: Moderate and adequate. The Premier can get very smart and frivolous about this, but a very real problem with the utilization of our resources of this province is the reluctance of this government to require these corporations to act with civilized behaviour consistent with the interests of our people.

He will not be laughing if it is announced in a few weeks that Texas Gulf Sulphur is building their smelter across the Quebec border, near Noranda.

Mr. Nixon: Is there a chance of that?

Mr. Sopha: There is a likelihood, we are told. He will not treat that as being frivolous.

Mr. Chairman: Section 2?

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, at the risk of continuing an abuse of the committee, I would like to underline my concurrence in what the member for Sudbury has said, not about the latter point, but about the fact that an amending bill to the tax bill, such as this, illustrates very clearly the care and attention which experts can give to corporations' taxes which is not available to the ordinary citizen under the correlative statute, The Income Tax Act of Canada. I think the Provincial Treasurer should be very well aware that most of this type of legislation is self-serving in many respects of special interests in the community. Part of it, of course, is the reaction of the Treasury to those various self-serving interests.

I am certain that the Provincial Treasurer is well aware that the corporate tax bar is both ingenious and inventive in protecting the interests of the corporate clients in this province.

Mr. Chairman: Section 2?

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might direct a question to the hon. Provincial Treasurer, recognizing my limitation of knowledge. Sir, would I not be correct—if I was wishing to set up, for example, a manufacturing operation here in the province of Ontario, incorporated in the Bahamas, your intention is under the deeming section 2 here, that if they own land they shall now be deemed to have a permanent residence? Is it not open to me, sir, to associate an independent corporation for land holding purposes? Subsection 2, therefore, will not be applicable to the manufacturing operation.

I am just wondering if the question of associated corporations does give you any concern here? It seems like an obvious opening to me but perhaps with my limited knowledge it is not an obvious opening.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think not, Mr. Chairman. I rather like to think that it is a substantial step forward in that the extent to which land ownership is deemed to be the residence, or whatever the appropriate word is for taxing purposes, brings us a step forward. It may even bring us closer to the realization of the proposition that the hon. member for Sudbury made, in that if there is no existing property, the actual physical property may well find its way into the jurisdiction.

Mr. Bullbrook: I just think all we have to do is set up a dummy corporation and enter into a lease-back arrangement, and your section 2 is not operative as far as the profits emanating from the manufacturing operation, as I see it.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on section 3 in sub-clause 5, I notice two provisions of that sub-clause; one deals with such a corporation not being subject to tax under section 31 of The Income Tax Act of Canada and the other is applicable to corporations which elect to be taxed under that section of The Income Tax Act of Canada.

I cannot understand why, in the one case, the reference is only to the portion of its taxable income arising from the sale of land, which is the case where the corporation is not subject to tax under section 31; whereas, in the case where the corporation has elected to be taxed under section 31 the section applies as though the portion of its taxable income arising from the sale or rental of land in Canada were its total taxable income.

In the one case, the rental is included and the other case the rental is not included as part of its total taxable income. I have the same comment about the resolution which has already been passed immediately preceding this bill, where there is no reference to the rental income as being part of the taxable income. I again, if the Minister does not have that information, I would simply ask at some point perhaps he would drop me a note explaining it to me.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, I think I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the fact the word rental has been admitted to subsection 34(a) does not mean that such rentals could not be taxed, if you managed to identify them. Rentals would generally be handled by a trust or other agency and they could be taxed under the general principle of power contract by the principle on behalf of the agent. I think provision is made for the matter that has been referred to by the hon. member for Riverdale. At least, it is my understanding that this is provided for.

Mr. J. Renwick: My other point, Mr. Chairman. I know that the resolution has been passed. Perhaps the Minister should look at the resolution because the resolution itself, where it makes the division between the two classifications of such corporations nevertheless does not refer to the rental portion of their income being included as part of taxable income. It may possibly be a flaw in that resolution.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 3 to 36, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. J. Renwick: On section 37. A matter which has always failed to appeal to me is that under section 37, we are now increasing the rate of interest to be charged on unpaid taxes from 6 per cent to 9 per cent; and correlatively under section 40, we are going to pay on overpaid taxes, interest at the rate of now 4 per cent instead of 3 per cent, unless, of course, you have been successful on a reassessment by the Minister in which case you go to 6 to 7 per cent which the Treasury will pay. I would simply say to the Minister that if there are unpaid taxes and the rate is to be 6 to 9 per cent, then if there are overpaid taxes, the rate should be the identical rate, regardless of the circumstances in which the overpayment may take place.

I would point out to the Minister that where for most individuals the tax is now deducted at the source, the question of whether there is or is not an overpayment is not really in the hands of the individual making the calculation on his income tax. Therefore, in my view, he should be entitled to the same rate of interest as the government charges those persons who are lax in payment of their tax. Certainly the discrepancy between 9 per cent for unpaid taxes and 4 per cent for overpaid taxes does not appeal to me.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the matter of increasing the penalty rates on unpaid taxes, at present it is 6 per cent for the first two months and then it becomes 9 per cent. We are simply moving here to make it a uniform rate from the onset of the unpayment.

Now in the other instance, the rate is lower. There are, I suppose, situations where it could be advantageous not to pay your tax unless the rate imposes a sufficient penalty, Mr. Chairman. At current rates it is quite some advantage to delinquent taxpayers not to pay their taxes. It is one of the reasons why we decided to increase the penalty rate across the board.

In the other instance the rate, of course, was being increased from 3 to 4 per cent on overpaid taxes. It is only in those circumstances, I suggest, who incidentally where —more has been taken, incidentally, Mr. Chairman, by the Provincial Treasurer than was originally required and in those instances we recognize that there has been an overpayment and a recognition of it is given. I am not going to attempt to justify the disparity of the rate with what we are proposing here and what the hon. member provides, but—

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I only reiterate the point that where you are increasing the taxes from 6 to 9 per cent for the first two-month period, that in fact is generally the period within which the persons involuntarily have failed to pay taxes. They might every well pay up. Why penalize a person during that two month period by increasing the rate from 6 per cent to 9 per cent? Surely it is quite reasonable to give a person two months to make the necessary—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, it is corporations we are dealing with, not persons.

Mr. J. Renwick: I understand.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 37 to 48, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 49:

Mr. Sopha: I wonder, does the repetition—is it not possible in the drafting of a statute in this province to have one section that would say "wherever in this Act the word Treasurer appears it shall be deleted and the word Minister substituted therefor". Is that not possible? Is there something wrong with legislative drafting that you could not do that? We could save the taxpayers of this province the many hundreds of pages that must have been published, by making that simple substitution of those words. I take it the Provincial Treasurer is now the Minister of Revenue. Is that so?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The bill has not been proclaimed.

Mr. Sopha: It has not been proclaimed, I see. Well this is a very minor point but I am just wondering in the vein of economy if we could not have one section that said that. Wherever the word "Treasurer" appears in this Act, it shall be deleted and the word "Minister" substituted therefor. Are you able to tell me that would not be possible?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, the member's comment is quite in order. It was felt for the sake of precision, I presume, and greater clarity, that it be done this way. I do not think it is that burdensome. It may take an extra two or three minutes of the time of the House. On the advice of our legal people and legal counsel it was decided that this was the most efficient way to do it. Mr. Chairman, I accept the hon. member's comments but this is the way that it was decided to do it.

Mr. Sopha: I wanted to make one additional comment. I want to make it absolutely clear that I will be a minority of one around here in believing, perhaps phantasmagorically, that the legislation belongs to the House, all of us, all my colleagues, the NDP and the Ministry—it belongs to all of us. No vested interest in it by legislative counsel, or the draftsmen; they have none at all—we take their advice, but they have no vested interest in the legislation. If there is any vested interest it is ours. Now, perhaps at some time some bill will come in where the cost of several thousands of pages of paper will be saved to the people of Ontario.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 48 to 57, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 143 reported.

RAISING OF MONEY ON THE CREDIT OF THE CONSOLIDATED REVENUE FUND

House in committee on Bill 149, An Act to authorize the raising of money on the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

On section 1:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, this might be a suitable time for the Provincial Treasurer to report on his recent journey to Europe. It was stated in the press that he was going to examine the possibility of entering the money markets other than our own national markets, the Canadian market and the American market. I have spoken to him privately and I thought his comments were quite interesting. I do not know whether it would be appropriate but certainly I think all members of the House would be interested if, in fact, the government is considering the possibility of using the power in this bill to borrow money from other jurisdictions, particularly European jurisdictions, to meet our requirements in the coming year.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, Mr. Chairman, if you find it in order, I would be quite happy to respond to the suggestion of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

I would first say that the trip I undertook, which concluded yesterday with my return from the continent, was undertaken primarily for the purpose of fact-finding; finding out what we could about the availability of capital in the European market, the conditions and terms under which capital could be obtained. For this purpose we conducted a series of visits and discussions with representative people in Switzerland and in Germany.

Recently, as hon. members who have been reading the press as it relates to the capital market will have recognized, over the last six or twelve months' period or even longer, capital markets domestically—and even as far as continental North America is concerned—have been difficult ones. The matter of availability has been difficult not only in Canada but in New York, and the cost of borrowed capital either for public or corporate purposes has been a matter of some concern, I think, to everyone who has to provide capital for the development of the jurisdiction, whatever size it may be.

So it was with this particular background that we undertook this tour. It was a gratifying tour, I can report to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee, in that I am pleased to say with much emphasis that we found Ontario reasonably well known in areas of Europe where you would not expect it to be. On the other hand, when you are dealing with or discussing matters with what can only be regarded as some of the most capable financiers and bankers in Europe I guess you should really, Mr. Chairman, recognize that they are going to know something about all the potential borrowers that may exist anywhere.

Mr. Nixon: Did they sing our song?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: They are aware of "A Place to Stand" over there, very much so, very much aware of "A Place to Stand". And I am happy to report to the House that unless I was very much misled—and I do not think I was—Ontario's credit is good abroad. No engagements were made, no commitments were made. I propose shortly to examine the detail of the information we obtained and upon the consideration of the accumulation of material, presumably make certain recommendations and offer some advice that will lend itself to one type of policy or another. I think I am safe in saying, Mr. Chairman, that Ontario to my knowledge has not borrowed, has not sought capital outside continental North America before, so that before any engagements or commitments in that capital market are undertaken, it seems to me that the matter of the related policy should be examined. Nevertheless, the prospects are there. Two of our sister provinces and, indeed, the federal government, have already sought capital successfully in those markets.

Mr. Nixon: Did the Treasurer say two?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Two sister provinces that we know of, probably three—I think the province of Quebec, the province of Newfoundland, and negotiations were reaching the final stages with the province of Manitoba while we were there. I believe they are being concluded back in Canada today—in the province of Manitoba. And then, of course, we know that the federal government has undertaken a short-term loan in deutschmarks and, I believe, one in lire. We did not examine the Italian market because it is a government relationship but we did discover that this market exists. Mr. Chairman, we rather think that our jurisdiction at least should be knowledgeable about our potential in markets outside of continental North America and we came back armed with some pretty specific and rather satisfactory information.

Of further interest to the House, the best market in Europe at the moment, or the most active market, would be Germany. Germany, by virtue of government policy, interpreted by the central bank, or Bundesbank, as it is called, has elected to make capital available to borrowers outside of West Germany in an effort to provide a better balance to their international balance-of-payment situation. This is precisely why it is being done and being encouraged by the central government. And there have been some quite substantial loans arranged over there. Notwithstanding that we think there are still funds available. But I say to the House that there has been no decision made as yet as to whether this source of capital will be made use of; that decision has not been reached. I have not been back long enough to make it possible for those who make the decisions to have given sufficient consideration to it. But all in all, it was a worthwhile tour.

As far as the consolidated revenue fund is concerned, certainly if the method of borrowing and the same credit factor is employed in those markets as is the case in Canada and the United States, then of course, the money would be raised on the credit of the consolidated revenue fund in the same manner, although I am prepared to say to the House that from a technical point of view it is easier to borrow money in Europe than it is in the United States or probably in Canada. The technical difficulties are not there to the same extent—it is much easier. At the same time, the long-term credit is not there to the extent that it is here. It is available but for a shorter term unless certain special arrangements can be made and certain cost factors can be met. But the technical details of borrowing, particularly Germany, are very simple. They are very easy by comparison.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether there is much more I can say other than to report to the House that it was from my point of view, and of those who accompanied me, a very valuable trip. It was worthwhile to gain this knowledge and experience, I think.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the comments of the Provincial Treasurer—

Mr. Chairman: Order, please. I would point out respectfully to the leader of the Opposition that the Provincial Treasurer was asked to report on his trip which he did, and which in the opinion of the chair was somewhat irrelevant to the bill specifically and perhaps if there is going to be any discussion or debate it could more properly be discussed in the Treasury estimates.

Mr. Nixon: Well, I know you would not want to anticipate anything that I might be prepared to do, but I would like to ask the Provincial Treasurer to what extent he is going to approach the $400 million limit? The limit varies from year to year. He is budgeting for an overall deficit of $250 million and it is obvious he will have to have access to more than that in order to keep the business of government moving from day to day. But to what extent does he believe he will have to use the credit, the power to borrow that is extended here? I wonder if he could make some sort of an estimate as to what the costs of these borrowings are going to be? Is there any way to estimate this previous to actually entering into agreements?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, Mr. Chairman, I wish I possessed a crystal ball. I can assure you if I had one we could use it to the very great advantage of the province.

I would assume that the amounts shown in here—and it is less than it was a year ago by $100 million—represents what we may anticipate borrowing. You must bear in mind that the—

Mr. Nixon: You did not go over $400 million last year.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: No, but our bill last year made provision for $500 million. Our experience was less, last year, so we have asked for less authority this year.

Mr. Nixon: Very responsible.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: And we think we can live within it, but it must incorporate the extent of our borrowings not only in the usual type of capital market, but also our borrowings from the Canada pension fund, and all these—the whole picture is wrapped up in here. I cannot with any degree of assurance tell you whether we will be on the button or whether we will be a little less. Obviously we cannot be over it without coming back to this Legislature with another bill.

Mr. MacDonald: Maybe that is why we have a fall session.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Let us deal with these sessions one at a time.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: I think that is fair, but obviously we have restricted ourselves to this amount of capital borrowing and just how close we can come to it or not, I cannot say. At this particular point in time, Mr. Chairman, I would be rather reluctant to indicate—and I think you will see the practical wisdom of not indicating—the precise extent to which we were going to engage ourselves in the capital market under any circumstances. I doubt very much if it would be consistent with good business, if we make our capital requirements known prior to actual borrowing.

But I leave it to the hon. members, sir, as to how wise it would be if we tipped our hand to the extent that we were going to enter the market. It would not be good business. We have never done it.

But we believe that this amount represents, as accurately as we can contemplate it, the amount that will provide for our capital requirements. Now as far as rates are concerned, this is why I would like to have a crystal ball. I can assure you it is very difficult to anticipate; the market has eased a little bit in New York, I believe, since President Johnson decided to impose a surtax to cut expenditures.

Mr. Nixon: And the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: And the Bank of Canada rate has reflected the easing of the money market and within the last day or two. This is quite true. So I would like very much to hope, of course, that trend would continue because the cost of borrowed capital has been very, very substantial. Fortunately, I say to the House—and maybe we are abusing the privilege of House in committee here a little bit, Mr. Chairman, but nevertheless, it is maybe quite appropriate to say this—I can tell you that we have stayed out of the capital market to the greatest extent possible because of the related cost factors.

We were not obliged to enter the market last year as much as we had anticipated; by the judicious use of liquid reserves and we hope to continue that into this year, as I mentioned in my Budget. And the more judicious use we can make of our liquid reserves and the greater extent to which we can stay out of a costly capital market, I would hope the House would concur, is good business and good management. So I assure you, Mr.

Chairman, I assure the committee that this is what we propose to do. And this is why this particular bill in the form shown represents the best of my knowledge, the best that I can tell the committee; it represents the amount that we think we can live with in terms of capital requirements.

Mr. Nixon: Just one more question as far as I am concerned, Mr. Chairman. How much of the Canada pension premium contributions that come back to the province would be reflected in this $400 million? How much of that we will take up?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, it would represent—

Mr. Nixon: Eighty per cent?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Three quarters for sure. It is difficult to tell really; we draw against the Canada pension fund from time to time as it accumulates in Ottawa. Then, of course, as you know, we give a security to Ottawa for it, and we take one back from a school board or municipality in the other hand. The rates are essentially the same. The rate that we pay Ottawa is the same rate that we lend again, plus a fraction of a percentage for administrative purposes and cost of handling. Again, to tell you with any degree of accuracy, is very difficult. Your figure might be fairly close. But having told you that then, you know quite a bit, do you not?

Mr. Chairman: Section 1. The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I have two or three somewhat technical questions to ask the Minister on clause 1.

I notice in the bill that there is no section repealing any other bill which authorized borrowing and fixed the limit. I just assume that when this bill is passed, it thus supersedes any previous borrowing authority; but I am, as a technical matter, curious as to why in some way it does not so state.

Now, perhaps, if I put the other questions, too, the Minister could answer them rather than deal—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: There is a new Act every year, of course, and this Act sets aside the previous Act. There is no question about that, and there will be none; it is an annual situation if required.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I am just raising the point, I do not pretend to know what is the reason of it. It seemed to me that if any banking institution was looking into it in a very technical sense—as they do in the United States—somebody might very well say, "Well, is this the only authority, what about previous authority?" Maybe there is no problem. I only asked the question. I do not pretend to know the answer to it.

The second point, though, I think is of some greater substance; it refers to the principal amount of securities issued and sold shall not exceed, in the aggregate, $400 million. I had thought that the criteria anyone would look to is the question of what securities under the authority of such a statute as this, are in fact outstanding at a given time, or am I wrong? Is this an authority up to $400 million? Or is there an authority to issue not only up to $400 million, but if a certain debt has been retired in the interval to take up the slack by a further issue. In which case the vital criteria would seem to me to be the amount of indebtedness which is at any time outstanding.

Just to pinpoint the matter, and I am not going to move it as an amendment, but it did seem to me that if after the word "Act" in the 16th line, the phraseology "and at any time outstanding" were inserted, the bill would be considerably clearer as to the limitation which was imposed.

The other comment relates again to borrowing abroad and that is—how is the equivalence established between borrowings which are made in foreign exchanges? How is that related to the Canadian dollar figure of $400 million, when we are in a relatively unstable international situation so far as devaluations of currencies may take place? There must be some standard by which equivalences are established if you borrow in deutschmarks or lire, or in United States dollars. Again I was curious as to what the standard of equivalence is? And my last point is who, in fact, in the government maintains the control over and is responsible for the adhering to the limitation imposed by this bill?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: The limitations imposed by this bill, I suppose, in the first instance would be vested in the Treasurer more particularly than in the department, through the Deputy Provincial Treasurer and the Comptroller of Finance. Comptroller of Finance is the officer of the department who largely deals with the matter to which the hon. member has made reference.

Now, with respect to the matter of borrowing outside Canada; in New York, of course, the loans are made in terms of United States funds and payment is received in terms of United States funds. They are then converted into Canadian dollars and the prevailing rate of exchange applies.

There is no way, no way that I am aware of, where you could write into a prospectus or in terms of the registration process in Washington, any device that would protect you. The payment is in American dollars and of course, subject to the prevailing rate at the time of the payment.

On the other hand, in the initial circumstances, if American funds are received and converted into Canadian and a constant situation remans, there is no appreciable cost because what you gain in the first instance, upon repayment, you lose. But the provisions, sir, of the securities exchange commission of the United States are very, very rigid. They are rigid to the extent that i's must be dotted and t's must be crossed and names must be inserted of various officers who are authorized to sign and execute documents. It is, as I was commenting earlier, much easier from the technical point of view to accomplish a loan in the European market than it is in the United States market.

By saying that, Mr. Chairman, I hope I am reassuring the committee that the provisions of the statute that the Treasurer produces are submitted to the House in the light of the very rigorous requirements in the markets in which we have to borrow, particularly the United States market.

It is in recognition of these particularly rigorous requirements that our statutes are so drawn and if they were not drawn in an appropriate fashion, I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the committee, we simply would not be able to negotiate a loan, because the securities exchange commission would send us back.

It is on a basis of some experience, then, that I would almost have to propose to you and to the committee that they accept the legislation as being written in the terms that are required for these purposes.

Mr. Bullbrook: Well if I may, Mr. Chairman, I was not overly taken by the comments of the hon. member for Riverdale and I do not think he was overly concerned himself, but when you do read subsection 2 of this legislation, in conjunction with his remarks, your appropriate or sister statute of 1967 is still law. Then of course, your limitation is not $400 million any more.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: That is correct. But one more piece of assurance: It is an exceptional circumstance because we would not be approaching, shall we say, New York, for loans in those proportions, but any loan or a combination of loans in the United States market that exceeded the figure authorized in here, simply would not be possible.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, I would like to sound a warning, if I might, to the Provincial Treasurer and to the government. I fear you may be making an error financially in doing your borrowings in the United States and in European markets and through—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: We have not made—

Mr. Shulman: You are considering it, I understand.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Only the possibility. No engagements have been made.

Mr. Shulman: Let me, before you make it firm, point out some of the pitfalls which perhaps have not been pointed out to you. One of the pitfalls, particulary—

Mr. Chairman: Is the member referring to borrowing in the European markets?

Mr. Shulman: Yes sir.

Mr. Chairman: Well with respect, the member will recall what I suggested to the leader of the Opposition. The Provincial Treasurer made a statement about his exploration of the possibilities of obtaining funds and I did suggest that it would be more properly debatable under the estimates of The Treasury Department and specifically this bill is simply the authorization for the borrowing of funds up to a certain amount. It indicates in no manner, how or where they will be borrowed and I do feel that such debate could properly be pursued in the Treasury estimates. It is not in this bill.

Mr. Shulman: Inasmuch as a portion of $400 million is going to be quite definitely borrowed in the United States; would this be relevant to the debate?

Mr. Chairman: I do not really believe there is any reference in the bill where the money is going to be borrowed. It is a normal annual bill.

Mr. Shulman: But is it a normal matter to borrow a portion of this outside of Canada? What I wish to discuss is not specifically borrowing in Europe but the fact that a portion of this money is not borrowed in Canadian dollars. This is the point I am getting at and which has been discussed already by at least two other members and I would like to pursue that particular point.

Mr. Chairman: I think perhaps, as a matter of information, the member might put questions to the Minister.

Mr. Shulman: All right, sir, to continue. Borrowing made in the United States some ten years ago was made at par. We now have our dollar devalued by 8 per cent, so that you have been penalized that much. We will be penalized that much, Mr. Chairman, when repayment is made and I would like to suggest to the Provincial Treasurer that a far more serious situation could develop if borrowing is made in other countries. We found in the particular country that he mentioned, just some seven years ago that a very large number of other countries had borrowed money in West Germany and they then played a very dirty trick. They did not devalue, they revalued the deutschmark upwards.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Shulman: And everyone who had been foolish enough to borrow there suddenly felt very, very unhappy about the situation.

I would like to suggest to the Provincial Treasurer that the largest possible amount of money should be borrowed here in Canada, in Canadian funds, because if you do not borrow it in Canadian funds you may save 1 per cent or perhaps even more in interest rates but you may find that when the time for repayment comes that you may lose your 1 per cent back plus a great deal more.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Well, Mr. Chairman, the observation of the hon. member is quite correct. This was recognized in Germany. It was discussed in Germany, and the possibility of revaluation must always be considered. I would have to say, upon investigating this matter and discussing it at length, not only in Germany but in other markets in other areas, that it is regarded as a very unlikely possibility. I would assure the House that really we are digressing, but we are on the subject here now anyway—

It was a very unhappy experience for everyone the last time, including Germany, because revaluation, of course, does not put them in a preferred position as far as trading is concerned. It benefits everyone but Germany. But the possibility must be recognized. It is recognized, and I assure the House, no engagements or commitments were made nor will they be made until all these matters are properly pursued. I simply wanted to assure the House of those situations.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we have a limitation here of $400 million, and if we were borrowing these moneys outside, and, therefore, incurring this heavy exchange loss, as has been mentioned by the member for High Park; might it be wise for the Minister, and for provision to be made by the Treasury board, for reserves against such exchange devaluations as is commonly done in corporate borrowing where they do set up reserves. They all hedge against this. We could find ourselves not only owing $400 million, but perhaps $450 million, or more, and therefore, we would have exceeded the limitation as set out in this bill.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, the comments which I made, and which the member for Sarnia has made, are not by way of indicating that the bill in its traditional form has not been adequate in the past. I would think that between now and the time this bill is introduced next year, the Minister should refer it specifically, in terms of its draftsmanship, to legislative counsel. It is quite true that when you read the bill the aggregate of $400 million is in addition to all sums authorized to be raised by way of loan under any other Act which would take in all preceding Acts.

I realize you get to the point of ridiculousness. Traditionally, it has worked, but it certainly is inaccurate.

I would also again reaffirm the point I made: that what we must, in fact, be talking about, is not issued and sold in any particular period of time, but what, in fact, is the maximum amount outstanding at any one time. That is the limitation which must govern the operations of the Treasury and the bill does not so state.

Sections 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 149 reported.

THE MUNICIPAL UNCONDITIONAL GRANTS ACT

House in committee on Bill 154, An Act to amend The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, section 1 has carefully deleted boroughs within Metropolitan Toronto and I gather that this has raised the problem in other areas of grant, where they feel that grants like these should be going to them for services that they specifically have to look after, such as recreational activities and others. They feel that they are being by-passed in the way that this is now being worded. Would the Minister set out the reasoning for excluding the boroughs within the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs): I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that is the purpose of the section particularly. The purpose of the protection is to include a regional municipality in this particular case —which happened to be Ottawa-Carleton.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, this is also excluding the municipalities in that region from getting the grant. Why is the grant going to the metropolitan or the regional governments instead of the boroughs?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Well there have been many arguments made on this. This is what was done in the case of Metropolitan Toronto for one good reason—because, in total, it provides more money.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, why will they not be getting their money through normal tax levies that they assess the member municipalities, instead of going to the regional government grants which hopefully go down to the benefit of the municipalities themselves?

Mr. Chairman: Does the Minister have any further comment on this?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: If you will look at the schedule, you will see that when the municipalities are lumped together, they are going to get a higher rate of grant. This is the purpose of the Act. So, obviously, I would assume that the boroughs are happier in the city taking a grant of $7 per capita on a metropolitan basis, than taking, for example, in one case $5.75, and I suppose in two cases, $6, and in the remainder, $6.50. So in aggregate they are receiving much more money.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Is this the carrot to entice the small municipalities to unite?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: To small municipalities to get together.

Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. R. F. Ruston (Essex-Kent): Mr. Chairman, on section 4 here, I have noticed the discrepancies in the grants to municipalities, towns and villages, cities and so forth for some time and I really think that in some way it is discriminatory, that we pay larger grants because of population. I do not know that this is too fair, when you think that sometimes the population of municipalities could be smaller or larger and that the tax rates are much higher locally. I think that it was very discriminatory—to take, for instance, a township or town or village having a population of 7,000 to 10,000; they get $5; while a city of 200,000 and over gets $6.

I fail to understand why this should be so. I think that this should be more uniform, and I think I heard someone on this side over here a minute ago say that it is encouraging them to get larger. But I think there should be other methods of getting our municipalities larger rather than just to bribe them with a dollar or two here. I really think that the govenment in the past has had a habit of trying to bribe the people, as well as the electors, with a dollar or two here or there and has been successful, but I do not think that it is the best way to go about it. This is very discriminatory to the towns and villages and townships and smaller cities, the way that the grant is made, and I think that it should be equal regardless of the population.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent): Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few remarks along the same lines as the hon. member for Essex-Kent. I thought that maybe the new Minister in this department would adjust these unconditional grants a little more fairly. Of course, the municipality which has 750,000 gets $7 and the smaller one, around 2,000, gets $4.50. I might say that we have heard so much about the province of opportunity, and I thought that this new Minister would adjust this more evenly across the province at the $7 level.

I hope that the Minister will give this thought before he makes the final decision and make these unconditional grants, no matter where you live in the province of Ontario, so that they all receive the same amount. The small municipality has not got very much in the way of sewers and water. This morning I went over to the Ontario water resources commission, the municipalities' reeves and officials were told that the sewerage system would cost them $300 per house in this village per year. I am telling you that this unconditional grant should be changed and the smaller municipalities should receive the same as the large municipalities.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I wonder if my friend would allow me to interrupt? I think that we could go on with this for a couple of hours and if we got out Hansard we would find that we went through it last year and the year before. The whole purpose of the bill, very simply, was to honour the commitment made by the government in the assumption of the costs of administration of justice. There are no principal changes. It brings the north in line with the south and it did precisely what the Treasurer undertook to do. I think that we could spend several hours and have a really hot rural-urban fight here this afternoon, and we would not accomplish anything.

Mr. Nixon: A new Minister should have new ideas.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: My friend from Essex-Kent said when he was speaking that perhaps the slogan should be "amalgamate and escalate," but let us not get into all that this afternoon. Mr. Smith made certain recommendations with regard to these grants and the matter is under study by the government, the select committee is examining them, and we are taking a look at them, sir, and I imagine that there will be some changes. Whether they will be along the lines suggested by my two friends from Kent this afternoon, or along the contrary line about to be suggested, undoubtedly, by my friend from Yorkview, and adhered to by others in the House, let us leave that for some cool winter's day next year and get on with something else today.

Bill 154 reported.

THE MUNICIPALITY OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO ACT

House in committee on Bill 145, An Act to amend the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I would just like so say that I am glad to see the Minister is giving the council power to decide what remuneration they are going to pay the chairman and the members of the council. It is quite valid to give such power to an important-sized corporation of this sort.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that people should set their own salaries. I would like to suggest that there should be an amendment in this Act stating that any changes in salaries should be effective only after the election following the changes made. And I would present this for the Minister's consideration.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I am wondering if that should apply to The Legislative Assembly Act as well.

Mr. Nixon: It probably should.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 4:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 4, would the Minister explain the reason for the rewording of section 4? They have put these words in: "from any source whatsoever towards an expenditure". What were they correcting, what sort of a situation?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Let me read the explanatory note. I think we have described this as housekeeping. It brings the two sections, section 79 of The Metro Act and 86 of The Highway Improvement Act into the same language, which concern the same thing, mainly a deduction of all contributions to cost of road improvements. The wording of section 79 is somewhat more restrictive than section 86, and Metro therefore suggested that the language should be broadened.

Mr. Chairman: Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, section 5—again, is this the same type of thing to bring it into line? It does not seem to be by the notes. Is it a very slight change in the wording? It says "adjoining property that is lawfully used and is owned for commercial and industrial purposes." Now, I am just trying to remember my notes on this. Does this mean that it actually has to be in the master plan now or it just means that they can pass a resolution without a bylaw to allow someone to use these untravelled portions?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: There was no authority to lease the space if the building was a legal non-conforming use. The building is there, and obviously there is a boulevard there which perhaps could be leased, but it was not possible formerly, because it was not a conforming use. As long as the building is there, then there is no great harm in leasing the space. So that is the reason for the word "lawfully".

Mr. Chairman: Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, who set the limit at $130,000? Why is it set there for the Toronto transit commission, raising it from $80,000? Why is the limitation set there? We seem to have given, in the first section of the bill, powers to set their own salaries; surely they can set how much they are going to be granting annually to the transit commission towards the cost of free transportation.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: This is the amount that Metro thought was appropriate, and I think it worked out with the transportation commission, but frankly, I would agree with my friend, that point was not raised. I can see no harm really in what he suggests. I do not think it is that important, but perhaps we could make a note of that. The next time the bill is amended, I suppose it could read, "may make an annual grant to the Toronto transit commission towards the cost", and so on, and leave the amount out. I cannot see any harm in that, but I have not discussed this with the Metropolitan chairman or the solicitor. We would be glad to, before the legislation comes in again. I cannot see any reason why it should not be removed.

Mr. Chairman: Section 6 agreed to.

Does the Minister have an amendment to section 7?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: There is a conflict of wording in section 7. I move that section 7 of this bill be amended by adding at the end of subsection 2(a) the following words: "or of the member appointed in place of the chairman under subsection 5". That ties it in.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if this is correct? There seems to be a little bit of an advantage given East York and York in that they can have an alternate sitting, even though they cannot vote, in keeping track of the proceedings of the school board meetings. But in the case of the other boroughs, if one of their two representatives becomes ill, they do not have someone sitting in the background and being kept informed by his presence of what is going on at these meetings. This struck me as being a bit of an advantage to East York and York township unless we gave the others the right to have an extra member sitting in on the meetings although not participating.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: The problem is here, and I think you are aware of this, that if the chairman of an area board is a separate school supporter—I think this is right—he cannot be on the metropolitan board, and that is the reason the alternates come in to play.

Mr. Chairman: Shall the motion carry?

Section 7, as amended, agreed to.

On section 8:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 8, does anyone else get that mileage payment that they are providing for in the school board? There seems to be a difference, also, between the payments to the metropolitan separate school members and the ordinary school board members, and why would there be this difference?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: As you will appreciate, these sections come from education rather than from us. But the Minister without Portfolio from Scarborough North (Mr. Wells) tells me that there has always been this difference, on the basis that separate school members only attend half of the meetings in fact, and this is the reason for the difference.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 8 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 12:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, in the matter of The Metropolitan Toronto Act—this is to do with the board, is it, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: Yes, police commission.

Mr. Deacon: Should we consider having this board enlarged so that it can include, say, a member of the board of trade, a member of the labour temple, and more representatives from the citizens at large?

Perhaps if we could broaden our representation on the police commission, instead of just having magistrates and the chief magistrate of the city, we would have a more representative group of citizens. We might overcome a lot of the ill-feeling which seems to build up occasionally between the police and the citizens through lack of understanding—

Mr. Chairman: May I respectfully point out to the member that section 12 of the bill provides for change in the composition from one magistrate—one person only—rather than two magistrates, and while the member may have a valid point, it is a part of the principle of the bill.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, then I will suggest that in subsection (d) instead of the wording "one magistrate designated by the Lieutenant-Governor", we have "one person appointed by the metropolitan council"?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Just answering your point briefly, I think you will realize that the Metropolitan Toronto board of police commissioners, in consisting of five, is greater in number than most others, I think. Hamilton has five police commissioners, and there may be one other municipality with five, but of course most municipalities in the province only have three on the police commission. Frankly, from my limited municipal experience in the department, I have never heard it suggested that it should be a larger group than three, or in this case five, and that has never been suggested to me. I think there is a reason for keeping it a small group and I had never heard the view that it should be enlarged with that kind of citizen participation.

Now, your specific suggestion, as you know, for composition presently, includes three people who are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council, and two who, in effect, are representing the metropolitan council; and this amendment preserves that balance of three and two, although it changes the composition from two magistrates to one magistrate and one other such person.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, is there any provision in the basic Act, which I have not examined, about there being in office for a specified term and there being a rotation of the members? One of the problems that people have raised is having the same people on the commission year after year and being really unable to look at things in maybe a new light. Maybe some rotation in personnel and provision for this in the Act here would help the situation that I have been raising about poor relations between the public and the police.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: These people are all appointed—well, of course the mayor is not appointed, he is ex officio; the others, or the chairman in the case of the metropolitan commission, are appointed during pleasure and perhaps it should be that there should be a greater turnover. I would be glad to take a look really at the—the composition of police commissions is in the Attorney General's legislation generally. We have been moving generally towards putting a fixed term into legislation, and then if it is the intent of extending that term they can be re-appointed. Perhaps that would not be a bad idea in the legislation for police commissions. In which case it should certainly follow as companion legislation in this Act.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I am suggesting—I am glad to hear the Minister say he will take it under consideration—but I am suggesting that between terms there be a one-year gap at least. This makes it much less difficult not to re-appoint someone than would otherwise be the case. You can come back to a good man the second time if you want to but it is not nearly as awkward.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that that should be. I think of some police commissions which I am familiar with, and particularly now, where you have just one member of the judiciary and you have the mayor. There is a constant turnover there, or there can be. Perhaps there is not, and perhaps the third person can provide some continuity as well so that all the continuity is not in the hands of the judiciary which may, or may not be a good thing. I can see arguments both ways and I suppose there is for that reason good reason for leaving it as appointments during pleasure, but we will be inclined to have a look at this.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, that matter of continuity can be taken care of by overlapping the terms, and then people are carrying on who have had experience.

Mr. Chairman: Sections 12 and 13 agreed to.

I believe the Minister has an amendment to section 14?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes. I would move that section 14 of the bill be amended by adding at the end of section 203 "as re-enacted therein" and section 355 of The Municipal Act.

Motion agreed to.

Sections 14 and 15 agreed to.

On section 16:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 16, some licensing, I think, should be down at the local level. This provides for licensing by the metropolitan commission but local businesses and vendors in each borough should be controlled by the boroughs themselves. Apparently at the present time a lot of delays are being experienced in red tape in getting some of the metropolitan licensing through, and I suggest that consideration be given to breaking the licensing down between areas that should be handled by a local bureau, and those which are and should be licensed on a metropolitan basis because of their mobility, such as taxis.

Sections 16 and 17 agreed to.

On section 18:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 18, is this to help encourage charitable and other institutions sponsoring elderly persons' homes and accommodation?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, but each year there have been a number of private bills dealing with this exact subject and it seemed appropriate that this is certainly within the competence of the metropolitan council if they wish to do it rather than having them come with private bills. This gives them the power to do it. Whether they will exercise it that much or not I do not know.

Section 18 agreed to.

On section 19:

Mr. Deacon: In connection with section 19, Mr. Chairman, which has to do with the O'Keefe centre management, I think in view of the Smith committee recommendations, regarding accountability for the enterprises, that it is very important that we have some sort of limitation—certainly very careful reporting—as to the operations, financially and otherwise, of this centre.

Under subsection 3:

> The metropolitan council may by bylaw establish general policies to be followed by the board of management in the operation and management of the centre.

Does that bylaw for general policies include artistic, or financial limitations of any sort on this? Are they going to be absolutely free to move whichever way they want?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Well, subject, of course, always to the fact that any borrowing has to be approved by the metropolitan council. The metropolitan council, of course, is going to take any surplus, and is responsible for any deficit. Within those limitations I think they do, as I read the Act, have a considerable amount of freedom which, I would think, includes freedom in the artistic sense as well as in the financial sense.

Mr. Shulman: I am a little disturbed by this section of the Act. I think the council is involved in a rather poor business deal. The O'Keefe centre is a great huge barn of a place which is suitable for very, very few productions because the plays are so unsuitable that anyone in the balcony, or anyone behind the first 15 rows needs field glasses to see what is going on.

The O'Keefe Company—the brewery—made a mistake in building it, but they were smart enough to realize their mistake and they were clever enough to be bailed out by the city of Toronto, and I think that this Legislature is making an error. If there is need for another theatre, surely it is not a theatre of that size. If the city wishes to get in the theatre business they should build one according to specifications needed by the city and not take over a completely unsuitable building which must remain empty for a very large period of time unless they are going to put in plays, or other displays which literally cannot be seen. I think that the council has made a mistake; I think Mr. Allen has made a mistake and I think the Minister has made a mistake in this particular section.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: With great respect, I would not agree with the member for High Park. I personally would not agree. I am told by the chairman of the metropolitan council and I think that last year, other than taxes, and I assume, other than depreciation, the centre has been, and can continue in their opinion, to be operated at no cost—they simply will not pay the taxes. Now, I personally feel that is not a bad contribution for a municipality to make to the artistic life of a city, or of a community, or of a province, or of a country for that matter, if we forego, in this particular instance, collecting municipal taxes.

But aside from whether I personally agree or disagree, or whether the government agrees or disagrees as to whether this is a particularly a good deal artistically or not, I feel that this is certainly within the competence of the metropolitan council to decide whether it is a good deal; whether this is something they want to do or not do. And they decided that they wanted to enter into this agreement; they want to operate this theatre. "More power to them", the Attorney General says, and I could not agree more.

Sections 19 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 22:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, why is not a normal majority of council required for spending money on giving information out on the advantages of the municipalities? It seems rather strange that this should be selected and separated out and subject to a three-quarters majority for any such expenditure.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Actually the section, Mr. Chairman, which this is replacing, named the amount of money plus an increase in the amount of money, and I said, again going back to this principle, "Why should there be an amount of money made? Why should we not take the limitation off, or at any rate bring it into agreement with The Municipal Act?" And this is, of course, what The Municipal Act says. Three-quarters poses a council. I think perhaps The Municipal Act is a little bit more restricted.

Mr. Chairman: In any event the amendment has to do with the amount of money.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: That is right. I think this is perhaps traditional with the diffusion of propaganda—advertising in the broader sense—and I think we recognize, Mr. Chairman, the legitimate purposes of municipalities today. I suppose at some place in the past they were considered different from other kinds of expenditures, when these limitations were put on. I am not sure they need to remain but the provision should be the same whether you are spending $1,000 on a new map or $1,000 on a new motorcycle for the police force. Presumably, in both cases a simple majority should be enough to carry it, in my view, and I would hope that when we have a good look at The Municipal Act, we would make those kind of changes in The Municipal Act and then amend this Act accordingly.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I am certainly glad to hear the Minister take that view because I think the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld) would be very upset if he had to have three-quarters majority for any moneys to be expended here in this government.

Sections 22 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 145, as amended, reported.

THE MUNICIPAL ACT

House in committee on Bill 155, An Act to amend The Municipal Act.

Sections 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 5:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 5, does this amendment mean that any time there is a vacancy there has to be a new election?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7:

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, in connection with section 7, subsection 3, where a vacancy occurs in the office of alderman, I would like to suggest to the Minister that when such a vacancy occurs it should be stated by statute that the next person who receives the highest number of votes should be appointed to the vacancy provided he has a reasonably-sized vote. In my opinion this is the democratic way to do it, and this would prevent the political jockeying which we see at the present time in Toronto, where it depends not on getting a large number of votes to be appointed—which is the way we are all elected—but being appointed by having a large amount of influence, and I would like to make this suggestion to the Minister.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, if I could comment on that? In many elections in Toronto and other cities, in two aldermen wards the first two could get substantial votes and the last one could perhaps get 50. I have seen this happen. Surely, the suggestion by the member for High Park makes no sense in this regard. Very often you get a crackpot on the ballot who runs a bad last and can get no more than a handful of votes. Suddenly, he is elevated into office by no one's wish other than by the accident of the length of somebody else's life. I think this makes no sense at all, Mr. Chairman, and I think the suggestion put forward by the member for High Park was just not thought through.

Sections 7 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 11:

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Chairman, on section 11 I would like to ask the Minister whether he considered the resolution that had been submitted to him requesting:

> Provision for reimbursing any person for expenses incurred by such person for the fees and expenses of counsel employed by such person, where in the discretion of the judge, the incurring of such expense was justified and the judge may order by whom and in what manner the same shall be paid.

This section, I would understand, Mr. Chairman, refers back directly to the investigation in the city of Windsor, and it would clear up the allocation of the expenses involved in conducting the hearing. An individual that may be grieved against could be put to a fairly large expense in employing legal talent, and where the investigation absolved the individual completely he would still be liable for all of the legal expense. In this section I do not think it allows the judge conducting the hearing to allocate costs, does it, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, it does not, and I think you are referring to the resolution from the Windsor utilities commission. We have looked at it and propose to have a further look at it. There are several ways in which investigations can be carried on, if they are thought necessary. In Bill 241 it originates at the counsel level, and then there are sections which allow the Lieutenant-Governor in council to initiate an enquiry—appoint a judge and initiate an enquiry. In none of these sections—and I think there are three or four, and I believe there are some sections in The Education Act—has it ever been thought desirable that costs can be awarded by the judge? It may well be that they should be, but if we were going to amend Bill 241 this way we would want to take a look at the other sections in the same way, not only in our legislation but in legislation of other departments. We propose to do that and that may be a good thought.

Mr. B. Newman: But in the meantime, if an individual is involved in a sizeable amount of financial outlay, he would have no resource at all. He would be obliged to pay it himself and that really is not fair, is it?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I suppose it would vary from situation to situation. It is perhaps one of the penalties we all pay when we run for public office, I do not know. It would vary, certainly, from situation to situation. I suppose it depends on who ends up being right and who ends up being wrong. But we are going to have a look at this and perhaps we can find—

Mr. B. Newman: I mean retroactively in your looking at it; would there be any, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: What we have been talking about is going on. I think we could deal with it after the next fall session and probably still come in on time.

Mr. B. Newman: As long as you keep this in mind.

Section 11 agreed to.

On section 12:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the chairman of the emergency measures committee has the power in an emergency after the council gets bumped off. I am wondering what the thinking of the Minister is here, that this person should be designated this power? The emergency measures organization has not had much success in its operations so far, and I am wondering why the power is vested here rather than in some other person or official?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Let me read the explanatory memorandum:

> When there is an emergency as defined in The Emergency Measures Act, 1962 and 1963, and the council is required to appoint a person or persons to fill the vacancy or vacancies in the office of mayor, reeve, deputy reeve, controller, alderman, or councillor, when a quorum of the council cannot be obtained among the surviving members of the council capable of performing his or her duties as such, or where there are no surviving members of the council capable of performing their duties as such, then the chairman comes in.

Sections 12 to 16, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 17:

Mr. Young: In section 17, Mr. Chairman, there is a problem that most of us in municipal life have faced from time to time, and that is the blockage of natural water flow. We have water courses and drains mentioned here, but often the problem is that people who are established in the municipality find themselves becoming neighbours of a subdivider, and he builds the land above the level of their lot. The result is that the lot becomes a lake and there is no recourse except to sue the subdivider because of the blockage of water and the creation of a lake in the backyard. This happens time after time, and the little person, the ordinary citizen in the community, cannot go to court very well against a subdivider or builder. So he sits there and takes it, and finally goes to the expense of building his lot up to the height of the surrounding lots.

I am wondering whether or not, while making this provision, we could not insert two or three words here for prohibiting the obstruction of any drain or water course or natural water flow, and require the person obstructing the flow to remove the obstruction that is perhaps not in the words that the law officers would like, but it does convey the idea that if there is a natural water flow across the back lots, then if anybody obstructs that and therefore causes the water to back up and flood a person's backyard and basement—as often happens in a case like this—there should be some legislation to give recourse to the person so wronged. I am wondering if the Minister might consider this, and whether this might in some wordage or other, be incorporated into this legislation?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would want to give it a great deal of thought because if there is an example as you have given, where there is a flow of water across the back of a lot, where there is not presumably a municipal or private drain—

Mr. Young: No defined water course—

Hon. Mr. McKeough: You see, I think that the remedy is there should be a drain constructed under the Act, The Drainage Act. I suspect that people knowledgeable in drainage matters, would tell us that perhaps you might be discouraging the building of a proper drain, or deepening a ditch or whatever needs to be done. You were into what I think is a housekeeping amendment, which I think perhaps corrects an oversight when it was amended before in this amendment. I would be glad to give some thought to the matter you are raising, but when you get into this matter of drainage practice and law, it is a very confused field.

Mr. Young: I know that it is a very vexed question, Mr. Chairman, through you to the Minister, but it is a problem which is going to be very much with us, particularly as urbanization proceeds.

The smaller cities, as they develop, are going to find this more and more of a problem, because very often we have people who are established in an area, who may have a backyard that slopes into the house. Then the natural drainage comes off one way or another and the situation has been that way for a long time. But it is not on a water course; it is just something which happens in the spring, when the snow melts or when heavy rains come. Then somebody builds alongside him, the natural drainage is blocked and the water goes into the basement instead of along the natural flow.

I think that this should be looked at very carefully by the Minister and by the officers in charge of framing legislation, so that some solution to the difficulty can be found for people who are bound to suffer in greater numbers as urbanization proceeds in the province.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I will give the Minister an example. Up in Richvale there is an avenue where, in the backyards there has been load after load put in of fill. My most recent correspondence was from a lady where the last load of fill went in. The problem is such that the council of the municipality has not been able to cope with.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18:

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, on section 18, there are some good parts to it, but there is something really bothering me. It is a question that is not being taken hold of by the province. It is still left in the hands of the municipalities to fight out among themselves.

There have been very many sad experiences in other jurisdictions where a wealthy municipality adjoining a less wealthy one, bribes the less wealthy one by large payment. They dump garbage in the less prosperous municipality, causing pollution conditions which are very difficult to clear up later on.

In this case, of north Toronto, we saw last year a very costly case. Metropolitan Toronto used its very strong power against a weaker municipality which objected to what they felt was an infringement on their rights. They had to spend many thousands of taxpayers' dollars on legal fees to protect themselves. I feel that it is wrong for us to proceed with this section. It is a section that, I feel, we should put aside and deal with in another way.

It is very good to see the item concerning the ability, or providing the municipality with the ability, to take action on private lands where garbage disposal is occurring, which right they did not have heretofore. But I am very concerned about the fight that we are going to see, certainly in that region north of Toronto, if we do not deal with it in this Legislature in legislation and planning.

Under this legislation, a municipality can go into King township, or some other area, and dump garbage up north and get it away from their own boundaries. I think that it is very important that they not be allowed to do so, unless they have proven to the satisfaction of your department that there is no other site within their boundary that is available. This is a very contentious and troublesome section for us to proceed with and I would ask that the Minister consider amending it in the bill.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): I agree, to some degree, with what the member for York Centre has said. The whole matter of land fill and garbage disposal is one that I have just recently come into a great deal of contact with. It seems, as I view it, that after the municipality receives permission to establish this area for garbage disposal, The Department of Municipal Affairs and the municipal board then sort of wash their hands of it. The people who reside in the proximity of the disposal area then suffer all the consequences.

The one area that concerns me at the moment is that of health. We just received in Hamilton a report on the pollution emitting from the Hamilton garbage disposal area, and I think that before granting permission to establish such an area, we have to take a very careful look at what we consider to be landfill. We cannot just take areas that are lower than others and fill them up to bring them level. Sanitary landfill is not that; sanitary landfill is taking an area, digging it out and filling it up in layers so that we do not have the sort of saturation of the area that we have in most of the garbage dump segments today.

Now, in Hamilton, we are faced with a great problem. On Hamilton Mountain we are faced with a health hazard, and before The Department of Municipal Affairs gives permission to any municipality to establish a dump, they should carefully review the conditions under which sanitary landfill will be permitted. I think one of the conditions must be that there shall be no emission of fluid from that dump into any waterways. This is not being carefully viewed at the moment.

There are many areas where the natural fluids from the dumps are flowing into the natural waterways and we must stop this immediately. It can only be done if we go to an entirely different method of garbage disposal. I do not believe the landfill method has proven too satisfactory, particularly in municipalities the size of Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Well, Mr. Chairman, in dealing with subsection 5 of this section, there are no easy answers to this whole problem. The hon. member for York Centre has suggested it should be deferred until some other more satisfactory method can be found, but I do not think there is one, frankly. I suppose some day in the future somebody will discover a way to dispose of garbage cheaply other than by landfill, but that way has not been found as yet.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Stop eating.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Yes, the hon. Minister, who is always very practical, says we can stop eating and that would solve the problem.

But this was determined—after a great deal of study by officials of my department, officials of The Department of Health, the water resources commission—it was considered to be perhaps the only practical way of handling the problem. Very briefly it provides that a municipality can go into another municipality, presumably to look for a site for a sanitary landfill operation, and if the municipality agrees then of course there is no problem. If the municipality does not agree, then ultimately it can go to the Ontario municipal board, which will hold a public hearing and hear the arguments on both sides and allow or disallow it to take place.

Now, nothing in all of this interferes with the rights of the local medical officer of health, or The Department of Health, particularly under section 6, nor does it interfere with the powers of the Ontario water resources commission in this regard. If there are circumstances such as the hon. member has described, and I am sure there are—I went through one in my own riding a mile from my house where a good friend of mine, as a matter of fact, wanted to locate a sanitary landfill site and I thought it was a dandy site.

It turned out there was going to be a problem or there could be a problem. There was a remote chance, really, I think even the commission would put it in that way, that the level of the bottom of this abandoned gravel pit was at the same level as many wells, a half a mile or a mile away. The member for Kent would remember the discussions that went on. Eventually the municipality said no, having had the advice of the commission, having had, I might add, the advice of the MOH, who was not as concerned. And eventually another site was found. It is a very messy, tricky problem and there is no easy solution to it.

Mr. Deans: I wonder if I might make just one observation? One of the big problems seems to be that the department of health—and I am not thinking about the provincial Department of Health, but the medical officer of health—seems to take the same attitude that perhaps the Minister of Correctional Services takes, and this is unfortunate. The thing is this, that we are allowing much too large an area to be used for sanitary landfill in many cases instead of restricting it to a much smaller area and getting it over with and getting it out of the way. It is a sort of perpetuation of filth and stink and stench and infestation, and this is what is wrong with it. Perhaps they should not consider allowing such large areas to be used for sanitary landfill. I think we could go to other means of disposal—they are available—but at least limit the size of the dump in every case; give it to a small area that can be filled in a year or two years rather than going on for 10 or 15 years.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I just add, of course, that there are a number of examples—and I think particularly of Belleville, where that really magnificent Centennial park has been created over a number of years, and as I understand it is still being added to. I am not arguing with the member. I agree; I think sometimes the area designated may be too large and it is not cleaned up before going on to another area.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the Minister feels there is no alternative to this Act, the way the wording of it is now in that section, because I am sure that the province should be taking a responsibility, and his department basically should be taking a responsibility, for solving any area of dispute between municipalities in this, instead of leaving them to fight it out among themselves, especially when you have a very large municipality, such as Metropolitan Toronto, up against a small one to the north. It seems very important that the onus should be clearly in the Act; the onus should be clearly on the body seeking to use an area in another municipality to prove that they definitely do not have any area in their own territory. It does not state that here, and it does not put that onus on them, it is only onus by implication. For example, there are studies and there has been considerable work done in disposing of sanitary landfill in freshwater bodies where the proper protection and barrier has been constructed to prevent pollution of the freshwater bodies and the seepage has been treated in sewage plants. Some discussion of this took place at the OWRC conference last winter at the Inn-on-the-Park and it is quite possible that Metro Toronto could make excellent and valuable land development available or park development along the waterfront if it pursued that line of attack on its garbage disposal problem instead of attacking small municipalities to the north.

I urge the Minister not just to leave this Act, this section as it now stands because it is just going to lead to a lot of battle on the part of these municipalities.

Sections 18 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

On section 22:

Hon. Mr. McKeough: I would move that section 406 as re-enacted by section 22 of the bill be amended by striking out "remuneration" wherever it occurs in section 406 and inserting in lieu thereof in each instance, "allowance". These are to make the wording consistent in other sections of the Act.

Motion agreed to.

Section 22, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 23 to 31, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 155 reported.

THE ASSESSMENT ACT

House in committee on Bill 156, An Act to amend The Assessment Act.

On section 1:

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Minister for the reason for the "whether paved or unpaved"? I understand there is some problem here, and could I ask the reason first before I make any remarks?

Hon. Mr. McKeough: For many years it was interpreted that pavement was not an improvement for business tax assessment. Then I guess some people suggested that it was an improvement, and to clarify it, and without really debating the merits of it one way or another, the intent of the Act insofar as the department was concerned, "pavement" alone did not constitute an improvement. And this simply clarifies the intent of it, so all shall know.

I think it is probably fair to say that the recommendations arising out of the Smith report and a more thorough look at The Assessment Act may well change it or turn it upside down. I do not know, but rather than have a lot of confusion we felt it was advisable to clarify this.

Mr. Young: Then that brings us within the 10 per cent assessment, really. I was just wondering how that is going to affect the assessment in many municipalities where the assessment on the parking lot of Dominion stores or Loblaws may be regarded as something more than the 10 per cent assessment. This will automatically bring it back to the 10 per cent and this will be what will happen so that assessment may in effect be lowered in many cases.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: No, we do not. No.

Sections 1 to 7, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 156 reported.

THE POWER COMMISSION ACT

House in committee on Bill 158, An Act to amend The Power Commission Act.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3:

Mr. Nixon: On section 3, just one question. This section says that notwithstanding anything in this section, no contract between the trustees of a police village and the commission for the supply of power shall be entered after July 1, 1968. Does that mean following that date there will be no new contracts, or that no contracts with police villages will be entered into and therefore a police village supply will all come under rural hydro?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): No new contracts.

Mr. Nixon: The ones that are established will be continued?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: I understand so, yes.

Sections 3 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Bill 158 reported.

Hon. Mr. McKeough moves the committee of the whole House rise and report certain resolutions, certain bills without amendment and certain bills with certain amendments and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of the whole House begs to report certain resolutions, certain bills without amendment and certain bills with certain amendments and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 17th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. Chairman: Before we proceed with these estimates the Chairman would just like to take a few moments to draw certain matters to the attention of the committee.

I think yesterday, particularly last evening, there was a great deal of debate that was actually out of order, due in some cases of irrelevancy, in other cases due to repetition. I think there was an exceptionally great degree of failure to recognize the authority of the chair. Consequently the debate was carried on endlessly, and I think that the Chairman should draw to the committee's attention that it is the Chairman's intention to abide by the tradition of the rules and the traditions pertaining to committee procedures, in that discussion and debate is supposedly and has been much freer than while the House is in session.

There is a great deal more latitude permitted, and I think that the Chairman has always attempted to see that this is carried out. It is the Chairman's intention to continue to do that, that we do not have to abide completely and entirely and rigidly within the rules that govern the House while in session. However, I do ask the members if they will attempt in future, while we are dealing with the estimates, to try to stay within the rules of the House and avoid repetition and irrelevancy and to please pay a little more attention to the chair.

On vote 207:

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. On Thursday evening, June 27, as reported at page 4889 of Hansard, the Attorney General said this, "I took the occasion to say that so far as my knowledge runs there was no tapping of the phones of the two magistrates in question".

I am advised, sir, that in the final edition of tonight's Telegram the feature story on the front page states quite clearly and definitely that the phones of Magistrate Bannon and Magistrate Gardhouse were, in fact, tapped. The Telegram story quotes certain persons from whom they got that information. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney General must clarify either the correctness of that story or the information that he conveyed to the House on June 27 last.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, I do not propose, for a moment, to verify any story that appeared in any medium of the press. I did not read the article. I do not know what it says. I take it that it says what the hon. member recounted, but my answer still stands at this moment the same as I gave before, So far as my knowledge runs, I only knew of the tapping of the line of one person.

Mr. Singer: Then, Mr. Chairman, continuing with the point of order, does the Attorney General not have a duty to fully inform himself as to whose phones were tapped, and to advise the House accordingly?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I do not think I have any such duty, Mr. Chairman, at all.

Mr. Singer: That is a shocking thing to say. Just terrible.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 207, office of the director of the land registration. The member for Sudbury.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I should like to ask the Attorney General, whether any progress is being made in the way of encouraging the registration of land in this province in the land titles system.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, Mr. Chairman, considerable progress. During the past year we have brought in under the land titles system quite a number of areas on application by municipalities and by our own initiative urging that this be done. We have plans in view which I think will expedite this further as we move along in the future. It is our objective to get one land system of a land titles type to cover all the land of Ontario.

Mr. Sopha: Would the Attorney General be able to give the House an estimate of what year we might project in the future that all the land in this province might be under the land titles system?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I do not think I could state a year. One of the things is that there is considerable survey work to be done in fairly large areas of Ontario in order to make it possible to bring the title in the state that will be acceptable to land titles system. It has to be a certified title which you can guarantee is good.

The other thing that I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, is that I think the hon. member may recall, or may be aware, that the whole business of real property is one of the subjects being studied by the law reform commission under reference. I would expect it to make some very definite recommendations very shortly, when the study is completed. I think we would prefer to get those recommendations and then to implement them, and I am sure we will find it possible to do that. But I cannot name a date when that will occur.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the director of land registration. The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Would the Attorney General please tell me why it would not be possible to pass a law of this Legislature saying, that after a certain day, every transfer of land in the province of Ontario, which takes place, will be made through the land titles office, as a simple method of getting this programme under way? If this had been done in 1945, a substantial part of the metropolitan area, for example, would now be in land titles.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I suppose you could pass a law. It is easy to write an Act and say that, but the Torrens system, which is land titles, requires that the title be such that it may be guaranteed. It is a title behind which the government stands and assures that the person getting the title gets a good title without qualification.

Now to simply say, by a law, that the registry offices, where we have to search titles, henceforth would be in land titles, would require, in many cases, a survey to establish the boundaries. This is a very expensive and time-consuming thing, and somebody would have to bear the brunt of that; either the individual property owner, the purchaser or the vendor, or the government. For one thing, we would not have enough surveyors to do it all at one time. It would require a great expenditure of money, and I do not think that it would be proper to put the expense of that on the individual. The way it is done just now is to bring it in in bulk by sections, by our own initiative. In northern Ontario, of course, a great proportion of the land there is under land titles. But I think that we can only do it from the registry offices in a somewhat piecemeal way; because of the expenditure and the difficulties in surveying and certifying the titles that are there, inherent in that registry office system.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, when I was a law student there was a very wise man who was the deputy registrar in the registry office —I am not sure that I have the title, but he was the senior civil servant in the registry office in Toronto—and he had been there a great number of years. I suppose he knew more about titles in the city of Toronto than perhaps anyone who has been there before or since.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Was he in the land titles office?

Mr. Singer: No in the registry office. He never got to be registrar, because those were the days when the registrar always was the political appointee, and it was the deputy registrar who ran the office. The political appointee sat there and took the bows.

Mr. Sopha: Those days have not changed.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Hepburn days!

Mr. Singer: Nevertheless—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What year were you a law student?

Mr. Singer: After the war.

An hon. member: Which war?

Mr. Singer: The Boer War.

Mr. Chairman: Will the member be more precise?

Mr. Singer: Nevertheless, I remember talking with him one day, and he said in all seriousness, if somebody gave him the power to guarantee every title in that registry office and he could charge a dollar a title, he was sure he would end up a millionaire, because the very few bad titles in there really were not worth worrying about. I have remembered that remark for a long, long time, and I think what this gentleman said made abundant good sense. Which brings me to the point that our profession is doing a job in dealing with land that is not reasonable or fair to the public.

You can get an ordinary type of transaction where you have a lawyer for the vendor and a lawyer for the purchaser, and perhaps a lawyer for each of one or two or three mortgagees, all of whom, except the lawyer for the vendor, is going to charge the full tariff, based on a percentage of the purchase price, which includes a guarantee of titles. So you have three or four or sometimes five lawyers searching the same title, because no lawyer will accept the report of another lawyer, and if he is going to guarantee a title, it has to be his own guarantee.

I think that this is one of the things that goes to raising the cost of real estate. It must be. And I think, by and large, it is useless, and, by and large the legal profession deserves to be criticized for allowing the situation to continue and in not speaking out in a loud and clear voice and doing something about changing it.

Going back to my friend, the deputy registrar in the city of Toronto, I do not think it would be nearly the monumental task that some of us have assumed in the past, to put all of the property in the registry office in Toronto, which is probably the largest one in the province, under the Torrens system, under the land titles system.

I would think if we set about it with a real verve, that we can get the thing done in a reasonable length of time. We could thereby save the people of Ontario an awful lot of money, because as soon as it became apparent that all titles were being guaranteed as they are under the Torrens system, the necessity for these repetitive searches and the necessity for the unreasonable fees, would begin to disappear. I think that we would be doing a substantial service for the people of Ontario if we could move in this direction just as quickly as possible.

I have said this on other occasions, and the Attorney General, substantially, has not disagreed with me. But I do not think that we are making much progress on this line, and I would like to hear his comments.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Lawyers are not going to kiss you for that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I just want to reiterate that the things the hon. member has just said, were set forth in the reasons of the law reform commission as to why they are doing the study. So I am confident they will come up with some very definite recommendations at this time. I have to say that since they are doing that study and should produce it before too long, I should wait until the recommendations. I am sure that this is one of their objectives.

Mr. Singer: The name of the assistant registrar has just come to me now. It was Sam Dodds, and perhaps many of the lawyers in this House knew him when he was in that capacity in the city of Toronto registry office.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the director of land registration. The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. Lawlor: I will not be long. There are two small matters that I would like to bring to the attention of the Attorney General. One of them is that I promised a number of people at the registry office to speak to you, since they have come under the administration of justice. They have not had a raise in pay, they tell me, for three years, and I had to promise on the basis of a discount of my costs, to mention this in the House.

The second matter was connected with the sheriff's office. The liaison at least in Metropolitan Toronto, and certainly in Brampton, and so on, of the sheriff's office in searching of executions, and the registry offices—not the land titles in this case which does the search of execution free of charge—but in the case of the sheriff's office, that is a very bad connection. And while you have pretended to automate it—it comes through by some kind of teletype machine—the situation that exists, the log jam that takes place there two or three times a month is appalling, and sets back the whole operation of the system. Surely some other way can be found in which the names of people, execution debtors can be transcribed from the sheriff's office to the registry office itself, at which the lawyers are waiting for word as to whether to proceed with their transaction. I can assure you there is often a tie-up for three or four hours and longer.

Now, the answer that we were given in the profession is, "Well why do you not do it the day before?" The fact of the matter is that it is dangerous to do it the day before, because it may not be until the last moment that the execution comes in.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the hon. member is correct in saying that they did not, as I understood him, and there had been no raise in salary levels.

Mr. Lawlor: I shall re-check with them.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I am right that these masters of titles and registry officers and the staff there, particularly the registrars and the masters, were reviewed and their salary levels increased last year, picking up over a period of two years back when they had them delayed. This matter, I believe, is again under review and assessment. In any event, I will note that and will make certain of that.

Now, the second matter which the hon. member raises about the delay in getting the list of execution creditors over to the registry office: I was not aware of that creating a backlog. It must be localized here because I have not heard of it in other centres, and I have not heard of it at all as the hon. member raises it. There should be no reason, as far as I am aware, why, if it is lack of staff, or a lack of modern equipment for transmission and notation of the list of execution creditors, that should not be brought up to date and modernized and I will look into that also.

Mr. Lawlor: I can vouch for that one personally.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not practise, of course, in Toronto, and I was not aware of that, but I shall certainly look into it.

Mr. Chairman: Is there anything further on the director of land registration? The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I want to pursue very briefly this question of the transfer of property to land titles. The legal profession has the monopoly in conveyance of real property in the province of Ontario, which is jealously guarded. The Attorney General can correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that the tariff charged by the legal profession is identical whether the transfer takes place in the registry office—and I am speaking about particular county tariff—or in land titles. The work for the transfer of titles through the land titles system is much less onerous, because of the guarantee of the title of the previous work which has been done. It is not possible that as some, even minor, incentive to get property transferred into land titles, the fee for the legal profession in transfers taking place in land titles could be reduced, so that the clients of the lawyers would realize that if they are buying or selling property in land titles, the legal expense will be considerably less, and that there might be some added incentive to them to put it into land titles?

The other obvious method, to my mind, is to provide that in land titles the transfer of property be done by public officials, and that there be no need, once land is in land titles, for the intervention of the legal profession. It is, in my view, certainly time that under the land titles system, the monopoly of the legal profession be removed, and be limited to the transfer of titles in the land registry system. I think this would provide then a very real incentive.

I would like also to suggest to the Attorney General that unless the law reform commission, in the terms of reference made to it of the study which is now taking place of real property, has specifically had directed to its attention, the need for the total renovation of the land registry system, as distinct from the elimination of the anachronisms of real property law, that that reference should be made now, and that I would ask the Attorney General to tell us that it is part of their terms of reference, or that it will be specifically made part of their terms of reference.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I wonder if the hon. member will just give me that latter question again.

Mr. J. Renwick: The latter question was whether the study being done by the law reform commission on real property is directed toward the removal of anachronisms in real property substantive of law, or whether their terms of reference specifically include among other things, the total renovation of the land registry system in the province of Ontario, either by immediate action of this assembly when the report comes in, or over a planned, phased programme which will see the end of the anachronistic system presently in effect in the land registry offices.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am certain, to answer the last enquiry first, that the study does cover substantive law. I know that I can answer the hon. member affirmatively on that. As to his question about anachronisms, I think that those are covered, but I shall make it my business to draw attention to the commission, if necessary.

I think that I mentioned earlier in the estimate that one of the persons employed by the law reform commission was Professor Mendes de Costa, who was carrying out a study of the basic reforms in our system, and I shall follow up from the question of the hon. member.

I think that it is a fact that the tariff charged by solicitors both in land titles conveyancing, and in registry office conveyancing is the same. Generally I think this is so. I believe that the tariffs are fixed by the local bar associations, and I think generally it is so, that the tariffs are the same.

On the suggestion of the hon. member that perhaps some inducement might be made to urge that land be brought under land titles—a reduction in the tariff under the land titles system—that might be a very meritorious suggestion. From my own experience which has not been in conveyancing for the past nearly five years, I must say that I would toss a coin as to my preference, whether I had to search a title and close a transaction in land titles or at a registry office. I found that while perhaps I had more searching to do, and took the risk—the responsibility of guaranteeing the title in the registry office—I found so many technical requirements in the conveyancing. If there was a mortgage, the amount of survey that was required in the checking of detail.

I found so much technical requirement in land title always, that I felt that system was becoming just about as cumbersome as, or even more cumbersome actually than, the registry office system, apart from the searching of title. And I would just as soon, in my practice in the one area of the province, close a deal in registry office as in land titles. I found myself sometimes doing much more work to satisfy the very difficult requirements of land titles. I have been concerned—I think I would say this here—I have been concerned with how this system has grown in its attempt to be perfect as to title, and has laid on some very technical requirements, some very onerous requirements. I would hope that they could somehow be simplified. Actually, I am giving consideration to that.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, would the Attorney General tell us whether there have been any claims made against the fund under the land titles system during his term of office as Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not that I am aware of. I think it is very unlikely that any have been. That assurance fund is held to a certain level now and we transfer the interest to the consolidated revenue fund but I know of very few claims down through the years that have ever been made against the insurance company. I had occasion one time, if I may speak of my own experience, to make a claim which I thought was a very valid one because the government itself had actually laid the title on, over a title for which an individual held a certificate of ownership. I made a claim but it was not successful, against the insurance fund. However, there was a compensation of another kind offered to that dispossessed owner. I have a note advising me that there have been a number of claims each year, approximately three or four, ranging from $500 to $5,000 each.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, there was a case which I came across—I did discuss it with the Deputy Attorney General; I think I wrote to him about it—where there had been a mistake made, based on an original survey which was made 50 or 60 years ago and the master of titles was compelled, under the provision to The Surveys Act, to review the whole matter. The Surveys Act has a peculiar clause to it, seeming to indicate that if the survey is wrong there should be no compensation.

There was an unusual way figured out as to how to get around it because the aggrieved person, the person down at the end of the same title, had acquired title from the land titels office and the title passed through several hands from the time of the filing to the original survey. Suddenly, someone else discovered that the survey had been wrong and the injured person appeared to be without a remedy because of this peculiar clause in The Surveys Act. As I say, there was correspondence addressed to your deputy and there was a way, I think, figured out to get around this unusual provision. But I would urgently suggest to the Attorney General that he review this matter and bring in the proper amendments because on the face of the statute and certainly on the face of the provisions in The Surveys Act, it does not seem reasonable that this situation might occur even one time again.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the director of land registration. Anything further on the part? Carried.

I wonder if perhaps the next two—is there anything there? This is still land titles and registry offices—is it my opinion those two particular headings are carried?

Office—official guardian's branch.

Mr. Singer: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say something about the official guardian's branch in connection with a matter that came to my attention not too long ago.

The official guardian's office seems to be an office that looks after matters that are brought to its attention as a result of an ensuing problem, usually as a result of possible potential litigation where there are people who are amply informed about their rights, probably through counsel, and where the official guardian acts then on behalf of infants or unborn infants or that sort of thing.

The case I refer to was where the father of three or four children, all of whom were under 21—they were quite young—died intestate. He had been separated from his wife who was excluded by his separation agreement from participating in his estate. There was a dispute between his brother and father-in-law as to who had the right to be the administrator of the estate and the dispute went on for an indefinite period of time. Whether the matter has been solved yet or not, I do not know. I tried to interest the official guardian in stepping in on the basis that the rights of the infants were being seriously interfered with because the estate was wasting. Nobody seems anxious to apply for administration and there were assets, not a great many—it was not a large estate—but there were assets that were disappearing for a variety of reasons.

The official guardian or a solicitor in the official guardian's office pointed a certain section of The Official Guardians Act out to me. It seemed to satisfy him reasonably conclusively that he had no authority to come in as of his own initiative. It would seem to me that the time has come to have a real look at The Official Guardians Act and at The Public Trustees Act, which is the next thing and to direct our attention as to whether or not these two offices could not and should not be expanded very substantially so that the two officials, the official guardian and the public trustee, have a duty placed on them by law to move into any matter where it seems that infants and/or other people who are not able to protect themselves need protection.

In other words, I do not think the limits should continue to be as they appear to be now that the official guardian and/or the public trustee come in only after the matter has been brought to their attention in the case of pending litigation on the case of an infant settlement or in the case of an interpretation of a will, and so on. I would think there should be written into both of these Acts, the responsibility addressed to both these officials, to have the general supervisory jurisdiction in favour of all people in Ontario who cannot otherwise protect themselves. And it should be sufficient to start the machinery of those offices working when it is drawn to the attention of either the official guardian or the public trustee, that there is a danger. And with little more ado, if they are satisfied that this is the situation, they can step in and they do not need the present assurances that both fees are going to be paid, for instance.

Another thing that bothers me so much in court is that when you see the official guardian in court and/or the public trustee, substantially they come to court to say, "We have agreed and our fees, Mr. Justice So-and-so, we would suggest, would be in the amount of $60 or $80 or $100" whatever it is. I would think that their interest as public officials in the branch of this department rather than being concentrated, to a substantial extent, on extracting fees out of these estates, should be to a reasonable extent to the protection of people who could not otherwise protect themselves.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think there is considerable merit, Mr. Chairman, in that suggestion. I was not aware of that. The official guardian who has a function—perhaps I should not say a duty—as guardian of infants' estates not the persons, would, I would have thought, on the request of a solicitor—I take it the hon. member was acting—have the capacity to act in that manner and would have come in.

Mr. Singer: I could not get him at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I shall be glad to look at that.

Mr. Singer: I discussed it with your deputy and he tried, too—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I shall look at that. I have made a note of it. On the other note on which the hon. member ended with the official guardian and public trustee, I think he mentioned the official guardian particularly; he seems to be interested generally in his fees. My own experience has been that when I think of the official guardian and the public trustee, which I have done, they sent long reams of instruction and questions querying almost everything that was done by the executor of the estate and questioning the way the accounts were set up and so on and entailing a lot of work and I think they well earned—

Mr. Singer: I am not saying—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say this: They certainly make me earn more than my fee.

Mr. Singer: I am not suggesting that the people in there are not competent, that they do not do their work, but I did suggest a couple of years ago certain things that I found wrong, and that situation has been cleared up. I am not suggesting that the people in those offices, by and large, are not very competent people and do not earn their worth, but you see them most frequently in courts, standing up and saying, "I concur in this, Mr. Justice so and so, please fix my fees at"—and this is sort of the constant memory that I have in any event of what they seem to be doing most often.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think, perhaps, I must say—perhaps I should not say it but I trust the hon. member has not been asked to act for the official guardian.

Mr. Sopha: No, but you would appreciate that—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I just wondered about that, but if he has I will tell him that the official guardian will make him earn his fee.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further under the official guardians' branch?

It being 6 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES
DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 207:

Mr. Chairman: Public trustees branch, agreed to.

On probation services branch, the member for Yorkview.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, in connection with the probation services branch, I would like to ask the Minister about the present status of his staff: How many staff members there are, what the case load is, the average case load, what is the maximum case load for any one member of the staff; and how does the Minister feel as far as the staff is concerned—is it adequate to do the job it is designed to do at the present time?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, the total number of probation services complement is 419. That includes the supervisors, the probation officers who are 256 in number and the secretarial-clerical service which is 136; a total of 419.

As to case load, the total number of cases under supervision: Adult cases, and I am giving the figures for 1967, 12,287, and children 6,584; a total of 18,871. That is an increase, I may say of 14 per cent over 1966.

I have not got actual individual case loads.

Mr. Young: Is that 256 actual officers?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Two hundred and fifty-six probation officers, plus the 27 who are supervisors; they are also doing the same work in a senior capacity as the probation officers.

Mr. Young: It is rather a heavy case load then.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is, I admit, a heavy case load. I do not have the figures, but they vary from individual to individual. The hon. member has probably worked out the average.

Mr. Young: About 70 average.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: About 70, yes.

I think the recommended number is around 50 or better or thereabouts; but not all of these are really the type of case that needs immediate or continuous, say weekly or bi-weekly, investigation so that while I might be prepared to admit that we are carrying a very heavy burden of work, with what might perhaps be considered to be an inadequate staff, the probation officers are all doing, I think, satisfactory work in the situation. While we have asked for additional complement I think we are able to carry the work load which is before us in a fairly adequate way.

Mr. Young: How many extra officers is the Minister asking for at the present time? What is he seeking to make up the proper complement to bring the case load down to adequate proportions?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have asked for 15 due to the takeover of the Ottawa and Sudbury juvenile and family courts for probation services and also the number of 12, nine probation officers and three clerical, making 27 altogether that we have added to our complement.

Mr. Young: I would take it, Mr. Chairman, that the 15 you are seeking for the Ottawa area would in part be filled by present staff there.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, that is right. The Ottawa and Sudbury areas are filled by present staff.

Mr. Young: That means about 12 new people?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Young: May I ask what are the prospects of securing that extra staff?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We have been able to get the staff we need.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): The Minister speaks as though there has been no particular problem securing qualified personnel. Now a few years ago, either he or his predecessor indicated that he had reached a point where it was difficult to get qualified personnel. Otherwise, the Minister indicated, he would have been willing to expand the staff. Are you running into difficulties in getting adequate staff or are you running into trouble with the Treasury staff in getting adequate money to hire the staff?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think that it is correct to say that we have run into trouble with the Treasury board on the moneys that we have asked for. We are treated well. We have some difficulty in getting the type and quality of person we require, but I must inform the House that I have applications on hand from persons wishing to be taken on as probation officers and while they have quite good qualifications they do not quite meet our standards; we are quite selective in this area.

I have had to inform some people that we just did not have a position open for them at this time, but it is not so much the difficulty in getting the quantity of probation officers that we want, but because I think that this is a very important area in which the character and ability and the understanding and approach of the person is most important.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, just let me add briefly, if I may: I would agree that I think standards should be safeguarded, but on the other hand, if this is not the serious problem and you are not having difficulties with the Treasury board, I would urge as fast an expansion of the staff as is possible. Returning to the figures that the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) put on the record yesterday, I think that as soon as we get away from as large a proportion, relative to our population, of people getting into jails instead of on probation, the sooner we are going to have a modern penal system.

Vote 207 agreed to.

On vote 208:

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss some glaring inconsistencies in the manner in which concern for public safety is expressed in the province. I want to deal with two very much contrasting situations, one in Metropolitan Toronto and the other in the city of Windsor.

In the city of Windsor in April of this year a group of people applied to the Windsor police commission for a carnival permit along with their application for a parade licence and a licence for the use of a city park in which to celebrate the emancipation day festivities. These have been carried on in Windsor since 1905, commemorating the freedom of the slaves in the United States and the British Empire.

The application for the carnival licence was denied by the police commission. The organizers appealed that decision to the Supreme Court of Ontario, which upheld the Windsor police commission. It did so, and the commission reached its decision, on the basis that public safety would be jeopardized by holding celebrations, which were to take place at the beginning of August of this year, many months after the application by the organizers was made. The police commission apparently has this wide discretion to anticipate events, to look at existing circumstances and from these anticipate how they may continue unaltered or changed in the future.

Now one of the ironies of the situation, Mr. Chairman, was that under the powers vested in the police commission to issue licences it had no right to refuse a parade licence. It had to grant the parade licence. Its only authority was to regulate the manner in which the parade could be held, and accordingly they granted the parade licence. Surely this is an utter inconsistency, that the police commission in the interest of public safety is empowered to grant a licence for one form of activity, or not grant it, and in the other case of the exercise of the right of assembly in a parade it has not authority to deny a licence.

I know that the Attorney General will say that there is a considerable distinction between the two matters, granting a parade licence and granting a carnival licence. Unfortunately, in this situation the two applications had to go hand in hand because the success of the festivities depended on the ability of the organizers to raise funds to pay for the celebration through the carnival.

Now I do not want to discuss the other element in this case, Mr. Chairman, which is a charge of discrimination by the organizers of the emancipation day celebrations against the Windsor police commission. What I want to discuss is the broad discretionary power which in the interests of public safety is given to police commissions to grant or refuse carnival licences. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that it is fortunate they have no discretion in granting parade licences—affecting the right of assembly, because I am convinced that in this instance, had the Windsor police commission had that authority, they would have denied a parade licence also.

We have the reports in the Windsor paper of the meetings of the Windsor police commission in which one member of the commission was quoted as saying, "if we do have the right to deny a permit"—it was not then established to the commission's satisfaction that it did not—"then I move not to grant it." There were other comments by the chairman of the police commission who said that he might consider granting the licence if the organizers agreeed to two conditions, one of which was the provision of statistics to the commission as to the number of negroes who might support the carnival.

It was an offensive and unnecessary examination of the applicants. Let me contrast that situation, Mr. Chairman, with what took place in Toronto on May 5, where a self-avowed Nazi, the leader of the Canadian national socialist party, appeared in Allan gardens to deliver a diatribe of hate against minority groups in this country and was protected, was protected, by the police of this city in such large numbers that they outnumbered the audience of David Beatty by several times.

According to the press reports of that meeting there were police everywhere. The man was surrounded by three rings of police, the middle ring of which was mounted. There were police on the rooftops of nearby hotels, and the deputy chief of police himself was present to direct operations, which the newspaper report said were carried on with military precision in anticipation, Mr. Chairman, that there might be some danger to public safety in view of the events that had taken place at the similar meeting held by this man in May of 1965.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): What was the date of this meeting?

Mr. Peacock: I am speaking of a meeting held in Allan gardens on May 5.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): It did not get any publicity and now the hon. member is giving it publicity.

Mr. Peacock: The second meeting, Mr. Chairman, did not get any publicity, but the first meeting which John David Beatty held this year, occurred on May 5 in Allan gardens. I am saying to the Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, that where the city of Toronto had no alternative but to grant this person the right to speak in a public place they provided hordes of policemen to secure his person and to prevent rioting, in order to protect his right to spew out hate and venom against minority groups. Yet in another community of this province we are unable to guarantee the public safety of people participating in and helping to organize and observe a long standing commemorative event, Mr. Chairman, which we in this province regard as something which distinguishes us, we often point to this as something which distinguishes us, from our brothers on the other side of the river that divides Windsor from Detroit.

Now I think, Mr. Chairman, that if regard for public safety is to be paramount in events of this nature, then surely, Mr. Chairman, we can find ways of guaranteeing to peaceful citizens the exercise of their rights. Why should a responsible citizen be denied the right to carry out an activity celebrating something which he cherishes because someone else might happen to come along and interfere with it.

What the police commission has said what the Attorney General—what the Supreme Court of Ontario—has said is that "X" will be denied his rights because of what "Y" may do in the future. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the discretion which the police commission has exercised in Windsor in this instance, a discretion which has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the province, has got to be narrowed by statutory amendment and has got to be placed in the same category as the right of the commission to issue permits for parades and the right of municipal councils to issue permits for the use of public parks for public functions.

I hope that the Attorney General will consider introducing such a statutory amendment and end the situation which resulted in such a glaring inconsistency as between Toronto and Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am very interested in the remarks of the hon. member. I think he perhaps overlooks some of the factors, some of the facts and some of the features of this matter.

In the matter of the Beatty situation in the city of Toronto, which he mentions and which he outlined, the commission had no hesitation, or at least they granted him the right to appear; and as the hon. member said, he used the occasion to spew out hate and venom. They had some knowledge, some previous experience, of what was likely to happen, of his attitude, his approach and what he was likely to do. While they granted permission for the meeting and the demonstration of the occasion, they were there in large numbers, and in the interest of public safety; not to protect him so much as to protect the public. That is one thing.

In the situation in Windsor, which happens to be a border city; bordering the great city of Detroit where there have been disorderly situations, riots, shootings, damage to property, injury to persons; it certainly could be well anticipated that if the permit requested was granted there would be a large influx of people from another country. I hesitate to say a foreign country but technically that is so.

I have great confidence in the behaviour and the conduct of the citizens of Windsor, Ontario, but I think it could be well anticipated, and the police commission was well aware, that if permission were granted for the carnival, which was an extended situation over a number of days, there would certainly be, particularly on the occasion of the parade, an influx of persons from another country who have a different approach, apparently, than our atittude towards respect for law and order; which they have demonstrated across on the other side of the river, across from Windsor.

It is not for me to say whether the police commission was right or wrong. The matter was referred to the human rights commission and was referred to the Supreme Court of Ontario, which held that the police commission had within its authority and within its power to refuse to grant the permit relating to that matter. That is determined by the court, and I accept the decision of the court.

The hon. member, I take it, suggests that in these circumstances, for reasons which he has set forth very succinctly and very cogently, that we should now consider changing the law relating to the matter and make it possible for some other approach to be taken. I can only say to him that I think it is within The Municipal Act that the authority is given, that is where the legislative changes have to be made.

He says surely we could find ways to carry out peaceful demonstrations. Well I think we can if we were dealing with our own citizens, but I am sure he would be fair enough to say that this is a situation where we were not dealing simply with the citizens of our province. This is a border situation where there has been demonstrated, within a very short distance across the border, a very different situation than we contemplate and than we have to face in this country. Surely the police commission of the city of Windsor had to take into account the facts of the matter and to anticipate what would be likely to happen if a large number of citizens of that country were to come in, and with their attitude towards certain things, what they consider a grievance, demonstrate in our country their resentment of a situation which they have faced in their own country.

I think perhaps we are not to be involved in that if we can avoid it.

In any event, all I can say is that the Supreme Court of this province, having reviewed the matter and having decided that the police commission of the city of Windsor had the power to decide to take the action they saw fit, it is scarcely for me to say that the court decision was wrong.

When I come to the suggestion of the hon. member that we should make a change in our statutory legislation, I would be glad to think about the matter, to consider it further—as I point out, I think it comes within The Municipal Act—but to make a firm decision that I would accept that suggestion at this time, that I am not prepared to do.

Mr. Peacock: I hesitate to charge the Attorney General with drawing blanket conclusions about the character or the probable behaviour of people who are invited to an occasion in Windsor, because the only point of fact on which the counsel for the organizers of the emancipation day celebration, who is associated with the Canadian civil liberties union, and the counsel for the Windsor police commission and the city of Windsor itself agreed, was that there would be approximately 10,000 people in attendance.

Nothing at all, Mr. Chairman, was assessed as to the conduct of these people who had arrived in Windsor from Detroit and other parts of Michigan; many of whom, I stress, would have been invited by the organizer of the celebration. I ask the Attorney General: Under any other circumstances in maintaining public safety, could not the same measures be applied? For example, the border controls, the Windsor police themselves with their knowledge of individuals who might cause trouble; surely, Mr. Chairman, surely it is an unfounded assessment of the situation to say that the people invited to come to Windsor are likely to cause trouble.

How can the Windsor police commission, or the Supreme Court in endorsing the police commission's decision—and I will quote from the opinion of Mr. Justice Scott:

> In my view there was evidence before the police commission to justify the fear of a possibility of civil disorder in Windsor by the emergence into that city of large numbers of negroes from Detroit over a period of several days in August, 1968.

Sure, Mr. Chairman, there had been riots in Detroit in the summer of 1967, and again very briefly, and very minor ones following the death of Martin Luther King; and certainly there was a possibility that some of the people who participated in the riots of 1967 and those following the death of Martin Luther King would attempt to cross the border and possibly take part in the parade or the carnival. But is there not, Mr. Chairman, just as much likelihood of criminals and hoodlums from Windsor itself jumping into the situation in order to cause trouble? Do we deny the right of people to meet and assemble and carry on a business activity in support of their celebration because there is a danger of someone, no matter what their colour or where their origin, causing trouble?

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the danger of the anticipated trouble just was not established. I think that the frame of mind of the police commission, it is on the record, was wholly against the holding of the celebration this year. I think that the same restriction that applies in the case of the granting of the parade licence should be considered in the granting of the carnival licence.

I appreciate the necessity for the exercise by the police commission of due care for public safety, but I believe in this case, Mr. Chairman, they allowed their better judgment to be put aside. They allowed other factors to influence them, which they should not have allowed to influence them. I think to prevent that happening in the future the Attorney General should give that suggestion consideration.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I cannot let the matter rest just here.

I have said I would be willing to give the matter consideration, but surely the hon. member does not suggest that the police commission of Windsor should shut its eyes to the facts, the circumstances, which surrounded this application. True, we could argue, as he has argued, that people could come in, and they might be the most estimable citizens, from the neighbouring country; but the fact is that there had been riots, there had been killings, there had been shootings, there had been disorders; and the situation is aggravated by certain recent events in the United States. Not to be aware, not to anticipate a large influx of these citizens for this particular type of carnival—this particular parade—not to anticipate that would be to shut one's eyes to what everything circumstance pointed up was likely to happen, was likely to occur in this country.

As I say, we were not dealing here just with a local situation with our own citizens. I think the police commission was bound, in the interest of public safety to the citizens of Windsor, to take into account all these factors which almost guaranteed what would occur.

I think to close my comments on this matter and on the member's suggestion for a change in the law, we might observe a situation which is current and see what happens in coming weeks, and then perhaps assess the whole situation.

We are not dealing here, and I make this point clearly and firmly, we are not dealing here with just our own citizens or our own territory, or our own citizens or country; we are dealing with the question of admitting, in a border city, a great number of people from a different country, who take a different view and who have a problem which does not concern this country at all, because we are not faced with it. I think that any commission that shuts its eyes to those facts would be derelict in its duty.

Mr. Peacock: I would like to pursue just one more point.

I am unaware, and I am sure that the Attorney General is unaware, as was the Windsor police commission, of any particular circumstances surrounding the application within Windsor itself; unless, this is a backhanded way of saying that Windsor has its own problems of the kind that exist in the United States and that any admission of people from the United States who are negroes is likely to create a flashpoint that will draw out of Windsor people the same kind of violence. This is the inference that is left by all of this.

Mr. Chairman, the whole point of the celebration is to bring people together who have something to celebrate other than the violence and trouble between the races in the United States. That is the whole point of the celebration.

We are not asking people to come over to our side to start trouble, we are asking them to come over to Windsor to participate in the celebration which commemorates and honours the act of emancipation. How the officers responsible for public security and safety in the province can leap to the conclusion that there will automatically be trouble, as they have—they have not just talked about the possibility in many of the public utterances, they have said that there will automatically be trouble if this celebration was held. I might say in parenthesis that it is not going to be held in Windsor because of all the difficulty surrounding this—is something which I find extremely difficult to cope with in the House. I do not want to get into the other issue in this case, but I am afraid that it is facing us and we are going to have to deal with it, in terms of race relations in the city of Windsor.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We can deal with it in the city of Windsor, that is what I have been saying.

If it were a local situation, among our own people, I think that we could find reasonable, proper, fair and equitable means of dealing with it. But the hon. member is suggesting we grant this permit to invite into that situation persons from another country who have a different problem and who are aggravated by the situation there. I think that it is almost automatic that one would assume they would demonstrate in some way to show their dissatisfaction and disillusionment and grievances in our country, and create a situation such as occurred in the sister city of Detroit; which we would not want to have in this country.

I did not mention this when I stood up before, but the hon. member mentioned that with our border patrols we could contain the situation and that the police know these people. This is, I can only say, nonsense really; because border controls cannot distinguish the persons who come in, nor do our police know them, people from a foreign city who come in. These things would be useless in that situation. I think that I must say, with the backing of the Supreme Court, that the commission had the authority and properly exercised it with discretion.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): Mr. Chairman, I make no observations about the decisions of the Windsor police commission whatsoever. My friend from Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. B. Newman) and the others have that completely within their purview.

I am, however, concerned about the observations of the Attorney General. I was in some doubt about the position that he took, but he clarified it a second ago when he referred to the differences of the problem. It is perfectly clear that what the Attorney General for Ontario is saying is that these problems of race relations are American problems and they belong in the United States and he does not want to countenance the importation of grievances into Canada. Well I cannot let that pass of course.

Pointing out the historical contrast of the situation that our great grandfathers faced just over 100 years ago, at that time and in the intellectual climate of that day they were not content to leave the issue of slavery to be purely an American problem. They opened the doors of Windsor to allow refugee slaves to come in here, thus exhibiting great humanistic qualities toward those whom our great grandfathers thought were abused because of the state of laws, which in some way the Attorney General puts it tonight, were the laws of another country.

I used to think, until just a few moments ago, that perhaps I was too nationalistic. I am not nearly the narrow nationalist that the Attorney General for Ontario is, because he invites us to support him tonight when he says: "We have our border with the United States and the problems south of that border are their own; we must on no account countenance any demonstration in respect of those problems within the four corners of the province."

Now that is inconsistent with a couple of things. I prefer the attitude of a couple of thousand students who went down and demonstrated outside the American consulate one year ago about the treatment of the coloured people in Alabama. That enthuses me more than the Attorney General's view.

The other thing is that the Canadian government, notwithstanding very severe censure and a worsening of relations with Washington, has made Canada, other provinces but principally Ontario, a haven for those evading the Vietnam war in the United States.

That was a Canadian government decision. But I take it that the attitude of the Attorney General of Ontario is entirely parochial, that on no account must we have any form of demonstration in Canada that refers to some undesirable situation in the minds of the demonstrators concerning some other jurisdiction.

Well if that is his view, that is not the type of country I particularly want to live in. I am more an internationalist than that. I hope that, notwithstanding my devotion to this country, that my mind can range across the borders and worry about the plight of my fellowman elsewhere.

It may be that the Windsor police commission in the circumstances were right in their order. I do not quarrel with that, but I hope that their order was based on different reasons than those of the Attorney General for Ontario. I hope that they had other motivation than that, and I hope that we Canadians will not be so self-satisfied and so sedentary or unctuous in our beliefs that we can turn our backs on inhuman conditions elsewhere and say: "Well, that may exist there, but for heaven's sake do not import them into Ontario. We don't want to be bothered with them and we do not want any possible upset of our fairly droll and uneventful lives that some attention to those problems may bring."

Now, I do not think that I distorted his language. I think I paraphrased it quite correctly to show the contrast in his view and my own view.

One of the glorious chapters in our history was the underground railway, where we gave refuge to people who were going north. And by north they meant to Canada. That was the pseudonym for Canada. They called it going north. Martin Luther King, when the CBC invited him up here a year ago to give the Massey lectures, which is becoming quite an honour to be bestowed on a person, in the very first lecture he referred to the long-standing connection of Canada with the coloured people of America. That is how he began; he showed the justification of the CBC in inviting him here because of that long history of friendship and refuge and haven for downtrodden people, his people that he wanted released.

Well, to me, as a Canadian, I feel exactly the same way as my great grandfather must have felt when he lived over on the farm at Belleville in 1864, before then, that it was perfectly all right for those people to come in here. I would have them come in, I must say, without quarreling with the Windsor police commission at all, I would have them come in here and then show a little enthusiasm for their cause if they wanted me to.

It makes one feel all the more sore about it when one knows that this has been going on for a long time. This celebration has been going on for a long time and for the first time, this year, the door was closed to it because of insurrection across the border.

Now I want to make it perfectly clear that I do not quarrel with that decision, and if my friend from Windsor-Walkerville tells me it was all right, then that is fine with me; but I do quarrel with the reasons given by the Attorney General for Ontario for supporting it. That parochialism and national comfort that he portrays, to me, are for the birds.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Sudbury is a pastmaster of misconstruing and misinterpreting any straightforward clear remarks that one may make. I am just as proud as he is of the fact that in the days of slavery we were a haven in Canada to those who sought refuge from slavery. But to invite into our country the individuals from that system, which no longer exists, is one thing; to invite on a particular occasion a demonstration of persons who may demonstrate in a way in which they have demonstrated across the border of our country—with violence, death, destruction, burning, damage—is another thing.

He says this occasion has been going on for a long time. Certainly it has been going on for a long time, but it has only been of recent time, only of very recent time, that in our great neighbour, as a result of conditions that exist there, there have been these demonstrations, these violent demonstrations.

Mr. J. E. Bullbrook (Sarnia): You do not remember 1943 too well, do you, when they threw them off the bridge.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Only of recent times have these particular types of demonstrations been occurring in the neighbourhood to the south of Canada. To shut our eyes to that situation and to invite into a border city a situation which could develop into that type of damaging demonstration, I think would be no service to either our country or to the cause about which these people feel so deeply or to our neighbour which is so friendly.

Mr. MacDonald: Why are you so fearful?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not think it is a case of being fearful. I think we could contend with it.

Mr. MacDonald: Face up to it and do not cut it out.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But I am simply pointing out that there is no relation whatever to our attitude in the days of slavery and giving refuge to the individual and creating a situation where those of another country may come in and demonstrate in the way that they have demonstrated, with violence.

Mr. MacDonald: I agree with your criticism of the hon. member for Sudbury, but you are confusing the basic issue.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think this is irrelevant; I am simply saying that the member for Sudbury is a past master at—

An hon. member: Circumlocution!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, not only circumlocution, but at misinterpreting and twisting meanings and words.

Mr. Sopha: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not accept that at all.

Mr. Sopha: You said that it is their problem.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am no less proud than he is of the part that Canada has played in helping to free the slaves, but I do not think we have a part to play in encouraging what might possibly be a demonstration of the type that occurred across the river from Windsor. I think the police commission was right in its decision.

Mr. Chairman: If the members would not mind just for a moment: Before we proceed with vote 208, upon second look the Chairman notes that there are several distinct divisions within this vote, which divisions are quite clearly separate. Perhaps with the concurrence of the Attorney General and the members of the committee we could take this particular vote in the same manner that we did the previous vote under the specific, not item by item but under the various titles as shown.

For example, under the office of the assistant Deputy Attorney General there is an item in the previous vote in that very same title, but the centre of forensic sciences, emergency measures, fire marshal, supervising coroner are distinctly separated.

With the concurrence of the Minister and the committee—

Mr. Singer: He is talking about two different assistant Deputy Attorney Generals.

Mr. Chairman: The headings are identical, but as they relate—

Mr. Singer: It is headed the same.

Mr. Chairman: The Chairman quite understands!

If the committee concurs, and the Minister concurs, we will deal with it under the titles as indicated. Now if there is anything under public safety that is not specifically mentioned in these other items, let us have it now.

The member for Sudbury East was on his feet two or three times.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Mr. Chairman, through you to the Attorney General, last fall in a planned demonstration in the city of Sudbury, in an effort to bring a study area at the University of Sudbury called the Nags Head under the sponsorship of three university professors and certain people working with the alcoholic and addiction centre, a demonstration was lined up involving the university students. On the afternoon that the university students were to march the order came from the police commission that this had to be stopped. I went with the Reverend Colin Clay, to see the chief of police, and lo and behold I could not find him.

So we then left the police station and went over to the court house and saw the gentleman from the court house, who is also on the police commission. We discussed this matter of the university students having the right to march. They had made application, and at the last minute they were turned down.

We were told that—or we advanced the idea—that this being a university town we could expect demonstrations in the future, as all university students do this, and this would be the first. However, we were advised that the public safety was at stake and that any students who left that university to go to Bell Park in Sudbury would be arrested.

Now there were police up on buildings, there were police cars surrounding the park; and to show you how dangerous these students were, when they were denied the right to march we went back to the park and told them to disburse and go home, which they very obediently did.

Now this was not a very wild march and it was not a very enthusiastic group, not one that was going to break things. Yet they were denied the right. Certainly there was nothing similar to the condition my colleague from Windsor West outlined. Certainly the police commission's argument was opposed to what we were trying to do, or the theory that we advanced, that they had a right, a freedom of speech and a freedom of demonstration. The police commissioner said no, and in fact he elaborated quite largely on the fact that they had to protect the citizens of Sudbury.

Now there was no danger involved. We found one member of the three-man commission and it was denied; this very peaceful, orderly demonstration that could have led to no harm to anyone was denied.

Now again, in keeping with what my colleague from Windsor West has said, I think there has to be consistency somewhere. If we can protect the citizens of Toronto against Beatty, then certainly we should be able to protect the students' rights in Sudbury and the citizens of Sudbury, because it would not have been a wild demonstration.

I would appreciate the Attorney General's comments.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think I would agree with the hon. member, quite frankly, that perhaps there was no reason. I do not know any more facts than he has given me. Perhaps there was no reason to deny a permit for this march, this demonstration, this parade.

All I can say to him, knowing just what I know and what he has told me, is that this is a matter on which there is nothing in The Police Act which gives the police commission this authority. It is a matter which is delegated by the municipal authority, by the municipal government, to a police commission to pass upon the question of permits for certain parades, demonstrations, carnivals and things of that kind. If there is a problem here, which there appears to be—I do not think there is a problem in the Windsor situation other than it has been disposed of—but I think in the situation related to the House by this hon. member, perhaps we should look at The Municipal Act to see whether there should be some restriction put on that authority or that it should be retained by the municipal government.

It is quite conceivable, and I can understand that police commissions may exercise an authority delegated to them in a wrongful or in a restrictive way. I am not arguing or taking issue with what the hon. member has said. As I say, this is the first time that I have heard of this incident. It would be a matter for study in our municipal field of legislation to see whether that power should be enlarged or should be even more carefully defined, or whether it should be delegated to such an authority as a police commission.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further under general public safety?

Mr. R. Gisborn (Hamilton East): Mr. Chairman, I want to deal for a moment with the so-called anti-riot chemical Mace.

Notwithstanding the comments that have been made in the past few days in regards to this chemical, notwithstanding the questions that have been put to the Attorney General and the answers given, I feel that we should have a more clear statement and an enunciation by the government as to the continued use of this chemical in the province of Ontario.

This chemical was introduced in Hamilton by a police officer speaking to a service luncheon a week and one-half ago; very indiscreetly, I feel, and a lot of the citizens of Hamilton were quite concerned.

Now I am not an expert in this sort of thing. What concerns me, and I am sure concerns many people, is the indecision and the differences between the experts in this field as to whether or not this chemical will be injurious to health. There is no doubt that when it is used, as it was used in London, an innocent bystander could be affected.

I understand that the use of it was tested personally by a reporter in Hamilton, in keeping with instructions he was given by a police officer that it should be used at three-foot distance in three-second shots. He took the test and it knocked him unconscious momentarily, and burned his eyes and his body before he could get rid of it. He had to go home and change his clothes and take several baths. The after effects were something, as he puts it, he has never experienced before.

Mr. Chairman: Might I suggest to the member that earlier today this question was put to the Attorney General in a fairly broad manner and the Attorney General did provide answers at that time. I am just wondering whether the member for Hamilton East has anything further to add to that which has already been—

Mr. MacDonald: He has added a good deal more to it.

Mr. Gisborn: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I want to add my comments to those that have already been made.

The thing that concerns me with this weapon—and I comment under this estimate for the benefit, or for whatever conclusion the Attorney General may want to draw from it—the thing that concerns me is that this kind of weapon can be imported into Canada and can be used by the province, under the provincial police, and can be used and stored on the shelves of the city police without the decision being made by a political body.

I think it is incumbent upon the Attorney General of this province to use all of his good offices in connection with the federal authorities and the municipal authorities to see to it that some legislation is enacted so that if this kind of a chemical, a weapon, is going to be imported into this country, it should be on the basis of a decision made by the federal government. If it is going to be used in this province it should be decided by this Legislature; and if it is going to be used in the municipality it should be decided by the elected body in the municipalities.

How far do we know this sort of thing will go? We cannot tell who is going to use it and when. That has been experienced now. No one can tell the police or the municipalities when they can take it off their shelf and use it. It has been demonstrated now that they are carrying it and they use it at their discretion.

Certainly we know that narcotics in this country, and in all countries, are under strict control. But thieves and addicts get them. In my opinion, Mace would be a splendid weapon for the common thug and robber to use in holdups across the country. He does not have to carry a gun, he can subdue his victim for seconds, he can get him unconscious so that he cannot remember or identify the robber, and he can fleece him within seconds and disappear.

These are just some of the things that can happen.

I cannot see, for the life of me, why this sort of thing can be allowed to be used in this country without it being the decision of a political body, whether it be the federal people, the provincial people or the municipal politicians. I think the Attorney General should give more consideration to this situation than has been shown in his answers to the House during the questioning period this afternoon.

I think that it has been made very clear that he is concerned about it, and he says that he cannot interfere with the police commission; fine, that is decided by legislation. But certainly there is nothing to stop the government from introducing legislation that will put this kind of a chemical weapon under control in this province.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had expressed a pretty serious measure of concern about this matter this afternoon. True, it was not discussed in these estimates before. The hon. member makes several points. He spoke first of the possibility of stopping the importation into this country of this chemical —one name of it is Mace—but my understanding is that it is now manufactured in this country. If it were imported it would be a matter of restraining or preventing importation and would be a matter of federal jurisdiction.

This matter gives me as much concern as it does him, I assure him. If it is a defensive chemical it comes under The Food and Drug Act, which is also federal legislation, and should be controlled, I think, across the whole country by the federal government.

I am not trying to shrug off responsibility. He mentioned that it should be decided, and these were the words and I took them down, he said: "The use of this should be decided by the municipality." This is the point I made this afternoon, that this is where the control presently lies, with—

Mr. Gisborn: It should emanate from this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well perhaps it should. But the control—in the city of Hamilton, for instance, which the hon. member speaks of—the control lies with the municipal government of the city of Hamilton to say—

Mr. Gisborn: They have no control.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh yes they have; they have the control. They can say their police commission do not use this; that is all they need to say.

Mr. Singer: The council—can say that to the police?

Mr. MacDonald: Why can you not say it here then?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well—just a moment!

The mayor sits on the police commission, the local county judge sits on the police commission; and one other person, now surely—

Mr. Singer: Are you suggesting that council can direct—the police commission?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. But I am suggesting that surely the municipal council, if it has taken any stand in this matter, and I am not aware that it has, can express its views to its police commission.

Mr. Singer: They should express more—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. But I am not sure that they have.

Mr. Singer: The council cannot direct the police commission.

Mr. MacDonald: What is the good of that? You are expressing too much and doing too little.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I were the mayor of the city of Hamilton, I would have something to say to my local police commission, which would probably have more effect than what I say here to the commission.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, what effect did your previous statement have?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well I point out that there certainly is a local concern which should be expressed, which I am not aware has been expressed by the municipal government of the city of Hamilton; or the city of London, where apparently this bug was used.

The other thing that the hon. member pointed out was that the thug, the robber, the criminal could use this to subdue his victim to commit his crime. Well if this is so does it not follow that perhaps, I am not expressing this as my own view, but perhaps should not the argument be put forward if this is available to the thief, the robber, the criminal, should not the police be armed with the same weapon in order to counteract the activity of the criminal?

Mr. MacDonald: What about the argument that you ban the sale of Mace—and get back to the root of the problem.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes; it is all very well and I am sure—

Mr. MacDonald: You have the power to do that.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. I am sure, but let the hon. member be practical for a moment. You can pass the law which the police will observe, will observe and obey, that they must not use it, but does the criminal—

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): He will not get it if you regulate the sale.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Does the criminal obey the law and say—

Mr. Shulman: But do not make it easy for the criminal.

Mr. Gisborn: The criminal does not care.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sure the hon. members are not so naive as to believe that if you ban the—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: No, they want the Marquis of Queensbury rules.

Give the criminal the same break as you give the police. It's sort of a game. It is supposed a battle on the side of the police not on the side of the criminal.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Do the members wish the Attorney General to provide his remarks or not?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am sure the hon. members are not so naive as to believe that because you make prohibition against the carrying of a pistol or a tommie gun or Mace that the criminal is going to obey that law. He will find it, he will have it, he will carry it.

Mr. MacDonald: Are you now justifying its use by the police?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: You do not say that by simply passing a law you make it unavailable to him, that I do not accept. I am not saying that is an argument I put forward as to why the police should have it, because I have expressed my view that they should not use it in any case until we have established beyond all doubt that it is not harmful in its effect on human beings.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Hear, hear! And you should not let them use it.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not have the power.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Bring in legislation!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not control importation; I am not the administrator of The Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): You can prevent the sale in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, perhaps we could bring in an Act.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I have expressed my concern. My views are not so far away from those of the hon. member who spoke.

I do not want to appear amused about the matter, because I am not amused about the seriousness of this matter. I have expressed my views. I think perhaps we will find that they may have some effect. I certainly have the matter under consideration with the Ontario police commission and I think I will have to ask the hon. members to leave it at that point now and see how effective my efforts may be.

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I think the Attorney General is quite right when he says the way he is applying his powers at the present time he is unable to stop its use.

I have three clippings here of recent date. The Toronto Daily Star, May 29: "Wishart Tells Police They May Be Sued If Chemicals Used"; May 28: "Township Police Ignore Wishart Mace Warning". Toronto Telegram, May 29: "Two Windsor Area Townships Plan To Use Mace In Riots". And of course the reports from London yesterday that it was used.

Mr. Chairman, I know you are aware of the fact that the first use of Mace in Canada was in the town of Preston where it was used to control a drunk, an individual. The police felt they did not want to hit him on the head with a stick, so they sprayed him in the face with the chemical.

Now the information associated with the growing sale of the chemical is very interesting indeed. It is being imported into Windsor, and I believe it is being manufactured in at least one other place.

The one clipping that comes from the Hamilton Spectator, and I think it was associated with the information that was given to us by the previous speaker, indicates that there are several correctional departments in Canada which have purchased a supply of Mace. I would think that we should be assured by the Minister of Correctional Services of the province that he is aware of the use in correctional matters, whether or not we have it available in our own correctional institutions, and just what steps he is taking in order to look into the use of it in other jurisdictions.

Some of the information from the Hamilton Spectator of June 1 is extremely interesting and it is parallel with what the hon. member for Hamilton East gave to us a few moments ago. It indicates that the United States surgeon general has issued a warning regarding its use and individual doctors have reported cases of severe after effects. This is precisely what the Attorney General said he was afraid of this afternoon, that there would be prolonged after effects and perhaps permanent injury.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: On May 23.

Mr. Nixon: Right. The United States public health services recommended that police departments make arrangements for washing persons hit by the disabling chemical agent.

We are told of specific damage and I quote from the report, causing irritation of the eyes, muceous membranes of the lungs, produces apathy, confusion, dizziness, liver damage and heart abnormality.

We are told of the use of the chemical in Preston in some detail, by the police officers who have used it, that it was equivalent to a blow. In their view it was more humane.

But the one interesting thing that was brought to my attention was this very bulky report of the national advisory commission on civil disorders from the United States of America, which reported on March 1. They deal fairly extensively with the use of a number of riot control measures. I agree completely that we do not have this problem here. I do not believe we need the use of these chemical crowd-control drugs.

I hope that we can keep them from being generally used in the province; and while I have agreed with the Attorney General so far in that he is right when he says that we do not know whether it will be permanently injurious, I could not disagree with him more when he says that he does not have the power to control its use in the province. Through the Ontario police commission, surely, he can by legislation if need be force the police departments to refrain from using it until it can be proved that it is not permanently injurious and that it does have a place in the sort of problems that the police in Ontario face, not the quelling of enormous riots but in the general duties that they have in the ordinary course of their responsibilities.

There is one section from this report that I would like to read. I would say to you, Mr. Chairman, that—I glanced through the report, I cannot say I have read it in detail—it forces it upon us how completely foreign the problems in the United States are to what we have experienced here—their tremendous riots, the loss of life, the loss of public property and the strife between races, something that we have great sympathy for; and my colleague, the member for Sudbury expressed this very well, I believe.

But one section deals specifically with this problem. I quote from page 177 of the report:

> The experience of many police forces has demonstrated that the value and community acceptance of new non-lethal methods may be jeopardized if police officers employ them in an indiscriminate way. In some of the cities we studied reports of improper use of some chemical weapons by individual police officers have led to charges that these weapons are brutalizing and demeaning.

I would just add here that we all sense this. I mean you can understand a policeman in the course of his responsibility manhandling a person if need be. We hate to think about that, but we know it is necessary. But there is something brutal about the fact that an aerosol can is put into the face of the person and a chemical is sprayed on him that completely fells him.

Well, to go on:

> To assure public confidence and prevent misuse police administrators should issue clear guidelines on where and how police may employ such control measures.

I think the difference is that there is every likelihood we do not require these control measures in the province of Ontario. But I believe beyond that we must recognize the fact that individual police officers and municipal police forces may feel that they have to have this modern weapon against crime and against civil disorder. When they find themselves in the midst of the melee with a can of this stuff strapped to their belt, they are not going to think about the philosophy of the thing, they are going to pull it out and spray it right in the face of the person without the training and without the approach that is called for in this particular report, even though it was issued in connection with the problems in the United States.

The recommendation is that they should not be sprayed at individuals or any groups of individuals at distances less than 10 feet. It says that it can do permanent harm if it is sprayed at less distance than three feet. The details are here. But the police officers who are presently using these canisters of Mace have not had the training that is available.

The report from London—and you may, Mr. Chairman, have heard the police officer who used it, on the radio tonight—said he was so close to the person that some of it sprayed back in his own face. Well, the very fact that a police officer in a department that is under the jurisdiction of one of our larger municipalities, should have had the power and the facility to use Mace under those circumstances, I consider to be incredible.

The fact that a police officer in the little town of Preston sprayed it on a drunk because he was menacing in some way, seems to be a responsibility that the Attorney General is going to have to carry himself. It is not enough for him to exert moral persuasion by a statement in the House, or an answer to a question as it was in the case of the question by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Sargent).

I think really that it is necessary that definite direction be given by the Attorney General, and I am quite sure he could do this without legislation under these circumstances. Perhaps it is not reasonable to ban its use for the foreseeable future, but certainly it should be banned until we know its import and its dangers in the indiscriminate use by untrained police departments.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I think it is well to remind ourselves at this point in the debate that we are discussing an estimate which is entitled "Public Safety". That is the relevance of it in the context of our debate at the moment—public safety. Now, let me say this, I acknowledge that the Attorney General has expressed, in pretty forceful terms, his apprehensions with regard to the consequences of the use of Mace. What puzzles me is, having expressed these apprehensions as far back as May 23, and reiterated them today, even in the face of evidence of their use, he is not willing to go one step further. A supremely ironical situation is developing. If the Minister is correct in his statement as to the possible dangers and therefore the reason why we should not use Mace, what the Minister has to do, is protect the people of the province of Ontario from the police. We have to be protected against actions of the police.

Mr. S. Apps (Kingston and the Islands): Sometimes the police need a little help.

Mr. MacDonald: They maybe do, but do not confuse the issue now—just leave this to the hon. member for Humber (Mr. Ben) and others—the member for Humber who is always wanting to protect the police against the insurrection of the motley crowd, so to speak. If the Minister is correct in his assertion that this is dangerous, and it should not be used by the police, when we hear stories that in Preston a policeman has sprayed it in the face of a drunk, or we hear stories that the police in London are now using it on teenagers, or we hear the kind of stories as to the rather news-headline-seeking experimenting with it in Hamilton, surely this underlines the point that we have been trying to make—by interjection mostly up until now—that there is an obligation on the part of the Attorney General to move, not just contemplate, not just express his views, but to move and to act so that something will be done about it. And act at this level, so that you do not leave it to a lot of local authorities.

Now, I want to suggest there are two ways in which the Attorney General should move. One, I draw to his attention that, while he apparently had expressed his views, he ignored the information available in the public prints on June 25 following the meeting of the convention of the Ontario association of chiefs of police in Barrie, that one Ross Reid, a partner in a Preston, Ontario company, which is supplying Mace to many police forces in the province—it does not indicate whether they are supplying it from their manufacture in Preston or whether they are importing it from the company which holds the patents in the United States, but this is the source in Canada. Furthermore, Mr. Ross Reid told this meeting of the police chiefs that at least 35 police departments across Canada has bought it. Interestingly enough, when he was queried, Mr. Reid admitted that many of the police departments which now have Mace prefer not to talk about it, but he would not reveal which these were.

In other words, the Attorney General, having come to conclusions and reservations with regard to the use of this chemical, did not know, when he should have known, that it was being sold to, and being stocked, and was being used with increasing frequency by the police forces across the province of Ontario.

So what action should flow from it? I suggest two things. One, the Attorney General, until he has satisfied himself, should move to ban the sale of Mace to anybody, including police forces. And it should be backed up by a request for an inventory as to what stocks there are in the law enforcement agencies of the province of Ontario which, in the broad sense, come under his jurisdiction. I would go one step further—not only current stocks of Mace, but perhaps there should be an inventory report periodically, of all new weapons that might be used in law enforcement, so that the Attorney General does not discover himself, like any citizen, that some new and offensive or dangerous weapon is coming into use in the province of Ontario. I think these are practical steps that the Attorney General can take.

But my basic plea is, let us not talk and think and express views. On the basis of the Attorney General's own analysis, the time has long since passed for him to act, and I have suggested two ways in which he can act.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I find myself very much in agreement with the hon. leader of the Opposition in the views he expressed, and, to some extent, with the hon. member for York South. I am not by any means certain, that I could adopt the suggestion immediately that we should ban the sale of Mace.

I have expressed strong reservation against its use. I have expressed reasons why that should be so, because if there is no certainty that it is not injurious, then I think police forces should not use it, but I think there is a deeper and a greater reason why police forces should not use it and I hope we will be able to make that reason clear.

I do not believe that our police forces should be of the attitude, or constrained, to use force against our citizens in the situations in this country. I do not think they should be copying—which I think they are doing—the police forces in the metropolitan situations in the United States—and in situations which do not apply to this country. We used to have a pride in our police, where the red-coated mountie could go out, and by his force of character, and the fact that he wore a uniform; that he had behind him the majesty of the law—could quell a great crowd of people. I think we have to find a return to the situation where respect for the policeman, the respect which the public pay to him by reason of his office, or even of his uniform, by reason of his force of character—

Mr. Nixon: And not by reason of his weapons?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: And not by reason of either his billy, or his revolver, or his Mace, but that he exerts the force of the majesty of the law which he represents. I think the police made a mistake—and I hope this message will get across to them—they make a mistake when they think they have to carry by their side an aerosol canister to spray in the face of a drunk to subdue him.

I do not think that an individual, a policeman, needs that type of force; I do not think he needs that type of weapon; I think he scarcely ever needs to use the ultimate weapon which he may have at his disposal and this weapon about which at this moment we are uncertain as to its very damaging effect, I think is a very bad thing to use. My concern is that it destroys the respect that the public may have for our police forces, because it will create in the public an enmity, an attitude, that the police are an enemy, that the policeman is exerting an extraordinary force which he should not need to use. That is my great concern really in this whole matter.

I would hope that the leaders of our police forces, the police commissions of our municipalities, the committees of council who govern police forces, would surely be able to exert upon their forces which they govern at the local level, a sentiment that just because somebody across the line in the country which we border puts forward the idea that we are up to date, that we are modern, that we have the latest weapon, we do not have to copy that situation. Surely we have grown up. If we have not, we should grow up to the extent where we can say we do not have that society and we have an attitude towards our law enforcement officers which is different, which is better, and our people have a different approach toward them.

This is where I think we make a great mistake; this is the thing that gives me so much concern. I am well prepared to accept, if I thought it would be effective, the prohibition by some quick measure of legislation. But if we cannot convince those who govern our police forces that this is not a good thing, that this a thing that carries effects which go far beyond the immediate local situation, then we have failed.

Surely, in this country, we have grown up to the extent where can say we have a different approach to the maintenance of law and order. Surely our police forces have the morale, training, the force of character to walk into a crowd, or to go on horseback, to go armed with some simple weapon, a billy if necessary—though I think that is seldom necessary—and say, "Let us maintain law and order here, this is not the way we conduct ourselves."

This is the thing that gives me concern, and I will undertake this to those gentlemen who have spoken, that we will consider the suggestions that have been put forward. But I would hope that through the Ontario police commission we could make the views which I feel so strongly, felt and observed by the local police authorities and I think they may be effective.

I will consider the suggestions that have been put forward, but I hope I will be able to succeed in the views I have expressed here without going to the extent of sudden legislation.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): It is nice to have the NDP on the side of law and order, it is a very nice change.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Attorney General—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order please!

Mr. Nixon: —could tell us if any of these chemical control agents are available in our correctional institutions?

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order please.

Mr. Nixon: Are any of these chemical control agents available to the guards presently in our own correctional institutions? The article indicated that there had been extensive sale to correctional institutions—it did not say in Ontario—but in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Mr. Chairman, to my knowledge this chemical is not in our institutions. As a matter of fact, at one time it was discussed and turned down.

Mr. Chairman: Centre of forensic services.

Mr. Singer: Emergency measures, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind this vote is probably the most useless vote of money that we make.

Mr. Chairman: Are we not on forensic services?

Mr. Singer: No, emergency measures.

Mr. Martel: No forensic services.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park then, on forensic services.

Mr. Singer: All right, we will forget about it for now.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, in contrast to what the member for Downsview has just said, this vote is one of the most important we may have and one of the most valuable.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the member for High Park knows that

I was addressing my remarks to the emergency measures branch and let him not put words in my mouth the same as he tries to do to other members.

Mr. Chairman: Order please! Order!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Is the chair to understand that the member for High Park is speaking on the centre of forensic sciences?

Mr. MacDonald: Right!

Mr. Singer: He does not know?

Mr. Shulman: I confess it was a deliberate joke.

All right this is a more serious matter because I believe that the Attorney General in this particular area has erred on the other side from which he usually errs. In previous votes I have complained of the amount he has spent. In this vote I am complaining that he is not spending enough. I think he is using very bad judgment in connection with the centre of forensic sciences, and I wish to tell you that two years ago there was a fairly extensive research programme being done at the coroner's office in Toronto. It had come to our attention that certain deaths were occurring as a result of automobile accidents and that there was strong evidence to suggest they were due to the inhalation of carbon monoxide.

The head of the centre of forensic sciences, the late Dr. Ward Smith, a very gifted gentleman who unfortunately is no longer with us, was very interested in moving forward his department in every possible direction, particularly if it would assist in any of the fields in which he was involved and one of which was prevention of death. I approached Dr. Ward Smith at that time and told him that in the cases of automobile death where there was some question as to the cause of death, that I wanted to have a blood carbon monoxide measurement done. It had been routine to measure for alcohol.

I wanted to expand this and in any case of doubt to measure for carbon monoxide, because there was a very interesting study that had been done in another country which indicated that as cars become older they no longer handled their combustion as well as before, and carbon monoxide was leaking up through the bottom of cars, making people drowsy. This was possibly the reason for a lot of the crashes that were occurring. Dr. Ward Smith said that he would be delighted to do the work.

Unfortunately, he said, he was terribly short staffed and was having great difficulty in handling the routine work that was coming in and that his department was falling farther behind.

He said, "I have asked The Department of the Attorney General a number of times for more money, and staff, and I have been refused. I wonder if you would mind writing the Attorney General and asking him if he would give us greater facilities and more staff, because I think that this is an important piece of work, and I would like to do it and I would think that we would have a greater chance of getting it if the request came from an outside source."

Mr. Sopha: How long ago was that?

Mr. Shulman: Two years, or one and one, half.

So I wrote to the Attorney General and suggested to him that the forensic science centre was short of staff and money, and that their work was falling behind in the routine things that we had to do. I pointed out this new work, which I felt was very important, and I asked if he would give consideration to Dr. Smith's request for further staff and financing.

I got a letter back from the Attorney General in which he said that the work you wanted done was not necessary. It was only research, and I am paraphrasing as I do not have the letter here in front of me, but if we get it out I am sure that he will agree that this was the sense of what he wrote me and as such. It was not part of the duties of the centre of forensic sciences.

The letter is available if the Attorney General wishes it.

The amount of money which has been given to the centre for forensic science has gone up, I think, less than any other item in the whole Department of the Attorney General. When we compare it with some of the items which are just such frill and froth, such as the one that is about to follow, emergency measures, it is a great shame that we do not have a more forward-looking view in the department. It is a shame that this particular centre which, I must say, Dr. Smith created as a model which was looked upon as a model of what could be done in a very short time—it is a great shame that the support is not given by the Attorney General. Now that we have lost Dr. Smith I think that it is terribly important that the Attorney General be urged by us to give more attention to this department and give them more money because they need more staff. They are still behind in their work and they are unable to do the tremendous research which that department could do. This is terribly important, in conjunction with the coroner's office. If they had been allowed to go ahead with this particular problem or project, it would have been completed six months ago, and it was of incalculable importance. It has not been done extensively anywhere else in the world.

I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that his attitude toward this particular department was and is the wrong one. I think that he has made a serious error in judgment and I would ask him to give further consideration to this matter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the remarks of the hon. member and I think that I agree with him. I would like to have more funds for the forensic centre, but I do not want to disparage what we have done. Our estimates show that our increase over last year's estimate—last year being $890,500—we are asking for $996,000 this year, which is an increase of 14 per cent, or $105,500.

Mr. Shulman: Is not that mostly increments?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, but 14 per cent is a substantial increase. The details which I have before me, and which I am sure and know that the hon. member has not got, is a basis for comparison from 1965, 1966, and through 1967. It shows that, in the pathology branch of the centre, the increase, 1967 over 1966, is 79.5 per cent. The biology increase is 36 per cent, that is 1967 over 1966, and of course, I have pointed out the increase for this year. Toxicology has an increase in 1967, over 1966, of 40 per cent.

We have done a great deal in the years past and perhaps not as much this year, with a 14 per cent increase, but in the organic chemistry area, over 1966, in 1967, was 17.5 per cent. The physical chemistry area increased in 1967, over 1966, by 19.5 per cent. The pharmaceutical chemistry section was 32.5 per cent in 1967 over 1966. This is an average over 1966 of 24.7 per cent in last year over the previous year and this year we have been able to obtain an increase of 14 per cent. Much of this, as the hon. member points out to me, is maintenance and increment, and so on.

We are very interested in the work of this centre of forensic sciences and we have been working very steadily, not just this year, but in the past two or three years to bring it forward. I am appreciative of the fact that the hon. member mentioned the work of the late Dr. Ward Smith, who did a great deal, and was a very noted and acknowledged leader in the field. But I think that we must say also that this province, in its facility that it gave him for the work allocated to him, made him as famous as he made the province of Ontario, in the centre of forensic science. I think that there is credit both ways in this matter.

Although I appreciate the interest of the hon. member, it is not necessary to urge me to have an interest in this matter, which is one that I feel has great merit. It is doing a great and very important work and I am very proud of it. It is one of my particular interests and if I could get the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton), within his means, to be more generous, I would do so and he would not be relieved of hearing from me as we present to him the needs of this centre of forensic sciences in our estimates.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, it is always nice to hear the hon. Attorney General's sentiment, but it is just too bad that the actions do not match them. When I brought up his rise in expenditures of 60 per cent, 70 per cent, and 1,000 per cent in different matters, he explains, "Oh, most of this is increments." Then we have the grand rise of—

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Shulman: Oh yes he did, look back in Hansard.

But when we have a rise of 14 per cent here, most of which is increments, the rise in the centre of forensic sciences, and I am not even taking new approaches—this has not yet caught up with the backlog which Dr. Smith was asking before he died.

I am sure that the Attorney General will agree with me that there should be somewhat more priority here than perhaps in some of the other matters which have been discussed here today. The centre for forensic science has a great deal to do with our life and health and a great deal to do with the control of crime in the province. It is far more important than all the Mace in the world.

To be niggardly about it, in the less than $1 million you are giving them this year—I am sorry to say it is niggardly in this field—is a very short-sighted view and one that 10 or 15 years from now we are going to regret tremendously. I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that he be a little more vigorous with the Provincial Treasurer and a little more insistent, because this, to my mind, is an extremely important matter, and I trust that next year we will see some improvement in this vote.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman I almost feel that I could say that more members on the opposite side should express views of this nature, but I reserve a goody for the hon. member when I tell him that the Provincial Treasurer has been quite generous really.

Perhaps one reason that we have not got quite as much—one reason perhaps why we were constrained to accept a reasonable expansion, which I think that 14 per cent will allow—is that we are promised a new facility for the centre for forensic science. It will be a 12-storey building, which will cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $10 million, to provide for the expansion of these facilities. This is on the way.

We have not forgotten the centre for forensic science. I think that the hon. member can look forward to, not only this new facility for it, but an expansion of its work and the service which it is rendering the province and I agree, largely, with his remarks.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, in reference to the new building. Are the plans confirmed for this building?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. The building is to be erected on Grosvenor Street and plans are practically complete.

Mr. Shulman: Would the Attorney General inform me what the building is to contain? There are rumours it is to contain a liquor store. Is that correct?

Mr. Nixon: Got to pay for it some way.

Mr. Shulman: That is a serious question, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, well, liquor is a serious question at any time. I am not completely aware who will be occupying certain portions of the building.

I think there is a possibility that the ground floor might be partially occupied by a facility to dispense alcoholic beverages.

Mr. Shulman: Could the Attorney General inform me what else will be in this 12-storey building? Specifically, will the Toronto coroner's office be enclosed in this building?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The thinking is that perhaps three or four floors will be available for general office occupation and the rest of it will be the centre of forensic science.

Mr. Shulman: And the Toronto coroner's office—this will be included?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, and a morgue and all the things that this hon. member has wished for.

Mr. Shulman: Is it fair then to say that—Mr. Chairman, through you to the Attorney General—is it fair then to say that the Attorney General's sentiments, as expressed in this House last year, as to the taking over the Toronto morgue have changed since that time?

Mr. MacDonald: What did you say last year?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I remember. I said there was an obligation on a municipality at that time, to provide certain facilities of its own in the way of morgue facilities. Now this is the centre of forensic sciences of the province of Ontario and the work that will be done here will be for the benefit of the whole of the province in the administration of justice as it falls within this department. I think the province has an obligation, which it is assuming and which it recognizes, to provide facilities for this centre of forensic science.

I would hope the city of Toronto, in its hospitals perhaps, or apart from them, as it sees fit, may provide some additional facilities to what other municipalities do in the way of morgues. This will not, I am sure, be adequate to serve the whole of Metropolitan Toronto.

I am advised that we are contemplating sufficient space so that we may provide a considerable facility to them, and that they will pay some rental for that facility which we will provide. That is proper because why should we give Toronto something we do not provide other municipalities?

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I hope the Attorney General is wrong in one of the things he just said. He said that he thought the city would have extra space in hospitals or elsewhere. I hope he is not serious in that particular statement because we certainly do not want dead bodies being taken into hospitals, it would be a terrible health hazard.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I only say this, that from my personal experience, if I may be bold enough to recite it, when I served on a hospital board some years in my own city not too long ago—a recent addition to the hospital provided a facility where bodies could be examined and disposed of. It was not a morgue but it is a facility where there would be examinations made and then the body was disposed of and taken to a morgue—

Mr. Shulman: The Attorney General intrigues me. I must pursue this a little further, Mr. Chairman.

In this particular facility, in this particular city, in this particular hospital of which you were a senior member, did you allow bodies to be brought in from outside for post mortems? Or did you just look after your own, was that it?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Right.

Mr. Shulman. Well that is, Mr. Chairman, a little different from what is required in a morgue, where bodies come from all sorts of interesting places and carrying all sorts of interesting germs. May I suggest to the Attorney General that if he is thinking that the city should supply facilities in hospitals, I certainly hope it is not for the purpose of—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, the hon. member misunderstands me. I do suggest to him, that I think he is aware that deaths which occur in hospitals may need an autopsy, an examination and the sort of thing that can be done most conveniently right in the hospital, and you should have a facility there to do that sort of thing.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Never had a complaint from a morgue customer.

Mr. Chairman.: Anything further on the centre for forsenic science? Carried.

The emergency measures branch.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, exactly as the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond) says, I am going to deliver the same speech as I have delivered for the last ten years. We have come now, Mr. Chairman, to probably the most useless vote in the whole of the estimates that are put before us by the government.

Only this time, Mr. Chairman, it seems to be three times as useless as it was last year, because there is three times as much money being asked for as there was last year. Yes, yes—I have last year's estimates here—you asked for $488,000 and this year you are asking for $1,623,000. Now that seems to be more than three times—

Mr. Martel: Blame it on Mace.

Mr. Singer: Yes. I would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that we would have begun, long before now, to phase this out and instead of that, the Attorney General seems to be asking for three times as many dollars as he asked for last year.

Now the role of the province in emergency measures completely escapes me. We have gone through all the nonsense of building shelters, providing signs—the last time we heard of the signs they were lodged in the basement of some police station—providing escape routes; everyone was going to escape to the county of Bruce from the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto. Nobody bothered to look at Highways 400 or 401 on a holiday weekend to see that we could not even get back in from the holiday weekend let alone escape in the event of a tragedy.

Mr. Nixon: Except for the Cabinet, they were—

Mr. Singer: The Cabinet yes, I suppose the Cabinet's little shelter up at Camp Borden was being looked after. Nobody could quite figure out how—while a bomb was dropping here we were going to let the Cabinet all escape up to Camp Borden and hide themselves in the cement underground vault that was built there, or whatever else you had there. We lesser beings, the Opposition never got around to seeing that. It must be quite a thing.

Well, Mr. Chairman, as Ottawa seems to be phasing itself out, all we seem to have for this expenditure that goes on year after year, are elaborate offices, pretty little pamphlets that are put out, apparently signs gathering dust in some basement, a cement fort I guess, hidden underground at Camp Borden, and plans. I suppose in some part of these buildings there are thousands of blueprints, perhaps the hon. Minister of Trade and Development could use them in his housing problem. There are lovely sets of plans for building shelters and the blueprints were well drawn, and supplied, at our expense, to the people who wanted to build shelters. Very few did, but the plans are there and I am sure the Minister, if he looks hard enough, can find in some back room, all these blueprints. Perhaps he can use them or turn them over and use the same paper to build some houses and draw blueprints on the other side.

Well, Mr. Chairman, what really is the justification for this vote? Last year I moved a motion and I am going to move it now, that this vote be reduced to the sum of $1 and I think the motion has three times more effect than it had last year because he is asking for more than three times as much money.

So, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the hon. member for York South who just wanted me to refer to the page reference of the speech I made last year, I will only say what I have said now, and I will now move that the item $1,623,000 in the emergency measures branch of vote 208 be reduced to $1.

Mr. White: To be consistent, could you make that $3.

Mr. Singer: No, 33 cents I was thinking, 33 cents.

Mr. Chairman: The Chairman will put the motion first and then it is debatable.

Mr. MacDonald: Also any other topic.

Mr. Chairman: The Chairman would like the member for York South to repeat that interjection. Did the member for York South mention something about—

Mr. MacDonald: I had another topic on this particular point in this amendment, and I presume I will have to deal with it before you have the vote on the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: The Chairman is simply going to put the motion to the committee, and then the motion itself pertaining to emergency measures branch will be debatable.

Mr. Singer moves that item regarding emergency measures branch of $1,623,000 be reduced to the sum of $1. Shall the motion carry?

The member for Wentworth.

Mr. I. Deans (Wentworth): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Speaking to the amendment as proposed, I only say that I agree with it wholeheartedly.

I have no little experience in this matter, having been at the fire department and having taken part in some of what was termed to be the emergency measures activities. I can truthfully say that this is indeed $1,633,000 being wasted.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Deans: If the Attorney General is looking for additional funds for forensic services, then perhaps this might have been the place to get it. He could have taken it right out of this vote and used it for something of much greater concern, and of much more value, to this community.

The emergency measures organization does not fulfil any useful purpose in this province. It is being run by people who are mostly out of date, out of touch, and is basically a haven for people who enjoy playing soldiers, firemen and policemen. I really suggest that this entire portion of the estimates be removed voluntarily rather than have us vote it out. It would show the Attorney General to be a man of foresight and ability if he would just take it upon himself to tear that part off the bottom of the page and forget it was even there, and then delegate the money over to the Minister of Trade and Development, to use for housing.

Hon. Mr. Randall: I have the plans, and now, the money.

Mr. Chairman: Any further debate on the motion?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I have a haunting fear that when this motion is put, and the bell rings, and everybody from the Royal York gets up here, that the motion may be defeated. Therefore, I want to address my remarks to the unhappy prospects that the motion will be defeated and that we will have to live with this organization and try to make the expenditure of its money as useful as possible. My remarks are in that context.

I have in my hand, a copy of the letter which the Attorney General may have seen. I think in the first instance it was addressed to the local press. It is from Michael J. McDonald, no relative of mine, though he happens to be a constituent of mine from Weston. Following the snow storm last winter you will recall the emergency condition with which we were faced on most of the main arteries in the city of Toronto. He suggested that we should plan more effectively for such storms in the future.

Let me quote a couple of paragraphs from this letter. Having spelled out the kind of thing that happened in terms of traffic tie-ups and people not being able to get through, either on normal routine business or emergency business, he then proceeds:

> This problem is not insoluble. I submit that what is required is some form of an Emergency Measures Act. Some of the features of this proposed Act would be a central authority for each area—that is Metro Toronto—to co-ordinate within its boundaries all efforts to solve the problems created by an emergency such as storms, floods, etc. This central authority would also be responsible for making maximum use of radio and television for purposes of public information bulletins.

Another main feature of this Act would be a prohibition against the use of any major arterial road within the emergency area by other than emergency motorists, public transportation vehicles and other authorized traffic so long as the emergency remains. To make such a provision acceptable, it would have to be coupled with other emergency measures such as (a) the creation of emergency parking lots adjacent to major roads and railways—these could be created by using publicly-owned property such as school yards; (b) ensuring that the public transportation authority has all its motor vehicles in use; (c) hiring special trains in these areas served by trains; (d) closing of schools and use of school buses for public transportation.

Then Mr. McDonald—my constituent—adds:

I am quite confident that our governmental authorities could improve, and add to the above mentioned proposals if they chose to deal with the problem. This compounded problem will not solve itself. It will not be solved by polite requests to leave cars at home, it will only be solved by proper legislation encompassing, I suggest, some of the above mentioned proposals.

If a storm affects this area in the way exhibited in the past few days I hate to think what would happen if something really serious happened.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that there is in that letter some proposals that would be worthy of consideration by those who have the direction of EMO, if it is going to continue to be with us.

Indeed, I was rather intrigued that when that storm did hit last year in the city of London where its impact was sufficiently strong, so the newspapers informed us, that the Prime Minister was blacked out at home for a day or so, they did bring the emergency measures organization in to cope with some of the problems faced in the community.

In short, the idea is not without some experimental use—already in the London area, but I would ask the Attorney General when he replies whether or not this is not a more useful area for expending the moneys that might conceivably be voted if the House makes the mistake of turning down the amendment that is now before us.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might ask the Minister through you, what the municipal projects are which constitute the $1.1 million here. I presume this is an expansion of the fire fighting services and the radio and telephone communications system and all this sort of thing which started some years ago. I wonder if the Minister would answer that first before I proceed.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should first of all point out that in the estimates as they appear, under the emergency measures branch, there is the figure of $1,623,000, that is broken down into the five items as shown there; salaries, travelling expenses, maintenance, public information, courses, and so on, and municipal projects. I think the hon. member who has just spoken asked the question in relation to the $1,136,500 municipal projects.

What I want to make clear is that that figure of $1,623,000 is the total item for the emergency measures branch, including the federal contribution.

Mr. Young: I understand the federal contribution—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am going to give you that—including the federal contribution. Now the—

Mr. Singer: Why do you not change your system?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, do not ask me, I did not change it.

Mr. Singer: A most peculiar way of presenting these estimates.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It was some other department which decided to set it up in this way and I do not question their wisdom. I find it a little difficult to follow myself. But it is what is known as gross budgeting, I am told.

Mr. Singer: Last year it was net.

Mr. Nixon: This now includes the federal money.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The federal money is in here too.

Mr. Singer: It does not appear anywhere here.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The total is $1,623,000, of that the federal portion is $1,217,000. So that the amount of the Ontario contribution is $406,000.

May I just point out that last year the federal contribution was $2,397,500, at the least the total was $2,397,500. The federal contribution was $1,909,500 and Ontario's contribution was $488,000 as against $406,000 this year. So our estimate is down by $82,000 or some per cent which I am not immediately able to figure out by mental arithmetic.

Mr. Singer: It would be very helpful if you could give us the present figures.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I say I found this somewhat strange myself, but this is gross budgeting. Our contribution, the contribution of Ontario, is $406,000, not $1,623,000.

Now, to answer the hon. member about the municipal project, I am not sure whether the question was, what was our portion of that?

Mr. Young: What are the municipal projects, Mr. Chairman, through you to the Minister, what do these consist of?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They are, generally, organizations set up for emergency measure projects, or emergency measures to meet disaster situations—fires, floods, hospital fires—and always in the background the situation which might arise from a fallout or atomic disaster or something of that nature. I have said this before—

Mr. Young: Is this equipment?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Like the hon. member for Downsview, I have to make the same speech largely that I have made on previous occasions.

Mr. Nixon: The Attorney General has made better ones before.

Mr. Singer: If you are going to hang it on atomic disaster—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I am not going to hang it on atomic disaster and I never have. All I have said and all I am able to say is this: We are asked by the senior government of this country, which contributes the great portion of the funds necessary to this emergency measures plan, we are asked to co-operate, to assist in having our municipalities organized, to keep the organization going, to carry on exercises, to train people, to at least keep a hard core of people available in the event of disaster—

Mr. MacDonald: It is the softest core in the country.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is a request from our federal government which we have accepted and we have agreed to co-operate with. That is our attitude, that is the way we have gone along with it. I think hon. members are perhaps aware, but they may not be, that the federal government this year has substantially decreased across the whole of Canada its activity and its expenditure in the emergency measures organization.

One of the features which I thought was most valuable really in emergency measures was the assistance in firefighting, where the federal government contributed very substantial amounts of the cost of firefighting equipment and pumpers. They have abandoned that practically entirely, and consequently we are not making a grant to that project, which I thought was one of the features of the organization.

Perhaps I could answer the question by reading some of the activities, and I will not take a great deal of the time of the House:

> The emergency measures organization was involved in several incidents during the year, notably in the large forest fires in northern Ontario, which resulted in the sudden evacuation of Chapleau and Sioux Lookout. The excellent emergency plans which have been drawn up by the emergency measures organization at Timmins, Sudbury and Dryden were put into action, and as a result hundreds of people were taken care of and provided with shelter and food.
> This was one of the outstanding examples of the benefits of planning in advance for emergencies, and reflects great credit on the respective communities concerned.
> A tornado, which swept through Perth county, which fortunately destroyed only barns and did not strike populated centres was a scene of coordinated activity by the Perth county emergency measures organigation in organizing salvage and cleaning-up operations.
> When fire struck in Brockville, the local emergency measures organization swung into action to assist the first department and arranged for a series of floodlights from their rescue kit to assist in firefighting operations.
> Emergency planning paid off in Kingston, Ontario, when fire struck the local Hotel Dieu hospital. Patients had to be evacuated to other hospitals.

There is also mention that during the year some nine hospital disaster exercises were planned, ranging from a relatively small-scale test to full-scale test of hospital disaster plans. These exercises involve extensive community support which was organized by the local emergency measures organization.

The largest annual training exercise ever held in Ontario took place at Camp Borden in September where rescue and first-aid units from all over the province attended in a realistic night exercise on a site provided by the Canadian forces base, Borden. Over 500 volunteers participated in a simulated rescue of people injured in a disaster area created to approximate the results of a tornado-struck town.

The results of this exercise were considered to be most realistic and worthwhile, and provided a great demonstration of the enthusiasm of a hard core of volunteers throughout the province.

Those are a few examples of some of the activities carried on by the organization. But I can only say, Mr. Chairman, that our approach to this matter is one of accepting the request by the senior government of Canada to participate in preparing and training our people as best we can in peacetime conditions, to be prepared to meet disasters of various kinds. I do not believe that the amount which we contribute, $406,000, when the federal government is contributing $1,217,000, is an unusual request for the federal government to make. Perhaps I should not sit down without saying I, of course, oppose the motion.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, I think what the Minister has said has underlined the problem we face here tonight, and perhaps the hon. member for Downsview should be talking to his friends at Ottawa over these next 12 months, and a year from now we shall see what success he has had.

Mr. Singer: At least I have some friends up there to talk to, which is more than you can say.

Mr. Young: Well, we have a few, and we shall see what success he may have had a year from now. But the thing that disturbs me, Mr. Chairman, about what the Minister has said, is that a few years ago I understand we were getting some firefighting equipment, we were getting various pieces of equipment for various municipalities across this province. Evidently that has now ceased and the money is now going into exercises, into salaries I suppose, and we're frittering it away in these kind of activities which really amount to little or nothing.

In the long run it is the firefighting and the police forces coordinated which have to meet the disaster. And very often the word I get from some of my friends is that the EMO is simply a fifth wheel and clutters up the situation. This may not be true in every case, but certainly it is in some instances. So it seems to me that this kind of money, if we are going to spend it, should be diverted to make more efficient our police and our firefighting equipment, and coordinate these to handle the emergencies that arise, since they have to handle them anyway.

So I would hope before any year has come around that our friends would be able to talk to their friends at Ottawa, and that we would see an end to this farce from that point of view. Then the Minister could stand up in this House and say we are no longer requested by the central government to spend this supplement here in Ontario, to supplement a useless grant from the central treasury.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, before we vote, I wonder if I could solicit from the Attorney General a comment on the observations of my namesake, in the letter I read, with regard to the use of EMO for coping with such emergencies as storms in the metropolitan areas?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They have done this on a number of occasions that I am aware of. I must confess—I hesitate to confess it—but I did not get all the content of that letter because I was trying to assess these figures and get my own thoughts in order on this motion.

Mr. Nixon: Let us have that again.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Do not read it again.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will send the Minister a copy of it. I have a suspicion—as a matter of fact, I think the hon. Minister has a copy in his files.

Mr. Nixon: I am sure he carries that around in his pocket.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, Premier Robarts has a copy, and the hon. Robert Nixon, whoever that is, has a copy.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Send me a copy.

Mr. MacDonald: All right, I will send the Attorney General a copy, but I say in conclusion, without repetition, that I noted that London has done it. The main point of his complaint was that it is not being done in the metropolitan area of Toronto. If we are going to have this more or less useless agency, let us make it available for emergencies such as we had in the instance of the heavy snowstorm.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am aware that in Metro Toronto they have one of the very best, most efficient, active emergency measures services in various areas of emergency that there is anywhere, and very capable people in charge of it.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, in rising to support this amendment, I would like to point one aspect of emergency measures which perhaps—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Is there an amendment?

Mr. Shulman: The motion—I would like to point out one aspect of the EMO which perhaps some members of the House are not aware of. In their wisdom the emergency measures organization has created a list of 2,000 essential citizens who are to be saved in case of disaster, and I was—

Mr. Nixon: Do not tell me that your name is on that list.

Mr. Shulman: I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I was a little upset to find that I am number 2,000. However, I was much less upset, Mr. Chairman, when I found that all the Conservative backbenchers did not make it. They have been left off entirely, and I am sorry to say that—

Mr. Nixon: Have they got a place in the bunker?

Mr. Shulman: Along with this very interesting list, Mr. Chairman, one is issued a very special wonderful document with your picture on it, and instruction on how to leave the city when disaster strikes. I may point out, Mr. Chairman, it is also good for entering the Ex, in case you do not get any other use out of it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question which I have for the Attorney General, I know two of the people on the list. He and I are wondering who the other 1,998 essential people are. Perhaps he could inform the House.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am not sure I have one of those blue cards myself. I could not know who the others are.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Niagara Falls.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I am very much amazed at so many intelligent, prominent men in this province taking the time of this House to make so light of such an important body of people.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Bukator: Originally—

Mr. White: Looks like another Liberal rebellion from here.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Bukator: Originally, it was the civil defence. It seemed like a very serious thing at that time. They put up many tents in many areas and wasted a lot of time and a few of the taxpayers' dollars hoping that in some way, with the many groups and the county councils, they would assist their fellow man, if there was a disaster. We are fortunate that nothing like that happened.

Now for a group of people to get together and to assist each other in trying to help one another if that had to happen, I think is a good cause. I have spent many hours and many weeks co-ordinating groups of people in the county of Welland, to try to bring about the necessary assistance that people needed.

As the Attorney General said in some of the instances throughout this whole province little groups of people have assisted when help was needed—the unsung heroes of this province.

I could not sit here and listen lightly to this type of picking on the public who have tried so hard to assist and this is their reward in this day.

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Why speak to us? Look at your friends.

Mr. Bukator: I say to you, and I am glad that that figure came out. Have fun, enjoy yourselves—it is later than you think.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Bukator: This particular group of men in the Cabinet who have their shelters set aside for them in Arnprior might be a good place to have them if this disaster does come about and the doctor himself should live. He might have an opportunity to perform an autopsy on them and see what made them tick all these years.

I do not take this lightly. I think it is serious. The federal government apparently is contributing $1,200,000. The province is spending a very little amount of money.

There are many men who have many plans and you cannot tell, there may be a chance yet, that their services will be needed. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to this particular government, that they were the ones who have taken it very lightly, and delegations have come to you on many occasions asking you for assistance, and you have done absolutely nothing for them.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Oh, ridiculous.

Mr. Bukator: You, my friend, are ridiculous. I have attended the Attorney General myself with groups of people, some asking for his assistance, and to this day they have not got what they requested, and the money was there.

I say the Conservative government is just as responsible as anybody is. I am going to support this amendment, simply because you have not been doing your job. It is as simple as that.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order. The Minister of Correctional Institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member for Niagara Falls started out to say just what I was going to get up to say, and I was going to support him wholeheartedly when he started out. Because I got up on my feet before this Legislature on these estimates at another time and spoke in the same fashion.

Of course EMO is not being as effective as it should be because they have been going through this ridiculing almost every year that I can recall in this Legislature.

I am surprised the hon. member for Niagara Falls finished up by saying he is going to vote for the amendment. I mean, to be consistant, he should continue to do his best to encourage these people. If they need more financial assistance, that is another matter, and that is what should be debated. Not just laughing about it.

The hon. member for High Park may feel that it is useless because his name is on the list. I do not know. Maybe that is his reason. I would think they had a good reason for putting his name on the list because of the position he held before.

Now there are a lot of good citizens in this province, as the hon. member for Niagara Falls has stated, who have volunteered for this work. They have spent long hours taking training and whether you think they are being as effective as they might be, I think really is beside the point.

We spend reams and reams of publicity and propaganda and newspaper headlines on the restructive forces of our community, but the minute you get some group which is attempting to do something positive, we start to ridicule them. I think that is ridiculous. We should give them all the encouragement in the world.

If the hon. member opposite and the other hon. members feel that EMO are not being given the financial support they believe they should get, rather than cutting them off completely as this amendment apparently does they should have a resolution asking the government to give consideration to more support, because there are many of us who feel they should be encouraged and given much greater support than they are getting.

But it is very difficult to get the support unless you have the public behind you, and it is difficult to get the public behind you when people in places like this are poking fun at them—these great citizens who are trying to do a good job.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Cochrane South.

Mr. W. Ferrier (Cochrane South): Mr. Chairman, I suppose the people of Timmins are a little more avant garde than they are in some other places of the province, but I do have to rise to pay tribute to the emergency measures organization of our community, because last summer when there was a forest fire around the Chapleau area and it was necessary to evacuate that community, a great many of the residents did come to the Timmins area.

And that organization did a tremendous job in seeing that these people were sent to various homes and their needs were looked after and they were properly cared for, and I cannot feel that the organization is completely useless after the kind of job it did in our area in looking after the citizens of Chapleau.

It might be that we are just so far ahead of the province that it will take it a long time to catch up but anyway, they did a worthwhile job and I think that they are to be commended.

Mr. Chairman: The motion by the member for Downsview is that the item re: emergency measures organization of $1,623,000 be reduced to $1.

All those in favour will please say "aye".

Those opposed will please say "nay."

In my opinion the "nays" have it. Call in the members.

All those in favour of the motion please rise. All those opposed please rise.

Clerk of the House: Mr. Chairman the "ayes" are 29, and the "nays" 48.

Emergency measures branch agreed to.

The office of the fire marshal, vote 208.

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): May I ask the Attorney General if he is giving any consideration to the resolution recently passed by the city of Niagara Falls originally, and adopted by other municipalities, requesting that provincial regulations ban the sale and setting off of fireworks in the province of Ontario except for supervised displays?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, this request has been made to us on at least two occasions that I recall by different delegations and I think that it has been presented to the Cabinet by some of them.

We have felt that the authority in this situation rests with the local municipal council and so far the government has not adopted a policy of passing general legislation to try to deal with the situation across the province.

Mr. Bukator: In view of the fact that the Attorney General said they did not agree to pass general legislation this is where the trouble comes into the picture. It is very easy to go to a place like Crystal Beach and that village passed a bylaw against fireworks in that village because of the fact that most of the small buildings are of wood construction.

The township next to them just beyond the boundary last week set up their stands and sold firecrackers to the people in the township, who in turn took them into the little village and set them off, and that is why we ought to have general legislation. That is why the city of Niagara Falls asked for the same thing, they have the same problem.

Supervision is good when conducted by experts who know the business. There is an editorial in the Niagara Falls paper which actually asked for my support in this House. They did not have to come this far, because I believe general legislation is the answer to the problem. I think that they should be let off in a supervised manner such as at the exhibition. Nobody is hurt then, because the experts know what they are doing.

But the way it is today, it is not doing the job at all, because the municipalities that want to keep it out cannot do so simply because they are sold in neighbouring villages or towns.

This has happened throughout the province, I think you will find, and I suggest that the Attorney General take a good look at this. I think that provincial legislation in a general way from the Attorney General of the province is the answer to it. You can put the road blocks in where necessary and then keep them for three or four days in the year when they want to set off fireworks. The rest of the time it is youngsters who get the firecrackers and do not know what to do when fires come into the picture. This is where damage is done. People are hurt, or maimed, and we sit here doing absolutely nothing about it.

I want the record to show that at least some, I hope many more, will speak on this to persuade the government to legislate against this. Some of us are not content to sit back and ignore this dangerous situation.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You mean to confine the damage to three days of the year?

Mr. Bukator: Well, much better three, than 365, even you can calculate that well. The percentage is not that great, Mr. Attorney General. Through you to that hon. Minister whose name I can hardly remember because he hardly ever speaks in the House, we do not know that he is here; from time to time he does make an appearance and once in a while he interjects, but makes no sense. This is another one of those interjections. Well, Father Time will take care of him. I have lots of time and it seems that at this time of night, I usually come to life, and I am willing to stay until three or four o'clock if you like—

An hon. member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Sopha: Well, you have lost me!

Mr. Bukator: Mr. Chairman, we are not getting through the estimates as quickly as we ought to, and I am contributing to that particular thing at the moment myself—

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): I should have taken your pulse when you asked me to.

Mr. Bukator: But getting back to the legislation—

Mr. MacDonald: That would be divulging confidential information.

Mr. Bukator: I would like to read into the record some of the comments and I think that they are good, and since there are only two or three pages it will not take long. The Hamilton Spectator has voiced unqualified support to the Niagara Falls resolution asking for the province to ban fireworks and says that Hamilton should be among the first of Ontario's municipalities to unequivocally endorse the Niagara Falls petition.

The Evening Review gave similar support to the resolution when it was introduced several weeks ago, "Because we believe that the dismal accident record substantiates the need for fireworks prohibition."

Here is what the Hamilton Spectator had to say:

> Each year, the city suffers a week of wanton lawlessness and vandalism. Firecrackers themselves are not to blame for the senseless noise, damage, danger. People, thousands of them, are responsible for the annual agony.
> Hamilton has a fireworks control bylaw, but it is openly flouted. Merchants sell fireworks to children contrary to the law. Children and adults explode fireworks in the street and parks contrary to the law. Firecrackers are thrown at people and buildings, contrary to the law.
> Large numbers of people have loudly demonstrated that they are not qualified to handle firecrackers and that the city fireworks control bylaw is worthless.

I need not read any more to you. It is about time that we had legislation from the provincial level.

Mr. Chairman: The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: I would just like to say a word on what the hon. member for Niagara Falls has been discussing. It has been very difficult for me to see why, when we approach May 24 celebration, and I am never sure just what we are celebrating then, but that is the time that we can get the fireworks under the municipal bylaw. But when we come to the first of July, when we maybe should be concerning ourselves about celebrating something, most of the bylaws prohibit the sales at that time. If the Attorney General is going to move to control this sort of thing and leave the period of time when the fireworks can be sold in order to celebrate some national day, I would suggest that the period of devastation be brought around to July 1 when we are celebrating our Confederation day and would be more significant than the holiday of convenience in May.

I think it is time we moved towards the participation of our young people and many others in recognition of July 1 as a day of importance for our nation, and a gradual change of the celebration earlier in the season.

I do not know whether the Attorney General is considering such legislation, but I feel quite strongly about that and I hape he would consider that aspect at the same time.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Wentworth.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the Attorney General. Did he receive representation from the fire chiefs' association with regard to banning the sale of fireworks to the general public?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not believe we did this year. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. Deans: You have in the past received such a request.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I believe I did a year ago, or something more perhaps than a year ago. It was not entirely, I think, a unanimous approach. They were representing certain municipalities, as I recall. I did not receive any this year.

Mr. Deans: I would just say in regard to that I do believe that the sale of fireworks to the general public should be banned at this time. I think that some form of a permit system that would allow groups of adults who intend to put on a fireworks display at any particular given time that would allow them to purchase those for a particular purpose, strictly supervised, would be a suitable way.

But I had many experiences, in my former capacity, taking part in fireworks displays. When they are available to sell to the general public, what generally happens is this. The fireworks display itself is well supervised. It is held well out of reach, and generally speaking in such a fashion that it will not be injurious to anyone or to any buildings, but children have these fireworks and are able to run around in the crowds of people and throw them around.

I saw on two occasions small children badly burned in baby carriages. I have seen, numerous times, where children have come close to losing eyes because of stupidity, and I cannot see any purpose in allowing this to continue. It serves no useful purpose. I am not denying the children the opportunity to view fireworks, but I think that it should be done under strict supervision and they should be sold under municipal permit and that this Legislative Assembly should pass legislation making that law.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the fire marshal. The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman, the use of the fire marshal's report for the end the calendar year of 1967—a good deal of information which can be quite summarily given to the House indicating the incidence of fire, the impact of it in loss of life, and the causes of it and how it can be dealt with, and what is actually being done. If I just may refer to page 3 of this report, it says:

> Continuing the fire incidence reduction from 1965 to 1966, the number of fires went down; the number of fires which occurred in Ontario dropped even more in 1967. Following a decrease in 1966, the total fire loss has taken a substantial rise, however—

I do not think it is because of inflated land values necessarily:

> —of to $11 million, or slightly more than 24 per cent. The number of fire fatalities was the same as in 1967 as it had been in 1966. Careless smoking was again found to be the most frequent cause of fire, with 6,200 outbreaks recorded—down 699 from the previous year. Its fire loss was just over $2 million. The improper use of electricity, with half the number of incidents, had a fire loss nearly twice that of careless use of cigarettes, cigars and pipes.

He goes on to say:

> The cost of incendiary fires this year was up half a million dollars to the amount of $2.6 million, the third most costly cause of fires in this province.

Touching just briefly on the incendiary situation in the province, there is a very high rate of detection and conviction, nevertheless, and it would seem that the arsonists in our midst seem to be rooted out quite well. At page 12 they say there were 768 fire investigations conducted—that is where there was a suspicion of arson, of which there were 109 fires in which 161 people died; 52 large fires and explosions.

There were 607 fires where there was a suspicion of an offence having been committed, of which one half—about 301—were found to be of an incendiary origin. As a result, 287 criminal charges were laid and here was an amazing figure of which 235, of the 287, registered convictions. There were 17 acquittals and there were a number of cases awaiting trial at the end of the year.

I think these are facts of value to get before the public and into Hansard, out of this particular report.

I do not think enough can be said with respect to the business of careless smoking. My remarks on that particular head is that I wonder whether criminal proceedings are sometimes commenced against individuals who, through that particular kind of negligence, do cause damage to property and to the lives of others on a considerable scale. And, with that in mind, as to just what proceedings are envisaged. I get the impression that by and large this is accepted as a risk that we all have to undergo in the province and it may be just as well to turn the criminal wheels a bit in order to foreclose that possibility which, after all, costs many millions of dollars each year.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I should like to make a brief comment, Mr. Chairman, and it will be brief.

I think the hon. member has pointed out some very salient facts in the report. I would like to just comment that, on the fire investigation matter, where 301 fires were found to be of incendiary origin and 287 criminal charges laid, and the securing of 235 convictions, with 59 still pending, is a pretty good report.

Briefly, on the matter of careless smoking, I think I have to say that careless smoking itself is not necessarily, in fact is not, a criminal offence. It does not enter into the criminal area. Perhaps it should but it does not.

Mr. Chairman: Anything more under the fire marshal's office?

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the Minister if he is considering passing legislation or regulations that would permit members of the fire department to issue tickets to individuals who contravene minor fire safety regulations.

We have an annual fire inspection in practically every community across the province. The fire inspector may come into a home and find certain safety regulations that are being violated. He simply warns the resident to have that cleaned up within a certain period of time, but he has no authority to take the individual to a court of law and penalize him for infractions of fire safety regulations.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, Mr. Chairman, our approach to that is that this is not a punitive approach or attitude. It is an educational approach to warn and educate people and encourage them to improve their situations and not to run the risk of leaving situations which are likely to cause fire hazards. We have not, at this point at least, and I think we would not, make this a matter of issuing a summons in that situation.

Mr. B. Newman: Mr. Minister, have you not been asked by the fire chiefs' association to institute such a procedure?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I do not believe I have. I think perhaps this has been a matter we have discussed. Suggestions may have been put forward that this might be an approach, but I do not think I would accept that approach. It has not been urged upon me.

Mr. B. Newman: If education fails, what is the answer, Mr. Chairman? There is no answer then?

May I ask the Minister if he was considering legislation forbidding the sale of certain types of garments that would flash—inflammable garments and inflammable toys?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The fire marshal's office has done research on various articles of clothing, toys, dolls and that sort of thing. What we do is go to the manufacturer and persuade him that those things must come off the market and are not to be sold. We have not passed legislation. Once it is shown that there is a danger there is no difficulty, I think, in closing that out of the market.

Mr. B. Newman: How about imports, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The province does not control imports.

Mr. B. Newman: You see, you have not solved the problem if the articles are allowed to be imported into the country.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: We go to the merchandiser and say, "Do not put this article on the market."

Mr. MacDonald: That is the way you go to the merchandiser who handles Mace, yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mace, I thought you would say that.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Mr. Chairman, I have another matter in this vote that may take a few moments. Is the House leader anticipating going home rather shortly?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I take it your remarks will only take a couple of minutes and—

Mr. MacDonald: No, it will take more than a couple of minutes, that is the point.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Four or five?

Mr. MacDonald: Four or five.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That would be fine.

Mr. MacDonald: You insist on breaking a gentlemen's agreement—okay.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh no!

Mr. MacDonald: You force me to come to only one conclusion.

Mr. Chairman, since it is being thrust upon me I shall proceed.

I wanted to raise a matter that has become a topic of prolonged discussion and negotiation between local 9-14 of the oil, chemical and atomic workers international union in Sarnia and the city council. The issue has arisen because during the past year some of the corporations in that area—particularly, I believe, Polymer—had decided that members of their bargaining unit, workers who normally were full-time firefighters within the plant, have now been relieved of those duties. They have switched the firefighting responsibilities to shift workers who are trained for the purpose. So when the emergency arises, they will then presumably drop their normal work and do the firefighting.

The net effect, as argued by the union, is that a greater load in firefighting has been dropped on the local municipal firefighting force and therefore, the local municipal taxpayers.

Now, in the context of that, there are two or three points that I wanted to bring to the Minister's attention. For example, in the brief that was originally presented by the union to the city council—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Where is this?

Mr. MacDonald: Sarnia.

And I need not remind the Minister that Sarnia is, I think, a place where fire hazard is above the average because of the nature of the industry.

It is pointed out in their brief, for example, that modern industrial operations in the interest of efficiency have a bare minimum of saff covering these process jobs, the regular jobs within the industry. In the event of an emergency call these process people have to leave their posts unattended, thereby creating further hazards.

To cite one example: In one area where there have been approximately 10,000 horsepower of compressor equipment working with ammonia ethylene, and methyl chloride, the attendant is one of the new duty call firemen and may, at a moments notice, be expected to leave this operation unattended.

Now, as a layman, as a citizen just examining the argument put forward, it strikes me that this is a dangerous kind of situation to create in a new set-up that is presumably going to be adequate to meet the threat from fire in the community.

On the next page in their brief, the union points out that "Polymer Corporation in March of this year, subsequently told this union, firemen and process workers, that no shift people will go outside the plant to fires." So that if per chance there is a fire nearby that may come their way, according to the rules no shift person can leave the plant, even though conceivably he may be one of the persons who has been trained for firefighting purposes.

They then go on to make an extended argument—which at this time of the day, I will not put on the record—regarding the standards established nationally by underwriters to prove what they contend is the case that the firefighting force in Sarnia is already understaffed, and that by dropping this larger load on them, they are not going to be in a position to cope with it and, therefore, that the corporations are not carrying their fair share for protection in the community.

They conclude by asking a number of questions:

> We ask what price are you prepared to pay to further subsidize industries responsibility? We ask further, is industry prepared to pay its share of the cost of services and authorities proportionate to its true market value of all assets?
> We further ask, is industry prepared to subject itself to further inspection and public reporting thereon, by all municipal, provincial and federal government fire inspection authorities? And are the industries prepared to comply with the findings of these groups? Are the industries prepared to supply complete and full information on all of the petroleum chemical volatile, explosive, obnoxious projects that are being handled, produced and transported in the Sarnia area?
> At the present time, the Ontario fire marshal's office and the municipal fire departments cannot obtain sufficient information from industry to train their people to be knowledgable in dealing with these bombs on wheels that are hauled along our streets and highways, let alone go into any of the plants in this area, on what might be termed a mutual aid basis.

They point out in a subsequent document, Mr. Chairman, that in contrast to the counter-argument presented by industry, supported by the underwriters association and accepted by the local municipal council, that one of the officials of Polymer emerged in a different capacity, namely, as the corporation's sole witness before an arbitration board to deal with a grievance.

In the course of his evidence, this Mr. Dale Wood, supervisor of special risks, the oil division, Canadian underwriters association, stated that his work covers oil and petrol chemical plants all across Canada, including all of the chemical valley. This man gave in evidence, for the arbitration board, that—and let me cite two or three incidents —first, "no plant has what he would call a professional fireman."

Now, here is a man who said this new set-up was fine, but when he comes up in another capacity, before an arbitration board, he makes a flat assertion that no plant has what he could call a professional fireman.

Secondly, he and others in his organization base their opinions on the information that the company tells them, not in what they physically see themselves.

This is a man from the underwriters association which is establishing the standards by which we are going to live and operate.

Thirdly, his organization is interested only in the physical property; they are not interested in the employees. Here, of course, you have the insurance underwriter's callous, economic approach. In fact, he nailed it down by a quote, which out of context is almost too stark to contemplate, but here it is:

> You can kill all the employees you wish, as long as you do not destroy the equipment.

Now, that is a nice kind of approach.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: What was the first document the hon. member mentioned?

Mr. MacDonald: The first document was a brief that was prepared by the local union of the oil chemical and atomic workers and presented to the city council. The council in turn sent it to interested parties for comment and the representations came back. This was finally dropped in the lap of the fire marshal whose comments were solicited on March 19, 1968, which was some months after this argument got underway, and had raged—if that is not too strong a term—in the community.

The fire marshal replied to the city manager, Mr. R. G. Given. He makes three or four points, not all of which, once again, I will go into at this hour. But there are two or three of them that relate to public policy which I think the Minister should be aware of, and perhaps could comment on. His first comment, if I may quote a portion:

> The concept that has traditionally been followed in Canada and the United States and indeed in Europe, when large complex industrial organizations establish themselves within the community, is to act as good corporate citizens by providing fire protection for their own installations.
> There are several reasons for doing this, but one of the most specific is that such corporations are processing or manufacturing complex products which require specialized fire protection equipment and training of personnel that could not be expected to be provided by the municipal corporation. The standards of fire protection and employees' safety that such private corporations follow are usually dictated by government law in the case of employee safety.
> While it is not clear as to whether or not the opinion of The Department of Labour was sought with respect to employee safety in this matter, apparently the opinion of the Canadian underwriters association was obtained with respect to the level of fire protection for property safety.

I have two comments to make: One, as is pointed out later, the fire marshal—and perhaps with some validity, for this is not within his bailiwick—but when it gets back to the Minister, who is a member of the Cabinet sitting with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Bales), he leaves hanging in limbo the question of whether or not the safety of the workers is being protected.

I suggest that when the two Ministers are sitting in the same Cabinet, if as fundamental a change is made in the fire protection set-up, and the question can validly be raised whether the workers are being adequately protected within the plant, then the onus should rather quickly rest with the Minister of Labour being brought in and render a decision.

I am not aware—it is now three months since this letter was written—if the Minister of Labour has made any comment whether or not the law for protecting the workmen has been sufficiently safeguarded in this change, or if something more should be done about it. There should be co-ordination in the Cabinet on this kind of thing. Secondly—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Was this raised in the Labour estimates?

Mr. MacDonald: Frankly, no. Touché. Maybe I will ask the question tomorrow.

However, on the second point, with regard to the opinion of the Canadian underwriters association apparently having been lived up to, I have already put some evidence on the record. As to, quite frankly, whether or not the opinion of the Canadian underwriters association is the sole opinion that one should consider, I have some doubts. Any association that would make the comment that I quoted—"You can kill all the employees you wish as long as you don't destroy the equipment—as far as I am concerned, is not going to be accepted as final authority.

Mr. Bullbrook: That was taken out of context.

Mr. MacDonald: Somewhat out of context perhaps—I said it was too stark. But what he was saying was that, as far as the insurance underwriters are concerned, they were interested in the equipment and the building but not interested in the employees.

Mr. Sopha: Well, that is a terrible thing to say.

Mr. MacDonald: The physical set-up, not what happened to the men, right. And this is where The Department of Labour comes in.

Now let me move to the second point in the fire marshal's letter and I quote:

> In order that your council may satisfy themselves, an adequate degree of employee saftey is being maintained over this change in fire protection—

I am sorry, I really have dealt with this. This is where they said you should get in touch with The Department of Labour

It will be interesting when I put a question to the Minister of Labour now, to find out whether or not something has been done to assure himself.

But finally, the fire marshal wrote:

> If you feel it would be of any assistance to assess the needs of your municipal fire department, this office, on receipt of a resolution of your municipal council, would be prepared to conduct a municipal fire protection survey of your municipal corporation, but such a survey could not take into account completely the special hazards presented by the petro-chemical industry within your municipality.

Now, earlier in some great portions of these documents which I have not quoted, they make reference to the mutual fire protection arrangement which has been established on a county basis in some instances and in other instances among the industry themselves. What puzzles me—and I am now back to policy in the broad application, not only in Sarnia, but elsewhere—concerning the fire marshal's reservation. If the fire marshal's office is going to go in and make a survey why, if the survey is going to be meaningful in the context of that community, would it not take into account all of the firefighting —the mutual aid arrangements within the industry or the mutual aid arrangements within the community as a whole?

I do not profess to be an expert in the field, but I am a bit puzzled as to the purpose of the survey, if it is not going to take into account everything in the community, and come up with a pretty definitive recommendation.

However, my basic point, apart from whatever comment the Minister may have on the Sarnia case as a specific example, is more in the broad context. I am intrigued as to what appears to be a general tendency for industry that has accepted, as part of its corporate citizenship, a share within its own plant, of firefighting protection costs, but is now tending to unload this on to shift workers, as a part-time basis, with a lot of questionable consequences. But more important, to drop a greater proportion of the burden on the local municipal firefighting force, so the net effect is that what was originally carried by industry, rightly or wrongly, now is going to be carried by the already overburdened local municipal taxpayer. In short, this may well be something that the Smith committee should be looking into, in terms of the equitable sharing of our tax burden at the local level.

Mr. Bullbrook: What did city council say on that?

Mr. MacDonald: The city council, if I recall—and if the member is more knowledgable I invite him to speak—the city council in effect sent the union brief out to get the reaction from the underwriters, from industry, from everybody, and then finally, after a further exchange, they sent it to the fire marshal's office. That was some three months ago. Now what has happened since then? If the member can fill us in, I would appreciate it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, this would appear to be a desirable time and appropriate one to move that the committee rise and report.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to a certain resolution and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee begs to report it has come to a certain resolution and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning we will continue with the estimates of this department until one o'clock in the afternoon and the happy hour between one and two p.m. before lunch will be assigned to Budget debate.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11.20 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

FRIDAY, JULY 5, 1968

The House met at 9:30 o'clock, a.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introductions of bills.

THE TERRITORIAL DIVISION ACT

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Territorial Division Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: This is a housekeeping bill.

THE MUNICIPAL TAX ASSISTANCE ACT

Hon. Mr. McKeough moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Municipal Tax Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, those amendments correspond with amendments in the following Act.

THE DRAINAGE ACT, 1962-1963

Hon. Mr. McKeough moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Drainage Act, 1962-1963.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, this Act amends the 1962-1963 Drainage Act and is essentially concerned with clarification of certain sections of that Act, and a simplification of administrative procedures. Sections 2 and 7 provide that notices be sent to all affected conservation authorities at least 30 days before the engineer is appointed. Sections 4 and 5 were amended to delete reference to The Conservation Authorities Act, and make reference to the new Conservation Authorities Act 1968. Section 9 and 10 deal with administrative procedures.

These two sections eliminate the need for approval by the Lieutenant-Governor in council for grants in excess of $5,000. The remaining sections, Mr. Speaker, deal with a variety of matters pertaining to this Act. Section 1 spells out the reference to "the Department" as meaning "The Department of Municipal Affairs". Section 3 corrects previous reference in a section dealing with assessment of land in neighbouring municipalities. Section 6 removes doubt concerning the status of lands that are exempt from taxation under The Assessment Act. This section authorizes such lands to be specially assessed in substantially the same manner as provided for in The Local Improvement Act. Section 8 is primarily of a clarification nature, and extends the eligibility for drainage grants towards repair and maintenance on drainage works assessed against agricultural lands. Section 11 ensures that the drainage referee will be compensated for his services under the Act, notwithstanding the provisions of any other Act.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Highways that follows some information he gave the House yesterday.

Why was the priority for the construction of Highway 522 and the bridge over the Pickerel River Narrows reassessed?

Hon. G. E. Gomme (Minister of Highways) Mr. Speaker this is a usual procedure for us in the department to reassess the needs of the traffic and all these things with every highway project, and this would be why.

Mr. Nixon: Why do the reassessments come after every election?

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Energy and Resources Management has an answer to a question.

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, in answer to question 512 asked by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon). His question was:

1. Has approval been just granted for a new sewage plant in the township of Vaughan? 2. Will this new plant serve all the southeastern section of Vaughan, located in the Don River shed? 3. Will the town of Richmond Hill have access to this new plant to alleviate its present overloaded sewage facilities? 4. Did the OWRC recommended this new plant?

The answer: Arrangements have been made with the Ontario water resources commission to authorize implementation of certain sewage works in the township of Vaughan in accordance with the report by Duncan Hopper and Associates Limited, Consulting Engineers, dated January 3, 1968, entitled "Township of Vaughan, North Don Sewerage."

I now wish to report the government's conditions under which this authorization is to be given.

1. A 1.4 millon gallon per day complete sewage treatment plant, will provide for effluent polishing and nutrient removal. This plant will serve the expanded York Central hospital, the proposed Don Head school, 4,200 persons in the town of Richmond Hill and 400 acres of new development which is generally described by drawing No. 6774-1 in the Duncan Hopper report, and there will be no extension of the serviced area beyond these limits and no expansion of the sewage plant capacity.

2. The sewage plant will be abandoned by the municipality with no compensation if it is requested to do so when the overall servicing programme in York central areas is implemented by the OWRC.

3. The township of Vaughan shall participate in the proposed regional servicing scheme, and enter into an appropriate agreement with the Ontario water resources commission.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THIRD READINGS

The following bills were given third reading upon motions:

Bill 143, An Act to amend The Corporation Tax Act.

Bill 145, An Act to amend The Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto Act.

Bill 149, An Act to authorize the raising of money on the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

Bill 154, An Act to amend The Municipal Unconditional Grants Act.

On Bill 155, An Act to amend the Municipal Act:

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish again to make a few remarks about Bill 155, and the clause in that bill relating to the enabling of large municipalities to dump garbage in small ones, or even small ones to dump garbage in large ones, without proving the need to do so, and I think that this whole approach of setting up a situation, whereby municipalities will get into conflict with each other even before the Ontario municipal board, is unwise and I think it is unnecessary and I deplore that the Minister has not found a better solution to this situation. I think that the government is failing to approach the problem which is going to be an increasing one, in a logical and long-range, and far-sighted way. They are just setting up a battleground which is going to occur repeatedly until this government devises a plan to deal with the disposal of garbage in a major metropolitan area.

Motion agreed to; third reading of the bill.

The following bills were given third reading upon motions:

Bill 156, An Act to amend The Assessment Act.

Bill 158, An Act to amend The Power Commission Act.

Clerk of the House: The 15th order, the House in committee of supply; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 208:

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sandwich Riverside.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich Riverside): I believe that last evening, the Attorney General did not get around to answering the question: Would he introduce legislation provincially to ban the sale of fireworks publicly? I think that he overlooked giving us his view on the matter.

Mr. Chairman: That topic had been completed and the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) had introduced another topic.

The Attorney General had not responded to it.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): I wanted to speak on the matter raised by the hon. member for York South. I did not, in the instance, get a copy of it, but I think I got the content of it as the hon. member read it. I think that the fire marshal was expressing what I think was a very proper approach to the matter. He was willing and competent to survey for the municipality, its capabilities in the matter of firefighting, and its complement, and the equipment it should have and the circumstances of its municipal responsibility.

I did ascertain in discussion with him that he did not feel that he had the jurisdictional right to go into the industry concerned and that perhaps he did not have the competence to assess the technical requirements of that highly pyrotechnical industry. I also ascertained the provisions which relate to the safety of the personnel, that the industry comes under the Canada labour safety code, and this is a Dominion company, a Crown corporation, controlled under the Dominion labour safety code.

The fire marshal had no objection to doing that, but the company should decide its own means of firefighting and whether the provisions are adequate for the protection of its personnel. It comes under the Canada safety code, and should be followed through that agency.

Further than that, the matter has been followed up and arrangements have been made with the Ontario Department of Labour, and in conjunction with the federal authority, to have that inspection or study made and the fire marshal will assist to whatever extent he will be requested. I understand that he is working through The Department of Labour, which handles the labour safety code, in the matter.

The general approach to the municipalities of the fire marshal—as the hon. members are aware, much work is done in aiding the municipalities. It helps them assess their needs for firefighting purposes, in personnel, equipment, and training. These have been most helpful and the recommendations suggested are usually adopted and carried out. Generally the situation has not been left as was indicated by that letter but they are being followed up.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Chairman, as I indicated yesterday, my interest was not primarily in the specifics of the Sarnia case, but more generally in the underlining policy, and therefore its possible wider application throughout the province of Ontario. I emphasize that before I proceed with my remarks.

I think that the Attorney General's remark, with regard to The Canada Labour Safety Act applying, is true in the case of Polymer, because it is an emanation of the federal Crown. But it is not true in the case of any other industry in the province of Ontario. That brings me to a basic policy question about the operation of the office of the fire marshal.

What is the point of having the fire marshal's office which moves in to survey the adequacy of fire protection in a community but does not have the power to investigate an industry? As I quoted yesterday, the underwriters say that they accept the industry's versions of its fire protection capacity because they do not go in and see it for themselves. Now it seems that there is a problem here at your level, caused by a need for a policy decision on behalf of the fire marshal's office. Because, now that we are altering the previous setup with regard to fire protection and apparently shifting some of that share of the burden that was carried by corporations on to the municipalities, it would seem that someone will have to make the decision as to whether or not the new situation is adequate for the protection of the community, as well as industry.

You cannot do that by standing outside and helplessly, in effect, operate on the basis of, "what the industry says is the story." As I indicated last night also, I do not think that we should be satisfied with accepting the insurance underwriters' views of the situation.

But, moving out of Sarnia altogether, I have an even broader application of the issue. My question for the Attorney General is: just how wide is this practice—one illustration of which we have seen in Sarnia—of companies who have had their own full-time work-force staff to do their own firefighting, dropping that responsibility and handling it on the basis of shift workers being trained to cope on a part-time basis? How widespread is this shift of responsibilities for fire protection from corporations to the local municipality?

Just before I sit down, I would like to mention two other aspects of the situation, with specific reference to the underlying policy, because the Attorney General has not referred to them. It has to do with the business of the shift of the tax burden. How widespread is that throughout the province of Ontario? It seems to me that if it is more widespread than in the city of Sarnia, then this is a matter that should be looked at as an aspect of overall government policy.

Secondly, on the safety aspect, again setting aside Polymer's unique position of being a federal Crown agency—what are the procedures to bring the provincial Department of Labour immediately into the picture when there has been a change in the firefighting establishment and the division of responsibility between corporations and the local municipality? As I said last night where the fire marshal writes and says, "Now I suggest you should get The Department of Labour in to discover whether or not the workers' safety is now adequately protected under the new set up"—the public safety is the fire marshal's responsibility, but the workers' safety is the government's, through The Department of Labour. Can we not get some automatic procedures established within the government that, when the change is made, there will be an immediate assessment by the appropriate government department, in this instance The Department of Labour?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am really very appreciative of the hon. member raising these points and I agree with him that I think there is certainly a need here for discussion and a formulation of policy. The matter came to my attention for the first time late yesterday evening and I have not had time to pursue it.

I have noted very carefully in my brief notes what he has brought forward. I agree with him that there is certainly a need to have a discussion as to the powers of our own fire marshal's office with respect, particularly, to his powers to enter and inspect and require certain things to be done in a corporation, which is a citizen of the community and a taxpayer, from the point of view of property protection and particularly the personnel therein, and that this will involve our Department of Labour very definitely. I appreciate that Polymer is a special situation, but the fact that it is a Crown corporation does not take away from the necessity of pursuing this matter.

I have not had an opportunity to discuss it, except very briefly late yesterday with the fire marshal, and I have not had a chance to talk to my colleague, the Minister of Labour. But it does occur to me that while the matter needs to be followed up, there must be quite a wide power in the local fire inspector who can come into the home, and, I presume, into industry, into an area within a municipality, and inspect and require changes, improvements, and so on. I have noted the matter. I agree that there is need for study and probably action, and I shall follow up the matter. I am glad it has been raised.

Mr. MacDonald: I appreciate very much what the Attorney General has said. May I just emphasize one point? In following it up I wonder if the Attorney General would cast his eye across the province and see how widespread is the development of this problem.

Mr. Chairman: Is there anything further on the office of the fire marshal? The member for York Centre.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, would the Attorney General advise me if the fire marshal's office keeps an inventory of the fire equipment and the age and the efficiency and capability of fire prevention equipment in the various municipalities around the province.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. The fire marshal's office has a complete knowledge of the equipment complement of each municipality.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, could the Minister advise me if the fire marshal's office is also co-ordinating or assisting the municipalities in the co-ordination of firefighting agreements between each other; in the training of their personnel; and in seeing that they have, perhaps, a rating efficiency as to their ability to cope with fire protection in their municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a large part of the activity of the fire marshal's office. We have no power to compel municipalities to amalgamate, as it were, their forces, but they are assisted in every way in advice—inspection of their complement, the training of their personnel, and their needs are set forth. The fire marshal's office gives them very useful assistance in this area.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, then the fire marshal's office does advise municipalities when they consider the agreements and arrangements to be deficient in protecting any particular areas concerned, do they?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They do.

Mr. Deacon: Well, I appreciate that answer, because a few years ago when we were trying to determine the efficiency and the situation of our municipality in Markham township vis-à-vis the other municipalities in the province, we were unable to get assistance from the fire marshal's office at that time. I am very pleased to know that this type of programme has been introduced. It is amazing what excellent results can be achieved in these less densely populated areas by volunteer brigades if they are properly assisted and encouraged by the fire marshal's department.

I know that in our own area we have seen some remarkable results of a volunteer brigade. I noted with interest the member for York South's concern about industry and their co-operation on part-time, rather than full-time firefighting assistance. I know in our own area that we have valued very much the co-operation of small business people and others who are willing to give up their time to look after the protection of our property, and have done it very effectively.

I do not think I have ever before seen a partially burned barn, it is a most unusual sight. That is the situation in our own municipality under the volunteer system, and I do not think it is to be deprecated.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, one brief question. Does the fire marshal's office have anything to do with inspection of government-owned buildings, for example, the Mercer reformatory?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It inspects many government-owned buildings from the point of view of fire.

Mr. Shulman: In that case there is a matter I would like to follow up. The member for Lakeshore and I toured the Mercer reformatory recently and we were a little disturbed to discover that the fire hose in the large room—I guess it is the auditorium—obviously had not been inspected or touched for many years. The hose is wound around a central core, and fungus and cobwebs have completely bound the whole hose together so it could not possibly have been used.

I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that that inspection, at least in this particular area, was not too thorough, and request that he look into that matter.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will be glad to do that. When the hon. member's question was asked it was about the inspection of government-owned buildings, public buildings—the fire marshal does this usually on request. Where a building comes within the jurisdiction of a department, such as in this case at Mercer, which he specifies, the inspection, originally and primarily there and protection generally in that institution, would be the responsibility of The Department of Correctional Services under the Minister.

The fire marshal would come in, usually on invitation, and advise, inspect and report and give the basis of his findings of what should be done, but I do not think he goes in as a matter of course to inspect. I have noted it.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the fire marshal; agreed to.

Office of the supervising coroner and general inspector of anatomy. The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, perhaps some of the members will recall that last year there was an enquiry into the purpose of coroners' inquests, and I thought perhaps I should say a word or two on the purpose of the coroner just in case this enquiry had not come to the attention of some of the members of the House.

I am not going into the details of the enquiry. We have belaboured that on numerous occasions, but at this particular time I am anxious to discuss the purpose of the coroner, and specifically the purpose of the coroner's inquest for this is the reason I am here.

There has been a divergence of opinion, let us say a mild disagreement between the Attorney General and myself on the purpose of the coroner's inquest. As I understand the view of the department as it has been expressed in letters and publicly and at the Royal commission, the purpose is to determine the cause of death in the specific cases involved.

May I say, to digress for a moment, that the Premier stated in the Legislature April 14, 1967 on page 2198 that the status and purpose of the coroner would be looked into by the Royal commission. Somewhere between the passing of his instructions to the commissioner and the carrying out of the duties of the commissioner, this was somehow overlooked, so perhaps you will pardon me, as I go into that now.

I would like to submit to you, sir, and I am sure you will agree with me even if the Attorney General does not, that the purpose of a coroner's inquest should be to prevent future deaths. This is the role that has been passed down by precedence and common law from our Mother of Parliaments, from the role of the coroner.

In England it is agreed with by Jervis, the leading ancient authority on coroners. It is agreed with by Gavin Thurston, chief coroner of London, England who has written what is the authoritative text on the purpose and function of the coroner.

Unfortuntely, here in Ontario, the department does not agree that this is the primary function of the coroner. In fact, I am not sure that they agree this is a proper function of the coroner, and the role of The Attorney General's Department and of the Crown attorneys who represent him at inquests, for many, many years was to limit discussion at inquests, to limit the investigation at the inquest so as to determine the cause of death alone and for some years they became very upset if there was any digression off into related matters which might prevent a similar death in the future.

If we look at it at a very simple level, I think it is quite obvious that, if the Attorney General's interpretation of the role of the coroner is correct, we might just as well wind up coroners' inquests right now and forget all about them. Because if all we are interested in determining is the cause of death—let us suppose a car is struck by a train at a level crossing—the cause of death is easily determined. The person was crushed or torn to pieces and we could stop the inquest right there.

But, of course, that is not the function of the inquest. The function is to go deeply into the matter and determine if there should be a level crossing at that particular spot. You make recommendations to prevent cars from being struck by trains.

When we have a death in a hospital as a result of an instrument being left in error in the abdomen, the cause of death is very obvious—obstruction of the bowel. But the purpose of the inquest should be to determine more than this. It should be to determine and lay out rules which would prevent this type of negligence occurring in the future.

I think that many people—I would like to believe most people—in this province were satisfied and pleased in recent years when a new trend had occurred in coroners' inquests, when they were probing more deeply and were making efforts to prevent deaths in the future, which I submit—and I believe I have a great deal of authoritative support—is their proper function.

Incidentally, believing that the Premier has some influence with Judge Parker, I prepared a 200-page brief, 100 pages of which were on the purpose and function of the coroner. I did not get an opportunity to deliver it at the Parker Royal enquiry and you will be delighted to hear that I am not going to deliver it today either, as it would take a very long time.

It really is not necessary to cite all sorts of precedents and authorities. If the Attorney General wishes, I will be glad to read it but unless there is a specific request from him perhaps we can dispense with that.

Now to come up to date. I am extremely disturbed to find that since the recent eruption in the coroner's office the people in charge at that office—and the responsibility ultimately must go back to the Attorney General, there is no use blaming the little man who works for him, who only follows his directions—the people at that office have turned the clock back.

We are right back in 1962 and before that when the purpose of the coroner's inquest was to get the thing covered up, get it over with as fast as possible, if possible placate the family, quiet down the press, make sure there is no flare up and onto the next disaster.

I would like to refer you to an inquest which took place in Toronto recently, which exemplifies all that is bad in the present attitude of the Attorney General and the supervising coroner and everyone who has anything to do with coroners' inquests. They have managed to turn the clock back 20 years. We are right back where we were before—not interested in preventing future deaths, only in "getting it under the rug."

I have here a copy of the Toronto Daily Star of Wednesday, June 26, 1968—and let me say, unfortunately, this is not the only example but the most recent and it just proves the people concerned have learned nothing by those five years of controversy. The only thing they have learned is "if someone tries to look into this thing, get them out of the way and let us get things back to the way they were before."

Well, there were three deaths—three construction workers died in North York—and The Attorney General's Department may not have been disturbed about it but a lot of other people were. Particularly the labourers' union, who were involved with this case closely because it was members of their union who had died.

They were very anxious to explore not what particular organs were crushed in the bodies of those men—only the Attorney General cared about that apparently and the coroner in charge and the Crown attorney—the union was interested in exploring ways of preventing similar deaths in the future.

They felt, quite rightly, that the cause of these deaths and the key to preventing future deaths was very obvious. It lay in the construction safety code, and if changes or improvements could be made in the code this type of disaster would not occur again.

They wanted the construction safety code looked into closely. They wanted the system of safety inspection in North York looked into closely. And what did the Attorney General and his servants say? "Do not look."

There is another matter that comes into this—that is the right of the relatives of the deceased or the relatives of any interested parties to ask questions at an inquest, to get all the facts, to examine any witnesses, either in person or through counsel.

This, I am sure the Attorney General would agree with me, should not be a privilege which can be given or taken away at the whim of himself or a coroner. It should be a right, provided the questions are pertinent, provided the matters that are being looked into are relative to the death or may help to prevent another similar death. The affected person should have the right to cross-examine.

Well, at this particular inquest, which to my shame took place in Toronto, they did everything wrong they possibly could. They refused to allow lawyers for interested parties to cross-examine, they refused to allow pertinent facts to be brought out, they did their best to cover everything up and sweep it under the rug.

I want to read just a little bit of what occurred at that terrible, terrible parody of an inquest, this mock inquest which took place here a week ago:

> Assistant Crown attorney J. B. Webster invited any lawyers present to join him at the counsel table. However, when Waterman—

Lawyer J. Waterman was appearing on behalf of the union to enquire into safety.

> —However, when Waterman began asking questions whispered to him by Norman Pike, the safety director of the labour union, who was taking notes, the Crown attorney objected. "This is not a sounding board for union proposals," Webster said, "we are trying to establish why and how he died."
> Waterman protested he had the same objectives as the Crown attorney but was going a little deeper with his questions. Webster was reinforced in his objections when Duncan Phillips, a lawyer for North York, objected to Waterman questioning witnesses at all.
> Waterman protested but the coroner ruled, "From now on I would like your questions submitted in writing. If they are relevant, they will be put. Is that understood?" Waterman, who seemed on the point of explosion, said, "Understood." When Waterman started asking questions about the construction safety code, Webster—

that is the Crown attorney—

> —said, "Direct your questions to the cause of death, not the safety code." "The two questions cannot be separated," retorted the labour lawyer.

They would not let him pursue these questions.

So what do we have at that inquest? We have a senior coroner present, who should have known better if he had not received instructions to the contrary. We had a Crown attorney present, who should certainly have been instructed in the proper role, the proper function of an inquest. We had a lawyer for the borough, who certainly was not interested in future safety matters; he was interested in finding out what injuries caused the death. And the Attorney General did not intervene, or if he did it was on the wrong side, as represented by his Crown attorney—on behalf of silence, that is where the Attorney General intervened.

So what does the labour union think about this? Let me say the feeling of the public is that there is some importance in this matter, in addition to the more important matters of preventing similar deaths. The feeling of the public is of some importance because, if they begin to believe again, as I now believe, that coroners' inquests are purely and simply to placate people, to quiet things down, they are going to become very disturbed with coroners' inquests, as they were for a long period of time.

And let me suggest to the Attorney General and to the Premier—because this is what interests them—if the public become very upset they are going to lose votes, so may I suggest at that level alone you should have a more direct interest in this matter.

What did the labour union think of all this? They have charged a cover up. "The men are dead, but they do not want us to stir up a hornets' nest, they make it look so beautiful." The safety director called out, "Good cover-up job." The lawyer said, "The inquest was a shocking bloody disgrace." And he was right.

The head of the labourers' union said they are not interested in our lives, and he was right. And I say to the Attorney General, terrible inquests occur in the boondocks of this province, but to find something like this occurring here in the capital, with the presence of a Crown attorney, with the presence of a senior coroner, highlights the extent to which he has succeeded—and I lay the responsibility on the Attorney General—the extent to which he has succeeded in perverting the purpose of an inquest.

As the Attorney General and chief law officer of this province, it should be his desire, it should be his wish—politics aside, interest of individuals aside, interest of corporations or government aside—it should be his one desire to see that the facts are brought out in a way that can produce recommendations that will prevent this type of death, and he does not care.

I am going to stop for a moment. I have a great deal more material on this particular subject but perhaps the hon. Attorney General has some comments on this matter, or any other member.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If there is any more material of that nature, I would hope the hon. member will proceed and get it over with, because all I have heard so far is the same sort of thing, the allegations he made, which were the subject of a Royal commission of enquiry. I would make the some comments as were found by that commission of enquiry.

Actually, to stand up and charge that the Attorney General does not care, that the Attorney General is disinterested, that the Attorney General has changed the approach of coroners' inquests, is completely without any foundation whatsoever. We have broadened The Coroners Act, requiring further institutions to report deaths—The Coroners Act specifically requires industry to report deaths. I think I differ not so much with the hon. member as to the purpose of the inquest. Where our differences perhaps arose —he will direct his mind to it—was over the methods that he particularly was pursuing, which were undoubtedly irrelevant to the purpose of the enquiry.

Mr. McRuer, in his study, has taken into account the coroner's office, the coroner's function, and has made certain recommendations. And as I reported to the House before, we are studying all the recommendations which Mr. McRuer has made with a view to implementing them into legislation.

With respect to the coroner's office, he deals with the purposes of an inquest; he points out that we do not have an Act specifically spelling those out. I can say that we have followed the English practice and Mr. McRuer quotes it:

> Proceedings in evidence in an inquest shall be directed solely to ascertaining the following matters, namely—

This is the English language of their statute:

> (a) who the deceased was, how, when and where the deceased came by his death, the persons, if any, to be charged with murder, manslaughter, infanticide or accessory before the fact.

and so on.

> And the particulars required by The Registration Act to be registered.

And then it goes on to provide that:

> Nothing shall pursue the coroner or the jury from making a recommendation designed to prevent the recurrence of fatalities similar to that in respect of which the inquest is being held.

Now, if you are pursuing fully, as you should —and I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting I have restricted the enquiry—if the enquiry is pursuing—

Mr. Shulman: How about the inquest?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There is nothing the hon. member has said where I am related to that inquest.

Mr. Shulman: The Crown attorney is your representative.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If you pursue the enquiry as it should be pursued, and it should be pursued to the fullest extent as to how, when, where, you get to the situation, the circumstances surrounding the death, whether it is in industry, hospital, an institution, a motor vehicle accident, and so on, and all those circumstances come forth.

It is to be borne in mind that the coroner's inquest is conducted before a jury of the people. It is a public enquiry before a jury. And their recommendations are carried forward to the department of government, to the municipal people, to the chief coroner's office, so that action may be taken to implement them and to make the necessary changes, so they may be followed up. So there is more to a coroner's inquest than just what the hon. member is trying to make out—to find out the cause of death and the nature of it and an autopsy on the body. I just have to reject that whole statement.

As I say, it is in the nature of the charges that the hon. member made which were found baseless when they were investigated by the Royal commission. I am not going to quote that report, nor am I going to take the time of the House to conduct such an enquiry here into that. I can only say that what he has said about the attitude of the Attorney General is not true. The coroner's enquiry is directed to ascertain all the circumstances, particularly with a view to making, through a jury of the people, recommendations that are acted upon by the departmental authority to which they are directed.

Just to reiterate briefly. The recommendations that Mr. McRuer has made are fairly complete and we are moving towards implementation.

Mr. Shulman: Is the Attorney General going to make any comment on the particular inquest which took place in Toronto?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No.

Mr. Shulman: Does the Attorney General approve of the conduct that took place at that inquest?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have not studied the particular case.

Mr. Shulman: May I suggest that the Attorney General should study that particular inquest, because this represents everything that is wrong in the department. Before I go on, the member for Sudbury East wishes to make some comments.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Mr. Chairman, through you to the Attorney General. The Attorney General is quite aware that the complaints that my colleague from High Park has made are the same type of comments that he has received from the union officials in the Sudbury district regarding inquests held in that area. The very fact that we do not seem to stress the fact than an inquest's findings should be to prevent further accidents occurring seems to be handed on to the management.

I want to quote from a letter which I received from the union, addressed to the Minister of Mines (Mr. A. F. Lawrence) and I believe that copies have gone to the chief engineer of mines and so on. This is what the union finds now as the result of this attitude—that an inquest is not to eliminate further accidents occurring and I quote:

> We know from experience that in many cases these recommendations handed down—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could you give the date please?

Mr. Martel: Yes, it was March 22, 1968. I will continue:

> —by coroners' juries are completely ignored, and, in fact, in our operations the mine superintendent will not discuss the jury recommendations that were handed down regarding a fatality in another mine, even though it is the same company.
> In other words, management at Creighton and Garson Mines will not discuss anything regarding the fatal accident in Levack Mines, although all are INCO properties.
> This does not make sense to us. If this is a mining fatality and the jury makes certain recommendations to prevent a similar accident from taking place in the future, should not these precautions be carried out at all mines? If this is not the case, then we believe that the taxpayers' money is being wasted, and that we are accomplishing nothing towards preventing such tragedies from taking place.

This is certainly in line with the comments of the member for High Park when he says: "What is the value if not to prevent future fatalities from occurring, when management refuses to talk about it, even though it is respecting another mine?

I have quite a bit on this, and, as the Attorney General is aware, I have been pursuing some questioning at length over the way that inquests and investigations are taking place in our area. I would like his comments up to this point.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member knows that I have been in correspondence with union officials and management on this matter and that I have since the date of that letter, asked the chief coroner of Ontario to proceed to Sudbury to discuss the whole matter there, which he did with the officials of his office. I have had correspondence since.

I met—not since the letter, but previously—with the members of the union there and we have discussed the matter with the Minister of Mines, and these matters have been brought to his attention.

I must say that there is one question which the hon. member has not mentioned—about the company police on the payroll being employed to investigate fatalities. That has been changed and the investigation will be handled by the Ontario Provincial Police. This has been done since the date of that letter, so we have moved into the situation through the chief coroner's investigation into the matter and my own intervention. I think you will find that has been greatly improved.

I must say, and it is only fair to say, that some of the things which were raised by the union officials were unreasonable. This was in the matter of procedure to be adopted, where they wanted the right of anyone to be able to get up and question a witness.

It had to be pointed out that the coroner has discretion as to how the inquest shall be conducted. To permit any person who felt he had reason, to stand up and talk and question the witness on his own, or with counsel, was something which would make for improper conduct in the inquest. It was pointed out that the question should be raised through the Crown attorney who is the person who has the responsibility.

There were comments made that because the cornoner would not permit this that he was incompetent or biased or something of that sort, which I have to completely reject. But we have moved to investigate the substance of the complaints there, and I think that the hon. member will find that they have been largely corrected. The matter is still a current file before me in my office.

Mr. Martel: I would like to ask the Attorney General how all the evidence, or the type of questions that the union wants presented can be submitted by someone else who is not familiar with mining? I have taken into consideration the fact that the question was not presented in precisely the manner necessary to establish the type of answer desired. I do not mean an affixed answer, but as a teacher I know that I can elicit a certain reply just by the manner in which the question is put.

It is certainly one of the complaints of anyone at an inquest that the questions are not asked in the manner desired. Consequently they do not get the answer. It is not an affixed answer that they seek, but the manner in which the question is presented is irritating in that we cannot get the facts sometimes. Will the Minister comment on this?

Hon. Mr Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am more than willing to comment, but I would prefer to answer all the comments that the hon. member has on the matter at once. I will deal with this one that he has asked.

What he is really suggesting is that people be allowed to ask leading questions; a question which leads you into a certain reply, and that is not good, fair, or proper questioning.

Mr. Shulman: The supervisory coroner does that all the time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But this is a detail. As I have pointed out, the coroner does not necessarily follow the rules which a judge would or might require, because an inquest is wider and goes further. But for me to say that in an inquest leading questions would be permitted, I just cannot say that.

The hon. member is protesting about the framing of the question and this may be due to the fact that the coroner asks the question in his own style, or that the Crown attorney is permitted to ask the questions, which may be quite proper, in the coroner's inquiry.

Mr. Martel: Mr. Chairman, I am not suggesting that anyone be allowed to get up and ask leading questions. I am simply stating that someone who is familiar with the type of work and trying to get the questions across in the best manner, without being leading, should be entitled to do that.

There are other areas that I would like to move onto again if I might. The Thompson inquest held in Sudbury is one. I submitted to the Attorney General some time ago, a quote from the Sudbury Star and so on, the fact that Mr. Thompson's body had been moved within five minutes of the time that he was struck, and that the plant was back in operation five minutes after the time that he was injured.

Now, there are certainly some very disquieting things coming from this in that I received a long distance call just three or four days ago.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member goes on, if that is the inquest, the fatality that I recall, the fact is that Thompson, while he was very seriously injured at the site, did not die there, but was removed, and died in the office. So surely the hon. member is not suggesting that because he was moved while he was still alive that this is a wrongful thing to do.

If he had been completely dead as a result of the accident, perhaps there was some reason to leave the body there to see all the circumstances surrounding it. But to leave an injured man—a seriously injured man—to lay there and not to move him is something that one could not contemplate.

I do not know what point he makes by saying the body was moved within five minutes. Why should it not be? I do not understand the implication of that remark. We investigated that and it was put forward in that way once before. Having been investigated, we found that the death occurred after he had been moved to some place where he might be treated, given some assistance. I do not follow that implication. I do not even accept it.

Mr. Martel: Well, Mr. Chairman, through you, I was not finished in what I was going to say.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is that so, or is it not so? Did not Mr. Thompson die elsewhere than where he was injured?

Mr. Martel: Right, he died within five minutes, but he had been moved. The point I am coming to, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that the body—the evidence apparently, or the scene of the fatality—was greatly changed prior to anyone coming there to investigate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a different matter and that has been brought to our attention.

Mr. Martel: The point I want to find out is; will charges be laid against International Nickel for altering the site of an accident before it can be investigated? I do not think they have a right to do this. I am no lawyer, but it does not seem right to me. How can you conduct an inquest when the scene of an accident has been altered, and certainly this has been a complaint of the union officials in the Sudbury district for the greatest length of time now. Frequently—and I have seen pictures—cement and everything has been added to alter the site of an accident before an investigation is conducted, and this sort of practice must stop. This is the point I am driving at. The fact Thompson was moved, and died somewhere else, is not really relevant here, the point I am trying to make is that the site of accidents are being altered and investigations cannot then be thorough.

The last point I would like to bring out deals with a case that was submitted some time ago. It revolves around an inquest held into the death of Mr. Stanick. Again, a case which I brought up earlier. The union has written Mr. Cotnam, March 6, 1968, that one of the men who gave evidence was being intimidated by certain of the supervision. I am wondering if The Attorney General's Department has looked into these allegations of attempting to intimidate a man to give the "right" type of information at the inquest by certain minor officials in the plant who were intimidating certain of the witnesses. I wonder if the Attorney General and his department look into this matter?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would say to the hon. member on that point that if you let me have those facts which he has I will be glad to look into it. You say that a letter has gone to Dr. Cotnam? I would like to have an opportunity to follow that up. That apparently was in March, you say?

Mr. Martel: March 6, 1968.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Now, I would be glad to follow it up. As to altering the scene of an accident, which were the words of the hon. member, there is no reason why that is to be regarded as a cause for prosecution, unless it were done with a view to destroying the evidence which existed.

Now an accident occurs in an industrial plant, in an industrial situation, there are witnesses, it is presumed, who saw the circumstances at the time of death. A beam has fallen, a machine has fallen over, a track has been broken and something has occurred to cause a fatality. The body is removed, but there are witnesses to these facts, who can give evidence. It is not to be expected that the whole plant must shut down, and that nothing can run, and that the industry must come to a halt.

That is not required, and it is not a matter which should be taken into account—with a view to prosecution, because the situation is restored, and industry resumes its way or the operation or whatever it may be. The same thing in a motor vehicle accident. You get as much evidence as possible of the scene, the vehicles must be moved to let traffic resume its normal flow. These are things that our common sense dictates must be done. I have a note now that in the Stanick case—the matter reported to Dr. Cotnam was referred to the Crown attorney, Mr. Burbidge, and investigated and there was no evidence. He could find no evidence that the man was being intimidated in any way.

Mr. Martel: Well just two final points. One, I would like to congratulate the Attorney General for having the provincial police conduct the investigations into fatalities at any of the INCO holdings in the Sudbury district. The second point, however—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: May I be permitted to say that when we brought the complaint to the attention of the International Nickel Company, they were most anxious, and immediately said that had they realized there was any objection to this, they would be most happy—in fact it suits them very well to have fatalities investigated by the OPP. There was no difficulty about that matter. It was just a case put forward to us as a cause of disquiet, with the feeling that the company police maybe, were not as impartial as they should be. There was no difficulty whatever.

Mr. MacDonald: On municipal taxes and everything—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: There was no difficulty in the matter. We did not have to expend any effort to accomplish it. Let me say that.

Mr. Martel: The final point, I would just like to get back momentarily though, to the altering of the site. I agree with the Attorney General that we cannot stop the whole production of a huge corporation like INCO, or any other plant for that matter, but I have seen pictures, Mr. Attorney General through you, Mr. Chairman, where cement work and everything has been done to improve the site prior to the investigation being conducted, and I think this is wrong. I find you start production again, but to do cement work and make repairs and so on prior to the investigation being conducted, surely it must be wrong.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No it is not wrong. I mean the hon. member is drawing an implication, because a company where the man who was employed took steps to improve a situation so that a fatality or an injury would not occur again, that this is wrong. No, industry must go on. He agrees what me on that. Now, should it not be a sensible thing to say well, if this was the cause—if this piece of equipment was not strong enough, or not properly placed—let us correct it so that we will not have another accident tomorrow, but, as I say, the evidence of how the situation was, and of how it existed at the time the fatality occurred; that can be given, and should be given, in evidence, but to say—"Oh you must not fix it—carry on your business, but do not fix it until the inquest is held a month from now, or three weeks from now", would be inviting another disaster.

Mr. Martel: I am not suggesting until the inquest is held. I am saying until the investigation is completed and this is where I am drawing the line, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue one matter in which the Attorney General has made some intriguing comments, the question of lawyers cross-examining at inquests.

His comment in reply to the member for Sudbury East, on this particular matter was: "Nothing improper in this particular coroner's actions," and certainly people could not, at will, be allowed questions, even through counsel.

The thing that intrigues me about this is that it is in direct contradiction to written instructions sent out—written advice, pardon me—sent out by the supervising coroner of Ontario. I presume that there is some contact between these two gentlemen. The supervising coroner of Ontario sent a letter out to all coroners in this province, advising them that any interested parties should be allowed, either in person or through counsel, to question witnesses.

Of course, this was not done at this inquest. Let me say, to begin with, this should not be advice. It should be instruction. I am sure the Attorney General knows that. It should be in the legislation. It is not. I trust that before too many of these sessions have to be gone through at an annual rate, it will go into the legislation. But in any case, here the supervising coroner sends out one set of advice which is not followed for whatever reason, not only in Sudbury, but right here in Toronto. It is not followed and the supervising coroner's advice does not spread too far from his office, or, at least, it is not followed too far from his office and then, we have the Attorney General getting up and literally disagreeing with it.

I would like to ask the Attorney General what are his views? Should interested parties be allowed to cross-examine and question witnesses in person and/or through counsel?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the hon. member has completed his remarks on this matter?

Mr. Shulman: I have completed my remarks on this matter. There are one or two other matters under this vote.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like to hear the rest before I answer.

Mr. Shulman: Does the Attorney General not intend to answer that question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I will answer when the hon. member has completed his comments on the matter of coroners.

Mr. Shulman: All right. If the Attorney General does not wish to answer that question, I will go on to another matter. Now, I am going to talk about the Attorney General.

There is just a little difference, Mr. Chairman, between the Attorney General's attitude as expressed today where he says he agrees with the objectives of preventing similar deaths, and his attitude when it comes down to specific cases.

We had a case brought up here, in the Legislature, a month ago involving another mock inquest. This one was held in Kirkland Lake. The Attorney General did not see anything wrong with this inquest at all. I asked him to investigate it. I asked him to upset it, but there was nothing wrong.

Well what happened at that inquest? A boy died as a result of a series of errors, many of them medical errors, and who turns out to be the coroner conducting the inquest? Why, one of the doctors who was treating that boy, who was involved in the medical errors before his death. He is the coroner.

Who is the chief witness? The man who is in charge of that treatment, the man who was in charge of the errors who turns out to be the coroner's partner.

The Attorney General does not see anything wrong with this. He defended this here in the House.

Now what happened at that inquest? Well, the doctors admitted a series of errors were involved. The coroner, his name was Doctor Gibbon. I will just quote here from the Kirkland Lake paper:

> Several times during the enquiry Doctor Gibbon referred to his close connection with the case. In his summary of the evidence he concluded: "It is hard to be objective because I knew every inch of the steps that were taken."

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Just like Mr. Callaghan.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Callaghan, as far as I know in reply to the interjection is not personally involved in this particular matter that he is looking into. The obvious difference was that Mr. Callaghan is not in charge at his enquiry. This coroner was.

Mr. MacDonald: Hear hear. Two very vital points.

Mr. Shulman: So the coroner admits it is hard to be objective. The Attorney General does not think there is anything wrong with that. Now, were all the facts brought out at the inquest?

One would think that a coroner in such an awkward position would lean over backwards to make sure that all the facts were brought out, at least to avoid the thought in the minds of some suspicious people that things were being covered up. So, did he bring all the facts out? Well, again I quote the coroner, after the inquest:

> Later he remarked that several things had not come out in the inquiry, but they were "not important."

Well, did the Attorney General think there was something wrong that some of the matters were not brought out in the enquiry? No, the Attorney General did not think anything was wrong with that either. He defended it here in the House.

What about the chief coroner of this province? What did he think about it? Well, the lawyer who was acting for the family was a little upset that this mock inquest was being held. He asked for a recess and he conferred with the coroner. Mr. Spence Stewart, the lawyer, said.

> The question has been raised as to whether Doctor Gibbon could act as coroner on anything he has something to do with.

This had been taken up with the chief coroner when he happened to be visiting the area and he had said it was all right so long as Doctor Gibbon acted impartially.

The mental logic behind this is quite intriguing. I would like to suggest that we follow along on this particular field of thought, that inasmuch as there has been some criticism of another inquiry that is coming up shortly, if we should follow the same method, I would like to suggest to the Attorney General that Mr. Fred Bannon be put in charge of this enquiry. Exactly the same situation.

You put a man in charge who is to look into his own conduct and you find nothing wrong with this and you are not surprised when the result comes out, nothing wrong there at all. He just died because of a few little mistakes.

I am not criticizing this coroner particularly, I am not even criticizing the supervising coroner particularly. I do not think they have the background to understand anything was wrong. I am criticizing the Attorney General, because with his experience and his background, surely he realized that this was not a proper inquest. It was not an honest inquest. It was a mock joke, nothing more and nothing less.

It is the same as with the magistrates. When we bring something to the Attorney General's attention here in the House which is obviously wrong, it is obvious to everyone here, it is obvious to every member of the public who reads the facts, we do not expect the Attorney General to get up and defend the indefensible. It is his function when something like this occurs to get up and say, "It was wrong, I will see it will not happen again, I will order a new inquest. I will see that the coroner and supervising coroner are properly instructed."

But what does he do? He gets up and he says "Nothing wrong here, there is no reason in the world why that coroner should not have conducted the inquest, after all he was not the chief doctor in charge. He was only one of the consultants. The chief doctor was just his partner. Nothing wrong with that at all."

This is the mental logic of the chief law officer of this province. It is a disgrace and you are a disgrace.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I expected that.

Mr. Shulman: Well, worse is to come. Before I go on to other matters, if the Attorney General or any other person intends to make any comment on those matters I will sit down for a moment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member is through on this subject of coroners?

Mr. Shulman: I am through on this subject. But I am going to go on to other subjects, under this vote, if there is no one else who wishes to participate in the debate.

Well, let us go on to another subject, the waste of money. On numerous occasions in this House I have got up to discuss this government's waste of money. I must say it varies from department to department. Some of the departments excel in wasting money, but most of them care sufficiently that when something is pointed out as wrong they have enough sense to do something about it.

This, unfortunately, does not apply to this department. I do not want to go into the matters raised at the Royal enquiry because that would take some lengthy time, with one exception, and that refers to waste of money, because this matter has now been brought up over a period of three years and absolutely nothing has been done.

The problem arises in that every body which is to be cremated must have a certificate signed by a coroner—quite properly, I would say. However, some 25 per cent of these cremations have already had another certificate signed by a coroner, and to send another coroner or the same coroner out to sign another piece of paper in a death which has already been investigated, is to my mind, and I think perhaps even to Judge Parker's mind, a waste of money.

The good judge minimized the amount of money involved; the good deputy assistant Attorney General explained, it was not "public" money, it was the public's money, and he is quite right. It is only the public's money that is being wasted, but it is sheer waste. The amount is growing every year because the number of cremations are growing at a great rate in this province.

When it was first drawn to the Attorney General's attention, it was obvious that this had occurred through an oversight, a mistake, when they brought down the legislation, which is understandable—no one can criticize that. But they have now had three years in which to change this.

More recently in the last year and a half, or two years, there has been another form of waste. They have a new type of certificate that has to be signed for shipping bodies out of the country. Once again, there is nothing wrong with the legislation per se, but they made an oversight, and the oversight involved requiring a certificate to be signed when a coroner's investigation had already occurred and another certificate had to be signed.

The solution is very simple. You merely need an amendment to your Coroners Act and your Cemeteries Act, saying, very simply, "any case which has already been investigated and a certificate signed by a coroner is exempted from this section." Simple legislation—one would have thought we would have seen it, at least at the beginning of this session, after everything that was said at the Royal commission on this particular subject, which was not disputed. This was one matter that was not disputed. The only thing disputed was the amount of money that was being wasted.

So, for goodness sake, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney General should put his people to work and bring in the amendment. There is no need to continue this way, it is just foolish.

Before I go on to another matter I will sit down and see if the Attorney General or any other member of the House wishes to participate in this debate.

An hon. member: He is worn out.

Mr. Shulman: Not for a while yet.

Well, if no one else wishes to participate in the debate, I will go on.

What I would like to talk about is the firing of coroners—a matter of which I have some small knowledge.

Coroners, according to the member for Sudbury, are not judicial officers. I am not going to argue the technicality of that, although if they are not, they should be, I think, because they are carrying out a judicial function, and a function in many ways far more important than that of magistrates, because the coroners deal in life and death while the magistrate is dealing with liberty and money. Very important matters on both sides but may I suggest that life and death is equally as important, if not more important.

Coroners should not be a political creature present at the whim—"at the pleasure", I believe the word is in the Act—at the pleasure of the government. If a coroner is to properly carry out his function without interference—and we have had the Attorney General here in the last 48 hours talking about how important it is that he should not interefere with the judiciary, with the magistrates, even if they make a mistake. Here we have a situation where the Attorney General does not feel the same compunction—as far as coroners go, if they do something he disagrees with—out they go.

They are not even entitled to a hearing. In my particular case, I screamed loud and long and I got a hearing. I do not believe I got a fair hearing, but I got a very long hearing. I have no personal complaint, but I have complaints about the system in reference to other coroners. As the situation now stands today, if some coroner anywhere in this province should happen to make a decision with which the Attorney General disagrees, for whatever reason, without any hearing he can send him a letter signed by the Lieutenant-Governor in council—"Out". He is not entitled to a hearing.

If there is a great deal of public outcry or if, in the kindness of the Attorney General's heart, he decides to order a Royal commission, or to have someone look into the matter, maybe he will get a hearing. But may I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the proper way?

If a coroner is to be thrown out, he should be entitled to a hearing and the mechanism is already there, so you do not even need any new legislation. There is a board called the public service grievance board, which, if one reads ordinary English, should cover matters of this type. There are regulations—I am sorry I do not have the Act here in front of me—but there are regulations covering public servants and there are regulations covering employees of the government who are not civil servants.

Rather innocently I went to the public service grievance board and asked for a hearing as to whether I had been properly fired. I mention this only—it is quite irrelevant now—I mention it only in relation to the future, so that other coroners in a similar situation should get a little more sensible treatment.

The public service grievance board did not hear my case. The reason they did not hear my case was very simple. The Attorney General wrote them a letter and he said, "The public service grievance board can only hear people who are involved in public service." I would have thought I was in the public service, but apparently I was not—at least, the Attorney General said I was not.

I came to the board and I said, "I would like you to hear my case because I am in the public service," and he said, "Oh no, you were not appointed under any of the Acts related to public service. You were appointed under The Coroners Act, therefore you are not entitled to a hearing; no other coroner is entitled to a hearing. If we fire them, that will teach them. They will keep quiet."

Well, he is right. That will teach them and they do keep quiet, even the bravest of them. But it is wrong, and I say to you, sir, and through you to the Attorney General, that the stand he took in front of the public service grievance board was wrong. And I invite him to reconsider the stand he took at that time. We know why he took that stand. It would have been terribly embarrassing if the public service grievance board had decided this particular coroner was fired improperly. Understanding it, I still cannot tolerate it, because he is wrong.

Without being retroactive, which I am not asking for, but for the future, I am asking him if he finds it necessary at some future time to discharge a coroner, I would suggest to him, and I ask him to put it on the record, that if such a matter should come up, and if the coroner feels he has been unjustly discharged, and if that coroner asks for a hearing in front of the public service grievance board, the Attorney General stand up like a man and go and present his case in front of the public service grievance board.

It is not a public hearing, it is a private hearing. It is not going to be in the newspapers. Let him present his case there and, if he is right, he will be sustained by the board and that is the end of it. But if he is wrong, he should not want to be sustained, he should want to admit his error. For him to refuse to defend himself, to refuse to defend the stand he takes in front of the public service grievance board is not worthy of even this government.

Before I go on to some other matter I will sit down in case some other members of the House should wish to particpate in this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I will carry on then.

I would like to turn my attention to the supervising coroner of Ontario. I am delighted to see he is here today. I hope he is learning something which may be of value to him in instructions which are sent out to coroners from time to time. I do not wish to go into detail, into the job he is doing. I am sure we are all aware of the quality of that work. I just wish to raise one particular matter, because it is wrong and it should be changed now, and this particular matter involves cremations.

The purpose of a cremation certificate, Mr. Chairman, is to ensure that before any body is cremated, destroyed, a proper investigation is made by some person who is not involved in any way to ensure that, at no time in the future, may that body be needed for further investigation, in case of possible homicide or any other reason because once you sign that cremation certificate, once the body is destroyed, that is it. You are not going to find out anything from that body.

So, when I was appointed chief coroner, the first reform I made was to ensure that cremations were properly investigated. The coroners were assigned to do this investigation in rotation.

The old system, I may point out, was another mock, another parody. It was a situation where two or three men had cornered this particular business and they would go out and without even examining bodies, or often without even seeing the certificates, they would sign cremation certificates and bodies would be destroyed. They would often sign them wholesale.

Some rather senior members of the department were signing cremation certificates without seeing either the body or the death certificate, or making a proper investigation.

Well I cleaned that up—almost. There was one little part that was not cleaned up as of April, 1967, and that was a matter that one of the crematoria did not approve of the delay that took place in cremations. It might take as much as half a day or even longer before a coroner completed his investigation or signed the certificate, and so the crematorium got in the habit of calling the supervising coroner and he would come up and assist them.

This was wrong, and I had hoped after everything that was said at the Parker commission—regardless of what Judge Parker thought of it—that the supervising coroner would have stopped this particular practice because there are certain cremations he had to sign for.

Those are ones where the death took place outside of the jurisdiction. But cremations occurring with the jurisdiction should have been handled the way they were handled in my office, by giving them to coroners in turn. No coroner knew what case he was going on; no funeral director knew who the coroner was that was coming out. In this way we were sure of an independent and complete investigation.

Well, last week I went down to inspect the records of cremations that have taken place in the last three months and to my dismay, to my amazement actually—I find that some people just do not learn—the supervising coroner is still going out and signing cremation certificates.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Is there anything wrong with that?

Mr. Shulman: Yes there is something wrong with that. First of all, if he is doing it in order to make the extra $10, may I suggest to the Attorney General, raise the salaries, give him enough money so he does not have to participate in this particular venture. I believe he is paid some twenty odd thousand dollars. If he needs more, give him more.

I do not argue about the importance of the job, it is a terribly important job. It deserves top pay. But do not have him going out trying to pick up the odd extra ten dollars here and there and interrupting the system. I do not question the particular cases he has signed. I do not think he is a bad man. I think mainly, he is a particularly stupid man, but he is not a bad man—

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is it desirable in this House to make insinuations about a man's character in the manner that it is being done? I think it is quite proper to raise the principles of the matter or procedures involved, but not to go into the question of insinuations which have to do with a man's motives or his own character or, indeed, his professional ability. I think the facts, in parliamentary procedure, is to deal with facts alone and let the conclusions then be obvious.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, to continue. Are you going to rule on the point of order or shall I go on?

Mr. Chairman: Well, I think you should keep your personal attack to a minimum please.

Mr. Shulman: I will be glad to keep my personal attack to a minimum. Up to this point I have kept my personal attack to a minimum. The point which I am raising, and I will stress it again, is that cremations should be handled all in the same way by rotation by the coroners in that form, and this will prevent possible future abuses. This matter was raised with the Attorney General while I was the chief coroner, it was raised at the Parker Royal commission, and it obviously has not changed.

Let me again say to the Attorney General that for whatever reason—and I have no hesitation in repeating what I said before—if it is financial, give him more money, and that is not a personal attack. For whatever reason, it is wrong. I would suggest to the Attorney General that he see that it does not continue.

One other matter I would like to ask the Attorney General about. I am rather intrigued by the duties of Dr. Cruickshank—I understand he is a consultant. I was rather amused to see that his salary is set considerably higher than the salary which I received as chief coroner. I understand he is carrying out some of my functions, so it makes me begin to realize what I was really worth in that job and I get some amusement out of that.

But I would like the Attorney General, when he gets around to getting up on his feet to answer, what are the functions of Dr. Cruickshank? If he is carrying out a portion of my functions I am curious to know what they were and why they are worth $15,000 a year.

Now, one other matter. In recent months we have seen another change of policy at the coroner's office, and this relates to people who are taken to hospital because they were ill, are examined in the hospital, told they are not ill, sent home, and proceed to die on the way home. It appears to me that this is an unusual occurrence, an occurrence worthy of some investigation. I am sure if I were a member of the family of such a person I would be extremely disturbed.

It is not good enough to say it is just one of those things that happens every now and again. It does happen every now and again, sometimes through no fault of any person involved. Sometimes, the doctor just cannot tell what is happening.

But sometimes it does occur through fault. Sometimes someone is negligent in that hospital or callous or careless, and in every death which occurs under those circumstances there should be an inquest.

There are two reasons for that inquest. One is to find out if someone was negligent and to make sure they are not negligent in the future. The second reason is to satisfy the family and the public.

It had been the policy for the past four years, up until a few months ago, in every death of this nature to hold an inquest because common sense says an inquest should be held. Well, you cannot always rely on common sense in this particular department, unfortunately, and now we do not have that policy. Sometimes we hold inquests, particularly if there is a big fuss. Sometimes, we do not hold inquests.

A man named Donnelly, was taken to the hospital a few weeks ago in this city. They told him he was fine, "go on home". He went home and died. I said to the Attorney General, "Will you hold an inquest"?

"No, I will not hold an inquest, I am not going to interfere with the coroner"—that is what he said. "I am not going to interfere with the coroner". The coroner decided there should not be an inquest.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is what you said I should do—not interfere—

Mr. Shulman: I am trying to equate your views here. Let me say, what I said was that you should not fire them. You say it is all right to fire them, but we should not interfere with them. The Attorney General's views change from moment to moment. He has said coroners are not judicial officers, perfectly all right to throw them out if we do not agree with them, but we must not interfere with their decisions, even if they are wrong. He is consistent there, at least. He said the same thing about the magistrates—"Must not interfere with their decisions, even if they are wrong"—and he was wrong, this coroner, and the Attorney General was wrong, and the principle is wrong. What I am asking him to do today, is reflect on his wrong decision. I am not asking him now to hold an inquest into the Donnelly case which is now past. What I am asking him to do is to reflect on his wrong decision and to confer with his supervising coroner and gently pass the word down to the coroners.

If someone dies under these strange circumstances, for goodness sake hold an inquest, because if you do not, if for no other reason you are going to be badgered again next year on all of these cases. So I would suggest that will be sufficient reason if justice and common sense is not enough.

Now let us go on to another matter, although if there is anyone else who wishes, I will take my seat.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: The gentlemen who are speaking, Mr. Chairman. Do any of them wish to participate in the debate? If so, I would be glad to yield the floor to them, otherwise—

Mr. Chairman: I do not think so. They have not addressed the chair.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Well let us continue to another matter. This is the matter of taking dead people to the hospitals. Sort of an odd thing one would think. One would not think that one would want to take dead people to hospitals, unless you are going to try and bring them back perhaps.

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Did you ever hear of cardiac massage?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, but when they are dead three weeks, cardiac massage is of not very much use.

Mr. G. A. Kerr (Halton West): Name a case like that.

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Rigor mortis has set in.

Mr. Shulman: We have a rule here in this city, unless it has been changed and we have not heard about it, that the dead are to go to the hospitals to make sure. The reason this rule was brought in was because a coroner made a mistake one day—and it is an understandable mistake, let me say. It can occur, in rare circumstances, that it is difficult to tell whether someone is dead or alive.

There can be circumstances like that. Not common ones, thank goodness, but it can occur, and this coroner made a mistake and I do not condemn him too seriously. He made a mistake and any of us can make a mistake. The person decided to come back to life and by strange coincidence, this lady happened to be in the family of one of my campaign workers, so I am rather familiar with the details. The coroner had left a death certificate which makes a lovely souvenir, incidentally, for that lady. But anyway she came back to life and she was taken to the hospital and she recovered and she is quite well.

I understand as a result of this, and in haste, and without thinking, I am sure without thinking, the acting chief coroner of this city brought in a new rule. Coroners must not pronounce anyone dead. If a coroner is called and they have not been pronounced dead by another doctor, the person must be taken to the hospital, to have certain tests done, I presume. I believe you mentioned electro-cardiography. Well unforunately, he made a blanket rule. I can understand why he made the blanket rule. He panicked, and he did not think, and he rushed to make this rule to protect the coroners, which certainly protects them.

Unfortunately this lets some rather funny things happen. The week after this occurred, there was a decapitation. The coroner was called to the street where it occurred and unfortunately he was not allowed to pronounce death. The head was off, mind you and no other doctor had arrived as yet. The emergency ambulance was there. The coroner said "I cannot pronounce death, off to the hospital", so they picked up the head. One man picked up the head and other two men picked up the body and off they rushed to the hospital and they took the parts in and the intern said "yes he is dead". The coroner followed on behind, did what was necessary, and ordered the body down for a post-mortem.

May I suggest that this type of ridiculous situation—and it is a ridiculous situation—in addition to being stupid, is a health hazard. We had another case where a man was dead. for a considerable time, had reached the point where heart massage was not going to be of much value because decomposition of the body had set in. The coroner was called and unfortunately coroners are not competent, apparently, according to the acting supervising coroner, to pronounce death and he said "Well I cannot pronounce death because there has been no doctor here."

It is pretty hard to get doctors to come out when you tell them there has been a body dead for a couple of weeks and you want them to come out and pronounce them dead. The doctors are likely to laugh at you, so it is pretty hard, under those circumstances, to get another doctor to come out. So what do you do? You take the body in all ambulance to the hospital. This is a health hazard. You do not want decomposing bodies going to hospitals because they are going to bring in disease.

So, I ask the Attorney General, if a coroner is not competent to pronounce death, who is? If a coroner is not competent to pronounce death, why is a junior intern with a little less experience, competent to pronounce death? So I say to the Attorney General, reflect, ask your supervising coroner to reflect, ask the acting chief coroner to reflect, perhaps they made an unwise decision and ask them, for goodness sake, to rescind this stupid rule.

A coroner has enough common sense, one would hope, that if he has some doubt he will send the person to the hospital. If he has no doubt there is no reason to call in another doctor. There is no reason to send the body to the hospital. A little common sense, please Mr. Attorney General. Now, unless there is someone else who wishes to participate in this debate I will go on to another matter.

Mr. Kerr: Rave on.

Mr. J. Jessiman (Fort William): We will bring in sandwiches.

Mr. Shulman: This is the matter of the coroner's office and research. I must confess, I will have to withdraw something I said earlier in the session. When I first came here and made my maiden speech one of the matters I referred to was the matter in which Dr. Porter was doing research into automobile deaths. The Attorney General, I stated at that time, had told the House that this work was continuing, and I pointed out that it was not correct, and I asked for his resignation. I want to withdraw that request for his resignation because since I have had an opportunity to make my maiden speech, I have had a further opportunity to see the other material, i.e., the other country lawyers that are available on the Conservative side. I think now it would be a great disaster if the Attorney General were to resign, so I ask him to stay there and try to improve himself.

Now to go on to the matter of research at the coroner's office. We have launched a very massive programme of research over a period of four years with some very excellent results and if there is any one thing that I am proud of at the coroner's office, it is the research work that was done at the coroner's office. That research work was passed on, in the field of automobile injuries to the Ford Motor Company in the United States. There are some rather delightful letters from them, indicating the work that was done with it. We were involved, unfortunately just at the time of my dismissal, in arranging a crucially-important piece of research which they have not been able to arrange anywhere else in North America. They were prepared to put in a very large sum of money to complete this work.

To do this work involved putting dead bodies in automobiles and smashing those automobiles. Because the real problem with research in automobile deaths is that you cannot do it. You cannot take a volunteer and smash him up. So you do one of two things. You either use an ape, or some other animal, and unfortunately there is no other animal which physically is just like the human being, so this research is not quite accurate, or you use a cadaver, and they were able to get cadavers, but unfortunately they were old cadavers. The only cadavers that were available were from medical schools, and they had been pickled for some time, and when you pickle somebody—with few exceptions, may I say—the body changes considerably, the bones change and tissues change, we have—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Like a gherkin, is that what you call it? Gherkin. As the member for Lakeshore has pointed out we have seen this happen in front of our eyes.

Research of this type is not fruitful. It is not accurate, because, unfortunately, once a body becomes brittle and you smash it up, it smashes, it shatters, and so you get funny results, so the various auto companies have done research with old cadavers, over the past ten years, but they do not know if their research is accurate, in fact they are pretty darn sure it is not accurate.

I had an idea. I got together with the research director at Ford's, and I said: "I think, in fact I know, from our previous research work here, that I can get permission from families of newly deceased to allow them to assist other people. We will ask those families if we may put the bodies in automobiles and smash up those automobiles." I was very excited about this. I felt this was probably going to be one of the most important pieces of work we had done—I am sorry we are losing the Attorney General.

And the Ford Motor Company was very excited about this. They were going to set up a special laboratory and bring it to Toronto. They were prepared to invest a very large sum of money, because this would have been of tremendous value.

Well, it has been dropped—gone. The Attorney General's Department basically, does not feel that research is a proper project of the coroner's office. In fact, I have a letter from them saying that they do not think I am legally in the right in doing any of the research.

What was the research? First of all, none of it was done without the permission of the next of kin. When we had a body we would ask for written permission to carry out the research which we felt would be valuable. We never proceeded without such permission. We found that most people were quite happy to give this permission. They were glad to see that the bodies of their loved one could help some living person, and the work led to unbelievably delightful results.

There were new discoveries in the field of diabetes, there was new discoveries in numerous endocrine diseases. We assisted research teams at the Banting institute; at the General hospital; at the Western hospital; at St. Joseph's hospital; at St. Michael's hospital; in areas outside of this city. The research that developed was published and was distributed all over the western world. I ask the Attorney General what research projects are going on at the present time? Why do you continue to have the attitude that, if we do research, it must be only as a side venture—something that must not really be given priority? In fact, the Attorney General thinks there is grave doubt whether the coroner can do research at all. This is a terribly important thing.

Why in the world do we not have the results of the auto death project which was well under way in April of 1967? It should have been completed by now. It should have been published by now. Where is it? It is not, and I charge the Attorney General that he has made a serious error. His attitude is wrong. He is short-sighted. He is showing a complete lack of feeling for what can be produced. This can be of value, not just locally, but everywhere.

Here in Toronto, we had a unique opportunity—perhaps unique in all of North America—for doing this type of work, because we were getting a large number of autopsies in one place. We had the facilities to do the research work, the chemical work, in the numerous hospitals, the Banting institute, in this city. This was work which, because of lack of facilities, lack of bodies, or religious laws in other parts of the world, could not be done. It was producing tremendous results.

I ask the Attorney General if he has some research projects going now—there were some eight going at the time I left. If he has some going now, I would like to know what they are.

I would like to ask him about Dr. Porter and the automobile research project. At what stage is that project? When can we expect Dr. Porter to publish his results? If the project has gone, ask him why and ask him to reflect. Perhaps he has made a mistake, and perhaps he should reconsider, and start that project going again, and the other projects which were of so much value.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to sit down. The Attorney General has said that he is not going to make any comment until I am finished. I am finished at the moment, but I may have some more to say.

Mr. Chairman: I would suggest to the member for High Park that the Attorney General has indicated that he will consider replies when the member has completed his remarks on this particular portion.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that the rules of this House do not say anything of the sort? If the Attorney General wishes to speak, he may. I may then bring on some other matter. If he does not wish to speak, that is his privilege.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Attorney General care to make any comments?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I feel that two hours of the time of the House has been wasted by these wild allegations. I will certainly not take long, because many of the things do not deserve either comment or response. One or two of the points, perhaps, should be dealt with.

I was interested to hear the member for High Park say that if there had been an enquiry into the matter of his grievance that would have been the end of it. Well, we had an enquiry at great length into many similar types of allegations, and that does not seem to have been the end of it at all. However, it was quite apparent that he had no right to a hearing or a grievance hearing, on this discharge.

As to the matter of the evidence before a coroner's inquest, I should like to speak briefly, because that is a matter of importance. I would like to say that I agree with the direction set forth in a letter from the chief coroner to the supervising coroner for Ontario. I think it was clear, proper and correct, and although the hon. member tried to make out that I had a different attitude, I agree with him.

On that point, I note also Mr. McRuer's recommendations, that he sets forth on page 497 of his volume I: "Regulations should provide that persons who, in the opinion of the presiding officer, are substantially and directly interested, could have full right to appear by counsel and to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses with discretion in the presiding officer to limit these rights where it appears they are vexatiously exercised or beyond what is reasonably necessary." That is a very carefully worded recommendation and, as I have pointed out, we are studying the recommendations of Mr. McRuer with a view to implementing them in this field, as in many others.

The waste of money I think is a negligible matter. I could see nothing there to comment upon. The estimates of this department are not large. The increase is $58,000, made up of the annual increase in salaries, which is $45,000, and maintenance, $12,500. Travelling expenses are very considerably reduced from the previous year.

On the question of certificates of the bodies of persons who are cremated and then shipped out of the country. Surely the hon. member can understand that there is need for special precaution in such cases? Part of the area of the Attorney General's office extends into police work and all I need to say is that, in the matter where bodies are cremated, particularly in border areas, and then shipped out of the country, there is another area of concern of which we are well aware. I am not going to say more than that.

His attack on the supervising coroner I thought was disgraceful. To imply that it was wrong because the supervising coroner took it upon himself, in what the hon. member said is an important area of concern—that is, the certificate for persons who are cremated—because the supervising coroner made it his concern to see that these matters come to his personal attention and he signs the certificates. To say that is an indication of cupidity or greed, I thought was a disgraceful thing, particularly, because a civil servant has no right, no opportunity, to stand up in this House and make any defence. I just mention it in passing, to say that I think that is typical of the conduct of the hon. member, which I deplore.

The other point which the hon. member raised I do not propose to comment on. Just one other thing, I have a note that Dr. Porter's project was extended to include the whole province. It was a local project on testing with relation to traffic research and it has been extended to include the whole province. That study is going on.

Mr. Chairman: Office of the supervising coroner, the member for Humber.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Chairman, for a long time I have thought that we ought to do away with the whole system of coroners. It is rather an archaic system which originally arose to determine whether a person had died at the hands of a King, or had died a natural death, or had died accidentally.

I do not know how we evolved to the hodge-podge it is now, but it is certainly becoming of questionable worth and value. Some of the decisions that one gets out of these juries are absolutely ridiculous.

I attended one coroner's jury—I even took the trouble to get a copy of the transcript through the department. In this particular instance a truck driver had been killed. He had parked his truck on a shoulder. The truck, according to the evidence, was parked at least two feet on the shoulder. I sat there listening to the evidence.

One man testified that he looked in his rear-view mirror and he saw a body flying through the air. The driver of the station wagon which had struck this individual said that when he first saw the man who was killed he was walking behind the truck from the right hand side to the left. Now behind the truck would be as he was was approaching him.

The OPP constable who gave evidence said that this was a truck that was carrying a load which had been held down by chain locks. One chain lock was locked, the other was open and the policeman testified that in his opinion, by the markings on the side of the truck, the victim had been standing up on his load, locking the second chain when his truck was side-swiped and he was swept off and hurled about 75 feet.

The jury came back, but I was not there. I did not hear about the recommendation until after I left, but I was amazed to read in the newspaper that the verdict of the jury was that the victim had got out of his truck on the wrong side, when there was not a tittle of evidence to indicate from which side the victim had dismounted his truck, which as I say, was parked safely on the shoulder provided by The Department of Highways, at least two feet in. Then they brought another recommendation about the acceleration strips. Nothing to do with the death at all.

Then there was the verdict that was brought back with reference to the hon. member for York South.

There is the one down at Prudhomme's where the coroner tried to compel a jury to bring in a recommendation that the watchman had lost his life because Prudhomme's had not followed certain rules and regulations. The mere fact that the watchman could have lost his life because he ran into a burning building, perhaps to save something or to rouse the inhabitants, completely destroys that argument. Still, the coroner felt obliged that he must compel the jury to bring back a verdict—a recommendation of some kind.

As I say, they are absolutely asinine some of these recommendations that have been coming out lately. All they they are supposed to determine is if the man died from natural causes or accidental causes, or if the man was murdered. This is the function of the jury and always has been the function of a jury.

The truth of the matter is that the whole system is archaic, as I say. In our courts of law if the evidence which will be adduced is of a technical nature, the judge will dismiss the jury on the grounds that they are incapable of weighing the evidence as put before them, that they are incapable of understanding all the technical terms and technical matters that are brought before them.

Have you ever heard of a coroner dismissing a coroner's jury on the grounds that the evidence which is to be adduced is too technical for them to understand? In most cases, the only one that does understand the evidence being adduced is the coroner himself.

I think perhaps it is time that we went into the system of medical examiners where a judge could sit or a magistrate could sit as the coroner, and then a medical practitioner would have to come before a judge—who does not understand medicine—and he would have to reduce his evidence to language that could be understood by a layman, and then perhaps we could understand what it was all about because we are all laymen.

As it is, the doctor goes in, gives evidence which the jury must weigh and yet, the only person who understands this evidence is the coroner himself. To me this is absolutely ridiculous.

The time, I think, has come where we ought to have a medical examiner whose job would be to carry out an autopsy of everyone who did not die in a hospital in the attendance of a physician who would then sign a death certificate. Too many lives can be taken by several poisons that are too easily available these days.

I received a letter here and one clause appealed to me. It had to do with wire tapping and stuff, this writer says: "There are no Queensbury rules among criminals," which means nowadays they are keeping pretty well ahead of the police, and they can use any kind of insidious means to do away with somebody if they want to dispose of him.

Certain recommendations have come down from these coroners' juries, but is that alone a reason for justifying the existence of the coroners' juries? The only time these juries ever do bring down a recommendation is when somebody has been killed. Surely, we ought to have a system where recommendations are continuously coming down for the betterment of the surroundings in which we live without people having to die.

Why can we not have an ombudsman jury, or a continuously sitting grand jury, whose job or function would be to continuously roam through the community and discover things that are not up to standard, conditions that are dangerous, situations that must be corrected? Why do we have to wait until somebody is killed, or hurt before any action is taken?

There are always recommendations coming down from many sources which are not heeded until somebody is killed. Then they go overboard, way beyond what is necessary, to correct the situation. Mr. Chairman my recommendation to the Attorney General is that the coroner's jury be done away with, and that using doctors as coroners be done away with. I suggest that we use doctors as medical examiners, whose job would be to perform an autopsy on everyone who dies to determine the cause of death. The cause of medical science might profit immensely from being able to perform all these autopsies.

I would also suggest that doctors should have to give their evidence in the enquiry to laymen rather than medical practitioners, so that they would have to speak in terms and language which would be understandable by the layman.

As far as these recommendations are concerned, I think they are for the birds. As I say, we ought to have a system of a continuously sitting grand jury, or omudsmen's jury which would sit 365 days of the year—or be in existence at least—and working most of the that time—going to the community and trying to find out what is wrong and correcting it. That way, I think we would get a lot further.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Attorney General have any comment?

The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, before going on, I would like to suggest in reply to the hon. member for Humber that the circumstances were rather unfortunate ones, because if a coroner does his job properly, it is his duty to ensure that doctors do not lapse into a common error that they tend to make in court, and that is talking in technical terms. One of his duties is to ensure that the pathologist or any other doctors who are giving evidence at inquests give it in simple laymen's terms. If the doctor should use the technical term, it is the coroner's job to stop and say: "Doctor, what does that mean?"

It is irrelevant whether he understand it or not. It is certain that the jury should understand it. Also, at the beginning of the inquest, he should tell the jury that if there is something that they do not understand, a technicality, for goodness sake to speak up and ask what it means. If this is happening and juries are being led blindly by the nose, of course it is wrong.

On the other hand, I think that the Attorney General would agree with me, the jury system along with the coroner, is better than the coroner alone, as it acts as a check on a coroner going "wingey", which can happen.

Also, in relation to juries, I would like to make one further comment. This goes back before the Attorney General's time, so I trust that he will not take it too personally. It is extremely important that the juries be chosen impartially, and by chance. This has not always been the system.

My very first conflict with the office of the Attorney General—and, let me repeat, it was not this Attorney General—involved the subway collapse. At that time, an official of The Attorney General's Department phoned me up when I was about to hold the inquest, and said, "I have the list of the men we want on that jury". It started out with Mr. Faludi, because he was the town planner, "and he knew", and so on, down the list. Each person had a special reason to be on the jury. We had a terrible fight at the time because it was my belief, and still is, that the place for experts is in the witness box and not in the jury.

I hope that throughout the province, the Attorney General will ensure that we do not have "packed", or "blue ribbon" juries. This was not the only occasion. In the Hogg's hollow collapse, there was a "blue ribbon", specially-chosen, jury. Goodness knows why. They brought in a terrible verdict. So as far as the jury goes, they will serve their purpose provided they are properly instructed and properly chosen. I think that it is very important that the Attorney General insure that proper instructions are given them, and ensure that the coroners understand that the technical things must be explained to the jury, and for goodness sake do not "pack" the juries.

Well, now, to go on. I am disturbed that the Attorney General did not see fit to comment on the Englehart situation, where the coroner judged his own work. He felt that this was not one of the items which he wished to comment upon. He also did not answer my questions as to the duties of the consultant employed by the office. He did not make any comment as to whether or not the inquests are going to be held into the death–

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If the hon. member will permit, I answered the Englehart matter fully and I think the hon. member asks questions twice in the House. The other matter that he has just mentioned–I answered as to Dr. Cruickshank's duties–he asked twice about that in the House. I answered it at great length, so I see no reason to comment on it. I would say that I agree with his attitudes on coroners' juries.

Mr. Shulman: Well, I am glad that we have some common ground. Yes, the Attorney General is quite right, I have asked about those matters twice and I have yet to receive an answer which indicates that he appreciates the seriousness of the situation. He still has not interfered with that inquest, and ordered a new inquest. He apparently thinks that it is all right for a coroner to look into his own behaviour, and this to my mind is a very serious and crucial matter, because it is going to come up again, as it has before, in this province. The Attorney General still has not indicated that he is going to insist that it does not occur again. To start with, he should order an inquest into the death of Teddy Trajkewicz. There has not been a proper inquest into that death.

The Attorney General has not indicated whether or not he intends inquests to be held in deaths occurring immediately after discharge, or refusal, from hospitals. He does not indicate whether the ridiculous practice of taking dead bodies to hospitals is to cease. He has not answered my questions as to the research programmes, if any, which are still going on. He did make a comment about Dr. Porter which I found rather intriguing, because I called Dr. Porter at the time that I made my original comments in the House–last April I believe–and I have not phoned him since. But at that time, you may recall that the Attorney General had said, or indicated, that the work was being expanded and Dr. Porter was to carry on. Unfortunately someone had forgotten to tell Dr. Porter.

As of the date that I talked to him, which, as I said, was early in April, he had not received a single iota of the material that the Attorney General referred to from the day which I was discharged. However, I was delighted to hear, that now–and I presume that this must have occurred recently–Dr. Porter's duties had expanded and he is now looking into these cases all over Ontario.

There is only one thing that puzzles me, Mr. Chairman. Dr. Porter's job was to go to the place of the death of the accident immediately after it had happened and examine the automobile, its position, the body and its position, so that, after the post mortem was done, from his personal knowledge of the material facts, he would be able to correlate suggestions which would improve the manufacture of automobiles. I would like to ask the Attorney General how many different localities Dr. Porter has travelled to, to view these particular accidents? I find it rather difficult to see how he traavels to any of them because by the time he got up there, surely the automobile would be scraped up and dragged away. It seems either there is a misunderstanding, or else Dr. Porter's job has been changed somewhat, and instead of which, different coroners across the province are mailing what they are finding in the accidents and he is trying to correlate from that.

This, I may tell the Attorney General, is an absolute and complete waste of time. To begin with, most of these coroners, in fact, all of them outside of Toronto, will not have had the training to know what to look for.

Secondly, you cannot correlate. It is like a research man examining 100 hearts, he knows a certain thing after examining those 100 hearts. If you have 100 different men examining those 100 hearts, and then telling one other, then each man has not learned a darn thing, or very little. So let me suggest to the Attorney General, that I would be very intrigued to find out what Dr. Porter is really doing, and in how many cases has he actually gone out and examined the situation as he was supposed to do? To send him all over the province is sheer nonsense. You have enough of these accidents right here in Toronto to bring forth a proper study, good results, and something the automobile companies can work with.

You have him running all over the province and all you are doing is wasting his time, besides which he is not going to get to the sites in time anyway. Again I would like to ask the Attorney General, if he will deign to comment on this particular matter, what other research projects, if any, the office is doing at the moment?

Now, some other matters. I made some comments earlier about the public service grievance board and my suggestion that, in future, coroners, if fired, be allowed to appeal to this board, and the Attorney General replied, referring to my own case. I once again apparently did not make it clear, or he missed the point, but I was referring to coroners in the future. Is the Attorney General agreeable that, in future, if a coroner is fired, he should have the opportunity of an appeal to the public service grievance board without the Attorney General's office attempting to prevent such an appeal being heard? And just by-the-by, in case the Attorney General missed the point, the Parker Royal commission was not looking into my firing, they were looking into allegations which I had made about the conduct of the office. They did not look into the matter of my firing, I wish they had.

Another matter: The letter which the supervising coroner sent to all the coroners in the province recommended that interested parties be allowed to cross examine.

The McRuer report has suggested this with the obvious proviso that if the questions are irrelevant or vexatious the coroner can cut them off. Yet this has not been done in the cases we have referred to.

In the case I referred to just last week in Toronto, the person's lawyer was not allowed to put the questions at all. Secondly, the questions were certainly not vexatious. Thirdly, they certainly were pertinent. So, at least here in Toronto why are the coroners not following the direction or the advice which the Attorney General has agreed with, and which the supervising coroner had sent out to all the coroners?

One other thing I would like to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, up until April 8, 1967, it was a direction, not a discretion, it was a direction which had never been challenged by The Attorney General's Department or by any lawyer, or by any interested person, that any interested person at an inquest in this metropolitan area, either in person, or through counsel, would be allowed to cross examine. That direction was written on the coroner's desk in large print. It did not last 24 hours after April 7, 1967, immediately, that night, that direction was removed.

May I suggest to the Attorney General if I, as an individual coroner here in Toronto, was able to put such a direction into effect, I am sure the Attorney General will agree there should be such a right, he could do the same throughout Ontario. It is advised by the supervising coroner, it is not carried out, but it is advised like so many things in this government the talk is great, but the activity is somewhat different. Surely, if one individual coroner could carry this out in this big metropolitan area, the supervising coroner and the Attorney General between them should surely be able to carry such a thing out in this province, and they will not have a complaint from a single person in the province. This I assure them.

We had it going in Toronto for two years. There was not a single complaint, there was not a single abuse.

The Attorney General has pointed out that the waste of money which I mentioned is a negligible matter and there is only a $50,000 increase in this item. Apparently he has missed the point which I made. The increase, the waste, does not show in this item, it is not public funds, it is the public's funds.

He said one thing that disturbed me very much. He said in cremations which are being shipped out of the country—and I am afraid perhaps he misunderstood me — so through you, sir, I was referring to (a) cremations—all cremations; (b) to bodies, not urns, being shipped out of the province, they are two separate matters. With reference to cremation, he said for cremations being shipped out of the province, special care is needed. Of course special care is needed, but I should hope that in every case which a coroner goes to investigate that special care is needed, and that the coroner will give special care to those matters. If he is not giving special care to his investigations there is something very peculiar going on.

Again I point out to the Attorney General that in those cases where a coroner has already investigated — I should hope with reasonable care—there is no need two days later to send a second coroner, or the same coroner to repeat the investigation because in actual fact they do not repeat the investigation. They go out and find that a coroner has already made the investigation. They say, "Fine, I will sign the certificate, ten dollars please."

So it is just waste and duplication. There is no extra work done. There is nothing new done. There should not be anything new done because it has already been done, and if it has not been done there is something extremely odd.

Finally, and I am through, I am sure you will all be delighted to hear, I just wish to stress once again, because I think it is far more important than any of the other matters which are brought up, and it has received no attention from the public or the press or in this Legislature, it is the matter of the research.

You have an unparalleled opportunity in your hands to do work here in Toronto which cannot be done anywhere else in the world for a variety of reasons, and you are not doing it. We did it for four years and we had great things to show as a result of it. I beg you, I request you, humbly, you are a sensible, reasonable man, reconsider this matter, bring this back and if you bring this back I promise I will not bring any of these matters up again.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I think there is one item I should mention in reply to the remarks. In the Porter research project I should inform him that while that was enlarged, I did not say it was being done by Dr. Porter entirely. It is being carried on now by TIRF which is the traffic injury research foundation, and all the reports from across Ontario are being reviewed by that organization in conjunction with The Department of Transport. It is enlarged in that sense.

Mr. Shulman: That is a different matter entirely.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not a different matter. It is an enlarged enquiry using the same studies.

Mr. Shulman: May I explain? Obviously there has been a misunderstanding, a big misunderstanding. The work Dr. Porter was doing was a job that only one man could do. It was a matter of going to the site of an auto crash and finding what part of the automobile had done what to what organ. A doctor has to do that, preferably a coroner or a pathologist. Nobody else can do that.

To suggest that this is being done is untrue—obviously this is a different matter, because if a number of doctors are doing it it is not going to show the same results.

Every man who has done research in this type of work will agree, and I am sure if you will ask your assistants beside you they will agree. It has to be done by one specialist, one technician, who will see all the automobiles for purposes of comparison.

May I again suggest, of course the TIRF investigation is a good investigation, a practical investigation. It may lead to good results. But it is a different matter. And may I suggest that if, for whatever reason, you do not wish Dr. Porter to do this, assign some other coroner to do it? But get it going again, because it is a very important piece of work and it is not going to cost anything. The automobile companies are willing to finance it, in fact they sent us money to finance it, which I sent back because it was not possible for us to go ahead. But on that note, the note of research, let me again stress this to the Attorney General.

Mr. Chairman: The office of supervising coroner and general inspector of anatomy; agreed to.

Vote 208 agreed to.

On vote 209:

Mr. Chairman: Board of negotiations—the member for Downsview.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, on vote 209, I think this is the vote where we can discuss matters dealing with expropriation. I do not plan to make any lengthy remarks in this regard, except to express my substantial disappointment that we have not had placed before us a new Expropriation Act governing both principles and the procedures.

I have spoken about this many times in the past and I think the Attorney General is aware of my thinking and the thinking of my colleagues on this matter. We believe that there has to be a more realistic guide written into the statute as to how to determine value. The report of the law reforms committee has made certain recommendations, but we have not as yet heard the government's view in this regard, and I think it is most important that this very serious problem be solved.

It is all very well for the law reform committee to come in with a report and spend a lot of time on it. The report has some merit. I have some criticism about it, but there is no point criticizing in the air over a report that has been produced. We want to hear what the government has decided and what kind of expropriation laws we are going to have in the province of Ontario.

This whole question of expropriation becomes a more and more frequent and bothersome problem to most of the members in this House and to thousands and thousands of the citizens of the province of Ontario.

Certainly urban members get constant complaints from their constituents about what are alleged to be, and in many cases are, substantial inequities in providing for compensation for expropriation.

The problem, of course, is arming the bodies that are going to decide the cash awards with the proper set of ground rules, and making those ground rules as fair as they can possibly be. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, as my colleague, the member for Sarnia said the other day, we have to arm the person whose land has been taken with adequate means to protect himself. He has to be given competent evaluators, access to competent evaluators and the ability to pay for those competent evaluators, and he has to be given access to competent legal advice and the ability to pay for that competent legal advice.

There has to be a methood whereby the whole process is speeded up, notwithstanding the fairly recent amendments to The Expropriation Procedures Act. These matters drag and drag and the finality in them is a long, long time in coming.

But the whole process of expropriation, the number of bodies that can do it, the ability to make arbitrary decisions with no avenue of appeal, is a most bothersome thing.

In this complicated age where we have highways people who must build more highways and educators who must build more schools, and on and on through all these bodies that have these powers, people just are unable to understand why their house would be taken and there must be an avenue for them to inquire with full rights before some impartial body that is going to tell them.

We made a nibble at some kind of an advance when we dealt in a certain way with hospitals and conservation authorities, universities, and I think there was one more —three. I criticized that approach at that time because I do not think that a judge of the county court or district judge is the proper person to make the decision.

I would have much preferred to have seen the English system whereby the final responsibility lies with the Minister who is answerable in his Legislature. I do not think that a judge is going to be able to understand the kind of implications involved in these things—and I do not think he should be asked to—but I think there must me an ample opportunity to have a public hearing.

In England they send down referees—I think it is the Home Secretary who is charged with that responsibility—and the referee gives notice to all the people who are affected, there is a public hearing, a full report is made to the Minister and he in due course makes his decision.

But it is important, Mr. Chairman, that one person should be responsible for all of these decisions. I would think that if the Minister of Health decided that for his particular purposes he needs some more land he should make a recommendation to perhaps the Attorney General or whichever other Minister is designated by the government as Minister responsible, and then the whole review procedure gets underway. I do not think there should be a variety of people who have the right to make the final decision.

How many expropriating bodies are there? I counted 6,000 at one time. My figure has been questioned, but there are far, far too many elected bodies, appointed bodies, private corporations, charitable corporations and so on, who have the power to take away people's land without any real opportunity for the people concerned to have the matter reviewed first as to the wisdom, and, second, to get reasonable satisfaction insofar as the amount of the compensation is concerned.

We have talked on many occasions about the house for a house theory, and no one in government as yet has seemed to accept this as a reasonable proposition. But in this day when we have such a fantastic housing shortage, it makes no sense to me at all that if you take away a man's home and you bring in the evaluators and they say, "Well it isn't much of a home, it is only worth $7,000 or $10,0000, here is your money, off you go," the person whose house has been taken away is unable to re-establish himself with the money he has obtained as a result of the expropriation.

He did not ask to have his home taken. It is an act forced upon him by some form of government. He was quite happy to stay where he was, he had a roof over his head, he was able to support himself and look after himself.

But the unfair thing that happens in so many cases is that a government body or a body in Ontario with power to expropriate, can and often does take away a person's home and gives him a number of dollars which are not sufficient to allow him to re-establish himself in equivalent accommodation.

No one can challenge the prime right of the public authority to take private land for public necessity, but that right is an unusual one and must be exercised with the utmost care and caution.

And when a person's home is taken away from him, surely there is enough intelligence in government to discover a way whereby he is going to be given another place to live in approximately the same circumstances as he was living in before government came along and interfered wtih his rights to enjoy his form of living.

Very briefly, sir, that summarizes the arguments we have put forward. I have no desire to prolong these estimates unduly but this whole problem of the process of expropriation is a most serious one and I am very disappointed because even though we have discussed this over a long period of time as we get into the last days of this session we still have no pronouncement from government as to what their view is insofar as fair expropriation procedures are concerned.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate it if the Attorney General would put on the record the statistical information about the board of negotiation very much in the way that he did last year.

Secondly, I would ask the Attorney General if he would consider following the same procedure that the government has followed in the case of The Business Corporations Act and The Personal Property Security Act, and bring in for first reading at this session the proposed legislation on expropriation.

I understand that for practical purposes it is completed. I do not know whether there are two bills, one covering the procedural recommendations of the McRuer commission and one covering the basis of compensation as a result of the law reform commission report, or whether only one piece of legislation has been prepared and that is on the basis of compensation.

My understanding is that the intention of the government to introduce it at this session has been changed and it is now intended to introduce it in the fall, if there is a fall session. If the legislation is prepared—and I understand it is—I would ask the Attorney General if he would introduce it at this session so that it would be available for public comment and discussion before the fall session or at the time at which it is going to be fully debated.

This would, in some way, eliminate that problem we run into in important public bills and that is, that once second reading has been held in the assembly and it is referred to a committee the principle is established and little, if anything, can be done by public debate and discussion about the essence of the bill.

The intervening two or three months with the thought and the concern that people have expressed about expropriation would give the public an opportunity to consider the bill and for the Attorney General to have the reaction of the public to the appropriateness of the legislation.

I need not comment about the urgency of the matter. We are in a state of limbo so far as urban renewal is concerned, and while urban renewal has many aspects, one of the principal stumbling blocks to any initiative to begin again in the city of Toronto in the field of urban renewal will depend upon this legislation.

I would ask the Attorney General to answer those two specific comments.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am glad to answer the comments. I would like to say since the hon. member for Downsview spoke first I found myself in agreement with almost everything he said. I am just as disappointed as he is that we have not got this legislation before the House at this time and perhaps I can deal with that matter now.

We have talked about this on some occasions in the House. I think I reported to the House the other day that we were going forward with this legislation. The members know it is in the Speech from the Throne, it is a promised piece of legislation and therefore, it will definitely be presented. I had hoped that we might have it in this session but I cannot say that we will. It may be possible.

Mr. Singer: Will it be a composite Act?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It will be one Act. That is the way we have it designed and we had started on the amendment to the Expropriation Procedures Act, bringing in the basis of compensation as in the report of the law reform commission, when we received the other recommenadtions—those of Mr. McRuer—which were wider, broader, deeper, and we attempted then to shape a completely new Act into the amended Expropriation Procedures Act and that has been our approach.

That Act has been prepared for some weeks but you have read, I am sure, the law reform commission's report. The recommendations are so varied there—and they differ, to some extent at least, with the recommendations made by Mr. McRuer—that we have had great difficulty in consolidating them into legislation which we think we can justify as reasonable, feasible, practicable and equitable.

That is what we are doing and I can tell the House I have a committee of Cabinet working with me of such departments as Agriculture and Food, Highways, Public Works but all departments have been asked to give us their commentary on it.

It is taking time to frame that legislation. I can bring in a bill which is, in a sense, ready. But it is not ready to my satisfaction, and to bring it in as the hon. member for Riverdale says, in a state which does not satisfy, and to say, "Here is the government's proposal", knowing that I am going to have to amend it in committee or in the House—I do not like that procedure.

Therefore the reason it is possible that it may not appear in this session—but certainly in this year—is that I want it to be perfect and to represent as nearly as possible what I think is carefully considered government policy to meet the recommendations.

We are working steadily on it and hope to have it before the House before very long. I cannot promise this session but rest assured that we are getting on it with and as I say, it was in the Speech from the Throne. It is one of our main objectives.

On the committee of negotiation, which is this estimate, I have considerable statistics here. They examined during the years 1965 to 1967, or at least had before the committee, 751 applications. The committee was successful in settling 66 per cent of those; 13 per cent are presently pending and the committee was unsuccessful in 21 per cent.

They came from expropriating authorities such as Department of Highways, city of Toronto, Metro Toronto, Union Gas, Metro separate school board, Hydro, city of Hamilton, county of Frontenac, city of Sault Ste. Marie, many other communities ranging right across the province, public school boards, separate school boards, universities – University of Guelph, I note – conservation authorities in several places and so on. There are serving on the board—they are spread across the province—12 persons whose names I have here, if you would be interested.

Mr. Singer: Yes could you read those—put them on the record?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. Mr. E. Armstrong, Mr. J. M. Bennett, William Dymond, who is the secretary, J. A. Ferguson member of the board, M. J. Gaiser, F. Heaman, William Lang who is the chairman, J. McConaghy, M. McKay, W. Mowat, L. Schedlin, and E. E. Webster.

If you are interested—the chairman is paid a per diem allowance of $75 for his services, the secretary $60 per day for not less than 16 days per month and members receive $50 per day when they are sitting as members of the board.

The board is doing a good job and has been of great assistance in settling the matters. They point out that 53 per cent of all requests received are by the owners or their authorized representatives; 47 per cent were received from the expropriating authorities. Approximately 40 per cent of the owners are represented by solicitors. But the individuals, of course, may appear on their own behalf to present their claim.

This has been a most successful committee. Its work has proved so.

Vote 209 agreed to.

On vote 210:

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, this is the vote that deals with the Ontario police commission and we agreed earlier that this is the vote under which we should discuss the whole question of wire tapping.

In view of the events that have transpired in this province in the last few weeks the whole question of wire tapping has come before us and before the public and, I do not think there is a topic that has more disturbed the people of Ontario than the lack of control that we have over wire tapping.

I put before the House a few days ago the suggestion that wire tapping was illegal and I made reference to the statutory provisions contained in section 25 of The Bell Telephone Act of Canada, in sections 110 and 112 of The Ontario Telephone Act and in section 372, I think it is, subsection 1 of the Canadian criminal code.

I do not know that we have had a definitive statement from the Attorney General on this point but I gather from his remarks that he does not share my view that wire tapping is necessarily an offence under any of these three statutory provisions.

However, Mr. Chairman, I was tempted to do a bit of research in order to try and ascertain whether or not anyone has ever been charged with an offence under any of these three statutes. So far as I have been able to ascertain there are no reported cases in connection with charges under any of these statutes. The Attorney General nods his head and I will now say that I have had my research confirmed by an official of The Attorney General's Department. He too, had not been able to find any reported cases.

I think the time has come when the Attorney General should find out whether or not it is an offence under any of these statutes to listen in to other people's telephone conversations. The only way he is going to find out is to begin to lay charges and I would think that there are ample occasions on which the Attorney General would have before him—or could get—evidence that wire tapping is taking place.

He should very quickly place the matter before the courts and let the courts decide whether or not any of these three statutes are in fact sufficient to limit the whole aspect of wire tapping. There can be nothing more insidious, in this day and age, than the unusual invasion of privacy that takes place by reason of wire tapping, the use of electronic listening devices.

Scientifically we have made fantastic advances in this particular field, and I understand that certain of the new electronic equipment that is available can listen in to conservations taking place in a room perhaps a quarter or half a mile away, and that this can go on without any knowledge of the persons involved, completely without any knowledge.

What happens when this kind of enquiry, this kind of investigation, this kind of snooping goes on? Who knows what is going to happen?

Do we listen in, for instance, to a man in conversation with his wife on the telephone or in the privacy of their home and, as husbands and wives occasionally do, they have an argument and they are exchanging nasty words with each other? Are these words transcribed by some official somewhere in a file and dragged out at a later time by goodness knows who, who might have had access to that file or might have transcribed it?

And suddenly someone who is in the public eye has to begin to explain why he and his wife had an argument and called each other names once years before; is this the sort of thing that we can lightly countenance? But this is a logical result that can flow from unauthorized and completely unsupervised and unbridled use of these new techniques.

One would have thought that the Attorney General of the province of Ontario would have been in the forefront of wanting to curb this. The whole question focuses in very important connotation as the result of the investigation ordered into the conduct of two magistrates.

The judge, Mr. Justice Grant, is going to decide in due course whether or not the evidence gathered by use of these methods is going to be admissible. I would think that the judge is going to stay far, far away from the basis upon which, or the methods by which, this evidence was gathered. I do not think the judge is going to put himself into the middle of this kind of a discussion, because that was not really within the terms of his reference. The judge is not going to gratuitously give us any opinions, not having been asked for them, as to how, or if, or when, wire tapping could and should be supervised. So I think it is up to us to determine these things.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, even with the police—and let us start with the police—even with the police there must be established, at the first instance, a chain of command whereby the use of these devices is strictly controlled. I do not think it is a sensible argument to suggest that under no circumstances should the law enforcement authority, should police officers, be prohibited absolutely from using these devices. But I do think, Mr. Chairman, it is of the utmost importance that, when resort is going to be made to these devices by law enforcement authorities, that there is a method of control.

I do not know how much of what we read in the paper is correct. I do not know in this particular case, the one involving the two magistrates, whether or not the people who did the wire tapping—we do not even know who they were—if they got anybody's permission at all. Presumably somewhere along the line there might have been a chain of command.

Here on the front page of one of our Toronto newspapers today, and again last night, are references to and the pictures of two of the members of the Metropolitan police commission, and some of them say,

"We did not know it was going on at all. We were surprised. We did not know until we picked up the paper."

Whether Chief Mackey knew it was going on or not, I do not know. Does anyone have to get his authorization? Does the inspector have to give authorization; does the sergeant do it? Or does the individual policeman suddenly say, "This is going to be a good day to go out and wire tap, and I am just going to go out and see what I can find?" Surely, Mr. Chairman, this has to be brought under control.

As I say, it must be recognized that there might well be occasions when the law enforcement authorities have to resort to this kind of tactic, but I think it has to be tightly controlled. We have the weapons here in this Legislature to immediately control certainly police activities, there can be no question about that. I would think that we can direct immediately that there be no wire tapping by any policeman unless and until there is authority and approval given, say, by a Supreme Court judge. And I would think that that approval should not be lightly given by a Supreme Court judge.

It would seem reasonable to me that when such a request is made, it should be made on the highest authority of an individual police force. It should be made to a Supreme Court judge, and it should be made to a Supreme Court judge in order to satisfy him as to two things: No. 1, that the case which the police are investigating is one of unusual importance and seriousness, and, No. 2, that the police are unable, in the ordinary course of events, to gather evidence any other way than by the use of these devices.

If those two things can be established to the satisfaction of a Supreme Court judge, then the Supreme Court judge shall issue his warrant or shall issue his approval and in terms that are strictly confined, and for limited periods of time. The warrant could well read that: "I hereby authorize constables A, B and C to use electronic devices" —and particularly describe them—"in the investigation of a certain case, for a period of time, whether a week or 10 days." Based on that, these procedures should be allowed to continue.

But I think it is most important, Mr. Chairman, that these controls must be brought into being at the earliest possible moment. Short of this kind of control, then I say, sir, that we are facing the most serious danger of the invasion of privacy—we are facing the most frightening aspects of a police state.

George Orwell's "1984" was directed to this kind of world, and we have it here in Ontario, Mr. Chairman. If we are going to sit back without taking any action, saying that there is nothing presently in our laws that can stop it, then I say we are inviting all that George Orwell predicted in his book.

I would say that we must go much further, Mr. Chairman, because, in addition to the police use of these devices, there are other uses being made by a variety of people, people in business competition one with the other, who invade the privacy of their competitors' business to find out trade secrets. Snoopers, people who are idly curious, do this on occasion. Private investigators, for the purpose of gathering evidence for matrimonial actions, and that sort of thing.

It would seem to me, sir, that our laws have to be written so that, other than on most important and properly authorized occasions, no one can wire tap or use these devices. In the event that they do, then they have committed a serious offence and should be answerable for the same before the courts. The penalties written in relation to these offences should be heavy enough so that the people who engage in these unauthorized practices will know that, if they are brought before the courts, they will be seriously punished.

In addition to that, sir, I would say that we must amend our Evidence Act, and come somewhat to the approach the Supreme Court of the United States takes. We should say in our Acts that evidence improperly gathered, or illegally gathered, is not admissible. Certainly evidence gathered by illegal means of wire tapping, or listening, or electronic devices should not be admissible to the courts unless there has been proper—well, then it would not be illegal, if there had been proper authorization beforehand, then it should be admissible.

I know the Attorney General is going to tell me that the substantial responsibility for this matter lies in Ottawa. To a certain extent, I would subscribe to that theory. But I would say, sir, that here in this province, in Ontario, we have our own responsibility. Until or unless Ottawa moves—and I would hope that the things that I am saying would impress themselves upon the minds of the new government in Ottawa, and in the mind of the Minister of Justice there, and that at the first opportunity we would see appropriate amendments to the criminal code.

When the federal House of Commons is going to meet and when they are going to take that action, I cannot say, and certainly we have no control over that. But in the meantime, Mr. Chairman, we here in Ontario are in session, and the Attorney General has a formidable stock of ammunition that he can use, if he wants. He has all the power of government behind him to today bring under control the frightening, the horrendously frightening, series of events that I have been trying to describe.

I would say, sir, no longer is it good enough for the Attorney General of this province to throw up his hands and say there is nothing I can do. There are many things he can do. Certainly he can quickly bring under his control almost immediately, the police use of wire tapping. Certainly he can bring before the courts a trial case, a series of charges under The Telephone Act of Canada, The Bell Telephone Act, The Ontario Telephone Act, and the provisions of the criminal code that I referred to.

If the province of Ontario speaks in a loud voice as to its feeling about the use of wire tapping, this is going to have a very substantial effect, both on the people who might be contemplating its use and on the Legislatures in other places.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I missed the section of the code the hon. member referred to which he—

Mr. Singer: It was section 372 (1) I think. I referred it to earlier, but 372 (1) is the one I recall. I will check that for him and give it to him later if that is not correct.

I would therefore say, sir, that we have to move, and we have to move immediately.

Finally, one other thing. When, in a matter in which this Legislature is concerned, there have been certain admissions made as to the use of wire tapping.

I would think that the legislators of this province, and the people of the province are entitled to know how it came about. I do not think we have any right to enquire at this point as to what evidence was gathered, but I think it is most important that we get from the Attorney General today the full story of how much wire tapping took place in these investigations. Who authorized it? How many officials—police officers—were used? How many occasions they listened? And whose telephones did they listen to?

I happened to be at a social gathering the other evening, and I was sitting at the table with one of the magistrates who acts here in Metropolitan Toronto, and he just threw up his hands and said, "I do not know." He said, "I hear what I think are strange clicks on my telephone from time to time. Maybe somebody is listening to me or not."

It was a pleasant party and we began to kid backwards and forwards, and I said, "Do you ever have a fight with the wife over the phone," and he said, "Oh yes we do."

"And do you ever call each other names?"

"Oh yes we do," and he said he "would be shocked if the transcript of one of these husband and wife arguments suddenly found its way into a police file."

There is no suggestion that he is not a good magistrate and no one has criticized him to my knowledge. But there is the doubt, the very substantial doubt, in his mind that as a result of what was going on in relation to these two investigations that people might well have been listening to his conversations, and making recordings of them and reports being written and placed in files.

I would say that the Attorney General has a duty and a responsibility to tell the people of Ontario, particularly in relation to these matters which are under investigation by Mr. Justice Grant, whose telephones were listened to? Who authorized it? And the occasions on which it was done.

I think that, at the moment, covers my very strong convictions in relation to this most serious matter.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I agree with everything the member for Downsview has said. I wish to draw to the attention of the House, that I have a motion before the House on this subject at the present time, a resolution before the House that in the opinion of this House it should be a criminal offence to tap or listen in on any private telephone, except with an authorization signed by a judge of the Supreme Court.

It was reported in the press earlier this week that this view is shared by the government of Ontario—if this press report is correct—and that certain representations had been made by the provincial government to the federal government on this matter.

Now, if this report is correct, and the provincial government and the Attorney General do share this view, I ask them to bring my resolution forth for debate so that this House can unanimously support it. I would then suggest that with the support of all three parties, the federal government would move very quickly to bring in suitable legislation, particularly if we are able to inform them that the House has unanimously supported it.

Mr. Kerr: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the hon. member for High Park a question on that point? Would this application—I assume it would be an application to the Supreme Court judge—would it be an ex parte application, and if so would the hearing be in camera?

Mr. Shulman: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman, I will try to keep my remarks as succinct as possible. The President of the United States made this statement in an inaugural address to Congress in the year 1967. It received the largest Congressional applause of any other topic in the speech.

> We should protect what Justice Brandeis calls, "the right most valued by civilized ment"—the right of privacy. We should outlaw all wire tapping, public and private, wherever and whenever it occurs, except when the security of the nation is at stake, and only then with the strictest safeguards. We should exercise the full reach of our constitutional powers to outlaw electronic "bugging" and "snooping."

He submitted at that time a crime control bill containing the power here mentioned, and I wish to mention it, because one of the things I am going to recommend is a negative concept, the prevention of such use in the future.

They had a provision forbidding the manufacture, distribution or advertisement in interstate commerce of wire tapping and eavesdropping.

May we put it this way, that in this province I think we live in a relatively Elysian field of innocence, and that perhaps it has not deeply penetrated our society as yet. If we review the position set out by Alan Westin in his rather magnificent tome called "Privacy and Freedom" there is case after case and page after page outlining various incursions into pirvacy as exercised and not only by private detectives but sometimes for the personal delectation of the individual to snoop on his neighbour both with listening and with camera devices and so forth.

The range of the devices have now become very widespread. They are shown in Esquire magazine. The member for Sandwich-Riverside introduced earlier on March 11 in this session the case of an advertisement for a Swiss device being sold in Ontario for $148 about which very little has been said.

Subsequent to that date, there were spike microphones, shotgun microphones, brief case recorders, there is a cocktail or bug martini, there are two-way mirrors. The range is simply enormous, and I would think that under the powers of 92 (13) a good many of these devices can be controlled constitutionally in this province. In any event anything having to do with Bell Telephone communications and facilities they certainly can.

The fact of the matter is that no private individual, no one for that matter including a government agency, knows whether its telephones are being tapped or not.

There is, a case in Las Vegas of eight telephone lines taken out by the IRS in the United States into a hotel there, yet nowhere along the line is it possible to receive it back from the telephone company to detect. It is done by induction coil process back at the offices of the telephone company itself, which keeps these things strictly under control.

The second thing I want to mention is, apparently, that people who run the country or run this province, and particularly in the United States, are forever claiming—that is the President, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, the head of the Treasury, all the top boys—they do not seem to know what is going on. They all throw up their hands in front of congressional committees and say: Well, it is not done with our authorization, as a matter of fact quite the contrary.

There is, in the code of the revenue service, a specific admonition against doing it, and a penalty to be acquired in so doing it. Nevertheless it is done as has been proved before the Long committee in the United States Congress. It is done on a vast scale and with far-reaching implications.

As far as things go here, we do not know just what the scale of this eavesdropping is. Looking at the paper just yesterday and as the member for Downsview said, the situation is that our law enforcement officers and people in charge disclaim knowledge of how the police are conducting the affairs of this province.

The one other point that I wish to drive home is the reneging on his degree of responsibility by the Attorney General, Mr. Chairman, vis-à-vis the police forces of this province. It is, as McRuer pointed out, his responsibility. He is the chief law enforcement officer of this province. It falls squarely on his shoulders to know, to direct, and in all ways to enter into the ways in which the private communications of citizens are being impinged upon, or intervened on, or interfered with, and to shuffle this off, this most vital area, as though there was some screen between him and the operations of the police department, is an abdication of responsibility.

This must cease. It is the most gross, ongoing incursion into our lives that is taking place through the devices of science. It is something that is new to us, which we nevertheless must face up to. I think we should face up to it—though it has not, I would think, come into our lives very deeply as yet—in a preventive way. We ought to forfend against it.

We ought to be able to live on the experience derived from the United States, and on what Westin has told us in his admirable investigations—and he did a very thoroughgoing job—in order to offset, in advance of the case, the possibilities of using these devices as has been indicated under two headings:

1. I think the Attorney General probably agrees with this, it is simply a question of getting legislation ahead, that no eavesdropping device be used without, as you said, the permission, I would think, of a superior court judge—no lesser authority. That is number one.

2. To be taken under advisement forthwith—the banning of devices of this kind of public sale in the province. The only purpose behind these things is an undue and a most surreptitious invasion of our most intimate rights. Let us seize the bull by the horns right at this stage and give leadership.

As I said the other day in my opening remarks, the position of the Americans—the Supreme Court decisions are fine. The problem is carrying out the lower state decisions in the federal courts. The whole thing has been traduced internally, and they are having great difficulty trying to bring these surveillance devices under surveillance.

With that in mind, and to shorten further conversation—I shall have more to say at a later occasion—I would ask the Attorney General to take both of those suggestions under consideration.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 210. The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I notice there are only three or four more minutes and the comments I wanted to make on the question of the invasion of privacy will probably take somewhat longer.

I do not want to enter in on this discussion in the sense that it is a simple problem. I think it is a very complex and difficult problem. I share most of the sentiments expressed by my colleague from Lakeshore and some of the sentiments expressed by the member for Downsview. Again, I do issue a word of caution that I do not think that the United States has, in fact, solved the problem, either by the Supreme Court decision in the United States, or by any clear governmental directives, as to the way in which these devices will be used.

I think within that context I would like to—

Mr. Singer: You are not suggesting that I said they had?

Mr. J. Renwick: No. The member for Lakeshore referred more specifically to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and indicated that, perhaps, that guidance was adequate. I am not specifically familiar with the various cases which came before the Supreme Court of the United States, but my understanding from the commentary that I have read would indicate there are still many unresolved questions involved in the problem.

Therefore, all I want to do is to place before the assembly—and I would prefer, Mr. Chairman, to do it in a connected way on Monday, rather than at one minute to one—certain distinctions which are involved in this field of wire tapping, in an endeavour to be of assistance in a coherent way. I would appreciate it if, in those circumstances, I could continue on Monday.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Attorney General want to make any reply?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think, Mr. Chairman, since it is so close to one o'clock—this is quite a subject to discuss—I will reserve my remarks and would not commence them now.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed, Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker the committee of supply begs to report that it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Clerk of the House: The 9th order, resuming the adjourned debate on the amendment to the motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair and that the House resolve itself into the committee on ways and means.

BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. T. Reid (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the debate a week ago I was discussing the Conservative government's lack of response to the health services shortage between 1948 and 1962.

I would begin my remarks today by stating simply that all but one provincial government in Canada invested more of its allotment from the federal government in health programmes, such as professional training, hospital construction grants, survey of health facilities, to mention only a few, than did Ontario. Ontario used, Mr. Speaker, only two-thirds of the available funds from the federal government between 1948 and 1962. This is in distinct contrast to Saskatchewan, for example, which invested 81 per cent of its allotment.

Mr. Speaker, if the Conservative government of Ontario wanted to avoid a serious bottleneck in the supply of health manpower and health services in the 1960s, they could have done so by intelligent foresight and action in the 1950s. For example, if the Conservative government of Ontario had invested its full allotment of $193 million on providing more health manpower and more health services between 1948 and 1962, the present Conservative Treasurer would not have had to press the expensive and wasteful panic button this year.

The example of the failure of the Conservative government to make full use of its allotment of federal government health funds in the 1950s is meant to be just that. It is an example. It represents the attitude of the Conservative government.

As an example, this failure of the Conservative government to make full use of its allotment of federal government health funds in the 1950s is an indictment on the ability of the Conservatives to govern and manage the public affairs of the men and women of this province. Here are the facts, again, to elaborate on this example.

The federal government made available to the Conservative government of Ontario a total of $193 million to ensure a greater flow of health manpower and health services between 1948 and 1962. The Conservative government left $64 million lying unused in the coffers of the federal government. This money was not translated into Ontario health facilities, or into health manpower, or health services. Sixty-four million dollars was just left idle.

This failure to invest $64 million of federal health funds into the supply of health services in Ontario meant that an additional $64 million was not invested by the province as well as part of its matching investment. The gap was $128 million—a gap between what was needed and possible and what was actually done.

What is $128 million? Well, it is more than four times the $29 million increase in the net general expenditures of the entire Department of Health between 1967-68 and 1968-69; $128 million is equal to the estimated rise in the cost of operating OMSIP next year.

And this government has the sheer gall to state in public, in the Legislature of Ontario, that the reason it does not bring the people of Ontario under the coverage of medicare now is that "increasing the supply of health personnel—must have precedence over a universal health insurance scheme."

It is the lack of planning that is so appalling in the present government's approach. It invariably takes the short view, the easy way, the lazy man's way. Social issues are swept under the public rug—and that underlay is getting deeper all the time.

Have you not noticed that every few weeks or months a social service or public health emergency arises in Ontario? Each time there is usually a flurry of statements from the government of Queen's Park, some of them contradicting others, and then an "investigation" is ordered and there are further pious statements, even from the Premier of the province, if the situation seems to spell political trouble.

But the lack of foresight that laid the groundwork for each of these emergencies is rarely heard about—and the idea of preventing them by planning remains a strange and foreign idea to this government.

This government at Queen's Park—despite its old-fashioned apparatus and outlook, unhappily lacks the old-fashioned virtue of thrift. It is a Conservative government that does not conserve; a progressive government that progresses at a snail's pace.

I would like to turn to another area which I consider very important. I will just deal with this briefly. It is about the comic strips in the newspapers promoting violence. I would like to give a specific example. In the prominent, eyecatching position of the upper right page of the so-called "comic page" in the Toronto Telegram, the readers find the strip "Odette, British Agent", and here is the script for Thursday, June 27, 1968:

> We burned her spine, yanked out her toenails and still she refuses to talk. Shall I proceed with other tortures?
> No, take her to her cell for now. It has been a pleasure, we will meet again soon. I am afraid that you are going to the Gestapo again tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, this is but one example of the so-called comic strips in many Ontario newspapers which promote violence in a society which has had enough violence. In my opinion, if the newspaper editors do not exercise a better sense of social responsibility to do their bit to stem the propagation of violence in their funny strips, this government has a direct responsibility to do so.

I would be prepared to argue that violence in comics is a special case. The least I would ask of Ontario's newspapers—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. T. Reid: The least I would ask of Ontario's newspaper editors is that they be consistent. Some editors write in a derogatory way about our young people, particularly those who protest in the visible way. No wonder some of these young people opt out of our society—the kind of violent society so-called funny strips in our newspapers seem too often to condone. Mr. Speaker, the next time that a person is found in the city with a burnt spine or yanked toenails I will say that the editors of the Telegram are directly responsible as well as the present Conservative government.

Mr. Speaker, leaving that question for the hon. members to ruminate over the weekend, I would like to turn to another subject. I would like to talk about what I consider to be an infringement of teenagers' rights and the failure of the Conservative government to move in this area.

I would like to start my remarks by referring to the Ontario human rights code. This code, which is a statute of the Legislature states that one of its two aims, and I quote, "is to make secure in law, the inalienable rights of every citizen".

The Premier likes that statement very much and quotes it quite often. The recent statements of his Attorney General and Minister of Education concerning school records of our young people of Ontario and the use of the records must make the Prime Minister realize how empty his fine words are of any real meaning.

The Ontario human rights code also states, "Recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of human family is the foundation of human freedom, justice and peace."

The Attorney General and the Minister of Education of this province, through lack of leadership and policies and indeed, I suspect, lack of knowledge of what is meant by inherent dignity and equal and inalienable rights to all individuals, have not only allowed a fundamental right of individual teenagers to be transgressed, but have refused to take decisive action to prevent their rights from being transgressed in the future.

I maintain that the spirit of the code of human rights in Ontario has been transgressed in the matter of school records, if not in the letter of the code. I state this in an absolute sense as well as in the relative sense that the pupils of our schools have been discriminated against on the basis of age and station.

They are captive in a school system. Their actions and behaviour are observed and recorded. Unlike their elders they are compelled by law to be captive. They cannot protect themselves from such systematic scrutiny.

That lack of action and statements by the Attorney General and the Minister of Education concerning school records in the last few weeks, is to be condemned. Philosophically, and as a Liberal, I condemn them absolutely for putting a system over the rights of the individual.

I urge the Prime Minister of this province to acknowledge that Ontario should lead the way in the national acceptance of a Canadian charter of human rights as a part of a revised Canadian constitution, so that individuals such as our young people in school can have their inalienable rights—including the right to privacy and liberty—protected under our constitution, as opposed to being dependent on the whim of any particular government controlled at any particular time by a particular political party.

A constitutionally entrenched bill of rights would guarantee the fundamental freedom of the individual from government interference, federal or provincial. Individual rights ought not be submitted to vote; they ought not depend on the outcome of elections.

In the proposal for a Canadian charter of human rights prepared by the then Justice Minister, Pierre Elliot Trudeau, the following statement is included. It is a direct quotation, Mr. Speaker:

> Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. The exercise of this freedom, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to conditions and restrictions as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, or for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence.

In the specific context of individual rights and pupils' records what I have said can be put this way. Teachers, school officials, Department of Education officials have access to pupils in school. They write down information and views about these young people and build up a file on each individual.

A great deal of this information is collected without of course, the consent of the individual pupils. I can think of no better example in our society today of "information received in confidence".

Mr. Speaker, where are the laws of this Conservative government preventing the disclosure outside of the educational field of this information received in confidence? Instead, here is the policy of the Conservative government as expressed by the Attorney General and the Minister of Education. I quote the Attorney General, June 28:

> There is no privilege accorded for this type of information (the pupils' accumulative school files). I can think of situations where it would be most cogent and most valuable as evidence.

The Minister of Education, Mr. Speaker, on July 4:

> The question of information and the law is a very complicated one and I do not think I am qualified to get into that aspect of the question of school records.

What does this amount to? It amounts to this: the Education Minister says, he is inept in giving leadership in this area. The Attorney General comes very close to saying that there should be no privilege accorded for this type of information and the Prime Minister of this province has the sheer gall, Mr. Speaker, to go around saying that our laws—the laws of the Conservative government over the past 25 years—the statutes of this province should make secure the inalienable rights of every citizen.

If the disclosure of information received in confidence, on pupils in our schools, is not a transgression of a young person's inalienable rights then I would like to know a better example.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the Attorney General and the Minister of Education have read a recent publication entitled "Living and Learning". I believe it was a report prepared upon a request of this government. On page 170 of this report, in a chapter entitled "Fundamental Issues in Ontario Education" is found the following statement, and I quote it directly, Mr. Speaker:

> An important issue emerges in connection with new methods of data processing and information retrieval. Facts about a pupil, measurements of his performance and even judgments regarding his character and potentialities may be recorded and stored. Such records should be treated as confidential so that private information is not released or used without consent of the individual concerned. The possibility that information about a person may prove ramaging is not to be treated lightly.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that both the Attorney General and the Minister of Education of this province have treated this matter very lightly indeed.

Then, in the broader context the Hall commission report states this, and when I say broader, I mean broader than the area of access to court, the access of the law courts to this information, talking about access outside the school system to employers and so forth. The Hall commission states:

> Who knows what category of people might be segregated for special attention in an unforeseeable future merely on the basis of the cards spewed out by an electronic sorter.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks on this area by recording in Hansard part of an editorial that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning, Friday, July 5, 1968. I hope that by doing this I will draw the problem both to the attention again of the Attorney General and the Minister of Education as well as to some of the hon. members opposite so that in their caucus they might press the Attorney General and the Minister of Education for a clear cut issue on this.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): They never attend.

Mr. T. Reid: I would like, therefore, Mr. Speaker, to put this into the record. The editorial is entitled "Records First or Children, Mr. Davis?":

> Yesterday, Education Minister William Davis had his say on the subject and it was uncharacteristically gauche. The use of the records in the courtroom, said Mr. Davis, has not hurt the usefulness of the records. The incident should not reflect on the value of the records to the educational process.
> Who was worried about the harm that might be done to the records by reeling them off in a courtroom? Did Mr. Davis have no thought about what damage might be done to people, the people, whose case histories with all their prejudice and stereotyped judgments, might be exposed in public?
> Has Mr. Davis examined the full transcript of the trial in question? Has he even sent for one? Has he read his own committee's report with its references to the victims of self-fulfilling prophecies or is he succumbing to a severe case of the rigidity which this committee warned were a danger to anyone who would administer his colossal department efficiently, humanely and with flexibility?

Mr. Speaker, I submit that my leader and other members of this official Opposition have brought to the attention of the government a fundamental issue on which they must have a stand and a policy. Now I close with those remarks, Mr. Speaker, thank you.

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry): In taking part in this Budget debate, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that one of the major problems in the province is the heavy burden on municipal taxation and based upon the Smith committee's recommendations this government undertook to lighten the municipal taxpayers' load by some $126 million. This relief was to be brought about by two measures; shelter exemption grants to all homeowners and tenants in the province and by the assumption by the province of the cost of the administration of justice. In the Budget presented by the hon. Provincial Treasurer to this House on March 12, Mr. Speaker, the government has more than fulfilled its commitment. The proposals contained in this Budget which will be implemented in this session will bring relief to our municipal taxpayers in the amount of $191 million. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this government has not only fulfilled its commitment to the people of this province, it has exceeded that commitment by some $65 million.

One of the most important gauges of any government is its economic integrity and stability and the size of debt in relation to gross product. In 1948, Ontario's provincial debt was in the order of 13 per cent of the gross provincial product. By 1962, this debt was reduced to approximately 9 per cent, and as of the 1966-1967 fiscal year, the debt was further reduced to 6.6 per cent with a modest deficit proposed in the Budget before us. The increase in the level of debt for 1968-1969 will be well below the 9 per cent limit suggested as tolerable by the Ontario committee on taxation. This highly satisfactory state of affairs is no accident. It is the result of the consistent application since 1943 of one of the basic principles of this party.

The former leader and Prime Minister of this province the Hon. Leslie Frost said in an interview:

> The philosophy when he was Premier was to develop the province and get more people to make the wheels of the economy go around and with the taxes and revenue that came from the expansion of the economy to increase our standard of living. It has to be a partnership between the two philosophies of economic advance and human betterment. This is one of the things that Canada should bear in mind today.

Mr. Speaker, I do not pretend to be an economist but I do feel that I understand and appreciate the economic philosophy of our party and its significance today to Canada and to our province of Ontario. Put in the simplest terms, it seems to me that the revenue which we spend here each year comes from the taxpayers, the workers, the wage earners and the industries in commercial enterprises of this province.

If we wish to increase expenditures, there are only two general courses open to us, we can increase taxes on the industries, businesses and wage earners that we now have in this province, or we can strive to broaden our tax base by fostering new industries and businesses and consistently increasing the number of wage earners or taxpayers. Last year, for example the gross provincial product of our province rose by 7.8 per cent to $24.9 billion, and in the process 95,000 new jobs were created.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to recent events in Britain. That country's serious economic plight provides a very important lesson which must be learned by all Canadians of all parties. At the latest count, only 19 per cent of the 15-19 age group in Britain were in school or university, while in Japan, for example, the figure is over 40 per cent. When one ponders over these significant figures we can all appreciate what two world wars in a period of 30 years has contributed to the drain on Great Britain's physical resources.

Public policy with emphasis on redistribution of income and welfare programmes in Britain along with the rate of household saving has remained relatively low and considerably below that of the seven principal European countries for which comparable data is available.

With business savings also comparatively low the overall rates of gross savings as well as gross capital formation on average from 1958 to 1965 have been lower in Britain than in any other European countries covered in the capital markets study made in 1967. Therefore, government policy has a definite effect on this country's economy.

Mr. Speaker, this Conservative Party is fully committed to policies designed to create and maintain the economy. For that reason we welcome the socialists' announced decision to swing to the left. In the press, mention has been made of our more aggressive attitude toward them. These reports are true and we will continue to attack that party, for we are convinced that its success would inevitably bring the same economic ruin to Canada and Ontario as the Labour Party has brought to Britain. With a former socialist as leader in Ottawa, we do not know where the federal party stands.

Further evidence of this provincial government's recognition of the vital importance of sound economic planning is provided by the organization of The Treasury Department into The Department of Finance and Economics and a Department of Provincial Revenue. This reorganization is a good example of the type of progress being made by this government almost unnoticed by a press which is kept fully occupied reporting upon one unfounded and irresponsible charge after another from the benches opposite of alleged cruelty and inhuman treatment to persons in the Don jail and in Guelph, and so on.

Our people are learning the hard way that, contrary to what they are being told by many politicians, there is no money tree growing either in Queen's Park or on Parliament Hill. In the final analysis it is the consumer and the taxpayer who are the source of all revenues including most of the funds derived from our corporations and businesses.

One looks at the total funds which we in this House simply allocate to local governments, school boards and other agencies throughout the province. The amount of these funds is largely dependent upon expenditure decisions made at the local level. Let us take one example openly, that of legislative grants to school boards.

The figure here is $490 million for this year and no doubt the Minister of Education was questioned very closely on this figure during the estimates of this department and this is right and proper, but this is no guarantee that the vast sum of money will be properly spent and we can only be certain of this when school boards throughout this province are subjected in their turn to the same searched scrutiny and enquiry which is conducted within this House.

I firmly support our government's programme of consolidating the school administrative units on a county basis. All of us are agreed on the principle of the programme of equality for all children of this province, regardless of where they live. But in addition this consolidation will also ensure greater accountability to the taxpayer of the sums being spent on education. While we may not see any reduction in the cost of education, I think that as a result of this reorganization we may reasonably expect to see less duplication of effort, fuller use of facilities and therefore we should derive greater value from every dollar committed.

I commend the Minister of Education for the strides his department is making in the field of education known as television. I believe that all of us can take pride in the fact that our province is establishing a world-wide reputation in educational television. Because of the great distances which separate our municipalities, television is bound to play an increasing title role in ensuring equality of educational opportunity for all Ontario.

In the field of social and family services, I welcome the hon. Minister's intention to spend more effort in rehabilitating welfare recipients. This is simply another application of our party's programme.

It is the aim of this government to deal with dependency on welfare allowances, insofar as possible, by methods of prevention and rehabilitation. Our social services are being designed not only to help those who are unable to help themselves, but just as important, to assist others to become self-supporting once again.

In looking over the Budget for The Department of Social and Family Services, Mr. Speaker, one notes an overall increase in expenditures of approximately $20 million.

The bulk of this increase is devoted to the child welfare branch, with expenditures this coming year of over $34 million, versus $27 million of a year ago—and to the family benefits branch and municipal welfare administration branch, which are each up approximately $4 million. Another significant increase has gone towards improving the vocational and rehabilitation services provided by the department for our handicapped citizens.

The training or education now available for these citizens runs from a complete university education, professional courses, clerical or trade school training, to on-the-job experience in office or factory in jobs calling for every degree of skill and ability. Employment for graduates includes the whole spectrum from sheltered workshops for those unable to compete in the industrial-commercial world, right through to semi-skilled, clerical, technical and professional positions.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, our handicapped have been helped to establish their own businesses, and legislation has already been introduced this session to expand this programme. At present we have some 2,600 persons in 81 workshops in Ontario, out of a total of nearly 6,000 persons who annually receive vocational and rehabilitation assistance.

I was pleased to note also, Mr. Speaker, that the emphasis in our expenditures on health has been directed to increasing the supply of health specialists. Some $30 million is to be spent on health sciences teaching facilities for the training of doctors, dentists, nurses and health personnel.

In addition, grants will be increased for the construction of teaching hospitals and for schools to educate hospital personnel. I know too that the increased bursaries to be provided to medical, dental and other health specialists will be welcomed by all members of this House.

This policy is entirely consistent with the hon. Treasurer's opening remarks that first things must come first—that these expenditures form an essential part of the foundation for the future growth in our health services.

In the field of agriculture, I am very pleased that the Minister of Agriculture and Food (Mr. Stewart) has appointed a committee to have a full-scale examination in the entire cheese industry. The eastern counties of Stormont, Dundas, Glengarry, Prescott and Russell produce over 50 per cent of the cheese produced in the entire province and naturally, this is of great importance to eastern Ontario because of the unstable conditions in Britain of the pound sterling value and Great Britain being our prime market for export cheddar cheese, the United Kingdom's economic difficulties will have a direct bearing on the cheese industry much more so than any other dairy product produced in this province.

I am pleased to know that this committee is already at work and it is anticipated that the report will be in from their findings by midsummer. Many of you have heard high hopes expressed for the farmer's lot each year for the past 30 or 40 years.

If I may sketch briefly the developments which have deepened the farmer's problem, then examine the future of the dairy, beef and hog operations in eastern Ontario in particular, Mr. Speaker, the farmers of eastern Ontario are not alone in having problems. It would appear that the word progress has come to mean migration from the farm to the city and movement from occupations which require a good deal of labour to those which use more machinery and less labour.

The incentive to move to the city has been provided by low prices and incomes to farmers. This has been as true in Ontario and other parts of Canada. Since 1940, farmers have applied more capital and equipment to their farms, production has increased, while net incomes have remained about the same as in earlier years. During the same period, since 1940, urban industrial incomes have gone up nearly five times.

So unpredictable has agriculture been that even a very good farmer who used his credit wisely and expanded his production at the right time could be destroyed by the decisions of other farmers to expand at the same time. The over-production and low-price cycles destroy hundreds of good dairy farmers, some good large hog farmers and hundreds of good broiler operators. This very large problem, low income on the farm, and in the small towns has led to the continuous movement of the people to the city and is causing serious concern in eastern Ontario, as well as all over Canada.

It would appear that the burden of solving the low-income problem of rural people seems to rest with the state government and with local and county government. We must work out new ways to raise farm income in the province. We may have to use either county governments or lump a number of counties together into regional governments to tackle some of the jobs that must be done.

I believe the first job to be done is to gradually slow down the flow of people out of the rural area to the city. That requires the development of a strong base of local industry, good roads, good educational facilities, both for young people and for men and women who want to earn a good living. The local attraction must be strong enough to keep the people from leaving. The next job, as I see it, is to develop in this part of rural Ontario, the kind of diversification that will allow individuals a choice of jobs without leaving this part of the province. It is true that there is some choice now but the choice should be much wider, providing more options for people. It begins with educational facilities, with adequate schools, colleges of applied arts and technology and colleges of agriculture. Then it requires the provision of places to work right in this part of the province and not somewhere in the distant city.

It has become clear that the plight of the farmer is serious and that it must not get worse. We have had major conferences on farm income and we have a farm income committee working as swiftly as possible to offer possible solutions: At the federal level, a five-man task force has been appointed to examine the problems of the farmers in Canada, and to develop guidelines for a natural, agricultural policy. Across in the United States, the problems of the farmers are not the only ones that they have suddenly recognized.

Great cities of this continent are threatened by smog pollution, by race riots and by general lawlessness. It is clear that the great American dream of moving people from the farm to the city has gone slightly sour. The result has been a new focus on our whole structure of civilization. Just as they have seen the 50-year move from the farm to the city, I believe we are in need of a comprehensive study in this country because the time may come when the city will be questioned as a place to live and the country will come back to its own, but dairy, beef and hog farmers want to know what farms hold in the next few years.

As recently as five years ago, everybody seemed to think that all public programmes were aimed at getting people off the land and into urban jobs. Through Ontario legislation, we began to make capital grants for productive activities, leading to the improvement of farms: To carry out other farm improvements over $120 million will be made available over the next ten years to commercial farmers in Ontario.

The Department of Agriculture and Food in Ontario has other programmes which are changing the whole future for good farmers. Junior farm loans, with the most generous terms in Canada, crop insurance, community pastures, expert extension advice, and so on. Through co-operation with other departments in the Ontario government, a variety of new services is being introduced to rural Ontario which will totally change the face of the province by 1985. One of these is the system of colleges of applied arts and technology which will place advanced technical training within driving distance of every rural boy or girl in Ontario.

Another is the vastly expanded network of university facilities in the province, with scholarship programmes to match which will make it possible for thousands of rural young people to attend university, if they wish to do so. Allied with all this is the expanded service of the colleges of agriculture at Kemptville, Guelph, Ridgetown and New Liskeard. Each year, agriculture, as it is practised on Ontario's commercial farms, comes closer to professional status.

As of now, the Kemptville school of agriculture is the Kemptville college of agricultural technology. Recently, we have come to the realization that to simply dump people into the cities can be costly to the individual and to the country. People have been hanging onto their farms despite inadequate income because they could do nothing else or were fearful of setting out to try. Training was not available at any cost and jobs only could be found for those with training. Age was against many.

Governments are finally aware of the need for transitional programmes for those who must change their jobs and pension schemes for those who are too old to move. Even more important, governments are attempting to generate new industrial growth in rural areas so people will not be forced to move too far from their home area. Governments at long last realize that they must help farmers to manage the agricultural industry. They must be able to help farmers develop marketing procedures, to move products to market in an ordinary fashion, and more necessary, limit output to the demands on the market.

In the age in which we live, governments must have staffs of economists and statisticians to predict the future as accurately as possible and they must try to make sure that extension men, engineers, farm credit advisers and others speak with one voice and carry the correct advice to the farmers. On the other hand, farmers must do their part to raise their incomes.

It is not enough for governments and farm organizations to help with the jobs of training, drainage, farm consolidation and overall rural development if the individual farmer refuses to use the good sense he was born with. If he refuses the training, persists in buying machinery out of all pride rather than necessity, insists that farm records are not necessary and that expansion is out of the question, there is very little that anyone or any government can do for him.

There is no point in paying him more for his products than they are worth, or wasting time talking endlessly to him about things he should do. If such a farmer prefers to continue with a closed mind, he cannot be helped. It is a waste of the extension man's time and the cash and credit of the taxpayer to bother about him for long, but we must be sure to provide him with new opportunities, and the perspective to see them as opportunities. Until every small farmer has been given the chance to choose between several alternatives, both in farming and outside it, the job of the public service to agriculture is not finished.

Farmers must attempt to set up a strong, unified organization which will be capable of negotiating on their behalf with other parts of the food industry or with government. Unless they can bind their conflicting interests together, they will not be able to assist and advise governments in the development of sound, long term policies; without those sound, long term policies, no farmer can make plans for the future. I am optimistic about the future of agriculture in eastern Ontario because in the last few years, governments at all levels are more concerned than ever before about farm income.

In Ontario, we are going full steam ahead in attempts to develop and adjust policies which will assure a position of strength for agriculture in the general economy. Until recently, the vast majority of people in Canada have ignored two subjects—food because we have never been hungry, and pollution, because it has never really been a health hazard until recently. Fresh air and water, the woods, the farms and the open spaces, have been taken for granted, just like our plentiful supplies of food.

Factory waste, which finds its way into the lakes and streams and kills the fish is a form of pollution. Animal waste from our farms, the sooty smoke from our factories, the careless use of chemicals and insecticides can all contribute to pollution. The pollution dangers have increased with the increase of industrialization of our province, concentrations of population and the introduction of new production technology both within and outside agriculture.

We are fortunate in Ontario and Canada, that our problems are much fewer than those of our neighbours to the south, and most countries in the world. We are fortunate to be in a position where we can benefit by our experience and correct this evil. It will require the co-operative understanding and support of people in all walks of life.

Although the smoke from smelters, agricultural chemicals, the sewage from towns and cities and the refuse and the sewage from pleasure crafts and boats and the factory waste are causes of pollution, lack of responsibility on the part of the general populace, and to some degree, lack of knowledge, this problem goes far beyond provincial boundaries, and the sooner the entire population realizes that this is everyone's problem, and that it is having an adverse effect on everyone, laws and regulations will likely be required, and everyone must play their part to co-operate to the fullest.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude these remarks by commending the hon. Treasurer of this province for his 1968 Budget—another sound investment in the people of Ontario and in our dynamic economy!

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, it has often been said by members of this House that Ontario is the province of opportunity. Statistics prove that this is a fact. That is if you happen to live in southern Ontario.

Ontario accounts for four-fifths of the nation's fully manufactured goods and a large share of Canada's financial power, mineral, agricultural, and forest resources. Economically, Ontario is 40 per cent of Canada.

In 1967, the value of goods and services produced in Ontario totalled $25 billion. During 1967, 132 major new manufacturing plants opened in Ontario, valued at $91 million. A further 262 companies expanded their manufacturing facilities last year. Manufacturing shipments in Canada during 1967 amounted to $38 billion, over half in Ontario.

New investment capital in Canada amounted to $2.7 billion; again, over half was invested in Ontario. The yearly increase in population in Canada was 378,000 and Ontario accounted for 174,000 of this increase.

At a glance you would be inclined to believe that this province really had a great deal to offer, and it has, if you happen to live in the area referred to as the "golden horseshoe." Almost all of the manufacturing activity, capital investments, and population increases, have taken place in one-fifth of the province, in the south. In the remaining four-fifths we are still trying to impress upon this government that northern Ontario has been neglected for far too long.

Let us look at what has happened in northern Ontario as a result of the equalization of industrial opportunity plan announced during the election of the fall of 1967.

To June 4, 1968, five loans totalling $831,749 created 181 jobs in northern Ontario. One of these was to Allied Chemicals, for a plant at Falconbridge, and this loan was for the maximum of $500,000. In eastern Ontario, 12 loans were granted, amounting to $2,274,913 and creating 452 jobs. In the rest of Ontario, 14 loans were granted in the amount of $1,879,816, which created 562 jobs. That is a total of $5 million of taxpayers' money which has been handed out, but how much equality in industrial opportunity did we have?

There were a total of 15 Canadian companies who benefited, 12 foreign owned and four mixed. More than half of the loans went to non-Canadian companies. This plan was to encourage industry to locate in underdeveloped areas of the province, with forgiveable loans as incentive. Ten million dollars was allocated for this purpose and the municipalities wanting to participate were to apply. Some 308 municipalities made application and 236 were approved.

Northern municipalities are not better off than they were before. All northern communities have made application and yet only three—the Lakehead, Kenora, and Falconbridge—have been able to obtain loans. Now, northern municipalities are no better off than they were before and are competing with the 236 others that have gotten approval. But only five of these loans have been granted to northern municipalities, and, to date, northern Ontario has only received five of a total of 31 loans under the EIO programme.

Let us look at what happened under the conventional Ontario development corporation loan from its inception in 1963 to June 4, 1968.

In northern Ontario, four loans have been granted, totalling $565,000. In eastern Ontario, eight loans valued at $1,409,000 were granted and, in the rest of Ontario, 12 loans totalling $2,794,000. Of all ODC loans in the past five years, northern Ontario has received four out of 24 and $565,000 out of a total of $4,768,000.

Looking at the location of new industries in Ontario in 1967, six were located in the east, two in the northwest, four in the northeast, 13 in the Georgian Bay area, nine for Lake Ontario and 18 in the midwest, 15 in Niagara, seven in Lake Erie, six in Lake St. Clair, and 52 in the central area. Northern Ontario welcomed six new industries out of a total of 132 located in this province in 1967.

Just so as I am not being too critical of the provincial government, I would like to read a press clipping from the Port Arthur News Chronicle of March 30. It says:

> The flying visits of Cabinet members to the Lakehead are continuing as candidates for the Liberal leadership drop in to chat and make their pitch for the support of the party delegates who will be voting at the next convention. Certainly northwestern Ontario cannot complain about being forgotten or overlooked by politicians—whenever they want them.
> One of the latest of these was External Affairs Minister Paul Martin, who is rated as being one of the top three finishers at the very worst, and for whom every vote is important. What did Mr. Martin talk about? Why, accelerating Canada's economic growth by placing greater stress on the development of northern Ontario's resources. He said if he were Prime Minister, he would introduce a vigorous programme of development of the resources of northern Ontario, northern British Columbia and the northern sections of the prairie provinces.

How many times have the people of northern Ontario heard such things before? They have heard them from the lips of every politician of every party, during every election campaign, both federal and provincial. But it is only during the campaign that such things are heard, not afterwards.

Mr. Martin has been the senior Cabinet member and acting Prime Minister in the present government since it came into power in 1963, yet it is not apparent that he swung his influence for northwestern Ontario's side when all the public bodies here were pestering the federal government to extend to this region the benefits of being a designated area, so that secondary industry would be easier to attract.

Come to that, neither it seems, did any of Mr. Martin's Cabinet colleagues. Industry Minister Drury said, "No," definitely and firmly and not a peep was heard out of any of the Cabinet about the need to boost the development of northwestern Ontario resources.

It may well be that when these politicians come up here, they really mean what they say while they are saying it. The trip from Ottawa and Queen's Park may open their eyes for a fleeting moment and make them realize the opportunities that are being missed, but once they get back on their home grounds, they forget. So Mr. Martin's promises of programmes to stimulate the economic development of the northern regions should be taken as an exercise in traditional electioneering practices and nothing more.

Mr. Speaker, I have quite a lot more to say in my remarks and, with your permission, I would like to adjourn the debate.

Mr. Stokes moves the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will continue with the estimates. I would like to remind the members of the affair being held by the Lieutenant-Governor on Wednesday evening, and in no circumstances, it is my understanding, will the House sit next Wednesday evening.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): We continue with the estimates of the Attorney General?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 2:00 of the clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

MONDAY, JULY 8, 1968

The House met at 2:00 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of amendments in here that relate to Bill 44 and the legislation the committee will be discussing tomorrow morning. The Schools Administration Act will also provide for an increase in honorarium to the trustees. It refers to an extension of the board and lodging principle and two or three other matters of some interest, but this bill will be going through the education committee for discussion there.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, can I ask the Minister if the legislation contains provision for a transfer review board?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think the leader of the Opposition is referring to a transfer review board. No, it does not refer to a transfer review board and I thought this was a matter that we could discuss at the education committee. This has been communicated to the Ontario teachers' federation.

Mr. Speaker: Introduction of bills.

The member for York South.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): I have two questions for the Minister of Labour.

1. When will the award of the board of arbitration, chaired by Mr. J. B. Metzler, in the dispute between St. Mary's general hospital, Kitchener, and the Ontario and London building service workers' union, local 220, be released?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question from the hon. member, I am advised by the chairman of the board that he expects to be able to release that report within a week.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister would permit a supplementary question? What conceivable explanation is there for the fact that the hearings were concluded April 2—over three months ago—and we still do not have a report?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, the report had been drafted but it has not come back from the two other members as yet. I have made enquiries about it and I think the hon. member received a copy of a letter this past week, about this matter and it will be dealt with within a week.

Mr. MacDonald: You have not answered my question. What conceivable explanation is there for a three-month delay?

Hon. Mr. Bales: I think the explanation is simply that the members have not yet returned their report. I am sure they will very shortly.

Mr. MacDonald: My second question to the Minister of Labour is: Will the Minister invoke section 7, subsection 6, of The Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act, 1965, to implement the award of an arbitration board in the dispute between the Woodstock general hospital trust and the London and district building service employees union local 220, released on May 8, concerning which the hospital management has refused to meet with the union since that date?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question from the hon. member for York South, under the Act the Minister does not invoke section 7, subsection 6, of The Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act. If either of the parties draws to an arbitration board's attention the fact that an award has not been implemented, the board is then empowered under section 7, subsection 6, of the Act to make a collective agreement that will be binding on both parties. In this case the union drew this matter to the department's attention only last week and the department conveyed to the chairman of the board the fact that an agreement had not been implemented. It will now be up to the board to see that it is implemented.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Sandwich-Riverside has a question from last week.

Mr. F. A. Burr (Sandwich-Riverside): Mr. Speaker, a question for the Minister of Health. What steps are being taken to reduce or eliminate the air pollution emanating from the Canada Cement plant at Zorra?

Hon. M. B. Dymond (Minister of Health): Mr. Speaker, this plant and others in the area are presently under survey by the air pollution control division and their sampling network has been put into operation in the area to determine the extent of the problem. The programme will be worked out on the basis of those findings.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Sudbury.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): I have a question of the Attorney General, Mr. Speaker. Is it a fact that Myer Rush has expressed a willingness to return to Ontario voluntarily? If such is the case then will the Attorney General inform the House why he maintains expensive proceedings in the courts of the United Kingdom to compel his return rather than facilitate the voluntary return of Mr. Rush to Ontario under appropriate conditions?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Rush expressed the desire to return to Ontario voluntarily, we immediately enquired as to what appropriate conditions might be imposed by the court to ensure his return. Unfortunately there is no authority for the court to impose any conditions, nor is Scotland Yard in a position to do so.

If our application is withdrawn, Mr. Rush would receive his passport back from the police and be free from the jurisdiction of the court. In light of the past experience in similar matters we thought it best to proceed in such a way as the law provides and not to rely upon an unenforceable voluntary suggestion given by Mr. Rush. We did not have too much faith in that suggestion.

Mr. Sopha: May I ask a supplementary question? Has the Attorney General become acquainted with any offer by Mr. Rush to surrender his passport to another person, mutually agreed upon, in order to ensure that he will not use it himself, or any improper person?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Hamilton Mountain.

Mr. J. R. Smith (Hamilton Mountain): I have a question for the hon. Minister of Health. When is approval of the amalgamation of the Hamilton and Wentworth boards of health to be announced?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, the regulations describing the constitution of the board of health of the Hamilton-Wentworth health unit comes into effect on July 9, when the new health unit will be established for all purposes.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Health. Do ambulance operators in Metropolitan Toronto, who pick up a body and have it pronounced dead at the hospital and then take it on to the morgue, charge the Ontario hospitals services commission $40 for such calls? Does the Minister think that this is an expensive charge, and does he intend to take steps to reduce this cost?

Hon. Mr. Dymond: Mr. Speaker, no charge is made to OHC for the transfer of a body from a hospital to the morgue. The fee for this service is recovered from The Attorney General's Department. I would therefore not presume to give an opinion as to whether this charge is excessive or not. The whole matter of ambulance costs is continually under review, since this is a new insured service, we are watching very closely in order to learn from our experiences.

Mr. Shulman: Inasmuch as the question should have been directed to the Attorney General, can I submit it to him as notice at his convenience?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 11th order, the House in committee of supply, Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

On vote 210:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to speak very briefly on the question of wire tapping and try to draw some of the distinctions which are going to have to be made by the government when it is considering the question of wire tapping, both from its own point of view, and whatever submissions they may wish to make to the federal government.

Really, what we are talking about—it is a question of eavesdropping, which I think, is a better and more inclusive term than wire tapping—is the extent to which we are prepared to protect communications between individuals and groups of individuals from invasion, and to protect the privacy of communications. I do not think that we run into quite the same problem when we are talking about written communication as we do with spoken communication. In written communication, you can usually find some method by which to tag the person who intervenes on a written communication with trespass or theft or some such known offence, related to tangible property, under the criminal code. And, of course, under The Post Office Act of Canada and the regulations made under it written communications going through the mail are very highly protected.

However, when we move into the area of eavesdropping, we find a situation where a communication can be interrupted and heard by someone for whom it is not intended, without interfering with property. I would like not to get sidetracked into subtle legal distinction between wire tapping as such, and electronic eavesdropping by means of microphones—and, on the other hand to avoid the problem of the wire tap in its property aspect. The interruption or the interception of a message being transmitted by telephone or other wire communication involves the interference with property in one of its uses, and with the ownership of property and, in this sense, by and large, the law is reasonably satisfactory.

I do not agree with the member for Downsview that section 372 of the code, which deals with mischief in relation to the enjoyment of property can, in fact, be extended to cover the kind of electronic eavesdropping which is of major concern these days.

I would like to set aside for the moment any subtle distinction that can be made between wire tapping on the one hand and electronic eavesdropping on the other, and deal with the broader question of the invasion of privacy of communication as such and the extent to which, in our society, this government should give some consideration to reinforcing the protection which we all assume our private communications have.

There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that in the field of civil law—that is the field separate and distinct from criminal law—the government of the province of Ontario could, if it wished to do so, by statute create a civil right in individuals which would permit them to sue in the courts for damages or for punitive damages if an analogy were drawn between slander and invasion of the privacy of communication.

This could be done either by the courts extending the principles of libel and slander or some other civil right, or it could be done by statute of the province. I would hope that the Attorney General would at least consider the possibility of legislation to provide a civil right to a person who has had his privacy invaded, in the sense of the invasion of his privilege of private communication, so that he could sue in a court for damages and, if necessary, for punitive damages, for that kind of an invasion of his rights.

I would make only one other minor point in connection with that—that in the kind of civil rights that I envisage the Attorney General creating by statute, I do not think that the proposition of whether it is true or false should enter into the protection which a citizen should get; if you assume that the communication is to be protected in its privacy, then the mere intrusion into that communication which was otherwise private, should give rise to the right. And whether or not the information that was picked up during the course of that, was true or false, should not be a determining factor in fixing liability.

When one moves into the field of statutory regulation by this province—by passing some kind of a statute which would be within the constitutional power of the province—or whether one deals with it as a matter to be dealt with only under the criminal code. I think that in many ways Ontario must be the kind of workshop within which constitutional change whether enactments of this Legislature or the Parliament of Canada can be tested, and attention should be given to dealing with the problem here.

The major concern I have is whether or not you can, in fact, effectively outlaw electronic eavesdropping or whether you must do it only in such a way that a civil right arises for this kind of eavesdropping. My own view is that it should be possible for the province of Ontario—as at least an intermediary step until the government of Canada decides to amend the criminal code to make it an offence—to pass some kind of law which would prohibit the use of electronic devices and microphones for invasions of the privacy of communication, and to impose statutory penalties which I think would go some way towards showing public concern about the need to regulate this kind of invasion of a civil right.

Assuming for the moment then, that in the final analysis one level of government or the other will decide to outlaw and make it an offence to invade the privacy of communication between individuals—

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Or both in complement.

Mr. J. Renwick: —or both in complement—then I think we come to the more difficult question and that is the extent to which there would be any exceptions in favour of the police or other government bodies in having the right to invade the privacy of communication. And I say "other government bodies" because one can certainly envisage the situation where The Treasury Department of this government, for example, if they felt they were being defrauded in a substantial amount of money of the revenues of the province, might feel they were justified in engaging in electronic eavesdropping. The same may also be true of the racing commission. One could name many other branches of government that might feel that they had a justification in the public interest to invade the privacy of communication.

I think it is important that we make it perfectly clear that any exception which is made is made for the police and for the police alone, and not for any other branch of the government or any other commission or instrument of the government.

When you come to the extent to which police should be limited in the use of eavesdropping for their purposes, I find great difficulty with the two tests which the member for Downsview laid down as being ones which would be satisfactory to him. I felt they were extremely vague and very difficult for anyone to analyze properly to come to a conclusion that an exception should be made. If I recall correctly the words of the member for Downsview, he referred to a situation of unusual importance, and second that the police would be unable to gather evidence in any other way, as the criteria by which a judge of the court would grant permission for eavesdropping.

I think that the criteria must be much more refined than that to enable the person, whoever it is who is to grant the authority, to come to any kind of a decision on it. And I would suggest, for want of some better criteria, simply the basis that the police who are making the application have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that a crime is about to be committed; or have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that they would be able to obtain evidence in support of a conviction in the case of a crime which has already been committed; and in the third area—which is the much broader one, but which I think is where the public interest requires protection—that they have reasonable and probable grounds to believe that there is organized and syndicated crime in a particular area involving specific persons, which the public interest requires should enable the police to exercise this kind of surveillance.

Those three criteria, Mr. Chairman, in my view, would then enable the person to whom the application is to be made to exercise the kind of judgment which is required to be exercised in this area.

Mr. Singer: Is that tighter? It sounds as loose and as vague as you can possibly make it.

Mr. J. Renwick: I think that the police should be in a position to establish to the satisfaction of the person to whom the application is being made, that they have reasonable and probable grounds.

Now, in the three areas to which I made reference, one is that the crime is about to be committed—

Mr. Singer: That could be stealing a loaf of bread.

Mr. J. Renwick: Yes. The crime that is about to be committed. I have not finished my argument. I am speaking of a crime. I am speaking of the tests involved. Reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the crime is about to be committed; reasonable and probable grounds for believing that they can obtain the kind of evidence which would lead to the conviction of a crime which has been committed; or reasonable and probable grounds to believe that organized or syndicated crime exists in the province and that in the public interest this surveillance should take place.

Then you come to the question which the member for Downsview has raised: What is the kind of crime which you are speaking about? Do you allow it for every kind of crime, or do you limit it to anticipate crimes or crimes which have in fact been committed, or to organized crime in areas which are considered to be of serious concern to the public? The whole area of extortion, blackmail and the kind of racketeering which is involved in the phrase "organized or syndicated crime" may very well be the kind of area in which and surveillance should be permitted.

When you come to a specific crime which has been committed, or the police believe is about to be committed, then I think, in my view, it must be limited to a serious crime related to either person or property; and I presume the gradations in the code are sufficient to establish that kind of crime: that is, murder or arson or some such similar serious offence including, probably, the offence of kidnapping. Then I think you have to deal with another distinction which, to my mind, has not come through clearly at all and that is, in the province of Ontario at the present time, for practical purposes under proper safeguards, the court will now admit by way of evidence, information obtained by eavesdropping whether it be by means of a wire tap or whether it be by means of an electronic pick-up of an otherwise private communication.

I think the Attorney General should seriously consider whether or not evidence should ever be admitted in this way and whether in fact, such surveillances which may be permitted would be limited entirely to police intelligence work, so that the information which is obtained by the eavesdropping could provide leads and other information by which the police could carry on their police work for the purpose of coming into a court and proving guilt in the normal and usual way, rather than being given the advantage of bringing into court, under proper safeguards, a very simplified method of producing evidence that is by the production of the actual transcription of the communication which took place.

I incline to the view that the limitation which should be placed upon the police is purely that of police intelligence and that we should not permit in courts the introduction of evidence which has been obtained by this kind of eavesdropping. That is a distinction which I have an open mind about but certainly, at the present time, my view is that it should be limited to police intelligence work and not extended to the point where the product of eavesdropping could be produced in the court by way of evidence.

Another distinction which I think has to be made—my colleague the member for High Park has suggested a judge of the Supreme Court—I am inclined to view the matter as one which should fall under the Attorney General and that if any exception is to be made in favour of the police carrying on surveillance for intelligence purposes only, it should be made by the Attorney General. It may be that it should be to the police commission, but for the purposes of simplicity I would say to the Attorney General himself.

The reason I favour the Attorney General over a judge of the Supreme Court is that the Attorney General is present in an assembly such as this and is responsive to the use of the authority which he is granted, because he is subject to questioning about the extent to which surveillance is taking place.

Let me make it perfectly clear. I do not think that the Attorney General, should he be the one who is shouldered with this responsibility, should answer specific questions about whose communications were subject to this surveillance, but I would think that from the point of view of the public interest that if the Attorney General was responsive yearly to questions such as—"How many times was the discretion exercised and permission granted to the police to carry on surveillance through electronic devices?"—that this would be an ample safeguard, or at least a partial safeguard, for the public against an extensive use by the police of this kind of surveillance.

I think that kind of control appeals to me somewhat more than having an application to a judge of the Supreme Court of the province of Ontario who is entirely isolated from the kind of questioning, limited though it may be, which would be available to members of the assembly and who, in this sense, would keep the Attorney General, as the responsible Minister, responsive to public opinion.

It has, of course, other dangers; when you move into a time of heightened public concern about one area, you may well find that the public would condone a wider use by the Attorney General of the right to grant such permission than should be tolerated. But I think in any democratic system that one has to accept the risks of relatively wide oscillation from time to time in what the public may or may not consider to be permissible.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I can usefully comment further about the problem. My major concern was that the question, having arisen in the way it has arisen in this assembly, should at least provide a specific focus in which a debate could take place. My second concern was to attempt to lay before the assembly some of the basic but very fundamental distinctions which have to be made when any consideration is given to the whole question, in its broadest context, of the privacy of communication between citizens.

I hope in these remarks I have made those distinctions in such a way that the Attorney General, either now or later, might feel that he could comment on them.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Chairman, if I may comment just briefly on the subject: some of the hon. members will recall that I have been a participant in debates on this matter on two or three occasions over the years, and that I hold the view that the police should be permitted to use this technological instrument in their continuous fight against crime, but that this use must be very closely controlled, I should think, by seeking and obtaining the permission of a superior court justice.

You may recall, Mr. Chairman, when I dealt with the subject a few years ago, I made reference to commercial eavesdropping and I was glad to note that the car dealers in London and the Bell Telephone in London, who have been using hidden microphones to listen to conversations often between a man and his wife, or between a customer of the Bell Telephone and one of the business representatives, discontinued those commercial operations almost immediately—in fact, one car dealer was up until two o'clock in the morning removing the eavesdropping equipment.

So I do think that this subject should be acted upon in the way that I have suggested. I think that the legislation, when it comes, should embrace both police officers and laymen of one kind or another. I am thinking not only of private detectives but of laymen of every description.

I am prompted to add this latter qualification at this time, Mr. Chairman, because I have in my hand a transcript from the Parker Royal commission and I note an example here, which I use for illustration, of how eavesdropping is undertaken from time to time by public officials, and I say this in the same moral category—

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: Order! A point of order?

Mr. Shulman: On a point of order, before we go further in this, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has referred to the Parker Royal commission. The only incident of eavesdropping as he has referred to was the taking down of information of a conversation which took place on my own line. It was taken down by my secretary on my instructions. There is no relationship whatsoever to wire tapping.

Mr. Chairman: I do not believe the member really has a point of order.

Mr. White: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could develop this thing for a minute or two and then the hon. members present can comment on whether or not this falls in the general area which is of obvious concern to this Legislature.

The eavesdropping that took place in the car dealer's premises, of course, were using his own equipment and his own premises to listen to the conversation taking place between a stranger, so to speak, and an agent of the car dealer. I think we all recognize that that is blatantly immoral and if it is not immoral, then the sign on the wall of the closing office should have said, "This conversation may be monitored by the sales manager".

If it was moral, and if it was ethical for the Bell Telephone Company to have supervisors overhearing the conversations between customers and business representatives through a microphone hidden in the little metal calendar, why did they not have a sign on the calendar saying: "This conversation may be listened to at any time in an effort to check the service being given to our customers and in an effort to render better service to you and others."

I see this in the same category and I note on page 2263 of the transcript the exchange between the commission's counsel and the secretary to Dr. Shulman, and I am going to read these several extracts.

Question: "Was Dr. Shulman there?"

Answer: "Yes he was, he was in his office."

Question: "And took the call?"

Answer: "Yes, he did."

Question: "And did you hear any of the conversation?"

Answer: "Yes, I stayed on the line."

Question: "And do you recall what the conversation was about?"

Answer: "I took notes after the conversation and I referred to those notes last night."

On page 2268:

Question: "Did you make a note of all conversations on the phone when you were there?"

Answer: "Not all."

Question: "Which ones?"

Answer: "Oh, if Dr. Shulman asked me to I did."

On page 2269:

Question: "Were you told by Dr. Shulman to make a record of the conversation?"

Answer: "Yes."

Question: "Before it even started?"

Answer: "Yes."

Question: "Did he say why?"

Answer: "No."

Question: "Have you any other notes of any other conversations you had reported this way?

Answer: "I have, I do not have them with me."

Page 2270: Part of an answer: "Dr. Shulman did often tell me to make a record. Sometimes I did when the conversation was going on, sometimes afterwards".

Farther down the same page, an answer by the secretary: "He said to me to listen in."

Question: "He signalled you to listen in?"

Answer: "Yes."

Question: "Are you in the same room?"

Answer: "No, we are in the next room. I can see him in my doorway. I usually hold on to the phone, lean in and tell him to take it."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is easy enough to dismiss this idea out of hand but it seems to me that a police officer utilizing the most sophisticated equipment, perhaps not even attached to the telephone line itself, or a lay person, listening in on a switchboard, or an agent, listening in on an extension, fall into the same category philosophically. I see no difference at all.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): How can you suggest that?

Mr. White: I do not know, but you can certainly limit the use to which the information gained in that secretive and unethical fashion is used. At any rate I do, once again, say to the Attorney General that this troublesome area must be brought into control, and this must be accomplished through legislation. In conclusion I want to summarize my point.

First of all, modern equipment must be available to police forces in seeking out criminals.

Second, the police must not have this power unbridled.

Third, permission must be sought for and obtained in advance, preferably, I should think, from a member of the Supreme Court.

Fourth, not only police officers but laymen must be subjected to this legislation.

Fifth, not only the most sophisticated electronic equipment but cruder methods of overhearing private conversations must also be considered and dealt with in the legislation.

Mr. Sopha: If you proceed this way you will never identify Henry's other wife.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: In a way I am rather pleased that the hon. member for London South brought this matter up. In my usual restrained way I was not going to mention these matters here in the Legislature, having hoped that the Attorney General and his department had learned their lesson from this. But since the hon. member for London South has brought this matter up, perhaps I should inform the House, or those members who are not aware, what the matter was that was being eavesdropped on. First of all, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. White: On a point of order. I think it would be a very great mistake, sir, to let this debate on wire tapping and eavesdropping degenerate in a rehash of the enquiry. My objection and the—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on this point of order, I had no intention of bringing this matter up; it has been brought up by the member for London South. He has imputed certain conduct. I believe I should be allowed to elaborate on the matters that were listened in upon.

Mr. Sopha: I would not call you on the phone.

Mr. Shulman: I hope not.

Mr. Chairman: It seems to the Chairman that any discussion regarding wire tapping at this particular point in the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General should be confined to generalities without any particular references to specific occurrences, and I think that the debate may continue on a general basis.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to your ruling, but having permitted the hon. member for London South to deal deal with specifics, I think the member involved has every right to give the full story. Then if you want to restrict it to generalities from that point forward I think maybe that would be wise, but we have gone too far now to stop at this point.

Mr. Chairman: I would say that the Chairman was not perhaps listening to the member for London South quite as closely as I should have been, and I missed the element of specific discussion of any particular case. If that was the situation then I do believe that the member for High Park should be able to clarify any misrepresentation that might have been made.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you very much. First of all on a matter of generalities, let me say that there is a very grave difference between listening in at a car dealer's between a husband and a wife discussing, in a supposedly private room, a conversation they thought no one else was hearing, and a man having his secretary listen in on his own conversation and taking records of that conversation.

Mr. White: Did you tell your callers that you were having their conversation recorded?

Mr. Shulman: To answer the question from the interjection: No, I did not.

Mr. White: No, well that is the point.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, it was the Deputy Attorney General. May I say—

Mr. White: Take your coat off and—

Mr. Shulman: If the member wishes the floor I will be glad to yield it to him.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park has the floor.

Mr. Shulman: May I say that this occurred on two or perhaps three occasions, and I may say, Mr. Chairman, that the only calls I had my secretary listen in on, and write down the text of the conversation, were those of The Attorney General's Department. The reason we found it necessary to do that, and this came out in the Parker Royal commission, was for the simple reason the Deputy Assistant Attorney General has a very poor memory and he sometimes forgot matters which were of some importance, and sometimes he remembered them as occurring somewhat differently—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): That is what the police say about witnesses.

Mr. Shulman: Exactly, exactly—somewhat differently from the way they did occur. The circumstances which were brought up here by the member for London South—I wish to inform the Chairman before I go on to the general remarks—were the fact that the Deputy Assistant Attorney General, and I am sorry I do not have his exact comments here, said on the phone and these words were written down—that a man could not be hired as a coroner because he was of Hungarian extraction. That is what the member for London South has brought up and I am sorry he brought it up because I had hoped that this matter was now a dead issue.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Justice Parker found against you on that.

Mr. Shulman: Not on that matter, he did not. Read the report!

Mr. Sopha: He found against you on all issues.

Mr. Shulman: He did his best on most issues, he certainly did; he did his duty as a good Conservative. However, to come back to another good Conservative, the member for London South, I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, coming to generalities now, that the member for London South had enough intelligence to understand that what we are talking about here in this House at this time is wire tapping—listening in on someone else's phone to a supposedly private conversation between two individuals who are unaware that a third party is listening in on their conversation.

I should hope that if the member for London South does not understand the difference, at least the Attorney General (Mr. Wishart) does, and this is what we find so offensive. There is nothing wrong, let me say now, in a man having his own conversations written down. I find nothing offensive in that whatsoever.

Mr. MacDonald: The Bell Telephone Company will provide you with a device that will record it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You cannot phone me without telling me that someone else is listening.

Mr. Shulman: And may I inform you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Minister of Correctional Services that these conversations were not a matter of my having someone. The calls were from The Attorney General's Department.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: You did not tell the party who was talking to you.

Mr. Shulman: Now let me stress again. There are certain instances where, of course, the police should have the right for national interest, or matters of serious crime, to listen in on conversations, but that decision should not be made at the police level. It should be made at the level of the Supreme Court. The decision should be made in the form of an ex parte order in camera, because obviously if you are fighting international crime, or if it is a matter of treason, or some very serious matter of this nature this is essential. But let me say that the police definitely should not have the right at whim, and particularly what can be a relatively unimportant—

Mr. White: It should be made by you!

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. White: Should coroners have the right?

Mr. Shulman: No one should have the right to listen in to other people's conversations at any time without permission of the Supreme Court.

Mr. White: Well, that is what you did.

Mr. Shulman: The member still does not understand, Mr. Chairman, that this was not a matter of listening to a conversation of two other people. It was the matter of listening to one's own conversation; if the member does not understand that now he never will.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Talk to yourself.

Mr. Shulman: But I assure you, Mr. Chairman, every other member in this House understands, with the possible exception of the member for London South.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: I wonder what the hon. member's secretary, listening to the private conversation, or what someone thought was a private conversation between two other people—I wonder what her position would be under his system.

Mr. Shulman: No.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member had better let that alone.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I must withdraw my earlier comment about the member for London South. I said—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The late J. S. Woodsworth would turn over in his grave if he could hear this NDP defense of this Orwellian double talk.

Mr. Shulman: I said the only man in this House who did not have the intelligence to understand—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Does the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman) agree with the leader of his party?

Mr. Shulman: There is another member, the Minister from St. Andrew-St. Patrick.

I withdraw my comment and apologize to the member for London South. Now, I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you see the distinction. I am sure every member in this party sees the distinction. I am sure the members of the Liberal Party see the distinction. I am sure every other backbencher in the Conservative Party sees the distinction and ultimately, it is going to sink through to the member for London South and perhaps even to the "member from Spadina." But Mr. Chairman, this is the basis and it is an extremely important matter. For goodness' sake, explain it to them.

Mr. Sopha: My Lord, this is an application on behalf of Dr. Shulman to permit him to record telephone calls.

Mr. White: I would like to explore the distinction which the member is attempting, without success, to make; and I must say, by way of preface, that I have noticed the philosophy and standard of ethics is quite different for others than for himself.

Would it likewise have been all right if the conversation had been monitored by a—

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: On a point of order.

Mr. Shulman: I think the member has just imputed my conduct. I would like him to substantiate or withdraw—

Mr. White: I have no comment on your conduct and I am not going to withdraw.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, if he has no comment on my conduct, the member for London South has stated that I have a different set of standards for myself and for other people. I would like him to substantiate or withdraw.

Mr. White: All right. I will now attempt to substantiate.

Mr. Shulman: Then he must substantiate or withdraw, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. White: I will now attempt to substantiate.

Mr. MacDonald: Do not make irresponsible comments. You have an obligation for responsible conduct subject to rules of the House.

Mr. White: I have been invited to withdraw or substantiate my remarks. I will now attempt to substantiate my remarks.

The hon. member has claimed a special right to have telephone conversations overheard by his agent although the other party of the conversation is not aware of it. This is in no way different, surely, from one party to a private conversation on a telephone—let us call it the Bell Telephone Company—having his agent listen in to a private conversation where the other party has no knowledge of that eavesdropping. It is a loophole, sir, which must not be permitted, because if it were, then one party to a private conversation could have either an electronic recording device or an agent—whether that agent be a secretary, policeman, a detective or what else—and that is the difference that you cannot comprehend.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 210?

Mr. White: Because if you are insensitive—

Mr. Chairman: Vote 210?

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: The member for Lakeshore on this particular point?

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say much on this particular point except to say that there is all the difference between day and night intercepting the conversations of third parties and having someone act as a conduit when you get a call directly through to yourself. Really!

In any event and keeping it fairly general, but referring back to the Telegram of last Thursday—I will not make any mention of the specific incident involved—but arising out of that is the role of the police in this province and the governance over the police administration touching wire tapping and eavesdropping.

At that time, I did not go on because I felt we could stretch the debate to any length, nor do I intend to today. As I said in my opening statement, which seems light years ago, sir, that it would be, as far as I was concerned, a major matter for debate in the next session on The Attorney General's Department—this whole area of privacy and invasion by scientific and other devices—and we should really launch into doing about it, and seeking to prevent something that has become very widespread and deep-rooted in the United States of America, as I shall indicate in a moment.

What I am interested in here, are the certain statements made by Judge Macdonnell, that the wire taps were not brought to the commission's attention. And he added that the police do not tell the entire commission every time they use electronic eavesdropping devices any more than they would before chasing a burglar. He thought that maybe chairman C. O. Bick might know a little more about it. But when he was contacted by the reporter, he refused to discuss it with relation to the magistrates' case, and I felt that the tone, if not the tempo, of the conversation left something to be desired, considering the role that he plays in this province and vis-à-vis The Department of the Attorney General.

He went on to say on the following page—and notice the somewhat snide tone about all this—that: "That the police should be able to use any sort of listening device but only with a warrant from a judge. It is not the police that the public should worry about." I certainly think it is the police that the public should worry about. They have the instrument, by and large, in their hands, though others in the form and field of labour competition, and what not, can obtain these devices. But certainly, insofar as his role is concerned, the police are the prime object. "It is not the police the public should worry about. If some of the people throwing up their hands in holy horror would worry about the snooping being done by otherwise average citizens we might get some laws on the subject from all so-called legislators."

At the moment I suppose we are "so-called." But the minute we begin to move on this matter he will have to withdraw his rather caustic remarks as to the role we are playing herein. In the meantime, I would think the Attorney General might drop the hint to him, that they might exercise greater discretion, since our opinions—and those from all sides of this House have been made known that we all consider it a meretricious practice to be dropping in on the conversation of competitors; except under the strictest surveillance through the courts, it is a matter that must be brought to an end, and we, on our side, would do just that.

Now, ranging out beyond this, what is the position of the police in North America? In looking at Westin, and what he has to say, "the great bulk of crime in America and the primary work of law enforcement are both centered at the local level. The city, county and state agencies share jurisdiction over the investigation and prosecution of criminal acts". In 1965, William Shaw, the electronics editor of Law and Order magazine, conducted a nation-wide random survey of electronic eavesdropping by such local law enforcement agencies. Forty-two agencies responded, seven from cities of more than 150,000 population, 12 from cities of more than 50,000 and 23 from towns of more than 20,000. In all, 80 per cent of the agencies reported that they use wire tapping "occasionally."

Almost 30 per cent said they use it whenever possible. Over 35 per cent of the agencies said that they used regular wire-connected or battery-operated, hidden microphones. None would state that they were using the simpler and more popular wireless radio transmitter bug. Shaw explained that such "bugs" are now forbidden by FCC regulations. Eighty-eight per cent of the agencies said that their interrogation rooms were wired for eavesdropping—in other words, where lawyers meet with their clients, in income tax offices around that country, in various forms of police interrogation, in the police stations, wherever lawyers or with other people seeking confidential information would think they were in privileged premises.

Not at all, 88 per cent of the agencies said. I think that these are shocking and startling figures and I am sitting here today in this Legislature, and the hon. Attorney General, I am sure, is unable to tell us to what extent this is operative among the police forces in the province. This is indicated, and I use it for this purpose solely, in the comments made by chairman C. O. Bick of the metropolitan police commission.

My complaint, and what I want to hammer at in this regard, is that again, as the chief law enforcement officer, this is a direct and bounden duty on the Attorney General's part to be immediately in contact with this sort of thing. It cannot be shuffled of, or even pushed to arm's length. The police, as against the courts, is his direct and immediate responsibility. We want to know the range of wire tapping devices and what are the expenditures of money in this province in this way. We do not want them to operate their insulated little island of investigation, divorced from the commissions that were largely appointed to exercise some surveillance for the protection of the citizen against police methods in this regard.

The police, I say, appear to be, all over this continent, a free-wheeling, completely unregimented, untried, group who may in this wise, since we have no legislation, exercise whatever discretion they wish in this particular regard. The thing has become widespread and the danger to our personal integrity is very great, and we cannot urge it upon the Attorney General to a great enough extent that he must now appraise himself of all the aspects of wire tapping and eavesdropping in Ontario, and go about a method of bringing it within the ambit of the courts, and his department, in a direct and forcible way.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, it looks as if we have a long hot day ahead of us. May I suggest that you might put it to the House that the members might be allowed to remove their jackets?

Mr. Chairman: I might say to the member that this is not a point of order, since there is nothing in connection with these debates which is out of order at this point and, therefore, it is not a point of order. I fail to see that it is actually a point of personal privilege.

In the Chairman's knowledge, permission for such action had been requested in the House about two years ago, I think, and permission was not granted at that time. I do not think that it is a matter upon which the Chairman has any authority that he might rule as part of the House rules. I can only say to the member that it has not been the custom over the years, and perhaps someone other than the Chairman should rule upon the matter.

It has not been the custom or the conduct. Permission has been asked previously, and it was refused by the House, and I can only say to the member that if he or any other member does not observe these traditions, then he is breaking tradition, and as Chairman, I have no authority to deal with it. But it is not a point of order, or personal privilege, and I put it to the member in that way. It is not part of the traditional conduct of the members in committee, or the House itself. Does the Attorney General have any replies?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, when the House adjourned on Friday last, I did not have the benefit of the interesting and thought provoking comments from the member for Riverdale, or the member for Lakeshore, and I would like, although I have prepared some remarks which I shall read shortly, and I took them down with car so I would say exactly what I thought should be said on this matter, I would like to comment on the additional debate which has taken place here today, although my remarks may touch quite closely to them, there are one or two things that I should say.

I listened with great care to the hon. member for Riverdale, particularly, and made note, and I assure him that I shall read Hansard, which I was not able to keep up with entirely, and I will find an opportunity there to study the suggestions that he made, particularly on the question that the province could pass legislation to give to the individual, a punitive damage right for invasion of privacy.

I think that that is something definitely deserving of consideration, and something which we will look at. I have not touched on that in these remarks because this suggestion had not been put forward, and while we may have thought of it in our general thinking, I had not referred to it here.

The three criteria as he put them forward, I think that generally I could go along with them, but I should like to study them at more length.

Mr. Sopha: In a minute he will say that he is going to send it to the law reform commission.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No, I think not. I would, perhaps, come to that. This is not a question of law reform so much as it is initiation of new law. I think that the suggestion that the police be allowed to use wire tapping devices of an electronic nature for intelligence, or investigative purposes, but not as evidence, is also something worth thinking about, and the suggestion that the Attorney General should be the person to rule on the application, and justify such use, is another matter, which I confess, had not occurred to me.

But in the words of the hon. member, and those of Mr. McRuer, whoever passed upon the application, it would have to be shown to him to be reasonable, probable grounds. I think that is true. The reasonable and probable grounds for this method of securing intelligence would possibly be that they result, or lead to, a conviction. I am not sure that this should be put in a statute in any event. I think that that is the basis on which the application should be considered.

But these are things which I think the hon. members will agree are in need of study and definition in very close and specific detail. The hon. member for Lakeshore added something to his remarks of Friday last. I recall, on that occasion, that he used the expression that he felt the Attorney General was guilty of abnegation of his duty, or words to that effect, in that he did not step in and assert, and direct the police, as I take it was his approach, not to use this method of investigation—and he enlarged on that today.

The point I make is that without legislation this is perhaps where he would say, "Well, why have you no legislation?"—but without the legislation up to this point in the province—and I might add, in this country, as we have no national legislation, except The Bell Telephone Act. There is no authority, no more than there was the other day when I spoke about the use of Mace. There is no authority to direct any particular police force as to how they shall conduct their investigation.

Mr. Singer: But you can take that authority.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, and I shall come to that. I should like to say this. As long ago as a year and a half ago, at least, in February of 1967, we went to Ottawa to a federal-provincial conference on criminal matters, particularly criminal law, and the amendments which should be made. One of the briefs which we presented, one of the submissions which we made, and one of the matters upon which we took considerable time, was the matter of legislation to control the obtaining of information by police forces, particularly, because it had to do with criminal matters, through the use of electronic devices—wire tapping and all the other types of eavesdropping material. We presented the view then, and we still feel, that it was a matter for federal law. Now, I shall refer to that in the remarks which I shall give to the House in a moment.

We felt that there should be legislation, and our position was that it should be permitted; that police forces should be permitted to use these devices in investigation of crime, but that it should be strictly supervised and controlled. And our suggestion was that by the obtaining of a court order by the police, and establishing the need for the right to act in this way—as the hon. member for Riverdale said, they would have to establish grounds, or reasonable and probable grounds that this would secure a conviction for a crime. Now that was the position we took a year and a half ago.

The Minister of Justice at that time was the hon. Mr. Cardin, in that conference. Sitting beside him was the late hon. Guy Favreau, and the hon. Larry Pennell, then Solicitor General. They have all moved from that area now, Mr. Favreau by death, Mr. Pennell has been elevated to the bench, and Mr. Cardin is no longer, I think, in the field of political affairs, as far as I know.

And we now have Mr. Turner, a new Minister of Justice. I would hope that with the new Minister of Justice, and the current Prime Minister being the former Minister of Justice, perhaps we can promptly and quickly pursue, with some hope of achieving a firm result, the proposal which we made a year and a half ago. I point out that it is not a matter which is of recent concern to us, and not a matter in which we have taken no action.

I think it is fair to say that perhaps we would be naive if we said we were not aware that police forces have used these means to obtain knowledge of the activities of criminals.

Mr. MacDonald: Even though they denied it on occasion.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Although I can state, as I said before, that I have no knowledge of specific instances other than the one which has come to light in this particular enquiry. And I think this enquiry has focused attention upon this matter. It is something which perhaps the public was somewhat generally aware of, and the mere fact that it has come to light in this enquiry does not make it particularly more urgent, but I do point out that we were pursuing it a year and a half ago.

Mr. MacDonald: Furthermore, industrial espionage involving wire tapping is very widespread.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes. There is the field within the civil situations where industrial persons, and perhaps individuals, spy upon each other. We eavesdrop upon each other in ordinary life. As the hon. member for Riverdale pointed out, we perhaps should have legislation, and I have noted that we shall take that into account and consider it.

Now I should like to say this before I read the brief remarks I prepared. I think that in the discussions, which have been worthwhile and interesting, there has been a slighting of what I think is an important element, and that is the protection of the public.

While it is all very well to be critical and to say, as I agree we should say, that this is an activity that must be strictly controlled if it is to be permitted, I think we must bear in mind that on the other side of the ledger there stands the great public. The public demands and must have protection from our law enforcement agencies against very sophisticated and active criminals who are using every means that science and technology provides to pursue their activities to the detriment of the public.

I do not think we should forget, in talking about the police invading certain areas of this kind, that the police are the men who stand as the protectors and the shield of the public against the activities of the criminal. I think that point was perhaps glossed over in the discussions which have taken place in this House, on this particular vote of my estimates.

What I have written down, Mr. Chairman, and what I should now like to read, is as follows:

I think all reasonable people must feel a great dislike for the principles which are necessarily involved in the act of wire tapping. We have been raised from our earliest days upon the principles of equity and fair play that have been the foundation of not only our system of justice but, indeed, the foundation of so many other aspects of our society. It must, therefore, concern us all when we see these principles somewhat perverted by the introduction of electronic devices that eavesdrop upon conversations.

Over 500 years ago an ancient English law prevented eavesdropping and made it an offence which could be brought before the court even by way of indictment, and that law developed in an age when there were no electronic devices such as we have encountered today. The principle then was just as applicable as it is now, for we individually resent any invasion of our privacy. For this, in turn, is a violation of our personal integrity and this no man can accept lightly.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think our problem today goes further than even that which is contemplated in the wire tapping discussion which has been so prominent over the past few days. While eavesdropping in its original form was considered insidious, wire tapping was an extension which was even more resented. In fact, we would be very short sighted if we did not recognize the many forms of electronic surveillance that may be carried on with the exceedingly well developed devices that are now available in this area of technology.

My whole approach to the problem, Mr. Chairman, is predicated upon the use of any type of electronic device which is utilized for a purpose that might be considered an invasion of privacy.

While I agree with these deeply entrenched principles of preservation of our privacy I must at the same time accept the very important task that is placed upon the law enforcement agencies of our country. We are all familiar with the report by the president's commission on law enforcement in the United States and the portions of that report which deal quite extensively with the problems of organized crime in the society to the south of our border.

That report also deals with the necessity for wire tapping and electronic surveillance and it comes to the conclusion that that type of surveillance is an absolutely essential device for law enforcement, particularly as it appeals to organized crime.

I do not intend to regale this House, Mr. Chairman, with the many quotations from the various persons who have cited the colourful incidents where electronic surveillance has played a major part in respect of the apprehension of criminals. I would only point out to the hon. members of this House that one of the basic conceptions inherent in organized crime is the complete protection of the top criminals who direct their nefarious enterprises from those individuals who are the small time hoodlums carrying on the criminal activities.

At the same time may I point out that by the very nature of crime there is a tremendous revulsion to the committal of any orders or directions in the form of writing, and consequently the criminal will rely to a far greater extent upon the spoken word. Over the distances which are inherent in our society today it becomes obvious that if you are not going to be able to write these messages then you must at some point resort to telephonic communications.

I mention these two principles, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that it demonstrates graphically that the electronic surveillance device becomes absolutely essential if we are to deal effectively with the organized criminal who could constitute such a threat to our society.

Having mentioned my feelings with respect to the two major principles involved in this matter, Mr. Chairman, may I say very shortly that my position has been consistently that electronic survellance of the individual should be expressly prohibited by a national law subject only to the provision that it would be available to the appropriate law enforcement agencies under the authorization of the court. I have taken this position publicly on other occasions and, indeed, at the conference of Attorneys-General which was held with the Minister of Justice in Ottawa a year or two ago, February, 1967, I believe. There was almost complete agreement among the provinces and the federal authorities that the electronic device should be prohibited except for properly authorized law enforcement purposes. The mechanics of how this would be worked out in practice have been discussed in their preliminary stages, but certainly agreement on principle was readily forthcoming.

I recognize, of course, that there is an area where the province might properly legislate with respect to eavesdropping and the electronic items that are used for this purpose, but in my own view a provincial law would not be completely effective nor would it be a legitimate application of provincial authority to federal communication systems that might be operating within our province. We would also be faced, of course, Mr. Chairman, with the possibility that devices could conceivably be used in one province which would provide surveillance of communication systems in another province, and there might be a complete inconsistency of the laws with respect to the matter. I stress that, because I think this certainly should be a federal law and I believe my views in that respect are the views of the other provinces.

The whole system points to a federal law and, indeed, the Royal commission of enquiry into the invasion of privacy in British Columbia came to the conclusion that a federal law should be enacted which would make it an offence to use electronic devices improperly, although that Royal commission did also come to the conclusion that there was a valid area of provincial legislative authority if it was decided that it should be exercised.

For my own part, Mr. Chairman, I, therefore, must state that I look upon electronic devices as an absolutely essential tool to effective law enforcement particularly in our continuing battles with the organized criminal. For that reason, until the device is dealt with by appropriate legislation, I do not feel that I can in any way censure the police for the use of these devices in proper circumstances and, indeed, I believe that we would all condemn our police forces if they did not use every appropriate and lawful device for the purpose of protecting us from the organized criminal. I do not feel it is necessary to deal extensively with the statutory provisions which exist and which purport to deal with telephone communications, except to say that none of the existing provisions either in the criminal code of Canada or in the various Acts respecting telephone communications, were intended to deal with electronic devices. And certainly by their language they do not create offences which would apply to the type of conduct with which we are specifically concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I am looking forward to the time when we will have a federal statute which will prohibit electronic eavesdropping except for law enforcement agencies, which will be authorized by the courts, and I would earnestly express the hope that this legislation will not be too long in its ultimate introduction into the laws of our country.

Mr. Chairman, no one, as far as I can recall, in the discussion of this matter made any reference to the fact that the commissioner appointed to enquire into the matter of civil rights in this province, the hon. Mr. McRuer, dealt with this matter. I should like to conclude my remarks by quoting what he had to say on this very subject in his report No. 1, volume 2, and I read beginning at page 937, where he said:

> We are particularly concerned here with the duties of the Attorney General as they relate to the prosecution of offenders and to law enforcement through the administration of justice.
> The effectiveness of all legislation for the protection of the civil rights of the individual depends on good law enforcement. The individual has a right to be protected from unwarranted police action, but likewise the peaceful citizen has a right to all the protection of the law enforcement agencies against unjustified invasion of his basic and fundamental civil rights. Too often the focus is misplaced and the rights of peaceful members of society are forgotten.
> In this province we have entered upon a new era which creates special problems for the law enforcement agencies. Modern means of transportation, the automobile and the aeroplane, together with modern means of communication, two-way radio systems and electronic listening devices, have become as available for use by organized and unorganized criminal elements as they are for the peaceful purposes of society. In some areas on this continent organized crime has become so developed as to impair the power and authority of government.

I think we all know to what he is referring.

> The protection of the rights of the individual requires that all the advances of technology be made available to law enforcement agencies with proper safeguards. It is no trespass on the civil rights of the individual that every scientific means of detecting crime should be properly used for protection of the public interest. Geography has placed us alongside a nation with different laws and different means of law enforcement.
> It is a recognized fact that organized crime abroad is prepared to reach its tentacles into this province in such a way as to make residents of the province in some degree subject to the power of criminal elements from abroad. The right of the individual to the protection of his civil rights under law does not extend to the safeguarding of the lawless against all reasonable and proper means of detecting his lawlessness.
> Representations were made to the commission to the effect that legislation should be passed restricting the use of wire tapping and listening devices by police officers. Some representations were made suggesting that the right of police officers to question persons accused of crime should be restrained or restricted. These representations raise difficult problems, but they are problems that must be solved by a realistic and unemotional approach.

It is hard to follow the logic of the contention that it should be unlawful to intercept a message passed as part of a plot to rob or assassinate, while the robbers or assassins should have free use of all scientific means of communication. What gives rise to misgivings is that there might be an unwarranted invasion of the privacy of the individual by the exercise of police powers of interception of communications. The question is one of balance and regulation.

Where law enforcement agencies have reasonable ground to believe that means of communication are to be used for the advancement of crime, they should be given a means to secure power to intercept messages. This is not greater trespass on the rights of the individual than the power now conferred on a peace officer to arrest without a warrant, or to get search warrants upon application to a justice of the peace.

The control over the exercise of such power should undoubtedly be strict, but nevertheless the power should exist. It does not seem logical that a power should be conferred on a police officer to deprive a man of his liberty by arresting him, if he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that he has committed an indictable offence, but that he should not have power to intercept a message if he can demonstrate to a judicial officer that there are reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the message is being used for the advancement of the commission of a crime.

And then Mr. McRuer concludes:

In large measure, any change in the law would be beyond the powers of the Legislature of the province and beyond the terms of reference of this commission.

And, of course, I think it is plain to all members of the House that he is referring there to particularly the criminal field, and the presentation of evidence in criminal cases. As I have indicated, this should be undoubtedly an area of federal jurisdiction and legislation, and that is the direction which we have taken to try to secure legislation in this area. I think that I need not add again, that I am indebted to the suggestions that were made to what we could do in certain areas, perhaps touching mainly our civil rights.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, for those of us listening to the debate, this has been quite an education. I have listened to the Attorney General with much interest, because this is the second time in a week that he has surprised me. I feel that his natural responses to the problem raised last week with the use by police forces of the chemical Mace, and now today, his reaction to the use of wire tapping without authority, have been good, democrative ones, and we, on all parts of the House, have recognized this.

The part where the surprise comes in is that the Attorney General, who must accept great responsibility for the direction of our law enforcement agencies in Ontario, including all the municipal forces and the Ontario Provincial Police, is loath to accept this responsibility in any meaningful way, and is not prepared to bring forth legislation controlling Mace and this sort of chemical control. And with the same approach, he says that he does not have the power, and has bolstered his argument by quoting from the McRuer report, and that the Legislature does not have the power, to ensure that our police forces across Ontario must have some judicial authority before they undertake wire tapping.

For the last three weeks we have seen the Attorney General contradicted by what we might call "usually reliable sources" as to the authority that was used in a wire tapping case which has been discussed to some extent in the House and is presently sub judice.

So it seems to me that the Attorney General cannot escape the responsibility that all of us have in this House—to bring forth legislation which deals with the problem in Ontario and particularly as it pertains to our own police forces in Ontario. If we are not going to needlessly tie their hands, and if we require that they get judicial authority before undertaking the wire tapping and electronic surveillance that has been under discussion here. I personally believe that this is well within the power of the Legislature and certainly within the power of the Attorney General.

I would urge him to act, and act in the very near future to undertake the kind of control in both these cases which as I understand it, would be favoured on all sides of the House.

Mr. Singer: Hear, hear. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the remarks made by my leader could be more apt than they were. What disturbs me particularly is that the Attorney General in his way—and he is a kindly man, and I think that mentally he has a good sound approach to these matters, but it is in the carrying out of his intelligent thoughts that he falls down. Having said what he did about the use of electronic devices, he added—and I am paraphrasing his remarks—that no one could object to the proper use by the police of the devices. Well, Mr. Chairman, this is the very concern. What is the proper use?

I just went through my remarks of last Friday and I asked him a series of questions at that time. We have had no answers. I tried to ascertain who in the metropolitan police force authorized the use of wire tapping. Did it come from the police commission as the news media state it did not? Did it come from Chief Mackey, or an inspector, a sergeant, or did some policeman just say—and this is the phrase I use—"This would be a good afternoon to do a little wire tapping. Let us go out and see what we can find"? I think that we have a right to be concerned, and it is our duty to be concerned about what is proper. The Attorney General has, at his command, and the command of government, the full power and authority to do anything he wants to, in relation to police forces. We could have a statute this afternoon to do away with all local police forces, if that was government policy, and to establish the OPP as the only police force of Ontario. We could have a statute—and we have one now—that deals with the amalgamation of police forces. There can be no question in anyone's mind that the government can do what it wants, and thinks is proper, insofar as police forces are concerned. Now, there seems to be no reason why, while we await federal legislation, there cannot be a series of statutory directions to our Ontario police forces, as to what is proper in these matters of wire tapping and the use of Mace and several other matters.

Surely there is no statutory prohibition in that regard if the government wants to exercise it? I think that this is what is indicated. The pious statements, no matter how well meant, of the Attorney General, that it is not proper that certain procedures go on, just are not enough for the province of Ontario. He is not just an ordinary mortal, or ordinary member of this Legislature. If he in his best thinking—which I think is pretty good on occasion—has come to the conclusion that there are certain things being done by the police forces in Ontario which should be controlled, then he and his colleagues have the power to regulate; and for goodness' sake should do it. Bring us the statute and let us see it. We will pass it, I think with plaudits from all sides of the House. But he does have the authority.

I would agree that probably, a most intelligent type of action could come from the federal government, and I would myself, sir, believe that it is forthcoming, reasonably soon. But we have a newly formed Cabinet in a newly elected government, and when that House of Commons in Ottawa will go into session, we do not know, nor do we know what the priorities will be. It could be a year or more before they get to writing this kind of provision into the criminal code. In the meantime, Mr. Chairman we are in session, and we are going to be in session for a day or two yet. The Attorney General has at beck and call the best legal advisors in the province of Ontario and it would be a matter of very little moment, if he has his mind set in it, to bring in a statute that would give him and the province some kind of control in these matters, rather than to let the situation wait for another 18 months. That I think is the simple position.

The word "proper" is the word that disturbs me, because we do not know, we have been unable to get any information as to what was done in the case of the two magistrates. The information in the press has been confusing and contradictory. Were other magistrates listened to? Who authorized it? These are most important questions and I think we have the right to know in the House whether it is being properly done, and what the word "proper" means. What are the criteria that determine what is proper?

The Attorney General talked about my suggestion on bringing a test case under the three statutes that I referred to, and he said that it was not intended—I think that was his word—that these statutes be used for this purpose. And I think this follows more or less automatically, because The Bell Telephone Act of Canada is an 1880 statute and certainly no one had in contemplation in those days, the sort of thing that can be done now. But the Attorney General is a good lawyer and he knows full well that our judges from time to time take a principle—and it might be as old as the principle in the New Brunswick statute that they are talking about, from 1650 and applied to present day circumstances—and when they see fit, they apply it. I would think that a judge could well look at the statute of 1880 relating to The Bell Telephone Act and say,

"This is exactly what the House of Commons of that day had in mind, and it is not unreasonable to say that in the circumstances of today, this should apply".

Or there is the question of The Ontario Telephone Act of much more recent vintage. Surely a substantial argument could be made—and there is no question that you would have to meet the other argument about what is federal and what is provincial jurisdiction. But I would think that a substantial argument could be made to say that those two sections 110 or 112 are applicable. I will volunteer, at a good rate of pay, the services of my colleague from Sudbury or myself. We will prepare briefs on that if you want, and I am sure that the briefs could exercise a substantial persuasion on the minds of the judges or the magistrates who are going to be charged with interpreting this kind of charge. Or again, there is a section of the criminal code—and my friend from Riverdale was quite anxious to dismiss this out of hand. Perhaps he is right. Perhaps I am completely wrong, but how do we know Mr. Chairman, unless and until we test these things? There could be as many opinions on these matters as there are lawyers who have opinions. There is only one test.

It is no good for me to stand here in this House and say "I am right and the Attorney General is wrong on the matter of legal interpretation." All we can do is give opinions —and I think my opinions have some reasonable intelligence in law—and the only way we are going to find out is to bring these matters before the court, and let us test them. At least then, if you do nothing more, we will have some sort of judicial opinion which can form a guide. But more important, sir, I am concerned about the Attorney General having espoused what I think are the right ideas. Concluding his remarks with saying, "Well, we are going to wait and see what happens; we hope the federal government will act."

I do not think we have a right to wait that long. I think we can do something here now, Mr. Chairman. I think we can do it now under property and civil rights, and our powers to control the administration of justice, and several other sections and subsections in section 92 of The BNA Act, and I think we should act, and act now, and relieve the minds of our citizens that at least within our authority we are doing as much as we can to bring this situation under proper control.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, if I might be permitted just a word after the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview and the leader of the Opposition. I would like to deal with those very briefly.

The leader of the Opposition said that the Attorney General had been contradicted and I do not take that too seriously, but I think apparently he sincerely thought that had been the case. Actually I do not quite understand that, because any statement I made either in the House or outside was to the effect that, so far as I was aware only one line, at least no line, other than that of the criminal had been tapped, or information obtained from it, and as far as I was aware, the magistrates' lines had not been tapped.

I know there was a report in one of the newspapers which I was asked to deny or substantiate, and I said I felt I had no need to do that. But I do want the House to know that I have investigated this matter with the metropolitan police of Toronto, and no one there can substantiate that any such statement was ever given, or that the magistrates' telephones were ever tapped. I do not know where these newspaper stories arise. My investigation indicates that that is not the case, and that is all I know.

I would like to say this to the hon. member, particularly with reference to the remarks to the hon. member for Downsview. I would point out that also mentioned by the leader of the Opposition was the matter of the use of Mace, and this matter of wire tapping. The use of Mace is a very recent thing. We had a question about it before the end of May in this House. On wire tapping, the employment of electronic devices of this nature, the focus of attention has come upon it very recently, and I think largely as a result of this enquiry.

So that when I come to the meat of the remarks of the hon. member for Downsview, that you should have legislation, I would point out to him that I am thinking and considering very seriously the necessity, perhaps, of amending some of our legislation, possibly in The Police Act.

Mr. Singer: Now you are talking.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: But he must realize that as I stand here with these very recent events just developing—and I stand here as a Minister—I cannot say what government policy is, because there has not been an opportunity to develop it. I will assure him that the very thoughts that he has put forward have occurred to me, and there may be a necessity to exercise some legislative control of this kind in these areas. Perhaps that might make him feel that I am not, as the member for Lakeshore said, abdicating entirely.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, just a minor point on that. First of all as the member for Downsview, I never dismiss out of hand any comments which he makes. The point I was making is simply that we are dealing with property, and when you are referring to property you are in a different realm than when you are dealing with intangible communication of oral words between one person and another, and their interception by electronic devices at a distance.

Mr. Singer: Res in jus or Res in rem? Let us get that clear.

Mr. J. Renwick: A minor point that I might draw to the attention of the Attorney General, if he does consider amending The Ontario Telephone Act, is the distinction which arose in the United States where with legislation quite similar to what they have in The Telephone Act in Ontario and the federal Telephone Act, nevertheless the telephone company in the United States was quite able to avoid that provision of the statute in these circumstances. And this is a memorandum which is reported to have been prepared by Mr. Courtney Evans, then an assistant director of the federal bureau of investigation, and a liaison officer with The Department of Justice in the United States.

The memorandum is dated in 1961, and the memorandum sought permission to lease special telephone lines in order to monitor an electronic surveillance. Evidence of the Attorney General's approval of such leasing was required by the telephone company. The memo distinguished between wire tapping and bugging, making it clear that the leased lines had no relationship to interception of telephone communications. They were to cover situations: "When it is impossible to locate a secure monitoring point in the vicinity of the premises covered by the microphone."

Mr. Singer: Where is that quotation from?

Mr. J. Renwick: This is a memoranum from Courtney Evans, an assistant director of the federal bureau of investigation, a liaison man with The Department of Justice in the United States. The point is obviously quite clear. The telephone company felt that it was quite legal for them to make their lines available by way of lease for connection with electronic devices, whereas it would not have been lawful for them to have given any permission for a direct wire tap on to the wire over which the communication was passing. Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am very curious. I do not recall that. You say the memorandum was in 1961?

Mr. J. Renwick: Memorandum from the United States, 1961.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be very interested in seeing it. I am interested in knowing whether it was in the area of criminal use, or for use in criminal investigation. Was this a civil approach?

Mr. J. Renwick: No. This was a criminal investigation in the sense that it was a surveillance of operations in the Las Vegas gambling area.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That would be definitely criminal.

Mr. J. Renwick: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be very interested in seeing that, because in the United States, of course, the individual states have criminal jurisdiction. The federal government has been able to acquire and exert certain criminal jurisdiction, whereas in Canada we have one criminal jurisdiction that is federal. But I would be very interested in reading that if the hon. member would perhaps make it available to me.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask the member for Riverdale a question. Would not this be more pertinent to the American Supreme Court view, that evidence illegally gathered is not admissible, rather than to the point that we are discussing? I wonder if that argument might not have come forward in that context? The Supreme Court of the United States has said on several occasions, as I understand it, that evidence illegally gathered is not admissible, and I wonder if that argument might not have revolved around that particular point.

Mr. J. Renwick: It may perhaps have. I want to speak very briefly about Mace, if I may, Mr. Chairman, only because an article has come to my attention since the comments last week.

I would like to know, first of all, whether the Attorney General has discussed the use of Mace with the police commission which is the vote we are now dealing with?

Second, whether or not the police commission agrees with his views which he has expressed in the House, so that they are entirely in agreement on his attitude on the use of Mace? Third, whether or not the police commission, with the very limited authority which it has under The Police Act, has advised the police chiefs and the police commissions throughout the province of Ontario on the views of the police commission and on the view of the Attorney General on the question of the use of Mace?

I have those three questions and I would like to read very briefly from an article which appears in the July 13, 1968, issue of Ramparts Magazine dealing with Mace, which I think may be of some assistance to the House. It refers in part to a report of The Department of Health and Welfare—Public Health Service in the United States, which apparently revealed that the content of Mace is 2 - chloroacetylphenone, kerosene and freon propellants, accounting for about 5 per cent of Mace. The remainder is 1, 1, 1 - trichloroethane, a solvent sometimes known as methyl chloroform.

It goes on to say that any ophthamologist can tell you that chloroacetylphenol can cause permanent scarring of the cornea which can result in partial or total loss of sight. But what of 1, 1, 1 - trichloroethane, the main ingredient of this co-called non-lethal weapon? First, although its rate of skin penetration is relatively low, it is "rapidly absorbed through the lungs and gastro-intestinal tract." Under "Symptoms and Findings", The Department of Health and Welfare has this to say about the effects of 1, 1, 1 - trichloroethane:

> Irritation of eyes, mucous membranes and lungs. Central nervous system depression. Headache, lassitude, facial flushing, incoordination, confusion, vertigo anaesthesia, severe hypotension, coma. Uncontrolled heart fibrillation due to sensitized heart muscle may occur. Death from respiratory arrest or peripheral vascular collapse. Heavy exposure may cause liver injury.

It goes on to say that:

> The known official tests of Mace were conducted on rabbits sprayed from a distance of six feet. Then six rabbits had drops of Mace placed in their eyes and were checked for two weeks. When the rabbits survived, Mace was turned loose for use on humans.
> It is interesting to note however, that when a new medicine is developed to benefit human beings, it must go through months and sometimes years of extensive testing before it can be given out and then, only under stiff controls.
> Doctor Lawrence Rose, a San Francisco ophthamologist, conducted independent tests in March 1968 on three rabbits. Two of them suffered corneal scarring and loss of eyelid hair plus second degree skin burns.
> Currently, the only protection from Mace is to smear petroleum jelly on the face with special attention to the eyes, nose or mouth, or to wear a motorcycle helmet with a plastic windshield covering the face.

That, I think, is the one point which the Attorney General has indicated he agrees with and it is that there is, quite likely, physical damage which can be done to a person's body by the use of Mace.

But the other point, I think, is even more important, and that is the intrusion on the integrity of a person's personality.

> There exists at least prima facie cause to ban Mace's use. Some police agencies are already having second thoughts about Mace and those in San Francisco, Los Angeles, Cincinnati and Washington, D.C., have voluntarily restricted or prohibited its use because it causes central nervous system depression and confusion at the time of arrest. It could conceivably be banned on the basis of depriving a citizen of his civil rights.

Mr. Chairman, it would be interesting to record those quotations from that recent article and I would ask the Attorney General if he would answer the three questions which I put at the beginning of my remarks.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the hon. member has seen fit to read that into the record. I hope it will receive wide publicity and I would add further that regarding the findings of the surgeon general in the United States in his public comments, as to the dangers of the use of Mace, one part helped me in my conclusions about it, and I think I would like to just say this further—that I noticed after I had made some remarks the other day in the House, and they were given publicity, that one or two police chiefs said, "I would rather use it than a gun."

But I think they missed the point. There were incidents of using it against drunks, an incident of using Mace against a student. The point is, you would not use a gun either; but to just say, take the examples, rather Mace than the gun, was a begging of the whole question really and I should like to take this occasion to point that out.

To answer the questions. Yes, we have discussed the use of Mace and its ramifications with the police commission since it came to our attention—in May actually—and the police commission does entirely agree with my point of view as I have expressed it here. We are preparing, and will have out, I trust, very shortly, a statement of those views.

I cannot call it a directive, perhaps it would not qualify under that heading, but it will be going out to police forces so that they will know our attitude without question. There was some question raised as to whether they knew our attitude and in the circumstances of our present legislation, that is the best we can do. I think I have dealt with our attitude towards legislation in these debates.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, there are two points regarding the Ontario police commission that I want to go on to. But let me, if I may, comment briefly on the point of debate for the last 10 or 15 minutes.

I would agree with the general thrust of the argument advanced by the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Downsview because, quite frankly, I think the position of the Attorney General at the moment has become untenable. Now whether he gets himself off the hook by a statement which is accepted as the equivalent of legislation, or whether in another instance a statutory change is required—that is a matter of means rather than of the end. What disturbs me is that in view of the Minister's very strongly expressed views last week with regard to Mace, and with regard to the evidence my colleague has just put on the record—and the Attorney General now backs up with reference to the sugeon general's comments—you had a situation such as emerged last Friday morning after the debate in the House here where the chief of police in London said, "We have every intention of continuing to use it until we get a directive from the Attorney General's office."

Now whether it comes from the Attorney General's office, or whether it comes from the Ontario police commission—which presumably is the overall body that gives directions to police forces, whether they have the force of a directive or not—is, perhaps, a point we have got to look into.

But whether it is from them or from the Attorney General's office, surely some action has got to be taken because the average layman reading this comment of the chief of police would find it a little difficult to interpret his comments as being anything other than somewhat defiant of the Attorney General. After all, the Attorney General has stated clearly what his view is and immediately, the next morning, the chief of police in London says, "Well we are going to continue to use it until we have some direction."

This is the untenable aspect of the Attorney General's position at the moment. Maybe he has commented on that by saying that in conjunction with the Ontario police commission, he is preparing a statement—it might be too strong to be described as a directive —but it will be some clear indication.

Now I go back to the wire tapping because I think the Attorney General's position is again untenable for the same reason. I was most intrigued to hear the Attorney General say that people would be naive if they believed that the police force have not been using wire tapping.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Police forces.

Mr. MacDonald: Police forces generally have not been using wire tapping. Well, I have said this before in the House and I will repeat it. I stated that the Toronto police force had been using wire tapping, and I stated it on the basis of an interview with a high official of that force some five or six years ago when the whole question of organized crime was of lively concern. And what happened: the first thing that happened was that Chief Mackey denied it.

I think we are in a pretty peculiar kind of situation when the Attorney General will get up and say anybody would be a bit naive not to realize that police forces are already using wire tapping when, if one makes that statement in the House as I did some years ago, it is immediately denied by the chief of police.

I think we are all hung up here and the only person who can get us off the hook once again is the Attorney General by clarifying what can be done under law. Otherwise it is done "illegally" and I do not think we can wait—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Not illegally.

Mr. MacDonald: I said illegally in quotes. I recognize the legal technicalities and I do not want to get back into them, as a layman. You lawyers have had your field day in analyzing them and, I think, under the circumstances, it was maybe useful that we got down to analyzing the legal technicalities and the fine points in it. But that everybody should be so apprehensive and that the Attorney General himself should say, for example, that wire tapping should not be done even by police forces, except under careful supervision, and having gotten permission from the courts, that he now should say that he is not going to do anything to make this a requirement and, therefore, they can continue to proceed with a free hand, is, it seems to me, a questionable kind of situation.

That, I think, is the untenable situation that the Attorney General is in at the moment and I think he can clarify it only by either a directive, as in the case of Mace, and if necessary, by a statutory amendment perhaps to The Police Act, as he is suggesting now with reference to wire tapping. Otherwise he is going to be in crossfire and, if I may say it in as kindly a way as possible, he has nobody to blame but himself.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member quite realizes that we have sought legislation, we have sought it in the proper place where it should come from. I know the hon. member had my statement; I know he listened very carefully when I was giving it to the House. I do not think I can say to the police, "Do not use this means of gathering intelligence," because my statement is clear: I think the police must have this, they must have it under supervision, and I do not think the province is the jurisdiction to legislate in this field where we are trying to control and define and direct police forces, law enforcement agencies, in the protection of the public, in the use of electronic devices to get intelligence.

I do not feel I am on a hook; I do not feel I am in a crossfire; if I am I will have to stand up and take it, but we have asked for legislation, we have urged it in conjunction with the other provinces, on the federal government. I do not think we are overly optimistic when I say I think we can anticipate some action soon; and I believe, as I pointed out before today, that this matter is not such a desperate situation as might appear from the fact that a lot of attention is focused on it at this particular moment by reason of the fact that certain activities of the police in this area came to light as the result of the enquiry which is now set up in connection with the magistrates. We will pursue it. I have undertaken that we could consider suggestions where the province might legislate. Mr. McRuer pointed out that a lot of it is outside the province's field and this is so apparent to me and a national law —a Dominion-wide law, a federal law, in a field which is under federal jurisdiction—is so desirable, and a provincial law would be quite ineffective in many ways. It might have some good effect, but it would be a piecemeal bit.

So I just want the hon. member to understand: We are pursuing this, we are concerned with it, we have been concerned with it, and I wish we could get action where the action should be.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let me say this:

(a) I agree that police forces should have the right to use wire tapping under the necessary safeguards;

(b) I agree that it can be handled best at the federal level.

All I am saying is that if there is going to be a year, a year and a half, or two years—which may well be before the federal government acts—I do not think it is impossible, as the Attorney General himself has intimated, that through an amendment to The Police Act you could cover it on an interm basis, a stop-gap basis for the province of Ontario—and quite rightly there is apprehension in the public mind—I think you would meet it until we get action from the federal level.

However, I do not want to belabour that point any further, Mr. Chairman. There are two other areas I would like to raise. One, with reference to the police commission. Periodically one reads editorials in newspapers or comments in the media, with regard to the controversial issue of police cars taking chase after somebody who has violated the law—often a rather inoffensive violation of the law. And the net result is a greater endangerment to life and the public safety in the police chase than was involved in the original violation of the law. I am wondering when we are going to come to grips with this, again through some sort of a directive that I would assume might come from the Ontario police commission. The House might be interested, Mr. Chairman, in a despatch datelined San Francisco on June 18 that was carried in the Toronto Daily Star in which it said this:

> More than 500 Americans were killed and 1,000 injured each year in auto accidents caused by policemen chasing suspects, a physicians' group charged yesterday. Only a small fraction of those involved are guilty of serious crimes, and many are innocent bystanders, or the policemen themselves, said representatives of the "physicians for automotive safety."

And then it goes on:

> The two physicians presented some admittedly crude statistics from a small survey on nation-wide press clippings over a three-month period. The results showed one of five pursuits end in death, seven of ten pursuits end in accidents, five of ten pursuits end in serious injuries, three of four pursuits are for minor offences, and in only one of 100 cases was there a presumption that a crime of violence had been committed.

Now, admittedly these are crude statistics. I am curious to know whether we have any comparable statistics, crude or otherwise, in the province of Ontario. But I think there is general agreement on the proposition that this is not a wise thing; and yet until police forces get directives, it seems to me that you are going to have a continuance of the practice, and repeated editorials deploring it, but meanwhile injuries and death needlessly for relatively minor crimes. Perhaps the Attorney General would like to comment, or should I go on to my next point?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I could comment on this, Mr. Chairman. We have a directive to the Ontario Provincial Police force on this matter which has been observed. We have not come to the point of issuing a directive through the police commission to local forces. Perhaps this is a very worthwhile thought, but whether it would be a directive or perhaps a strongly worded piece of advice that would express our views might be the way we could name it, because we cannot tell a local force how they should pursue their policing—at least under our present legislation. We can equip them, we can say they are ill equipped, we can direct them in certain things, but we cannot get down to the point of saying how they conduct themselves in certain police activities. But I note the suggestion and I shall discuss it with the police commission to see what we may be able to do.

Mr. MacDonald: I had one more point, if I may. Another commitment has arisen some ten minutes ago. Perhaps I can complete this and go to my other commitment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to raise again in a bit of detail this recurring problem of the absorption of small police forces by the OPP. I, and I think other members of the House, have been the recipient of documents prepared by members or officials of the municipal police association of Ontario, a body which I understand came into being a year or so ago, to cope with some of the problems in the piecemeal take-over of small police forces across the province of Ontario. I must say the more I read it, the more I think there are two aspects of it in which they have a very, very strong case. They point out, for example, that when the government moved in the take-over of the administration of justice, they took over all the existing civil servants involved at the local level and this involved clerks and people of various levels of training or lack of training.

But apparently there was no effort to winnow out those who did not happen to come up to civil service standards; they had been brought in; they had been absorbed in the take-over of the administration of justice. And they raised the question: Why, in the instance of police officers, and particularly police officers who have gone to the police college at Aylmer and who have passed the necessary examinations, should they be winnowed out with the argument that they do not meet the qualifications of the OPP?

The second point that they raise is in reference to the manner of the take-over, piecemeal, unplanned, the change in intention and timing as to the take-over of any specific force. They point out, for example, in one of their documents that a memorandum had gone out from the Ontario police commission some time ago in which it referred, in anticipation of this take-over, to the process of elimination. Let me quote this one paragraph. Incidentally, it was over the signature of R. P. Milligan, the chairman of the Ontario police commission. I quote:

> It is emphasized that this is still in the planning stage. Municipal police officers should have no fear that suddenly, one day, they will find their forces eliminated and themselves without a job; the process will be slow and gradual, and not before the municipal council, the chief of police, and the members of the force, have been consulted and a plan worked out for a smooth transfer of responsibilities to the OPP, and only after due regard to the lot of the municipal police officers. When a plan has been agreed upon, and only then, will elimination be considered and an effective date decided upon.

Just let me give to the House, Mr. Chairman, two or three examples which are provided in documents by this municipal police association. The first one happens to be a document that is signed by L. F. Straus, who is the chief of police at the present time in the Port Elgin police department. It is dated June 20, 1968. He points out that in October of 1965 he noticed an article in the London Free Press dealing with the proposed elimination of municipal police forces in Ontario.

> I had never been appraised of this intended action and so called Mr. R. P. Milligan, QC, chairman of the Ontario police commission, to enquire into this matter. I was advised that I had nothing to worry about, my employment was not in jeopardy; I was doing a good job here; to keep it up; and further that he had been misquoted.

He goes on to point out that with these words he felt that his present employment was not in jeopardy and so he remained. He was in Port Elgin at that time.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That was in 1965.

Mr. MacDonald: Right. I continue quoting:

> In June of 1967, I was a member of a group that went from this area to Toronto to speak with members of the Ontario police commission regarding this elimination. Other members of this group were from Wingham, Walkerton, Lucknow, Wiarton, and Kincardine. Also accompanying us was Mr. Roger West of Wingham, Ontario, Progressive Conservative candidate in the forthcoming provincial election. We spoke with Mr. R. P. Milligan, QC, and Magistrate T. J. Graham. We were told that a study was being made at this time into policing in Ontario, and was now taking place in No. 1 district of the Ontario Provincial Police and in northern Ontario.
> A study was to be made of the entire province and we were led to believe that no action would be taken in the elimination process until this was completed. On enquiring into our future employment, we were told that the majority of municipal policemen, who had a reasonable amount of police experience, would be absorbed by the Ontario Provincial Police. We left there feeling that if our forces were eliminated we would still have employment with the OPP; the prospect of having employment after this elimination is the main concern of the men who are about to be eliminated.

And then he goes on to point out that in his own instance he was married, with three children aged 13, 11 and 8.

> We expect a fourth child in September of this year; I have been involved in police work for over 21 years, and know nothing else.

In other words, here is a qualified person.

There is a second case, in the instance of Blind River. This is signed by John F. Kern —I think it is—ex-chief of police, town of Blind River. He points out that during a routine survey on February 12, 1968, all five members of the Blind River police force were interviewed by chief inspector G. E. Smith, OPP, planning branch, in company with J. S. MacLaren, advisor to the Ontario police commission. At this time, chief inspector Smith advised all members that any take-over would not take place before the end of 1968. On Monday, April 1, 1968, he goes on to point out that the chief of police was contacted by Mayor Venturi, the chairman of the board of police commissioners, who called him in and showed them a letter which had been received by the clerk of the town of Blind River from the Attorney General, the key paragraph of which was:

> I am able at this time to inform you that within my own department I have been able to arrange for the policing of the town of Blind River to be done by the Ontario government through the use of the Ontario police force. Will you be good enough to so inform His Worship Mayor Venturi, and the members of your town council.

Mr. Sopha: That is the former mayor who writes.

Mr. MacDonald: The letter. Right? And later in this document:

> In accordance with this information, please be notified and convey to your men the fact that the police commission of the town of Blind River will terminate its agreement with the town of Blind River's municipal police force on April 30, 1968.

In other words, in a matter of months they have assurance from the Ontario police commission that there was going to be no take-over before the end of the year; then the Attorney General enters the picture and indicates that there will be a take-over. And then suddenly these men who at least had some security of tenure in their job to the end of the year, have received notice as early as April 30, 1968 that they are out of their jobs.

So, first there is the failure to give assurance of absorption into the OPP even on the part of some who had training and long experience in the police force; and second, it is anything but an orderly take-over when timings are changed and given without notice to all of the people that are involved.

However, let me go on to one further example. This is signed by Patrice Veilleux, chief of police, in Hearst, dated June 14, 1968. I quote two paragraphs from his memorandum:

> From March 15, 1968, to May 31, 1968, a total of approximately 10 calls were placed with the Ontario police commission, and on each occasion we would be advised to call later and that they were unable to give us a definite answer. In May our town clerk called Mr. Eric Silk of the Ontario Provincial Police to see if he had any information as to when the Ontario Provincial Police would be taking over the policing of the town of Hearst. And after being advised that there were only three men left on the force, he would see that action would be taken soon to relieve the local force of their duty. He also enquired if the present men had already applied for the OPP, and if they were not interested that they could take over sooner, as they would have no interview with these men and that would make it easier.
> He also stated then that his department was not interested in taking any town police officer into his department as they were not qualified in many cases, and they just were not interested. What strikes me the most is that my men are all qualified, and have all completed courses at the Aylmer police college, and our lowest mark was 79.5 per cent, and our highest mark was 86 per cent, so why are they denied the right to keep up with their police career if they wish to do so?

Once again a refusal to accept men who have been trained, have experience, and are graduates of the police college; and second, no clarification as to exactly when the take-over is going to happen.

Another example: This one is signed by Robert Hamilton and is from Durham, Ontario, addressed to the chief of police in Southampton, who happens to be an official of the municipal association. This man points out that he had been a guard in the reform institutions from March, 1955, to June, 1956, at which time he made application for chief of police for the village of Dundalk, and he was accepted. In 1964, he was interviewed by a member of the Ontario police commission:

> I was informed by him that they were going to bring the standards of the municipal police personnel up to that of the Ontario Provincial Police, so was advised by him to go to the school at Aylmer police college and if I was qualified I would have nothing to worry about, there were big things in store for municipal policemen, but they would not disclose at that time what was coming. I was advised by them that if the governing body of the village was willing to send me to the school for 10 weeks, I was prepared to go. The member of the Ontario police commission approached my council and made arrangements for me to attend school, explaining to them at the time that they would benefit from my schooling.

Now, I just interject here for a moment. Here is an instance where it was suggested, prior to the announcement of the take-over of small police forces, that there were bigger things in store for muncipal police officers and that what would qualify them for involvement in these bigger things was to attend a police college and to be a graduate of it so that they would confirm their qualifications.

However, let me go on: He indicates in January, 1966, he went to the police college and successfully completed the course and returned to work for the municipality of Dundalk. Then I continue the quote from his memorandum:

> One year later, in February, 1967, I was informed by mail that effective one month from date, my job would terminate due to the take-over by the Ontario Provincial Police, effective May 1, 1967. Apparently, the agreement I had signed with the council was not valid as its contents were broken.
> The OPP take-over was never discussed with myself or any member of my committee. I was also advised later that we were to be interviewed by personnel from the Ontario police commission and the Ontario Provincial Police but to date I have never been approached by either for such an interview.
> When my position in the village of Dundalk terminated, I found it difficult to find any type of employment due to the time of year, age, and a number of obligations. As a married man with six of a family, all still in school, this period of unemployment was a frightening experience and set me back financially. I am still trying to meet commitments caused by this and to my way of thinking it seems deplorable when a man has conscientiously worked long hours for a period of 10 years, that a situation such as this could arise, and will continue to do so in many municipal departments where there are less than 10 men, unless the powers to be are made aware of the situation and are prepared to do something about it.

Well, enough from that one memorandum, I think, to make the point.

One final one signed by S. Stark, formerly of the town police, Thessalon, present chief of police in Southampton. He points out that in the summer of 1966:

I journeyed to Toronto where I entered the office of the Ontario police commission and spoke to Mr. R. P. Milligan. I produced the newspaper clipping indicating the proposed take-over and asked Mr. Milligan what the score was and asked that I be given a straight answer. Quoting from memory, Mr. Milligan stated, "Oh, I wouldn't be too concerned if I were you. Actually we do intend to eventually eliminate the one-man department, but it's a long time away. When you go home, write me a letter stating your qualifications, such as your marks at Aylmer, and so on, and we will keep it on file and we will be able to let you know of any job openings when they come up."

In the fall of 1966, I met Mr. A. A. Wishart, Attorney General, on the street in Thessalon. I produced the newspaper clipping and asked him how long it would be before I was eliminated. He stated and I quote from memory, "Oh, I wouldn't be too concerned, we do intend to eventually eliminate the one-man forces but it is a long time away. Here in Thessalon we have no intention of taking over, we would rather have the OPP help you when you need help than to have the OPP take over."

In January, 1967—

That is just three or four months later.

—Mr. J. F. McLean, advisor of the Ontario police commission visited me in Thessalon. At that time he told me, "You are on a one-way street. If you intend to stay in police work you had better consider looking for another job." I asked Mr. McLean how long it would be before the OPP would take over and he stated that he didn't know.

In March of 1967—

Again three months later.

—I sat down with the town council to negotiate a working agreement for the year 1967. At that time I was informed that the town wouldn't be having a police force after April 1, 1967, and they produced a letter from the Attorney General offering the town free OPP policing, provided they disband their own police department and at the same time suggested they retain their present man as a bylaw officer. I then went out on my own and got another policing job in eastern Ontario.

Later in his memorandum:

Before leaving Thessalon, I telephoned the OPP recruiting officer in Toronto and asked if I could join the OPP. I was asked my age and education and upon replying that I was 40 years old with grade 8 and had completed the general police training A course at Aylmer with marks of 84 per cent, I was informed that I was not eligible for the OPP because of age and education. In May, 1967, I obtained the brief which was put out by the Ontario police commission regarding policing smaller municipalities.

In this brief I noticed that The Police Act had been amended so that men who were eliminated could be accepted into the OPP. I then telephoned the Ontario police commission in Toronto to see if I could still get into the OPP as my family was still in Thessalon. I own my home and the Thessalon detachment of the OPP was expanding due to the Ontario Hydro project which was just starting up. At this time, I spoke to Mr. McLaren of the commission and when I asked about this opportunity which I thought was open to me, McLaren did not know what I was talking about or what brief I was referring to. Mr. McLaren said he would check into it and let me know. I am still waiting. This is my experience up to date regarding the elimination of small police departments. It is my own personal opinion that if a man has been to Aylmer and successfully completed his police training, he should be taken into the OPP when the time comes for his elimination.

Now, that is enough, perhaps, to document a situation about which I had the impression —perhaps wrongly—that the Attorney General was tending to dismiss in his comments up until now. I think there are two or three points: One, as they state here, why is it not possible, particularly when you have officers who have training and are graduates of police colleges, to have them taken into the OPP, perhaps to take the same kind of approach as you have taken in the general take-over of the administration of justice where the local civil servants, if I may describe them as such, were taken in, whatever be their qualifications, if they had been doing the job up until then they were taken in, instead of being dismissed into a state of unemployment in an inhuman way.

Second, this business of a planned take-over, but with changes in the plan, people involved not knowing when it was going to take place. Indeed, as the process is going on, there is still a great necessity, and there would be great value in the Attorney General making a statement of policy, so that the small police forces, that ultimately are going to be taken over, will know exactly where they stand and the personnel involved will have some opportunity of being able to plan their personal programme.

I would solicit from the Attorney General some comments as to what can and should be done in these instances, but perhaps with specific reference to this business of the take-in to the OPP of police officers who have lost their jobs. It has been suggested in one of these documents that fewer than 1 per cent had actually been taken in.

Now, is that really the case? And if it is really the case, is there not something that comes pretty close to breach of faith? When one looks back to that directive over the signature of the chief of the Ontario police commission, back on December 31, 1966, where, as I quoted earlier, in the comments on the process of elimination, two things were assured—one, that the process would be and orderly one with a smooth transfer of responsibility and, secondly, that there would be an opportunity for jobs for the people involved to be taken into the OPP.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to comment. First of all, in taking over the police forces, starting with the one man force and moving to the two and three man force, and the most we have ever contemplated, the five man force, in that, it was a piecemeal programme because in some instances, the municipalities were not ready to accept that invitation, which was a purely voluntary invitation, nobody was forced to disband the local force. The offer was made and there was a suggestion that it should be a smooth transition, and we hoped it would be, in that it would not be sudden. It was piecemeal because it was, first of all, necessary to recruit and make sure that the Ontario Provincial Police force had the personnel and the facility to take over the policing responsibilities there.

It was not like the administration of justice because the requirements of a person to become a member of such a force as the Ontario Provincial Police are much more onerous—

Mr. MacDonald: What about graduates of Aylmer college?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I am sure that the hon. member will understand that in a force such as the Ontario Provincial Police, the course at the Ontario police college does not necessarily fit a man for the requirements of the provincial police force. Many could not qualify because of age, health, and background. I think that it has to be recognized that it is not the same as a clerk in an office carrying on the same duty from day to day. The requirements are more strenuous and more onerous, certainly in the police force, so that the same consideration did not and do not apply.

Another thing about the provincial police force which could, perhaps, be modified, and I know that we have discussed this at length with the police commissioner, is that the provincial police force is a deployed or mobile force, and men are subject to sudden transfer. To bring in men who have special privileges, such as men who are assured that they will not ever have to move, is one of the things that can downgrade and help to destroy the morale of a force.

Mr. MacDonald: That was a general stipulation.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This gentleman from Thessalon, whose letter, incidentally, I have and which I investigated and which is not correct in all its statements, said that one of the things that he wanted was to remain in Thessalon because his family was there. Now, if you bring the local man in and let him stay there, and say to the other recruit on the force, "You must be ready to move at a moment's notice anywhere," it can affect the morale of your force very seriously.

These are some of the considerations. Now, let me say this. I have said that only on the request of the municipality will we move in and take over the responsibility for policing. Blind River, I think, was perhaps a special case, but the same thing applied. They did request, in fact, urgently. This was a five-man force, and some months ago Blind River, the mayor and council became aware that the one industry was going to phase out and it would be done at the end of this year. This is the one industry and the police budget is something approximating $55,000. They came to us urging not only action in this area, but from the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough), and the Minister of Tourism and Information (Mr. Auld), and The Department of Highways, and The Department of Trade and Development to seek any assistance they could get to direct industry to them, and to encourage highway activity and tourist activity, and one of the things that they particularly brought to my attention was: "Can you lift the burden of policing from our shoulders, which our people are just not going to be able to support?"

We considered it sympathetically and the mayor said that there would be no problem —and he would confirm this, with their men because they could get employment in the mines which are booming there now, and in the other industries outside the town. We gave as much notice as possible and in one of the letters, which the hon. member read, indicated that the provincial police, in one of those cases, "could move in sooner if there is no interest in coming to our force, but we will interview you". This is the approach. They do interview. I do not have before me statistics as to how many have been taken into the Ontario Provincial Police force, but perhaps I can get them before my estimates are concluded, but I think that you will understand the considerations that apply. I have a note that the Ontario chiefs of police have received two complaints altogether in the whole programme since the time that it began, and the police association of Ontario has received none. Now, I have received some of the letters that the hon. member read, and I would ask him if he would be good enough to let me have those, or the details, and I will investigate each and every one of them.

I know that this is the gentleman, Mr. Stark, the one man force at Thessalon, and I am told by the council—and I have the material in my file—that he resigned when they said, "You can continue as our bylaw enforcement officer." And he said, "No, I am going to another job." And he went and became a policeman in another municipal force. This was open to a good many men, and the training that they were offered in the police college should be an assistance toward that.

But they cannot all qualify for the OPP, and I wonder if I could have a helpful suggestion; I wonder if we are to say, "We will assume the policing in the municipality, for the good and sufficient reasons that we offer, good and sufficient police protection, relief from monetary responsibility and so on, are we to say, "Only when you have located your force in other jobs"? I do not think we can be expected to say, "We will, as a part of that take-over, find situations for your men". I know the situation in Blind River, and I recited it in the House two or three weeks ago. Three of those men at that time had secured employment, but one, I was told, was very reluctant to take any kind of employment, and one, for reasons of health was not employable at that time. These are all special situations, but I will get the figure as to how many the provincial police force was able to absorb.

Mr. MacDonald: I thank the Attorney General for getting that figure some time later, if not during these estimates. However, with respect to this, I find the Attorney General's reaction as unsatisfactory as I have found his earlier reaction in specific cases that have been brought up. Just let me read again the memorandum that was brought out to the police forces over the signature of Mr. Milligan. Now, in the light of the evidence that I have put on the record—and I will not take the time of the House to go back and review it—just listen to this:

> It is emphasized that this take-over is still in the planning stage, this is a process of elimination. Municipal police officers should have no fear that suddenly one day they will find their forces eliminated and themselves without a job.

Now, let me interject there. I put two or three cases on where they were told that there would be no take-over before the end of 1968, and in April 1968, they got a notice that they were out of work.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: When was that letter written?

Mr. MacDonald: This was a memorandum that went out, my colleague says that it was on May 19, 1967, but I find it a little difficult because there are quotes within quotes within quotes, and I cannot be certain of the date, but in any case, it was at an earlier stage.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: It is not too important, if I might be allowed to interrupt, but it was the introduction of a sort of long-range plan and I think that part of the intent that was expressed there was that "we are moving to it, but it is going to be a little while before we get to it in respect to the individual—"

Mr. MacDonald: Let me make some points clear. The police officers reiterate time and again that they do not object to what you seek to do. They agree that the take-over of the small forces is going to result in more efficient law enforcement in the province and they do not object to that. What they are objecting to is the lack of a smooth take-over.

As Mr. Milligan's memorandum stated:

> The process will be slow and gradual, and not before the municipal council, the chief of police and the members of the force have been consulted and a plan worked out for a smooth transfer of responsibilities to the OPP, and only after due regard for the lot of the municipal police officers.

When you are told in January there is going to be no take-over until the end of the year, and you get a notice on April 30 that your job is gone, that is a far cry from the assurances of Mr. Milligan in that memorandum.

Therefore, it seems to me that there is not adequate communication, and while the Minister is absolutely correct when he states that this is voluntary, it is a particular kind of voluntariness, because if the Minister writes under any particular circumstances and says, "We are now ready", or anybody else writes and says, "We are now ready to take over," it would be a foolish municipality that is not going to say very quickly by return mail, "Take it over and relieve us of the cost."

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh no, Mr. Chairman, that letter, and any letter, went out only after request, so that in that sense it was not voluntary. We did not write and say, "Now we are ready to take you over, come on in." They wrote and requested. The first invitation, the first promulgation of this programme was, "We are prepared to do this," before any request, perhaps before many requests were received. But Blind River, for instance, was an urgent request. First Cochrane, Keewatin, all urged us, "Come in and take over." Now, I think it is fair to say that perhaps, while we accept a certain responsibility to do our best, there is a primary responsibility surely on that town council which says, "Come in an relieve us of this, we need you."

Surely the employer there has a more primary responsibility, and the government can accept to employ these former employees. We would like to help, but we cannot wait forever till we can place them—and I do not know if we have a complete responsibility to replace all these policemen. I would hope that the municipalities—and we encourage this—urge them to look after their men, but I think the primary responsibility is there. We could say to them, "all right". I suppose you could formulate a policy and say, "All right, we will take over the policing when you have got jobs for every man you have got, your two or three men, whatever they are." That would be one way of approaching it, but I do not know whether that is the proper way or not.

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, let me try to wrap this up with a specific suggestion. Is it not possible for the police commission to indicate what forces are going to be taken over in any given year, so that all concerned will know months in advance, a year in advance, instead of having snap decisions taken over a period of a few weeks or a few months, so that the whole picture changes after there have been verbal assurances, not only that their job was not in jeopardy, but also a lot of verbal assurances, according to those briefs, that they would have a job available for them in the OPP?

Well there are an awful lot of people who are living under a misapprehension, and the feeling that as they were graduates of the police college at Aylmer they were entitled to be able to get a job in the OPP. Let me dwell on this point for a moment.

The Attorney General said there are age qualifications. Sure there are age qualifications, but is it an age qualification as though you were taking a new recruit into the OPP? Or is it the take-over of a group of people following the absorption of the small police force so that you fit them in what might be called "successor obligations"? We hear of successor rights and successor obligations when one company takes over another.

I think the OPP has a certain successor obligation, particularly when you have got men who have 12 or 15 years' experience and who are graduates of the police college. Frankly, I find it a little difficult to find how so many of these people now find that they cannot get into the OPP. They must have been awfully poor officers, and we have been tolerating a situation that should not have been tolerated for a long time.

Mr. MacDonald: Just a minute, if you send a man to the Aylmer college and he comes back with 86 per cent, then the Alymer police college was engaged in a pretty strange sort of game.

Mr. Sopha: Well, maybe even you and I could get 86 per cent. That is meaningful.

Mr. MacDonald: Speak for yourself.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. MacDonald: In a force the size of the OPP? I will not pursue the argument. I would like to find out how many have been taken into the OPP because it has been suggested in one instance only 1 per cent. Now, if that is anywhere the case, that only 1 per cent have been taken over, then I think that there has been a pretty serious breach of faith on the part of the OPP, quite apart from the methods involved, in this rather disorderly, rather than orderly, take-over.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, could I say a word on this? I want to allege, and I am going to submit some evidence to support the allegations, that one of the chief causes of the difficulty in which the Attorney General now finds himself—or perhaps more correctly, the Ontario Provincial Police, or the police commission, find themselves—is because of the vacillation of the department in respect of this policy of eliminating smaller forces.

Now I say especially to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Jessiman), who often chides us for taking up the time of the House, that in this realm, our policy over here has been very consistent over the years. We have advocated the elimination of the small forces, and the policing of great reaches of the province outside the urban and metropolitan areas by the Ontario Provincial Police, and that attitude we take no credit for. It was reflected a few years ago—as my friend from Downsview will remember—in an encomium prepared by someone in the police commission.

Now, if memory serves me correctly, I believe it was Judge Macdonald who prepared a memorandum and said in it that a police force under 10 members was not justified in its existence. Now we have been saying that, as I say, for a number of years, and whereas we do not want to attract credit for taking that stand particularly, it is fair to point out to you, and remind you, Mr. Chairman, of the consistency that we have had in the approach. Now let us dwell on Blind River.

Part of the difficulty there is in respect of the vacillation that I spoke of a moment ago in regard to the policing of that town. A number of years ago, perhaps 10 years ago, it might have been longer, it might have been a little shorter. For some reason I have been trying to surround my memory to tell me what the reason was, but I cannot come up with it. For some reason, the policing of that municipality broke down, and there was a dislocation whereas the Ontario Provincial Police did not take over the policing of Blind River—a corporal, I remember his name, he is a very good friend of mine, to all intents and purposes became the chief of police of Blind River, and he was chief of police of Blind River for a number of years, whilst still being attached to the Ontario Provincial Police. There was, as far as I know, no agreement whereby the Ontario Provincial Police would actually take over the policing of the town.

Now a few years ago, perhaps that is five or six years, it might be a little bit shorter —one, of course, does not keep records of this, but relies upon memory—that arrangement ended, and the town went back to the classical system of hiring their own police force, their own police chief. Why are they going back? I do not know why the Ontario Provincial Police did not continue that system right along. But they went back to the old system, and now five or six years later there is more vacillation and now the Attorney General enters into an agreement with the town of Blind River for the policing of it by the Ontario Provincial Police.

Well, we have no way over here of knowing why that is, but it gives rise soundly to the description of that conduct as being vacillation. They both want to fish and cut bait at the same time, and we are saying, and we have always said, that let us have a policy whereby all the smaller police forces will gradually disappear. I cite again the example of that municipality down in the Niagara peninsula where they had six police forces in an area of 10 square miles.

Turn to my own community and one sees again a reflection of that policy of vacillation. At times, the provincial police have said to the valley municipalities, "We will take charge of the police," and they have carried it out. They have policed Highway 69 to the north and what was formerly the riding of my friend from Nickel Belt is now in the riding of Sudbury East. They policed all those municipalities up that highway and then along came a time, four or five years ago, when that was not satisfactory to them and they required those municipalities to establish a police force. One sees how ridiculous that is when the establishment of a police force—

Mr. G. Demers (Nickel Belt): That is not entirely true.

Mr. Sopha: Well, I am going to tell you how true it is, now that you invite me. I will put the facts in the record. Five or six years ago, they said to the municipality of Blezard—that is the one north of Sudbury—"You establish your own police force." And who did they get as chief of police? You would be interested to know that he was one of the chief figures that was involved in the so-called scandal involving Pacifique Plante in Montreal. A man who went down with Pacifique Plante and was dismissed from the Montreal police force and he became the chief of police of Blezard township. Now that it is how true it is, and his chief lieutenant on the force was his son. So it was a very happy relationship. They had a family affair in policing the municipality of Blezard. So that situation went on. They might have had one other constable in there. I do not recall anybody except chief Hachey and his son, formerly of Montreal and then along came the provincial police two or three years ago and they said to the township of Blezard —township of Hanmer, all right we will take it over again, and that is the situation today. They now police the—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Sopha: Is something bothering you?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes, very much. Mr. Chairman, it is not bothering me a great deal, but I thought we were on vote 210, the Ontario police commission. The remarks of the hon. member for the last five minutes—and I am not objecting to them—have certainly been on the Ontario Provincial Police and that is the next vote.

Mr. Sopha: This is, of course, hogwash—being bothered with that type of interjection.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I like to abide by the rules myself. If we are on provincial police let us say we are discussing that as well; at this time that is all I want to know. They want to go through this all again. The vote 211 is Ontario Provincial Police and I think what the hon. member is talking about in the Ontario Provincial Police. If he would like to discuss that under this vote at the same time, that is quite in order, Mr. Chairman, but let us be clear about it.

Mr. Chairman: Do we have anything further on vote 210?

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, I have not finished. I thought he was asking you for a ruling. He got up like Leslie Frost used to do, the old fox, and it is the first time we have seen a development of that technique. I have noticed it throughout his estimates; somebody is making a speech and he gets up and wants to make one right along with the speaker.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): We learned that from you.

Mr. Sopha: You sat in the House when Frost was here and you recall Frost used to do that all the time.

Mr. Chairman: The member has been speaking on vote 211.

Mr. Sopha: The Minister sits and listens to me for ten minutes and when I am almost finished he gets up and makes the silly interjection.

Mr. Chairman: You must decide whether you are through with vote 210 or not. Now if you want to talk about the Ontario Provincial Police it will come under vote 211.

Mr. Sopha: I was under the impression, perhaps I will be corrected if I am wrong, that these agreements for policing in the province are made by the police commissioner.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, could I clarify that for the hon. member? When he spoke of Blind River, he said there had been vacillation—

Mr. Sopha: Sure. I demonstrated it with evidence.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —vacillation from this hon. member's remarks. According to the hon. member for York South, we delay; no, we went too fast.

Mr. Sopha: On a point of order. I asked him at this point if I was not correct that these agreements for policing are made by the Ontario police commission. That is vote 210. If the answer is in the affirmative I contend to you I am in order. It is as simple as that. The one thing I do no want to invite is a speech from the Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member has a good point of order, Mr. Chairman. I will answer him. I was coming to it, actually. He spoke of an agreement with the town of Blind River. There is no agreement; that is, there is no written agreement. The OPP just assume it and there is no obligation on the town. There is nothing, except that the OPP move in.

Now there are a few municipalities in Ontario where there was a written agreement to supply the services of one or two officers at a certain salary or a recognized, agreed upon figure. And if the hon. member is interested I could tell him that in all those municipalities around about Sudbury, so far as I am aware, there is no agreement. It was simply a moving in, an understanding that we would relieve them of that responsibility. Just in the same way that we have not written any agreement with the municipality when we took over the administration of justice. We did not sit down and write an agreement; we assumed it, took it over.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, if I recall the legislation, the power is vested in the Ontario police commission to determine whether policing in any part of Ontario is unsatisfactory and if they so desire then they may take the appropriate steps. I am sure the commissioner of the provincial police, as my friend from Downsview has just suggested to me in an aside, does not decide. He does not decide where the provincial police should move in. That decision is made by the Ontario police commission—vote 210.

An hon. member: That is right.

Mr. Sopha: If the Attorney General wants to share the criticism then I am completely willing to say that the Ontario police commission must bear part of the criticism also; those who work under him and fail to take sufficiently forthright action to move into these areas.

I know it is hot and the Attorney General is ultra-sensitive today but he will soon be finished with his estimates and I am sure he will return to his pragmatic state.

The only other thing I wanted to say is I thoroughly disagree with the member for York South. He has developed to a high art this matter of bringing letters of complaint from individuals who contend that they are hard done by as a result of change in government policy and that is what happened here. But I want to say this, and I mean no disrespect or discourtesy or criticism of these very fine policemen who have been dislocated by the actions of the provincial police commission coming into the area, but my experience of the provincial police tells me that one of the great virtues of the force is the fact that they take young men who have heretofore not been connected with police work in any way and they train them in their own system.

And I would hesitate to see the standards or the method of doing things in any way diluted or changed by the provincial police inducting into the force persons who, notwithstanding their many years of valuable police experience, do not fit the qualifications of a new recruit to that force. One can have the greatest sympathy with them, but I would have to say as a matter of principle that I would be willing to completely rely upon the judgment of the commissioner of the provincial police and those who assist him in this regard in selecting suitable candidates from those dislocated. And I do not want to go any farther than that.

Finally, to return to the major theme upon which I rose to speak, and that is, I can only plead with the Attorney General that this policy of taking over the policing of the smaller areas of the province by the provincial police force proceed with an even greater speed, certainly not beyond a period of two or three years at the most, and we see the elimination of these small forces in our province. And that the wide resources of the provincial police in their scientific, technological, motorized and every other characteristic that is an asset, be used to provide the police services to our people.

I say that in the consciousness of my experience of the provincial police and the enthusiasm that it generates in one when one sees what a fine force it is, and how efficiently it operates with a maximum of courtesy, humanity.

I will tell you something about my experience, just to put it on the record. In no case in over 15 years did I ever encounter an example of brutality toward a citizen by a member of the provincial police. I am saddened to say on the other side of the ledger that in many cases, too numerous to remember, unfortunately, did I encounter it with municipal forces. But I like the aspect of that clean, white sheet of the provincial police; it is not marred by an example of anything untoward or unseemly or shoddy in respect of them carrying out their function.

Having said that, I inform the Attorney General through you, that it is all I want to say about policing and if he will bear with us with a little patience, there are a couple of other matters in respect of provincial police that I want to raise when that vote—

Mr. White: Mr. Chairman, on this point, I will not be a minute. I quite agree that the Attorney General's policy is very appropriate, that these smaller forces should be replaced by the larger and more effective force, and I think the method chosen is very appropriate, too. My mind goes back now to an experience that I had a few years ago when a constable of the London township police was injured and lost a leg in an accident while on duty. That man gained employment as a radio telegrapher or some such position with the OPP. There are a number of civilian occupations connected with the Ontario Provincial Police force, it would seem, and these displaced small-town constables, it seems to me, might very easily be fitted into the civilian force. Their age, experience and education do not make them suitable recruits for the police force per se, but it does seem to me we might make a special effort to accommodate them on the civilian auxiliary side of the OPP and I extend this suggestion to the Attorney General for his consideration.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I wanted to advert for a moment to our previous discussion about the use of Mace and wire tapping. We lawyers often overlook the obvious. We finally got the Attorney General to say that he might consider bringing in legislation. It occurred to me, Mr. Chairman, as that discussion was going on, that perhaps we have some power now. And I looked at section 62 of The Police Act and also at section 39(b) and it is my thought that we have the power now; the Attorney General could now, today, tomorrow, with his colleagues in the Cabinet, take whatever steps he thought were necessary insofar as controlling the police in their use of Mace or their use of eavesdropping equipment is concerned. Now, section 62, subsection 1 of The Police Act says this:

> The Lieutenant-Governor in council may make regulations,
> (a) for the government of police forces in governing the conduct, duties, suspension and dismissal of members of police forces.

It would seem to me that if the Lieutenant-Governor in council—who in this case, I would think, would act on the advice of the Attorney General—can make regulations for the conduct and duties of members of police forces in Ontario, all we need is not a complicated new statute, all we need is a simple regulation passed under section 62(1)(a) of The Police Act. Then I looked at some of the provisions that relate to the police commission, and while they are not quite as broad as this:

> It shall be the function of the commission—and I am reading now from section 39(b) of The Police Act:

> —to consult with and advise boards of commissioners of police, police committees of municipal councils and other police authorities and chiefs of police on all matters relating to police and policing.

When you relate all that, Mr. Chairman, to what the chief of police of the city of London said the other night—he said, in effect, in the newspapers and on television that he was just waiting; he was going to carry on the way he was until the Attorney General directed him to do otherwise.

Now, the Attorney General has the power here and he needs nothing more than the power he already has in section 62(1)(a) of The Police Act to convince his Cabinet colleagues to pass the necessary orders in council, and he certainly does not even need to do that if he wants to act under 39(b). All he has to do is to tell his friends in the police commission to go out and tell the commissioners of police, police committees and other police authorities and chiefs of police what they should do about matters relating to the police and policing. So I think we have really made a mountain out of a molehill. We relied on the Attorney General's earlier statement to my hon. leader when he said, "I really have no authority to do it." And I think the Attorney General successfully for a time dragged a red herring across the whole trail. He has the power, his colleagues have the power and they can act now without even bringing a statute to the floor of the House if they want to.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The hon. member would be the first one to object if I, under the language of section 62(1)(a) in regulation, where it says "The Lieutenant-Governor in council may make regulations (a) for the government of police forces in governing the conduct, duties, suspension and dismissal—" Now, anyone, surely, reading that, would take from it the meaning that it is the personal conduct—

Mr. Singer: Pettifogging again—if you do not want to act, do not, but you have the immediate power to do so if you want.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I like to act in a proper manner and I am sure that a regulation that says—a regulation in the Act, mind you, not a statutory direction, but a regulation—that says the Lieutenant-Governor may pass a regulation governing the conduct, duty, suspension and dismissal—now, reading that together, surely does not lead the hon. member to think that that goes down to the point of saying, you can use this—

Mr. Singer: It certainly does.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Oh, I do not think it does. Well, I must just respectfully disagree. And I am not dragging a red herring; if there is any red herring it is coming from the hon. member; he is trying to say that gives power. And 39(b)—"the function of the commission shall be to consult and advise"—now that is the very thing that I indicated in the House, today, we are doing; we were going to advise but that is as far as our power goes, to advise. So we are making use of that power, and that is the only power I suggest we have at the moment. I cannot accept the suggestion that the language of that regulation applying to duties, suspension, the conduct, in that context applies at all to the use of such things as Mace, or the practice of wire tapping with electronic devices. I just have to say I cannot accept that; that is not the way I interpret the language; and—

Mr. Singer: How do you interpret that section? What does it mean?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is really related to the code of offences which follows the disciplinary code for police.

Mr. Singer: Surely you can make it an offence to wire tap unless the police commission gives it its approval—unless there is a chain of command, unless there is permission, and so on—surely you can create that kind of an offence?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, you would be stretching language, and as I say, I am sure if I had done that the hon. member for Downsview would have been the first to object.

Mr. Singer: Well, Mr. Chairman, if the Attorney General says he is sure that I would have been the first to object, let him show me on the record one instance where either I or any of my colleagues have brought before this House, a complaint against the Attorney General for improperly passing regulations when he has the statutory power of recommending regulations and where he has the statutory power so to do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since the Attorney General wants again to quibble about the meaning of words, let us get all the quibble again on the record. He says: "I abhor these practices; I think something should be done. It would be better if it was done in Ottawa so we are going to wait until Ottawa eventually does it, but I will think"—and he only gets around to the third stage—"I will think about recommending to my colleagues that we have new legislation."

And then, finally, when we show him, I think, the reasonable power that he presently has, he says: "Really, that does not seem to be right and proper." It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that an eager Attorney General, who wanted to bring the kind of controls that he has talked about to this House this afternoon could do it; he has the available tools. The only conclusion we can come to is that really he is not very anxious to do it.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw to the attention of the Attorney General, two specific cases with regard to the take-over of policing duties —in particular, Nipigon and Geraldton. Now I understand that Geraldton has been negotiating with your department since early in February and I interceded on behalf of the people of Nipigon as early as April 14. According to your letter here, you state that: "Within the next few weeks, I expect to be able to advise you whether or not we will be in a position to give your request consideration. When the policy has finally been decided, I will so inform you." Now, there has been a survey taken with regard to the policing of all municipalities in northern Ontario, and I was wondering if the Attorney General is in a position to say what the policy of the Ontario police commission will be, particularly for the town of Geraldton and the town of Nipigon.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I first, Mr. Chairman, thank the member for Sudbury for the compliments he paid the provincial police force? I am sure that it is merited and I appreciate his being kind enough to give credit where I think credit is truly due. While

I am speaking, perhaps I could deal with one other point—he said, "Move with greater alacrity." The only thing that delays us, really, is funds and the training of personnel.

I think one will appreciate it takes time to train additional personnel and to recruit a proper force, with proper training, and to have gentlemen of this House vote larger sums to finance the operations of the provincial police force. But I appreciate the remarks he made very much. Now, the hon. member for Thunder Bay, I am wondering if I am between two fires here, his leader says, "Do not be so fast because you have got to take care of the chaps on the force." What am I going to do with Nipigon? Am I to wait until they have all got a job? Am I to ask the local municipality to get them jobs, assuming that the provincial police cannot locate them? This is one of the considerations, quite frankly—

Mr. Stokes: They are doing it now!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: —that delays us in moving into some of these take-overs. The other, and you ask for the policy of the commission, is exactly as I have expressed it in the general policy—it is a matter of consulting with the police commission and with the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police, and we usually consult in concert together, to ascertain that the provincial police force has adequate number of personnel, and that there is a facility there, or a detachment near, or some accommodation for chaps who will have to come in and take that responsibility on.

Now, I have not got the detail of these two municipalities before me at the moment but, generally, the policy of the commission is that we move, giving reasonable notice if we can, and your leader seems to think that we are too quick on the draw, if I may put it that way, because it leaves somebody out of a job. I am just as sympathetic as he is.

But the policy is to move to the small forces, and take that responsibility away from the municipality on request, and only on request, as quickly as we are equipped with personnel and with the accommodation. Now, that is the policy but, as I said before, I would be glad to have suggestions as to what do we do with the men that are there now on the force?

Mr. Stokes: Well, these are two cases that I have brought to your attention where they have asked you specifically to take it over and have been doing for the last six months.

The OPP is actually policing the town at the present time. And all I want is for you to take over, to perpetuate what you are doing, but to take over the cost of policing the towns. They equate the situation at Nipigon with the one that you referred to earler—at Keewatin—where they lost their only industry and where they were having a tough time paying for the cost of it. I submit to you, through the Chairman, that Nipigon is in the same predicament. They have lost their only industry with the closing of the plywood mill; the welfare payments in the town have tripled as a result of it; and I have brought this all out in a letter that I sent to you quite some time ago.

As I say, we are not complaining that you are doing it too fast—it is just the reverse; the OPP is already in there. The reeve and the town councils have been asking you for some four or five months to state your policy on it. And I do not think you can equate this specific instance with what my leader has said with regard to Blind River and other instances that he brought to your attention. I do not think that they are comparable at all.

Mr. Lawlor: Mr. Chairman, this is my first opportunity to jump into this part of the debate, and I would ask for a ruling from the chair before going on any further—namely, that the two votes, 210 and 211, be taken together. We started out, Mr. Chairman, if you will remember, talking about wire tapping and eavesdropping and so on, and we have gradually got over onto the other area. These are overlapping areas. If I look at the Ontario police commission report for the end of the year, and then contrast it with the report of the Ontario Provincial Police, they cover the same topics. I wonder if the Attorney General would permit that, and I could get whatever I have to say out of the way because I find the whole thing all tied together.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would be most agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lawlor: That being the case, I am vastly amused, Mr. Chairman, by the comments made by the hon. member for Downsview; to construe 39B (b) in terms which read: "To consult with and advise," into imperative, mandatory or directive wording, giving the Attorney General the power to tell the police what to do, seems to be stretching the thing somewhat slightly. What I want to refer to is the overall policing in this province—the role of the police, the job that might be done, and the job that is actually being done at the present time. Before launching into that, perhaps I might make mention of two other facts arising out of the wire tapping debate.

Number one, I would like to join with the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon) who made, the other day, some remarks as to the role of police commissions themselves. When police commissions are self-perpetuating, appointed bodies in which only one individual —and that is not too often the mayor—comes on to the board as new blood, operating, and the body has ossified and gone into sedimentation over a period of years, and no longer thinks in contemporary terms at all, when you have got this kind of beast or entity to deal with, then you can hardly expect to have very much democratic control. And you could expect to have a good deal of autocratic obtuseness operating within the area of police commissions. In other words, if as a gesture towards bringing some control over the use of wire tapping devices, through the expansion of police commissions, say to 12 individuals in Metropolitan Toronto, comprising a number of citizens who have no necessary legal training—but simply intelligent people who can give directives and who know how, who are interested in how these things operate—that sort of thing might be a move to bring about a modification of the situation, touching wire tapping itself, which would be perfectly within your power and would not require all kinds of legalistic gymnastics to achieve.

Apart from that, there is one other small point which we have not talked about and which would be interesting, and will, no doubt, be of importance when we come to legislation. That obviously only a certain range of crimes, only certain types of crimes ought to be covered. We were talking about crime syndicates. Obviously wire tapping in connection with crime syndicates would have to cover a vast range of issues, whatever type of conversation happened to go on. But in respect to single isolated acts of a criminal nature, then, of course, we will have to segment out those acts which we think are sufficiently felonious over against the misdemeanours that would be warranted. And to set out that field in itself could cause prolonged debate. Therefore I drop the matter right here.

Going to the role of police in this province, in between Christmas and the New Year of this past year, the Globe and Mail had a front-page article about a conference that took place at the American association for the advancement of science, in which three or four men made speeches touching the role of the police in contemporary society. Richard B. Huffman and Gordon Misener of the University of California school of criminology, Berkeley, and Robert Riggs of planning research corporation, Washington, D.C., and Los Angeles, reported on various studies of police departments. Now, I am not going to advert to this at great length, but, nevertheless, the headline reads: "Crime fight 5 per cent of the police job, study shows." Dr. Riggs said, "a study of an unnamed mid-western city—one of the ten largest in the United States—showed that the police department spent close to half its annual budget on community services like traffic and crowd control and escorting visiting VIPs. Only 5 per cent of the budget was actually spent on fighting crimes of violence."

The article goes on and elaborates the point with the other professors, the other men involved in the thing—Dr. Huffman, for instance, gives pretty much the same facts. Since we are trying to shorten this debate somewhat, I shall allow the Attorney General to look at that article, which has a good deal of solid meat in it, at this time. Now, arising out of that, comes the whole problem of the relations of the public with the police. This is a dangerous topic and somewhat treacherous ground on which I am going to tread. Nevertheless, as a member of the Legislature, I think it may be permitted, and even in honesty and all integrity, advisable so to do. The police have on their side the whole panoply of the establishment, everybody interested in the status quo. Everybody who wants to keep the solid pillars of society standing, they all come down hard on that position. We all know the magistrates and the court will believe a policeman against a citizen any day of the week; we know that this is inherent in the psychology of a society that does not want to fall into degrees of anarchy.

Nevertheless, what better than an Irishman to raise his voice against that particular kind of oligarchy and to speak about those people who have been disaffected, about those people who have run up against the police and found them not to be cultured gentlemen; to find them to be on the other side of the fence, in some instances oafs, in other words; and also men concerned sometimes with brutalization, with acts of violence against the person. I cannot help but recall—I do not have it in front of me at the moment—an article by Ron Haggart not so long ago, where a perfectly reputable citizen, confined in a jail on one occasion, looking through a hole in the wall, saw—and this was reported—numerous citizens being beaten up. This is something that is lamentable and you had better say "Oh", because if it goes on, then we are in a police state and that is a grave danger that is hanging over us. In 1824, or whenever it was about that time, when the Peelers came into existence—the first regulated police forces in the western world—it was to control an increasing population given over to greater and greater degrees of anarchy; there were grave problems in the enclosures and so on, and the situation in England was leading, because of social problems, to a considerable amount of violence in that society. And so they brought the police forces in and on the whole no one can help but agree that they are a good thing. But, nevertheless, like all institutionalized mechanisms, it takes on arrogance and the sense of its own worth, and intends always to abuse. And it is the abuse and the possibilities of abuse that lie within our police departments that I am concerned with today.

We have sufficient evidence in the newspapers, and iron-clad court experience, of the actions of police in threatening, in using devious devices, in promising things to elicit confessions, and in straight beating people up. I do not suppose it is necessary, even for factionists, to show who is boss. Now, this is not a sub-society acting on its own within the larger society; they are our servants and these men must be trained in ways and adopt attitudes which would be climatized to the good intent and the overall benefit of the society.

The police are held in disrespect; they do not get the support of good average citizens, and they are partially, at least, responsible for that themselves. And you, Mr. Attorney General, to the degree that you have control over those forces in the type of training that is being given—and I will go into it in a moment—are equally responsible. There are the questions of psychology; and questions of broader emphasis to be exercised here of sociology and the role of a police force in contemporary society.

My suggestions today will be, I suspect, rather radical. I think there should be a thorough going-over, deep-rooted, and a complete revision of the police force. We should take a new look at our whole police apparatus —in which direction I shall mention in a moment—but Dr. Huffman, in this article, said that although 75 per cent of the constable's time is spent on community service work, most of his training centres on dealing with criminals. This develops, what he calls, a "criminalgenic attitude", detrimental to his dealings with the general public. Now, arising out of all these words, that verbiage, I look at the Ontario police calendar for the year 1968, and looking at page 17, I see the courses that are being given to the police constables on the Ontario Provincial Police.

Indeed, these are 12 week courses, divided into two parts, and I go to part (a)—I will not detail them at all—this subject matter includes everything from law, to courts and evidence, great sections on law and traffic, and courts, and physical activities from police methods and then cut down at the bottom under heading 6 called "miscellaneous"—sort of thrown in for good measure, I suppose, along with "examinations"; "first aid" and "English"—is something called "public relations".

Apparently that is the extent of the public relations, whereas it is my contention that public relations is primarily more important than any other aspect of their whole duty, their whole approach to that public, and their intention in courtesy to alleviate those in distress which is the bulk of the people, and not to inflict themselves in some demogogic way upon individuals.

How often does a police officer, with very little role up to that time in society, suddenly, dressed with the powers and puffed up with his new found responsibility, lord it over the ordinary and average citizens who do not know how to stand up for their rights; threaten to take them into custody, ask for rights of search and seizure which never come to light all the way along the row, which they have no right whatever to do.

This is a petty despotism in our midst and I think it is largely because of failure in training. I think that the old boys who run the stations are part of the wild west show, too; you know, the way of conducting a kind of quasi-military body in our midst there with the guns and the barking out of the side of the mouth, this is the state of masculinity that is supposed to be operative.

I turn then to the part over on the next page where they have another course—part (b) which is the other six weeks. They get no training in public relations at all. They know all about disorderly houses, indecent acts, fraud, identification parades, you name it—dead bodies—but they have nothing whatsoever on public relations in that part.

There are a number of courses outlined in this book where public relations are barely mentioned. I shall go on, finally, to the last pages of the thing with respect to the role of chief constables—the chiefs of police—and how much are they exposed to knowledge? I think this is where maybe the fault fundamentally lies as to the attitudes on the part of the chiefs of police in this regard—rather lofty and off-handed; that we are all snipers at the police, and that we are seeking to diminish their role and we are making their task more difficult—all that sort of nonsense which we always meet when we stand up for the ordinary citizen as to certain overweening attitudes and acts which are extremely difficult to detect in some cases.

They do not go as far as physical violence. It is a question of an attitude which in some ways gets under your skin more than actually being poked in the ribs—it is that whole mentality.

The chiefs of police—just to finish up on page 30—have some basic concepts in police action and police attitudes towards the criminal law, the courts, the legal profession, and the public and the accused, and that seems to be about as far as it goes. On the second week, on the last page, 32, there is mentioned "human relations", some concepts of behaviour, and so on. It does not seem to be dwelt upon or emphasized as I am emphasizing it now. In our society, and with the police forces particularly, because they are armed with very arbitrary and sovereign powers over our minds and our bodies, the whole institution could very well become a Frankenstein and may be increasingly such a thing in our very midst.

Our whole task and direction, while not crippling them in their legitimate work, is at the same time to call them to a sense of responsibility where they do not alienate the ordinary citizens over petty grievances—the business of handing out parking tags; the business of being snide or rude or sarcastic almost on every occasion possible when they have any reason to talk to the ordinary citizen.

Now what do I say with respect to the solution, or possible solution to some of these problems? I suggest something on the lines of the division of labour—that the training of a certain group of policemen, those with the stomach for it, or the head for it, might be directed on to criminal work. Because as they say, only 5 per cent or thereabouts of the job is criminal apprehension, detection. And the police who have a gift for that sort of thing, let them do it. But for the other 85 or 90 per cent of the police force, ought they to be exposed—and I am suggesting training in our community colleges—ought they to be exposed to a greater range of civil relations with the public in the way of aiding and helping in the business, as they say, of crowd control? More money is spent at Mosport controlling the crowds there, I would dare say, than in apprehending arsonists in this province.

With that in mind are there not special skills they should acquire such as a sense of good public relations? A citizen should be as open and desirous of participating and helping the police on every occasion, which we well know is not the present case. Ought not the role of group behaviour and group psychology be taught to these men? I do not think it requires any great brains to be able to pick it up; it is going into the reform institutions at the present time.

The indications in this direction during the estimates were excellent in this regard—the business of working intelligently with other human beings so as not to bring about hatred, envy and revenge, the sense of hitting back every time. Bring people along—the carrot is a lot better than the stick. You have given no training in this regard, and there is a resistance, I suspect, from the Metropolitan Toronto police in this direction—pantywaist stuff they say, coddle the criminals. Nonsense!

Those that are tough and want to do that particular kind of thing, let them operate within the criminal field. But those police doing traffic control, and those who are patrolling beats where there is very little incidence, except in perhaps a petty way, of criminal apprehension, and those who are engaged in crowd control, and in all areas of the civil community life, and so on, which comprises most of their work—why should they not be given a completely different approach and a different outlook? I am sure they would enjoy their work better; I am sure they do not want citizens snarling at them. I am sure they want to feel some sense of participation in the community.

Alienation always works both ways, you know, so part of their reaction to people is because they feel that the average citizen has very little respect for them and would not come to their aid. If this were the case, why not bring a greater accord, accommodation and a sense of community together in this particular regard? Why not, then, launch out into a greater area of police training; and why not, as the last report of the police commissioner, page 12, suggests, why not utilize the community colleges?

They say they do not want in any way to be taken away from the police colleges as such; fine, it has its role. Nevertheless the role of community colleges is growing and the infinite possibilities of these colleges in terms of skills in this very kind of training for policemen, for people engaged in fire-fighting work, or for people who are jail guards, for a whole host of citizens in terms of human relations, is very wide, and only beginning. And so why not seize it, and see that the kind of thing I have in mind as to public relations in the police force are brought to pass.

Mr. Chairman: Anything further on vote 210? The member for Humber.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): I am not going to belabour this point long. As a matter of fact—

Mr. Chairman: May I just say that we should stick with vote 210? Ontario police commission.

Mr. Ben: Yes. I am not going to labour this too long but in listening to the hon. member for Lakeshore for the last 20 or 30 minutes it caused me to recall suggestions I had made to the hon. Attorney General last year. I believe it was when the presidential commission on crime in the United States published its report. If the Chairman will recall, I touched on the three types of suggested police officers or police personnel as were recommended by the report.

The commission recommended to the president that in the future there should be in the United States three types of police personnel: One would be a police agent, which would be similar to a detective that we have at the present time; that these should require a university degree in order to qualify as a police agent. This group would carry out the investigation of crime. They would be the detectives.

The second would be called police officers and they would carry out functions similar to what the policeman now carries out. For this group you would not need a university degree.

The third group would be more or less community liaison personnel, who would be made up of cadets, third-class constables and the like. Now, their job would be to act as community liaison, and they, of course, would require less training than the other two categories. I was inclined to rise this afternoon after listening to my hon. friend from Lakeshore because he would suggest that you train all officers alike, whereas this is unnecessary if you put them into specialized categories. Last year I asked the Attorney General to give some consideration to the recommendations which I made then. What comments has he got to make now with the passage of one year? Will he make some implementation of such a proposal as that recommended by a commission to the President of the United States?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can only say that I am aware of the view of the hon. member and he has repeated it again with some force, and I know the recommendations which arose out of that report, which he refers to. It is not practical at this time to implement, certainly not at full scale, that quality of training and education to divide the force into classes at this time. We have plans for extending the courses at the police college, both in programme and facilities, but to go to the length of those recommendations at this time is just not feasible.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, I would not for the world expect the Minister to implement any such suggestion overnight, but the fact remains, however, that the Attorney General could now lay out a programme for hiring individuals with university degrees to form a cadre of this specialized police agents group. That is the first step that could be taken. Likewise, he could start hiring those with grade 12 education to form the bottom group or community liaison group, and you could, for instance, have the nucleus of the suggested liaison force. But surely right now you could create a special category of police officers who have a degree and pay them accordingly and develop them into this police agent group, could you not, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is possible and could be considered.

Vote 210 agreed to.

On vote 211:

Mr. Sopha: I want to ask the Attorney General if, in view of the fact that the Ontario Provincial Police are taking over the policing of smaller communities—or to look at it from another aspect, the provincial police have been concerned with the policing of smaller areas and municipalities—I would like to ask to what extent they become involved in this system under The Liquor Control Act whereby they report people who are indulging in excessive use of alcohol, and who are subsequently put on the interdicted list? I should like to ask him how widespread the involvement of the provincial police is in this system?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think that the answer is—and maybe I can get some further information on this—but my understanding is that usually persons are put on the interdicted list on complaint of some member of the family, or after they have been the subject of a number of complaints of a near relative such as the wife, or member of the direct family. And I think that the provincial police are not specially involved in this matter except as it comes to their attention in the ordinary enforcement and carrying out of their duties. I could ask the commissioner and perhaps get some further information on the point. He has nothing further to add than what I have related.

Mr. Sopha: Well, from a personal experience of cases that have been brought to my attention, it used to be that the local provincial police officer would write on his own motion to the board to put a person on the interdicted list. Does that still obtain?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The commissioner advises me that there is a special branch of the OPP, the liquor enforcement branch, and they have very close liaison with the liquor control and licence boards, and it is possible that a report might be made on individual notice, but I am not sure how far they go as to the question of interdiction. But I would expect that the police would carry that out. I do not seem to be able to get any information on that detail at the moment. I can find out for the hon. member.

Mr. Sopha: Well, it strikes me that—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think this would be part of the duty, in the ordinary course of their duty, that they would make these reports if they found people abusing their privileges, and damaging themselves and their families. I think that this would go on.

Mr. Sopha: It strikes me as being a very nefarious and discriminatory practice. One is reminded of the index of heretics that the holy office used to keep in the days of the inquisition in Spain, where they kept lists of heretics; and this smacks of something similar to that, that a provincial policeman on his own motion can write in to the liquor board and have a person's name appended to that list. Now, really, could the Attorney General not lay it down as a matter of policy that in all cases where this desire to interdict a person from excessive use of alcohol, appropriate steps be taken to take that person before a magistrate and have him to do it? If a person is indulging in alcohol to excess then it is guaranteed that he is going to infringe some section of The Liquor Control Act because there is no statute on the books of the province that is easier to offend than that one.

You can offend that one involuntarily almost, or get yourself in a state of violation through use of alcohol, and then guarantee that you are going to offend the statute. But could we hear from the Attorney General that as a matter of policy in addition to that allusion that I used—in respect of it, it almost smacks of making the policeman a common informer, that he is a sort of spy in the area and uses this information. I do not know how it works after he writes in. My experience tells me that somebody writes in, the relative, wife or mother, and the board puts in an order to put the person on the list. I wish my friend from York South was here because I would call his memory without using the term, I would remind him of what that list used to be called by those who were not careful of their speech; you just summon up a slang name for the list; but it will come to mind what the list used to be called. I can see by the facial expressions that there are quite a few that remember, but I am not going to allude to it by name. I think that the whole thing is wrong, it is just wrong, and I hesitate to see provincial policemen using extra-judicial authority.

After all, they are making a judgment, and I have had a case called to my attention recently—and I am not going to recite the facts of it, but I thought the whole thing was pretty sinister—they exercised a judicial judgment themselves; they see the individual round and about a small town, and who can escape notice in a small town? And they decide the person is using alcohol excessively. That is a quasi-judicial decision, and as a result of the conclusions the policeman comes to, he writes a letter to the liquor board with the result that that person's privileges are suspended. Now, look at the discriminatory angle of it: If a person lives in a large metropolitan area like Toronto, to put him on the interdicted list is meaningless, it is completely meaningless, because there are any number of outlets to which he can resort if he wants to avail himself of the beverage, but in a small town, on the other hand, to put him on the interdicted list is a real punishment.

And I do not see that the power to punish in a sort of a backhanded way, in a left-handed way, perhaps, ought to devolve on a provincial policeman, I do not think he should have that power. If he thinks that individual "X" is using alcohol without responsibility, then let the policeman take the case before a magistrate and let the magistrate decide, upon hearing proper evidence and submissions, whether the person ought to be interdicted.

As our policing of the smaller communities increases by the provincial police, this is a weapon in their hands that I do not think they should have. And, besides, finally, I say those things on the sure opinion, an opinion firmly based, that to deprive a person of alcohol by means of edict is not helpful at all. The law should not be on the statute books of the province in the first place, it should be obliterated from the statute books because no amount of prohibition of that nature is going to help the individual who indulges to excess at any time. His reform will come in different revelations to himself of the error and, indeed, the suffering and the pain that excessive consumption of alcohol will bring. But that is a matter for another debate.

I just say to the Attorney General that I wish he would say to his chief commissioner of provincial police, "Let us get rid of this system and let us do it in appropriate fashion if it needs to be done. Let the local magistrate make that determination and assume the responsibility for it and get rid of this"—I do not think it is too much of an epithet to say this—"sneaky way of doing things in writing a letter".

Anybody can write a letter and not assume the responsibility for it and I suppose if the local policeman writes the letter to the board and asks for the prohibition to be imposed, the board would not make available to the person affected the name of the informant which surrounds it with a more sinister atmosphere than it need have.

I would plead in the open society, the permissive society, where we are going to let people do all kinds of things—they dress in outlandish fashion—

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Who dresses in outlandish fashion?

Mr. Sopha: Well, some people.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Are you referring to the Prime Minister of this country?

Mr. Sopha: No, I am not, I am referring to Norman Depoe's son as seen on the television last night, and others. We let them do all sorts of things in this permissive society and I would be broadminded enough to say if people want to drink to excess, let them. Let them do it within the limits of their own homes. I am all for imposing obligations—because a person drinks that does not mean he escapes his obligations, but what I really want to say is you do not cure him but are merely attempting to cut off the source of supply.

The policy is fallacious in that if it was ever attempted with success, it would be ruinous to the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton). But this aspect of it, involving the provincial policemen: In the local community, one wants him to develop a high rapport with the people he serves; some of those policemen in small communities are there for many years and they become very much a part of the community.

The chap at Gore Bay, for example, a very good one, has been there, I will bet you, upwards of a dozen years; he has been at the capital of Manitoulin Island, perhaps longer than that, but they establish a tremendous liaison with the people in the community and their success is a direct reflection, of course, of the rapport that exists between them and the local inhabitant.

I do not like to see any duties imposed upon them, or privileges given to them, that will detract from the very best relations I like to see these people have with the local inhabitants of the community. They are all the law in those small communities, sometimes out of the way. Can you imagine a fate worse than being stationed in Pickle Crow? Surely they must not keep them there very long, I hope—I hope they rotate them—but I had a look at that place—

Mr. Stokes: That is in Thunder Bay; you should watch what you say!

Mr. Sopha: I mean no disrespect but you would have to think twice about going there to retire. But it is a very valid point and the member for Downsview and I, of course, want to see the day hasten when in all these small communities throughout the broad reaches of this province, principally north of the French River, the police force is the Ontario Provincial Police. Of course, everybody concerned with its management wants to do everything they can to help the creation of the very best relationship between the members of that force and the people they are serving on behalf of the government of this province.

So I hope the Attorney General will tell me at eight, Mr. Chairman, is being six of the clock, that that practice will cease.

Mr. Chairman: Is vote 211 carried?

Mr. Sopha: No.

Mr. Ben: No. I want to speak on 211.

Mr. Chairman: Does the member for Humber want to debate vote 211?

Mr. Ben: Vote 211, yes.

It being 6:00 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Concluded)

On vote 211:

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Chairman, before recessing for dinner I rose to discuss the Ontario Provincial Police, and a topic that I have mentioned on previous occasions is the operation of ambulances along main express highways by the OPP if they are patrolled by the OPP. My recommendation is that the cruisers, or the patrol cars, ought to be converted into ambulances, or else station wagons which, in fact, double as ambulances, ought to be used as police patrol cars. I recall my civil defence days, when it was called civil defence before it became emergency measures organization, when we were planning escape routes from the city of Toronto, and it was estimated that Highway 400 could carry 2,000 cars per minute past a given point.

Mr. E. W. Sopha (Sudbury): It was for the Cabinet.

Mr. Ben: I guess they were all probably headed up to Sudbury or some place like that. Anyway, that is what it could carry, and that was utilizing both lanes for traffic going north.

The fact remains that on any weekend in the summer, Highway 400 does move approximately 1,000 motor vehicles per minute past a given point, going in one direction, and I daresay the same probably applies to 401 going east from Toronto. I cannot speak from too much experience westwards.

An hon. member: You mean eastwards.

Mr. Ben: The 400 could carry, under defence or emergency facilities, 2,000 motor vehicles per minute past a given point, using four lanes. That is 500 cars a minute per lane past a given point.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): That is eight cars per second.

Mr. Ben: That is right. That is what civil defence planned for when they thought they would have a couple of hours if they wished to evacuate a city. Things have changed since then.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): I call that low flying.

Mr. Ben: That is 500 automobiles past a given point per minute; eight per second. Anyway, it is a solid line of automobiles.

An hon. member: You bet it is.

Mr. Ben: And what happens if there is an accident? First of all, traffic slows to a crawl because people want to see what happened, and even when the police stay there to wave the people on, traffic still moves at a crawl.

Mr. Sopha: A lawyer's field day.

Mr. Ben: It is difficult for an ambulance to get to the scene. Normally, I trust, the police are prudent enough when requesting an ambulance, to request one from the 400 north of the accident scene so that it can speed to the scene of the accident against the heavy flow of traffic. It can then move back north, because the the traffic again spaces itself out after it has passed the accident scene.

The fact remains, the first person normally on the scene following an accident is the OPP, and I suggest that if they were riding in motor vehicles which have been converted to ambulances they could take the names and licences of the parties involved, and then speed the victims to a hospital and let the investigation be carried on by the police who arrive in the next patrol car.

Now, there are a number of patrol cars operating on the 400 at any weekend. I saw three of them at one accident scene over the weekend—as a matter of fact just yesterday—but there are not that many ambulances around. I should think that the prime interest when an accident occurs is to get the victims to a hospital to try to save lives, and not simply get the names and addresses for the purpose of prosecuting the parties involved. Saving lives is the important function, or should be the important function of the OPP, and they should be geared to that.

In instances where the injuries are very severe, I think that a helicopter converted to carry litters or stretchers should also be utilized. We have enough helicopters in the vicinity of Toronto, and, in fact, in Toronto they are giving reports on traffic. I think that perhaps these radio stations who operate helicopters giving traffic reports would also be performing a useful service if these helicopters were converted to take litters or stretchers, so that they could land when they see an accident and take a patient to the hospital.

The Hospital for Sick Children, I understand, has had its roof converted to a helicopter landing area. Perhaps other hospitals could do the same. The fact is that at the present time I think too many lives are being lost and too many injuries being made permanent because the victims of an automobile accident on a major thoroughfare in this province are not taken to the hospital in sufficient time.

I would ask the Attorney General to pass on that, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Chairman, when we adjourned at 6 o'clock, the hon. member for Sudbury had asked some questions about the role of the Ontario Provincial Police in connection with placing persons on the interdicted list. I have been able to get information during the adjournment, and I should like to give this information to the House now.

The first situation is where there is no conviction of a person, the member of the family gets in touch with the liquor control board. I find that the board then usually refers the matter to the Ontario Provincial Police for investigation, if it is in territory which is being policed by the OPP. If it is a municipal situation, I presume it is referred to the municipal police, and not to the OPP. The Ontario Provincial Police carry out investigations by consulting all persons who would be presumed to have knowledge of the matter. They explain why they are investigating and doctors, priests, ministers and neighbours are consulted.

They do not always, I am told, divulge the name of the complainant—it is quite often not given to the person who is being investigated. Then they make a report to the liquor control board of Ontario, which is a strictly factual report, without recommendation, unless they have been requested, or they have a history—they may report that and indicate their feeling in the matter. I am informed they always interview the person of whom the complaint is made, and this is usually followed up in a couple of months time, to see how the matter has changed, or improved, or deteriorated.

The second case is where there has been a conviction for such things, for example, as illegal handling; keeping for sale; selling to or supplying minors—something more than a minor charge under the liquor Act. The constable sends his report to the detachment commander and it is submitted by him to the superintendent of the district, and then to the liquor branch of the Ontario Provincial Police. Then it is forwarded to the liquor control board of Ontario. That is when there has been a conviction.

The third situation is where a person appears in family and juvenile court. This, I am told, is something like the show cause summons procedure, where there has been misconduct as a result of indulgence in liquor —wild spending; reducing the estate, or dissipating assets which are needed by the family—if there has been a history of habitual drinking, failing to provide, that sort of thing. He is brought before the judge to show cause why he should not be placed on the prohibited list. The court, I am told, then furnishes its findings to the Ontario Provincial Police, and they submit in the usual way.

There is another situation where the person convicted by a magistrate or judge is given a term of probation, a proscription against the use of liquor. The liquor control board complies with that by placing him on the list. The Ontario Provincial Police may have some relationship in that situation, but that would not be a usual one.

The fifth and last item on which I have any information is the situation where the premises have been declared a public place. That almost automatically calls for the owner to be placed on the list. Those are the answers that I have for the hon. member for Sudbury.

Dealing with the remarks of the hon. member for Humber, I know that he is going to say that that is what he would expect, or what I have indicated before, but I think that the situation has changed somewhat from last year; quite considerably, in fact. The primary function or duty of the provincial police is the enforcement of law and the maintenance of order, and if you were to place upon them, as a matter of course, duty—

Mr. Ben: May I place a question? Would it not be the preservation of lives and property?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am not downgrading that or placing it in any secondary order. I am simply saying that the duty of the police is the enforcement of law and the maintenance of order.

If you place upon them the duty of an ambulance service, I think that you largely dissipate and, to a great extent, destroy that function. It is all very well to say that it is important to get the seriously injured person into hospital. I would agree with that. But surely there must be someone to investigate the cause of that accident, and to take names and addresses, and to take pictures, and get details and measurements, and to see who was involved, to ascertain if there was drinking in the situation, or impaired drivers. These are important if the law is to be enforced and if we are to have the proper approach to it.

Now, we have this other thing that I come to and, without taking away the importance of helping the injured, we have brought in during the last year The Ambulance Services Act. While it may not be possible to have an ambulance or two ambulances present at every situation where there is an accident and someone is injured, we have across the province, now, moved from the old situation where the ambulances were privately operated on a rather haphazard basis by the municipalities to a scheme which the Minister of Health (Mr. Dymond), I am sure, would be able to enlarge upon. In describing the wide coverage, I say to my colleague that he has given—through The Ambulance Services Act—a means of providing ambulances to serve every area. I do not think in the circumstances that you can saddle or burden the provincial police with this function.

I would add that in many cases, without question, provincial police—where there are serious injuries and persons are in danger of bleeding to death or deteriorating badly—use their vehicles to get people to hospital and first aid; and this is very frequent. But to make this a firm rule would not be in order, and if the Minister cares to advise about how extensive the ambulance coverage is, I should be glad—and I am sure the House would be glad—to hear from him.

Mr. Ben: Well, Mr. Chairman, we pass laws in this Legislature and elsewhere for the preservation of life and the protection of property, and the prime duty of anyone who is charged with the enforcement of law is to carry out those two functions—to preserve life and protect property. All our laws are geared to that end. We are not for one minute suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that the policeman ought to disregard the miscreants whenever an offence takes place. We did not say that. One of the first things I said was that the first provincial policeman arriving on the scene under the circumstances I outlined would take the names and addresses of the involved parties; he would take their licences, and then he would depart with the injured and leave it for a subsequent officer to do the investigation of which the Attorney General spoke.

Or else he could ask them to wait until he returned if there was such a call for the services of the Ontario Provincial Police. I might add, Mr. Chairman, that if it was necessary for the parties involved to await the return of the first officer who had to take some victim to a hospital, then the OPP are very grossly undermanned. Whichever way you look at it I think that the Attorney General has struck out. No one is suggesting that the miscreant ought to avoid responsibility. What we are saying is that the preservation of life should be foremost in the Attorney General's mind and in the minds of the Ontario Provincial Police and that they should accordingly govern themselves toward that end.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Yorkview.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, may I ask, through you to the hon. Minister, a question in respect to what he has just said about the OPP being charged with the responsibility of investigating the causes of the accident? Many of us have been concerned for a long time with the matter of defective cars on the highways and I wonder how far the Ontario Provincial Police are instructed in respect to looking for defects in the cars involved in accidents.

I know that unless they are trained mechanically it may be somewhat difficult for them to pinpoint certain defects that may have occurred. But there are obvious things, it seems to me, in the case of accidents, particularly those where a car has gone off the road of its own accord; cars that have taken an erratic course which they should not have taken.

How far does the research really go in cases like this? What do the OPP do to try to determine if there have been defects, and if the car was at fault as well as the driver?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: My information is that the Ontario Provincial Police do not ordinarily, when attending the scene of an accident, make a study of the vehicle for a hidden defect. If it is apparent they note it. They do not do research on the vehicle to ascertain if there was some defect on it unless there is something about the circumstances that would indicate that something went wrong with the vehicle. That is the situation at present.

I would be glad to consider that thought and discuss it with the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police.

I would point out to the hon. member what I mentioned last week in one of these sessions in the House during the estimates, that there is a study being carried on by an organization known as TIRF. I think the hon. member is familiar with it—traffic injury research foundation. We have had conferences and discussions. There are a number of agencies involved and concerned in it, and the police is one of them which furnishes certain information.

This is a situation where vehicles involved in accidents—not every one, but a fairly good spot checking—have research carried on to ascertain defects in the vehicles, what could be done to right them and bring them to the attention of those who manufacture them.

But to answer the question directly, as I say the provincial police do not look for, or examine a vehicle with a view to ascertaining if there is some defect, unless there is something about the circumstances that might indicate, or make it apparent, that there was something of this nature at fault.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, might I just follow this up with a question of the Minister as to the liaison between the OPP and TIRF, that is, if there are unusual circumstances surrounding an accident, what are the procedures used at that point to bring this to the attention of the TIRF people so that they can investigate that particular acccident?

We saw one the other day—it was not an accident particularly—where the child died in the back seat. This was obvious enough, but there are many other cases where situations might not be as obvious as this. I was wondering whether or not a certain specific accident, or certain numbers of the accidents, are called to the attention of the TIRF authorities so that they can investigate.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I would like to inform the House that there is liaison between the Ontario Provincial Police and the organization, and I recall that in the conference here the provincial police sat in with us.

But some of the requirements of this organization were pretty onerous, something like the suggestion of the hon. member for Humber, and more than the police could undertake to stay and do if they were to take it on as a matter of course in every accident. They can furnish certain information, but as I remember, one of the forms that they presented which were to be filled out at the time, apparently, was so involved that if the OPP officer had to do that he probably would not have got much else done for the morning or afternoon, it was quite a research chart that was required.

But there is liaison and assistance, and I would be glad to discuss it further with the commissioner and see what might be done to expand that and follow it up.

Mr. Young: Then the TIRF organization simply makes a study of the reports or forms that they get, rather than going to the scene of an accident and seeing something at first hand.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I understand that they involve doctors, who treat the injured. I am not sure that they have engineers to look at some of the vehicles. They have a fairly wide range of research. I am not certain how far they go, but I remember that doctors are definitely involved, as are hospitals on the report. It just is not a police matter only. I do not know whether they send their own field workers out or not, but I have a feeling that they do.

Mr. Young: I knew that they did, but not to what extent, and I was wondering if their work was mainly research into records, rather than first-hand information, although I did understand that they did send some field workers out. I would hope that they would, or perhaps their research is not as meaningful as it might be.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Kent.

Mr. J. P. Spence (Kent): I have two questions for the Attorney General. In regard to unmarked cars patrolling our provincial highways, are there unmarked cars patrolling the highways in the province? And also on our provincial highways, we see aircraft patrols. What success are you having with these? Is this successful? Are you intending to increase them? What are your views on this?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, there are no unmarked cars on traffic routes that are used in the patrolling of traffic. I know without looking for the answer that the aircraft patrol is a very effective and successful method of checking traffic violations—speeding and that sort of thing. Statistics that we have show a reduction in accidents where they were very frequent prior to the bringing in of the aircraft patrol. I have the figures here, but I do not need to recite them. I can say it is very successful.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Ontario Provincial Police force is one of the forces, if not the only force, in North America which has a waiting list of approved recruits available from which it can choose new men. I would think that this speaks exceptionally well for the calibre of force that this is. In my experience, and I have had occasion to come across these policemen in their work several times in the last few years, I want to compliment the commissioner for the outstanding force that has been brought about. When he was first appointed, I may say—and I know the commissioner quite well; I knew him when he was in the Attorney General's department —I had some reservations as to how he would make out as a policeman. But several years of performance have convinced me that he was the right man for the right job.

Mr. Sopha: That was only because he was a lawyer, of course!

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): In spite of being a lawyer, you mean.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, in my experience these policemen—the ones I have encountered in any event—have known their job, they have been well trained, they have been polite, they have been immaculately turned out—

An hon. member: They did not give you the ticket?

Mr. Singer: They did give me a speeding ticket, yes. I have watched them manage crowd control. The day the Prime Minister came to Toronto—

Some hon. members: A great day.

Mr. Singer: A great day. There were several Ontario Provincial Police out-riding on their motorcycles and they did an outstanding job. I thought that after what I had said through these estimates, it might be worthwhile if I paid a few compliments to those responsible for creating and maintaining this good force.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I accept the compliment. I know it is given sincerely, and I know it is appreciated, and it is nice to hear a compliment of this kind, such as was given also by the hon. member for Sudbury, paid to the Ontario Provincial Police Force. I think it is a force of excellent discipline, good morale, and first-rate training, and I am pleased, of course, to know that members find it courteous and helpful, too. I will say that we get a good number of letters of this nature. Occasionally, as is bound to happen, there is a member of the force who exceeds his authority or throws his weight around a bit, but generally the word which we get from the public who are in contact with the force is that it is doing a good job and doing it with courtesy and efficiency. I hasten to acknowledge the compliments paid.

Mr. Sopha: Mr. Chairman, because we want to maintain good public relations, there is a matter that very much bothered me. It is related to the matter raised before the dinner hour by the member for York South, in respect of damage caused to innocent third parties by automobiles of the force while engaged in enforcement of the law.

I believe I can associate the member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter) with my remarks. When we served on the public accounts committee we took a position as being opposed to the government insuring its risks by the intervention of an outside agency. I believe, as a matter of principle, that, when servants and agents of the government cause damage through tortious acts, that the government ought not to interpose some alien agency between it and the citizen. The government ought to do what is appropriate in a direct way to compensate so far as money can compensate for injuries, loss, damage, that has been caused by servants of the Crown. It seemed to me to be a cold and heartless thing, that damage, even death—

Here we have a provincial policeman pursuing a motorist who is driving at a very high rate of speed. The provincial policeman takes off in hot pursuit and he develops a speed up to 90 miles an hour or more and he falls in behind a car. The errant motorist, the lawbreaker, is still some distance ahead. The provincial policeman pulls out to overtake the car he is behind—he does not see, he cannot see, that there are two 17-year-old boys on the road and he strikes and kills both of them.

To me it is just a cold and heartless reaction by government to then employ an insurance company—to have an insurance company interpose itself, on behalf of the Crown, to settle those claims. I would think that, believing as I do, that with a budget of $2.75 billion, as the Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) must find in this province, that the government ought to be a self-insurer in almost all aspects of tortious liability. If that were the case, it would bring into line the other principle that nobody ought to be interposed between the government and the citizen.

What would be wrong with a branch of the motor vehicle accident compensation fund being set up to deal with and adjust these claims, with an early approach by an agent of the government to those who were injured—in the case I cite, to the grief-stricken parents of the two boys—instead of waiting for them to assert a claim. I know in that case the parents asserted a claim and then the next person they meet is an insurance adjuster, who has really nothing to do with the thing at all. This is a place of direct contact between government and citizen in a democracy—and then that haggling over the amount.

I would think it would be a matter of good sense and good relations in such a case if the state, the government, erred on the generous side instead of that interminable wrangling over dollars and cents in an area where money really cannot compensate for the loss that has occurred.

I do not think the Attorney General or the provincial police, have any business employing an insurance company to underwrite its risks. I have no idea how much it costs a year, but I know this—that whatever the experience was in dollars this year, that if they continue the practice next year the insurance companies would just raise the premium. The premium would go up to cover the experience of last year's loss, plus the overhead and the profit features of the carrying of the business for the government.

So, looked at that way, it is not insurance at all. It is a charge upon the government by the insurance companies for relieving the government of the inconvenience of adjusting losses. But, as a matter of principle, I say the government should adjust its own losses. You see what happens here in the case, which was an extreme case, but it could happen again. The parents contact the Attorney General. He is responsible for the provincial police. They write to him. The Attorney General would probably reply. He would probably write them a letter, being the humane man that he is, but the next person they would hear from would be an insurance adjuster, an insurance company, someone not connected with the government at all.

Mr. G. Kerr (Halton West): What about appraising and adjusting claims?

Mr. Sopha: Pardon me? What did he say?

I am suggesting a branch of the motor vehicles accident compensation fund, and there is no question in regard to that fund, I say to my good friend from Halton West, of them giving money away. They do not. They are very realistic in their negotiations. This is connected with my overall view that the government ought not to insure at all against any form of liability. The Provincial Treasurer should be made to find the money and the government become a self insurer. There are many businesses that are turning over vast amounts of money and there are many that insure themselves.

But then of course there is another aspect which I am very much against, being a staunch constitutional monarchist—the whole business of bundling up the prerogatives of the Crown in a suitcase. The Deputy Attorney General gets them together, all the prerogatives, and takes them down to Bay Street to the head office of an insurance company and says, "Here, they are all yours now." And they can use all the constitutional devices that the best lawyers can dig out in defence of the claims that are asserted against the government, because the government has special pleas that are not available to the ordinary citizen, and that is an outgrowth of the development of constitutional law since the time of Henry I. They are not averse to using them.

I do not want to repeat the old story of poor old Perepelytz but in that regard they used an evasive, disingenuous constitutional device. They would not hesitate. Well, I take my stand, being the constitutional monarchist that I am, that those belong to the Crown, they belong to the government. The Attorney General is the custodian of them, not an insurance company down the corner of Bay and King Streets. I am suggesting that it is wrong for the provincial police to be insured by an outside agency.

That is the burthen of my argument, for the reasons that I have given. Basically, it applies not only to the provincial police but to every other aspect of government activity, that when the citizen is harmed through a tortious act of the state then he is entitled to speak to somebody who has the authority directly to speak for the government and to seek redress from that person. To carry my illustration to its ultimate conclusion, if the citizen sat back, being wronged, and he wrote to the Prime Minister himself, then somebody on behalf of the first citizen would write back to him and say, "Do not take this up with me." He would put it in very courteous language. He would say, "Take it up with the head office of Guardian Insurance Company, which is at 330 Bay Street, Post Box 460." That, I say, is a wrong response to the citizen who has been harmed by the tortious act of a servant of the state.

This department probably has more motor vehicles on the highway which create a greater risk of injury to other users of the highway—as the member for York South has very appropriately pointed out—than any other department of government. So it is a very relevant place to bring the attention of the Attorney General to this.

Mr. Chairman: The Attorney General.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Could I take a moment, Mr. Chairman, to deal with that point raised by the member for Sudbury? It is an interesting view which he puts forward. He submits that this self insurance by the government would do away with haggling in negotiation. I cannot quite follow that. I do not think that would happen, because to say that there would be no need to negotiate and no need to haggle as it were over the amount, would be to say that you would accept the first demand made. Otherwise, you have got to sit down and talk, adjust, and try to reach a fair and proper settlement figure, and that is what negotiations are all about.

Perhaps it seems incongruous that insurance companies should stand between the Crown and a member of the public, but at least there is this to be borne in mind, that if an insurance adjuster comes into the picture when the claim is made, it does provide two things: He has no interest in the matter, at least from the government's point of view; he is independent in a sense. He is representing the insurer, it is true, but he has an independence from government. He is not one of the parties involved and he does avoid political considerations which could very well play a part if a department of government itself had to negotiate in a matter of this kind. I am sure none of us are naive enough that we could not imagine that political considerations might militate one way or another in such a situation.

This is something that I think that the present situation avoids. If a friend of the government had a relative who suffered damage, I think there would be suspicion whether it existed or not. He would get special treatment, and with someone who was outspoken in his views of the government, I am sure that there would be the suspicion and perhaps even the suggestion that he had not been treated very fairly.

The other point which the hon. member made was that the Crown has special privileges. These have been pretty well done away with by The Proceedings Against the Crown Act, which leaves the citizen almost every recourse that could be had against any other person or party. There is, I am advised, a clause that the Crown is responsible for the torts of its servants, and there is discovery under The Proceedings Against the Crown Act. The Crown is responsible. There is discovery, and all the other rights and remedies which up to recently did not exist. So I think there is something to be said on the other side of that question. It is an interesting view and one that we might be prepared to think about, but at this moment I could not say I accept it, because I see immediately arising in my mind the arguments which I have tried to state briefly.

Mr. Sopha: Another aspect of provincial police work that I have had occasion to raise perennially is: I should like to hear from the Attorney General what was the experience of that anti-gambling squad in the previous year. How has it been working? I only encountered them once in the intervening year, and I won that round.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: They have been very active, and had a very successful year.

Mr. Sopha: Tell me, do they still go around at the instance of local chiefs of police, breaking up these penny-ante poker games? They might, a year or so ago, have started around here. But we have had a surcease here. Do they still go around breaking them up around the province?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Generally, they act only on complaint, and when a complaint is made, they are pretty much bound to act. Generally, their actions are initiated by a complaint, and they are brought into action; that is the principle upon which they operate.

Mr. Sopha: Well, having come up out of the puritan age a couple of decades ago, my complaint is that when you have a group of people engaged in a relatively small poker game, playing for quarters or something, that it is not serious enough to warrant the intrusion and the great expenditure that is involved. This is irritation, really.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The gaming law, or the law against gaming, is part of the code which we are bound to enforce and, as I have indicated, the provincial police have an obligation to enforce that law in their areas and they act on complaint. I might be inclined to agree somewhat with the hon. member for Sudbury but we have an obligation to enforce the law, and when it is brought to our attention, we have to act.

Mr. Sopha: That is good enough for me.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I am happy for you.

Mr. Sopha: That is good enough for me. The Attorney General having said that, I am sure that it will have a suitably prophylactic effect on the commissioner of the Ontario Provincial Police—if he is present—and on the activities of that organization in the ensuing year.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. Ben: May I ask the Attorney General some questions on this particular vote? In going through the expenditure of the public accounts of the province for the last fiscal year, under the Ontario Provincial Police, I can find no item comparable to item four of vote 211; that is movement of personnel, $300,000. The public accounts set out the travelling expenses for each district, and I am curious as to what these travelling expenses involve. Would that be going to court, Mr. Chairman? That is one question.

The main one, however, is this movement of personnel, $300,000. As I say, I can find no comparable item last fiscal year under this particular item. I note that there is a charge for data processing and I wonder if that has anything to do with a computer, because for a number of years, our party has been advocating a central computer system which would be centrally located and would handle all the items that have to be handled by the province, including the registration of chattel mortgages, sale agreements, automobile liens and the like. Would the Minister answer those questions, please?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I do not know if I followed all the points that the hon. member made, and I apologize if I did not because I was attempting to seek in the records an answer to his first question. I find that movement of personnel is shown in the estimates as an item of $300,000 for 1967-68, and did not appear in previous estimates because it was broken down in this year's estimates to segregate it, and show the separate department travelling expenses. The travelling is kept to a minimum. What is really significant is that when members of the forces are moved from station to station and place to place there is a necessary expense and estimate for the moving of personnel.

Mr. Ben: If I may, Mr. Chairman, the Minister may be mistaken because it would seem strange that the travelling expenses would jump by almost 50 per cent. I point out last year that $738,598.09 was expended, and under this vote you are asking $735,000 for travelling expenses, a mere three thousand less, so you can hardly claim that the $300,000 is replacing the $3,000 which you are deleting from the item for travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: If I may have a moment, perhaps I could find the reason for this.

Mr. Ben: While the Minister's assistants are trying to find that answer, may I ask out of curiosity, going through these estimates I find out that the salaries paid to the officials always are in Eaton's or Simpson's figures; in other words, they do not always come to the even dollar. Here is one for a Mr. Silk, $23,999.94. May I ask why you docked the man six cents off his salary? Missed a day did he, or a minute late?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have now before me last year's estimates for travelling expenses for 1967-68 shown as $998,000 and this year the estimate is $735,000, a decrease of $263,000. The movement of personnel is shown separately this year, which it was not in last year's, as $300,000, which would make the estimate $1,035,000 instead of $998,000; an increase of $37,000 for those items.

Mr. Ben: Well, Mr. Chairman, may I be presumptuous enough to differ with the Attorney General? The 1967 public accounts on page B-19 showed total travelling expense of the Ontario Provincial Police as being $738,598.09. Might I enquire, where does he arrive at the $900,000 figure?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: The figure the hon. member is looking at is for two years ago.

Interjections by hon. members.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Might I inform the hon. member, this is the latest publication there is. It is two years old.

Mr. Ben: Where do you get the $900,000 figure; it is not that in this latest book?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: This is two years old.

Mr. Ben: Oh, I see.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Chairman, back in January I had occasion to write to the superintendent of the Ontario Provincial Police at Port Arthur over a situation that exists in the town of Macdiarmid; they have no police force of their own; there is one 12 miles north of them on Highway 11, at the town of Beardmore, which is also manned by the Ontario Provincial Police. Now, on two different occasions I received complaints from the people of Macdiarmid; one was in connection with a disturbance that occurred there. There are only three phones in this little hamlet of Macdiarmid; it is a fishing village, and as a result of this, they had to wait about four hours to get the Ontario Provincial Police from Nipigon to go 40 miles up this road, which was under construction, in order to investigate the disturbance. On another occasion, a man had a heart attack—

Mr. Chairman: Order please! Order!

Mr. Stokes: —on a highway, and they had to wait about three hours—

Mr. Chairman: There is much too much private discussion going on.

Mr. Stokes: —before they could contact the Ontario Provincial Police, before they could move him. So, I wondered why it was not possible to get the police from Beardmore down to investigate disturbances and accidents such as this, rather than having to dispatch the OPP officers from Nipigon.

I received a reply saying that they felt that it was quite adequate, and those were the arrangements, and they were not going to change it.

Now, I have had several complaints from the principal of the high school, and the Indian chief, and nobody seems to be able to move these people; they do not seem to want to change; they do not want to listen to any arguments you put forth as to reasons why it should be possible to dispatch somebody from 12 miles away rather than 40 or 45 miles away.

I was just wondering if, when you have Ontario Provincial Police policing a town, whether their responsibility ends there, or whether you can dispatch them to investigate accidents or deaths, say, within a reasonable distance of the town. And I was wondering what your policy is with regard to policing towns which have no police force themselves, and where you have to send Ontario Provincial Police long distances.

It would seem to me that it would make a lot more sense if you ordered somebody from 12 miles away rather than 40 miles away, but I have not been able to make any headway with the OPP in the Lakehead. I was wondering why this policy exists with the Ontario Provincial Police?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think I should like to answer this, Mr. Chairman. In northern Ontario, generally, the Ontario Provincial Police may police certain towns, certain municipalities, usually towns, but they police the area. It is an area situation because a great deal of it is unorganized. I do not know the particular situation except as it is related here, and I accept it as related.

It would seem strange that the call had to go to a detachment or personnel 40 miles away if there were personnel available within 12 miles, at Beardmore, as I understand it.

I do know that we have had difficulty in locating sufficient personnel at Beardmore to police that area adequately due to the lack of accommodation, and we have been trying to remedy that situation. It may be that the police were just not there and available because the hon. member knows it is a large territory; communication, as he has indicated, is poor, and it is not always that you can reach perhaps the closest detachment in that situation.

But I am glad he has brought it to the attention of the House. I would ask him if he would bring that particular situation to my attention so that I could look at it closely and just see what might be done to improve it.

Mr. Stokes: I would like to add just one thing further. In the town of Armstrong, where they have something like a population of 500, they have an OPP corporal, and six constables.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: That is a whole area.

Mr. Stokes: Yes, it is the whole area all right, but the people in the immediate area would not be many more than 400 or 500. Yet in the town of Beardmore along the main highway, they have I think it is three constables, and none of them will go 12 miles down to this adjoining hamlet to police that. We have to get somebody from 40 miles away to come in and do it. So, the two things seem to be at odds with one another.

Mr. C. G. Pilkey (Oshawa): Mr. Chairman, I would like, first of all, to relate a couple of cases, and then I want to ask the Minister what the people in this province can do in relation to some of the arrests. I do not want this to reflect on the Ontario Provincial Police because I do think that basically they do a pretty good job in our province. But, obviously, they are human and there are times that they make some mistakes.

There was a situation where a group were driving together on the 401; there was more than one car; and I want to illustrate this to make my point. As there was a great number of cars, the group got all broken up and at one point one of the cars was speeding and went past this fellow and he made a comment to his wife; he said that this fellow could be arrested or could be stopped for speeding.

And lo and behold, about three or four miles up the road the fast driver was pulled off to the side by the provincials. They had caught him. So the second man pulled over on the shoulder to wait for his friend. Lo and behold, the officer goes back and says, "Let us see your licence."

He says: "What for?"

"Well," he said, "you were speeding."

He said: "No, I just pulled in here to wait for my friend."

He said: "Oh, no, give us your licence."

So he gave him the licence and subsequently he had to appear in court somewhere in Kitchener and was fined for speeding. In addition to that, he lost a day's work in the plant. I do not recall exactly what the total cost was, but this is the position he found himself in.

Then, another case. I just want to relate the two. In this other case the Ontario Provincial Police was pulled off to the side of the road as they are on occasions on the 401. The policeman then drove along 401 and the chap was driving behind him. They went about a half a mile and the police pulled him over. The man said: "What for? I was not speeding."

The policeman said: "No, but you were travelling too close to me."

Travelling too close! He had just pulled off in front of him.

Frankly, there is an injustice. I do not think they should be running to their MPP's with these problems for us to raise them with the Attorney General in the hope he will do something about it. But it appears to me that there should be a place where the citizens of this province can make a direct appeal against those cases, so that they do not find themselves, as this one chap did, in the court.

The other fellow, by the way, pleaded guilty and paid the fine, because he figured out that whereas the fine was $17, if he went to court with it he probably was going to be convicted anyway. And in addition to that, he would have lost a greater part of a day's work. He figured it out economically that it was better to pay the fine and plead guilty.

All I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, to the Attorney General, is that there should be some area where these people can appeal if they really feel that there is an injustice served on them. As I say, I think that probably a great majority or 90 percent of them are legitimate, but I want to say that the provincial police are not infallible either. They are not infallible, they are human beings, and they make the odd mistake, and when they do make this mistake, I think that the people of this province ought to have an area where they can make a direct appeal.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, just one brief question here. I would like to get some further details about TIRF. I wonder if the Minister could give me the address?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I can get it for the hon. member. I have not got it in my material in front of me now. I will see he gets it right away.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you. At the beginning of this estimate, Mr. Chairman, which appears to have been a long long time ago, you may recall I asked you where private detective agencies should be discussed, and I was told to discuss it under this particular vote. So I want to bring a matter up here which I think is a very serious one. It involves the control of private agencies in this province.

It is very serious if a private agency is involved in a kidnapping in this province, and nothing is done about it. We know the facts were laid in front of the Attorney General. The matter involves two children, Valery and John Martin, who were kidnapped on May 15 of this year by persons employed by the Argus Detective Agency of Windsor, Ontario. The background of this story is that this is a terribly tragic situation in which the two children had parents who had split. The father had legal custody of the children here in Canada; the mother brought an action in California which the father did not contest because of expense.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to say that I am aware of all the facts of this matter; they were brought to my attention some time ago. The matter is being investigated by my people and by the Ontario Provincial Police. That investigation is going on. It is not yet complete.

Mr. Shulman: I asked the hon. Minister about this matter some weeks ago. At that time he said it was under investigation. I have the facts all here and, since this investigation has not yet been completed, I will be pleased to present the facts to him. The situation was very simple—

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I should, perhaps, add that while the provincial police have completed their portion of the investigation, the matter has been referred to the director of public prosecutions in my department, so at this point that is all I could say. But I am fully aware of all the facts.

Mr. Shulman: Well, perhaps the rest of the House would be interested.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: For the benefit of the member for London South (Mr. White), if no one else, Mr. Chairman, I think I should relate the facts, because these matters have been before the Minister for really quite a length of time.

It is a very very serious matter, and nothing has been done about it. It is time something was done about it, Mr. Chairman—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Take him in the back—

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, in California the mother of these children made an application to the courts to have custody of the children—

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, I know these facts.

Mr. Shulman: It dismays me that the member for London South does not wish to be educated. However—

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Have they anything to do with the estimates?

Mr. Shulman: Quite a bit to do with the estimates.

Mr. Reilly: If they have I would like to know where.

Mr. Shulman: Well, for the benefit of the Conservative whip—the member for Eglinton —I will explain this has to do with the control of detective agencies in this province, which were to be brought up under this vote, and in which the Attorney General is responsible. When a detective agency in this province partakes in a kidnapping, this is matter which is of interest in the estimates.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the mother of this child applied in California for custody in the courts. The father could not afford to go down; he is a man of very modest means. He did not attempt to defend the case, having already won, in American courts, custody of the children. He remained here in Canada, obeying the law; he is a teacher at Oakville. On May 15 of this year the children were grabbed off the street from the grandmother. There was a scuffle, and they were dragged into a car, driven across the border, and taken down to California.

Some hours after the abduction had taken place, one Duncan Stewart, aged 35, employed by the Argus Detective Agency, of Windsor, Ontario, and driving an auto registered to that agency, came to the local police station at 8 p.m. Actually, he showed them a badge from the Argus Detective Agency, and informed the police that he had been the driver of the car that was involved in the abduction. He presented certain papers from California which, he said, gave him authority to carry out this action—and which, may I say, was completely illegal. Those papers had no legal status here in this province, whatsoever.

May I say that The Criminal Code states that if someone does something lawful by unlawful means, he is guilty of a crime. It also says that when a crime is taking place, anyone who conspires with the person committing the crime is guilty of a crime.

Mr. Sopha: We do not give any opinions on medicine.

Mr. Shulman: That is very fortunate. These codes are clear, and there seems to be tacit approval by the Crown not to enforce the codes, as long as a member of the family is involved.

I know very well that the Attorney General has referred this matter to his director of public prosecutions. If I may anticipate—but I am not anticipating any member, I am anticipating what the director of public prosecutions will do—a charge will be laid of simple assault. There will be a court hearing and the person, or persons, involved will have their wrists slapped and nothing further will be done.

Now let me say what should be done in this case. The children—I do not know how to get them back—but what should be done in this case is make sure that this does not happen in Ontario again. You are only going to do that if you take away the licence of that detective agency, because if they know they can get away with this in the future, they, or some other detective agency, for a sum of money, will become involved in similar cases in the futre.

Let me strongly represent to the Attorney General that this is not a matter of laying a charge of assault. This was a kidnapping, nothing more, nothing less, and that detective agency should lose its licence.

I have another matter, unless the Attorney General wishes to make some comments on this.

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Well, I would comment quickly on this. The hon. member is determined to relate all the facts, which were well known, of course, to many members of the House, and certainly to my department and to myself. I am not sure he has stated them correctly. As I had stated early in his remarks, they are being investigated; the matter is before the director of public prosecutions in my department.

The hon. member now has entered the area of prophecy. He prophesies what is going to happen. Some things he does not know, apparently. The question of intent enters into a prosecution of this kind, an act of this kind—whether there is knowledge. Now he speaks of the order from California having no legal effect in Ontario. That may be so. The question that arises when you prosecute a person acting upon it is whether he has knowledge of the effect of that order.

These are things we have to take into account and weigh in the action which has to be taken. In any event, the short answer is, it is before the director of public prosecutions and will be acted upon as soon as our study is complete, which I trust will be soon.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the Attorney General through you, sir, that if a detective agency is not aware of the laws of this province, it should not be in that business?

Mr. Chairman, there is another matter I would like to bring up. I would like to presage my comments by saying that I agree with the member for Downsview that the Ontario Provincial Police, by and large, do a good job. I had the pleasure of being associated with Mr. Silk in my previous occupation and I found him always to be unfailingly polite, effective, and very pleasant to work with.

You have heard the member for Oshawa relate two cases of people who were charged, perhaps, unfairly. I would like to show the other side of the measure. You have had a number of occasions this session where various members have suggested that, perhaps, there are two sets of justice in this province, one for the rich and powerful and one for the not so rich and powerful.

We heard about Viola MacMillan, Mr. Farris, Mr. Wookey and Mr. Grafstrom; they got away with various matters which, for some reason, did not require prosecution.

Mr. Sopha: Is this relevant, I am asking you? Is it in order?

Mr. Chairman: It appears to the Chairman that the matter is relevant.

Mr. Shulman: The matter which I wish to discuss today has to do with the Ontario Provincial Police and a certain Mr. Archie McCol, age 65, of Inglewood.

This gentleman, who I understand was the designer for most of the bridges on Highway 401, was in a car accident some weeks ago. As a result of the accident his car struck another car, killing a person—I am sorry, some months ago. It was last September, in Mississauga. A .38 calibre pistol was found in the wreckage of his car and a warrant for his arrest on a criminal negligence charge was sworn out at the time. He was admitted to a Toronto hospital with the understanding that, when he was ready for discharge, the Toronto hospital would notify the provincial police and they would come out and arrest him. And they did that, the hospital notified the police when he was ready to be arrested. The two police officers arrived at the hospital to pick him up and he said, "Well I do not really want to be arrested."

There was a conversation which took place at that time which I would like to ask the Attorney General about. The provincial police then left the hospital, and the hospital presumably for a good reason decided to readmit him for the day. Subsequently, Mr. McCol was transferred, I believe, to Riverdale—in any case a convalescent hospital here in the city—

Mr. N. Whitney (Prince Edward-Lennox): Is that when the workmen's compensation hospital burned down, about that time?

Mr. Shulman: We will get to that. He signed himself out of the hospital in the company of his private pilot and has not been seen since. So, I would like to ask the hon. Attorney General, since the provincial police appear very efficient in laying charges in cases such as the member for Oshawa brought up, what particularly happened in this case; how did Mr. McCol talk the provincial police out of arresting him; does the Attorney General have any idea where Mr. McCol is at the present time; and is there a warrant out for his arrest?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: No. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the case at all, at least the name does not mean anything to me. If the hon. member cares to bring me these facts, I will be glad to look into it and give him a report on it.

Mr. Shulman: I have just related the facts. I am sure the Attorney General will give me a report.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Sudbury east.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): Mr. Chairman, in the north we have what could be described as something left over from the 19th century. We have company towns, and on Friday I was glad to hear the Attorney General advise the House that fatalities in the INCO holdings would now be investigated by the Ontario Provincial Police.

I would like to pursue this just a bit further and ask the Attorney General if he could ensure that the security guards at the international holdings were security guards, and the town police were town police, and not one and the same.

I do not think it is fair either to the security guards or to the men working in the plants to, on one occasion, be stopped for possibly speeding — it is right that they should be stopped for speeding—but stopped by a policeman and then find the next day he is supervising traffic at the plant.

I would urge the Attorney General to do one of two things. Either see to it that the municipalities are policed by provincial police, or that the security guards remain security guards constantly and Coppercliff have its same police continuously as the service police. There should be a distinction for the sake of the men and the sake of the employees involved.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 211 agreed to.

This concludes the estimates of The Department of the Attorney General.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity of addressing myself to the members of the House with respect to the estimates of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset of my remarks to note that special care has been taken to compile statistics and facts for these estimates up to December 31, 1967. I am sure that you will realize that this is really more by way of statistical data than is required.

At the time of last year's estimates, however, the department was only a few months old. Even at this time, our history dates back only 19 months, and it is with this thought in mind that we have striven to have our registrars and branch heads provide the most up-to-date information possible in a practical sense. Those of you who have had an opportunity to familiarize yourselves with our first annual report will have noted that the information contained therein covers departmental activity up to and including the previously-mentioned date of December 31, 1967.

A quick examination of our estimates will reveal that we are seeking approval of a proposed increase in expenditures of $645,000, or 25.2 per cent more revenue than was the case previously. Specifically, we are seeking approval of an amount totalling $3,208,000 for fiscal 1968-69, compared with $2,563,000 for fiscal 1967-68.

We have experienced a growth and new depth of activity in all areas, but most significantly in our main office function and the operation and scope of the consumer protection division. Collectively, the department has grown in manpower from 242 on April 1, 1967, to a total of 300 today.

Perhaps the most exciting evidence of growth can be found in our consumer protection division, which has expanded more than any other single segment of the department in the past year. The appropriation sought from this House will make consumer protection a million-dollar business in Ontario—in fact, a $1.2 million business.

The projected increase represents a rise of $334,000 over last year's budget of $866,000, or 38.5 per cent. It will make possible the maintenance of a staff of skilled personnel which has grown from 98 a year ago to 128 today, and includes in its ranks lawyers, examiners, inspectors, registrars, clerical and secretarial people.

A second area where a marked increase has been noted is in the main office of the department. These estimates propose the approval of funds totalling $650,000— a figure $150,000 or 30.3 per cent greater than a year ago. The need for these moneys reflects in part the growth and consolidation of staff which has been assembled to provide ready expertise on many complex areas with which the department finds itself involved.

This complement includes a solicitor attached to the main office and an information branch of four, in addition to a departmental financial research group made up of a financial research assistant and an economist.

An additional $94,000 over last year's budget of $795,000 is being sought in these estimates for the Ontario securities commission. This represents a rise of 11.8 per cent.

There have been some additions in staff and some well-earned adjustments upward in salary, but the main emphasis has not been on increasing personnel. Hon. members may well recall that the commission had achieved substantial growth in staff at the time of the 1967-68 estimates.

I am informed that the Ontario securities commission is currently in the process of consolidating its services through making maximum use of the many proficient persons now on staff. Because of the requirements in The Securities Act, 1966—with respect to insider trading, takeover bids and financial statements, for example—the services provided by the commission are being used to a growing extent.

The volume of printing required, particularly as related to the OSC monthly bulletin, has expanded to a considerable degree and is reflected in the need for more funds.

Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further with my estimates, I would like to clarify a situation which has arisen as a result of statements made by me in the House and subsequently commented on in the press.

On June 14, 1968, in response to a question before the orders of the day regarding circumstances which preceded the acquisition by Rothmans of Pall Mall Canada Limited of an 11 per cent interest in Canadian Breweries Limited from Argus Corporation Limited, I referred to the published remarks of Mr. E. P. Taylor and Mr. Bruce Mathews. These remarks, on behalf of Argus Corporation, were made at a time when the Wall Street Journal had published a report concerning alleged negotiations between Argus and Transcontinental Investing Corporation, of New York. Transcontinental had refused to comment on the negotiations.

Mr. Mathews, while neither confirming nor denying the fact of negotiations, was quoted as saying that the number of companies wanting to have conversations about acquiring various parts of the operations of Canadian Breweries was almost continuous.

At page 4475 of Hansard for June 14, I noted that Mr. Taylor might equally have been criticized for adding fuel to the fire of potential speculation, had he commented on any negotiations before a firm agreement had been reached.

I then went on to say:

—I know of no reason in the business world why a person is not permitted and privileged to make a categorical denial with respect to a business transaction that is being negotiated—

Subsequently, in the Toronto Globe and Mail of June 18, a report under the heading "Ethical Practice View Requires Explanation," the following comment was made by the writer, Mr. Fraser Robertson, and I quote:

> But the public will be even more concerned about Mr. Rowntree's statement, which seems to say it is quite proper for any company to lie about important negotiations.

Apparently, in the minds of some observers, my statement has created a false impression. This was the opposite of my actual intention, and I wish to make my position clear beyond all question.

First, I think a man—or, for that matter, a company—is entitled to negotiate for the purchase or sale of property, including shares, outside of the glare of publicity. However—and it is in this regard that my statement appears to have given rise to confusion—it is my view that a man, when questioned, is entitled to say nothing or offer no comment about his private affairs, just as Transcontinental did.

This I believe to be basic, because he offers comment, and the negotiations do not prove fruitful, the comment can only lead to speculation and injury to parties who acted upon it.

It is similarly fundamental, however, that if he elects to say anything, he must tell the truth and the whole truth. Anything less than that criterion is just not acceptable.

In the Globe and Mail of July 5, Mr. Robertson repeated the inference that I said that it was quite proper for any company to lie about important negotiations. In an article which dealt with insider trading he said, and I quote:

> It will be no comfort to the public if insiders keep their hands legally clean while brazenly lying to the public about activities that may seriously affect the fortunes of outsiders, a practice recently upheld by Leslie Rowntree, Ontario's Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, it had been my intention to clarify this matter during my estimates. Unfortunately, my estimates did not come before the House as soon as I expected, with the result that the second column was written before I was able to make my position clear.

My interpretation of the July 5 column is that Mr. Robertson is suggesting that mere control of insider trading will not satisfy the public that its interests are being protected. In that regard, the Ontario securities commission is conducting basic research at this moment, and has been for some weeks, to try and determine whether there is any correlation between reported insider trading, news releases dealing with insider trading, and subsequent market action.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that, time and again on the public platform, I have insisted that all business transactions in Ontario must be on the table, and that there must at all times be "full, true and plain disclosure." More than any other single principle, it is in fact this undertaking which is the basis for our existence as a department functioning to protect the public interest. I at no time intended to infer any deviation from this general principle.

Mr. Chairman, the last item I would like to make reference to has to do with some matters dealing with government insurance, with respect to our assets. I, as of today, will be in a position to table that question and also to expand upon it and that information will be made available to the members tomorrow. After our estimates are concluded there will be an opportunity for a debate and discussion, with respect to government insurance, as I undertook several weeks ago.

A commission team has just completed new regulations dealing with finance companies, trust indentures and trustees under The Securities Act. The regulations were ready by July 1 in keeping with a proposal that I announced in the House on February 23 of this year.

The commission, in addition to its growing regulatory responsibilities, is continung to cooperate wth a number of committee studies and proposals which we anticipate can have important implications in Ontario and Canada.

Principal among these matters are the CANSEC proposal and the mutual funds study, which require a co-operative national effort and, in Ontario, the committee to review the commission's underwriting, vendor consideration, escrow or pooling policies and other matters related to financing mining exploration and development companies.

Work to advance the CANSEC proposal has unfortunately been interrupted in recent months as a result of events in Ottawa. It is our hope in Ontario, however, that the co-operative effort required to advance the idea that a national securities commission can be a good thing for Canada will resume at an early date.

I think that anything any of us can do to strengthen our province and our country through enabling people to have greater confidence in our financial institutions must be done. I see CANSEC as one vehicle which could contribute greatly towards this goal.

Ontario is, through the Ontario securities commission, continuing to co-operate and work closely with the Canadian committee on mutual funds and investment contracts.

The purpose of the study is to obtain complete information concerning open-end funds —including funds sponsored by trust companies—and investment contracts, and thereby to determine whether legislation in addition to that which already exists is required for the protection of the public interest.

Ontario is sharing the cost of this study together with the nine other provinces. The total cost is being shared on a 50/50 basis between the federal government and the provinces.

An appropriation of $200,000 is set aside under the main office vote to support the studies mentioned together with actuarial studies being made into the matter of automobile insurance; a public information material study; a research grant constitutional study, and a research commodity market study.

In keeping with the other major branches of the department, an effort has been made over the past year to better equip the office of the superintendent of insurance and registrar of loan and trust corporations to provide more comprehensive service for the public.

Personnel in the branch has been increased to 47 and budgetary requirements are up 16.4 per cent, or a total of $66,000 over last year's figure of $403,000.

There has been some strengthening of inspection services and greater supervision provided over matters relating to the examination of policy contracts.

There is provision in the estimates for an additional counsel to be employed to be part of a team which will study the various existing Acts under the branch, and assist with finding ways to cope with new problems.

Mr. Gordon E. Grundy, FCA, assumed his new duties as superintendent of insurance and registrar of loan and trust corporations on May 1.

Mr. Cecil Richards, FCA, the former superintendent, is working on the research required preparatory to a planned re-drafting of The Loan and Trust Corporations Act. Mr. Richards, in addition, acts in an advisory capacity and is providing liaison with the other provinces in respect of a proposed general updating of loan and trust legislation.

I am pleased, Mr. Chairman, to be able to report that credit counselling service offices have been established in Brantford and London through The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs in co-operation with local people.

We have agreed, in writing, to provide offices in each of these cities with 40 per cent of their operating budget up to a maximum of $5,000 a year. This will enable them to provide debt counselling in cases where consumers have over-extended themselves.

The establishment of these two offices is in keeping with the intent of section 1, subsection 2(b) of an Act to establish and provide for the duties of a consumer protection bureau, which states that the consumer protection bureau shall "promote and assist existing counselling services in respect of consumer credit."

Extensive studies are underway into two aspects of the services provided by the registration and examination branch of the department.

The advisory services division of Treasury board is assisting department officials in a study of the registration and office procedures and functions with a view to consolidating the four main registration facilities into one central group.

The legislation involved includes The Collection Agencies Act, The Real Estate and Business Brokers Act, The Mortgage Brokers Registration Act, and The Used Car Dealers Act.

A team of lawyers, under the direction of the department solicitor, is screening the four Acts to ensure that similar regulatory functions are treated in a like manner. They will proceed, taking into consideration the principles raised in the McRuer Royal commission inquiry into civil rights.

A vital and growing part of our consumer protection programme has to do with the efforts being made to better inform the average Ontario citizen of his rights under the law.

We have attempted to bring this message home through various means, all of which have met with good response from the public.

Early this year the department began a series of consumer protection conferences with a two-day seminar-type programme at the Lakehead. This was followed by similar conferences in Woodstock, North Bay and, recently, at Kingston.

Each conference serves a dual purpose. They, on the one hand, provide the opportunity for a segment of the buying public to get first-hand exposure to the consumer protection legislation available in our province and the people who administer it. At the same time, opportunity is provided for department officials to discuss, in a workshop atmosphere, the problems and pitfalls which face the average consumer.

It is our intention to resume the programme in the fall and to extend it in the spirit that I have outlined.

An attempt has been made at these conferences to bring together a cross-section of interested people, and from this exposure at the local level to establish a continuing flow of information and service.

In addition to community leaders, representatives from labour, the retail industry, women's groups and consumers at large are invited.

Explanations are given by senior departmental personnel on their special fields of interest, and are balanced off against workshops, panel discussions and forums. Broad audience participation is encouraged.

In order that some of the effect of the programme can be extended to those who may not be able to attend a particular conference, an effort is made to establish the type of liaison with a community that will lead to appropriate registrars and other experts being invited at a later date to speak to specific groups. Our experience has shown that there is a growing tendency for organizations to take advantage of this offer on the part of the department to furnish speakers.

An integral part of the seminar programme has to do with the dissemination of pamphlets which have been designed and written in a manner that have made them both attractive and informative to the individual .

When the pamphlet programme was inaugurated less than ten months ago, we quite frankly had no real idea of how great the demand would be.

Our aim was to provide information on consumer related matters in the hope that the general public would be interested enough to read and request the material.

I am happy to be able to tell the House that public response to these publications has been far beyond our most ambitious expectations. Upwards of one million pamphlets have been distributed both on our own initiative and on request from organizations and individuals.

We intend to extend this programme and produce new pamphlets to deal with particular areas to supplement those already available.

Another area where a planned effort has been made to inform the individual of his consumer rights has come through our participation in fall fairs, the Canadian national exhibition and the national home show.

We have been encouraged by the response at these events and intend to continue and enlarge on this facet of our consumer education programme.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there was some interest shown in the House with respect to the recent four-day interprovincial conference on consumer protection, sponsored by the government of Ontario through my department.

It is relevant to deal briefly with the conference, since many of the areas discussed involved matters which are of concern to many members.

Frequently I have taken the position that many facets of the complex area of consumer protection lend themselves to a broad, cooperative approach as opposed to some sort of singular action by a given province or jurisdiction.

This conference confirmed my belief, and I might add that the desirability of a joint approach in some key areas was acknowledged by representatives of every province and representatives from the federal government. The result was a decision to form working committees to provide research and study into areas of concern.

It was accepted that there were no easy solutions to many of the problems, but that through sorting out and defining the areas of practical jurisdiction we could work toward avoidance of unnecessary duplication, with the overall determination being to achieve desired goals on behalf of the consumer.

Every province and the federal government will take part in what we expect will be highly selective and expert committee studies where small, well-qualified groups will work on specific problems in a manner which has not been done before.

The areas slated to come under study include direct sales and "cooling-off" periods; standard form of consumer credit contract; warranties, disclaimer clauses, cut-off clauses, assignments, and holders in due course; prepayment privileges, default and forfeiture provisions, repossession rights, relief against acceleration and forfeiture; advertising and federal-provincial liaison in jurisdictional matters.

We anticipate that a number of reports will be ready by September 30 of this year so that they may provide the basis for the next interprovincial conference on consumer protection.

I would like to deal briefly with two Acts which have been deemed to have a consumer orientation, and thereby should be of interest to the House in the context of these estimates.

The first, The Cemeteries Act, 1960, is now being administered under the consumer protection division of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. The transfer was approved by order-in-council. The transfer brought an additional 12 persons under the consumer protection division.

The Act, which was extensively amended in 1955 following a report of a select committee of the legislature, had previously been administered under The Department of Health successively by the sanitary engineering division, the environmental sanitation branch, and the public health engineering section of the environmetal health branch.

It is in the providing of supervision over the handling of funds held in trust under The Cemeteries Act that the consumer protection division will function with respect to this transfer of authority. The divison will also approve plans, rates and rules and deed forms dealing with the actual operation of a cemetery.

Two types of funds are involved. One, the pre-need assurance fund, involves moneys set aside in trust by the owner of a cemetery out of the amount received on the sale of cemetery supplies and services.

The other has to do with perpetual care funds which are received by the owner of a cemetery in trust for the purpose of providing perpetual care of a cemetery.

The second piece of legislation, which is in the process of being transferred to the consumer protection division, is An Act to control the content and identification of stuffing in upholstered and stuffed articles upon their manufacture, sale and renovation.

As I have explained previously to the House, the purpose of this legislation is to safeguard the health of the public and to protect the consumer by ensuring that the content of upholstered and stuffed articles is as represented by the manufacturer.

We anticipate that the transfer of this legislation will be effected in the near future. It will add eight persons to the consumer protection division staff and bring to a total of 19 the number of Acts under the jurisdiction of my department .

Hon. members will recall that on April 30 of this year I announced that executive council approval had been given to the appointment of Mr. Budd H. Rieger as chairman of the Ontario deposit insurance corporation.

It has occurred to me that some members might question why ODIC is being maintained, though the cost of doing so is minimal, when in fact the relevant legislation was amended last year to direct Ontario firms into the federal deposit insurance scheme.

It had been our intention from the outset to dissolve the Ontario corporation provided that we were satisfied that the federal plan met the requirements needed to protect Ontario depositors.

We are, of course, satisfied with the insurance provisions of the federal Act, but we are maintaining the Ontario deposit insurance corporation at this time because of the rehabilitation provisions in the Ontario Act which have not yet been incorporated into the federal Act. These provisions empower ODIC, through right of entry, to co-operate with a firm in difficulty with a view to helping it achieve managerial and fiscal stability in the public interest.

One other very low-cost item that I would like to mention is the financial and commercial affairs advisory committee. This committee is made up of very expert persons in the financial, legal and commercial segments of our society. They serve voluntarily, giving advice and acting on a consultative basis to the Minister.

I wish to state at this time Mr. Chairman, that the persons involved on the committee have given unstintingly of their time and effort and have performed an invaluable service on behalf of the people of Ontario.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, it is indeed gratifying to me, as a person who has been associated for some years with the financial community, to have an opportunity to comment on the financial affairs side of this department. I might say also that, over the last several years, I have been impressed, as have others in the community, by the progress which this government has made in endeavouring to achieve what I think are the three major objectives of the investment and business community.

I would say these three objectives are, first of all, to establish the confidence of our business community, the confidence of the public in our business community and not to try and substitute, here in Queen's Park, the judgment of politicians and civil servants for those experienced managers, directors and professionals as the Minister has mentioned in his speeches.

The principle we are trying to get across is the importance of full, true and plain disclosure, so that the people can judge fairly and objectively what is good and what is not good. It is not the function of the legislators in the free enterprise system to make things so difficult that operations are inhibited and they cannot function properly. The laws we legislate must be workable and reasonable.

We must create an atmosphere of confidence in the Canadian economy that attracts, not only our own investors, but those abroad to invest as free individuals in this province. Unfortunately, we have an element in this industry, as in most industries, that is irresponsible and necessitates a constant vigilance on our part in the way of new laws and constant vigilance in the way of supervision and enforcement of these laws.

I would like to say that I read, with some interest, the report of The Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs which was published a few weeks ago for the period ending December 31, 1967. It showed that there had been quite a bit of work done in establishing a good department operation. But as I got into this report, I was dismayed by the lack of information that shareholders of companies would normally hope to find in annual reports whereby they might judge the merits of the operation of their company.

Now, our role as legislators is perhaps somewhat more than those of shareholders of companies, because I think that we have a responsibility to know the background and operation of the departments for which we answer to our constituencies, and we should have information whereby we can judge how well and how efficiently the taxpayer's money is being used in the operation of these departments.

I would say that if any department of this government should be showing the way, it should be this Department of Financial and Commercial Affairs. It has spent literally months devising the forms whereby the normal corporations of this province must report and disclose their affairs, and it should be prepared to give equally good and complete disclosure of its operation, not just to the public, but particularly to ourselves as legislators.

I have been very much frustrated in this regard of trying to get background information, and it is no wonder that during this past session, with the lack of information, cost benefit analysis and proper basis on which one can judge the efficiency of the way our money is being used, that so much time is being taken by this House in going over these estimates.

As I go through the report of say, the British American Oil Company, I can see what it has been doing in each of its fields, how the company's progress has been made.

The Minister has done that to a degree in his department report, but we do not get anything of the financials, of the cost of operating various parts of the operation. I think this is very important. I think we should know just how much various branches are costing, and what personnel they have in them.

The accomplishments are listed to a degree here, but I think it is very important Mr. Chairman, that the Minister show us in this report not just a lot of platitudes, but something whereby we can judge how well he has been operating.

If we went to a shareholders' meeting of a company and we just had this report presented, we would be in for very justifiable criticism and very lengthy criticism. I think it is time that this department led the way in establishing new standards of public accounting and reporting on government operations, and it is an opportunity that I hope the Minister will take advantage of another year.

I have heard plenty of criticism and suggestions about the federal government's lack of efficiency, but here we do have comparative figures, for example, coming out from the Minister of Finance dated June 14 for the period ended April, 1968, and showing the comparable period of the year before.

Because we do not have comparable periods here, we have the hon. member for Humber who misquoted, inadvertently, but with plenty of reason, because the figures are not there in the department estimates, the budget estimates. That is not your department, I agree, but we do not have comparable figures here, and yet this is one of the basic things that we are insisting private business supply.

Mr. Ben: On a point of order, I quoted the right figures, I did not have the other figures. I did not misquote them, please correct that.

Mr. Deacon: All right.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You fellows had better get together over there.

Mr. Singer: Oh, we are together.

Mr. Ben: I did not misquote any figures, I just gave the latest that were available to the Legislature.

Mr. Deacon: Shortly after the Minister published a report for the period ended December 31, we received a report from Canada Packers for the period ended March 31. It did not take them four and a half months to make their report, and a very complete report it is. It is because they start preparing their report not at the end of the year, but they start during the year and are ready to proceed and they can then give us promptly as shareholders, or as the public, a good idea of what that company is doing, what the industry is doing, and what the outlook might be. We can see the past, the present and the future.

I suggest that this department should act on the premise of not saying, "Do as I say but not as I do," but "Follow the example of this department." I hope another year we will see a much more impressive and useful document for the annual report upon which we can make our judgment of the estimates.

I notice in this annual report it has reference in the Minister's statement to its financial affairs advisory committee. I suggest that on that committee, which includes some of the foremost business people of this community and this province, that they would be able to provide the Minister with many useful ideas as to how to improve his report in another year so we can all laud his work and not criticize it in this regard at least.

I read with some interest the operation of the Ontario securities commission and the study of their Price-Waterhouse report, 1966, the basis of establishing the commission in its new form and setting it up. I was particularly interested in this because I brought up some questions about Prudential Finance the other day in the House. I did not bring up this matter of Prudential Finance just to raise a lot of old sores. It is not old hat. The question of the Prudential Finance Corporation is a very important one for us in this House to study in detail. There are many questions we have to examine closely, and when I read through the documents and read them through carefully and studied them, with many of those who have been concerned with this, I find that we have failed in many areas, and I am not sure that we have covered up these areas so that we can prevent a recurrence of such a catastrophe.

We have seen, in the case of Prudential Finance, a determined promoter being able to take away—and literally, in many ways, steal—from innocent investors millions of dollars. We can say quite rightly that they had a prospectus in which they could judge the merits of the investment. In looking through that prospectus I agree that this, in the eyes of any experienced investor, would be shunned as a very, very risky and virtually bankrupt company and one that we would never recommend to anyone. After studying it very briefly, we could say we would not recommend this.

But we look at what has happened in this case. In these questions I have asked the Minister, and I am going to be asking him, to provide answers, and I hope he can to the greatest extent when the estimates of the Ontario securities commission come forward.

I notice there are many gaps in the reports that were given on this, that were published in Mr. Howard's report, in the Osler, Hoskin opinion, and in the Clarkson report. And I think we should have the answers to these questions before we go any further.

I think we should know the answers to them, and we should be sure that we have gone as far as we can go—after a catastrophe like this, which has shaken the confidence of thousands of people who are investing in this province—and have done all we possibly can as legislators to correct it, and done all we possibly can as managers responsible for the operation of the Ontario securities commission, to be sure it is equipped to provide the type of disclosure and supervision that is necessary in situations of this sort.

I look at the Wee Gee Mines situation of last fall. It was seven weeks from the time that the questionnaires were received from the brokers dealing in Wee Gee Mines before the commission took action—seven weeks. It took one week—seven days—for the brokers to supply the information, but seven weeks for the commission to decide whether or not it should take action.

This is not good enough. In that period of time, the stock rose sharply, there was a lot of trading in it and a lot of people could be hurt. I think it is most important that we look into questions like this to see where we are slipping or not doing the job as well as we should be doing.

Now, it comes down to staff, the quality of the staff. The stakes in this industry are very high; great rewards for those who can get away with illegal procedures and in effect stealing from the public in a way that we cannot catch them very easily. So we have to be especially vigilant, especially capable, and we must be sure that we have experts in our Ontario securities commission who are capable of dealing with, and quickly ascertaining when there are difficulties and when there is a situation which needs to be looked into.

We have done a great deal to improve the situation. In the last several years the change has been gratifying, but we still see a major turnover in staff. We get good people in and after a while they leave. We had a very heavy turnover last year and why? Is it a matter of salaries? Is it a matter of atmosphere?

We want to make this as challenging and as meaningful a role as anybody could take up because we know how important it is to the whole economy of this province. We want to have it where people can invest here, knowing that Ontario is vigilant, that it has laws that are sensible, and sees that these laws are enforced by knowledgable people; who are not so slow in dealing with our affairs and not using a staff that is not particularly experienced or adept; not only slow, but inefficient in dealing with matters that come before them.

I think our staff has been improving, in actual fact, in dealing with prospectuses these days. It takes somewhere between 10 days and two weeks to give the letter of deficiency on an underwriting. But you know if I go to the Manufacturers Life Insurance Company with a prospectus, it takes them 24 to 48 hours to tell me what is wrong with that issue, and they do it in considerable detail. You will find that it is not just that insurance company, but almost any institutional investor, that has people who can quickly get to the core of a prospectus, determine what they do not like about it, and give you the answers in a hurry.

There is no reason why the Ontario securities commission cannot operate much more quickly than it already does. Of course, as long as we have a problem with other provinces not operating in co-operation, we will have frustration and delays, and I am pleased to see that the Minister is endeavouring to get CANSEC in operation and the co-operation of other provinces working as soon as possible.

It will be a great achievement when one prospectus or one securities commission will clear, in effect, a prospectus for the whole country. I hope we can do it without the cumbersome procedures that they follow to the south of the line in securities exchange commission which not only is terribly expensive, but terribly slow. I am sure that the way the securities commission, or the chairman of the securities commission, is working is the right one, that of co-ordination and co-operation. Our goal is competence and that is what I hope we can establish.

One aspect of the securities commission that did dismay me greatly this year is that I think they have been moving arbitrarily and too hastily on the matter of mutual funds. During the year they brought in a schedule on mutual fund fees that was completely arbitrary. Instead of waiting for a period of time until the study of the mutual funds committee is available—and the Minister a year ago stated it would be available this January—the commission introduced a schedule which it thinks is all right.

Now, as a result, one of our most successful funds in the country ceased selling its fund even though it had one of the best records of any in the continent, because it said that even though it was the best performer, it could not get credit for it. This is defeating one of the major objectives the Minister has stated in the past of not inhibiting the operations of business. These people know what they are doing; there has not been a public outcry against the operations of this fund. It has been a very successful one, and unless there is real need and good reason for making an arbitrary change before the study of the Canadian mutual funds committee is available, then I think the commission should have kept its hands out of this matter.

The next area that I wanted to discuss was the matter of the superintendent of insurance and registrar of trust and loan companies. The objective and the purpose of the superintendent of insurance and registrar of trust and loan companies is to keep a guardian eye on the operations of this industry, so we can be sure that they are in a sound financial condition. We are not going to have a major catastrophe such as we had a few years ago in the Atlantic Acceptance–British Mortgage–York Trust debacle. But Mr. Bobkin, for example, one of those insured under the Wentworth Insurance Company, wonders just what sort of guardian eye we are keeping. Mr. Bobkin is one of those who complained to the department and who sought assistance from the department in connection with insurance of his car, which he had through the Wentworth Insurance Company. He is still paying for his claim out of his own pocket, because the insurance company went broke.

He wonders what sort of a guardian eye this department is maintaining, and I look at it and I would have to say they are looking at the annual reports every year. I know the Minister knows that the financial condition of a company can change very quickly in a year. As a matter of fact, in the brokerage business we know, very much to our regret, that overnight what appears to be a very strong surplus position can be changed through imprudent balance of investments. In many ways you can be caught off base. The stock exchange operates a system which I think is a rather good one. They have a monthly questionnaire that the firms have to fill out. They have not only a monthly questionnaire that their firms are subjected to, but at any time they are also liable to have the auditors walk in and check their position at the end of a month. If there is a serious discrepancy between the position they have reported and the position that the auditors find, there is real trouble to pay. In this way, they are able to keep a good monthly check on the types of investments, what the obligations are, the liabilities as well as the resources of the companies in these fields.

This is what is important for us to do, Mr. Chairman. It is important for us to really supervise these accounts. An annual report does not mean a thing when a company can readily dress its statement quite well when it is going to have to be ready for an audit. The way is to have these companies ready at any time for inspection, that at all times we know they are in a proper position to meet their obligations, and so we do not have men like Mr. Bobkin saying, "What is this department doing in supervising and being a guardian eye on my insurance company?" We want to have people's confidence not only in our insurance companies, but in our trust and loan companies. If we had such a system, I am sure the cost of the deposit insurance would be much less, because the risk would be greatly reduced.

I would appreciate hearing the result of the great study by Mr. Mayerson, which the Minister described as being done last year. Perhaps he will tell us that later on during the estimates.

So I am hoping that in this whole question of insurance and trust and loan companies, the Minister will adopt the policy of not whether it is convenient and necessary for companies to be incorporated to operate, but to see that they are properly supervised, so that we know that their affairs are in good order.

My colleague, the member for Kitchener (Mr. Breithaupt), will comment later on the consumer affairs section, as well as my colleague from Waterloo North (Mr. Good), on another aspect of consumer affairs.

I would just like to summarize by saying that I hope the Minister will set an example in the future in his method of reporting. He has a great opportunity. He has a good advisory committee to assist him, and I think that the government can show new leadership in this field of how government can report effectively and simply and in understandable fashion to the taxpayers of the province.

I am hoping that we will see an improvement in the availability of experts in the Ontario securities commission. I was pleased to read of the recent appointment of Mr. Duggan, a very experienced man, and I think associate director of the securities commission.

I am hoping that we will see less confusion and overlap, which I forgot to bring up earlier, in the companies branch between the Provincial Secretary's reporting—the reporting that the Ontario securities commission requires from companies. It seems to me this is an overlap that we should be eliminating by perhaps putting the companies branch under the securities commission.

I remind you again that the stakes in this field are very high. We need expertise, we need vigilance. I am sure we will never be able to stop people who are determined to get around the law. But at least we can be on our toes, so we do not have people running away with situations like the Prudential one because we failed to be alert to the situation there. We did not see that in that case these prospectuses were issued to all those who bought the securities. We did not have any provision, nor do we yet have provision, whereby, when there is no underwriter looking after the buyers of securities, that there is extra precaution taken by the securities commission in looking after these people—people where companies are directly selling their securities to the public without an underwriter.

I am hoping that we will see a continued increase in investor confidence and an improvement of all the aspects of the operation of the financial affairs side of the department, as we lead the way, I hope, in this province, in creating confidence in and of our business community.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, may I say how pleased I am to come to this particular estimate. On previous estimates another member of my party had the primary responsibility so I had to restrain my remarks unduly. But now I can speak freely, I am sure that you and I both will have a most pleasant evening.

This particular estimate involved a relatively small amount of money—less than one per cent of that of supposedly larger departments—but this in my opinion is the most important department because the $3 million that is involved here, particularly the portion of it that has to do with securities legislation, affects every other department in this government and, in fact, everything that we do in this province. If it is ill-managed or non-managed, the cost of everything that we buy goes up and the cost of everything that the government does goes up. For that reason, the securities laws are of primary importance in our society, and they are not good ones, unfortunately.

There was a committee to look into this matter last year, and the chairman of that committee, with some pride, likes to call it after his name. Actually if I had chaired that I would have preferred to have it called by another member's name, because of the matters that are left out of the report. I will go into that in some detail when we come to that estimate; similarly the matter of health insurance—which has caused a great deal of comment—the securities regulations, the Toronto stock exchange, and lack of disclosure to shareholders. But this evening, because of the limited time available, I am going to confine my remarks to one very important item; the matter of automobile insurance in the province.

I have been doing considerable research in this matter since my election, and I began that research because during the election campaign I received some 20-odd complaints from people who felt that they had been treated badly by the automobile insurance companies. This interested me, and I put a personal ad in the three Toronto newspapers for one week in February, and asked people to write to me if they felt that they had been ill treated by insurance companies.

I received close to 300 replies to that very tiny ad. So tonight I would just like to deal with this one problem which has been neglected in this province. The people who replied to my ad in their letters, almost to the last person, gave the same message, and it is a very important one.

It is a message of abuse by insurance companies, of financial losses, great and small, of wasted time, wasted money and human suffering. The message invariably is of competing sorrows: the competing sorrows of two parties injured or killed, and only one side receiving any compensation.

The present system of compensating highway traffic accident victims is to assess fault —the victim not at fault succeeds and receives financial compensation, while the party liable at law for the accident fails, and may have to lay out a great deal of money for liability.

What is fault, or liability? It may be a momentary misjudgment as a stream of cars travelling at 60 mph pass each other by a few inches, two car lengths apart, heading north on a holiday week-end in July. Or it may be a misjudgment in the confusion of rush-hour traffic. Or it may be a car sliding helplessly out of control on an icy road.

In any event, the insurance companies, the institutions that advertise protection for their clients, rush to see if they can establish that their client was not liable. For insurance companies generally, entirely in this province, insure not their own client's safety, but his negligence. If they can establish that the other driver was negligent then they need not pay the claim.

Here is a sample letter which shows the problem which arises:

> Dear Dr. Shulman:
>
> I was involved in a car accident on December 2, 1967, and the insurance company has not settled with me, nor had anything to do with me.
>
> The other driver was driving, without lights, when he hit me, and he was also drunk. The police officer charged him and he was convicted of impaired driving and fined $150 or seven days.
> Since then I have mailed a registered letter containing a police record of the accident and two estimates to his insurance company, and haven't heard from them as yet.

This accident happened December 2, but the insurance company was not notified until January. On December 20, the driver was charged and was convicted of impaired driving, but on March 1, the insurance company still claimed to be looking for an independent witness "who can probably clear up this matter." For if they can somehow establish that their client was not responsible for the accident, if they can blame it on someone else, then they need not pay the claim.

And if there is any question as to liability, then the matter goes to court to be adjudicated one, two or three years after the event. This occurs despite the human suffering, despite the fact that a husband may have been killed or maimed so badly that he can no longer support his family. For it is not the injured father and husband's company that is liable for compensation, but an opposing insurance company, representing the negligent party, who must pay the claim. And what better position for an insurance company to bargain from—against a family with no provider and no income.

Now, they are free to negotiate a settlement from strength. They are not there to compensate the injured or the estate of a deceased, but to protect their client and to strike the best deal they can so as to cut their own losses.

Take what we offer you, they say, or be prepared to struggle through two or three years of court proceedings. It is an immoral system.

In a documented report carried out by students at Osgoode hall, Professor Allan Linden has conclusively shown that many seriously injured accident victims receive far less than adequate compensation for their losses.

And what of the other party who has been found negligent? He too may have been maimed or killed. Under present legislation, we merely say to that party, too bad—drive more carefully—too bad about you, too bad about your wife, too bad about your children. And in one careless moment a family may be plunged into continuing despair.

Then there are the cases where the accident occurred through no one's fault—neither party is to blame. This is the kind the insurance companies like. If you are going to have an accident, say the insurance companies, have that kind. Then we don't have to pay a cent, and, in fact, if you live through it, we may even get to raise your rates. Fortunately, because of Canada's legal system, this particular type of financial disaster is rare here, but it does occur, although it is common in the U.S.

All this suffering, and for what? For the insurance companies, who make millions of dollars without accepting their fair share of responsibility. But then, they are corporations, inanimate, and you can't expect a paper creation to have human feelings—to react to letters like this one:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

My present circumstances are rather desperate. In the latter part of August, 1965, my daughter, Judith, age 18, was killed in a car accident. At that time she was my only financial help. My lawyer claimed that there was nothing I could do and it was no use trying to claim anything. The driver of the car was a bad driver and had to pay $400 insurance to get his licence.

My daughter was working in the tobacco harvest with some friends. They accepted a ride from this driver.

Two weeks later I was in a car with some friends when we were struck from behind by a five-ton truck, two tons overloaded. I was sitting in the front seat and was thrown forward, striking my left ear on the dashboard.

I collected $900 in cash, the rest went to my lawyer and doctor bills.

My lawyer advised me to settle for this because of my desperate need at the time. But I have had the most dreadful headaches extending from my ear ever since.

I had had headaches before, but ever since that day earaches come with it, and depression, deep desolate depression. I become so ill I usually have to go to bed. I have shaking spells when I do not have tranquilization.. Even my head shakes. I'm so embarrassed that I cannot go out unless I have pills. I am afraid to try to take a job because of my condition.

I have two little girls, 11 years old. At present they cannot go to school. Because of the accident I have been ill with headaches, earaches, and depression and as a result have been unable to work.

The well in our basement is covered over by three feet of muddy, unfit to drink water, and I am unable to wash the clothes.

During the recent snowstorm, we did not have fuel for our stove and my children and I have had a miserable time taking fuel into our isolated home by toboggan.

I certainly hope something can be done as our circumstances are so bad. I suffer from depression and have had crying jags for no apparent reason other than at times, of course, it concerns me—my daughter is dead.

The insurance companies are not the only profiteers from this situation. Perhaps a part of all this suffering is for the benefit of the members of the Ontario bar that try accident cases and make millions of dollars. But then they are only servants of the paper-created corporations, sworn to do for their inanimate masters what the corporation would do for themselves, had they but lawyer's training.

Another letter I would like to read:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

My husband was in a car accident over four years ago. He had stopped his car and was waiting for the light to change when a truck drove into the back of my husband's car and smashed it into a truck in front of him.

My husband was not hurt too badly, but he had a bad whiplash and could not stand up straight for quite a few months after this. He went to the doctors and had to be treated for this accident. The bills from the doctors started to come in, so my husband went to see a lawyer and he said that he would take the case.

The lawyer sent all the doctors a letter saying they would be paid when the case was settled. My husband has gone down to see this lawyer to see how things were coming along, but the lawyer said they can't make up their minds what to do.

Now my husband has gone down to see this lawyer again, and he is now too busy to see my husband. Or when he phones him, his secretary says he is too busy to talk to my husband now and he will phone him back, but he never does.

My husband wrote to the insurance company of the car that ran into him. They wrote back and said that our claim was statute barred.

Now the doctors that helped my husband are sending us final notices.

My husband did not do anything at all to cause the accident. The doctors are starting to send us more letters for their payments and the lawyer won't answer his phone.

This is such a common letter, where the lawyers do not do their job. The case drags over the year and the people do not get a cent and the insurance companies do not give a damn. They are delighted.

Is all this suffering for the government of Ontario, preoccupied with 19th century laissez-faire, new world philosophy, dedicated to protect the wealthy and the powerful?

But I have heard from the people of Ontario, and they are living in 1968. They are living in an age where traffic is not orderly as it may have been 50 years ago. There are over two million cars in Ontario, and at times they all seem to be on the same highway.

There are, too, different drivers with different reflex actions, different sight capability, driving cars with different potential on roads with different hazards.

Typically then, accidents involve a whole range of contributory factors for which the concept of negligent party is almost absurd.

Experts have stated that it is unlikely that any but a fraction of these accidents could be prevented and it is impossible in many cases to state with any certainty who is responsible.

There is another letter:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

On December 19, 1966, I was struck from the rear by a taxi cab. I got out of my car and asked the cab driver what had happened. He informed me that the accident was not his fault as his passenger was hitting him over the head with her purse and he had lost control of the taxi, hitting my car.

It has been now over two years of stalling, procrastination.

To add injury to injury, I have been informed by my insurance company that my premiums are to be raised as a result of this accident.

I carry insurance to protect myself and others and when I call upon it to perform, nothing is done. I am the innocent party and I have been asked to pay a penalty, to pay when another's mistake and unwillingness to comply with what I (must have mistakenly) understood was the law.

This Legislature has for 15 years known that the fault-liability system is no longer acceptable. I quote from the final report on the select committee on automobile insurance dated March, 1963—

Mr. Singer: You put the wrong date on it, is 1962.

Mr. Shulman: I apologize. To quote:

The committee sees wisdom in the views of certain eminent persons who believe that the traditional fault-liability system sometimes falls short of providing justice to those involved in or affected by automobile accidents. To put the problem in its simplest terms, society can no longer be entirely satisfied with the idea that fault in every accident rests with an individual, or individuals, and the financial consequences, whatever they may be, should therefore rest with an individual or individuals.

In this automobile age, society as a whole is, perhaps, responsible for traffic accidents and their consequences to a greater extent than we have thus far realized or admitted. It may also be, as was suggested in the first interim report, that the task of establishing responsibility amid all the complexities of today is, quite frequently, an almost impossible burden on those who adjudicate cases.

It is no longer good enough for us to say that all those who are not entitled to indemnification under the traditional fault-liability system—the surviving dependants of the negligent party, the negligent party himself who may be disabled for life, or the small child who dashes in front of an automobile and is permanently crippled—do not deserve a remedy of some kind for damages. The fact of the matter is that they need a remedy.

And, on this same subject, from their interim report of March 1961:

It is rather surprising to the committee that, over the years, the insurance industry has not reacted more positively in this particular area of concern.

The result of the fault system is wildly erratic. Professor Linden of Osgoode hall found that small "nuisance" claims were overpaid because of the cost to insurance companies involved in court proceedings, while cases involving substantial loss received far less than deserved, as this letter indicates:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

In 1965, my son received a very bad whiplash. The insurance company said they would pay $300 to cover the costs of repairs to his car. We felt that when the insurance company made this payment, no further problem would be encountered in the settlement.

However, they refused to pay the doctors' bills and finally considered doing so if we would sign off all other claims against them. This was done in the fall.

However, I was not happy with this arrangement, but my son felt that, rather than keep the doctors waiting any longer, he should settle it one way or another. My son lost three months of work, and finally his job, in Ottawa, where the accident occurred.

I trust that some law will be passed at some time or other to protect the public from running into this kind of problem.

The system encourages corruption. The lawyer who assisted me in the research in this particular project told me that some insurance adjusters offer high fees to solicitors in the hope that the lawyer will persuade his client to settle.

Mr. Singer: Have you got any evidence of that?

Mr. Shulman: I am accepting the word of the lawyer who presented this to me. Do you want specific cases?

Mr. Singer: Yes, I would like some because I think if you have that kind of information you owe a duty to the profession and the public to bring it forward.

Mr. MacDonald: How quickly you spring to the defence of the existing insurance system!

Mr. Singer: No, I am not defending it, but I do not think you should make charges like that unless there is a reason.

Mr. MacDonald: You rise to its defence all the time.

Mr. Singer: I certainly will on an occasion like this without any nonsense from you.

Mr. Martel: One third of the lawyers fees are from automobile accidents.

Mr. Singer: Occasions like this, without any gratuitous advice from you, speak for themselves.

Mr. Shulman: It is a shame, Mr. Chairman, the member for Downsview does not show as much interest in the rights of the people who are struck by cars as he does in the good name of the legal profession. We see the lawyers in the Liberal Party jumping to their feet any time something comes up involving the bar. They are not on their feet—they are not saying anything about the horrible results of these accidents.

Mr. Ben: Point of order. Does the hon. member feel that it is justified to slander anybody at all, whether he be lawyer, doctor, Indian chief, baker? Is there some particular class that he thinks is justified to slander in this world? If he does think so, tell us so we will know.

Mr. Shulman: May I say, Mr. Chairman, that the legal profession has fallen short in many fields. This is one of them. I have not hesitated to criticize my own profession when they have fallen short, as you well know gentlemen, but when—

Mr. Ben: Everybody in a profession is therefore dirty.

Mr. Shulman: Everybody in a profession is not dirty. I said nothing of the sort, but you have not cleaned all your dirty linen.

Mr. Ben: Name the ones and we will do it.

Mr. Shulman: I have named them in this House and nothing has happened.

Mr. Ben: Name one.

Mr. Shulman: Very well, I will repeat my earlier speech.

Mr. Ben: I do not care who he criticizes. Let him name facts so we can prosecute. I do not care who he criticizes.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: May we return to automobile accidents, Mr. Chairman?

The plaintiffs file inflated claims. Law students are instructed to make claims on behalf of their client far beyond reasonable figures, because one never knows what a jury will award, and a client may hit the jackpot.

Witnesses remember the unrememberable. Some doctors exaggerate, and some lawyers, despite law society rulings to the contrary, work on contingency.

And if the fault system is defended as a safety device, because negligent drivers are penalized financially, then surely for that reason alone the fault system must be scrapped.

The central myth of the pre-scientific stage in this field was that drivers were responsible for accidents and could be made not to have them. Studies have shown that such a premise is not valid.

A more serious effect of the existing insurance system has been to fill the courts with cases. The number of highway cases—estimated to be 1,300 per year in this province, or approximately 16 per cent of all civil court cases tried in Ontario—have caused an unprecedented delay in the process of justice. It now takes an average of eight months to obtain a jury trial in the county of York.

There is, of course, the side effect of raising premiums of those involved in car accidents as letter after letter—dozens of them—received by me bears out.

Dear Dr. Shulman:

When my insurance agent was making up the renewal forms, I declared I had received only one summons, completely forgetting a summons for crowding the driver's seat that I had received near Barrie. He said my premium would be $178 for a year and I paid it.

When the insurance company discovered my omission, they increased my premiums to $202 per annum, an increase of $34 per year, also a six-month policy could not be taken out as I now had six demerit points.

I explained that I had been driving on the highway near Barrie, and my girlfriend had her head on my shoulder, only the two of us in the car.

Instead of taking a day off work, and paying expenses to go to court in Barrie and fight the charge, I decided it would be more economical and time-saving to pay the fine of $11.50.

My agent told me that he had explained the circumstances to the insurance company and they consider crowding the driver's seat as being more than three persons in the front seat.

Because I paid the fine for apparent reasons, I was automatically put in this category and they would not consider my story.

The fine was $11.50 so why should I pay this fine to the insurance company three more times, and that's only for one year.

I only wish I could have saved the $1,000 I have paid for auto insurance in the last three years to these highway robbers who set these prices.

The young man who wrote this letter is, of course, correct. Raising the rates of a driver is clearly a punitive action, a field belonging to legislators and criminal courts. But with our present system an insurance company has the power to tell a party that he is responsible for an accident, and he will be penalized. From this decision, there can be no appeal, and if an insured complains, rather than a hearing, he is more likely to receive a letter from an unsympathetic computer.

Nor, apparently, does an insurance company have to have a reason to raise the driver's rates. Here is another letter:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

Last December we received notice that our auto insurance would jump from $150 to $171. I phoned the company to enquire why the jump. We had no claims for eight years.

The following week we took out a policy with another insurance company and the next day I telephoned our former insurers to inform them we had insured elsewhere. The person that I spoke to proceeded to tell me that we owed them money as we had a three-year contract with them.

To break this contract, I would have to write them a letter asking to be released and pay them $38 service charge. When I protested strongly, he stated he could do me a favour by breaking the contract for me and send me a registered letter. This way, he said, it would only cost us $27.

I contacted our solicitor, who advised us to tell them that if they wished their money, they had better sue us.

Needless to say, when I did this, they apologized all over the place and passed the buck to an agent who they felt was being a bit over-zealous.

Here is another example of the same thing:

Dear Sir:

I have been covered by the same insurance company since approximately 1953. In the last 10 years, in fact beyond that, I have not had a claim filed for any accident, yet my insurance premiums have risen steadily each year.

The company informs me that I have a preferred rating—no claims bonus—but cannot get an "A" rating because I take my car to work. What good is the car to me if I cannot use it to go to work, since my wife does not drive?

The insurance company states rising claims and costs for the increases in premium, yet I have yet to see a poor insurance company.

Three years is the extent of the no-claims bonus, beyond this you could be accident-free for 50 years and not receive any more reduction in your premium rate.

Here is another one:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

Driving along the main road leading to the Ontario Hospital at Whitby, within the hospital grounds, I saw another car approaching from a sideroad, and I was struck as I was passing.

The police from Whitby township cleared me of any responsibility after taking marks, distance and point of contact into account. However, the policeman apparently stamped his report, "private property".

Because the accident happened on private property the other driver's insurance company refused to honour their obligation.

The damages to our car amounted to $160, with $100 deductible, so that in all, our insurance company paid out $60.

The car I was driving on this occasion was only four months old, registered in the name of my 21-year-old son. With a second son as another driver under 25 years of age, it occasioned a high premium, the amount being $297. Following the accident, which had cost the company $60, the premium was hiked to $550. It was I who was involved in this accident, but my son was the one penalized.

So as not to discriminate, many insurance companies levy the same penalty to all their insured, equally. Those who have had a claim for $100,000 are penalized to the same extent as those who have caused $10 damage to another vehicle.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Why did the hon. member go to Allstate?

Mr. Shulman: Because they had more claims against them than anyone else, and I was rather amazed by the huge pile that I had against Allstate so I made a personal visit to that company.

In any case, the explanation from this very fine gentleman, may I say, even though I disagree with the policy of his company, was if you have an accident, whether it is a $10 or $20 accident, the fact is that then you are more likely to have another accident, so if you have a $10 accident, they are going to raise your rate just as if you had a $100,000 accident. This is their logic.

Mr. Ben: Is this not statistically correct? If you have an accident, you are more likely to have another?

Mr. Shulman: Well, I would like to think that it is not correct; there are many differences. A $100,000 accident normally involves a number of factors which are not involved in the inexpensive accidents.

Mr. Ben: I am not speaking of quantum. Is it not a matter of probabilities that if you have an accident the chances favour you having another within two years?

Mr. Shulman: I am delighted to find that the hon. member for Humber is up defending this particular system.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: The law of probability is that someone having a small accident is therefore likely to have another small accident.

Mr. Ben: My point is that is it not a fact of probability in statistics that if you have an accident, no matter how small it is, the probability is that you are going to have another one within two years? Is that not correct?

Mr. Shulman: That is partly correct.

Mr. Ben: Elucidate please, do not try to waffle out of it.

Mr. Shulman: I thought that I had elucidated.

Mr. Martel: I suppose that if you have a second accident you will have a third?

Mr. Shulman: Excellent knowledge.

It is also interesting to note that insurance companies penalize drivers despite the fact that no criminal or quasi-criminal findings are made. At one point, insurance companies could cancel a policy without cause. This cancellation mysteriously becomes common knowledge throughout the industry, although the insured himself is given no reason for the cancellation. Here is another letter:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

> As you can see by the papers enclosed, I applied for insurance for my car on November 14, 1967. This insurance was cancelled within one month, and I don't know why. The insurance company did not tell me.
> I have telephoned the insurance company, but they don't seem to want to say why the policy was cancelled.

Things have improved a little, let me say. Now the insurance industry has devised a scheme whereby anyone can be insured. The scheme is known in the industry as facility. That is spelt f-a-c-i-l-i-t-y.

Mr. Sopha: Do you think that we cannot spell?

Mr. Shulman: I have had some doubts about the hon. member for Sudbury for some time.

Now if a policy is cancelled for any reason, or no reason at all, facility will accept the risk, charging the insured as much as 300 per cent of the normal premium or even more for commercial risks.

Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, getting a copy of the facility agreement was worthy of James Bond. For some reason the companies were not particularly happy to send out a copy of this agreement. I am not sure why, because I would think that they would have been very proud of having improved the system. It took numerous letters, many phone calls, and finally a member of the industry anonymously slipped me a copy.

By some strange coincidence the next day I received three copies officially, one from the office of the superintendent of insurance, one from the all-Canada federation, and one from one of the insurance companies involved. So the insurance companies, I may say, are very well aware of what goes on in this world.

The rates under facility are still excessive, because to charge as much as 300 per cent of a normal premium, and it can go a lot higher for commercial risks, appears to me a little unreasonable.

And who decides that an insured is no longer a good risk? Who penalizes the insured? Not the law, not this Legislature, but a nameless and faceless agent of a corporation, from whose decision there is no appeal.

Thus, while the Legislature of this province, through The Highway Traffic Act, and the Parliament of Canada, through the criminal code, have laid down certain rules, the breach of which may bring a penalty to the transgressor, the insurance companies have, through their own de facto legislation, sought to penalize drivers.

The law of the insurance company is, of course, not to punish drivers. They are not interested in doing that with the expectation of lessening future offences. What they are interested in doing when they raise the rate is to bring in more money to fatten their own coffers.

Here is another letter:

Dear Sir:

> I was parked in a parking lot at work, and when I came out one night, my car was smashed up on the left side. Nobody saw what happened, and the next day I got in touch with the insurance company who authorized the work to be done.
> I had insurance which was $100 deductible. The damage was $178.74, and the insurance company therefore paid $78.74. When my premiums came due, they had raised them.
> I had never had an accident, and that's the deal I got. I still have insurance, but not with that company.

On the subject of insurance companies' coffers, what about insurance companies' rates, and what of the myth that they are losing money? We can go all the way back to the 1930 study for this Legislature by the Hon. Mr. Justice Hodgins. His "Report on Automobile Insurance Premium Rates' concludes:

> I find that the automobile insurance premium rates fixed by the Canadian automobile underwriters' association, the "bureau," effective February 1, 1929, were unreasonable high.
> I further find that the method of increasing the rates in 1929 was unusual, unreasable, and unfair, in that they were founded on rates which had not been fixed on a scientific or statistical basis, as was contended before me, and by the further fact that the provision for expenses was increased by 50 per cent on two coverages, and 25 per cent on one coverage, without any increase in the expenses of the companies. No evidence was adduced before me to warrant such increase.

Now what of the myth that these companies lose money on auto insurance—a myth carefully propagated by the apologists for the insurance companies who cry that only their income from investments allows them to remain in business in light of their huge losses on auto insurance? Bunk! Let us leave aside their investments and look only at their insurance income.

The figures are available in the annual report of the superintendent of insurance. In 1966 there were $264 million of net premiums written, $247 million of net premiums earned, but losses of only $155 million paid. In other words, they took in in premiums $100 million more than they paid out in claims.

The same pattern is found every year. I have here the Toronto Telegram and Financial Post of April 20, 1968. The headline is "Big Profit Again in Auto Insurance," and this after all servicing, all expenses.

Mr. Ben: Where are the figures?

Mr. Shulman: They are in the report.

Mr. Ben: Well, give us the figures. Your leader thinks the same thing—

Mr. Shulman: I will be glad to give the figures, I have them here.

Mr. Ben: I have been trying to find those figures since your leader made the statement and omitted to put in what the costs of servicing them were, the wages that they paid, and so on.

Mr. Shulman: If the member for Humber will be patient—

Mr. MacDonald: Another Liberal rising to defend the insurance companies.

Mr. Ben: I will defend a member of the devil's staff—that is the NDP—if they are unjustly accused. I will defend you if you are unjustly accused, and that is really saying something.

Mr. MacDonald: Thank you.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to stay too lengthy tonight, but inasmuch as the—

Mr. Ben: We believe in justice, you know. Give us the figures.

Mr. Chairman: Perhaps we could get back to some proper debate.

Mr. Shulman: I am about to, Mr. Chairman, if the Minister will just be patient.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, tell us about it, give us the figures.

Mr. Shulman: I have the figures. May I finish my prepared address first and then I will be glad to give you the figures.

Mr. Chairman, I hate to keep the members unduly long tonight but I must digress to supply figures because the member has asked me for them.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I must apologize, I do not have those clipping here. I will supply them to the member tomorrow morning.

I will tell you what I am going to quote, Mr. Chairman, from the Toronto Telegram of April 20, 1968, and The Financial Post of April 20, 1968. I have, however, some of the figures here and I will go ahead because they are in my address, if I may.

Mr. Ben: You are guilty of the same thing.

Mr. Shulman: I will be happy to supply them. I promise the member for Humber, Mr. Chairman, he shall have them before 2 o'clock tomorrow.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, if you will keep these members subdued and quiet I will be happy to go on with my talk.

What of the insurance companies' claim that auto insurance losses are subsidized by income from other types of insurance? More bunk!

In 1966 insurance companies paid out in claims 58.9 per cent of the net premiums received from automobile insurance, but they paid out a higher percentage of the total in the other classes of insurance. In fact, the total for all insurance, including auto, was 59.3 per cent.

Which points this out—that actually auto insurance is more remunerative than all insurances put together. Read the report, it is right in the report.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. This whole debate has nothing to do with my estimates, it has to do with the Budget debate or Throne debate, or a matter of policy. This has nothing to do with my estimates, but in any event, it is all very well and I now move that the committee rise and report.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed; Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the estimates and there probably could be some reference to the order paper as well.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11 of the clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

TUESDAY, JULY 9, 1968

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence from the standing committee on education and university affairs, presented the committee's third report which was read as follows and adopted:

Your committee begs to report the following bills without amendment:

Bill 162, An Act to amend The Teachers' Superannuation Act;

Bill 163, An Act to amend The Ontario School Trustees' Council Act;

Bill 164, An Act to amend The Teaching Profession Act;

Bill 165, An Act to amend The Public Schools Act;

Bill 166, An Act to amend The Department of Education Act;

Bill 167, An Act to amend The Secondary Schools and Boards of Education Act.

Your committee begs to report the following bill with certain amendments:

Bill 168, An Act to amend The Separate Schools Act.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

Introduction of bills.

TOWNSHIP OF RED LAKE

Hon. W. D. McKeough (Minister of Municipal Affairs) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act respecting the township of Red Lake.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the township of Red Lake to pass a bylaw without the approval of the Ontario municipal board to provide for the issuance of debentures to pay for the addition of four classrooms to the Red Lake district high school.

TOWNSHIP OF CHARLOTTENBURGH

Hon. Mr. McKeough moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act respecting the township of Charlottenburgh.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, this bill authorizes the township of Charlottenburgh to pass a bylaw without the approval of the Ontario municipal board to provide for the issue of debentures to pay for the establishment of a water supply system.

CONTROL OF AIR POLLUTION FROM MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park) moves first reading of bill intituled, An Act to provide for the control of air pollution from motor vehicles.

Motion agreed to; first reading of the bill.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, you will recall that some weeks ago I had the pleasure of introducing a bill—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, is the hon. member in order?

Mr. Speaker: The member is quite in order to make an explanation of his bill if he so wishes, without a question.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: I thought it had to be requested.

Mr. Speaker: I would say this, that the practice lately in this House has been that the member introducing a bill has the privilege of making an explanation if he wishes. I stand to be corrected by the House if they wish it only to be in accordance with the strict rules of procedure that an explanation must be asked for.

Mr. Shulman: Hon. members will recall some weeks ago I introduced a bill to control air pollution from all sources other than auto vehicles. This bill covers the special problem of motor vehicles and lays out standards to control the problem of air pollution from this source.

Mr. Speaker: The Minister of Municipal Affairs has a statement.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: When The Residential Property Tax Reduction Act was before the House, one of the points of interest was when the province would be able to begin payments to municipalities.

This also was a point of interest—of very great interest—when I held a series of 10 meetings in various parts of the province to discuss the tax reduction system with municipal representatives and others. On those occasions, it was not practical for me to give answers that were as specific as my questioners perhaps would have liked. Today I can be specific.

The Provincial Treasurer (Mr. MacNaughton) has expedited the procedures for prompt payment to the municipalities. Consequently, I am pleased to be able to announce that cheques are being mailed this afternoon from the Provincial Treasurer to the first 34 municipalities which filed claims for reimbursement under the residential property tax reduction system. These are all the claims received by last Friday, July 5.

In most cases, the cheques relate to the first instalment of the municipal taxes. The amounts range from $231.40 for school section No. 1 of Harmon township, to $2,124,079 for the borough of North York. I am making the full list available to the hon. members as a matter of interest.

The total of the 34 cheques issued amounts to $5,385,892.62.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Rainy River has a question from yesterday?

Mr. T. P. Reid (Rainy River): I have a question for the Minister of Lands and Forests: Why was the group of boy scouts from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, known as the "Corn-poppers", granted free camping privileges at Killbear provincial park during the past weekend, although a group of Canadians from a nearby church was forced to pay $30 to have a Sunday picnic in the same park?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Rainy River, the church group was charged the daily entrance fee of $1 per car for day use after having been advised that such would be necessary. The boy scout group were allowed entry to choose the particular organized group camping site that they wished. They then paid the regular group camping fee of 10 cents per person per night. No vehicle entrance fee is charged for such organized group campers. The amount paid by this group of 43 boy scouts was $25 for six days. This is recorded on departmental receipt No. FO9285-4. In the case of each group the charges are as per the authorized schedule.

Mr. Speaker, I have a similar question from the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Knight) which was asked on July 5 and the question was: Is the Minister aware—

Mr. Speaker: The Minister has not yet been asked that question and the member for Port Arthur is not here so will he please retain his answer.

Mr. T. P. Reid: May I ask the Minister a supplementary question?

In view of this large discrepancy, are you going to review your policies so that a church group or some such organization as this is not laboured with these great expenses for a one-day outing? Surely the $30 was unreasonable. Some flexibility is required.

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Well, Mr. Speaker, we feel that this is a very reasonable fee. If, for instance, they wanted to leave their cars outside the entrance they could walk in free, and this was explained to them. In view of the large number we think it is a very reasonable fee.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park has a question.

Mr. Shulman: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I do not seem to have a copy of that. Could you send it here to me, please?

Mr. Speaker: Yes. The member for Peterborough might perhaps ask his question.

Mr. Shulman: I have it, it is all right. It is a question for the hon. Attorney General.

Are Canadian citizens who are placed on probation by United States courts and then deported to Canada required to report to probation officers in Canada, and under what legislation is such reporting required?

Hon. A. A. Wishart (Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, Canadian citizens who have been placed on probation by American courts and then deported to Canada, are asked to report to probation officers in Canada. There is no formal, reciprocal arrangement between the countries on that point and there is no legislation. The procedure has been adopted by the probation service of both countries.

I would say that if a probationer were refused there would be no sanction to compel him to report. The only thing I could add would be that if he should find it possible to return to the United States he would be subject to some compulsion there if he failed to carry out his probation terms.

It is just an arrangement that is reciprocal which has no legal sanction; one that has been adopted and carried out without any formal legislative sanction.

Mr. Shulman: Will the Attorney General allow a supplementary question?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Yes.

Mr. Shulman: Would you agree that it would be wise to formalize this arrangement by passing suitable legislation?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I think perhaps it would be fair to say that it would be better, if we felt it wise, that we try to get legislation for it. Sometimes it is difficult where you have two countries working to get legislation at the same time in both countries, but it has worked very well on an informal arrangement.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): There will be trouble if the hon. Minister gets mixed up in external affairs!

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I understand that the civil liberties people have sometimes raised this point but it seemed to me a rather minor thing that someone who had been placed on probation by the court in the other country should find it an infringement of his liberty not to carry out the arrangement we had entered into. As I say, there is some dfficulty in getting legislation contemporary and complementary together at the one time.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peterborough.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Education and University Affairs.

Do the new province of Ontario student aid programme regulations requiring one year's residence in the case of landed immigrants apply retroactively to students who are landed immigrants, who do not have one year's residence in Ontario, but had already applied for OSAP prior to the issuing of the regulations?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of University Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the current regulations for the Ontario student award programme apply as stated to all applicants in 1968-1969. Previous status, including that of landed immigrants, established under any previous regulations, will not have a bearing upon the current administration of the programme. At this time the regulations state that:

> An independent student who is a Canadian citizen, or a landed immigrant, must have been a permanent resident of Ontario for at least 12 consecutive months immediately prior to first enrolling in the academic programme for which he is requesting financial assistance.

This regulation was established on the premise that the major obligation of support is for our own citizens, and that some reasonable requirement of residence in our province should be met before public funds for educational purposes are made available.

There have, however, been some suggestions, for example, from the committee of presidents that this regulation may create some difficulties for those with landed immigrant status who wish to embark immediately on a post-secondary programme.

I have, therefore, asked officials of The Department of University Affairs to review the matter to ensure that we are continuing to maintain a programme of assistance that is fair and equitable both to those who apply for aid and those who provide the public funds to finance it.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

First, I am pleased that there is a reconsideration of this question, but I am wondering if the Minister might reconsider applications of any persons who came into the country expecting to take a university course and now find themselves in this particular situation; whether or not they actually applied before the regulations were in effect?

Might I direct another question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Trade and Development?

Could the Minister indicate how many centres which were originally rejected for designation under the equalization of industrial opportunity programme have now been accepted under this programme?

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): Mr. Speaker, I just walked in the House and found this question here. I will have to take notice and will get the information to the hon. member.

Mr. E. R. Good (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Attorney General.

When does the Attorney General intend to appoint additional coroners to service the cities of Kitchener and Waterloo, due to the absence of the only coroner now resident in the Kitchener-Waterloo area?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: Mr. Speaker, it is true that at the moment the coroner who is resident at Kitchener is away on vacation. He left yesterday and this morning I recommended a successor appointment. We have been looking for someone who is willing and ready to take the appointment. I would expect that appointment would be made very quickly.

In the meantime, I would point out that there are coroners in Galt, Hespeler, Elmira, Preston and New Hamburg, in any event, to take care of the work in the interim. I expect the appointment which I have recommended —which is, I may say, that of Doctor G. J. Chirst—should take place very quickly.

Mr. Good: Would the Minister allow a supplementary question?

How many coroners, in your opinion, do you think there should be in the twin cities of Kitchener and Waterloo?

Hon. Mr. Wishart: I have not any number in mind. I accept the recommendation of the supervising coroner. If he finds a need for additional coroners, he gives me the recommendation and I accept his view in the matter.

Mr. R. F. Ruston (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of the hon. Minister of Transport.

Is the hon. Minister considering any legislation with regard to truck safety, in view of the report in the Windsor Star of July 6, 1968, that safety inspectors found a semi-trailer truck loaded with 3,500 gallons of inflammable gas and the trailer had no brakes?

If regulations now exist, will the hon. Minister take the proper steps to see that all trucks carrying inflammable or explosive material be proven safe prior to operation on the highways of this province?

Hon. I. Haskett (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is apparent from the article to which the hon. member alludes that the current compulsory motor vehicle inspection operation of our department in Windsor is proving highly successful.

The article tells of 54 unsafe trucks being taken off the roads and that the owners of many others are facing possible court action. This vehicle inspection lane is one of a fleet of lanes operated by our department, giving compulsory vehicle inspections in all parts of the province at this time.

Section 48 of The Highway Traffic Act provides the police with the authority to remove any unsafe or dangerous vehicle from the road. And section 35—more specifically, regulation 224 promulgated thereunder—section 3, item 6, spells out the braking requirements for the vehicle here involved, namely, that a combination truck and trailer, where the trailer has a gross registered weight in excess of 3,000 pounds, must be able to stop from a speed of 20 miles an hour on a level, dry, smooth pavement in 50 feet.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Thunder Bay.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the Minister of Lands and Forests.

The first one is: Will the huge tracts of valuable timber on land held by the Algoma Central Railway revert to the Crown in keeping with the recommendations of the Brodie forest study unit?

The second one is: How much does the Algoma Central Railway pay in land tax for the 850,000 acres of property they own? Do they pay taxes on the undeveloped land as well as the developed land?

What are they charged, per year, for forest fire protection?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Thunder Bay:

On his first question: This matter is under very active consideration—there are negotiations at the present on this question of the exchange of land with the Algoma Central Railway.

With regard to his second question: The Algoma Central Railway pays provincial land tax in the annual amount of $73,845.45 for the property and interests they own. They also pay taxes on the undeveloped land as well as the developed land.

With regard to forest fire protection charges, the railway pays $29,994.75 per annum at current rates for forest fire protection under The Railway Fire Charge Act.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that this year, of course, we introduced and passed an Act whereby charges will be doubled, so next year they will be paying twice the amount they are now paying.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Essex-Kent.

Mr. Ruston: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of privilege. I wish to note in Hansard of July 4, page 5159, that the hon. Minister of Municipal Affairs, when replying to my comments made by myself, and I quote: "My friend from Essex-Kent said when he was speaking that perhaps the slogan should be 'amalgamate and escalate'." I wish to inform the House that these were not my words, and I am quite sure that the hon. Minister did not intend to add words to my remarks.

Hon. Mr. McKeough: Mr. Speaker, I have not read Hansard, and I thought what I said was that my friend from Halton West (Mr. Kerr) said those terms, so perhaps Hansard might be corrected accordingly.

Mr. Speaker: The House leader.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day, I wish to table answers to the following questions standing on the order paper: Nos. 2, 20, 21, 40, 47, 57 and 58 (see appendix, page 5380).

Mr. Speaker, I would like to provide the answer to a question from the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon), a set of questions having to do with the Prudential Finance Corporation. There were some eight questions all told, and the answer to the first one is:

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, citizens are assumed to be honest. The directors of Prudential were business men. The commission staff relied on the certification by the directors made in accordance with the legislation certifying that the facts contained in the prospectus constituted "full, true and plain disclosure of all material facts in respect of the offering of securities referred to" in the prospectus and that "there was no further material information applicable other than in the financial statements or reports where required."

The financial statements themselves were duly certified by a member of the institute of chartered accountants, Morris A. Stein. The material was examined by the staff to determine if it complied with the provisions of the then section 40 of The Securities Act.

It is not now possible to reconstruct the questions which were asked and the additional disclosure made in the prospectus at their request. It is clear that the warning given on the front page of the prospectus was required by them. Facts set out in a prospectus were not routinely investigated at the time of filing. Honesty was assumed. Prosecution for the alleged false filing, as in the present case, follows.

The answer to the second question is:

Prudential gave notice to the commission pursuant to the then section 19(2)1(iii) of The Securities Act, of its intention to offer 7.5 per cent sinking fund debentures, second series, to its short term note holders–the first series had been offered in 1962-1963. The commission objected to this offering until the company submitted and agreed to deliver to the existing security holders what the Clarkson, Gordon and Co. report of March 8 1967, calls, at page 12, the prospectus-type offering circular. The commission's objection was withdrawn on December 4, 1964.

The document contained up-to-date information and the same warnings which appeared on the face page of the earlier prospectus. The company was not authorized to raise additional funds from the general public, merely from its existing security holders.

The answer to the third question is:

By letter dated October 6, 1965, Prudential advised the commission that as at September 20, 1965, it had discontinued the sale of additional securities to its existing security holders under the section 19(2)1(iii) exemption. The commission had no information before it indicating that these sales had not in fact ceased in Ontario.

However, it was felt that the notice given did not effectively remove the exemption. As a result of enquiries the commission had instituted, a hearing was held on March 30, 1966, which resulted in an order pursuant to the then section 19(3) denying the exemption in section 19(2)1(iii) to Prudential. The order was dated March 31. This was intended to prohibit Prudential from raising additional funds from Ontario security holders.

The answer to the fourth question is:

Despite the fact that the Quebec securities commission, acting on information supplied by Ontario, ordered Prudential to cease selling securities in that province on April 5, 1966–a right which it had enjoyed until that time–and the publication of the fact of the March 31 order in the commission's May, 1966 bulletin, sir, the commission were not advised nor did they discover any evidence of any trading in Prudential securities in Ontario until after the fact of Prudential's insolvency was made public during November, 1966.

The commission's enquiries had continued after March 31 with no evidence being disclosed that Prudential was selling additional securities to the public. After November, 1966, it was discovered that certain officers of Prudential, seemingly to allay the fears of its creditors, arranged to redeem their securities by finding other purchasers for them. The purchase and resale was made through Ontario Metal Specialties.

Shortly before November 11 money was obtained through the efforts of Roman Lipowski. The money was converted to Prudential's use and no securities were issued. This conduct, as detailed in answer to the next question, resulted in a number of charges.

The answer to the fifth question:

Investigation by the commission staff has resulted in the following charges:

1. Against Joseph Benoit Brien, John Edward Despard, Joseph Adolph Jonak and Morris Abraham Stein, jointly charged under The Securities Act for the furnishing of the false information in the June 14, 1963, Prudential prospectus and financial statements. They stand remanded to July 8, 1968.

2. Against Roman Lipowski, Robert James Bishop, Selwyn B. Jones, Adrian H. E. Rutherford, Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Ltd., and Prudential Finance Corporation Ltd., for trading without registration, contrary to The Securities Act, following March 31, 1966. All parties stand convicted, with Lipowski fined $500 or 60 days, Bishop $1,000 or 60 days, Rutherford and Jones each fined $100, while Prudential and Ontario Metal Specialties received suspended sentences.

3. Against Roman Lipowski for fraud under the criminal code involving trading in Prudential securities between September 30 and November 30, 1966. He was convicted and sentenced to six months definite and 12 months indefinite.

4. Against Joseph Benoit Brien under the criminal code, the grand jury having found a true bill on May 1, 1968, on some nine separate counts involving forgery, uttering, theft, and fraud in relation to the affairs of O'Brien Gold Mines and North American General Insurance, and the furnishing of a false finance statement in connection with Prudential to the trustee with intent to deceive the trustee. The trial date has not been fixed.

The answer to the sixth question:

An opinion was obtained from Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt in a letter to the chairman of the Ontario securities commission dated September 22, 1967. This opinion has been furnished to a group representing the Prudential creditors.

The Metropolitan Trust Company took action on behalf of the cestui que trusts commencing shortly before November 11, 1966, after Prudential had failed to meet the interest payments for the first time. It insisted on investigation and as a result the serious financial position of the company became public.

The March 8, 1967, report of Clarkson, Gordon and Co. details, commencing on page 26, the deficiencies in the trust indentures. The standards are not considered adequate. Minimum standards are now to be found in part IX of the regulations to The Securities Act, 1966.

The answer to the seventh question:

This is reviewed in the opinion of Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt to which I have already referred.

The answer to the eight question:

These are detailed in the March 8, 1967, report of Clarkson, Gordon and Co., a copy of which has already been filed in the House. See in particular pages 9 and 10 of that report.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. For the edification of the private members who will be debating Resolution No. 39 on page 6—and perhaps I should read that.

By the hon. member for High Park:

RESOLVED:

That in the opinion of this House it should be a criminal offence to tap or listen in on any private telephone, except with an authorization signed by a judge of the Supreme Court.

Now, my question is this: Is this resolution intended to include an extension telephone? Is it or is it not?

Mr. Speaker: I really had not thought that the heat was quite that bad in here.

Orders of the day.

Clerk of the House: The 12th order, the House in committee of supply; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS

On vote 701:

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, I am going to digress from my speech for a few moments to take care of the various interjections and requests that kept coming from different members last night in the excitement of the moment. To begin with, I would like to draw to your attention, today's Toronto Telegram, which reports the proceedings of last night and which reads as follows:

> Dr. Shulman did not reply to a challenge from George Ben, Liberal Toronto Humber, a lawyer, to repeat some of his comments outside of the Legislature where he would have no protection against legal action.

May I say first of all that I do not think that the hon. member for Humber (Mr. Ben) made any such challenge, and the Telegram has its usual inaccuracy. However, if there is any such challenge from any member, I would be delighted to repeat this speech in total outside of the Legislature, or any part of it that anyone may request. May I say to the representatives of the Telegram if they are here today perhaps they will be kind enough to correct that error?

The hon. member for Humber did make certain requests. I referred last night to the various large profits made in automobile insurance and I referred to the newspaper report in the Telegram and Financial Post—the representative for Humber, I am sorry, is not here today. The member asked if I would produce the figures and the facts and I have them here and for the record, I will read this in, it being very brief.

From the Toronto Telegram of April 17, 1968, the Heading is "Big Profit Gain In Auto Insurance."

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: They are accurate when they are not reporting speeches apparently. I quote:

> Canada's fire and automobile insurance companies moved strongly into the black in 1967, to almost triple underwriting profits as compared to 1966. Total auto and fire profits reached $47.6 million in 1967, compared to $19 million in the previous year. There were impressive gains in the auto insurance business, where the number of accidents and resultant claims payment declined.
> The total written premiums taken in by the 400 insurance companies in Canada licenced to transact general insurance business reached a new high of $1.7 billion in 1967, compared to $1.5 billion in 1966. A total of $1.1 billion was paid out in claims and adjusting expenses. The underwriting profit figures represent that amount left over after claims, operating expenses and reserves are deducted, and they do not include income earned from investment.

This was the point that the hon. member for Humber did not understand, and I am glad to set this straight.

> In the auto insurance business, net premiums earned were $728 million, the industry paid out $469 million in claims and adjusting expenses.
> The figures for 1966 were premiums of $633 million, and claims of $369 million. The earn-loss ratio—net premiums divided by expenses—arrive at a percentage of 64.4 per cent in 1967. The industry considers 67 per cent satisfactory.

There is another article here from the Financial Post, two in fact, but I will not waste the time of the House reading them. The amounts are the same and I have copies here for the hon. member for Humber that he may read at his leisure and become educated.

The other matter—

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Informed—not necessarily educated.

Mr. Shulman: Informed, not educated, my leader informs me.

The other matter to which there was some reference last night from the hon. House leader (Mr. Rowntree) was to the effect that this matter of auto insurance should not be brought up at all under these estimates and perhaps should be discussed at some other time. Well, perhaps I should inform the House leader, through you, sir, that I do understand that the superintendent of insurance comes under the particular Minister, and I do believe that he has some responsibility as far as automobile insurance goes.

I think that all in the House will agree that the Minister who is responsible for the department should bring in legislation which will change and improve the auto insurance industry, and for that reason I am dealing only with this one subject in my lead-off address.

I am going to digress a little further for just a few minutes. I had not really intended to use any of this material. I had only three minutes to go last night, but for some reason I was not able to complete my speech, and since I have had an evening to reflect, a number of other ideas have come to my head and I feel that perhaps I should bring them to the attention of the government since they have been so kind as to give me this extra opportunity.

The matter which I feel I should bring to your attention, and I would like to thank the House leader for his consideration in allowing me some time to arrange this, is the matter of auto insurance, as to whether it should be worked out with the insurance company, or should the government move on their own.

I am going to bring to your attention certain material which would lead one very strongly to suspect that we, perhaps, are not able to deal with the auto insurance companies and the government is going to have to move alone.

The auto insurance companies have organs and magazines in which they print their innermost thoughts and they are quite fascinating.

To digress just for a moment, there is one here, the news bulletin for the members of the Ontario insurance agents association. There is quite an interesting article on the front page about these terrible members of that socialist party, the NDP, who are suggesting that we improve the insurance business, and they very strongly urge—

Ah! He is here! I am delighted, the hon. member for Humber has arrived. I will send the facts over to him.

Mr. P. D. Lawlor (Lakeshore): That is not what he is interested in.

Mr. Shulman: On the front page of the news bulletin for the members of the Ontario insurance agents association is an article extolling the agents to get out and fight for the two good old parties, because they are going to preserve things as they are now in auto insurance. They have this great line here which has intrigued me mightily:

> Sign up now. This is for the battle of the ideology against the NDP. Sign up now, then offer your local Conservative or Liberal candidate the facilities of our ghost writer's committee material that completely refutes the planned NDP programme. Do it now.

I have been wondering for some time where the members of the other side of the House got their speeches. I am rather pleased to have found out this interesting revelation and—

An hon. member: We signed up immediately.

Mr. Shulman: —I have taken the trouble to sign up so that next time they read one of those speeches, I will have a copy in front of me so I can follow it more closely, Mr. Chairman.

Well now, the insurance companies have another bulletin. This is called "The All-Canada Insurance Bulletin" and I was very flattered, Mr. Chairman, I managed to make the front page of "The All-Canada Insurance Bulletin".

After I put my little ad in the paper asking people who had had some problems with auto insurance to write to me, I received a lovely letter from the All-Canada insurance federation saying that they knew I was very busy and did not have time to look into all these complaints, and they would be happy to look into them for me. If I would forward the complaints to them, they would look into them and the would supply the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, so help them. I thought that was a very kind and fair offer of them, so I accepted—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): The hon. member can eliminate the corn. The gestures do not show in Hansard.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Mr. MacDonald: From that Minister, talk of corn is a little difficult to take!

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I am always glad to accept advice on a matter in which a member is expert.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member is killing us.

Mr. Shulman: Now because the All-Canada insurance federation is fairly knowing, I should think, in the matter of insurance, I was happy to accept their offer. I forwarded to them, approximately 100 odd of the complaints that had been sent to me, with the request that they look into them. I did not send the ones where persons had asked that their names be protected. Of course, I did not send the ones which are so clearcut, or where I had already had a reply from an insurance company in writing to the person involved. I just sent them approximately 100.

And I was rather amazed, pleased, horrified—to receive this bulletin. It reads: "Dr. Shulman Barks Up the Wrong Tree."

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Point of order, Mr. Chairman.

I think this is an appropriate case to talk about barking up the wrong tree and I rise on a point of order.

In my absence, the hon. gentleman who just sat down led this House to believe that he had, in handing me a piece of paper here given an answer to the question that was posed to him yesterday. He has led this House to believe that the answer is in this paper.

Mr. MacDonald: He read it.

Mr. Ben: If you remember, last night, the hon. member pointed out that last year the automobile insurance companies had taken in, in premiums, the sum of $700 million and some odd. I have the exact figure here—$728 million. And that they had paid out in premiums the sum of $469 million, implying that there was a profit of the difference, of $259 million, as the hon. member for York South had misled this House into believing when he made his Throne speech.

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): He did not imply that at all.

Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Ben: I am up on a point of order.

Mr. Chairman: The member has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Ben: I asked the hon. member to produce to me the cost of operating these insurance companies, because I pointed out that the difference—it works out to $259 million, if I did not mention that figure—but the difference was not profit. He tried to lead this House to believe that it was profit and he said he would produce the figures.

He has produced figures which indicate that he is wrong. This statement which he has handed to me, alleging to be an answer, points out that last year, the insurance companies, both fire and auto, wrote insurance to the amount of $1.7 billion and that their total profit on that, both fire and accident, was $47.6 million.

Their profit was no way near what the hon. member for High Park tried to lead this House to believe the profit was and what the hon. member for York South in his Throne speech, who gave exactly the same figures, tried to lead the House to believe.

Because, Mr. Chairman, if I may, when the hon. member for York South produced those figures, I spent two days in the library trying to find out where the difference of the figures was and I could not find them, either in national statistics or in the statistics of this government.

That is why I challenged the member for High Park to produce those figures, knowing he could not produce them.

Mr. Chairman: Order! Order please!

Would the member for Humber please inform the Chairman what is the point of order?

Mr. Ben: He has misled the House in trying to imply that the difference between amounts taken in on premiums and the amounts paid out in losses represents a profit.

He alleged that yesterday he would give me the answer of what the cost of operating these insurance companies was. He has failed to do so but he made a big bank here of sending me the answer which is not an answer. I will table this, Mr. Chairman, as proof that it is not an answer to the question put.

Mr. Chairman: In the opinion of the member for Humber he has not received a satisfactory answer as suggested the member for High Park would provide. I do not think this is a point of order, whether or not the answer is satisfactory, proper, true or correct.

The member for Humber has received an answer, period.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I cannot reply to that point of order because it was not one, but I would like to raise a point of order.

The member for Humber was not here when the member for High Park replied. The least he could do would be wait until he had an opportunity to see in Hansard exactly what the member for High Park had said before he chooses to waste the time of the House on a hot July afternoon.

An hon. member: Well, it is certainly cool over here.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

I think perhaps the member for Riverdale has a point. The member for High Park however, has the floor.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just so there will be no misunderstanding, I am sorry the member for Humber was not here, but I would like to re-read one paragraph here, just to—

Mr. Chairman: No, this would constitute repetition, in the opinion of the Chairman, and it is not necessary.

Mr. Shulman: I will just say this matter has already been read into the record and if the member for Humber would be so kind as to read it, I would be very grateful.

Mr. Chairman: That would be the proper procedure.

Mr. Shulman: All right. Now to come back to the "All-Canada Insurance Bulletin", front page, heading "Dr. Shulman Barks Up the Wrong Tree":

> The old adage, it pays to advertise does not always work. Take the stand of newly elected Ontario MPP, Dr. Morton Shulman, for instance.
> Dr. Shulman, an NDP member of the Ontario Legislature, placed the above ad in two of Toronto's newspapers over a two-week period.

They are a little wrong. It was three newspapers for one week:

> It was reported at various times that he was receiving anywhere up to 30 letters a day of complaints, but this just is not so. At All-Canada insurance federation's request, Dr. Shulman had passed along all of the complaints to All-Canada's Toronto office and they total only 75. At present, J. B. Humphries, Ontario manager of All-Canada is investigating the legitimacy of the complaints.

And here is the killer.

> "I have not found a really serious complaint yet," Mr. Humphries said. In fact, many people are more angry with the lawyers than with their insurance companies.

And so on, and so on.

Mr. Chairman, the All-Canada insurance federation was kind enough to look into these complaints and they sent me back their comments on each of them. I would like just—I do not want to take a great deal of time—but just take five minutes to tell you a few of the complaints which they found were not serious at all.

The reason I am doing this, let me say it again, for the Minister, is to illustrate the unreliability of the insurance industry and why it is so essential for the Minister to bring down proper legislation to control this particular industry.

Here is one—they are quite brief:

> Mr. and Mrs. R. A. Marquese—this is on the stationery of the All-Canada insurance federation—46 Roosevelt Drive, Thornhill, have collected a number of complaints against State Farm, chief of which is their unwillingness to pay more than half of the cost of an accident in which Mrs. Marquese's automobile was struck broadside by a car approaching from a side street.
> Although the other driver was charged with failure to yield the right of way, State Farm decided that Mrs. Marquese was partly at fault and therefore refused to pay the full amount. Mr. and Mrs. Marquese are dissatisfied.

Here are the comments of State Farm:

> Our claim number 60194578—third party claim. Our insured is Mr. L. D. McBean.
> There has been considerable correspondence, on this case. Briefly, this accident involved two vehicles, one driven by our insured and the other by Mrs. Marquese. There were no witnesses other than Mr. McBean's wife and the drivers tell different stories.
>
> Based on the facts in our file we offered a 50-50 settlement. Marquese feels strongly that no blame attaches to them. However, it is true McBean is facing a failure to yield charge on March 27, Court 30, Old City Hall.
> We can do nothing until after this case has been tried. If the transcript provides different information than that provided by McBean we will then re-negotiate with Marquese. Our claims people have been asked to review this information.

Here is a story where a car is travelling along a highway, another car comes out without stopping, bangs into the side of it. The insurance company says, "Well, we are half responsible."

Here is another one. Mrs. B. Brittain, 215 Evelyn Avenue, Toronto, says she suffered severe whiplash as the result of an accident that occurred when another driver ran a red light. The other driver was insured by C. E. Hastings and Company, through its agent, but the company has refused to compensate Mrs. Brittain for the loss of work or medical expenses involved.

Answer form the company, C. E. Hasting and Co.:

This accident happened four years ago. Mrs. Brittain was a passenger in a car which was struck from the rear. The adjusters tried to settle with Mrs. Brittain, but she was not satisfied with their offer. She then consulted her lawyer.

This is another case where a lawyer omitted to issue a writ within the 12-month period, and the claim was prescribed, therefore, we do not have to pay anything.

It is not a serious complaint, according to the insurance federation.

Here is a case where they admit the liability. They admit their insured was wrong, but the lawyer, for whatever reason, did not get the claim in within the 12 months. Too bad.

That is those insurance companies for you. They should have a little sense of moral justice. Just a little—when they know they are wrong, to do the correct thing.

Here is another one. Mr. Harry Hackett, 655 Hazelwood Avenue, Detroit, Michigan has a complaint against Shaw and Begg and their agent, Wellington Fire Insurance Company in Hamilton. It seems Mr. Hackett was hit by an automobile insured by Shaw and Begg causing him several weeks of hospitalization and some months of therapy treatment while visiting Canada.

During his stay in hospital, the insurance company agent visited him, and told him not to worry about submitting a claim until he was feeling well enough to travel.

When he was finally well enough to travel the company told him the statute of limitations in Canada had expired, and he could not collect on his claim. Mr. Hackett had to pay out $1,000 in medical expenses.

The insurance companies use this gimmick, the statute of limitations. Well, I screamed loud and long in this case, and so we got a lovely letter from All-Canada insurance federation. The company officials report that while they have no legal obligations in respect of Mr. Hackett's claim, they feel there may be a moral obligation. So although the claim took place five years ago in consideration of our raising this matter, they reopend the file and stated they would look into it sympathetically. Nothing was done, but they did look sympathetically into the file, and this is of great satisfaction to Mr. Hackett.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Who signed the papers? Was James Renwick their lawyer?

Mr. Shulman: Shaw and Begg. Their agent is the Wellington Fire Insurance Company.

Here is one from All-State. This is my favorite company, All-State. At least the other companies try and hide things a little, but All-State come out and stand on the wrong side fair and square. They do not attempt to hide things. Here is one of their classics:

Re: All-State Automobile Policy 59245253

Miss Isobel Shean

Dear Dr. Shulman:

Your letter of February 13 included the following item: Mrs. Isobel Shean, 191 Kenilworth Avenue, Toronto 8, complained that during the recent storm, a tree limb caused $200 damage to her car, and despite being covered for this type of accident All-State refused to pay for the claim.

Mrs. Shean had purchased specified perils coverage for damage to her car, rather than the broader comprehensive coverage which was available to her. Comprehensive coverage would have paid for this damage, but would have required an additional $4 premium. The specified perils coverage means just that. The specific item covered by the policy included windstorm. If this loss had occurred due to wind, if the limb had fallen because of a heavy wind, we would have paid the damage, but it is our belief that the limb fell because there was too much ice on the tree branch. Our adjusters went to considerable trouble to determine if there was a heavy wind at that moment. Unfortunately the factors present during an ice storm rarely involve severe winds. We took no pleasure in denying payment to our policy holder, but only protect Mrs. Shean for the coverage she elected to purchase. This case does not represent a legitmate complaint.

I think that is my favourite. I am sort of curious as to how, three weeks after, they went back and decided that at that crucial moment the wind was not blowing.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Well, it was not—

Mr. Shulman: We heard the report from the insurance company. I thank the Minister of Reform Institutions.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Correctional Services.

Mr. Shulman: Ah, he has moved a little bit.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The hon. member has not moved at all.

Mr. Shulman: A little bit of injustice. Well, I have dozens. There is no use going on.

If any of the members want details I would be glad to supply them.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: The last one was not a good example.

Mr. Shulman: Since I have been encouraged, I shall read one or two more, just to point out the variety we have here.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: I did not realize the Conservative backbenchers were so interested. I think perhaps I should give them one or two more, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

The member for High Park, I believe, just finished reading certain letters from insurance companies pertaining to certain things. Last evening the member read several letters from individuals, I believe, in response to letters he had solicited through a newspaper advertisement, of which there were some 300. I believe that the member read into the records some six, seven or eight of them, by his own words, last night. They were all the same, therefore, it is the opinion of the chair that any further reading of letters from any of these 300 individuals would be repetitious. I suggest to the member that we have had enough of them. He has made his point.

Mr. Shulman: I will come to those 300 shortly, but now I am reading insurance company letters, and they have been carefully chosen each to give a specific and different type of example. If you will notice the ones I have read so far, there has been no repetition, because each was a specific, different type of auto insurance coverage.

Mr. Chairman: Is the member proceeding to read letters from insurance companies?

Mr. Shulman: These are all from insurance companies. None from individuals. They all represent a different type of problem, but out of solicitation for your furrowed brow, I will stop there. Let me say—

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Not at all, go on.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Shulman: The member for Grey South is interested and wants me to continue, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

The Chairman, I would say to the member for High Park, is only trying to be fair to all members of the House, and if in fact they were letters from the insurance companies it was not my intention to rule them out of order. I thought he was reading from individuals again.

Mr. Shulman: I will summarize them all in 60 seconds, Mr. Chairman. These are letters from insurance companies. There are 30 or 40 letters here, each of which represents a flagrant abuse of insurance in the insurance companies' own words. These are not one-sided complaints. These are complaints that have been received by me and forwarded to the All-Canada insurance federation. This is their reply that I have been reading today, and the insurance companies are condemned in their own words.

However, there will be further opportunities, I am sure, to read some of these letters to the interested member, so I will return to my speech of last night and continue where I left off. But let me stress the point I was trying to make, through you, sir, to the Minister. The reason I am stressing this is the insurance companies and the senior officials in those companies are so blinded by the threat which they feel has been mounted against them from so many sources—all the way from the NDP at one end to the President of the United States at the other—that they are reacting blindly and rejecting what is obvious and simple justice. For that reason I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Minister, that it is very important that the legislation which we need, be framed in the department, and not allow the insurance companies to take half measures in an effort to put off—for them—the evil day when we are going to have justice in auto insurance in this province.

Last night I was discussing the income of the insurance companies. I want to be fair and I do not want to suggest that all the letters I received were critical of insurance companies. There were eight which I received which were very laudatory to the insurance companies. I think in all fairness I should mention those. It would be a gross injustice to the insurance industry to suggest all the letters were addressed against them. Eight letters spoke very highly of the present system of insuring. They included letters from the Index Card Company, Mother Parker's Food, and Bell and Peters Estate Planning. Here is one typical letter praising the insurance industry, and I think to give you an example of how some people are fairly treated, I should read this in all honesty and and in all fairness:

> Dear Dr. Shulman:
>
> I thought you would be interested in the fact that all my friends and myself have been more than fairly treated by auto insurance companies over the years.
> Yours sincerely,
> (signed)
> Senator Joseph A. Sullivan,
> MB, FRSM Eng., FRCS.

It is encouraging to know that at least the Senators of this country and their friends are receiving fair treatment. This does make one feel good.

The pattern tends to bear out what Professor Linden documented in his report of 1965: "There is a higher average tort recovery in the cases involving people in the higher income brackets. . . ." I guess the Senator had spoken to him also.

The fact remains, however, that unfortunately most of us are not yet Senators and the average person does not receive adequate compensation for his losses. As Professor Linden said, only 28 per cent of the people interviewed in his study received 100 per cent recovery of their economic losses. And of the total persons injured, in the county of York and forming Professor Linden's example, he found that 54 per cent received nothing by way of tort compensation. Professor Linden concluded from his study that:

> The present tort system does not provide full economic compensation for people insured in automobile accidents. It also demonstrates that many of those who do recover, receive only a portion of their losses.

On the same subject, Professor Linden goes on to say:

> The tort system fails to provide anywhere near full economic recovery for all of those suffering loss. The tort system appears to operate best in the minor injury cases, worse in the serious cases, and worst of all in the fatal cases. Thus, where full compensation is most needed, it is less likely to be forthcoming.

A case might be made for the insurance industry despite the fact that its primary objective of protective insurance is not being fulfilled, on the grounds that as a private business it is generally run smoothly, calmly, economically, and with greater efficiency than the bureaucracy and red tape of a government agency could provide.

Sadly, however, this is not the case in the insurance industry. Their operating expenses for 1966 were running at $208 million per year This figure represents a whopping 33 per cent of the revenues collected by insurance companies. Thus, almost one-third of every dollar paid by an insured goes into oiling the gargantuan, outmoded and inefficient machine, while only a portion of the remainder is grudgingly paid out in claims. The expenses include an advertising budget aimed at collaring the preferred risks in a keenly competitive field where apparently too few preferred risks exist. It is also paid out to detectives who spy on claimants with the fond hope of proving that the claim is based on a fabrication of the facts. It goes to pay adjustors, who we may conclude are remunerated for their ability to beat down the claims of injured parties.

Where it does not go is to the wife of the deceased breadwinner, the driver of an automobile who depends upon his vehicle as a source of livelihood and is unable to have his automobile repaired because of lack of funds. It does not go to the driver who through a minor error in judgment is found negligent despite the fact in 1968, the concept of negligence, other than gross negligence, is no longer a valid test. It does not go to the people who have written me letters.

Time magazine and the Wall Street Journal, which can hardly be accused of socialist bias, have recognized the inherent weakness of the present system and have come to consider the liability without fault system as an alternative. Even President Johnson in his speech on the state of the union mentioned the state of the auto insurance industry as one of the serious problems facing that country.

Time's essay, dated January 26, 1968 was written under the headline, "The Business with 103 Million Unsatisfied Customers."

The Wall Street Journal ran its story on January 7, 1967, under the banner, "Insurance Innovation." "A Canadian province finds a way to slash auto crash litigation—compulsory 'no fault' policies sold by Saskatchewan pay all victims automatically." That is from the Wall Street Journal, I pass on to the Minister of Trade and Development.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): They are trying to get rid of it.

Mr. Shulman: They are trying to weaken it. The present reactionary government has tried to weaken it, but so far has not succeeded in getting rid of it. If the Liberals are there for another session—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Shulman: I would be glad to.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The member suggested it cost 33 cents out of every dollar to operate the insurance companies. He is a professional man operating an office and I presume he has a secretary, he drives an automobile and he has expenses to get his bills collected. I do not think he could operate for 33 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Shulman: I am a little disturbed by the Minister's question because I operate on considerably less than 33 cents on the dollar, and I suddenly have a horrible vision of how much his department must be operating on. I will be very interested to look into his estimates again.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, just let me suggest this, I have run a number of businesses and if we made 20 per cent before taxes I thought we did a good job. And I do not think there are very many businesses can operate for less than 33 cents on the dollar.

Mr. Shulman: Well, I have had some minor experience in business and I would be happy to offer my talents to the hon. Minister in his business and perhaps between us we could form a very excellent partnership and would be making more money.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The member has a deal; his money and my brains.

Mr. Shulman: And I would be glad to earn it so the Minister could spend it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: The member can put up the bucks.

Mr. Shulman: Okay, the Minister has a deal. To continue, we all know—except perhaps the Minister responsible—that the answer is, of course, compensation without fault; with payment made regardless of who caused the accident. Compensation without fault, because in most cases fault is difficult to establish; without fault because regardless of tort liability the human suffering endured in most cases far outweighs any reasonable punishment for fault; compensation without fault because costs of operating the scheme are cheaper than the present system; compensation without fault because the administration of justice is threatened by the burden presently placed upon it; compensation without fault because instead of paying out a mere 67 cents on every dollar to accident victims, the scheme, as in Saskatchewan, would pay out 87 cents; compensation without fault because the people of this province, realizing the shortcomings of the present system, demand it.

And—let me stress—a compensation without fault system run by this government so as to eliminate waste, advertising expense, and the huge profits of the insurance companies. Last year they saved some $46 million—that was without reserve—and after all their huge expenses.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Does the member recognize Saskatchewan as a—

Mr. Shulman: Yes, that is why I am recommending it.

Hon. Mr. Randall: If you did not join their insurance company, you did not get insurance?

Mr. Shulman: Right!

Hon. Mr. Randall: That is a closed corporation.

Mr. Shulman: Good, sometimes there is merit to that.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Look what has happaned to them since, they have had to raise all their rates.

Mr. Shulman: They are still cheaper than here. Since the Minister and I are having a dialogue, Mr. Chairman, I would be curious, when he has an opportunity, if he would give us his views on the Hydro.

Hon. Mr. Randall: No, I would just like to—

Mr. Shulman: Now, how could the scheme be financed? The scheme could be financed by adding two cents tax to each gallon of gas purchased. This would mean that an Ontario resident getting 12 miles to the gallon and driving 15,000 miles—

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): That was in the paper this morning.

Hon. Mr. Randall: That was in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Shulman: You did not read that in the Telegram at least.

This would mean that in Ontario a resident getting 12 miles to the gallon and driving 15,000 miles per year would pay $25 as his share of the insurance fund. This is, let me say, bending over backwards, the average person gets more than 12 miles to the gallon and the average person does not drive 15,000 miles a year. The second source of revenue would be a $10 insurance charge upon registration for renewal of licence. And finally, a surcharge of $25 would be levied against anyone involved in an accident, the result of which was criminal or quasi-criminal charges being laid and a conviction registered.

Hon. Mr. Randall: Your northern Ontario members would never stand for that.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): They would if they were getting something for it.

Mr. Shulman: I think the northern Ontario members, who will speak for themselves very shortly, will be delighted to pay that two cents instead of the hundreds of dollars they pay for insurance coverage right now.

Mr. E. W. Martel (Sudbury East): I am a northern Ontario member and I took a great part in the debate on the increase in gas and I submitted questions to the—

Mr. Chairman: Order! Is the member on a point or order?

Mr. Martel: Yes, I was getting in on this dialogue with the—

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Well, Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, unless the hon. member is rising on one, surely since the hon. member for High Park has taken his seat, his contribution is completed and we can begin with the first vote.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, the member rose on a point of order and, if it is not a point of order, I would like to continue.

Mr. Chairman: Continue please!

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Of course, the proper response to drivers whose driving record is so bad it is a constant danger to public safety is to take away their licence; not as is done now, by having the insurance companies tax them into submission. The advantages of this system are immediate.

Mr. Ben: Your party will have to try for no extra premiums.

Mr. Shulman: I have just said exactly the opposite.

Mr. Ben: That is not what he said.

Mr. Chairman: Order please!

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I wish the members would listen. I am glad to have their heckling and their contributions but I would appreciate it if they would heckle a little more accurately.

Mr. Chairman: Please give the member your full attention. Would you carry on?

Mr. Shulman: The advantages of this system are immediate. Distribution of the premiums is far more equitable over the population. Those who drive more, pay more. Those with more expensive cars consuming more fuel, pay more; and non-residents of the province buying gas in Ontario would contribute to the scheme.

The cost per driver is considerably less than existing costs. The reason that costs would be considerably lower than present rates is based on the inherent weakness of the present insurance system which I have spelled out today.

The cost of administration of the scheme would be miniscule in comparison to the fantastic cost of advertising and administering the existing system. Think of the $1 million to be spent this year by the All-Canada insurance federation alone just for public relations and advertising. This is not a company advertising for business, this is the All-Canada insurance federation just spending $1 million for lobbying against a modern insurance team. Where is it going? Up the flue! Gone!

There would also be a vast savings in legal fees and court time, and with all the side benefits of more police available for their proper functions instead of being tied up in the courts.

The people of this province have too long endured the vagaries and whims of the insurance industry. They have asked to be relieved of the burden of an out-of-date method of insurance carried for the benefit of the shareholders and employees of insurance companies. They have asked that we provide them with a meaningful economical and humane system of insurance, and as their representatives we cannot ignore their request.

Such a system is possible now. If you, the government, do not provide such a system during the life of this Legislature, I can promise you that the next election will be fought on this issue, because we are prepared to provide such a plan. If you do not bring in a proper insurance plan, I predict you will be swept away by the people who are fed up with exploitation by the insurance companies.

One final word in conclusion. There is a piece of legislation which has been slowly marching toward us which will allow compensation without fault insurance in this province, and this, Mr. Chairman, is not the answer. What we have to have is universal compensation without fault insurance because, otherwise, if the insurance companies are allowed to stave off the time that we have proper coverage with a bill such as this where they can say "well it was available, you could have bought it, too bad you did not"—all this is just more window dressing. That bill does not go one-tenth of the way toward solving the problem. Sure, a few people will take advantage, but what we need is protection for everyone in this province and we expect this government to provide it.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on some of the matters mentioned by members of the Opposition.

First, the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon) expressed the hope that some information would be given with respect to the actuarial study being carried out by Mr. Allen L. Mayerson.

Mr. Mayerson, as I mentioned last year in the House, was commissioned by 10 Canadian provinces to do an actuarial study with the purpose of reporting on the adequacy and fairness of the present statistical plan as a means for establishing equitable automobile premiums in Canada.

For the information of the House, Mr. Mayerson is regarded as being one of the top actuaries in the United States.

Though his final report is not expected until sometime in the fall, I would like to refer briefly to comments made by him in a recent interim report.

He stated:

> Our preliminary work reveals a fundamentally well-founded, well-organized system for collecting statistics and using them to make automobile insurance rates in the nine Canadian provinces where private insurers operate.
> We believe the system is sound, and find no evidence to indicate that Canadian policyholders are, in any way, being victimized by the use of improper statistical or actuarial techniques.

As a matter of further interest, Mr. Mayerson noted that the "loss development factor," used to adjust the outstanding claims as reported, to the anticipated ultimate loss payments, had been inadequate in the policy years 1962 and 1963.

This resulted in the average claim in 1963 being underestimated by as much as 10 per cent. The result of this underestimate has been to indicate a lower premium level in the subsequent year than was actually justified.

Mr. Mayerson concluded that a re-examination of the "loss experience" in the development of claims was therefore indicated.

The hon member for High Park has dealt at length with automobile insurance cases and suggested that any negative aspect could be remedied by introducing a system of compensation without fault.

He has offered, as a curative, a socialist panacea for the bargain-basement price of $35 a year for the average driver.

Frequent reference has been made, as it is every year by the socialist party, to The Saskatchewan Automobile Accident Insurance Act.

The plan which functions as a result of this Act is held out as the answer to all automobile insurance problems. Without going into a lot of detail, the plan's basic limits include a $35,000 maximum on liability and a $200 deductible mandatory on first party coverage. Basic coverage is compulsory, and premiums are paid when the driver obtains his licence.

However, I seldom hear reference from the socialists to the fact that premium income falls far short of meeting claims and expenses, and in 1965-66 alone the people of Saskatchewan, through their taxes, had to underwrite a deficit of almost $1,000,000.

Mr. MacDonald: That is not true.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh well now, I sat here quietly listening and not interrupting you and I expect the same courtesy.

Mr. MacDonald: I just said it was not true.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is all right. Do you want me to continue?

I think that it should also be mentioned that it is incumbent on the individual in Saskatchewan, if he wants higher liability limits and more satisfactory first party protection, to buy supplementary coverage.

As far as Ontario is concerned, the final report of the select committee on automobile insurance recommended that compensation without fault "be made an integral and mandatory part of the standard policy sold in the province of Ontario."

As I am sure the hon member for High Park must be aware, a provision to meet the intent of this recommendation will become standard in Ontario and the rest of Canada on January 1, 1969.

Accidents benefits without fault, as proposed in the Ontario standard policy, differ in three important ways from those included in the compulsory coverage of Saskatchewan.

1. The purchase of accident benefits under the Ontario policy will be entirely voluntary.

2. Whereas Saskatchewan lists a rigid scale of benefits, varying amounts can be purchased in Ontario according to the desire of the indivdual involved.

The Saskatchewan scale includes: $10,000 plus $300 funeral expenses for one death; $4,000 for dismemberment; $2,000 for expenses not covered under any other programme; a maximum benefit for total disability of $25 a week for 104 weeks.

3. The Saskatchewan plan provides coverage to pedestrians. The proposed Ontario policy does not, as a basic requirement, though pedestrians can be added by endorsement. The theory in Ontario is that a motorist might buy protection for his passengers, but would not wish to provide protection for the pedestrians when the motorist was not responsible for the accident.

Frequent references have been made to the Osgoode Hall study by Professor Allen Linden. I would like to quote the following statement made by Professor Linden with respect to the study. He said:

> The report of the Osgoode Hall study on compensation for victims of automobile accidents demonstrated that there was a tort recovery in only 42.9 per cent of the injury cases, but most of the uncompensated did not attempt to recover and many were guest passengers who were barred completely by statute from recovering in Ontario at that time.
> This has not stopped some people from citing this data in provinces where there is no absolute bar to actions by guest passengers. Nor has it prevented others from assailing the insurers because of the large uncompensated loss figures, without carefully studying the basis of the calculation and the law in force at the time.
> On the other side, defenders of the system sometimes point to the bright spots in the data, ignoring the fact that the delays are longer and the incidence of recovery is less frequent in the more serious cases.
> Those who still wish to destroy tort law and those who want to keep it inviolate are now deadlocked.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to make a reference to the comments of the hon. member for High Park and the 300 letters. I think that it was common knowledge, and somewhat notorious about the placing of the advertisements inviting the complainants to come forward with their complaints. Now, in Ontario, there are estimated to be at least over two million auto insurance contracts in effect, and I can only comment on the 300, taking that as a fair figure, without discounting it at all. Three hundred out of two million is pretty much of a decimal, minimal aspect of complaints to be recorded.

Mr. MacDonald: As Time magazine said, "103 million unsatisfied customers".

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is all very well. It is just a juicy phrase—that is all. In my own experience, and I have said it before and I will say it again, most business people in this province are decent, reputable and responsible, and that is the basis on which our society is founded. However, we can get along with the estimates, I presume—

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to engage in a propaganda exchange with the Minister, with him dismissing everything we say on car insurance as being socialist propaganda, and with me arguing that he is regurgitating the ghost writings of the insurance companies. But there is one factual point which I categorically deny, and I challenge the Minister to substantiate it.

I submit, as my latest proof the Liberal Cabinet Minister in the province of Saskatchewan when this regurgitation emerged a few months ago from some spokesman for the insurance industry. The Saskatchewan taxpayers have never, and will never, under the statute of the Saskatchewan car insurance, have to underwrite the car insurance programme. There may, in some year, be a deficit as they move to an increase in premiums as all insurance companies have experienced, but the increase in premiums will pick up that deficit.

But there has never been an occasion—and do not let this Minister or anybody else play with the facts—there has never been an occasion in which the Saskatchewan taxpayer has had to underwrite it. This is a self-sustaining programme.

An hon. member: That is not true!

Mr. MacDonald: That is true, and your Liberal Cabinet minister has said so.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 701. The member for York Centre.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, in vote 701, I note a very large jump in the salaries this year. There was some brief mention made in the Minister's opening comments, but an increase from $135,000 in main office salaries to $309,000 would cause me to appreciate some greater explanation and detail on that and how it is made up.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In this department, as you will appreciate, there are three main divisions which are readily identifiable. There is the operation of the securities commission; the combined office of the registrar of loan and trust companies, and the office of the superintendent of insurance, and thirdly, the consumer protection division. There are a number of other areas which are included in the main office vote, the first vote currently before us. There is a substantial staff which has been established and is available to all of the three divisions of the department.

For instance, on April 1, 1967, there were 22 people, while as of April 1, 1968, there was an increase of 21, for a total of 43 members of the staff. The increases included an executive assistant to the Deputy Minister, the department solicitor, secretary to the solicitor, financial and accounting advisor, secretary to the financial and accounting advisor, financial research analyst, corporate counsel, librarian, one economist, and so on for a total of some 21.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I notice that there is also an increase in each of these three main departments of some size. They seem to have their own staff increases. I still cannot understand why it would be such a large amount in this department and in this year. Has it been found necessary to complement the work? There is no overlap occurring between the works of these three branches, and the department itself?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not think that there is.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, the figure of research expense again is $200,000. Last year, I understand that that amount was invested to the extent of perhaps $50,000 in the mutual funds study which was expected to be completed by January, 1968.

There is also money on a mining study and the CANSEC study, the actuarial study I suppose that has to do with the investigation of insurance rates.

Could we have some report on where the money is going this year? It would be also very interesting this year to hear what progress was made in these areas last year, because we had expected them in last year's Budget debate, or departmental estimates to have been completed by this time.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The $200,000 is broken down as follows. The Ontario government, acting as banker in the federal-provincial cost-shared study of mutual funds and investment contracts, allowed $150,000.

Secondly, there is a feasibility study re CANSEC in the amount of $10,000; thirdly a financing of a mining company study, $10,000; and fourthly acutarial studies in the matter of automobile insurance, $20,000.

Public education material study $5,000; research grant to the constitutional study $2,500, and a research commodity market study of $2,500.

In connection with the federal-provincial shared study on mutual funds, Ontario is providing the administrative services for the study and will act as a banker in meeting day-to-day costs.

As in the 1967-68 fiscal year, Ontario will seek reimbursement of its banker liabilities from the federal government, 50 per cent of the total cost, as will all other provincial participants.

Ontario's actual cost will be 34.44 per cent of the 50 per cent of the total cost involved.

The breakdown for the other participating provinces is as follows. Manitoba's share would be 4.97 per cent; Newfoundland 1.56 per cent; Prince Edward Island 0.40 per cent; Nova Scotia 3.07 per cent; New Brunswick 2.28; Quebec 25.8; Saskatchewan 4.62; Alberta 7.48; and British Columbia 10.36.

Now a comment with respect to the mining committee. In July of 1967, the Ontario securities commission appointed a committee under the chairmanship of commissioner D. S. Beatty with the following terms of reference; to review the commissions underwriting, vendor consideration, escrow, or pooling policies, and other matters related to the financing of unlisted mining exploration and development companies.

Secondly, the membership of the committee consisted of Mr. D. S. Beatty, as chairman, together with Mr. G. E. Grundy, Professor John Willis and Mr. J. F. McFarland of the commission, and Miss E. M. Brown and Miss J. Sabia, secretary of the administration became the committee staff.

Thirdly, the committee has concluded a series of public hearings held at such centres as Port Arthur, Fort William, Sault Ste Marie, Timmins, plus an extensive series of meetings at which representations were received from interested parties. Thse hearings commenced on August 9, 1967 with the last meeting having taken place on April 29, 1968.

Briefs and representations were received from many sources, submitted largely by Ontario residents, but also from persons as far away as Vancouver. During the course of these proceedings, it became obvious that it would be necessary to consider subjects outside the specific terms of reference.

The committee has completed a review of the facts and the submissions made to it, and they are in the process of formulating recommendations.

It is hoped that this report will be ready during the early fall.

Mr. Deacon: I am pleased to hear of the work of this mining committee, Mr. Chairman. I think it is very important that as soon as possible an alternative to primary distribution on the Toronto stock exchange be found so that we do not have the abuses and problems that have arisen from this practice in the past. I know the exchange itself, on the whole, will be very pleased to find a much better method of raising risk capital for our mining industry.

What progress has been made on CANSEC and is there any report as to the way that is developing? Is it developing in the form of co-operative interchange of prospectuses or a co-operative method of accepting the prospectus filed in other provinces, and having a standard that each province in effect will accept without having each one send in its own comments on a prospectus?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, it is not a matter which moves very rapidly, and particularly with the current political situation in the past six months. It has not been possible to move in some of these areas with the federal government. I think now that the air has been cleared we will be able to move along fairly rapidly

When the subject of CANSEC and what is involved with that subject matter was first raised, I had the view that a period of five or ten years might be required to get this type of thing established, but I have certainly revised my thinking on this.

I think that it is in the almost foreseeable future; in a matter of a year or so. I think in a couple of years it will be operative. So a good deal of thought has been given to this matter, and I think that the advantages of it are so obvious and patent that those involved in those jurisdictions, who have financial transactions within their compass, will be anxious to move this thing forward on a uniform basis, and simplify the procedures. I think that people in the financial field are entitled to a break by way of simplification and to avoid duplication of efforts.

Mr. Deacon: As I understand the concept, Mr. Chairman, CANSEC is working on a decentralized basis of co-operative acceptance of prospectuses rather than in the SEC concept of everybody having to go to Washington to get decisions. In this way, we can keep the actual dealing with prospectuses right here in the Ontario securities commission, rather than our having to deal with the securities commission in Ottawa, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You have stated it accurately.

Mr. Deacon: Has the government recovered its last year's contribution to the mutual fund study?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, there has been complete repayment from the other jurisdictions.

Mr. Deacon: The Minister did not state, but I think there was a release recently—which I do not have—of the names of the advisory committee of the department. You mentioned in your speech that it was a very low cost part of your operation, because these people were volunteers. Would you state their names or provide a list of their names for us?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes. The hon. Donald Fleming was the first chairman of that committee, and on his retirement he was succeeded by Mr. Donald A. McIntosh, QC. Other members of the committee are Charles L. Gundy, Thomas A. M. Hutchison, David B. Mansur, J. H. Ratcliffe, Allyn Taylor of London and John R. M. Wilson.

Mr. Deacon: Is their function purely advisory? What sort of function do they have? How often do they meet? How are you co-operating or making use of this committee?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They do not meet every week but I think they meet about every six weeks and are available to advise with respect to any crises or matters that are in the offing. They try to keep us informed so we can take the best possible action.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we might take advantage, even further, of this advisory type of committee and broaden its background and base, and have perhaps a representative of the labour union. I notice we have in here an urban development institute representative, and others from insurance, banking, law, and the investment community. Perhaps we could have this on a rotation basis so that we are able to have a continuing and more formalized contact with the public, and find ways of steadily improving the atmosphere between the financial community and the general public.

I do feel that one of the great problems in the past has been the feeling among the financial community that Queen's Park does not understand or does not pay attention to its needs. I think you made a great step forward when you established this committee, but maybe it could be even further utilized in the future.

Public education is a very important part of the operation of this department and I notice you have a small amount of money set aside for that. In what way is that money going to be used? What is the programme in public education? It seems like a very small amount to be spending when we need to have people much more aware of the steps they should take in investigating investments.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There have been two approaches to this matter of public education. I am glad to hear the hon. member take the position he has on this subject, because there can be no doubt of the need for better understanding by the public of both their rights and their responsibilities with respect to the market and the investment and purchase of securities.

We have included, in our first year, a series of four seminars largely directed to the subject of consumer protection. The idea behind the seminars was to get our staff out into the province and to experience just how we could develop and advance the question of education and the dissemination of information to the general public.

Tied in with that was the series of pamphlets, which have been written in layman's language, dealing with the consumer protection division, and also a pamphlet on securities.

At one point, a year ago, we thought that maybe 50,000 of these pamphlets would be the initial demand, but at the moment, within less than a year, there are over one million that have been distributed. There seems to be a good acceptance of this.

I think one of the great challenges that we must face immediately is to develop a method of contracting and advancing and developing this public education aspect.

We have learned a good deal from our seminars, and I hope that in this coming year we will possibly change the format of the seminars, and go to some other different cities and towns and develop a means of having a bank or a panel of competent persons who can be on call and go out with us to women's institutes or organizations which indicate and demonstrate an interest in what we are doing.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister could tell me if these seminars have been well attended or not well attended? Has it been easy to get good crowds in attendance?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: At the last one, in Kingston, where the weather was ideal, just a couple of weeks ago, over 300 attended. When the first one was held, at the Lakehead, there were about 225 present. In Woodstock, there was just a shade under 200, and I think that was largely due to a heavy snowstorm the evening before, which I think interfered with the attendance of some of the people. At North Bay, at the third one, there were about 225 again.

Mr. Deacon: I am interested, Mr. Chairman, that there are as many as that turning up. I think it is important that we really hit the headlines with these affairs. Maybe if we had seminars headlined "How To Make a Million," we might find that the public's attention is very much attracted. They might also learn some of the pitfalls of most people who think they can make money and, as in the case of Prudential, for example, are not aware that they should be getting a prospectus, and this–

Mr. Shulman: On a point of order, just for my enlightenment, will the member allow a question? I am just curious as to whether the member is suggesting that the government should recommend that "Anyone Can Make a Million" should be compulsory reading to all investors?

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, coming back to the matter. The public does seem to be quite ignorant of its rights and the available information that it is entitled to in order for it to be able to make a decision. It is amazing how few people recognize the true role of the securities commission.

We do not want government bodies telling us what securities are good and what securities are bad. But we want, though, to have full, true and plain disclosures. It is their obligation, if they are incapable themselves of understanding, to go to those who should know.

A lot of people think, for example, that the bank manager should know. Most bank managers do not know any more about securities than I know about lending money to people as a banker.

These are things that I hope this programme is helping to identify–that there are people who are qualified and can give them advice and others, who–lawyers, doctors, bankers–some are qualified, but a great many are not.

I have not seen copies of what the department has put out, I would appreciate getting some of this material. Had I been able to make contact with the Minister earlier regarding these matters, I would like to have seen what the Minister's programme involved, because it seems to me a very small amount for educating the public in this estimate.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 701, the member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I was very intrigued by the remarks of the member for York Centre. Just briefly, I would like to suggest to the hon. Minister, through you, sir, that he not follow this advice too closely because if he will think back the bad advice on some stocks came, sad to say, from the brokers. There were no bank managers recommending the purchase of Windfall. I believe that if bank managers err in giving advice it is on the conservative side, and in protecting their clients' interests; but, sad to say, some brokers are very competent and some are not so competent, and the public rarely can tell the competent broker from the not so competent borker.

We have seen just today, in the charges laid by this government, that supposedly reputable brokers can have their hands in the till. We have seen a number of other instances where supposedly intelligent brokers can give absolutely wild advice in recommending stocks which a prudent trained person would never purchase. So perhaps one should not push the bank managers out of this business, or the doctors either, too completely.

I would like to ask the Minister under this particular vote–he mentioned yesterday that the matter of government insurance will be discussed somewhere in here–should it not come under vote 701, or would you prefer to discuss it at a later time?

Mr. Chairman: I think the Minister suggested, when he was making his opening remarks, that it would be at the end of the estimates.

Mr. Shulman: Fine. The other question I have: Does the unsatisfied judgment fund come under your jurisdiction whatsoever?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is the motor vehicle accident claims fund and comes under Transport.

Mr. Chairman: Vote 701. The leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, there have been one or two comments made this afternoon that I find interesting, and I would like to get some information from the Minister with regard to them.

The first has to do with bankers acting as advisers in the purchase of securities. I would presume that everyone is aware of the fact that bankers can take orders for securities. Do they come under the direction of the securities commission in any way? I would presume they would, surely, since they have this responsibility and their offices from one end of the province to the other?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I missed a couple of words.

Mr. Nixon: Specifically, I want to know if banks come under the securities commission in their function in advising and placing orders for their clients?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Nixon: It seems to me that this is quite a serious shortcoming.

There are many investors that do use the advice of their bankers, and use the facilities of the bank, in order to place their orders —buying and selling. There are instances that I have heard of where these orders have not been competently placed. I believe that it is the Minister's responsibility to see that some agency, probably the securities commission, has jurisdiction in this regard.

The banks, of course, come under federal jurisdiction, but the bankers are going to be advising and taking orders for the sale and the purchase of securities; they are not acting as bankers specifically, they are acting as brokers. I think that legislation that would put these people under the direction of the securities commission could be quite possible and legal.

There is a serious loophole here. I would like the Minister's view, but surely there is something better within the present system.

Just before I sit down, I would say that the member for High Park is probably right, they might err, if at all, in the conservative aspects of their advice. But I have heard of cases where there was not an error in this regard, it was an error of incompetence in not placing the order when it was supopsed to be placed.

Mr. Chairman: Before the Minister replies, I would just point out to the Minister and the committee that we have been talking extensively on the Ontario securities commission, which is vote 702. I point this out to the members—that the securities commission is a separate vote. I put it to the Minister whether or not he wants to deal with it at this time.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, that is quite agreeable with me. It is a matter that the securities commission does not deal with, and there are no funds in it, apparently, that would deal with this, so it would be a matter of policy. I raised it because the two previous members had mentioned it.

The second thing I would like to put to the Minister is something else that occurred to me during the comments made by the previous speakers. Reputable advisors—usually reputable advisors—have been giving the sort of advice that would lead our investors to look to the New York market for a better and a safer return on their investments.

This has been a problem that we have faced, as Canadians and as citizens of Ontario, for many years. I refer specifically to the book, "How To Make a Million," or is it "Anyone Can Make a Million?" My colleague from Sudbury (Mr. Sopha) made mention of it—made much of the fact that the hon. member for High Park, who is quite a reputable adviser, in these matters, having been somewhat successful himself, if that is a criterion, had, as one of the basic recommendations, that for the best return and the safest return in investment one had to look outside of Canada and outside of the Toronto market for these investments. He is not the only one who has given this sort of advice.

We, in the last five years, have been plagued by a number of pressures that have really added force to these suggestions. There have been many studies made that have purported to show the percentage of Canadian investment and perhaps even investment in Ontario—that has gone elsewhere in recent years. I think it is very regrettable that the savings of our own people are not invested to a greater degree in our own natural resources and other industry.

It has occurred to me more than once that one of the things that might encourage home investment—investment in the Montreal Toronto, Winnipeg, and Vancouver exchanges —would be a national securities commission. I understand further that having listened to the remarks this afternoon about the programme known as CANSEC that this is sort of a typical Canadian compromise of making do with what we have and actually making a virtue out of it. I can imagine that the Minister, on previous occasions, and perhaps in the future, will try to make a virtue of the fact that the provinces are autonomous, but they have this great horizontal network of co-operation which is going to give us the sort of control that is better than other jurisdictions.

Yet the innocent investor is still prone to the feeling that, in the United States, the SEC can rule with an iron hand on any shady practices. In fact, this has resulted in the development and strengthening of confidence in American investments in relation to investments here that are still reflected in the investments that are made. We are still losing tremendous quantities of capital that would certainly be desirable that we would have invested here.

Specifically, I would like the Minister to comment on the possibility of transferring at least some of the powers that he has as the Minister in this department, to a national board. To what extent he can inform the House as to the percentage of savings that flow out of the province and out of the nation for investment in the United States, that might ordinarily be expected to be invested here?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is a pretty tall question, but let us just have a look at the situation. It is regrettable that the inflow of investment capital is at such a high rate in favour of the United States. It cannot help but have a bearing on Canada's monetary situation.

There are, of course, experts, and I do not pretend to be any expert in the field, but there are those who are experienced who say that where a stock is listed, say, on the New York exchange, and also on a Canadian or Toronto exchange that there is a better balance on the New York exchange because of the larger number of shares which are traded. This apparently makes it attractive for people to deal on the New York exchange, and apparently the advantages are obvious.

Now, let me just give you some figures here. There is a matter of education involved as well. The hon. member for York Centre was discussing the question of education in the securities field. I think that there is a lot to be done and I think that those of us who believe in Canada—we are always talking about our great natural resources and our mineral wealth—I think we have to do something about it.

Part of this programme of education must be to toot our own country and so participate in the development of Canada as such, and have a part of it. We are citizens. Let us be shareholders in our country's future.

I think we have two references made to the question of confidence in the market, in the Canadian financial scene. You will remember when the department was first established in November 24, 1966. I had some knowledge, and I think I have mentioned this in the House before, of what portfolio I would move to.

It was around November 10, when we were waiting for the department to be announced, and when Prudential went I began to think I had been had.

It was in this area of the determination of the government to establish this new department, and then when Prudential went you remember I said that I think that I could try to sum up the objectives of the department by saying that it was our intention to try and see that another Prudential just did not happen.

Mr. Nixon: There were some people who thought it came relatively close a few months afterwards.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Nixon: There were some people who thought that we came relatively close to another debacle, a few months after.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, but think of the leadership that was demonstrated by this government in avoiding that situation.

Mr. Nixon: Certainly, hanging on by their fingernails—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: All right. You remember the cartoon with you in it, and how the newspaper writers pictured you that day when the bank was falling? Do you remember? I do.

I might, on this point, say that last week that certain situation was finally and totally cleaned up and out of the way. The two companies that were involved completed their merger and received the necessary approvals from this government, as well as from the federal authorities in Canada deposit and—

Mr. Nixon: It took an Act of this Legislature.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is right!

Mr. Ben: What happened to the bank by the way?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The bank? Well, it has merged now.

While we are on this general subject, there was one other. I do not think I should name it, but there was one other company that, on the transfer and the acceptance into the federal deposit scheme, there was one transaction which had to be cleaned up. That, too, has been cleaned up, so that we are now in the position of being able to say that all Ontario loan and trust companies are now accepted into the federal scheme.

Mr. Nixon: May I just ask in this connection, does the Minister imply that one company actually had to draw on the provincial deposit insurance before the—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, no!

Mr. Nixon: Well, what was the sum which was cleared up?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It was an internal transaction where they had sold some property and there was a balance on the contract of purchase and sale that did not come due until some time in June. That is now completed.

Mr. Nixon: Provincial funds were never involved in any of the cases?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Nor did we ever get into the collection of any premiums in the Ontario deposit insurance corporation. I might say that in the ODIC, following Mr. Ambridge's retirement as the chairman, Mr. Budd Rieger accepted the chairmanship.

Though there is no activity in that Ontario deposit insurance corporation, we think we should keep it alive because under the Ontario legislation there are certain advantages which do not exist in the federal deposit bill, and I think they should—

Mr. Nixon: Those advantages are for management assistance, is that so?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is right.

Mr. Nixon: Well, I was going to ask about that, but I was not sure that it came in the first vote. I can save it if you want.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I am amazed by the remarks that I have just heard from the Minister, patting himself on the back on the good track record he has had since Prudential and I am surprised—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There was not any of that spirit in my remarks whatsoever.

Mr. Shulman: Well, I would be glad to retract my comment partially in that case. But I am surprised that the leader of the Opposition did not jump on him, because just within the last ten weeks, here in Ontario, we have had another Prudential, just as bad, exactly the same circumstances, and the government has not done a darn thing.

In Prudential, we had people at the head of the company who stole part of the funds; we had members of the public who thought they were taking no risk and were depositing their money; we had securities which were purchased outright, which disappeared.

We have exactly the same thing occurring right here in Toronto within the last ten weeks and nobody in this House has said a thing about it. I have a list here of people —pages of them—who have lost their money. These are not people who took a risk, these are people who paid outright; bought things like American growth funds. They did not think they were buying anything on margin, did not think they were taking any risk at all in securities. We had exactly the same situation where they did not have any protection.

I will have some very lengthy comments on this in the next vote, but under this particular vote I want to bring up the dereliction of the government in not providing insurance for investors, because this is what we need and we do not have it. We have this great, wonderful, new legislation which manages to protect a tiny, tiny proportion of those who happen to invest through a finance company or a trust company.

Most of the investors in this province are not aware of the fine distinction. They see that someone is a member of the stock exchange or someone is a member of the IDA, or is a broker-dealer, and they see no technical difference between them. This is why people do not want to invest in Ontario, because you still have not provided protection to investors.

You can still go in to, supposedly, the most reputable dealer on Bay Street and buy the best stock, or the best bond in the world and pay cash for the whole thing, and then two weeks later be told: "Too bad, too bad, somebody walked away with your money; no insurance for you, no protection from the government, just too bad."

I have an editorial here from the Financial Post of March 2, 1968, on ths very subject and they can hardly be accused of socialist bias. I want to read that because it sums up the whole problem, and it is a problem this government has not even touched upon, they have not looked at it.

Mr. Chairman: Does that come under vote 701?

Mr. Shulman: Yes, it does. It has nothing to do with the securities commission whatsoever. This has to do with government policy and the general office.

Mr. Chairman: Might I ask the Minister what vote this might be discussed under?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is quite agreeable to me.

Mr. Chairman: It is agreeable to the Minister.

Mr. Shulman: I am glad.

Mr. Chairman: I am glad that the member is glad.

Mr. Shulman: I am glad the Chairman is glad.

INSURANCE FOR INVESTORS

The recent bankruptcy of Toronto investment dealer Meggeson, Goss and Company raises this important question. There should be some form of industry insurance to protect clients who leave money or securities on deposit with investment firms. This insurance would be in addition to insurance carried by the individual firms. In the case of a trust company, the government decided that deposits should be insured even though the firms had long been subject to government regulation and supervision, and while some trust companies complained, the increase in trust company savings deposit volume since the introduction of insurance suggests that the change helped to polish an industry image.

There are many similarities between the trust company problem and that of investment firms. Both have had excellent records. Except for one small trust company which failed at the beginning of the century, no trust company depositor had lost money up to the time of the British Mortgage and Trust Company affair. None lost money then, but the Ontario government had to step in and promise to support the depositors. No client of a member firm of the investment dealers association of Canada has as yet lost money because of a financial collapse, although the outcome of charges laid in the Meggeson, Goss and Company incident is not yet known, nor is the position of clients.

Both groups are subject to substantial regulation and inspection. The trust companies are regulated by federal and provincial laws. IDA members are regulated by the association itself, which has strict rules about capital insurance, safekeeping and segregation of client securities and audits. But as in the trust company industry, the investment community as a whole suffers when one of its members attracts unfavourable public attention. The Meggeson failure should prompt the investment firms to reappraise the merits of additional disclosure, inspection, insurance, or other protective measure for their industry. It is in everyone's interest that the dealer's good record remain untarnished.

Mr. Chairman, that sums it up so very well. We have gone through these fantastic collapses in Ontario and we still do not have a system of government insurance that will protect the innocent investor, who without intending to gamble or speculate, buys a grade A security from supposedly a grade A broker, if that broker who either does bankrupt or, through a criminal act, has the funds stolen from him, that investor is just up the creek. He has no chance of getting his money back.

I suggest to the Minister that his department is going to continue to be in bad shape, and we in Ontario are going to continue to be in worse shape, because no one is going to want to invest here—worse, no one is even going to want to buy things here, even American securities. Why buy American securities through a Canadian broker who may run off with your money? You have to bring in legislation to protect the investor, and until you do, we are going to continue to have the problem as laid out in this particular editorial.

Far worse has happened since that editorial, as the Minister is well aware. We have a far worse situation on our hands right now which I will speak on later. This is not a secret, this is not something new. It has been written up time and time again, and this is something which is so outstanding, and which has not been covered in the trust companies' legislations, I am amazed that the Minister has not already brought in legislation to cover this particular matter.

Under this vote there is a matter I would like to go on to, but does the Minister wish to make any comment on this before I do?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would be glad to look into the matter you are raising.

Mr. Shulman: On the matter of investments in the United States by Canadians, I think this deserves a comment. It has been mentioned by the leader of the Opposition. The point which I wish to make under this vote is that investment in the United States by Canadians is not necessarily bad for Canada. I do not want to use my own thoughts or my own ideas here particularly; I am going to quote from R. H. Jones, vice-president of the securities division of the investors' group, which is one of the largest investors in Canadian securities. He made a speech some weeks ago in Montreal in which he spoke as follows:

> Investment by Canadians in United States securities is beneficial, not detrimental to the Canadian economy.
> He told the Canadian arm of the American management association yesterday that > the flow of equity investment is but a small part of the whole balance of payments relationship with the United States.

> So long as Washington permits us to borrow funds in the New York market, it seems rather short-sighted to agitate for Canadians not to invest equity capital in the United States. Furthermore, savings were attracted to equities only if there was a promise of reasonable return on the investment. Canadian investment in the United States, through appreciation, represents a growing income and wealth for the Canadian investor and, I may add, for Canada.

Mr. Jones said current assets under administered mutual funds total $2.3 billion.

> Over 45 per cent of these assets are in the form of non-Canadian common stocks. There is no evidence as yet of a slowing down in this trend because of the simple fact that the United States markets are broader, and offer representative growth stocks in computers and electronics, which are missing in the Canadian market mix. The Canadian market has suffered from insufficient liquidity and archaic operating procedures. A drastic change in investment philosophy has come over the mutual fund industry in recent years.

The point he makes here is a very valid one, and I think perhaps in our nationalistic patriotism we should not wave the flag too strongly on this particular matter. The amount of money that we are sending to the United States is really still infinitesimal as compared to the amount of money they are sending here, and the money that we send there does not go into things like bonds where we are drawing a flat interest rate. Most of it goes into equity investments which are going to bring riches home to Canada, so this per se is not a bad thing.

The reason for it is bad, because the reason is that in Canada we have bad securities legislation. In most things in Canada we expect to be five or ten years behind the times, but in securities legislation in Canada we are 34 years behind the times. I have here The Securities Exchange Act of 1934. It is The United States Securities Exchange Act of 1934, and it puts our legislation in 1968 in Canada to shame. When you read through this, you wonder why anybody would buy anything at any time on a Canadian exchange from a Canadian broker. It is a fairly lengthy report and I do not want to go into detail, but there are just one or two brief items I would like to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, because they sum up how in 1934 the United States securities industry, the government, and those responsible were so far ahead of where we are in Canada in 1968.

Basically this is the same Act they still have. There have been improvements made, but this is the basic Act as it was spelled out in 1934 following certain lessons which had been learned in that country in the previour few years but which apparently have yet to be learned here.

> It is wrong to effect a loan with one or more other persons, a series of transactions in any security registered on a national securities exchange, creating actual or apparent active trading in such security, or raising or depressing the price of such security for the purpose of inducing the purchase or sale of such security by others.

That is still a common practice right here in Toronto. I am not referring to wash trading, let me tell you right now; I am not referring to wash trading, which is forbidden in this jurisdiction. I am referring to the practice of a promoter stepping in and buying stock. He feeds it out through various means, through customers' men and in other ways, such as through United States orders. He then sells the stock, steps back in and buys it back, and creates an appearance of activity. This is illegal in the United States; it was illegal 34 years ago. It should be illegal in Canada. And do not confuse it with wash trading.

Mr. Ben: How about short selling?

Mr. Shulman: There is nothing illegal about that. In fact, short selling, may I explain, Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the member for Humber, is a very essential part of the working of markets. If there were no short sellers—and short sellers basically are the professionals who work in the exchange—when a stock starts to go down, there would be nobody to buy it back on the way down, so short selling is a very definite and very important part of securities trading. Let me say it has to be regulated and I think it is reasonably regulated. But short selling should not be a criminal act.

I refer you to page 26 of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act. They are referring now to directors, owners, and principal stockholders. Let me read this, because this sums up something which we have hammered at in this House but obviously we have not got through to the government on it.

Mr. Chairman: Did the member say 1934?

Mr. Shulman: 1934!

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for emphasizing that point for me.

> For the purpose of preventing the unfair use of information which may have been obtained by beneficial owner, director or officer, by reason of his relationship to the issuer any profit realized by him from any purchase and sale or any sale and purchase of any equity security of such issuer other than an exempted security within any period of less than six months unless such security was acquired in good faith in connection with a debt previously contracted, shall enure to and be recoverable by the issuer irrespective of any intention on the part of such beneficial owner, director or officer in entering into such transaction of holding the security purchased or of not re-purchasing the security sold for a period exceeding six months.

What this section does is prevent officers, shareholders and directors of taking advantage of inside knowledge and making a profit. They can be sued for that profit, and they can be forced to cough it up. We should have had this in Canada 34 years ago also.

On page 27, again, under liability for misleading statements, the Minister yesterday gave a great explanation of how he had been misunderstood by the Globe and Mail and he had not really meant what he had said, and I am glad that he made this explanation because he gave Ontario some very bad publicity in those words. But let us see what the law says in the United States. I quote section 18(a) under liability for misleading statements:

> Any person who shall make or cause to be made any statement in any application, report or document filed pursuant to this title or any rule or regulation thereunder or any undertaking contained in a registration statement as provided in subsection (d), which statement was at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, false or misleading with respect to any material fact shall be liable to any person not knowing that such statement was false or misleading, who with reliance upon such statement shall have purchased or sold a security at a price which was affected by such statement for damages caused by such reliance unless the person sued shall prove that he acted in good faith and had no knowledge that such statement was false and misleading.

This would prevent a situation which we saw right here in this province where directors of a company—

Mr. Ben: How? They never made a statement. There has to be a statement made under certain circumstances.

Mr. Shulman: Any statement in any application or report or document. Now let me give you a specific example.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Shulman: Obviously we are talking about two different cases. I am talking about Clairtone, what is the member talking about?

Mr. Ben: E. P. Taylor.

Mr. Shulman: Well, you look after E. P. Taylor, let me look after Clairtone for the moment. Who mentioned E. P. Taylor today? The member for Humber is once again confused. Mr. E. P. Taylor has made a few lies in the brewery matter, but I am now talking about Clairtone.

Mr. Chairman, this statement means that if a person, an insider, makes a misleading statement—it does not have to be written—and as a result of that misleading statement any member of the public loses money as a result of making a stock trade, they can then sue that director and get their money back. We should have this.

This would prevent directors who know their company is on the way down from making statements like "Oh, everything is rosy" and meanwhile rushing out and selling their own stock. And we have had that right here in Ontario within this past year. Surely this should be against the law; surely we do not have to be more than 34 years behind the United States. It is common sense legislation. Why should these men be allowed to make millions of dollars while others in good faith, believing their statements, went out and bought stock or held onto their own stock, and saw it go down to a tiny fraction of what it had sold at? This is why our securities legislation is abominable in this province. And we find people holding Ontario up as an example of what is good in Canada in securities regulations. And it is frightening.

Sure, we are better than Vancouver; sure, we are better than British Columbia—most of the obviously blatant crooks have moved to Vancouver. You have forced away the really bad promoters, but you have not looked after the matters that the knowing investors are aware of. Any knowing American investor or foreign investor is still aware that in Ontario, which is the model for all that is good in Canada, we have securities legislation which is more than 34 years out of date. Does the Minister wish to make a comment?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I cannot agree with that statement at all. That is not what the chairman of the securities and exchange commission in the United States says about our current legislation. He says there is nothing more sophisticated and modern than we have. Let me make a reference to the question of the difference between the American law and the Canadian law with respect to the example that was cited a moment ago.

This matter was gone into in some detail by the Kimber committee and they rejected the American rule quite deliberately. It did not just happen; they did not ignore it, but they felt that it was an undue interference with the normal business operation.

I tell you quite frankly, because I looked into it this morning, this was the reasoning and the recommendation of the Kimber committee, as it is called. However, carry on.

Mr. Shulman: Well, there are two points the Minister has raised here, Mr. Chairman. First of all, his comments on the speech of the securities exchange chairman; I wish he would read that again because the gentleman, as I recall, was commenting on one tiny aspect of our law. But, in general, United States officials think they are abominable. May I suggest he reread the speech.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I have read it.

Mr. Shulman: To come to the matter of our securities laws as related to the United States, I can sum up everything that is wrong in our Securities Act in two words. I can sum up everything that has been ignored by the Lawrence committee in two words, and everything that was ignored by Kimber and every other group that has looked into securities regulations in this province. Just two little words sum up everything that is wrong with it, and as long as they ignore these two little words, the new Act—

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): Well, sum it up and shut up.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Shulman: I am delighted to see the hon. member for Renfrew South is back.

Mr. Stokes: From the back 40's.

Mr. MacDonald: From way, way back.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, the sum and substance of what is wrong with our securities legislation comes down to two words; we do not have "timely disclosure." The strange thing is in the great reports which they brought in last year and were so proud of, nowhere in that report do we see those two words mentioned, they are not discussed. Apparently nobody thought of them. And yet that is the basis of the United States security regulations; that is the basis of what is good in the United States securities, and why people do not want to invest in Ontario, in Canada.

I have here an address by Mr. Ralph Saul, president of the American stock exchange, which was given on June 13 of last year and it is called "Timely Disclosure—the American Stock Exchange Experience', and their experience, let me say, goes back to 1930 in this little matter.

We have not got around to even discussing it here in Ontario, but we might as well start today because until the Minister is prepared to bring in a law embodying timely disclosure, money is going to continue to flow out of this province and the United States and foreign investors are not going to be prepared to send their money up here.

What timely disclosure, in effect, means is that when a company has a change in its business, whether that change is a huge upturn in earnings; whether it is a new discovery; whether it is a take-over offer; whatever change it may be that will seriously affect the earnings or the future prospects of that company; that company must immediately notify the shareholders. That is not quite what happens here.

In the United States, it is quite fascinating to watch when announcements of this nature come out. Immediately there is a great move up in stocks or a move down as the case may be, if the news is good or bad. Suddenly, all the investors become aware of the fact and govern themselves accordingly.

We do not find huge moves in the stock beforehand because a few people cannot take advantage of the situation. But what do we have here in Canada? A very different situation.

For a few days or a few weeks before the announcement is made we have a steady move up, if it is good news of the stock, steady buying—Lowry is a good example. Stock moves up, moves up, moves up. Suddenly, after it has reached its top then the announcement comes of a take-over.

The same thing with Clairtone, we saw when there was bad news coming, it moves down, moves down, moves down, moves down. After it is down, then the shareholders are told what has happened. Canadian Breweries. What happened? Great buying beforehand, then the disclosure is made.

People who did the things that were done here, if they were in companies in the United States, would be in jail because they have a wonderful law down there and it is called timely disclosure. I would like to read this address, and I am sorry to take the time of the House, but this may perhaps be the most important thing I may say on the subject of securities legislation during the next four years.

Until we have timely disclosure we are going to have high interest rates, high mortgage rates, high costs for everything because nobody wants to leave their money in this province. We need timely disclosure. This address was given before the American society of corporate secretaries in Hot Springs, Virginia.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Do not read it all.

Mr. Shulman: Do not worry, Eddie.

Mr. MacDonald: You just got here now.

Mr. Sargent: I know, but it is pretty tough to take.

Mr. MacDonald: You get impatient very quickly. We have not seen you for a week.

Mr. Nixon: Try to extract the kernel and save time.

Mr. Shulman: I promise the leader of the Opposition I will not read it all. I am going to extract the kernel.

> In January of 1963, the American stock exchanges announced a strengthening in timely disclosure policy. About one year later, that policy was incorporated into the exchanges' listing agreement.
> It requires a list of companies to make prompt public disclosure of any material developments in its affairs or operations, whether favourable or unfavourable, which might significantly affect the market or its securities or influence investment decisions.

I would like to describe how the timely disclosure policy fits into the total framework of disclosure requirements, then to discuss the exchange and experience in administering that policy and finally, to suggest some possible directions for future development.

Let us first examine the question of how timely disclosure fits into the disclosure obligations of listed companies. Actually, we find that these obligations can be divided into two categories. The first category which I will not go into is the legal obligation to make disclosures and prospectus and so forth, which is not too relevant to the point.

> Disclosure obligations in the second category arise in connection with the material or significant corporate developments. The SEC requires, under the 1934 law, that listed companies report specified material of corporate developments within ten days after the close of the month during which the event occurs.

This was in 1934. This was their first step to demand disclosure within ten days of the end of the month. That is how they started.

> This requirement has been described as a continuous disclosure system. In addition, another SEC requirement directed to the disclosure of material information is based upon a fraud concept.

And it goes on into that matter which is not too important at the moment.

> The timely disclosure requirements of the American exchanges fall within this second category. That is, they are hinged to significant corporate developments like the continuous disclosure requirements of the 1934 Act. Timely disclosure seeks to replenish the fund of available information upon which the public may make investment decisions.

Now, we had the member for York Centre get up and make his comments which were quite correct, that the public should be given full information.

Well, what he was referring to was prospectuses and annual reports, and of course they should give full information in prospectus and annual reports. But sad to say, prospectuses may come out only once in 20 years, and annual reports come out once in a year and a lot of things can happen within that year, from one annual report to another, which make tremendous differences, and the only people who know what is going on are the directors.

The shareholders are sitting out in the cold, and by the time the next annual report comes up it is too late. That is why 30 years ago the Americans, in their wisdom and they were wise here, insisted on continuous timely disclosure.

And this is why I am asking the Minister to bring it here.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The Toronto stock exchange has the same rule and a similar policy with respect to timely disclosure. For instance, let us have a look at unusual variations in the market price of stock. The securities commission makes requests for disclosure and in the case of Pyrotex and other company situations, such as Great West Saddlery, these things are all being—

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Chairman to read the sections of The Toronto Stock Exchange Act that requires timely disclosure?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is in the bylaws of the stock exchange.

Mr. Shulman: I would like to have it read, if the Minister at his convenience, would get a copy of it. What the Minister is talking about, Mr. Chairman, is investigation of unusual stock activity, and this is not what I am talking about.

What in the world good does it do to start —well it does some good I suppose—after there has been a great move up and everybody has made their profit, then they look into it. What the United States rule does is prevent people from taking advantage.

Sure, I come in here and say, will you look into the Canadian Breweries stock and the Minister says, "Yes we will look into it," and he looks into it. I ask the Minister, will you look into the matter of the directors of Clairtone selling their stock before telling the shareholders of the company, that it was going bust and the Minister says, "Sure, we will look into it." I asked the Minister if he would look into the Lowry matter. Sure they look into it. So what? They look into it, so what? How does that protect the shareholder?

We need a timely disclosure law, a law like they have in the United States in their 1934 Act. You do not have such a law.

I ask you to show me that even in the bylaws of the exchange. If there was such a thing in the bylaws of the exchange, it would be a small step in the right direction. A small step, mind you, because most stocks are not listed on the Toronto stock exchange. You need a regulation in your securities rules that says, by law there must be timely disclosure, and until you have such a law, why in the world should the directors carry it out?

A couple of years ago I was a shareholder, in fact I am still a shareholder in a rather well run company let me say—a company called Newconex. They made good profits and I have no quarrel with the directors of that company because they are following the law.

I went to their annual meeting and I said: Would you mind telling me what volume of stocks you have bought?" He said, "No, we do not want to tell you." So I said, "Well, do you not think I have a right to know how many shares you own of what I am a shareholder, a fairly substantial shareholder?" They said, "Show us the law where it says we have to tell you."

There is no law that says they have to tell their shareholders what stocks they are buying and let me say again, I am not criticizing the directors of that company, they behaved perfectly properly under the law and actually they are good directors. They made a lot of money for their shareholders but this practice is so improper.

The law is improper, not their activity, because they behaved perfectly legally. We require a proper securities Act. Until you have a proper securities Act you are going to have honourable men getting the legal advice which shows how they can tell the shareholders the absolute minimum and that is what they do, the best of them and the worst of them. The worst of them take personal advantage, the best of them take corporate advantage and surely, that is wrong.

Anyway to continue with Mr. Saul's address:

> It is my thesis that, (1) the timely disclosure requirements of the exchanges has been filling gaps in the continuous disclosures system under the law.

Let me just stress that. What he is saying is that the exchanges are working together with the lawmakers of that country to make sure that the shareholders are given an honest chance and an honest investment.

Here we do not have either the laws or the exchanges carrying out their duty.

In the United States they see their responsibility and their duty and that is why money flows to New York for investment from all over the world. They know that when you invest in a company there you know that you will know what is going on and you will get a fair shake.

He goes on, point (2):

> It is my thesis, that, (2), these requirements are likely to be of increasing importance to investors in the future.

And he is right. It is of increasing importance, because as an international investment becomes more important, money is going to tend to flow to areas where there is disclosure, and flow away from areas where you are playing craps.

He goes on.

> Point (3), there are important areas where the exchange of timely disclosure requirements might be further co-ordinated with the disclosure system under the 1934 Act.

I would like to go on to this thesis in my remarks. He goes on from there, but I will not go into great detail—

Mr. Nixon: Are we still in the kernel?

Mr. Shulman: We are in the kernel, yes.

I will not go into great detail of what he said, but what he is saying here, and this is a responsible leader of the American stock exchange, is that it is not enough that in the coming years they should go further so that the shareholder should have every chance.

Well, there is no use in going into what he suggests we should go onto. We will try that next year.

But, if he is saying that what they already have is not enough, surely, it is time that we should bring in these minimal steps in Canada, particularly in Ontario? If British Columbia wants to have the old bone boiler shops, if they wish to have this type of hot money, let them have it. Surely we deserve better in Ontario because in the long run, you can stick investors only so many times. They learn, and when they learn, they are going to pull their money out of Canadian securities and start investing their money in American securities through American brokers.

In the long run we are cutting our own throats. So let us be a little bit sensible and let us start with at least "timely disclosure." It is not just in the United States that there is awareness of the bad situation here in Canada. I hold here the Toronto Telegram, for Saturday, May 18, 1968, and, in great big banner print across the top, we read: "New Company Rules Must Be Free of Loopholes."

Periodically we get a new company law here. There is one now that is being presented by the Premier to the House. It has not been brought in yet as he wants to give the companies and interested individuals lots of representation time and already we are hearing lots of representations, Mr. Chairman, that "this law is too strict." It is "going to interfere with private enterprise" and, it is "going to stop our great Canadian investors from investing here." But actually that law is so bad that there are probably better laws for governing securities in Afghanistan.

It is so full of loopholes, and it avoids all the basics, there is really nothing there to control insider trading. There is nothing there about continuous disclosure, and nothing about timely disclosure, and nothing to prevent directors taking advantage of their positions. It is common knowledge, not just in the United States, but here on Bay Street they already know that. Here is Steven Vitunski, the financial editor for the Telegram —and I do not think anyone would ever accuse him of socialist bias—and he writes as follows, and I quote:

> Although we would not go so far as Premier Robarts in hailing his new company laws, as: "The dawn of a new era in our business community," we nevertheless believe that they are a step in the right direction.

And let me interject that they are a step in the right direction—a little tiny baby step, mind you, but in the right direction:

> Our only hope is that the legislation, when enacted, will not be riddled with the same loopholes that persist in the provincial government's new securities Act.
> For instance, numerous companies, especially subsidiaries of United States companies, have already won exemptions from reporting sales, and other figures. Insider transaction reports—they are still pretty much a voluntary thing, with little evident pressure on companies and individuals to report fully, or on time. In fact, insider reports are not much of a deterrent against insider profits to those who have this in mind. What is to prevent an insider from doing his trading through a relative who lives in another residence, or a nominee? And the whole premise of securities regulations seems to be wrong. It is based on the fact that the public can have remedial action by simply going to court. Court action however, is a most involved, costly, complicated and distasteful procedure for most ordinary shareholders. This is a rather archaic principle, akin to the police expecting citizens to apprehend and charge all traffic offenders.

Why can we not have some central body staffed with keen, young, crusading, well-paid experts who would go out and shake a few trees? Yes, I know that we have the Ontario securities commission, but they are mostly bookkeepers, and you have to present a virtually iron-clad case to them on a platter before action will be taken. I guess that the attitude everywhere seems to be, "Let us not get involved, do not rock the boat."

Well now, he sums it up so well. When we bring these things up here in the Legislature, what does the Minister say? What does the Premier say? They should go to court, they should take remedial action, they should sue.

These people have already been stripped. They have lost their money and often their money is already down in the Bahamas, or other tax havens—in numbered accounts in Switzerland. What good is it to them to go to court? It is too late.

What we require is securities legislation which will make it unnecessary for them to go to court. What we require is proper securities legislation which would prevent this type of insider profit.

Here is another editorial on the same subject. This is from the Toronto Daily Star, a more progressive newspaper. The heading is: "Why Should Insiders Profit?" And I quote:

There is still a big gap in the Ontario government's new legislation to protect shareholders against unethical company directors. It will still be possible for insiders, persons who have access to confidential information about a company's future plans, to make large profits on the stock market without regard to the interest of the ordinary shareholder.

The Ontario Securities Act of 1966 attempted to correct the situation. It provided, among other things, that if a director or senior official of a company used, for his own profit, any confidential information he acquired, affecting the value of his shares, he was accountable to the company for any profit on the deal. This rule applied also to associates of the insider.

Unfortunately, "associate" was defined to include only relatives of the insider who lived in the same home with him. This means that relatives who are not living in the same home are exempt from the provisions of the Act. Suppose the director has a son who has a home of his own? There is nothing to prevent him from passing on advance information to his son about a coming merger, or reorganization, or merger which is sure to send the stock of the corporation soaring.

The son can then buy as many shares as possible, to ensure a quick profit. And he need not account to the company for this profit, because he is not an associate within the meaning of the Act. But the wide loophole still is left whereby unprincipled directors and officers and their families can use confidential information to their own advantage. The gap should be closed and the bill should be changed so that all persons who obtain inside information from company officers or directors are held accountable for profits made through use of such information.

Of course, that is common sense, and, of course, the Minister knows that we should have this rule, but we do not have it.

We have situations here in Ontario where insiders, or the president of a company, can make $5 million through his inside information and compound his little felony by doing a little forgery to confuse the stock exchange about what he is doing. What does the Minister do? He gets up in the House and says, "There is nothing wrong in that, and we are not going to lay any charges."

Let me show you what is happening in Ontario this week. I have a paper dated July 4, 1968, and I want to read to you the sort of thing that can happen to you with our present securities legislation in Toronto, in this great province of Ontario now!

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): This past week.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, this past week. The Minister of Mines is always accurate on very important matters like this.

I quote:

Three directors of National Containers Limited have resigned as a result of a disagreement with president Hyman Katz concerning the method of proposed take-over of the company by Plant Industries Limited. The three are Eric Scott, Murray Howe, and William Zimmerman.

Mr. Katz was recently elected a director and president of Plant Industries. Plant Industries has agreed, subject to shareholder approval, to acquire from Mr. Katz, between 380,000 and 430,000 National common shares, representing between 54 per cent and 61 per cent of the shares outstanding. Warrants to purchase 50,000 additional shares are also involved.

The dissidents in a signed statement, said, "We strongly urge that all shareholders be given the opportunity of participating in this exchange at the same time, and on the same basis, as Mr. Katz. However, this he declined to do."

A later statement from Plant Industries said it may make an offer for the balance of the outstanding common shares of National Containers within a period of ten months from the date of acquisition of control from National's president, Mr. Katz. The statement added the offering price would be determined in the future.

Several years ago, all major Canadian stock exchanges, the investment dealers' association of Canada, and the trust companies association of Canada, adopted a code of procedure for take-over bids. It stipulated that any offer should be made to all shareholders, and, if more shares are tendered than approved, than covered by the offer, the shares should be taken up on a pro rata basis.

These arguments were recently aired in the case of Rothman's of Pall Mall Canada Limited purchasing 11 per cent of the outstanding shares of Canadian Breweries from Argus Corporation at $12 a share. The going market price for CB shares is currently around nine and a quarter.

So what do we have here? We have a great big man in this country, Mr. Taylor. We have not such a big man in Mr. Katz, and they are both doing the same—well, Katz, of course, is doing something much worse.

Katz is the president of the company, a public company, which is making an offer to another company of which he is a president—another public company of which he is a president—to buy a certain amount of shares at a rather good price. And who are they buying their shares from? Not from the shareholders. No, from Mr. Katz.

Mr. Katz has a strange sense of morality and this government has a strange lack of control of these matters.

This could not happen in the United States. It is illegal. It is improper. Up here it is just immoral, so what?

It is interesting to look and see who the directors are of this company. The directors of this company are leading members of the Toronto stock exchange. Now what can they do? They wail: "Sorry, we cannot do anything. We do not want to be tainted so we will step out of the company. We will sell our stock and step away from it, because it is obvious that this is immorally improper, but what does the Ontario government do? Nothing.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it is time that this government took action to bring in proper securities legislation so this type of thing cannot be done by the Hyman Katzes and the E. P. Taylors of this world. Because these men take advantage of the loopholes in our securities laws. They are interested primarily in their personal situation and not in the situation of the shareholders; and they step over the shareholders.

Here we have a glaring case that occurred five days ago in this city and nothing has been done about it for the simple reason that nothing can be done about it because there is no regulation to cover it. Is this new? No. Here we have had the Telegram, the Toronto Daily Star, The Financial Post again. Here is an article in The Financial Post of January 27, 1968—big heading across the front page—sorry, the 16th page—"Need Law Covering the Role of Directors/Trustees; Prudential collapse spurred governments, but still further tightening being urged", and it is a lengthy article. I do not wish to take the time in the House to read the whole article, but it sums the whole thing up again. We need proper securities laws in this province, and we do not have them.

So to sum up on this particular matter, I would like to say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the Minister, for goodness sakes, we are 34 years behind. I hope that next year I do not have to repeat by saying that we are 35 years behind. But if we do not have these regulations, these new Acts, I promise you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to the Minister, that I intend to repeat these comments ad infinitum, and every year until this government gets off its rear end and brings in some proper legislation.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested in some of the comments and comparisons and the reasons for our increasing investment in American securities, being the tremendous improvement of the SEC over our Canadian laws. I often wonder just what happens if the SEC is not able to stop a situation like Pentax, or the salad oil scandal, or Ico. It seems there are always situations developing that no laws can prevent. It is also very interesting for me to observe the comments on timely disclosure and the importance of that vis-à-vis the present situation that we have adopted here of when there is an unusual action in securities, they being subject to inquiries and the requirements of statements as to the reasons to what is behind them.

I know in my own experience there are many times when I have considered developments to be of importance, developments that I thought would affect the stock favourably or otherwise, that we have made statements and that nothing has happened or the reverse of what we expected has happened. I am still a director of two companies, one of which a week or two ago published a statement announcing a $1,400,000 loss, and the stock went up. There are many times that the results in the market place are difficult for those on the inside to understand. And it is also difficult to know how you can prevent direct or indirect gains being made by those determined to make those gains.

I do not say that we should stop being vigilant and endeavouring as the hon. member for High Park has stated to try to cover these items. But I do maintain that some of the solutions that they have been using in the United States for the past 34 years have done nothing but make it more difficult to do business there. They are not the basic reasons for our equity funds going down to the United States. We have improved our reporting requirements and I hope that we will do far more of it, but the main job is that we need in our country large, well-managed corporations with listed stocks that are marketable.

We want to have more of the industries such as electronics and others where there has been remarkable growth. We have seen in the last few weeks a remarkable increase in investment in Canadian stocks from abroad, including Germany, and it is because they have confidence that we are trying; maybe not in the very regulated way of the United States, but in the way that we are trying to, at the present—through I think common sense regulations—improve the atmosphere for investors in this country.

I would point out that I cannot understand, under liability insurance that security dealers carry, how the investors or those that were dealing with Meggeson Goss, for example, could lose money through stealing within the organization. They are covered by insurance, and many millions of dollars of liability is carried by the larger firms.

So, in summing up, I do not want to say that we have reached optimum; we are a long way from it. But I also say that we should use our heads and not bring in laws that will strangle the economy of individuals dealing under conditions where individuals can deal freely and knowledgeably in securities in this country. It is one thing to be looking at it from the outside; and I can assure the hon. member for High Park that I, as one who has been involved very much in the inside, am one who has been very much aware and hoping to see us overcome abuses in the past, I have found great difficulty in finding solutions that would cover all situations.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow this point up. The member for York Centre has pointed out the matter of liability insurance. Of course some of the brokers have liability insurance, but unfortunately they all do not have it, because there is no regulation saying they must, and they do not have enough.

I have letters here, some of which I will read later in this debate, which involve people who went to a broker, who paid outright for their stocks, who left the stocks there on deposit, and who now when the broker has gone bankrupt they have received letters from the trustee saying, "you are an unsecured creditor." As an unsecured creditor, you may expect to get back somewhere between 50 and 60 cents on the dollar. What protection have they had? So obviously liability insurance at the whim of the broker is not sufficient. Perhaps the member comes from a firm that carries enough liability insurance. These people made the mistake of choosing a firm that did not have enough liability insurance, and how many investors when they phone to buy a stock say, "by the way, how much liability insurance do you carry in case your bookkeeper runs off with the money?" Of course, you cannot make legislation that will cover every eventuality, but you can at least do the reasonable things. The things that were done in other countries three decades ago, and I sorry the member mentioned salad oil because, of course, salad oil has nothing to do with securities. The salad oil swindle did not come under The Securities Act because it involved the theft of some millions of gallons of salad oil and it came under an entirely different regulatory body. And may I say that he is perfectly right? You can never make laws that are going to prevent stealing, but you can make laws that will minimize stealing.

If someone is going to come into the treasury one day and open up the safe and take out all the money, or all the salad oil, and leave for Brazil, of course you cannot stop that. But you can make the regulations sufficiently tough, and the disclosures sufficiently open that planned thefts cannot go on over a period of time as occurred with Prudential, as occurred with so many others, and this is what timely disclosure does. It brings your stealing to a minimum. I remember he did make one very interesting point on which I would like to comment, just briefly. He mentioned that when the company announced that it had made a profit of $1 million—

An hon. member: A loss!

Mr. Shulman: Sorry, had taken a loss of $1.5 million, the stock went up.

And this is very interesting because this is the pattern in Canada. When a company announces a big loss—as happens time and time again—you will find the stock goes up; when a company announces a big profit, you will find the stock goes down. And the reason for that is very simple. The reason is that big loss, or that big profit, has been know for a fairly good length of time—perhaps a few days, perhaps a few weeks—to the insiders, and they have already taken the appropriate action. If there is going to be a loss, they have sold their stock; if there is going to be a profit, they have bought stock.

So then we have this strange thing that happens, the company announces a loss and the stock goes up, because what is happening is the stock has already gone down as a result of this selling and those people are replacing their positions and buying again.

I am not suggesting this occurred in this particular company. I have no idea what company is being referred to. But it is the pattern here in Canada, and this is why the pattern here is so different from the states.

In the states, when a company announces a profit the stock goes up, which appears reasonable; when it announces a loss, the stock goes down. We have exactly the opposite pattern here; it occurs time and time and time again. The explanation is very very simple. These matters are not kept secret and those who are aware of them ahead of time take advantage of it. I submit again, Mr. Chairman, it is time that we moved security-wise into the 1930s.

Mr. E. P. Morningstar (Welland): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. Is the hon. member talking from experience? Has he had this experience?

Mr. Shulman: I have had fairly considerable experience in the exchange. I have never owned any company that was listed on the exchange nor have I ever taken advantage of inside information because, unfortunately, I have never been an insider. I am not saying that I would not have, I might have succumbed to the same pitfall that other people have; there was no law being broken.

But unfortunately, or fortunately as the case may be, I have never been exposed to that particular temptation.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon, after all the heavy artillery has been fired here, and those of us who are still working on our first thousand, are listening in awe. But I presume that the Minister's report will come under this first vote, the printing of the report, and I just ask in lighter vein, a question of the Minister in charge.

I notice in this report we have a very fine picture of the Minister, in the early part of the report. It is a very good portrait, it captures his genial nature and the sharpness under that geniality; the whole thing is here. But there is something else appearing in that picture which rather interested me.

I understand from the rumours around the House and the province that the Minister has long-term ambitions when the present head of government sees fit to step down, although I understand that the other day the Provincial Secretary was announced in Hamilton as the next Prime Minister of Ontario. Now what that means I do not know.

I understand, too, the Provincial Treasurer has some ambitions here. But the thing that interested me about this picture is the emperor's hat which is resting securely upon the head of the Minister. I do not know whether this means that his staff is being kind to him or being prophetic for the future, or whether, on the other hand, the Minister himself is expressing his ambition by ordering that the emperor's hat be placed upon this very fine photograph at the beginning of this report this year.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Young: I do not know whether the Minister wants to comment on this or not, whether it is prophecy or whether it is ambition. This is something the House would like to know about.

Vote 701 agreed to.

On vote 702:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, I was talking to you, sir, in the previous vote about the possibility of the securities commission having some control over those people in the banking industry who advise on the purchase of securities and actually take orders. Perhaps the Minister now could make some comment on that.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I suppose that habitually and constitutionally this arrangement between the right of banks to act as investment counsellors, if I could use that phrase; it has been related to the banking function, and I suppose it has been regarded as a collateral aspect of banking. I had never given any thought to the point that the hon. leader of the Opposition raises. I would be glad to look at the matter. I must say it is a novel approach.

Mr. Nixon: I must say that I do not think there is any widespread difficulty, but these people are in the business that is ordinarily controlled by the securities commission or by the stock exchange regulations, but evidently they are free of all of this control. I think the Minister should concern himself with this in the next few months.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is our present Securities Act with its specific exemption not requiring banks to register as salesmen or brokers.

Mr. Nixon: Perhaps it would not necessarily have to be the banks, but the personnel, specifically, who have this responsibility should be registered.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would be glad to look into it.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on this particular point, may I suggest that it is going to be one heck of a massive job, because right down to bank managers we have advice being given. I should think that very often the elderly widow will have more confidence in her bank manager, at a local level, than in any central person. I think if you are going to start registering every bank manager, you are going to have a pretty difficult job. May I suggest on this point that—

Mr. Nixon: Well, it may very well be that not every bank manager should have the right to do this, if there are some indications that their advice is not in the best order, and perhaps that their business acumen is not equivalent to the confidence that is placed in them.

Mr. Shulman: May I suggest to the leader of the Opposition that from my knowledge of banking, and I have had some contact with bank managers, as the member from Grey South has referred to in the past—

Mr. Nixon: So have I, he phones me every weekend.

Mr. Shulman: Bank managers are under very strict regulations as to the investments they may make or advise, and they may not make the investment themselves. It has to be channelled through the investment department of the bank itself which is at the headquarters. The result is that I should think that bank managers are under closer supervision as to what they do with their clients' funds than are probably any other customers man or securities dealer. So, I think that this is probably an area in which there is not too much worry, and perhaps one in which we should not expend too much energy.

To my knowledge, I have never heard of scandal in this particular field. I have never heard a complaint from a client about being given bad advice by bank managers. They often give too conservative advice, but certainly I am sure that no bank manager gives bad advice.

Mr. Nixon: It is not a matter of advice.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think maybe it would be desirable if I were to just read this section so that we will have the whole clause before us. Section 18 says:

> Registration as an investment council or securities advisor is not required to be obtained by (a) a bank to which The Bank Act of Canada applies, or The Industrial Development Bank Act of Canada, or a loan corporation or trust company registered under The Loan and Trust Corporations Act, or an insurance company licensed under the Insurance Act.

And (b) a lawyer, accountant, engineer, or teacher, whose performance of such services is solely incidental to the practice of his profession.

You see, this is a general pattern of the exemptions which even goes on in section (d) to exempt a publisher of any bona fide newspaper, news magazine, or business or financial publication of general and regular paid circulation. So there is quite a background to this matter.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, under this particular vote, I would like to discuss with the Minister, through you, sir, the matter of the new increased schedule of fees that have been brought down under the Ontario securities commission through subsection 1 of section 3 of Ontario regulation 101-67. As the Minister is aware, and as we are all aware, there has been a substantial increase in those fees.

However, there is one comment here which I find rather intriguing. I would like to go on to the matter of fees. I think perhaps there is some error in the way they have been made up, but I am quoting the Globe and Mail of June 29, 1968. The heading is "OSC to Increase Fees July 1 for Registration and Filings" and it says here:

The Ontario securities commission will increase the fees it charges for registrations and filings effective July 1 to offset partly the cost of operations, according to H. E. Langford, OSC chairman.

Revenues are about $445,000, and the current budget requires $889,000. The increases will add an estimated $175,000 annually to the OSC's income.

Then the point, of course, I am coming to:

Mr. Langford said the commission does not expect to recover all of its costs because it operates as a public service.

I find this very interesting because I would like the government to be consistent in all the things they do. You may remember recently when we were discussing the increases for provincial parks and fishing and hunting licences, at that time the government expressed the principle, sir, that the fees must equal the cost of administration and servicing. I should like to think that the same principle would apply when we are dealing with the wealthy in this province—that is the security registrants, those making filings—as we do when we are dealing with those who wish to do a little fishing or hunting.

So, I would like the government to decide where they stand. Should things run as a public service be covered by the fees, or should they be covered out of public funds, you seem to be quite inconsistent.

The second matter on this item. I have the schedule of fees here in front of me and I would like to suggest that the preponderance of the raise in fees should go to those who are able to pay. That is, the brokers, investment dealers, or broker dealers, or the underwriters or the companies, because, to a company doing a registration, or doing an underwriting, $1,000 may be a very minor matter. To the large companies $10,000 may be a very minor matter. But, to the salesman who is earning a living and depending on his commissions to make his living, $75 can be a very important thing.

I would suggest to the Minister that this $75 fee for registrations, or renewal of registrations of salesmen is too high and will represent, in many cases, far more than a day's pay. I would like to suggest that this has been raised too high.

The added income necessary should be raised in the areas where it would not be felt so seriously, in the underwritings. Underwritings are very, very expensive matters. They often cost $100,000 and more. The brokers handling the underwriting will often charge far in excess of this, if it is a large underwriting and a $150 charge is really very tiny. I would like to suggest that as far as underwritings go, perhaps the charge should be in relation to the size of the underwriting, which would allow you to decrease the charge given to the salesman.

One other question I would like to ask under this matter. I am rather intrigued that the underwriter pays $250 in fees to Metropolitan Toronto, but $150 if he is outside Metropolitan Toronto. I want to ask, is that because the registrants in Metropolitan Toronto are more dishonest and require more supervision, or is there some other reason that the Minister could explain to me?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, it is related to the volume of business.

Mr. Shulman: Oh. Well, if it relates to the volume of business, why is it not charged according to the volume of business? Some of the very large underwriters are not in this city; they are in some of the other cities in the province. The way you have set it up, one is penalized if you underwrite in this city.

The whole set-up is, perhaps, not too well thought out. May I suggest to the Minister that he go back with his advisers and perhaps bring a better system of charges set up as he suggested just now—as I have suggested—according to the volume of business and to the size of the underwritings?

Mr. Chairman: Vote 702. The member for York Centre.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I want to go in some detail into the answers that were given today to my questions of last week about Prudential Finance Corporation and the problems that I see arising in this situation that I still do not feel have been adequately answered.

The first question that I asked was to do with verifying the accuracy and determining the adequacy of information provided by the officers and directors of Prudential in a prospectus dated June 14, 1963. I am asking this question primarily because of the practice that I feel should be followed by the securities commission in future to alleviate, and maybe prevent, the situation that has arisen here.

If you look at this prospectus, you will find that the company balance sheet is very thin indeed—the liabilities were almost the same as the assets. In a situation like that, where no underwriter was involved and trying to ascertain the merits of this issue as an offering to the public, they would have been very concerned about a situation where the equity, or the capital behind the company, was so thin.

I think the commission should undertake a different type of investigation, when no underwriter is involved on behalf of those that are going to be buying the securities. After all, an underwriter hopefully is looking to the future of his business and his relations with his client and therefore is going to endeavour to see that their interetss are looked after.

In the case of Prudential, or any other company that is proposing to offer securities directly to the investing public, I think special care and checking should be required and the fees of the commission should be charged accordingly. I agree with the previous speaker, the member for High Park, that the prospectus fees should cover the cost in full of the work done by the commission because, as he mentioned, large amounts of money are involved. The fees of the legal and auditing firms that are involved are very substantial and we know that if the commission is going to have good work done that they are going to have to have pay experts to look into these matters fully.

I suggest that, where no underwriter is involved, the fee should be larger, so that the commission is in a position to do an extra check and be sure the information is thoroughly investigated.

There are many sections in these assets statements that would raise questions on the part of an underwriter examing them, and I think that the commission should make it a practice—and I would hope I would receive assurance from the Minister that they will be making it a practice in future—to treat prospectuses in a far different manner, where no underwriter is involved, than where the company does have to satisfy such a third party as to the merits of its prospectus.

The second question dealt with an indication of sales debentures being made to other than existing holders of the debentures after June, 1964, when the prospectus went out of date. I notice in that case that there was an updated circular issued and approved on December 4, 1964, when the document was prepared and approved by them. But what is done by the commission to see that these documents are made available to the public at large?

How, when there is no responsible body, such as the investment dealer in the case of normal offerings, who is going to suffer as a result of having a complaint made against it—how are we going to ensure that the public is aware of the fact that they should be getting circulars, or have prospectuses, whenever offerings are made?

I now understand from the Minister's answer about these meetings, seminars, we have been having—that the department has been having, that the seminars have been on consumer protection, rather than securities protection. In that regard I think it is very important because of that, that the securities commission undertake a programme, if the department is not, of making the public aware of the precautions they should be taking.

The third question has to do with why the order was granted, or issued, to discontinue sales of debentures. I see there was another reason. I had thought there was really no indication, other than they are somewhat concerned about the financial position of the company—is that correct?

The strange thing is that there is no check made as to the practice of the company after an order has been issued. There should be some way that we can find out whether a company is adhering to the orders of the commission. It seems useless for us to have laws and orders unless we have a way of ensuring and having a check made as to whether these laws and orders are being complied with.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I am instructed on that point that the commission did interest itself in the company, but there was no further issue of securities.

Mr. Deacon: I was informed by some of these debenture holders that they, in fact, were offered securities all through this period.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Was that not trading among themselves?

Mr. Deacon: I beg your pardon?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It was trading among themselves, I understand.

Mr. Deacon: They were offered securities by the company officers during this period.

It has also been indicated what action the OSC took to enforce the Act, but what is rather pathetic are the sentences that have been meted out and the actual results of the steps taken by the securities commission. If the penalties are going to be so lenient for stealing such large amounts of money, it certainly should turn some of our less desirable portions of our society into this form of stealing because they know the penalties are rather small and infinitesimal compared to those if you go to a corner store and hold it up. They are doing far worse in the way they carried through their operation here and it seems to me that the penalties we are setting down in our regulations for breaches of the Act are far too light.

I would appreciate the Minister's comments on the results of the actions taken to date. They do seem very, very light in view of the seriousness of the whole affair.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Sentences and punishment is one type of deterrent for wrongdoers and would-be wrongdoers. If the sentences are not performing the function and acting as a deterrent, maybe they will have to be stiffened up. We were approaching a little earlier this afternoon this element of criminal intent and wrongdoing and, the fact is, I know of no law that will stop somebody from committing a criminal offence if he is determined to do it.

Whether it is theft or fraud, conversion, any of those matters, it is really an offence against society. But as the magistrates or the judges themselves, of course, we have no control over their judgment in that matter.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, could the Minister tell me if the sentences or penalties are not part of the regulations for breaches of the Act, are they not included in the regulations? Is it completely in the hands of the court?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In one instance they could have gone to jail for a year and the presiding judge imposed a fine, not a jail sentence. I would think that the option of a year in jail would be a pretty serious penalty to contemplate.

Mr. Deacon: Well, it certainly is sad that a person can steal millions of dollars and have a fine in this matter and yet if they hold up a bank they are apt to get many, many years.

Going on to the next question, that of the Metropolitan Trust Company, one of the matters that really bothered me in this study and listening to the people who were the victims of the whole affair, was their assumption that when the word "trustee" came into it, it actually had some meaning. I can see from the opinion of Osler, Hoskin and from reading the covenants and the prospectus that there was very little in that trusteeship at all. It was a very, very loose covenant. There was no one taking the position of the security holders, representing them, when that trusteeship was drawn up. I think this is something that should be recognized and should be put before the trust companies themselves as to a solution to the matter. I do not think—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just on that point. It has already been dealt with and, under the regulations, I think you will find in No. 55 in 1968, there are minimum standards for clauses to be contained in trust indentures with respect to finance companies.

Mr. Deacon: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I know there is with regard to finance companies but it may not be the Prudential Finance Company the next time, it might be the Zambeck Corporation or some other name of a company that is putting out securities and doing it on its own hook without an intermediary. I feel that regulations of this sort should not be just confined to finance companies; it is the matter that a trustee, when it is on a document, should have some responsibility in being sure that they are not misleading the public—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Bill 125, dealing with companies generally, has the same position as we have for finance companies having to do with corporations generally.

Mr. Deacon: I thank the Minister, Mr. Chairman, I have not studied that bill in depth yet and I appreciate the Minister bringing it to my attention.

One of the problems of the Metropolitan Trust action that did concern me was that they presumably were accepting, from what I could read, debentures that had matured and issuing debentures—accepting them from the company by means of a subsidiary which presumably had been the buyer, they were changing and re-issuing those securities, not the same term but of a new term. In other words, when a person wanted to have his security redeemed and the company did not want to have to comply with the regulations of the department regarding a new offering, it had a subsidiary buy the debenture that was about to mature and it then took that debenture to the trust company, had the trust company issue a new security for an extended term and that security was sold to another buyer. It was sold by the subsidiary company to circumvent the regulations.

How is it that Metropolitan Trust would have been issuing a new security of a different term and not just acting as a transfer agent in this case of the same security? The company with the collaboration of the trust company, as I can read it, was circumventing the regulations.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: If that situation were to exist today, we could lay a charge and would.

Mr. Deacon: Well, if it existed today you would lay a charge. Why could you not lay a charge for what occurred at that time? Why has the Metropolitan Trust not been charged for the situation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It just was not done.

Mr. Deacon: In that case, would the Minister then suggest to the legal counsel for the securities commission that they do lay charges, because I feel that this responsibility of trust companies should not be allowed to go by lightly; especially in this case because the trust company in itself knew the precarious condition of the company. It, out of its own funds, advanced the moneys for an interest payment prior to the time the company went into default; it had seen the trouble flag and surely its responsibility was not to the company but to the people who recognized the name trustee as being their trustee, the trustee for the debenture-holders.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, Mr. Chairman, the opinion of Messrs. Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt with respect to the possible liability of the trust company over the situation expressed some very serious doubts as to the chances of success in any action brought against them and, of course, that is one of the first considerations in the civil suit—to see if you can get your losses back and to restore the injured parties to their former position. The opinion of that law firm was that they did not recommend any action because they did not think it would succeed.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the opinion of Osler, Hoskin did not deal with this particular aspect of the matter and they did not question this situation as I read their opinion.

I would ask that the Minister perhaps obtain another opinion on this particular matter, and I would appreciate a report or a copy of that opinion when it is obtained. I think this is a very important contravention of normal trusteeship position. Would the Minister undertake to obtain another?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I see no objection to that at all.

Mr. Deacon: I believe that these matters are covered pretty well. The balance of the questions are answered and I appreciate the answers you gave me for the balance of the questions that I provided you with as far as Prudential is concerned. But as you can see there are many, many points in Prudential that can teach us a lesson so that we might be able to prevent a recurrence of this unfortunate debacle.

I would like to ask the Minister if there is is an improved study being given to streamlining the insider reports. We are now provided with very lengthy cumbersome forms as the member for High Park has mentioned. He mentioned that he doubted whether much enforcement of failure to report was being carried out. I do not care to find out myself what would happen if I did not report, but in any event, what is the follow-up on the insider report?

Is there a way of streamlining them so that we are immediately made aware of situations where people are not reporting properly, or where there are any breaches? Is there a way of following up and checking breaches of this regulation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes, there is. That follow-up is done.

Mr. Deacon: Is it on a computer system now, or going on a computer system as a result of the regulations you brought in this—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: We are not on a computer system, and the advice we get is that it is not sufficiently large to justify computer application.

Mr. Deacon: Has there been much study given to combining the corporate reports under one department so that the company's branch comes over under your control rather than the control of the department of the Provincial Secretary?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That matter has been considered and I would think in the not-too-distant future the government would make its position known on that point.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, the Ontario securities commission publishes a monthly bulletin and occassionally in the bulletin is a statement which I had felt we could assume would express the policy of the commission. But during the Wee Gee hearings this winter, when a certain statement was referred to, I understood the chairman to state that the security commission publications are not to be always construed as the policy of the commission. Would the Minister clarify whether the bulletins can be relied on or not?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The weekly summary is published for information only. There is a different side to the matter. But the monthly bulletin would be policy—

Mr. Deacon: I am referring to the monthly bulletin, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: —but the weekly summary for information only.

Mr. Deacon: Was the matter referred to in the Wee Gee hearings that of a weekly bulletin only?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is my understanding that the Wee Gee matter was in the weekly bulletin.

Mr. Deacon: I mentioned earlier the matter of the prospectuses and the new schedule of fees, and my concurrence with the schedule reflecting and certainly compensating the commission fully for the cost involved in a study of prospectuses, because if the commission thereby has the funds to employ expert staff and teams to deal with prospectuses, perhaps the delays in prospectuses could be cut down considerably.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not want to be picayune about the matter, but the revenue, of course, ends up in the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Deacon: Would not the matter of fees come under this heading?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Yes.

Mr. Deacon: Well, the reason I am bringing it up is because I believe that fees should be such that we can have a very strong staff, one capable of dealing promptly and expertly with prospectuses and so that the minimum delay occurs between the time the prospectus is submitted and the time a letter of deficiency is provided.

There is no need for this commission to be subsidized by the taxpayers. I am sure it can stand on its own feet, or the investing community can certainly support it fully.

I mentioned that experts in institutional investments can provide answers and very complete answers and their views of prospectuses in the matter of a day or two. It would be certainly a step in the right direction to have the commission speed up and strengthen their filing on the prospectus side of its operation.

I would appreciate hearing from the Minister if steps are being taken to strengthen further the staff to minimize delay in receiving deficiency letters.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think that we will alwas be directing our energies in that direction, to see that the backlog, or the time-lag factors, are kept to a minimum. Of course, there is the question of training of staff. My own view about staff at the commission is that we will always be a training ground in this field.

I think the instruction, the education that chartered accountants and lawyers receive in the course of their association with the commission gives them a valuable asset which is, frankly, pretty readily marketable.

This has been the experience in the United States and I think it is something we will just have to live with. But, actually, it is a good thing to have, people exposed to training and experience in the commission and then go back into, shall we say, the street taking with them that knowledge and experience.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I would concur with the Minister in saying that it is an advantage to have some rotation. I do not think the securities commission should be a training ground for people to understand the basics of a prospectus. Perhaps we can get people experienced already in the industry into the securities commission for a period of time and then they can go back out into it.

But the staff conditions, the atmosphere, pay conditions are only part of it. These can certainly make people feel quite happy and satisfied, providing a contribution to the economy of the country by their work in the securities commission. The staff turnover that I noted in the first six months of this year was particularly heavy and I was wondering if things have settled down, that this turnover was due to the fact that a lot of new staff had been brought on last year with the expansion of the department and it was a matter of sorting and sifting. Is there evidence of the situation settling down a bit now, or is it still a difficult matter?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not regard it as a continuing difficult matter. On the occasion of an earlier question to which the hon. member makes reference, I looked at and sampled the turnover problems, particularly with respect to professional people. While it seemed maybe slightly large on the face of it, on analysis it turned out to be quite reasonable with the high degree of opportunity for placement elsewhere and that sort of thing.

This question leading ultimately to the morale would be something that would be uppermost in our minds, on a continuing basis.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I raised the matter because I did have a list of several professional lawyers, statisticians and investigators who had left since the beginning of the year and it made me wonder whether there was some special reason for this that we should be looking into.

Now in the investigation situation I was appalled by the fact that it took seven weeks for the commission to decide to hold a hearing on Wee Gee—seven weeks after they received the information from the brokers concerning the activities of these brokers in that stock. It was during that period that the stock rose very sharply and many people would have been buying it on the rising market. I would appreciate getting some explanation and knowing what steps the commission is doing to speed up their analysis of situations of this sort.

Mr. Sargent: Does the Minister not know the answer?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The problem of the Wee Gee situation was that it was an unlisted stock and so the powers of the commission did not apply in those circumstances.

The current legislation was effective on June 13 of this year and now covers that situation. I do not think the example that the hon. member cited would as easily recur again.

Mr. Deacon: Thank you, Mr. Chairman: The matter of mutual funds has been brought to my attention and I brought it to the Minister's attention on more than one occasion because the study is currently going on and I understand it is going to continue for perhaps another year or so before there will be a report. Yet, the commission decided arbitrarily to put limitations on the commissions that could be charged, management fees that could be charged in the operation of these mutual funds and it has caused a great deal of distress, which was very vocally presented to the commission I understand, by those who had been doing a particularly good job in managing their funds. They felt that they were being given incentives to continue to do an above average job. They were not being paid the same as an ordinary run-of-the-mill mutual fund and, in view of the fact that when the avowed principles behind the operation of this department is to not inhibit or unduly discourage good operation, I would appreciate having the Minister explain why this arbitrary action would have been taken in the case of the mutual fund management fees.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The question of fees and the management fees in the mutual funds has been a matter of considerable research and study, particularly in the United States, and it is currently being looked at here in Canada. It is one of the areas where, in the judgment of the commission, they came to the conclusion that the schedule of fees should be modified and so this was their recommendation.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, what would have brought about that sudden decision on the part of the commission? Were there a lot of complaints about the fees being charged? Were those people who were owners of the shares—the companies affected—complaining about their operation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, there were when some of the companies started to charge quite high fees and the commission felt that they should not wait until the committee report came down. They felt they had a duty to move when they did.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, when these companies were charging higher fees, was disclosure of this change in their management fee made to the shareholders or was it something they kept to themselves and did not reveal?

Is this what was upsetting the commission?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It would be, if that information would have been disclosed.

Mr. Deacon: Well if it was disclosed did it cause objections or bring about objections from the holders of these securities? These higher fees certainly would not have been tolerated. There would have been some objection, or the people would have disposed of their shares.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, the commission felt that it was approaching the unconscionable stage.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, I feel that as long as there is disclosure and these funds are competing with other funds in performance and in their whole operation, people are quite free to sell them, that the commission is acting in an arbitrary and improper manner in interfering unless and until there is result from the study of the Canadian mutual funds committee. I feel that we have already caused one of the funds to cease its operation as a mutual fund—and probably one of the most successful ones we have got in the country—and this is completely contrary to one of the basic principles the Minister stated about this department.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, this red confession of the department; each year they hand out. It has got a very heavenly red and is very fitting in this department; but this is where most people are, who had dealings with the stocks over the years such as Prodential, British Mortgage, and Atlantic Acceptance.

There is a very charming picture of the Minister on the fly leaf here. That was a retouched job if I ever saw one. That was by Egbert C. Reid, and it probably cost the province about $5,000 for the art job on it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That excellent portrait is my own personal property.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, the field of the Ontario securities commission is a very involved and intricate field and I suppose that I really should not question authorities like the Minister on certain things, but we have some things that I would like to know about insofar as the police state we are living in here in the city of Toronto, by the apparent lack of the interpretation of the laws as far as wire tapping and electronics are concerned. I see on page 45 in the opening paragraph of the Ontario securities commission that it says: "To the Ontario securities commission is entrusted the establishment and surveillance of the standards and procedures of transactions in securities in the province of Ontario." And then on the second page it goes on to say that major investigations are conducted by teams of lawyers, accountants, and investigators, and then it goes on to page 49, the investigating section, under the supervision of the chief legal investigation officers.

Now, this goes on page 50 to show the number of prosecutions in 1966-67, and we have 146 informal investigations still pending and 249 outstanding cases, and I would like to ask a few questions of the Minister. In this department, who is the trigger man, the chief investigation officer in the Ontario securities commission per se, here? Is it Mr. Bray?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, it is Mr. B. C. Howard.

Mr. Sargent: What is Mr. Bray's function in the department?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: He is the director.

Mr. Sargent: And you pay him $6,999 for this job?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Did you say $6,900?

Mr. Sargent: $5,999, it is under salaries for Mr. Bray.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, that is a portion of the—

Mr. Sargent: What do you pay him now?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: $22,500.

Mr. Sargent: He gets double a member of Parliament's money!

An hon. member: Yes, but he is worth it.

Mr. Sargent: He is worth it? Above average? Well, plus expenses is right! This is a great ball of wax for us to try and get into; to try to find the answers to some questions. The chief investigating officer you say is a Mr. Who?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Howard.

Mr. Sargent: Well, what are the tools that he uses in this investigation? Does he use any electronics, eavesdropping equipment? No wire tapping?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Absolutely not. He is not connected with wire tapping at all.

Mr. Sargent: How do you know that?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, I am so instructed, and if it were any other way, I would be into it myself and stop it.

Mr. Sargent: Well, it is just a matter of the Minister saying that there has been no wire tapping in these investigations—

Mr. Chairman: The subject of wire tapping is out of order.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I am talking about investigations under this Act, on page 45, it is right here.

Mr. Chairman: I say to the member that the matter of wire tapping has been completely and thoroughly discussed and debated in this House, and it does not come under this matter.

An hon. member: You missed it!

Mr. Sargent: I know that I was not here. Mr. Chairman, I asked 37 questions this year on wire tapping to get this thing going. I knew that it was going on. He says it has not been going on and I know it has been going on.

Mr. Chairman: Order! The member will refrain from debating wire tapping.

The Ontario securities commission, vote 702.

Mr. Sargent: The Minister says that it is not happening in his department at all, it never has happened.

Mr. Chairman: We will not discuss or debate wire tapping.

Mr. Sargent: How have you got the power to make that ruling sir? I do not know that.

Mr. Chairman: I happen to be chairman of the committee.

Mr. Sargent: That is a pretty good start!

Mr. Chairman: You voted for me.

Mr. Sargent: Would the Minister then advise on the Toronto stock exchange, what is the cost of a seat on it?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Current markets vary.

Mr. Sargent: $10 or $100,000?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: At the moment it is in the general area of $65,000 to $70,000.

Mr. Sargent: Are these seats limited to a certain number of men?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is a limited private operation.

Mr. Sargent: And they name how many people will be on that board? You have nothing to say about that?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: All the bylaws of the stock exchange require the approval of the securities commission.

Mr. Sargent: So the lives and fortunes of 7 million people, fluctuate with the goings-on on Bay Street. It is a private club that can limit the number of people who will sit on the board and who they shall be, and we have nothing to say about it?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I do not think that I would put it quite in that light. I think that you will find that this is a pretty responsible operation. The internal set-up of the stock exchange is that they separate the administration people from the policy side. They have taken Mr. J. R. Kimber, who was formerly the chairman of the securities commission, as president of the exchange and the chief administration officer, and his is an arm's-length relationship with the directors.

Mr. Sargent: The fact is then that we have this yardstick or criteria of $55,000 to be a member of this club? At this point the people of Ontario have nothing to say about the personnel of that board. I think that this is an area that needs great study. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Minister, who set the fee that the stock exchange charges for the operation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: In the final analysis, the securities commission.

Mr. Sargent: Will the Minister advise as far as the investigating commission is concerned here, what is the reason for the fact that 146 informal investigations were carried over from 1966? In 1967, 253 were commenced, making a total of 339 investigations. Now, these are informal investigations. What is the difference between an informal investigation and a formal investigation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Section 21 of The Securities Act bears on this matter and sets out the powers which we are talking about.

Mr. Sargent: I still do not know the answer.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Section 21 is the first section of part 3 under the general heading of investigation and action by the commission. It is quite a lengthy section, but once whereupon a statement made under oath it appears probable to the commission that any person or company has contravened the provisions of this Act or the regulations, or committed an offence under the criminal code in connection with the trading of securities, the commission may by order, appoint any person to make such investigation as is deemed expedient with a due administration of the Act, and shall in the order determine and describe the scope of the investigation.

Mr. Sargent: That is the formal investigation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is formal. Yes.

Mr. Sargent: Criminal involvement—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Or it could be a breach of the Act. Plus a criminal—

Mr. Sargent: We have 19 criminal investigations still not settled; that is, of 1966-1967? The investigation is not final.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It could be. Yes.

Mr. Sargent: Would you define it as informal investigation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: An informal investigation would be in the course of business—by sending out a letter or making a telephone call, and asking for information.

Mr. Sargent: With no charges laid?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There might, or might not be.

Mr. Sargent: We have the 19 criminal cases still pending, and 249 informal cases still pending? Would you tell me, what was Viola MacMillan, a formal or informal?

An hon. member: She was formal!

Mr. Sargent: Then you have have 19 cases of the same—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: As a matter of fact, slightly more formal than that, because that developed out of a Royal commission public enquiry.

Mr. Sargent: You have 19 cases of the same parallel—still pending, and 249 outstanding too.

Could the Minister advise me, could the Viola MacMillan case happen again?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is only one answer to that. As long as there is any criminal intent, of course it could happen again.

Mr. Sargent: You have no machinery to block this happening again then?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There is no absolute remedy that could stop that sort of thing, any more than you can stop people from speeding. But we hope that the deterrents in the law are sufficiently strong that it will not happen again.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 702. The member for Riverdale.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chairman: Will the member have many remarks?

Mr. J. Renwick: I have some remarks, but I have a question that I want to give the Minister the opportunity, during the dinner adjournment and otherwise, to recall, so that he can give me an accurate answer to the question.

The question which I wanted to ask him is, whether or not, during the period from February 13, 1968 to March 5, 1968 the Minister had any discussions with either any members of the Ontario securities commission, or any members of the staff of the securities commission, about Prudential Finance Corporation Limited, and specifically, about the submissions made by the Prudential Finance creditors association to the commission on February 13, 1968?

This is the question that I would like the Minister to consider during the adjournment and give me his answer. I have a number of comments I want to make, and it seems to me to highlight and to pinpoint the remarks that I want to make. It is crucial that I know whether or not discussions did take place between the commission and the Minister during that period of time.

It being 6:00 of the clock, p.m., the House took recess.

APPENDIX

(See page 5339)

2. Mr. MacDonald—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) in the current fiscal year, how many breeders received grants from the government's annual grant made to the Canadian thoroughbred horse society? (b) What was the total amount of the grants paid? (c) What breeders received in excess of $1,000 in individual grants, and how much did each of them receive?

Answer by the Provincial Treasurer:

(c) The Canadian thoroughbred horse society awarded to the following the amounts shown:

Jack Hood Farm	$ 2,104.00
D. G. McLelland	2,605.50
E. C. Pasquale	3,440.00
Armstrong Bros. Co. Ltd.	1,667.75
D. Banks	2,715.50
Bill Beasley	5,052.25
Mrs. M. J. Boylen	1,226.62
Conklin Farm Ltd.	1,160.25
Mrs. R. A. Dew	1,097.50
Gardiner Farms	2,683.75
Gardiner Farm and G. M. Bell	1,371.00
J. T. Sabiston	1,332.00
P. A. Sherwood	1,079.00
C. Smythe	3,350.50
Stafford Farm	2,261.00
E. P. Taylor	14,657.87

20. Mr. Ferrier—Enquiry of the Ministry—In view of the fact that the Provincial Treasurer announced that Ecstall Mining Company are paying taxes to the province, will he inform the House under what Act or set of regulations they are paying these taxes?

Answer by the Privincial Treasurer:

Ecstall Mining Limited pays provincial taxes but it is not possible, nor is it in the public interest, to inform the House of the statutes or regulations under which it or any taxpayer, corporate or individual, pays taxes to the Provincial Treasurer. In addition, most of the statutes contain provisions to ensure that the information on a taxpayer's financial affairs will be kept secret.

21. Mr. Ferrier—Enquiry of the Ministry—Will the Minister inform the House of the actual cost to the province of building the rail spur for Ecstall Mining Company?

Answer by the Minister of Energy and Resources Management:

Nil.

Arrangements were made whereby the Ontario northland transportation commission constructed the spur line on behalf of Texas Gulf Sulphur Company at a total cost estimated to be $4,198,699.87.

The agreement leasing the spur to Texas Gulf Sulphur Company provides for repayment of the commission's investment plus 6 per cent of the same in 20 equal annual payments commencing on the 4th November, 1967, together with interest at 6.5 per cent per annum on the declining balance.

40. Mr. Edighoffer—Enquiry of the Ministry—1. What is the current status of the plan to install combustion-turbine generators to meet peak power demands? 2. What is the relative cost of power produced by this means: (a) In relation to base load power produced by hydro generation? (b) In relation to such power produced from coal-fired plants? (c) In relation to best achieved figure for nuclear power at Rolphton or Douglas Point?

Answer by the Minister of Energy and Resources Management:

1. To supplement peaking capacity and to provide independent power service for start-up purposes at existing thermal stations, 27 combustion turbine units, having a total installed capacity of 319,000 kilowatts, were placed in service by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario during the period November 1965 to February 1968, inclusive. A further six units with a total installed capacity of 45,000 kilowatts will be placed in service during 1970 and 1971 as standby units at Pickering generating station.

No other commitment has been made to install additional units.

2. It depends on how these combustion turbine units are used. If in the unlikely case that these units were to be operated on a base load power basis the total cost of producing a unit of energy would be:

(a) Over three times that of existing base load hydro-electric generation, that is, Robert H. Saunders–St. Lawrence generating station;

(b) Over twice the cost of coal-fired plants;

(c) Over twice the estimated cost to the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario of power from Douglas Point nuclear power station when it will have been purchased under an agreement between Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. and the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

On the other hand such turbine units, which are being installed by many utilities, are not normally operated as base load units. They are used to help meet peak demands and therefore such cost comparisons are unrealistic.

47. Mr. MacDonald—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) How much insurance was bought for coverage of property owned by the provincial government, or agencies thereof, through the insurance committee under the direction of the Minister? (b) What were the total premiums paid? (c) Does the insurance committee handle all insurance for property of the provincial government or agencies thereof? (d) If not, what is the breakdown of coverage and premiums, by departments or agencies, of insurance bought directly?

Answer by the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs:

(c) No.

(d) Ontario water resources commission: Coverage $50,474,400; Premium $53,293 per annum. Ontario hospital services commission: Coverage $1,515,000; Premium $1,644 per annum. Liquor control board of Ontario: Coverage $17,300,000; Premium $9,600 per annum. Ontario Northland Railway commission: Coverage $2,200,000; Premium $48,570 per annum. Workmen's compensation board: Coverage $15,269,000; Premium $6,677 per annum. Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario: Coverage $25,000,000; Premium $74,580 per annum.

57. Mr. Paterson—Enquiry of the Ministry—(a) What is the current view of the Ontario municipal board in relation to financing of self-liquidating municipal debts such as water treatment plants, and the normal borrowing limits of a municipality? (b) Are discussions being held by the Minister's officials to re-evaluate this type of municipal financing to allow or encourage the development of this type of facility, through the municipalities' own financing rather than that of a public agency such as the OWRC?

Answer by the Minister of Municipal Affairs:

(a) The chairman of the Ontario municipal board advises that the board considers the approval of a certain amount of long-term liabilities that may be in excess of the normal borrowing limits of a municipality, if the amounts of the principal and interest payments to service the additional long-term liabilities are not to be provided from taxation, but are to be recovered from rates such as electricity rates, water rates or other special rates.

(b) Municipalities may finance the cost of water facilities by way of long-term liabilities issued to either the public or to OWRC. OWRC is authorized to borrow from the province and to use the funds borrowed to finance the cost of water facilities. The provincial funds are made available by OWRC to municipalities at rates of interest which are approximately 1 per cent lower than the rates of interest which the municipalities would secure were they to borrow such funds from the public. OWRC has been approached to finance the cost of a greatly increased number of local water facilities as the result of the availability of these provincial loans.

58. Mr. B. Newman—Enquiry of the Ministry—How much has it cost the province of Ontario in salaries, office rentals and all other administrative outlays to collect Ontario succession duties for the years 1964 to 1967, inclusive?

Answer by the Provincial Treasurer:

The direct costs incurred in operating the succession duty branch of The Treasury Department, plus payments made by The Department of Public Works for leased premises, are as follows:

	For Fiscal Year Ending
	March 31 1964	March 31 1965	March 31 1966	March 31 1967
Salaries	$616,552	$640,386	$685,097	$823,112
Leased premises	57,636	50,100	50,100	8,350
Other costs	72,471	76,100	106,382	114,888
	$746,659	$766,586	$841,579	$946,350

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS

On vote 702:

Mr. J. Renwick (Riverdale): Mr. Chairman, I asked the Minister a question just before the dinner adjournment. I do not really need the answer at the moment but sometime at an appropriate point during the course of the evening perhaps he would give me the answer.

Mr. V. M. Singer (Downsview): He spent the whole dinner hour looking up the answer.

Mr. J. Renwick: I know. My question was simply whether or not during the period from February 13, 1968 until March 5, he had had discussions with the Ontario securities commission about Prudential Finance Corporation, and specifically about the submission of the Prudential Finance creditors association of February 13. I hope the point of my question will come out later on this evening.

I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to review the tragic financial history of Prudential Finance Corporation. That was done brilliantly by the leader of this party on February 22 during the course of the Throne debate and anything which I or anyone else in the House could add, would be superfluous to the—

Mr. Singer: You are so modest.

Mr. J. Renwick: —would be superfluous to the drift of the argument that the leader of this party made at that time. I do, however, want to put on the record the opinion which the Ontario securities commission obtained from the law firm of Messrs. Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt of September 22, 1967, and this is the first of a series of matters that I want to deal with. I know the House will bear with me because of the importance of this legal opinion, even though it does run some 13 pages, because the opinion in substance is as only lawyers could say it.

An hon. member: Read it all.

Mr. J. Renwick: I intend to read it all. The conclusion is:

> Our examination of the circumstances relating to the above listed occurrences and such other occurrences involving Prudential Finance as have come to our attention, does not establish any breach of the provisions of the applicable trust indenture on the part of Metropolitan which would give the creditors a cause of action; nor do we consider that these occurrences evidenced any bad faith or other failure to comply with any standards imposed by law on a trustee under a trust instrument of this kind.

The whole of the opinion and I know that the House will bear with me is as follows:

Mr. Singer: Before the member reached the opinion, could he tell us whether it was an opinion sought by the NDP or was that the opinion given to the government or where did it come from because I have been interested in having a look at that document?

Mr. J. Renwick: Well, I would certainly be happy to furnish the member for Downsview with a copy of the opinion if he would like to have it. I assume that the Minister has a copy? If not, I can furnish one to him.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): No, I understand the subject—

Mr. J. Renwick: Perhaps it would be wise if you followed it.

It is an opinion dated September 22, 1967, from the law firm of Messrs. Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt, addressed to the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, Toronto Professional Building, 123 Edward Street, Seventh Floor, Toronto 2, Ontario:

> Dear Sirs,
> Prudential Finance Corporation Limited, our file 21,868.
> Sometime ago you requested that we provide you with an opinion on behalf of the note and debenture holders (creditors) of Prudential Finance Corporation Limited (Prudential Finance) relating to the rights of such creditors against the Metropolitan Trust Company (Metropolitan) the officers and directors of Prudential Finance, its auditor or any other persons or companies.

We have not obtained particulars of the respective amounts of debt represented by the secured and unsecured notes, the first and second series debentures or a breakdown of the specific period of time over which each such class of deposition. For present purposes, it is not necessary to have this information.

In giving this opinion we have not considered any action which Prudential Finance may have which would now be vested in the trustee in bankruptcy, the Clarkson Company Limited, whether derivative on behalf of the shareholders or otherwise against any person, including the directors or officers or the auditor of Prudential Finance, except to the extent that any such possible action may interrelate to a direct action by the creditors or any of them.

We point out, however, that any such action by the trustee in bankruptcy is relevant in that if successful, the assets of Prudential Finance and, therefore, the funds available to its creditors, would be increased. We know that the trustee in bankruptcy is investigating this matter and if any action is justified it will no doubt be taken.

Our opinion is limited to the direct action, if any, the creditors have against Metropolitan, the officers or directors or the auditor of Prudential Finance.

Our investigation has not revealed any other person who may be liable, except persons who may have been a party to individual sales of securities and who are referred to hereafter.

After making a preliminary examination of the records, materials and reports made available to us and considering the facts that can be deduced from these sources, it appears to us that possible liability is confined to five general areas as follows:

1. Liability in relation to trust indentures. The trust indenture to which Prudential Finance was a party, and in which Metropolitan was a trustee herein collectively called the trust indentures, are as follows:

(a) trust indenture dated February 1, 1963, relating to the issue of debentures of the first series as amended by supplemental indenture of the same date;

(b) supplemental trust indenture dated November 1, 1963, supplementing the February 1, 1963 trust indenture by providing for the issue of debentures of the second series;

(c) trust indenture dated July 5, 1963, relating to the issuance of secured promissory notes.

It is pointed out at page 26 and following in the report of Messrs. Clarkson, Gordon and Co. (Clarkson report) transmitted to you by letter dated March 8, 1967, the trust indentures are deficient in provisions to protect the creditors. In this connection, we understand that Metropolitan did not negotiate with respect to the provisions of the trust indenture but simply executed the trust idenure as submitted.

This is not an unusual practice for corporate trustees; however, this raises the obvious question as to whether the law imposes any duty upon a person about to undertake the position of a trustee, under an instrument of this type, to negotiate for or otherwise require the introduction of such protective provisions. We have not encountered any law that imposes any such duty.

It is perhaps worthwhile to point out that historically the use of a corporate trustee probably developed because of the necessity of finding a legal technique whereby property could be mortgaged to the benefit of several creditors. The creditors at that time, as sophisticated institutional purchasers purport to do today, (I wish the Attorney General were here, because that is one of his favourite terms) looked after their own interest and the use of a trustee was merely a method to obtain security for the debt.

As the role of the corporate trustee developed, he quite often became responsible for performing certain functions, all of which were specified in the instrument. The corporate trustee is a trustee of the instrument and his duties and obligations are fixed by that document. The corporate trustee is not a trustee of the funds invested by creditors except to the extent that the trust indenture specifically provides.

With respect to the actions of Metropolitan as trustee administering the trust indentures, reference is made in the Clarkson report to the following occurrences:

(a) a sinking fund deposit due from Prudential Finance on the first series of debentures was satisfied by means of a temporary loan from Metropolitan (page 26 and following, of Clarkson report)

(b) the notes of subsidiary companies of Prudential Finance were taken by Metropolitan as "acceptable collateral" for secured promissory notes only in substitution for other securities (page 28 and following, of Clarkson report)

(c) starting in February, 1965, a number of debentures were tendered to Prudential Finance for redemption. Prudential paid to the holders the purchase price of these debentures but rather than submitting them to Metropolitan for cancellation, the debentures were transferred to Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Limited, a subsidiary of Prudential Finance which, up to 1966, recorded the transactions as though it had purchased the debentures for its own account.

Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Limited did not pay for these purchases but merely recorded a liability to Prudential Finance.

New purchasers for the debentures were then located by Prudential Finance and the transaction was recorded as a sale of the outstanding debentures by Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Ltd. to the new purchasers, although the money was paid to Prudential Finance. Metropolitan was instructed to record the transaction as a transfer from Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Ltd. to the new holder and to issue a new debenture.

This circuitous practice of obtaining new debenture holders continued even after the restraining order of the Ontario securities commission on March 31, 1966 (page 12 and following, Clarkson's report). Our examination of the circumstances relating to the above-listed occurrences and such other occurrences involving Prudential Finance which have come to our attention, does not establish any breach of the provisions of the applicable trust indenture on the part of Metropolitan which would give the creditors a cause of action, nor do we consider that these occurrences evidenced any bad faith or other failure to comply with any standards imposed by law on a trustee under a trust instrument of this kind.

Under section 4.08 of the trust indenture dated February 1, 1963, insofar as relevant: all debentures purchased or redeemed by Prudential Finance are to be forthwith delivered to and cancelled by Metropolitan and no debentures could be issued in substitution therefore. If Prudential Finance had not involved its subsidiary, Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Ltd., in such transactions, then it would have been (or should have been) apparent to Metropolitan that the re-issue of a debenture to a new holder was in violation of this trust indenture. If the re-issued debenture was not a valid debenture, then the purchaser thereof might possibly have had a right of action against Metropolitan to cover the money he has lost. There is some evidence to indicate that Metropolitan knew that Ontario Metal Specialties Co. Ltd. was related to Prudential Finance, but this trust indenture does not by its terms provide for the cancellation of debentures acquired by subsidiaries. In short, it could have appeared to Metropolitan that this subsidiary was merely purchasing debentures and reselling, an action not prohibited by this trust indenture. Accordingly, although we have singled this matter out for special attention, we doubt if Metropolitan would be held to have any liability with respect to such transactions.

(2) Liability in respect of sales, after exemption withdrawn. When respecting our opinion, you especially asked us whether Metropolitan is liable in damages to the extent of subsequent losses to those holders of first and second series debentures which were issued to them by Metropolitan after March 31, 1966—the date of an order of the director denying Prudential Finance the benefit of the exemption contained under section 19(2)1(iii) of The Securities Act RSO 1960, Chapter 363. The role of Metropolitan under the applicable trust indenture, as is the role of a trustee under almost all trust instruments of the same kind, was to certify debentures that are delivered to it by Prudential Finance (and in this case where Prudential Finance sold its own securities, return such certified debentures to Prudential Finance), and thereby indicate that the debentures were issued under the applicable trust indenture so that any purchaser thereof would know he was entitled to the benefit of the trust indenture.

Metropolitan itself would not normally be involved in the sale of the debentures (and we understand was not so involved) and accordingly we do not think the act of Metropolitan in certifying the debenture was a trade in the securities. Assuming that Metropolitan did trade such debentures in violation of The Securities Act, it is far from clear, under existing law, whether such violation would give rise to a civil cause of action against Metropolitan for damages.

(3) Liability with respect to prospectus in offering circular. The Clarkson Report at page 13, and following, and again in appendix "h" refers to certain false and misleading matters in the June 14, 1963, prospectus, including transactions between Prudential Finance and Independent Businessmen's Credit Corporation Ltd. Assuming that it could be established as a matter of evidence that there were materially false statements contained in the prospectus, there is a possibility of liability under section 69 of The Securities Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, chapter 363 (as applicable at the time in question). Subject to the exceptions detailed therein, section 69 makes every director and every person who has authorized the issuance of the prospectus, liable to pay compensation to the purchasers of the securities for any loss or damage suffered by the purchaser, if any "materially false statement" is contained in the prospectus.

The exceptions to the liability imposed under section 69 apply when the facts detailed in the exceptions are proved. One of these exceptions excludes liability where the director proves "that he had reasonable grounds to believe, and did, up to the time of the sale of the securities, believe that the statement was true." We have not had an opportunity to carry out such a detailed investigation of the facts which would be necessary to give a specific opinion in connection with this matter. It would seem, however, that there is a good possibility that the so-called inside directors may be liable to the secured note owners, who purchased the notes offered by the prospectus, although there may be no assets against which to realize upon any judgment resulting from such liability.

On the other hand, the facts which have come to our attention indicate that the defence could be available to so-called outside directors. Section 5 of The Corporations Information Act, Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1960, chapter 72 (repealed in 1966 but applicable to the years in question) creates a cause of action almost identical to the cause of action created by the aforementioned section 69 of The Securities Act except that the action in addition to relating to an untrue statement in a prospectus, also applies to an untrue statement in "notes or other circular (which) invites subscription for the securities of a corporation".

This section would apply to any selling literature used by Prudential Finance which invites offers to purchase securities, including the circular of December 2, 1964, which offered the second series sinking fund debentures. We are not aware of any misrepresentations in such foregoing circular. We point out, however, for your information, that the same defence as discussed above with reference to section 69 of The Securities Act, is available to directors of Prudential Finance.

In an action under section 69 of The Securities Act, as applicable to the time in question, or section 5 of The Corporations Information Act, the persons who purchase the securities offered by the prospectus dated June 14, 1963, the offering circular dated September 2, 1964, or any other circular which invited offers to purchase securities of Prudential Finance as the case may be, would not have to prove that they relied on any materially false statement contained in such offer.

Accordingly, in an action under either of the aforesaid sections, the creditors entitled to such action could join together. On the other hand, an action along the lines discussed in the following part 4 of this letter would depend upon the facts relating to each particular purchase, and accordingly each action would have to be on an individual basis.

4. Liability for false representations made to security purchasers. There is a possibility that specific individual purchasers may have a cause of action based on false or fraudulent misrepresentation made to them—and on which they relied—to induce them to purchase securities. Such misrepresentation could be contained in the representation, oral or written, of a person selling the securities, or in any written circular or newspaper advertisement or related document.

In order to succeed in such action the individual purchaser would have to establish all the facts required to support the action. It is our understanding that Prudential Finance sold its own securities. Any action of this kind brought against Prudential would not result in a recovery because of the limited assets available. Depending upon the facts of each individual case it may be that a particular purchaser would have an action—

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): Wind her up, wind her up; Mr. Chairman, this is taking too long, make a summation.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please!

Mr. J. Renwick: If the member for Grey-Bruce, if I can recall his constituency, as he is so seldom here, does not wish to pay attention this evening he can leave the chamber.

Mr. Sargent: Oh, you lawyers that drag these things out.

Mr. J. Renwick: He is not here most of the time and when he does come in he monopolizes the House with irrelevancies and I would suggest that he either leaves the chamber or keeps quiet.

Mr. Sargent: Tell us one thing you have said tonight.

Mr. Chairman: Order. Order, please.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): He does not comprehend the problem.

Mr. J. Renwick: If I could repeat the part where I was interrupted, Mr. Chairman:

> Depending upon the facts of each individual case it may be that a particular purchaser would have an action against an individual salesman or any other person who made the misrepresentation, in which case the claimant might have access to assets which would satisfy his liability.
> 5. Liability of audit. We have not investigated the circumstances in order to ascertain whether the auditor of Prudential Finance may have been negligent in giving his opinion with respect to one or more of the relevant audited financial statements. We understand that there may be a possibility that the auditor was negligent. In case you wish this matter pursued further we will outline in a general way the consequences which might follow for the benefit of the creditors if the auditor was negligent.
> A. Prudential Finance itself may have an action in contract or for the tort of negligence and its election for breach of the auditor's duty to take care. Any such action would now be vested in the trustee in bankruptcy. It could be very difficult in any such action to prove substantial damages.
> One theory that might result in the recovery of substantial damages is in the possibility that had the auditor not been negligent in giving opinions on financial statements from time to time for Prudential Finance and its shareholders, the actions of certain of the officers and inside directors may have been ascertained at an earlier date, and thereby result in a diminution of the damages which have ultimately been suffered.
> We have discussed this matter with a representative of the trustee in bankruptcy and such trustee's solicitor, and we intend to make available to him in memorandum of law indicating the results of research in this area.
> B. The secured noteholders who purchased the notes offered by the prospectus dated June 14, 1963 may have a cause of action against the auditor based upon the tort of negligence.
>
> The theory of this action would be that it was foreseeable by the auditor, that his opinion in the prospectus would be relied upon by the purchasers, and therefore to the extent that the purchaser did so rely the auditor is responsible for the damage flowing from his negligent act.
> It is also possible on a broader basis—

Mr. Sargent: Why do you not table it?

Mr. J. Renwick: To continue:

> —that it was reasonably foreseeable by the auditor that if his work had uncovered the insolvency of Prudential Finance, the prospectus would not have been accepted by the commission and as a result the existing holders of secured notes offered by such prospectus would not have purchased the same.
> C. It is possible that if the auditor had not been negligent one or more of the financial statements delivered to Metropolitan pursuant to the trust indentures would have disclosed the insolvency at an earlier date with a possibility of a diminution in the loss of the creditors.
> This cause of action would be more difficult because it would probably have to be shown that the auditor knew that the audit was going to be used and relied upon by Metropolitan, and in this way adversely affect the holders of the debt issued the trust indentures. Attention should be drawn to the fact that limitation periods exist with respect to the bringing of actions in Ontario, and in The Limitations Act and other statutes, in order to determine the applicable limitation period, it is necessary to know the exact nature of the action.

It should be noted that the limitation that applies to actions brought under the aforesaid section 69 of The Securities Act, or section 5 of The Corporations Information Act is six years from the date of acquisition of the securities. The general limitation period for actions based on negligence is six years. There are special limitation provisions applicable to trustees, and to actions against deceased persons, and to actions involving persons who are incapacitated or absent from the province.

If we can be of any further assistance to you in connection with this matter, do not hesitate to let us know.

Yours very truly,
Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt.

Mr. Chairman, I put that on the record not for the purpose of going through it at any great length but to ask a series of questions. I would appreciate it if the Minister would tell me whether or not, as a result of the receipt of that opinion, the securities commission has followed up on any of the matters involved in the opinion?

I would also, Mr. Chairman, make this comment, that one need not be a lawyer to understand that for practical purposes what this opinion is saying is that the note holders of Prudential Finance have no recourse through the courts of any kind, in order to recover any of the losses which they have suffered. And to the extent that there is—as is carefully stated in the opinion—the possibility of such actions, in fact the persons against whom such actions could be brought are not persons from whom any substantial recovery could be made.

So I only have this specific question, as to what the securities commission has done following the receipt of that opinion to pursue any of the matters which are set out in it. I leave entirely aside the question of what the obligations are today of trustees under trust indentures. What does the law now provide? What does the securities commission, by regulation, now provide in order to protect other persons who buy securities under a trust indenture, and believe themselves to have the protection of the person who by tradition has been called a trustee for the debenture holders or trustee for the note holders?

Mr. Chairman, I want to bring the record up to date on Prudential Finance from the occasion on September 23, 1967, when a meeting of the creditors of the Prudential Finance creditors' association was held at the Prince George hotel. In attendance, at that meeting, as a result of telegrams received by our party, and I believe by the Liberal Party and by the Conservative Party, were the member for Parkdale (Mr. Trotter), the member for High Park (Mr. Shulman), and myself.

I attended for one purpose only and that was to complete an obligation which I had assumed to the creditors when I told them I would look into the question of whether or not they had any recourse against the Metropolitan Trust Company, and I reported to them that in my opinion they had no recourse against Metropolitan Trust Company.

At that meeting the following telegram, if my recollection is correct, was read to the meeting. It came to the Reverend Ferry, who was then president or chairman of the Prudential Finance creditors' association from the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. The telegram was as follows:

THE PRIME MINISTER REQUESTED THAT I ACKNOWLEDGE YOUR COMMUNICATION REGARDING THE MEETING OF CREDITORS OF PRUDENTIAL FINANCE CORPORATION. I HAVE INSTRUCTED MR. H. C. LANGFORD, Q.C., CHAIRMAN OF THE ONTARIO SECURITIES COMMISSION, TO MAKE HIMSELF AVAILABLE TO MEET WITH YOUR PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY AT A MUTUALLY CONVENIENT TIME TO RECEIVE YOUR VIEWS ON THIS MATTER. MR. LANGFORD MAY BE REACHED AT 123 EDWARD STREET, TORONTO 2, TELEPHONE 365-2861. ADVICE SOLICITED BY MY OFFICE REGARDING THE LEGAL POSITION OF CREDITORS WILL BE READY SHORTLY AND WILL BE MADE AVAILABLE TO YOUR OFFICIALS BY THE CHAIRMAN.

And the advice to which I have referred is the opinion which I read into the record of Messrs. Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt. At least, that is my understanding of the last part of that telegram.

The chairman of the commission then, on September 25, wrote to the new president of the Prudential creditors' association the following letter:

Mr. Harold Westlake, 23 Roseland Drive, Toronto, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Westlake:

Special delivery re Prudential Finance Corporation Limited and Prudential creditors' association. According to the account in this morning's Globe and Mail, I understand you have been elected as president of the Prudential creditors' asociation of Canada. As you know, the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs authorized me to meet with representatives of the creditors at a mutually convenient time. I would be glad to do so and would suggest you might get in touch with me in this connection. I will also have available for you at the meeting, for transmittal to the members of your association, an opinion regarding the legal position of the creditors.

This commission is presently preparing a report to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. Notwithstanding that many comments have been received from individual Prudential creditors, the commission has never heard officially from the creditors' association. If the association wishes the commission to consider representations or a brief, the commission will be glad to do so and to incorporate its recommendations thereon in the report, which it will be making as mentioned above.

What the commission had in mind, in asking for representations, was a statement of the creditors' position outlining the reasons why public funds should be used to reimburse creditors for their projected investment losses in Prudential.

In this connection it will be obvious that the unfortunate economic circumstances of some individual creditors are not relevant so far as the commission's report is concerned. Hardship cases might be a matter for the welfare agencies.

Also, since your association represents creditors across Canada, it might give its views as to responsibility, if any, of other securities commissions or provinces in whose jurisdictions securities were sold.

I hope to hear from you at your early convenience.

The newly elected executive of the creditors' association moved as quickly as it could. On October 2, the chairman of the commission wrote again to Mr. Westlake:

Dear Mr. Westlake:

I have not heard from you in reply to my letter of September 25. I assume that as president of the creditors' association you would like to see the opinion which the commission has received regarding the creditors' possible rights and I am enclosing a copy of the letter to the Ontario securities commission from Osler, Hoskin and Harcourt dated September 22.

As I indicated in my earliest letter, if the creditors' association has any representations which you would like to make to the commission, the commission would be glad to meet with representatives at a mutually convenient time.

Well, Mr. Chairman, in company with the president and other officers of the Prudential Finance creditors' association, I attended upon the chairman of the Ontario securities commission and we discussed at length the correspondence which had passed, the reply from the Minister and the chairman of the Ontario securities commission, and what possible representation or submission the creditors' association could make.

That submission, if my memory recalls correctly, was made on October 11, 1967. It was at that time that the creditors' association advanced the proposal to the securities commission that although it was the continuing securities commission, the personnel of the commission had changed completely and that the creditors were quite prepared to make a submission on the basis that the Ontario securities commission would itself consider the proposals of the creditors and decide whether or not they would recommend to the government that the government appoint a commission to investigate and report upon the role of the Ontario securities commission in the issue of securities of Prudential Finance Corporation.

This matter was discussed but there was no specific conclusion reached at the meeting. I think that it is proper to say that the chairman of the commission indicated that if such submission were made it would be considered by the commission and whatever appropriate comment the commission wished to make would be referred to the government for decision.

This appeared to the creditors' association to be a very reasonable position because they were asking the Ontario securities commission to consider its own role, despite the changes of personnel, in the issuance of the securities of Prudential Finance Corporation and to pass the request on to the government as to whether or not a commission should be appointed with whatever comment they felt appropriate. I believe that this indicates on the part of the Prudential creditors as much faith as one could possibly expect them to accord the securities commission, having regard to the losses which the creditors had suffered. Later on, and after some discussion with the creditors' association, I was asked if I would appear with them at the time that the submission was made, and I had the privilege of on three or four occasions meeting with the executives of the creditors' association at their request, in order to answer questions which they wished to direct to me.

As a result of that, the president of the association, one or two of the other officers of the association, and myself, met with the full commission on February 13, 1968. We made the following submissions to the Ontario securities commission. This is on the letterhead of the Prudential Finance creditors' association of Ontario, addressed to Henry Langford Esquire, QC, chairman, Ontario securities commission, 123 Edward Street, Toronto 2, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Langford:

I refer to your letter to our association of September 25, 1967, and the meeting which Messrs. Tier, Collins, and I, accompanied by Mr. James Renwick, QC, MPP, had with you on October 11, 1967. You will recall that at that meeting, the discussion turned upon whether there should be a commissioner appointed under The Public Enquiries Act of Ontario to ascertain and report upon the role of the Ontario securities commission in the financial collapse of Prudential Finance Corporation Limited. The conclusion was that after discussion with the executive of our association, and if the association were in agreement, a submission would be made to you in response to your letter of October 12, 1967, asking that a commissioner be appointed to make this investigation and report.

As the executive of our association has now resolved that such a submission be made, and as those excerpts of the final report of the investigating team of the Ontario securities commission which are to be made public have been released by the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs, it is appropriate that this submission be made now. Our submission is made on the basis of the interim report of the investigating team of the Ontario securities commission dated March 13, 1967, the report of Clarkson, Gordon and Howe dated March 8, 1967, and the excerpts from the final report of the securities commission investigating team, dated October 12, 1967.

That was the report, which, if my memory serves me correctly, Mr. Chairman, was released sometime in the latter part of January 1968, although it bears the date October 12, 1967.

In the opinion of the executive of this association, it is essential that such a commissioner be appointed and our understanding is that you will forward our submission to the hon. John P. Robarts, QC, the Prime Minister of Ontario, in order that the government can make its decision about such a commission. While there is supporting evidence for our submission prior to February 28, 1962, and subsequent to June 14, 1963, we confine our submission, in the interest of brevity, to the intervening period, namely, from February 28, 1962, to June 14, 1963.

The only reference to the role of the Ontario securities commission in the reports is in appendix B to the published excerpts of the final report, which refers to "the part played by the staff of the commission in the discussions preliminary to the filing of the prospectus of June 14, 1963". That brief appendix clearly establishes that the commission was fully aware that the proposal to issue long-term debentures to short-term note holders in exchange for their notes was Mr. Brien's solution to the pressing problems of borrowing on short term and lending on long term.

It also establishes that the commission knew that Prudential Finance had lent money which it raised by the sale of notes to its parent company, the Independent Business Men's Credit Corporation Limited, to invest in subsidiaries of that company. The appendix also establishes that the commission suggested to the auditor of Prudential Finance that Prudential Finance should take over control from the Independent Business Men's Credit Corporation Limited of the companies acquired with the funds provided by Prudential Finance. The reason given for the commission making this suggestion is that if Prudential Finance proposed to go to the public for funds, a great deal of information would be required in any prospectus as to the manner in which its resources had been used up to that time.

The appendix also establishes that the commission recognized that the company's financial position was such that it would have difficulty continuing in business successfully. In these circumstances, the commission staff were persuaded that the company, if properly managed, might be able to overcome its financial difficulties and thereby avoid severe loss to its existing note holders. Accordingly the prospectus was accepted for filing on June 20, 1963. The investigation established the fact that Prudential Finance was insolvent at that time.

The foregoing statements in the report indicate that the commission exercised its judgment prior to and at the time that Prudential Finance Corporation Limited prospectuses were accepted for filing on June 14, 1963. The substance of our submission that a commissioner be appointed to investigate and report on the role of the commission is that the commission was aware that the prospectuses of June 14, 1963—

Mr. Sargent: You have been going for 50 minutes now, and you have not yet made your point.

Mr. J. Renwick: Continuing:

—drafted, including the financial statements of February 28, 1963, were drafted to reflect the transactions which took place in February, 1963, between Independent Business Men's Credit Corporation Limited, Mr. J. B. Brien, and Prudential Finance Corporation Limited, and the commission failed to enquire adequately or failed to enquire about the nature and effect of these transactions as it ought to have done. Had the commission demanded and received full explanations from Prudential Finance Corporation Limited of the transactions which took place between Mr. Brien, the Independent Business Men's Credit Corporation Limited and Prudential Finance Corporation Limited in the month of February, 1963, it is obvious that the prospectuses of June 14, 1963, would not have been accepted for filing.

We, therefore, request that a commissioner be appointed to investigate and report on the role of the commission during the period from 1960 to the collapse of Prudential Finance in 1966. We were concerned about the trite statement of the Minister in his release of the excerpts from the final report about a guarantee. We fully appreciate that securities legislation is not a guarantee of an investor; we dispute, however, the question that one of the risks which the public must accept is fraud in the management of corporations in which they are asked to invest their funds. It is our view that the commission's function is to protect the public against such fraud and that it cannot simply say that it was deceived.

Its obligation to the public, in the light of its specialized knowledge and its familiarity with the operations of the business and financial community, requires that the degree of lack of care and judgment of the commission in relation to Prudential Finance and its prospectuses be determined independently. It is our opinion that Mr. J. L. Bidell of the Clarkson Company is eminently qualified to be the commissioner appointed for this purpose; he now has extensive knowledge of the affairs of Prudential Finance, and it would not only be a saving in expense but we have the utmost regard for his capacity and integrity to carry out this role. We would be prepared to rest our case for compensation upon the finding of this commissioner after he has completed his investigation.

Thanking you,

Yours sincerely,

Harry S. Wesley,
President.

Mr. Chairman, in the event, Mr. Bidell stated quite categorically a day or so later that as trustee for the creditors he would not be in a position to even contemplate any such role, were such a commission to be appointed. I simply say that of course there are other men in the business community in the province of Ontario who would be eminently acceptable to the creditors of the Prudential Finance creditors' association.

Mr. Chairman, what then happened has left me absolutely flabbergasted since the time I received a copy of the letter. And it was the reason why, prior to the dinner adjournment, I requested the information from the Minister as to what discussions took place between February 13 and March 5.

The Minister will recall that the leader of this party on February 22, in the Throne debate in this House, outlined in detail in a synoptic way the financial fiasco of the Prudential Finance Corporation. The role of the Ontario securities commission is divulged in the report dated October 12, excerpts of which were released some time in the latter part of January by the Minister, which was the first time that there could be any public comment on it in this assembly. That was on February 22.

On February 23, I sent a copy of the remarks of the leader of this party to the chairman of the securities commission; indeed, I sent a copy to each member of the commission. I should go back a moment to say that we made the submission in an atmosphere of extreme cordiality on February 13 to the full commission. I expressed the gratitude of myself and, I am sure, of the creditors' association, to the full and complete hearing which we had on February 13.

On February 22, the leader of this party made the address, or a portion of his remarks were addressed to this problem of Prudential Finance in this assembly; and on March 5, the president of the Prudential Finance creditors' association received this letter from the chairman of the commission. And I have been speechless in many ways, but one of the contributing factors to my speechlessness was this letter:

Dear Mr. Westlake:

At a meeting of the securities commission held last week, it was decided not to proceed with the request which you made on behalf of the creditors' association on February 13 last. You will recall that on that date you asked the commission to consider recommending to the government that a Royal commission be appointed or some further investigation be made into the activities of the securities commission from 1960 to 1966.

In view of the fact that this matter is now a subject of debate in the legislative assembly, the commission does not feel that it would be proper for it to express any opinion. Therefore the commission will not be answering the request which you and your associates made to it on February 13.

Yours very truly

I am saying, Mr. Chairman, to the Minister, and I am addressing my remarks solely to the Minister, either he intervened for the purpose of making certain that the reasonable request by the creditors' association would not proceed any further to the government, or he failed in his obligation to follow up the series of events which were initiated by the telegram which he sent to the Rev. Ferry in time to reach the Rev. Ferry for the meeting of creditors on September 23.

Mr. Sargent: What did you expect?

Mr. J. Renwick: Despite the election which took place, I say to the Minister, I say to the government, I say to the members of the backbenches of the Tory party, if the seeds of rot are eating away at the bastions of Tory power in the province of Ontario, that letter and what it represents is symbolic of the activities of this government in relation to the needs of many people.

There are 3,500 creditors in the province of Ontario, 8,500 across the country. The total unsecured debt—of which in four or five years somewhere between 10 to 11 per cent will be repaid—stands at the present time at some $24 million. I appeal to this House to say whether or not the actions taken by the creditors' association in this difficult situation were not reasonable, were not eminently fair, did not comply in every respect with what they believed to be bona-fide initiative of this government.

Then the Ontario securities commission take it upon themselves to legislate some new rule equivalent to the sub judice rule. I asked my colleague, the member for Lakeshore (Mr. Lawlor), if he could perhaps give me a Latin phrase which would be the equivalent, and he referred to sub rosa, and perhaps sub controversium and subprognoscotum which, I believe, means under their noses. But he was unable to come up with any equivalent rule that anyone knows about which would indicate that the Ontario securities commission is precluded from dealing with a reasonable request of the citizens of the province of Ontario because the matter is being debated in this Legislature.

Now, the Minister has got to satisfy me personally, and this party, of the bona fides of the government's position. It can be easily and readily done, and that is for him to instruct the Ontario securities commission that they are to take up again the submission which was made in good faith by the creditors' association, to review the role of the Ontario securities commission in the financial fiasco of Prudential; to decide whether on balance it would not be fair and proper for this government to appoint a commission to look into the question of the degree of lack of care, the degree of negligence, if any, of the Ontario securities commission; the role which the Ontario securities commission played in this whole financial collapse and to decide whether or not, and here the creditors are prepared to rely on the result of that commission, whether or not they should be entitled to some compensation.

The only other alternative is a legal action. And the cost, Mr. Chairman, which I have looked into in association with the creditors' executive, of commencing a legal action—if it is possible, and I do not know whether in law it is—against the Ontario securities commission, to retain counsel to do the legal work which is involved in the preparation of such case, to retain all the other advisers which it would be necessary to do, would amount to something in the neighbourhood of $30,000 to

It will cost the creditors' association somewhere between $5,000 and $10,000 just to find out whether or not there is an action in law which can be brought against the Ontario securities commission. This is the extremity to which the government is driving the creditors of the Prudential Finance Corporation.

In my view, you have been toying with them. I do not think you have any right to deal with citizens of this province in that way. They have been eminently reasonable in what they have wanted to achieve. They have placed themselves in your hands with a very proper proposal, to make the decision as to whether or not an investigation is warranted and if an investigation does take place, to abide by the result of that investigation.

And now they are placed in the position where a great number of people, if they can afford to do so, are going to have to band together to obtain a legal opinion to find out whether or not they can sue in the court. And beyond that, if they are advised to go ahead or advised that they have any reasonable possibility of success, to decide whether or not they can afford to pay the costs of that kind of an investigation.

In my judgment, and I think, in the judgment of any person who has listened over the months to the story of Prudential Finance, I would think that their request on February 13 was proper and to suggest that because a member of this assembly, any member, in this case the leader of the New Democratic Party, because he had included remarks about Prudential Finance in the Throne debate, would lead the Ontario securities commission under some misguided judgment of their position and role in the province of Ontario to state that in view of the fact that this matter is now a subject of debate in the legislative assembly, the commission does not feel that it would be proper for it to express any opinion.

The creditors' association did not ask for any opinion to be given to them. They asked the securities commission, after the discussions which had taken place in October, and as a result of the telegram from the Minister to the Rev. Ferry on September 22, they asked that the commission advise the Minister, and the Minister to the Prime Minister, for presumably the government of this province, to decide whether or not, in the light of the submission, the oral representation which we made to the commission, fully assembled on February 13, whether or not the government would appoint a commission and if the commission had been appointed, as I have said, the creditors were quite satisfied to accept that finding.

I want to place our position, entirely divorced from the position of the creditors' association. I happened, over a period of time, to assist them to the extent that I was able to do so. I have not assisted them, if the record needs to be this clear, in a professional capacity nor have I been retained by them. I could be only in the category of a person who was an advisor to them.

But our position, Mr. Chairman, the position of this party, and I would ask the Liberal Party to associate themselves with it, indeed I would ask any backbencher in this House to associate themselves with it, is the following: The case for compensation for the noteholders of Prudential Finance Corporation Limited on a just and equitable basis is unanswerable; the report to the government of the province of Ontario by Clarkson, Gordon and Company on March 8, 1967, establishes conclusively that in June of 1963, Prudential was bankrupt. On June 13, 1963, a meeting was held at the offices of the Ontario securities commission at which the following persons were present: Mr. J. R. Kimber, then chairman of the Ontario securities commission, and now president of the Toronto stock exchange; Mr. T. O. P. Brown, the chief auditor of the Ontario securities commission; Mr. R. W. Knox-Leet, the registrar of the Ontario securities commission; Mr. J. B. Brien, the president of Prudential Finance Corporation Limited; Mr. Morris Stein, the auditor of Prudential Corporation Limited; Mr. J. T. Eyton, of the Toronto law firm of Tory, Tory, DesLauriers and Binnington; Mr. Betts, of the law firm of Carruthers, Fox, Robarts and Betts of London, Ontario.

The matter discussed at that meeting was the prospectus of Prudential Finance for the issue of its notes. As a result of this high level meeting, this prospectus of Prudential Finance was accepted for filing on June 14, 1963 by the Ontario securities commission and because of this, the notes of Prudential were authorized for sale to the public in the province of Ontario. On that date, the company was bankrupt.

Whatever the reasons, regardless of whose fault it may have been, the fact is that the Ontario securities commission, by its action on June 14, 1963, authorized the sale in the province of Ontario of notes of Prudential

Finance when Prudential Finance was bankrupt.

There are many other factors about the collapse of Prudential Finance—prior to June 14, 1963 and after that date—that add to the justice of the claim for compensation by the noteholders but all of these other factors simply reinforce the basic fact that Prudential was bankrupt on June 14, 1963, when its notes were authorized for sale to the public in the province of Ontario by the Ontario securities commission.

The government of the province of Ontario must grant compensation on a just and equitable basis to these shareholders, most of whom are individual citizens of the province of Ontario.

That is the position of this party, that is the position which we took early in our consideration of the Prudential Finance case. It is the position which is now abundantly reinforced by the appendix to the excerpts from the final report of the investigating team of the Ontario securities commission.

My last question—and I have not asked many questions tonight—my last question to the Minister is, will he, at this point, instruct the Ontario securities commission to consider the memorandum of the submission made by the creditors' association on October 13, after their consideration and if necessary by rehearing representatives of the creditors' association, to produce for the Minister the submission and their comment upon it, so that he can bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister of the province and of the Cabinet to decide whether or not in all justice and in all fairness to these citizens of the province of Ontario, there should not be a commission appointed simply for that purpose?

In my view, the facts speak for themselves. I do not believe that in this situation I have any particular bias other than to think that what the creditors' association has done has been eminently fair, eminently reasonable and has been done after the greatest care, thought and attention to the problem, and was done in the utmost good faith. To say I was shocked to receive this letter is nothing compared to the feelings which were experienced by the executive of that creditors' association.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me to make some remarks before the Minister replies, I feel the case for compensation for the creditors of Prudential must rest solely on the findings of an impartial inquiry. This was our position—since party positions are being staked out again—when this matter was before the House in 1966. I was newly come to my present responsibility and I remember distinctly the worrisome situation that was put upon us in attempting to reply to those people who were so personally concerned with these serious losses, and yet to maintain a position which I judged to be responsible. That was that an impartial public inquiry was necessary and that it was not for us to call for compensation without having the results of such an inquiry. That is the first point.

The second is this, that I admire the hon. member for Riverdale in the work that he has been able to do for the creditors of the organization. He is certainly aware of the fact that many of these people have approached us as Liberals, the member for York Centre (Mr. Deacon) has been putting his talents to this matter and has already been discussing it in the House but this is not important under these circumstances. We are talking about a submission, and a very carefully prepared one, that the member has put before us tonight and there is one area of serious confusion that bothers me at this time. Why should he believe that the securities commission should recommend a Royal commission to look into their own part that was played—either correctly or incorrectly with good motives or bad—in this particular matter?

The appointment of a commission must surely be a political decision, a decision taken by the administration as a whole, on the advice of this Minister. We must divorce from the information that has been put before the House very carefully and in great detail tonight, the amazement that the hon. member for Riverdale has expressed in the answer from the securities commission which, in fact, disclaimed their responsibility to reply affirmatively to the request for an investigation under The Public Inquiries Act.

This must surely be a decision that would be taken by the government as a whole. Now we have called for this since 1966, when it was first discussed on the floor of this House, and the matter of compensation must rest upon it.

I must say that from the material that was put before us tonight, it does appear that the securities commission may not have been acting independently in its reply to the creditors, and I hope that the Minister will be able to reassure us to the contrary.

The chairman and other members of the commission are not in a position to speak for themselves, and what has been said amounts to a very serious charge indeed, in my view, since the whole matter of confidence depends upon the objectivity of this commission. So I would say very briefly that once again, compensation depends upon the findings of an impartial investigation which we would support and have called for since 1966, and this matter of the impartiality of the commission is of great importance and we will listen for the words of the Minister in this connection.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a comment before the Minister replies. I draw attention to the fact that the member who has been criticizing the government's action has also called upon the backbenchers to say something with regard to the problem.

I would first address a point to him as a lawyer and ask him a question, professionally as it were, whether or not he really believes that government commissions who are disciplining or asked to overlook and oversee activities in the public sphere, in the public commercial sphere, can really be made liable or can really be asked to make the government liable for their non feasance—as distinct from misfeasance.

In other words, to put it in layman's language, can we really ask that the public of the province—that the public themselves, that any individual member or citizen—be put in a position to sue, for instance, the police, for failure to protect his home; whether or not the police at a particular time had their patrol car on the wrong block or whether the police themselves may have been drinking or whether the police themselves may have done some other negligent act? Can we ask the public to compensate the person who has been robbed because the police happened to be absent from their chore? That is my simple question to the member who has spoken, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity of speaking to the matter and particularly to answer the question which was posed by the hon. member for Riverdale before we adjourned for the supper hour.

Following the suggestion to the chairman of the securities commission that they meet with the creditors' group, I was subsequently informed by the chairman of the securities commission that he had been in touch and in contact with the association of Prudential creditors. I was informed that a further meeting was to be held on February 13 with Messrs. Renwick, Teer, Collins and Westlake, and on February 13 the chairman advised me that the meeting had in fact been held. The committee had requested the commission to consider its submission and to make a recommendation to government. The commission was going to do this.

The next I heard of this matter was on March 7, when I received a copy of a letter dated March 5, which the chairman had written to Mr. H. Westlake, the president of the creditors' association, and the letter has been read into the record, bearing date of March 5.

At no time have I ever interfered with the decision-making aspect of the Ontario securities commission, nor, when I was the Minister of Labour, did I ever interfere with the decision-making aspect of the Ontario labour relations board. I do not think that is my function and I think it would be a dangerous precedent if that type of interference were permitted to exist. I have no reason to have my confidence in the Ontario securities commission shaken. I know the amount of work that the current members of that commission undertake and I am also aware of the dedication with which I believe they perform and approach their functions.

From the day of the confirmation that the commission had held the meeting on February 13, until March 7 I had no conversation or communication nor did I give any direction to the members of the commission, neither directly or indirectly nor in writing or orally. I hope this will clear up that sequence of events as I have endeavoured to answer the questions as the facts exist.

There is no doubt about the seriousness of the situation. We have been over all of this many times and there are some great matters of principle involved, not the least of which involves the high degree of sympathy and understanding for those who have lost their money—and that is the truth of the matter, that is what happened.

Mr. Sargent: It is like the British Mortgage, and Victoria and Grey Trust; $2 million worth of public funds.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There were no government funds in British Mortgage.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order!

Mr. Sargent: He is asking for it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: Order!

Mr. Sargent: Better tell the truth once in a while. How about your buddies and stockholders in Victoria and Grey?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I think that this matter requires review. I would like to have the opportunity of discussing it with the chairman of the securities commission and, as well, with my colleagues in the Cabinet and that I will undertake to do. Beyond that, I do not think that you would expect me to say more, but I shall take the matter up with the chairman of the securities commission, and I will ascertain the extent of the commission's considerations with respect to this—the meetings and discussions with the hon. member for Riverdale, and creditors' association—and I shall also consult my colleagues in the executive council.

Mr. MacDonald: If I might raise with the Minister a related matter, I am sure the House appreciates very much his indication that he is willing to review this situation with the Ontario securities commission and with his Cabinet colleagues. But on page 19 of the original statement that he made in introducing his estimates, there is a paragraph which reads as follows:

> We are, of course, satisfied with the insurance provisions of the federal Act, but we are maintaining the Ontario deposit insurance corporation at this time, because of the rehabilitation provisions in the Ontario Act which have not yet been incorporated into the federal Act. These provisions empower the ODIC, through right of entry, to cooperate with a firm in difficulty with a view to help it achieve managerial and fiscal stability in the public interest.

I am wondering whether the maintenance of the ODIC for purposes of—to use the term—"meeting in the public interest" would not give the Minister, within the framework of his own statute, an opportunity to move, and, in the public interest, consider those who have suffered as a result of the Prudential financial debacle. That is one point I want to draw to the Minister's attention as he reviews the whole situation.

I want to make a brief comment on the observations of the leader of the Opposition. What disturbs me about what has happened here, Mr. Chairman, is that the telegram to the meeting of the creditors on September 22 last fall took place in the midst of the election campaign, and the creditors had every reason to conclude from that that the government was interested and was going to review the situation with a view, presumably, to some action. Certainly they had the right to draw that conclusion. The election is over; they made entirely proper representations to the Ontario securities commission.

Now, my friend, the leader of the Opposition, says that this is a political decision, if there is to be an investigation, but the creditors' approach to the Ontario securities commission resulted in a reaction which lead them to believe, once again, that the securities commission was willing to review their role in part, because conceivably they recognized that at least it was a questionable role, and in part because there was a considerable change in the personnel of the securities commission.

When the reply came from the securities commission on March 5, the element of surprise, not only in the mind of my colleague, the hon. member for Riverdale, but in the mind of creditors, was not that the Ontario securities commission was unwilling to recommend an investigation of itself, but rather—and I choose my word as carefully and as kindly as possible—the "feeble" excuse and explanation that they were not going to consider the representations any further, because this was a matter under debate in the Legislature.

The fact that this was a matter under debate in the Legislature was wholly irrelevant to their coming to grips with the issue, which was initiated from the meeting of February 13, and, therefore, I think the surprise is very understandable. There is no sub judice rule in reverse so that they could not consider those representations, because the matter was being debated in the House. I would ask the Minister to consider these further views and points as he reviews the situation.

Mr. D. M. Deacon (York Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say something further in regard to this matter, after the remarks from the member for Riverdale about the inability or the inadvisability or the unlikelihood of successful action in the case in the situation of Metropolitan Trust and their responsibilities.

It seems to me as a layman, not as a lawyer, reading the circumstances that surrounded the redemption and re-issue of the notes starting in February 1965 by a circuitous route, that actually there is cause for action by the securities commission against Metropolitan Trust, perhaps not by the note holders themselves, but by the securities commission—because Metropolitan Trust was instructed to record transactions as a transfer—which surely were quite obviously, in effect, a redistribution.

I would ask that when the Minister re-considers this matter—and has it come before a Cabinet for discussion—that he do it in the light of action by the securities commission against the Metropolitan Trust for their knowingly and apparently enabling Prudential Finance to go around the provisions of the securities Act, and the specific instructions of the securities commission, prohibiting sale of the debentures.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Downsview.

Mr. Singer: Mr. Chairman, I am puzzled. I have listened very carefully to what was put forward by the member for Riverdale, and by my leader and the reply of the hon. Minister, and it seems most peculiar to me that the creditors were directed to the securities commission for further enquiry in September of 1967. Because the complaint was that the creditors were directed to consult with the securities commission in September of 1967, and that is the telegram of September 23, the Minister is familiar with that.

I think it is already on the record but I can put it on the record again if you want. The telegram says, and it is quite brief: THE PRIME MINISTER REQUESTED THAT I ACKNOWLEDGE YOUR COMMUNICATION REGARDING THE MEETING OF THE CREDITORS OF THE PRUDENTIAL FINANCE CORPORATION. I HAVE INSTRUCTED MR. H. C. LANGFORD, Q.C., CHAIRMAN, TO MAKE HIMSELF AVAILABLE TO MEET WITH YOUR PRESIDENT AND SECRETARY AT A MUTUALLY CONVENIENT TIME TO RECEIVE YOUR VIEWS ON THE MATTER.

Mr. Langford can be reached at such and such an address, and such and such a telephone number, and so on.

Now, I hesitate to say this, but I have sat with this Minister for a long time, and it just occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister could have thought of no better a ploy to get this situation into the position it now is.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: That is not the case.

Mr. Singer: Well. All right. The Minister says that is not the case, but look at the facts.

Here are the creditors, the members of the Opposition, the newspapers saying—I said it and many others said it—we are not satisfied with the actions of the Ontario securities commission. We want some further investigations to take place, and we said this at great length and in a variety of ways, and then this Minister says, "I have a solution. We will ask the securities commission to decide whether the securities commission should be investigated."

Now does that make any sense, Mr. Chairman? It does not to me, and it was bound to lead, I would think, to the letter of March 1968, that the member for Riverdale referred to. Mr. Langford is a polite gentleman, and I am sure he would do as his Minister suggested he do, and that would be to listen. But I would think he would be placed in a most invidious and almost impossible position if Mr. Langford and his colleagues recommended to government that the only thing to be done for the securities commission was that government investigate Mr. Langford and his colleagues. Now that is what you were expecting. It is impossible that that set of circumstances could come about.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: They were not on the commission at the time.

Mr. Singer: That does not matter, it is a continuing commission. You change the chairman of the commission. You change certain members of it. My memory does not quickly serve me as to whether or not there are continuing members or not. I think there was one continuing member, was there not? Or two? Were there not one or two continuing members?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Oh yes.

Mr. Singer: Certainly the civil service of the securities commission was continuing. Certainly the chief counsel for the securities commission, Mr. Howard, was still there. Mr. Howard played a big role in the investigation originally.

Now I do not know how many people overlapped, but what you are in fact saying, Mr. Chairman, and what in fact the Minister was saying was let us get the opinion of Mr. Langford and his colleagues as to whether there should be an investigation into our set up. It is almost impossible that you could get a meaningful answer to that kind of a question.

If there was reason to accept the validity of an argument for a further investigation, I suggest there was abundant good reason—and the facts for that conclusion were laid before this House and spoken about on the public platform on many occasions. Then I think the member for Riverdale was dead right; it has to be now a political decision and the Minister has arrived at the point where he is being challenged with this at the only appropriate time we have to challenge him with it—when he brings his estimates before the House—and he says, "Well, the case is a very interesting one. Believe me, I will further consider it, and I will further consult with Mr. Langford, and I will further consult with Mr. Langford's colleagues, and I will further consult with my colleagues, and in due course we will decide whether or not we should accept Mr. Langford's opinion, if he is going to have an opinion at that time, whether Mr. Langford wants Mr. Langford and his colleagues investigated, and in due course we will have an answer."

How long is long, and when do we really get an answer? As I say, Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation I suggest that we are being flim-flammed. We are being sent around on a big merry-go-round with the object of overcoming this time in the House when these estimates are before us, without getting a positive answer, and for that, I think, Mr. Chairman, the government deserves serious criticism. I think the Minister, who has had ample time to consider his position, should say whether or not he is prepared to accept this abundantly reasonable request that the securities commission's actions during the course of this sad history be investigated by an impartial judicial commission. That is the question that is before him, and his assurance tonight adds nothing except further delay and further steps in the revolving merry-go-round.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, I think we should make sure that the record is accurate. Mr. Howard was not there at the securities commission during the time the Prudential decisions were being made. The active people at that time were Messrs. Kimber and Knox-Leet, both of whom have retired. Mr. Brown had something to do with matters of the commission at that time and he is the single remaining person there now.

Mr. Singer: I have not got these figures exactly, I have not got the complete rota either of the members of the commission or of the staff, but are there not a number of overlapping people who were there before and are still there, both as civil servants of the commission and as members of the commission?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There are not any active members of the commission. The chairman was Mr. Gordon Grundy, latterly the vice-chairman, who has been transferred over as superintendent of insurance; Mr. Beatty is quite active, and Mr. McFarland provides a liaison with the mining industry. I think Mr. McFarland would be the only member; he is a part-time member; he is the only member of the commission who was there at that time. The active direction and management of the commission comes under the chairman, who is the chief executive officer. The director, Mr. Bray, is the chief administrative officer in the operation of the commission.

Mr. Singer: You only confirm my point. You are asking the present chairman to advise you on whether he should investigate at least one of his colleagues with whom he presently sits. The present chairman had nothing to do with it, but at least one of his colleagues might have. You are asking the present chairman to advise you as to whether or not the civil service that he deals with every day should be investigated, and I think you have placed an impossible burden upon him if you expect sensible advice from him; he just cannot give you that kind of an opinion.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Let us just get the record straight. I am sure the hon. member would want the record straight. The request for this consideration came from the creditors' committee.

Mr. Singer: The creditors' committee appealed to government. The telegram that I read you which emanated from you, and was sent in the Prime Minister's name, said that the Prime Minister had said the matter would be considered in due course by the Ontario securities commission.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I sent it over my own name.

Mr. Singer: All right, but you quoted the Prime Minister's authority in the first sentence of it.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I sent it to the creditors.

Mr. Singer: To the creditors? I am not suggesting you did it at his direction. I am suggesting that the telegram appeared to be —and you confirm it—sent with all the authority of government. And the creditors, who wanted somebody to talk to who might help them, accepted that as being their only out at that point. But what I am suggesting quite seriously is that by directing them back to the securities commission for this kind of an opinion, you placed them in a position where they could not possibly get a result other than the one that the member for Riverdale referred to in his letter of March, because I would be very surprised if Mr. Langford would be able to say anything more than, "You have put me in an impossible situation." He has not said it in so many words. He said it in an unusual way, that you had put him in an impossible position. You have asked him to advise you as to whether or not he thinks that you should investigate his colleagues and his civil servants, and I think that is just impossible.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I would hope that any consideration the Minister has undertaken that he will give to a review of the matter, with a view to the appointment of a commission to investigate the role of the Ontario securities commission in the fiasco of Prudential Finance, will be taken quickly, and that if possible the announcement which the government may be prepared to make will be made in this assembly while this House is in session, so that we who are interested, as we all are in this province, would have an opportunity to make whatever comment is appropriate at that time.

The session is obviously drawing to a close and it would be unfortunate, to say the least, if any decision of government on this matter, which has been before them so long, should be delayed to the point where the announcement would be made when this House was not in session. I would ask the Minister, in the light of his undertaking, to consider the timeliness of making the announcement in the assembly. I need not read into the record the letter that, in fact, the Prime Minister did initiate in September the telegram which the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs sent to the then chairman of the creditors' committee.

I make one last comment, Mr. Chairman. While the Minister says that he does not interfere, and I think he said it in something to do with the decision-making function of the Ontario securities commission, I would simply refer to the fact that in his telegram he gave the instructions, "I have instructed Mr. H. C. Langford, QC, chairman of the Ontario securities commission—" and I would have assumed that on that basis, since he had sent the telegram at the Prime Minister's request, and he had instructed the Ontario securities commission, that this would be all the more reason why he should personally interest himself in the problem, as he has now indicated finally that he will do. We here associate ourselves with the Liberal Party in requesting that the consideration which is given will lean very much in favour of the appointment of a commission for the purpose of investigating the role of the Ontario securities commission.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, regardless of the Minister's statement that he is going to investigate this and have possibly an inquiry, and the fact that we have here tonight the cheering section for the New Democratic Party on their submissions, I fully believe that if the Minister is going to go this far into the investigation of the incompetency of the OSC insofar as handling this field in Ontario, there were many more thousands of people hurt over the same period of time in the fiasco of Atlantic Acceptance, British Mortgage, and Victoria and Grey, and if you are going to go this far, in all fairness you cannot pick out Prudential and give these people special treatment. You must cover the whole ball of wax. You must have an inquiry to find out why you can take public funds and secure the shareholders of British Mortgage, or Victoria and Grey, to let them acquire this great empire, and last year it developed that they acquired another $1.7 million of assets unknown to them.

These things have never come to light—that when the people lost their shirts in British Mortgage and Atlantic Acceptance, those assets that were accrued and escrowed by Victoria and Grey, the friends of the government—through using public funds, those accruals of assets should have gone back to the people who lost their shirts in the companies. By no stretch of the imagination, Mr. Minister, have you the right to pick out one mistake or one particular financial fiasco like Prudential and say, "We will investigate that." We know that you will investigate, but nothing will happen. I will bet you a case of Carling beer, right tonight, that not a penny will be forthcoming to these people. One way of getting off the hook, and we know this, is to say you will investigate.

I know what will happen. This is a continuous thing that will die of old age. The people who are your retained legal help will make a fortune, and the shareholders will still get nothing of accrual of assets, we know that.

An hon. member: It is hypocrisy.

Mr. Sargent: Well, this is true. It is a matter of record, in the history of this government, that you will set up these commissions and they will disappear gradually.

The Minister frowns, Mr. Chairman, but how does he answer the fact that Victoria and Grey acquired this great British Mortgage empire using public funds?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: There were no government moneys used.

Mr. Sargent: The credit of the people of this province was used to acquire this empire and the report has come out that they acquired another $1.7 million of new assets that they did not realize was there. Now, that money should not have gone to the shareholders of Victoria and Grey.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It is not true, not one dollar was used.

Mr. L. M. Reilly (Eglinton): Not one dollar of public funds was used to acquire British Mortgage.

Mr. Sargent: I agree with you, not one dollar was used, but the money was pledged and there is no parallel in the history of the province where public funds were pledged for a private company. And the fact is that Mr. Leslie Frost, and Mr. McCutcheon negotiated this deal and put it through. Fortunes are to be made through stock splits because of friends in the government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I challenge every member of this Legislature to get up and prove one thing that I have said that is wrong. And you, Mr. Minister—I know this thing inside out—and you are up the creek without a paddle right now, and you try segregate—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: You are repeating yourself, we heard that last year.

Hon. S. J. Randall (Minister of Trade and Development): So are you repeating yourself.

Mr. Sargent: I know I am, and they are repeating themselves when they say, "We will pick out Prudential and give them a special inquiry." Who are they trying to kid?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education): Your leader suggested the commission.

Mr. Sargent: We have this "tour de farce" with the NDP—it is something that they are going to ride for a while, and it is going to take up the time of the House when we should be busy doing business and making some progress. We are flogging a dead horse. Let us get on with the business and get something done and get out of this House.

I think the Minister is kidding the House that we are going to have an inquiry; he wants to get off the hook. His estimates are here; and every one of these Ministers, including the Minister of Correctional Services (Mr. Grossman) and the Minister of Education, when their estimates are up they are all very mellow and sweet. They say: "We will look into this" and "We will give you an enquiry" and nothing ever happens.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: I am very proud of my leader, and anything that he brings out I will try to go along with, but I happen to know—

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, there are many, many thousands of people across this province who have lost fortunes because of the inadequacy of this government and because of the fact that the Ontario securities commission was not functioning properly. We have a responsibility to people who lost fortunes, while other fortunes have been made by people on the other end, because of their friends in government.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Sargent: I feel, Mr. Chairman, that any motion that comes before the House tonight on the particular deal for Prudential, should be retroactive and the same treatment should be given for Atlantic Acceptance and British Mortgage because there are thousands of people and millions of dollars involved.

Mr. Chairman: The member for Humber.

Mr. G. Ben (Humber): Mr. Chairman, first of all I regret, extremely, that neither the hon. member for Carleton East nor the hon. member for Riverdale are in their seats. I waited until this particular item had just about carried because I was very much surprised, first of all at the question that was posed by the member for Carleton, of the member for Riverdale, and I was surprised that the member for Riverdale did not get up and answer. I do not know whether he was expecting a legal aid certificate to come from the government side before he answered a quasi-legal question.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, I think that perhaps a principle has been overlooked in the whole discussion with reference to all the parties that have been discussing this matter of Prudential. Perhaps if the member, or somebody else, would get up and answer the member for Carleton East, we might have another look at this whole problem.

The member for Carleton East posed a question to the member for Riverdale, saying, "Would you advocate making the government liable because an arm of that government, perhaps through a malfeasance, had caused a citizen to take a loss.

Nobody answered that and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that the day is coming in this province, and in this country, when everybody, in answer to a question like that is going to answer yes. Government, not just this government but all governments, have been slowly but surely dulling the defence mechanism of the citizens of this country through the passage of all kinds of laws which ostensibly are geared to protect them.

In other words, the citizen feels that he does not have to practise caveat emptor or be careful, because the government has already passed a law which is going to protect him against scallywags taking advantage of him. And I say to you that the more laws of this nature that you pass, the closer comes the day when you will have to indemnify the citizen against any damages suffered by him through misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance, on the part of the government or one of its agencies. That day is coming.

Already we are discussing compensation without fault. We of the Liberal Party have been trying to persuade the government that there is commonsense in indemnifying citizens who have been victims of violence. They do it in New Zealand and it is coming here. This is the liberal thinking these days; not the way it was expressed by the member for Carleton East. He asked in amazement if we would subscribe to that.

Well, I do, I think that governments are simply eroding, or outbreeding, and defence mechanisms that the average man had and it is now incumbent upon the government to do all the protecting. And if it is incumbent upon the government to do all the protecting, and it is alleging that it is doing the protecting, then I suggest it is responsible for compensating the citizen for any loss the citizen sustains when the government fails to carry out its obligations to the citizen.

As I say, I regret extremely that the member for Carleton East is not here so I could answer the question which the member for Riverdale did not answer. Because as sure as God made little green apples the day is coming—either you have to stop passing so many laws and start beating back into the citizen a sense of responsibility for his own welfare, or the other extreme is going to be here. Make up your minds.

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): Will we stop passing laws?

Mr. Ben: I believe that a person's inborn ability to try to look after himself should not be destroyed. I believe in the initiative of the individual. But since you are certain that you are going to destroy that initiative, then I say you have to compensate him for his losses; because you are liable for them.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence (Minister of Mines): Whether or not it is high risk capital involved? Would the hon. member—

Mr. Ben: If you would elucidate the question, I would be very happy to answer it.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Where there is high risk capital involved, would the hon. member propose that government should expropriate the profit made at the same time, along this line? In other words, where investment is made and a profit is made, would the hon. member tell us that, in his view, the government should come along and expropriate that profit?

Mr. Ben: When you are talking about high risk, then you are talking about gambling. Now, you should have been in the House when I expressed my opinion on gambling, on Sunday sports and on Sunday racing. I was against gambling and I am certainly not going to compensate people who lose their money gambling on the stock market.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Just give us a simple yes or no.

Mr. Ben: I just said I will not subsidize gambling. That is what you are suggesting.

Mr. Chairman: We are straying somewhat from vote 702. The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): I would like to rise and give my opinion on this particular point. I thought the other day, when we discussed the matter of compensation to victims of crime, that it was felt on all sides of the House that it should be a proper law for victims of crime to be compensated, and I would like to suggest to the members of this House, through you, sir, that the Prudential victims are victims of crime just the same as someone who has a gun stuck in their belly, and they deserve compensation on this matter.

Mr. G. Bukator (Niagara Falls): Mr. Chairman, I could not sit idly by listening to this debate this evening without adding a few of my thoughts. A total of 8,500 noteholders in this province are not going to be too happy with this Minister's decision to discuss this problem with his Cabinet, or with the chairman of the securities commission. The opportunity was here many months ago, 19 months ago to be exact. Nothing has been done.

The whole responsibility, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, is on the shoulders of this Minister and the Cabinet, the government as a whole. They have neglected their duty to the people of this province. This has come to me very forcibly as I received letter after letter from constituents of mine who have been taken for every dollar they owned in the world. We may not have the right to compensate them for their poor investments, but on the other side of the ledger this government had no right to neglect these people when they knew things were not right with that company.

I say to this Minister, in this House, this night that he has come not only short of the mark but it should have been before Cabinet and an investigation should have been in hand long before this. This, people should have known; it would have been just a semblance of encouragement to these people if they believe something may happen. I hate to have to believe, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce has just indicated, that nothing is going to happen.

I think this hon. Minister owes these people to at least investigate and find where the fault was and then we will talk about compensation. But until we know some of the answers, nothing can be done but what my leader has said to you—we need the proper authority to look into the problem to find out when and how this happened. And if the government is wrong, these people ought to get their money. But I want an investigation and nothing short of that particular thought will make the people, 8,500 of the noteholders, happy; nothing in the province of Ontatrio will indicate to you or any of your colleagues that you are doing the right thing, if you do not bring this investigation about, and very soon.

Mr. Deacon: Mr. Chairman, one last point. I noted in a reply given this afternoon to the question concerning Clarkson, Gordon report:

> What were the principal causes of the loss of $20 million between June, 1963 and November, 1966 as shown by an examination of all records including those of third parties to ascertain whether the costs recorded in the company's records contained any amounts of assets delivered to insiders?

The Clarkson, Gordon report specifically stated that they did not have the opportunity to examine the records of third parties to ascertain whether the costs recorded in the company's records contained any amounts delivered to insiders. And in the last paragraph it stated, "Due to the limitation and scope of our examination". Now I would appreciate also, in due course, getting a complete reply to the insider situation, which I do not think has been pursued. It may be a form or source of recovery for these people in a legal way.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park has the floor.

Mr. Shulman: If the member for Grey-Bruce is going to speak on Prudential, I will yield, because I wish to go on to another matter.

Mr. Chairman: Is there anything further on Prudential before we get to another matter?

Mr. Sargent: Yes.

Mr. Chairman: Is the member speaking about Prudential?

Mr. Sargent: The fact is that the Minister has intimated that he will call an inquiry into Prudential. What is our position there, Mr. Chairman, before we go on?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Just as I stated to the House 20 minutes ago.

Mr. Sargent: Well, I am sorry, I did not hear the Minister. Mr. Chairman, I know the Minister is having a rough time; he is on the spot, but will he please tell us what he is going to do?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I said I will discuss it with the chairman of the securities commission and I will also discuss it with my colleagues in the Cabinet.

Mr. Sargent: The Minister is going to discuss it, and what is he going to do about it? I know this man is under the gun, and he is under pressure, and he does not know the answers to a lot of questions, but where are we going from here on this matter of Prudential?

Mr. Chairman: The Minister has indicated to the committee what he proposes to do and he has expressed his intention quite clearly.

Mr. Sargent: Do you know what he is going to do, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Chairman: The Minister has just indicated to the committee what he proposes to do.

Mr. Sargent: He is going to discuss it with the Cabinet. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Minister, if he is going to discuss this with the Cabinet, what about the thousands of other people who lost millions of dollars so far as the British Mortgage and Atlantic Acceptance are concerned? Would he tell me of the $1.7 million that were accrued in a 12-month period to Victoria and Grey from acquiring British Mortgage? Was there any thought in the Minister's mind of having that $1.7 million of unknown assets distributed back to the people who lost their fortunes in British Mortgage? That is the first question.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The loss in British Mortgage was in shareholders' equity, it was not in deposits or guaranteed certificates.

Mr. Sargent: Is the Minister trying to tell me no one lost money in British Mortgage?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I said the loss was in the equity, in the shareholders' equity.

Mr. Sargent: So the shareholders who bought their stock in British Mortgage in good faith—that stock increased, their assets increased $1.7 million within 12 months. Why should that not have been redistributed to the people who lost their money? Now, these were unknown assets acquired. Why was that never distributed?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I do not understand that question at all.

Mr. Sargent: Well, I am not very bright either, but from the time Victoria and Grey took over British Mortgage, they had a fixed value of what they acquired, of which we put up $3 million. We pledged the people's money for $3 million to acquire that. If the Minister denies that, I say this is an untrue statement—that the credit of the people of Ontario was pledged to $3 million to acquire those assets. That is correct, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: One company purchased the other company. We did not advance them any money.

Mr. Sargent: And $3 million worth of credit of the people of Ontario's money was guaranteed.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: It was never put up.

Mr. Sargent: It was pledged if it was needed, was it not?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I challenge him as misleading the House. This is a matter of record and I can produce all kinds of documents from the press gallery and clippings to show this is a fact.

An hon. member: Apparently, that is not too authentic for the Minister of Municipal Affairs (Mr. McKeough).

Mr. Sargent: All right. Now the Minister says this did not happen. It is a matter of record that it did happen. Portions of this have been made through stock split—using public money as credit.

Interjection by an hon. member.

Mr. Sargent: I do not know, but Mr. Frost and Mr. McCutcheon and your friends may have known about it.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey South): Mr. Gregory, do not leave him out.

Mr. Sargent: You should not talk too much about this, because the people of Grey South got hurt too.

Mr. Winkler: I would like to ask—

Mr. Sargent: Whose mortgages?

Mr. MacDonald: Yours.

Mr. Sargent: Well, do you want to know what mortgages I have? Is that your concern?

Mr. Winkler: I do not want to know what they are—but where are they?

Mr. Sargent: I think it would be a good point, because they are not very healthy right now.

Mr. MacDonald: No wonder you want to get back to business, and away from the House.

Mr. Sargent: You are right.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 702.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Minister why this $1.7 million was not returned to the shareholders of the British Mortgage.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: My understanding of this matter is that Victoria and Grey, through their shareholders' meetings, purchased the shares of British Mortgage, so the British Mortgage people made a deal with them, which was approved by the shareholders at their meeting and the British Mortgage people are now shareholders of the Victoria and Grey and benefiting from whatever assets are in the company.

Mr. Sargent: You do not know, but that is your understanding; that is what you are told. But you should know. This is your job and this is what we are paying you for.

But the fact of the matter is that when Victoria and Grey acquired assets of the British Mortgage, the assets were stated—a certain fixed sum. A year later, a five-column story comes out in the financial pages of the Toronto Star by Jack McCarthy, that unknown to Victoria and Grey they found another $1.7 million out of British Mortgage acquisitions. Now I think at this point the Victoria and Grey stockholders and the shareholders of Victoria and Grey should not receive this accrual of funds from British Mortgage assets.

The Minister does not know about it and he does not know how to answer it and I do not think that anyone at this point would know, because the deal is consummated and everything is final and so it is down the drain like everything else and a lot of people have got wealthy through having friends in the government front benches.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that any part of our economy, whether it be trucking, shipping or manufacturing, has any right to come to the government and say, "We want a line of credit of $3 million to acquire a property." This we would not do, but in the banking industry we are different. A bunch of stockholders of Victoria and Grey come to the government and say, "We can pick up this great asset of British Mortgage, we have $3 million," and so, Mr. Chairman, they went to the chartered banks for the $3 million. The chartered banks turned them down. They went to the trust company association to borrow $3 million and they turned them down, and so they came in the back door with Mr. Frost and Mr. McCutcheon and—

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Harris.

Mr. Sargent: —and Mr. Harris—right. You are sharp tonight.

Mr. Winkler: Oh no—

Mr. Sargent: Right on the ball.

Mr. Winkler: That is something more than you can say.

Mr. Sargent: Once in a while you know what is going on. And so they came in and they got the $3 million credit in public funds from the front benches over there, to acquire this property.

Mr. Winkler: What a prefabricator.

Mr. Sargent: Now will the Minister say that I am not telling the truth?

I can tell you this is a matter of record, it is a fact. No other area of our economy can walk in and get $3 million credit to acquire an industry or a business, but the banking people can, and this is the unfair part of the whole deal.

Mr. Winkler: You have got some powerful friends, Eddie, they can do anything.

Mr. Sargent: So I say, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister does not know whether or not these $1.7 million should be redistributed to the shareholders. It is now sitting in the hands of the stockholders of Victoria and Grey, who have had stock splits, and many fortunes have been made through using public funds to acquire this great fortune. Further, I charge that in the Prudential affair the name of an associate of the Prime Minister was used in the prospectuses of Prudential Finance to raise funds.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You know that is not true, he had no connection with that law firm.

Mr. Sargent: I know the Prime Minister had no connection but an associate of his did and this was used to enhance the possibility of having a great sound company, and this is one more area in which you have responsibility because you have led the people up the garden path through your friends in government.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I never led anybody.

Mr. Sargent: I did not suggest you have. I say the government per se has.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Absolutely not.

Mr. Sargent: Well I take it back that you have, but I say that the government has been guilty of a form of going along down the line that is helping our friends in the driver's seat, and I think this is one area in which you do have responsibility.

But I think somewhere along the line, Mr.

Chairman, in finalizing my discussion on this point, that the $1.7 million which has accrued from no performance of Victoria and Grey should be distributed to the people who lost fortunes in British Mortgage, and this is an inequity. It is wrong and it is downright irresponsible and approaching a position that any government would not have come up with in the election year.

Mr. Chairman: The Provincial Treasurer.

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say a word or two, if I may. I think it is appropriate that this matter be clarified ever so briefly and I hope the hon. member, if he gets a satisfactory explanation, may admit that he has been misinformed.

If the Victoria and Grey Trust Company had not moved in to acquire the shares of British Mortgage and Trust Company and take steps to protect the liquidity over a short period of time, I say that catastrophe might well have taken place. In the first instance the depositors and the certificate holders could well have lost their investments. This did not take place. No depositor, no certificate holder lost one penny.

Second, I would point out to the hon. member that the acquisition of British Mortgage and Trust shares by Victoria and Grey Company resulted in the improvement referred to by the hon. member—that is, $1.7 million, and I do not know whether that is an accurate figure or not, has accrued to the benefit of the shareholders now in Victoria and Grey Trust Company.

Mr. Sargent: You are so right.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: So there is really no need for any distribution. Those shares are worth more—

Mr. Sargent: British Mortgage shares.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Oh no, no, no. British Mortgage—

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, can I ask the Minister a question?

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: This is vested in the shareholders of Victoria and Grey and the British Mortgage shareholders received Victoria and Grey shares.

An hon. member: Yes, two for 20.

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Yes, but nevertheless this accrues to the advantage of the shareholders. There is no question about that. It is quite simple.

Mr. Sargent: I appreciate the Minister trying to smooth this over—

Hon. Mr. MacNaughton: Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to misinform the House. I am trying to provide some accurate information to the hon. member. I am doing my best to do that.

Mr. Sargent: Well, we know your accuracy all right. You should multiply that by 12, too, like everything else. Mr. Chairman, the Minister has brought forward the fact that the Victoria and Grey were responsible for this increase in value. The whole point I am trying to make is that these $1.7 million accrual of assets were nothing to do with Victoria and Grey.

They are British Mortgage accrual of the assets that they did not know they had, so my submission is that in any fair business operation that would be retroactive, payable back to the people who got hurt. They are the ones who should have got that money, not Victoria and Grey, because they had no performance in making this money. It was the people who lost millions of dollars in British Mortgage who were hurt, and the man who put this province into so much debt in the past two or three years should be the last man to get up and talk about fair dealing.

The point is, Mr. Chairman, that British Mortgage is dead now; Victoria and Grey have acquired multi-million-dollar assets and the accrual has not gone back to the people who built it; it has gone to Victoria and Grey and no other area. The Provincial Treasurer may answer this question then: If there are many business failures in this province—and there are many business failures—and many thousands of people get hurt in business failures, and if any area of business comes to you and says, "Many thousands of people are going to get hurt by our business going down the drain; we would like to have government support on this thing—$3 million support," the fact might help if you knew Leslie Frost or Mr. McCutcheon—

Mr. Chairman: The member has mentioned those names before.

Mr. Sargent: You bet your life and I will mention them again, Mr. Chairman, but it is a matter of record that this did happen and the government is embarrassed about it. No other area of business can walk into a government and get $3 million worth of credit and that is my point.

Mr. Ben: Mr. Chairman, I have got to take exception to the statement of the Provincial Treasurer, this is misleading the House. What the hon. member for Grey-Bruce was trying to point out in his own inimitable way was that at the time Victoria and Grey took over British Mortgage and made an appraisal of the assets of British Mortgage, they under-appraised one asset by $1.7 million, approximately. This is the point that he was trying to make. The Provincial Treasurer cannot recall the exact figure, and I cannot recall, but I do know that it was in excess of $1 million.

At the time Victoria and Grey took over British Mortgage there may have been a share swap, but I am willing to wager now that it was at least five British Mortgage shares for one Victoria and Grey, or some other ratio similar to that. Six? All right, six. That means that if any of the British Mortgage and Trust people did convert their shares, they only ended up with one Victoria and Grey share for six that they had in British Mortgage.

Mr. Singer: One for 21.

Mr. Ben: One for 21; well, that is more fantastic then.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: That is beside the point.

Mr. Ben: Besides that, the fact is that when that $1.7 million was found, as the hon. member just pointed out, it was not earned by Victoria and Grey; they just found the end of the rainbow you might say, and they were the ones who were supposed to have looked the rainbow over before they did the conversion. But at any rate the British Mortgage people then would have received either only one sixth of that $1.7 million, or one twenty-fourth, whatever the ratio was, whereas in all honesty and morality they were entitled to divide it among themselves. That is, just the shareholders of British Mortgage should have divided that $1.7 million and not give 23 parts to Victoria and Grey for every one part they got.

This is what the hon. member was trying to say and I think he is justified in saying that and asking this government what they are going to do about it, because, after all, they were involved. It is true that they did subsidize the purchase by Victoria and Grey of the assets, they guaranteed the depositors. But the fact is that they were involved, they had their little pinkey in there, and there were a lot of permanent friends of the Conservative Party in this province who have all been in that.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Like Walter Harris?

Mr. Ben: Walter Harris; you corrupted him.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, the attacks on the principles involved in the case here interest me no end. For instance, I have heard the member for Grey-Bruce on previous occasions stand up and ridicule two particular names that he mentioned here again this evening. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that if there is some degree of morality here other than the business deal concerned, which I have no interest in discussing, I want to tell him and his friends in that party line that if we here tonight were to divulge the names of the people of that party who owned a tremendous interest in Victoria and Grey at the time the takeover took place, I think there would be a little less talk. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but while I am on my feet, I think that for the people in this House who have sat here patiently as the warm July weather has taken over, it does not behoove us to sit here and accept our responsibilities, and then be held hour upon end by people who like to be away for two weeks at a time doing something else that is not their business in the House.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Chairman, this is a point geared at me I guess, but I must say that it is getting to be a sin to be away from the House for seven days. I do not think it becomes any member of this House to get up and criticize anyone for being absent from the House. Maybe you are taking a shot at me, I do not know; if you were not, if it was somebody else it is all right. But I do not think it becomes any member to get up and take a shot at me; the member for Riverdale took a shot at me last week for not being here.

I want to tell you that I have nine different businesses; I am trying to keep the ball bouncing there too. I have about 60,000 constituents I have to look after too, and they are pretty important—in fact they are more important than the member for Grey South is, and listen to him talk.

Mr. Chairman: Can we get back to the estimates of the Ontario securities commission?

Mr. Sargent: I will get back to the estimates, but I recall another member of this House who took a shot at a member. He thought he should not be drawing his pay in this House, and that was the lowest blow I have ever seen coming from a member of government. The young chap involved walked across the House and he said to the member, "I am not mad at you." It was the meanest thing I have ever seen in this House for a member to get up and castigate anyone for not being here. If I am not in this House that is my responsibility and not yours. I carry my weight as far as my people are concerned at any time so do not worry about that at all.

On the estimates, I will say this, Mr. Chairman. In all this fiasco we are talking about when millions of dollars were lost in British Mortgage, Atlantic Acceptance and Prudential, not one person lost his job in the securities commission; no one was fired, and no one went to jail. Yet thousands of people lost millions of dollars through incompetency on the part of this government. Any time in the area of business a man does not do his job he is fired but these people were irresponsible.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: That is not true; at least three people are in jail right now.

Mr. Sargent: I am talking about employees of the department, who were responsible through their lack of operating their jobs properly. Fortunes were lost by thousands of people and no one was hurt at all except the people who trusted this government.

Mr. Chairman: On vote 702; the member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I want to go into a different matter involving the Ontario securities commission.

Mr. Chairman: Is there anything further pertaining to Prudential?

The member for High Park.

Mr. Shulman: I referred earlier today to the need for insurance for investors, but tonight I want to discuss the role of the securities commission in the most recent debacle that this government has presided over, and I am referring to the matter of the bankruptcy of Ord Wallington and Company Limited.

On April 16 of this year there was a hearing of the Ontario securities commission in relation to the matter of Ord Wallington. I have the bulletin of the Ontario securities commission for April, 1968, and I would like to read a very small portion of what was stated in this bulletin. I want to stress the date because that is very important, Mr. Chairman—April 16, 1968.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire in any manner, shape or form to try to restrict any members' speeches or discussion in this House, but I think it is public knowledge, at least as of today, that there are criminal charges, I believe, pending in respect of this matter. I think it would be a very serious breach of an old established rule and tradition in law, if not in tradition, and it should not be discussed in this House now while those charges are pending.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, on this point of order, if this is a point of order, I understand there are some criminal charges—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: If there is any doubt in my friend's mind, this is a point of order. In the heat of the chamber, I really do not appreciate snide remarks like that, especially from that hon. gentleman.

Mr. Chairman: Order, please. Order, please.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak to the point of order.

Mr. Chairman: The Minister of Mines has suggested that in connection with the bankruptcy of Ord Wallington and Company there are criminal charges pending. I am not at all sure that this would fall under the rules of sub judice. Is this what the Minister of Mines is suggesting?

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Precisely. If this is the matter my friend is discussing, and I think it is.

Mr. Chairman: If it is in fact, then I think we should determine first of all whether or not the matter is actually under investigation or if there are criminal charges pending. If this is in fact true and correct, then discussion on that particular aspect of the matter would be sub judice.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): Mr. Chairman, further to the point of order, I think it is important to point out that there has been a tendency on the part of members opposite to anticipate the introduction of material by members on this side of the House, and to rise to points of order in anticipation, without waiting to hear, as the Chairman and the Speaker have requested on a number of occasions, what the nature of the material is to be. Then once the material is introduced, Mr. Chairman, the Chairman can rule whether the matter is in order, or the members can take objection to it.

Hon. Mr. Grossman: Damage may be done.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: After the damage has been done.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, may I speak to this point of order? First, what I was going to bring up had nothing whatsoever to do with the charges which were laid against the gentlemen today. I might also point out to you, sir, and through you to the Minister of Mines, that I understand that there are some criminal charges laid against some certain individuals in relation to Prudential, but I did not hear the Minister jumping up to try to stop discussion on Prudential. The situation is exactly the same, Mr. Chairman. I have no intention of discussing the criminal acts of these individuals. What I intend to discuss tonight is the role of the Ontario securities commission in the matter of the bankruptcy. I have no intention of discussing the criminal acts which occurred.

Mr. Chairman: In speaking to the point of order, in view of the submissions by the member from High Park, and after considering the submission of the Minister of Mines, and after reading the newspaper account appearing in the Telegram, I do not believe the discussion as outlined by the member for High Park should be ruled out of order.

Mr. Shulman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

On April 16, and again let me stress the date, a hearing was held by the Ontario securities commission into the matter of Ord Wallington and Company Limited. Just to give the background to the members, because this case has not received as much notice as has Prudential, I shall read the entire matter. It is quite brief. It is only two pages:

> Present: J. W. Gemel, counsel to Ord Wallington and Co. Ltd., A. S. Wakim, staff counsel.
> Ord Wallington and Co. Limited hold registration and are recognized by the commission as an investment dealer. They are not a member of the Ontario district of the investment dealers association of Canada. Although issues were raised, the present decision is directed to the narrow question as to whether this investment dealer has sufficient free-working capital to meet its commitments. The net minimum free-working capital required of this class of registrant is $25,000.
> After reviewing the facts developed as of this date, and hearing the evidence adduced and what was said on behalf of the registrant, I must accept the tentative conclusions of our auditors that the company does not have the minimum free capital required, and an actual capital deficiency of an as yet undetermined amount exists. The nature and extent of this deficiency will only be established when the audit now in progress is concluded, and brought forward to the close of business on April 16, 1968.
> In the interests of the client and the public, the registration of Ord Wallington and Co. Ltd. was suspended at the close of the hearing on April 16. In the event this decision is appealed I am prepared to detail my reasons for this immediate suspension.
> It should be noted that our audit and other investigations continue once the updated audit is completed. A hearing will be convened in which all of the facts developed, including those of which the company now has notice, will be reviewed. The purpose of the hearing will be to consider whether the registration should be reinstated, cancelled, or whether an additional period of suspension should be imposed.
> I was assured by Mr. J. G. Wallington, the company's president, that the shareholders were prepared to interject further capital to ensure the public clients against loss. While I have no reason to doubt the good faith with which this assurance was given, the problem is that no one was prepared to say with certainty within several tens of thousands of dollars just how much new capital will be required. The audit will supply this information.

Now let me stress the next few lines because these are critical to what followed:

> While the company will not be permitted to undertake and do business during the period of suspension, it is permitted to complete the trades for which it has already contracted and to make delivery of securities to its public clients, apart from officers, directors, and shareholders of the company. Mr. Wakim has been instructed to furnish the company's counsel with particulars as to matters which he proposes, as soon as they are available. Mr. Gemel already is in possession of much of this information.

Dated at Toronto April 17, 1968.

Signed,

H. S. Bray, Director.

Mr. Chairman, let me stress this one line again:

The company is permitted to complete the trades for which it has already contracted and to make delivery of securities to its public clients.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the public has not yet learned that, but statements of fact from agencies of this government cannot be accepted at their face value. I have received a number of letters from clients in the sad position of having bought securities through Ord Wallington, and one of them is so glaring as to show the responsibility of the securities commission in this case.

It comes from a Mr. William Harding of 327 East 34th St. in Hamilton, Ontario. And let me say that this is one of dozens, perhaps hundreds, of persons who lost money in this most recent financial Conservative debacle and who come from Hamilton and district. Mr. Harding wrote to me on May 27 as follows:

Dear Dr. Shulman:

On April 4, 1968, I phoned a brokerage operating under the name of Ord Wallington and Company Limited, 42 James Street South, Hamilton, and placed an order for 350 of Guardian Growth Fund, pfd.

Let me interject to say this is a safe, senior security with relatively little risk, as stocks go.

A cheque for payment was sent out on April 17, 1968—

Note the date, April 17, 1968. This is after this hearing.

—and it was cashed at our bank April 23, 1968.

One week after this commission had made their statement.

On May 1, 1968, I received a copy of my original order, plus payment notice on Ord Wallington and Company Limited's stationery, copy enclosed. This was sent to me from the Ontario securities commission. On May 25, 1968, I received a registered letter regarding an Ord Wallington and Company Limited proposal under The Bankruptcy Act. My name is on the list as an unsecured creditor for the amount of $3,020.50.

Please excuse my writing as I have arthritis, plus coronary artery disease. Thank you for your attention and consideration,

Yours truly,

W. Harding.

So what has happened here, Mr. Chairman? The Ontario securities commission has made a statement. We must accept that they made the statement in good will. They have said, "This company is suspended. However, you are allowed to complete the trade you have now." We see that Mr. Harding saw no reason not to accept the word of the Ontario securities commission. He sent in his money, and they cashed his cheque a week later. Now they say, "Too bad, you cannot get your securities. You are an unsecured creditor. Let us see what we can get back for you, maybe 60 cents on the dollar; maybe 70 cents on the dollar if you are lucky."

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that the Ontario securities commission has a moral, if not a legal, responsibility to Mr. Harding, and everyone else in this particular position. They have gone on record on April 16 of this year as saying these trades can be completed, and these securities can be delivered, and if someone in good will, following this, sends money in, surely the securities commission is not going to say, "Too bad about you, you should not accept our word." Surely there is a responsibility on the part of this Minister, with intercession if necessary with public funds, to see that people in this position do not lose money.

Let me say this, Mr. Chairman, in the bankruptcy of Ord Wallington, the amounts involved are not of the huge sums that we saw in the Atlantic collapse. They are small, but from the same type of person who lost money in Prudential. As I go down the list, the losses are $200, $600, $100, $3,000, $8,000, $11,000, $200, $13,000. These are not rich people, these are small investors, people who do not buy speculative securities. If you look at the stock that they bought, as you go down the list, most of them were not the usual type of worthless securities that are sold all too often in this country; they are solid. These people are small investors, saving for their older age. It is exactly the same situation as the Prudential collapse, as far as that goes; the same type of person.

They did not think that they were taking any risk; they were not buying stocks on margin or trying to get an extra-large return. They were not really speculating. These were people who were investing, in all honesty believing that if you invested with a Canadian broker, and you paid in full for your securities, your securities would be sent to you. Some of the cases are glaring; Harding's case is an unusually glaring one. But all of these cases point up once again the very bad situation that we have in this province in relation to anyone buying securities through a Canadian broker, and it does not matter if it is Canadian or American securities. If they made the mistake of not running down that same day and picking up the securities, or even if they wanted to do that and the securities were not available that day—too bad, out of luck, you are an unsecured creditor.

There are two things I would like to ask the Minister. First, will he take steps to preserve the good name of the Ontario securities commission and see that those persons who sent in money after the Ontario securities commission said that it was all right to do so and they would get their securities, receive their securities? That is the first question. If the Minister answers no, I am going to be extremely disappointed in him.

The second question, and I have less hope on this one, concerns a matter brought up by the member for Humber, and other members. There is a duty on the part of government, when a government body does not do its job properly and does not supervise properly and when people are hurt innocently, or when in fact they are victims of crime, there is a duty to government to step in and reimburse them.

The second question that I am going to ask the Minister, and I am happy to say that the amount of money in this case is not a large sum as compared to Prudential, the total amount of money deficient is $141,000 which is small compared to Prudential because this was a smaller firm, and fortunately there are not as many people involved.

An hon. member: The government will not compensate them all.

Mr. Shulman: Well, perhaps the government should compensate them all, Mr. Chairman. I am going to ask the Minister if he will step in and see that these people who lost their money through no fault of their own will all be compensated to that extent, because simple morality and justice say that they should be and I invite the Minister's comment on this matter.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I cannot give that undertaking, Mr. Chairman. I am not prepared to give that undertaking in the words and fashion that has been requested.

Mr. Shulman: Is the Minister not going to make any further comment in this matter?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Not at this point.

Mr. Shulman: Well, in that case I will. I thought at least the Minister would act to preserve the good name of the securities commission but perhaps that is not too important in this province, and perhaps it is not salvageable.

I would like to give some other circumstances of people who lost money in slightly different circumstances in the Ord Wallington collapse, Mr. Chairman, and some of the other types of problems that have come up here, to perhaps persuade the Minister to give this matter a second look.

I would like to tell you the story of William Grady, who lives in Orono, Ontario—and most of the people who lost money came from good Conservative areas, and were good Conservative people and one would think that the government would be more considerate of their position.

The point that I wish to bring up now is slightly different and it is this: Why are these persons who have paid for their securities in full not secured creditors? Surely if a person buys securities through a broker, and deposits the securities at a broker and leaves them there with cash on top, surely he should be a secured creditor. If he is not a secured creditor, then there is absolutely no control of our registered brokers.

It is the responsibility of the Ontario securities commission, Mr. Chairman, I believe, and perhaps you will correct me, to oversee the brokers and broker dealers, and securities advisors in the province. It is their responsibility, I believe, to keep sufficiently close surveillance over these brokers to ensure that this type of situation does not go this far. It should be their responsibility to make sufficiently common spot checks, so that individuals are not taken as happened at this time. And I submit that it should come under this vote.

Mr. Chairman: I prefer the technical question raised as to whether or not the creditors were secured or otherwise, which would seem on the face of it to be a legal question rather than a commission question.

Mr. Shulman: This matter, Mr. Chairman, is not before the court.

Mr. Chairman: But you were posing what appeared to be, on the face of it, a legal question.

Mr. Shulman: Yes; to the Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs. I would like to ask, and I am sure that he has had legal advice on this matter, why these persons are not secured and I am sure that the securities commission has looked into this matter of secured creditors.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I think this is a matter to be handled in the bankruptcy court, and The Bankruptcy Act itself sets out the priorities and the sequence of events, and the order in which creditors are to be paid, and there it is. I am sure that the hon. member is as aware of that as I am.

Mr. Shulman: Is The Bankruptcy Act provincial legislation?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No, it is federal legislation.

Mr. Shulman: Well, then I would suggest to the Minister that we need provincial legislation too, since obviously The Bankruptcy Act does not protect persons in that situation. I have a man here who deposited cash in the firm. Cash! And he gets a letter back—

Hon. Mr. Randall: Well, what else would he deposit?

Mr. Shulman: Stocks! Most of them deposit stocks, but this man had left cash with the firm, and he got a letter back that he is an unsecured creditor. I would like to suggest to the Minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that inasmuch as federal legislation does not protect these persons, then it would appear to me that provincial legislation should be the proper place for this type of protection. Once again, Canada, particularly Ontario, is lagging behind and—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Mr. Chairman, bankruptcy, if memory serves me correctly and I think it does, is under The British North America Act as being in federal jurisdiction, and not provincial.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Chairman, through you to the Minister, it was not so many months ago that bankruptcies of trust companies and finance companies suddenly became a matter of provincial interest and legislation.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: No! Not at all!

Mr. Shulman: Oh, the whole purpose of this legislation was to protect the shareholder in a case such as this. There is absolutely no difference between a bankrupty happening in a financial institution of this type and a financial institution of the Prudential type. It is exactly the same situation as far as the poor persons involved, who bought securities—

An hon. member: What about York Trust?

Mr. Shulman: However, I do not wish to belabour this particular point.

I would like to finish up by saying, Mr. Chairman, that in the bankruptcy of Ord Wellington, the Ontario securities commission has a moral, probably, a legal, responsibility because of what has happened here, and in view of that I have related tonight; but they certainly have a moral responsibility.

The Minister has refused to make any comment. He has refused to make any undertakings but someone spoke earlier tonight of the dry rot that is affecting the Conservative Party in this province. Unless you do something about immoral situations of this type you are going to see far worse.

Vote 702 agreed to.

On vote 703:

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Chairman, the matter of insurance reform in the province of Ontario has been before the House at every session since I have become a member, and more particularly, since the report of the select committee in 1963. This final report recommended, after due consideration and fact finding in this province and elsewhere, that the province should adopt a form of automobile insurance based on the principle of compensation without fault.

I believe this is generally accepted by many people in the insurance field, certainly, by many members in this House. We have had a good exposition of it already today and yesterday from the hon. member for High Park.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that you have heard my colleague, the hon. member for Downsview, on many occasions extolling this principle and urging the acceptance by the government of this sort of insurance; not in a programme under the control, direction and operation of the state, as was urged this afternoon by the representative of the NDP, but one which would have the amount of regulation that we all believe the government should exert over any industry to see that the public rights are properly served and that we, as citizens, are getting a fair return for our dollar spent.

It is not my thought to put any formal proposal before the House. We have already had at least one of those today and I know, Mr. Chairman, that you are aware that many people in this nation, and this province and in the United States of America feel that this is a reasonable answer to the problems that automobile operators are facing in this province and elsewhere.

One of the leading authorities, Professor Linden has been quoted extensively by members on all sides and I thought that it might be useful, in opening some remarks on this matter—I am sure there are others who would want to ask the Minister for his most recent views on automobile insurance reform—to quote very briefly from a pamphlet that, Mr. Chairman, you will be interested to know is published by the all Canada insurance federation, probably using that $1 million we were hearing about earlier in the day.

It quotes, of course, Professor Linden's paper that was originally published in the centennial issue of the Canadian Bar Review in 1967. Since he is quoted as an authority by members on all sides of the House, and in many other Legislatures and Parliaments, I thought it would be wise for me to quote at least one paragraph.

This is from the pamphlet entitled, "The Path of Automobile Accident Compensation in Canada," and quoting directly, Professor Linden states as follows:

> Basic protection would be provided for bodily injury or death to all occupants of an automobile and to any pedestrian struck by that automobile regardless of proof of fault.

Then, without continuing with the argument which has been put many times before, he continues as follows:

> There is no reason, however, other than doctrinaire socialism that would prevent private insurers from underwriting such a loss insurance scheme. Its attributes are many. Immediate compensation for all; the retention of tort law, jury trial and damages for pain and suffering; no socialism; no new board; the schedule of payments would serve only as a minimum.

Now, it is our feeling as Liberals, that the time has come for far reaching reform in the automobile insurance industry. It is obviously necessary that the government brings forward legislation that is going to bring into being the principle of compensation without fault, as a part of an obligatory insurance programme for this province.

There is an argument that is always put forward by the hon. Minister and his predecessors that we in Ontario have achieved what amounts to 100 per cent coverage, without obliging our citizens to have the insurance that we feel is so necessary.

But I believe that we must assume now that the drivers in the province should be obliged to accept the responsibility that goes with operating a motor vehicle on our roads, and that part of this responsibility would be the coverage that would result in compensation without fault as has been recommended by the select committee and is well accepted by those who are knowledgeable in the field.

During the past two or three years, the Minister and his predecessor have been concerned with this matter. Just a year ago, he brought into being what is called, rather peculiarly, "the facility," which replaced the assigned risk plan that had been working in the province for some time and had drawn down considerable criticism from the industry and the government.

The facility, as it is known, is still rather ineffectual in some of its details. I would be particularly interested in the Minister commenting to the House on how he rates its effectiveness now that it has been in operation for a reasonable length of time. But I would also urge him that the time has certainly come when we should undertake sufficient direction of the industry so that we would require the implementation of this principle of compensation without fault.

We have legislation on the books which will be proclaimed in time for the beginning of the next calendar year—which is going to make it available at least in Ontario and across Canada.

But surely it is time that we took the responsible position that we must require the citizens of this province, who are going to make use of our roads with automobile transportation, to see that they are properly covered so that when they are involved in accidents, whether their own fault or someone else's, we are not going to have the unconscionable delays and the tedious courtroom procedures that have held up justice being done as it would be generally recognized.

I would urge the Minister to undertake these reforms. I believe that they would be supported on all sides. I believe we can have reasonable and useful reform in the system without it being taken over by the state. There is a matter here of considerable reform. We have been treated in the past to a detailed description of the programme and it is not necessary for me to even attempt to do that tonight. The Minister, I know, is concerned with it. He has made extensive references to it in the past and I would be interested to hear his comments tonight.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: Well, Mr. Chairman, with reference to payment of compensation, regardless of fault, as I indicated earlier in my remarks, provisions for the payment of compensation regardless of fault are now in the new automobile policy which becomes standard in Ontario and the rest of Canada on January, 1969. So it is a matter of some five months away.

Mr. Singer: We are not talking about fault here. We are talking about reforms.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: All right. Now with reference to the facility, there are three objectives. The first—

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, on a small point—if the Minister will just yield—it is January, 1969, I stand to be corrected. It was to be January 1, 1968. A bill was passed during this session to change that date to a date to be fixed by order-in-council. I would certainly be interested in confirming if the government has decided to bring this Saskatchewan scheme under private auspices in force in Ontario on January 1, 1969.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The date that the provinces generally and collectively are setting as a target date is January 1, 1969, and I have a memorandum from the superintendent confirming this so we are looking to that for the necessary proclamations to make it effective on January 1 of next year.

Now, with respect to the facility, there are three objectives: First, to enable insurers to accept any and all automobile risks offered to them through their normal production facilities. This has been accomplished throughout the industry with the exception of only two insurers which as of February 22 of 1968 had not yet subscribed to this plan. They are the English and American Insurance Company Limited and Transport Indemnity Company.

Second, to preserve normal binding arrangements between insurers and their agents. And this has been accomplished on a generally satisfactory basis.

Third, to minimize the motivation for declining risks and cancelling policies in mid-term. The following figures are an indication of the measure of success in minimizing mid-term cancellations. In September, 1967 there were 46 mid-term cancellations; in October, 1967 there were 32; in November, 1967, it was reduced to 22; December of last year six; January, 1968 four; and February, 1968, four.

The driving public, I think, benefits from this situation. In that, for instance, the purchase of automobile insurance for the motoring public becomes easier, especially for the types of risk which have had difficulty in recent years.

Second, in addition such cases, except a category with a high frequency record of accidents and/or convictions which your company or companies will define, will find extensions of coverage available to them beyond the present statutory coverage; for example, third party limits up to $100,000 and collision.

For all perils with deductible of not less than $100, or higher if warranted by the applicant's record or lack of driving experience, comprehensive or specified perils with a deductible of not less than $25, and medical payments up to $2,000. Third, the insured should receive better service under his policy because it will be issued in a normal company-agent relationship.

I am hopeful the facility will be a much more satisfactory arrangement than the assigned risk plan, which led to those disappointments and embarrassments of cancellation in mid-term, which to me was just not acceptable in this day and age, and in the current insurance climate in which we live.

I would hope that next year we will see the total impact of the use of the new facility and that it will work out as hoped. As I am indicating my views on the subject, I think it has turned out to be a pretty good deal.

Mr. Chairman, I move that—

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put, I rise on a point of order, and I do so at this time for two reasons. Number one is, I did not rise before and argue the point perhaps as strongly as I should have because I did not want to delay the matter then before the House as far as the passing of that particular estimate was concerned and, secondly, I rise at this point of the evening solely and simply because at this point of the evening, usually, the press gallery is pretty empty and what I am about to say, I would appreciate not appearing in public print because it, perhaps, may inflame other opinions.

An hon. member: No point in asking that.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: All right, I ask that as a matter of courtesy. Perhaps if there is none left in the House there may be in other areas relating to the House.

Mr. J. Renwick: This is a public House.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: It is a question of order relating to the rights of individuals before the courts of this province, and, as I say, I rise at this time because of the reasons that I have given.

I do not care whether the individuals named are good citizens or scallywags, if there are matters pending before the courts of this province which affect the rights of individuals, then I think someone, whether they are in the executive council or not, in this chamber, should rise and protest that matters that are before the courts should not be referred to in this House during the debate.

Let me just recount what happened today and I know nothing more about this matter than what I read in the newspapers today and what I heard in this House tonight. I gather, sir, that charges of theft were laid today against four individuals in this city who happen, I am told in the newspapers, to be principals of a brokerage firm.

Tonight, sir, we came into the House here and we heard an inflammatory speech made relating to this very matter, even the names of the individuals were mentioned. At least one of the individuals, if not more, who were charged today, were named in this House. Now, I am not saying the hon. member did this deliberately, he might not even have known what was in the newspapers today, I do not know, all I am saying to you, sir, is that this was a matter that affected the rights of individuals before the courts and it ill behooves, sir, any member in this House, responsible or not, to stand up and discuss this matter because it affects people's rights and it could possibly, it may not but it could possibly, inflame public opinion or do something to prejudice a fair trial.

That, sir, is why I rose at that time, and I think, sir, the full facts of the matter were not before you. I was condemned by one member for not waiting until the speech had been made. All right, the speech has now been made, and the names of at least one of the individuals charged today were mentioned in this House. And, sir, I must protest to you again, this line of prejudicing the rights of individuals, which has happened before in this session of this Legislature, should not be permitted to continue any longer in the name of justice.

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): That is the former rebel.

Mr. J. Renwick: Mr. Chairman, if I may speak on this point of order, I share, as every member of this House shares, the concern that the sub judice rule apply in the appropriate and proper circumstances. The matter has come before this assembly on many occasions. In this particular instance, agree entirely with the ruling of the chair, which was made this evening, that the rule against sub judice matters being discussed in this chamber did not apply to the remarks which were made by the member for High Park. The whole point is that the extent of the application of the sub judice rule is a matter of judgment in each individual case to be exercised by the Chairman, either from his own personal awareness of the proceedings which are taking place outside, or because it is drawn to his attention on a point of order.

I object, Mr. Chairman, to the Minister of Mines suggesting again, as it is prone from the government's point of view to suggest, the sub judice rule for some reason or other is an all-blanket closure of debate on all aspects of matters which are properly and legitimately matters for debate at the appropriate time in this assembly. If the Minister of Mines was suggesting that he disagreed with the ruling of the Chairman and that the member for High Park breached the sub judice rule, then I would suggest that at the appropriate time he give at some length to the Speaker of the House his version of the sub judice rule as it applies to one or more specific cases, so that we can get this matter clarified.

The very suggestion that a Minister of the government would stand up and suggest for one moment that there are matters on which he can invoke the closure of the press is to my mind unthinkable, and to suggest that at this hour of the night he would raise in a public assembly his version of how the club operates is unacceptable to me. Mr. Chairman, I agree with your ruling tonight; I think the members of the House do. I object, and will continue to object, to the attempt to make the sub judice rule a blanket closure or prohibition of debate on all aspects of matters of public concern. I will abide by any reasonable judgment in each specific case as to what the matters are which are sub judice. In this particular instance I listened very carefully, because I respect on most occasions the remarks of the Minister of Mines. I listened very carefully to what the member for High Park had to say, and there was no breach of any known interpretation of the sub judice rule, Mr. Chairman.

Hon. A. F. Lawrence: Mr. Chairman, I have already given you my views of how this applies to this specific instance, and I wonder if the hon. member was listening carefully enough that he even heard the name, as I say, of one or more of the individuals who were charged today, mentioned by the hon. member. The hon. member himself, of course, may not appreciate the responsibility he has in this chamber. What we say in this chamber is privileged, and it is a very onerous duty on each of us. I fear that some of us at some times do not appreciate the high level of responsibility we should have when we say things in this House and elsewhere, because those words are privileged.

Similarly, though, I think the hon. member should appreciate that what he says can then be reported in the press in a manner in which, if the press itself went out and printed those things, they themselves would be liable perhaps for contempt of court. In this particular case, there were questions thrown about unsecured credits in respect of share certificates, and presumably these are the very matters that are going to form the basis of theft charges. And the names of the individuals were mentioned here in the House tonight. I say to you, sir, that it is my belief that what transpired in this House tonight could—may not but could, and this is always the danger that we have to put up with—prejudice the fair trial of individuals. As I say, I have no more knowledge of them at all. There were sneering remarks made about Conservative firms, and Conservative supporters, and what not. I have never even heard of these people before or even heard of this brokerage firm until today when I read about this in the newspaper. But I do not care who they are, their rights, sir, were transgressed in this House tonight.

Mr. Chairman: Well, if the Chairman may reply to the matter raised at this particular time, when the Minister of Mines did rise on a point of order earlier this evening, the Chairman was guided by the fact that he must determine in each individual case whether, in his opinion, the rights of any individual are going to be prejudiced in any way, and if, in the opinion of the Chairman, such rights will be prejudiced, then it is the prerogative of the Chairman to immediately intervene and see to it that no such discussion takes place.

When the point was first raised, I did believe that there was a possibility the matter should be ruled sub judice. However, the member for High Park rose in his place and indicated that he only wanted to discuss and debate the matter of this particular bankruptcy insofar as it pertained to the Ontario securities commission, and that he did not wish in any way to debate or discuss the four individuals involved—I believe that is what the member for High Park indicated through the Chairman, and this is the basis on which the Chairman did make his ruling.

I might point out that in referring to a ruling of Mr. Speaker Morrow, the precedents of this House indicate that the chair has consistently exercised discretion in connection with each individual case in a very generous way, so as not to unduly curtail debate, and in the opinion of Mr. Speaker Morrow this is how the discretion should be exercised in order to give flexibility. But, nevertheless, the discretion should remain where it is, that is with the chair.

I say to the Minister of Mines, and to the members of the committee, that as Chairman I exercised what, in my view, was discretion. There was no indication to me that the rights of any individuals were going to be prejudiced and while I was not in the chair for the full course of the remarks made by the member for High Park, I was, nevertheless, listening in the lounge, and I must say I did not hear anything that, in fact, could have prejudiced any charges that are now pending or that may be pending.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves that the committee of supply rise and report it has come to certain resolutions and ask for leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

The House resumed, Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Speaker, the committee of supply begs to report it has come to certain resolutions and asks for leave to sit again.

Report agreed to.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we will continue with estimates and possibly look to the order paper and some bills, and I would remind the hon. members that tomorrow evening the House will not sit.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree moves the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to.

The House adjourned at 11:10 o'clock, p.m.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1968

The House met at 2 o'clock, p.m.

Prayers.

Mr. Speaker: This afternoon among our visitors I am sure that we are pleased to have a delegation down to visit the government from the Old Order and Amish Mennonites from the county of Waterloo, and I am sure that they will enjoy seeing the business of the province of Ontario conducted here this afternoon.

Petitions.

Presenting reports.

Motions.

Introduction of bills.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Energy and Resources Management. Is the Minister aware that serious pollution in the Ottawa area, particularly in the Rideau River, has resulted in the closing of beaches because of the coliform counts? Secondly, what action will the Minister take to assist in this matter?

Hon. J. R. Simonett (Minister of Energy and Resources Management): Mr. Speaker, yes I am aware that the coliform count in the Rideau River has resulted in the closing of certain bathing beaches by the Ottawa health department. In answer to the second part, the Ontario water resources commission is aware of this situation, and staff are in the area to ensure that all possible steps are taken to temporarily remove the source of this contamination. At the same time, the OWRC is holding discussions with the municipalities concerned and the new Ottawa-Carleton administration to expedite the provisions of regional collection and treatment facilities for the permanent solution to this problem.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister if the legislation setting up the metropolitan government has in any way interfered with the means whereby the OWRC would have to assist in the abatement of this pollution?

Hon. Mr. Simonett: Mr. Speaker, I would say no.

Mr. D. C. MacDonald (York South): Mr. Speaker, my first question is to the Prime Minister. Is there any meaningful way in which this assembly can express its support of, and sympathy for, the people of Biafra, and its abhorrence of the genocide which is taking place there as a result of the invasion of that country by Nigerian armed forces?

Hon. J. P. Robarts (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the key word is "meaningful" really; it is an international problem. We have been in touch with the government in Ottawa about it and the problem really is not one of providing supplies, it is a method of getting them into the country. We have indicated that we would be prepared to assist in any way that fell to us as a government, but it is an internal problem in the country and we have no method of bringing any influence to bear on how that country conducts its affairs.

On the other hand I would feel free to say that I am told that the government in Ottawa, the Canadian government, is making efforts in the international field to remove some of the road blocks so that help could be given to these people, and if such came to pass, then the governments here would be quite prepared to assist in any way we could, if the opportunity revealed itself and was possible.

Mr. MacDonald: My second question is to the Provincial Treasurer. What are the terms of reference of the issues relating to the appropriate bargaining units for public servants that have been referred to Judge Little? When is a report from Judge Little expected?

Hon. C. S. MacNaughton (Provincial Treasurer): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, may I say that on July 14 last His Honour Judge Walter Little was appointed by order-in-council 3173A67 as a special advisor to review and report upon collective bargaining in the public service of Ontario and the Crown agencies and commissions as defined in The Public Service Act.

The terms of reference include a number of items in addition to the question of determining appropriate bargaining units. I think at this point it would be appropriate for me to read from the order-in-council. It says:

> The Provincial Treasurer further recommends that such a study shall have due regard to the public interest and be of such nature and extent that said special advisors shall in particular report upon:
> (5) The method and procedures of negotiation within the bargaining system in which compulsory arbitration is the final means of resolving dispute.

As far as when his honour will complete the hearings, I would point out that he has already held a considerable number of meetings with the interested parties and these meetings are continuing. So I am really obliged to say, Mr. Speaker, that the date upon which he will complete his review and make his report rests largely with Judge Little but I believe he is well advanced in his consideration of the matters which are within the terms of reference. I cannot be more precise than that because it is still in the hands of the judge himself. I will send you a copy of the order-in-council if you wish.

Mr. Speaker: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of personal privilege. One of the important privileges of this House is the right to fair reporting. Yesterday I rose in the House in connection with the Toronto Telegram of Tuesday, July 9, and the particular quote which I referred to at this time was:

> Dr. Shulman did not reply to a challenge from George Ben, Liberal, Toronto Humber, a lawyer, to repeat some of his comments outside the Legislature where he would have no protection against legal action.

I protested yesterday in committee that this interchange had never occurred and the member for Humber had never made such a request. I added, however, if any member wished me to repeat my speech outside the House I would be pleased to do so.

Mr. J. H. White (London South): We wish the hon. member would give them all outside the House.

Mr. Shulman: Mr. Speaker, I addressed the Telegram at that time, and expressed the hope they would print a correction. In today's Telegram I wish to quote the article which they have printed, sir, and I then will have some comments to make. The heading is,

> SHULMAN HAS TO EAT HIS WORDS
> MPPs laughed uproariously yesterday as Dr. Morton Shulman bitterly attacked the Telegram—then had to eat his own words. The High Park New Democratic member criticized a Telegram report of a debate the night before which said George Ben, Liberal MPP for Humber, challenged him to repeat outside the Legislature statements he made in it about insurance company profits.
> Dr. Shulman said he did not think Mr. Ben made any such challenge. He hurled a crumpled copy of the paper to the floor snarling, "The Telegram has its usual accuracy."
>
> Footnote: A moment later Mr. Ben arrived in the House and said he had indeed challenged Dr. Shulman to produce facts and figures outside the House. Dr. Shulman—for once—was speechless.

Interjections by hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order.

Mr. Shulman: I have gone over the preliminary Hansard for both days, sir, to make certain I did not have some aberration of memory. The hon. member for Humber made no such comments. I have since spoken to him outside of this chamber to confirm the Hansard, and I wish to draw to your attention May's, in its most recent edition, on page 126, which reads as follows:

> The publishing of the names of the members of this House in reflecting upon them and misrepresenting their proceedings in Parliament is a breach of the privilege and destructive of the freedom of Parliament.

I should think the member for London South would second me in these comments.

Now I would like to point out to you, sir—

Hon. A. Grossman (Minister of Correctional Services): The hon. member belongs in the NDP all right. He can dish it out, but he cannot take it.

Mr. Shulman: We can take the truth very gladly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order!

Mr. Shulman: The newspapers have a perfect privilege to report or not report whatever they wish of the proceedings of this House. They do not have the right, sir, to misrepresent what is occurring here. This particular newspaper has made a pattern of misrepresentation of matters referring to anything in this party. Mr. Speaker, this is a flagrant example, and I say to you, sir, and through you to the Prime Minister, that I can understand that your sympathies would not be with members of this party, but this is a matter involving the Legislature as such. I put it to you, sir, and through you to the Prime Minister, to read Hansard, and after reading Hansard, sir, provided there is no retraction in that newspaper, it is my intention to ask that the publisher of this newspaper be called before the bar of this House.

Mr. Speaker: I will be pleased to look into the matter as suggested by the member. The member for Thunder Bay has a question.

Mr. J. E. Stokes (Thunder Bay): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Lands and Forests.

Does the Algoma Central Railway have the right to charge for and issue licences of occupancy on land held by that company?

Hon. R. Brunelle (Minister of Lands and Forests): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Thunder Bay: This land is private, therefore we have no jurisdiction over the use of the land. The ACR have the same rights as any other private land owner.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Grey-Bruce has the floor.

Mr. E. Sargent (Grey-Bruce): A question to the Minister of Financial and Commerical Affairs:

1. Will the Minister advise if issuers and underwriters of securities will be held liable for any erroneous information in offering circulars, and what punitive damages may be assessed as a deterrent?

2. Of the 249 Ontario securities commission investigations still pending, as listed on page 457 of the annual report, how many will be dealt with by the end of 1968?

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Under section 136 (1) of The Securities Act, 1966, every person making a statement in any application, report, prospectus, return, financial statement or other document, required to be filed or furnished under the Act or the regulations that, at the time and in the light of the circumstances under which it is made is false or misleading with respect to any material fact or that omits to state any material fact, the omission of which makes the statement false or misleading is guilty of an offence and on summary conviction is liable to a fine of not more than $2,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than one year, or to both.

Every director or officer of such company, who authorized, permitted or acquiesced in such offence is guilty of the same offence and subject to the same penalties. The company itself may be fined up to $25,000.

Under section 343 of the criminal code everyone who makes, circulates or publishes a prospectus, statement or account, whether written or oral, that he knows is false in a material particular, with intent:

(a) To induce persons, whether ascertained or not, to become shareholders or partners in a company;

(b) To deceive or defraud the members, shareholders or creditors, whether ascertained or not, of a company;

(c) To induce any person to entrust or advance anything to a company, or

(d) To enter into any security for the benefit of a company, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

Section 141 of The Securities Act, 1966, provides that where a prospectus has been accepted for filing and whether the purchaser received the prospectus or not, if a material false statement is contained in the prospectus, every person who was at the time of its acceptance a director of the issuing company or who signed the certificate to the prospectus as an officer or promoter of the company is liable to pay compensation to all persons or companies who purchased the securities for any loss or damage such person or companies have sustained as a result of such purchase unless it is provided.

(a) That the prospectus was filed with the commission without his knowledge or consent, and that, on becoming aware of its filing with the commission he forthwith gave reasonable public notice that it was so filed;

(b) That after the issue of a receipt for the prospectus and before the purchase of the securities by such purchaser on becoming aware of any false statement therein, he withdrew his consent thereto and gave reasonable public notice of such withdrawal and of the reason therefore;

(c) That with respect to every false statement he had reasonable grounds to believe and did believe that the statement was true;

(d) That he had no reasonable grounds to believe that an expert who made a statement on a prospectus or whose report or valuation was produced or fairly summarized therein was not competent to make such statement, valuation or report, or

(e) With respect to every false statement purporting to be a statement made by an official person or contained in what purports to be a copy of or extract from a public official document it was a correct and fair representation of the statement or copy of or extract from the document.

Now with respect to the second question referring to the annual report of the department, page 50 of the report states as follows:

> Approximately 146 informal investigations were carried over from 1966. In 1967, 253 were commenced, making a total of some 399. Of these investigations, 159 have been closed since the beginning of the year, leaving a balance of 249 outstanding.

While a precise estimate is not possible for the whole year, as at June 30, 1968, there were 213 informal investigations outstanding; 99 informal investigations had been closed during the period January 1 to June 30, 1968.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister accept a supplementary on this? What is the reason for this big backlog of cases?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: The commission is continually conducting investigations and I would expect that at any given time there will always be a number of investigations which are current.

Mr. Sargent: How many cases under this section are in the backlog?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would have to check that.

Mr. Sargent: Are there any?

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I would have to check that.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, a question to the hon. the Prime Minister: Why are brewers' warehouses granted a monopoly on the sale of beer in Ontario, and why cannot beer be sold in grocery stores?

Hon. Mr. Robarts: Mr. Speaker, the Brewers Warehousing Company, the organization that distributes beer, was set up in 1927 at the request of the government of the day after the proclamation of the first Liquor Control Act following a period of prohibition.

It just simply developed as a means of distributing beer throughout the province. It became obvious that it was impossible to distribute liquor, wine and beer all from the same outlets. There is the question of storage, refrigeration, return of bottles, and so on, so it really developed simply as a method of distributing beer to those in the province who wished to consume it.

After World War II, the Brewers Warehousing Company was formed by the breweries themselves as a non-profit organization in order to effect this distribution and it has continued in that way to the present time.

As far as the sale of beer in grocery stores is concerned, it is not government policy to permit it.

Mr. Sargent: Thank you. Mr. Speaker, a question to the Provincial Secretary. Will the Minister advise if there are any restrictions in the granting of a charter to open a brewery in Ontario; and what steps are necessary to acquire the same?

Hon. R. S. Welch (Provincial Secretary): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the easiest and simplest way to answer this question would be to indicate that if it is a provincial charter the member is interested in, the application would proceed in the normal way and that the provision of The Corporations Act, The Liquor Control Act of Ontario, The Liquor Licence Act and all the regulations under those Acts would have to be complied with. And in addition to this, because of the—

Mr. Sargent: Wait a minute, I do not get the Minister. Would he say that again slowly, what are all the steps you have to go through?

Hon. Mr. Welch: Well, it would be by way of applying for a provincial charter. I am assuming that the member, Mr. Speaker, wants a provincial charter to form a company in order to produce this particular commodity. Therefore, to answer the member's questions, he would have to comply with The Corporations Act, The Liquor Control Act, The Liquor Licence Act and the regulations under those particular Acts. And, in addition, he would have to satisfy the licensing regulations of the government of Canada.

Mr. Sargent: Would it be forthcoming—just say "yes" or "no"—would we get a charter? This is very important. Do we have a monopoly now or what do we have in this province?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

Hon. Mr. Welch: Well, Mr. Speaker, if one could cut through the editorial comment of a supplementary question, and simply get to the fact that we cannot give a yes or no answer to any question in advance of the consideraton of the application, because you have to satisfy all the provisions to which I made reference. And the issuance of charters at the moment under the present Corporations Act is one of discretion that lies with the—

Mr. P. J. Yakabuski (Renfrew South): The member wants a simple answer to a simple question.

Hon. Mr. Welch: Now I have forgotten what I was saying.

Mr. Sargent: Why do you not ask the boss there, and he will give you one? It is as simple as that.

Hon. Mr. Welch: All I am pointing out is that it is not possible to give an answer until such time as one could satisfy oneself as to whether or not one could comply with all of these provisions and regulations to which I have already made reference.

Mr. Sargent: Does the Minister think he could satisfy all these people? This points out the monopoly control.

Mr. Speaker: Order! The member is asking questions.

Mr. Sargent: Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Land and Forests: Is the government going to continue to permit logging operations with the attendant large logging roads to exist in Algonquin park in view of the fact that The Department of Lands and Forests has a stated policy to maintain primitive zones in Algonquin, as well as other provincial parks?

Is the Minister aware that there is a growing number of logging roads now being constructed in the wilderness areas of the park, totalling up to an estimated 1,400 miles of logging roads in length and that there is continual use of chain saws cutting timber in this natural park?

Further, will the Minister advise if the revenue from royalties and cutting pays for the cost of policing and handling of this destruction of our natural resources in Algonquin?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the hon. member for his great interest in one of our finest and largest provincial parks in Ontario?

In reply to the first question, Mr. Speaker, no logging operations are permitted in primitive zones in Algonquin park or in any other provincial park as set out under The Provincial Parks Act.

I am well aware of the logging roads in the interior of Algonquin park and of the cutting of timber. This is being done, Mr. Speaker, to harvest a mature renewable resource and it is carried out under very close supervision, under a management plan. All roads are individually authorized. The revenue from royalties does look after the administrative and management costs.

Mr. Sargent: Does the Minister have any comment on the league to save Algonquin park announced at the press conference this morning at the Royal York hotel?

Mr. Speaker: Order!

The member's question is not supplementary to his other questions. If he wishes he may put a question tomorrow.

Mr. Sargent: Are these people wrong in the statement that the department has 240-foot wide logging roads in this park, 1,400 miles in length?

Hon. Mr. Brunelle: Mr. Speaker, may I mention that, as I said earlier in my remarks, Algonquin park is one of the most scenic and one of the most important parks on the North American continent. We are at the present time carrying out a master plan. Months and months of study have been done on this master plan and it will be out sometime this fall.

We will have public hearings in the Algonquin park area and as you know, under the park zoning, we have recreational zones and primitive zones. We believe in the multiple use concepts and we are trying to look after the interests of all the people; those who are naturalists and those who derive a living. We believe that this can all be done under a provincial park plan, and I am sure that the hon. member, once he sees this plan this fall, he will agree that it is a really worthwhile plan.

Mr. Sargent: I have a question for the hon. Prime Minister in the absence of the Attorney General. Is the Premier prepared to investigate the three day's jail sentence given to a 16-year-old St. Catharines girl for the theft of an 89 cent package of eye shadow, as reported on the editorial page of the Globe and Mail this morning which says:

Mr. Speaker: Order, the question as submitted to the Speaker ended just there.

The member did not put the additional material in this morning so it will not go in at the moment.

Hon. Mr. Robarts: I have asked for a report on this incident.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peterborough.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Education and University Affairs. Can the Minister ensure the House that there will be sufficient places for well qualified applicants to Ontario universities this fall? The rejection of qualified applicants at the University of Toronto, St. George campus, is not indicative of an overall shortage of places?

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of University Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the House at the time of the estimates of the department, and I do again today, that from our estimates I can assure the members of the House that there will be sufficient student places at the provincially assisted universities of Ontario in 1968-69 for all qualified applicants. To clarify the situation at the U of T, it should be noted that recent reports on the enrolment situation at the St. George campus have been made on the basis of initial review of applications. The hon. member is perhaps more fully aware than some that there are on occasions multiple applications, and it is still early to determine just how many actual applicants will be at the University of Toronto.

When the students have made their basic choices and the situation becomes more settled, we shall have a clearer picture as to the number that can be enrolled at that particular location. In any case, on the basis of current evidence the university is hopeful that any student who meets the admission requirements at Toronto will be able to attend either Scarborough or Erindale Colleges if a place on the St. George campus is not available.

Mr. Pitman: If I might ask a supplementary question: Is it the policy of The Department of University Affairs to keep any type of tabulation of the number of places that now exist in the university? As the Minister knows, the qualified applicants are already enrolled in first year, unlike other years when the grade 13 exams did not come out till the middle of August, and I wonder if the university has any running tabulation for all the universities in Ontario, and where places are available.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure just how accurate or up to date the information is that we get basically from the universities. We get from them, shall we say, a running table that we keep on the number of applications, and those institutions that still have student places available. This is why I am in the position today to assure the House that there will be sufficient student places in some universities for qualified students in the 1968-1969 academic year.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Port Arthur has a question from July 4 of the Minister of Transport, and one from yesterday of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. R. H. Knight (Port Arthur): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that the question for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Haskett) was properly answered yesterday through questions asked by my colleague from Rainy River (Mr. T. P. Reid). I am satisfied with the answer that the Minister gave at that time.

I do have a question now for the hon. Minister of Labour: What special measures are taken by the Minister to improve the labour situation at the Lakehead, where some 4,000 workers are idle in the construction industry, and where 800 workers are on strike at Can-Car, and where labour unrest continues among 1,300 grain elevator operators and among the forest industrial workers in the area?

Hon. D. A. Bales (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the labour disputes cited by the hon. member will have to be settled at the bargaining table through realistic give and take by both sides. There are no emergency or special measures that can be taken by The Department of Labour beyond bringing the parties to the bargaining table at the appropriate time and giving them third party mediation assistance so that they can resolve their own difficulties.

It is neither possible nor desirable for the department to attempt to dictate settlements. What does and will bring about settlement is the willingness of the parties to compromise, aided by patient mediation work.

I might add that in reference to the construction matters, meetings are going on there at the present time with those trades that have not been settled and quite a number of those people who are out on strike have actually reached agreement in their particular trade. I might also add that the grain elevator workers are under federal labour jurisdiction and this is not a matter in which the Ontario Department of Labour is involved.

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. Minister accept a supplementary question?

In view of the apparent snowball effect that these labour disputes have, all coming to a head unfortunately at the same time, and in view of the great disturbance it is causing the people at the Lakehead, is there any hope at all that this Minister and this department can offer the people at the Lakehead? Could he say at this time when the department would be prepared to step into any of the disputes and whether it is involved in any of them at the present time, in any way?

Hon. Mr. Bales: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated that meetings were going on and we were deeply involved and have been for some time. We are doing all we can to appease the situation.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

THE SCHOOLS ADMINISTRATION ACT

Hon. W. G. Davis (Minister of Education and University Affairs) moves second reading of Bill 172, An Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

Mr. R. F. Nixon (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the amendments to The Schools Administration Act come before us year by year, usually late in the session as is the case this year. Quite often it is one of the last pieces of business we deal with before the session finally draws to a conclusion. As usual, the amendments this year are quite a grab bag of a number of matters of timely importance to the school system of Ontario.

I will not take the time of the House, Mr. Speaker, to read them all, but many of them are related to changes made necessary by Bill 44, which established the county units. But looking down the list I see that there are amendments that deal with school leaving age, teachers' board of reference, the fencing of school premises, the rights for the investment of funds by boards, employee insurance, the honorarium paid to trustees, moneys available for student board and lodging or supervisory offices, the abolition of the consultative committees, and so on.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, this bill as in the past, is a housekeeping bill which is designed to keep up to date the business of education in the province. It contains within its covers, the changes that are needed to keep education up to date, meaningful and operating in a modern and efficient way.

There is one glaring omission in the amendments that are before us. Since there is no specific principle other than the fact that within the covers of the bill we are expected, as members of the Legislature, to provide amendments which will keep the teaching profession, the trustees and the business of education up to date and I want to draw your attention briefly to this omission. I would begin by quoting from a statement by H. R. Wilson, president of the Ontario teachers' federation, in a memorandum to the members of the legislative assembly.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. As I understand the rules of this House, when we are dealing on second reading with matters of principle, unless there is a section in the bill which specifically refers to the matter that the hon. leader of the Opposition may wish to raise, then it is not relevant as it relates to second reading. I submit, with respect, Mr. Speaker, that to raise this particular issue on second reading is not within the rules of this House. It is not relevant. However, I do say this, Mr. Speaker, that I in no way wish to inhibit discussion, as I indicated to the member for Peterborough (Mr. Pitman), I believe, two days ago. If second reading were finalized today and the education committee were to meet tomorrow, then I would notify members of the OTF and the trustees council so that the full education committee and those who have an interest in the matter could be heard. If the hon. leader of the Opposition wishes to raise something, then I think at the education committee tomorrow morning, Mr. Speaker, would be the appropriate time to do so. I am more than prepared to see that this is done and I say with respect, as a matter of principle, that the matter being raised by the leader of the Opposition does not relate to a specific section within The Schools Administration Act, and as a result, cannot be considered on second reading here at this time.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if I might speak to the point of order. I would point out to you that it appears the Minister of Education is anticipating my remarks, although in this case he is correct in assuming that I am intending to speak about the transfer review board. But I would draw to your attention, sir, that the Minister himself has indicated that this is a matter that will be discussed by the committee and I feel it is important enough to draw to your attention briefly this afternoon.

I have tried in my opening remarks to indicate, sir, that I believe the principle of this bill is larger than simply the minutiae contained in the various sections—that it is the housekeeping bill for this particular Minister and the department. It comes before the House once a year, and there is a matter of importance and principle that would fairly, I believe, be discussed at this time.

Since the Minister has anticipated my remarks I can tell you, sir, that I do wish to discuss briefly the transfer review board and the Minister himself has said in the committee that this bill would be the vehicle for such a discussion—even though I suppose if the rules, as he interprets them, were to be applied it would not be in order in the committee either. He has protested, Mr. Speaker, that he does not want to cut off discussion. Surely I do not, and I trust that you do not, and I would ask, sir, that you permit me to continue with my remarks.

Mr. Speaker: It would appear to me that the leader of the Opposition wishes to discuss a matter of principle which is not a principle in the bill, having by arrangement or design or otherwise not been included in this bill. Therefore, strictly speaking it would be my opinion that it was not debatable on second reading but I know it is a matter of wide interest and I am only fearful that the remarks of the leader of the Opposition will spark a debate which will be entirely out of order.

In view of the Minister's statement that it will be considered in another place by the committee even though it is not in the bill at the moment, it would seem to me that the best method of dealing with it would be not to debate it here. But I am not persuaded that the matter of principle which is not in a bill is not a matter of principle that can be debated when the bill is being debated, if the members follow me.

Mr. Nixon: I do.

Mr. Speaker: Therefore, as the leader of the Opposition undertook to keep his remarks brief, I would declare that his remarks be in order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your ruling. I have made a commitment that I will be brief, and certainly I will fulfil that. But before continuing with my remarks I would like to draw to your attention, sir, that the hon. Minister's view that what would be out of order here would be in order at the committee tomorrow surely is an incompatible and peculiar view of the rules of the chamber. If you rule that I continue, I must assume that my remarks will be in order and I will endeavour to keep them brief.

At the moment of the hon. Minister's interjection by way of point of order, I was quoting from the statement made by H. R. Wilson, president of the Ontario teachers' federation in a memorandum to the hon. members of this chamber with regard to the provision of a transfer review board. I will read only one four-line paragraph from this particular part of his submission, Mr. Speaker.

> There is general agreement throughout the province among trustees, including members of the Ontario school trustees' council and school administrators, that the matter of transfer is the teacher's greatest concern with regard to the reorganization of school jurisdictions.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, certainly it is a matter of principle in the broad ambit that this bill should encompass.

There are many hon. members of the House who have served on boards of education and as trustees, and I am sure that they will be quick to agree with me when I would say that our trustees are capable. Most of them are now democratically elected, and with the proclamation and implementation of Bill 44, all will be democratically elected and be responsible to their own electorate. But it is the fear of the Ontario teachers' federation, and I would say a distinct possibility in reality by any objective view, that the boards of education may find in some areas that it is at least possible to undertake the transference of teachers in their employ to rather unattractive or perhaps outlying areas that are bounded by the new and enlarged jurisdictions in the county boards, and certainly in northern Ontario where the areas are very large indeed.

It is possible, as has happened in the past, that the boards, rather than taking a straightforward means of disciplining a teacher or even accomplishing dismissal, will order his transference to another location for teaching which would be tantamount, I suppose, in many cases to the teacher voluntarily withdrawing from employment. I am not saying that this would happen frequently. The Ontario teachers' federation has seen fit to put before the Minister, but not before the standing committee as yet, evidence that it has happened in the past in the township school areas.

No one believes that a competent board would do this, but surely any irresponsible action of this type would be a very serious matter indeed. But the very fear that it might happen and the experience that the Ontario teachers' federation has had in years gone by, has led them to recommend to the standing committee of education and to the Minister, that a transfer review board be implemented, and that it should be implemented by the bill that is presently before us.

The Minister has not seen fit to include this, although he has indicated at the standing committee on education that he may have some alternatives, perhaps involving looking at the situation and discussing it more fully, with the possibility of offering admendments in the future.

I believe that this is inadequate. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is necesary that such a review board be established now with the hope that it be used rarely, if at all. But it would be there for the use of any teacher under proper circumstances, so that any possibility of irresponsible action on either side would have an objective and fair remedy. This bill, of course, contains many changes of rather insignificant nature, and some are more important than others, which of course, we agree to in principle. But I believe sir, that the serious omission having to do with the transfer review board is one which we should consider in the Legislature at this time.

There is some question as to whether the matter can be acted upon in the committee itself, and I feel, since it is a matter of some continuing importance that my course of action is very clear, and that I should offer for the consideration of the House, Mr. Speaker, the following amendment to the motion, that the bill be now read a second time. My motion reads as follows:

That the words, "the bill be now read a second time" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "the bill be withdrawn and re-introduced by the Minister, containing a provision for a teacher transfer review board."

Mr. B. Newman (Windsor-Walkerville): Want me to second it?

Mr. Nixon: Yes. Seconded by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the Opposition moves, seconded by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, that the words in the motion for second reading of Bill 172, the words "the bill be now read a second time" be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "The bill be withdrawn and re-introduced by the Minister containing a provision for a teacher transfer review board".

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, just speaking to a point of order if I may, and I raised this with you before in hopes that we might avoid some precedent that might establish some difficulty for this House, Mr. Speaker, because I draw an analogy between the rules of the House and the rules of the committee. Perhaps it is not quite accurate, as I read the motion moved by the hon. member for Eglinton and seconded by the hon. member for York North that standing committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes, and I have no intention of reading all the purposes, but one is on education and university affairs:

> Which said committee shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to then by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon and so on.

I think, Mr. Speaker, on the wording of this motion which was carried by this House, it indicates very clearly that the function or the opportunities to go beyond a particular piece of legislation exists for the committees and this surely is a matter of principle. We should be very careful, Mr. Speaker, that we do not extend beyond the actual principle that is expressed in a particular piece of legislation and the education committee gives ample scope for consideration of this matter.

I am quite prepared to debate it here, Mr. Speaker. I just am very hopeful that we are not establishing a precedent that will not come back perhaps to cause us some difficulty in the future, because obviously the members in the NDP will have some observations to make and I, too, shall have something to say about the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition, because I do not think really that it is in order, and also I do not think it will resolve the problem that we face with respect to the transfer review board, but I shall reserve that when I speak to the motion.

This was a point of order, and I just bring it to your attention again, Mr. Speaker, whether this particular motion moved by the leader of the Opposition is in fact in order at this time.

Mr. W. G. Pitman (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could speak to this point of order as well. I share some of the reluctance of the Minister in regard to this particular method of reaching a decision on the transfer review board. First, I think it was only with the greatest reluctance that you, sir, agreed to a discussion of this matter in the House on this particular piece of legislation. To discuss the principle, I think, is a a very different thing than from actually placing before the House a measure which would deal with that particular principle which is not being debated as a part of this bill.

The second matter which bothers me about this particular amendment is the nature of the amendment itself. In actuality, I think the desire of both the Ontario teachers' federation, and other bodies are for teacher transfer review boards. I do not think a single teacher transfer review board for the province is a matter of discussion in any way whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Completely impractical!

Mr. Pitman: It would seem to me that this would indicate that there would be a single board which would be involved in determining transfers throughout the province.

Mr. Nixon: Is the hon. member now on a point of order?

Mr. Pitman: I am sorry, I shall return to this particular point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might give a little background on this matter. I placed an amendment before the committee on education and university affairs some months ago. It was an amendment to Bill 44 in which there would have been provision for a transfer review board.

At that time the Minister indicated that it would be more appropriate that an amendment be placed within The Schools Administration Act. On the suggestion, and after discussion, I, with the support of the member for Sudbury, withdrew that amendment from the committee on the basis that this bill would eventually reach the House. Now it has been the suggestion of the Minister, I think, this afternoon, that there will be an effective opportunity for further discussion and negotiation between the teachers and the trustees in the province of Ontario.

This legislation is coming before the House at a very difficult time when both trustees are unavailable and when teachers' representatives are apparently in Fredericton, New Brunswick, or in Europe. Thus it becomes impossible to bring before the committee as the Minister had hoped to do at this time, members of both the Ontario teachers' federation and the trustees, and I am suggesting Mr. Speaker, that the Minister might give assurance that this bill would be returned to this House either in the fall, if the fall session is to be a reality, or in early January or February—at least before next April when the whole matter will come to a head.

Now, at that time, perhaps there might be an opportunity to create an amendment which would allow appropriate action to be taken, and for a discussion to be in order in this House, and certainly for either an amendment for or against the transfer review board to be placed before this assembly.

It appears to me that as the situation stands at present, this is not an admissible form of amendment to this particular bill.

Mr. H. Peacock (Windsor West): On a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Davis: To the point of order again or not, I just did not—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Minister and the member for Windsor West would allow me now to have a comment, because I have had the opportunity, as the member will have noticed, of discussing the matter with the Clerk of the House who advises me that the precedents indicate that my doubts—when I said a principle which was not in the bill, but perhaps should be—was a proper subject for discussion on second reading, and I am advised by the Clerk, with appropriate authority, that that particular feeling and ruling of mine was incorrect and, therefore, the discussion is out of order, and the motion which was made by the leader of the Opposition is likewise out of order.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if I may rise, certainly in no way to debate your ruling, which I accept, but to ask for further information—because it would appear that if the second reading of the bill is accomplished this afternoon, and I hope that it would be, we would be presented with the bill for consideration at the committee tomorrow. As the hon. member for Peterborough has pointed out, the discussion will be somewhat impaired by the fact that those who are most concerned may not be able to be there, but if the rules of order are going to be applied as you apply them here, then we must assume that any amendments pertaining to the transfer review board or boards—of course, I would assume, just in passing, that if the House were to accept my amendment and if the bill were to be withdrawn by the Minister, he would bring it in with the transfer review board principle in an operable fashion—that no amendments would be offered at the committee that would be in order. Is that a correct reading of your ruling, sir?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the member for Windsor West wishes to speak.

Mr. Peacock: My comment on the point of order is this. The motion of the hon. leader of the Opposition is out of order itself, not in that his remarks preceding the motion were out of order as you have now ruled, but that according to May, on page 526, only two forms of amendments on second reading may be offered and the hon. leader of the Opposition's motion fell under neither of those heads.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Windsor West is quite correct because we had a similar one from the official Opposition some little time ago that I did not recognize because it was not in either of the two headings prescribed by parliamentary procedure, but it was dealt with properly and carried.

Mr. Nixon: Nevertheless it was in order.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, yes, it was in order—the other one was in order because it was quite different from this.

Mr. Nixon: I would like to just say, Mr. Speaker, surely it is not correct to say that this is out of order because of its form.

Mr. Speaker: I am not dealing with the matter of whether it is in or out of order according to its form.

Mr. Nixon: Yes, but that is what he said and you said he was quite correct and I do not agree with you.

Mr. Speaker: I think he is quite correct in that it was not in accordance with the two forms to which the hon. member is referring. Whether it is correct or not, by parliamentary rules it is not necessary to determine because so far as I can ascertain at the moment, and I think that the advice upon which I am resting this ruling is accurate, the matter was not in order at the beginning although it was my endeavour not to cut off discussion of a matter which I know is very important and of great interest to a great many people in our province.

Mr. A. B. R. Lawrence (Carleton East): Mr. Speaker, in the capacity of chairman of the committee on education and university affairs, I wonder if this might not be an appropriate time for me to ask for direction with regard to the question of whether or not a motion of this type would be in order before my committee itself. I know that the intention of the government as expressed by the Minister was accurately set out by the member for Peterborough, that this matter certainly be raised and discussed before the education committee, but I would be pleased, Mr. Speaker, if you could give me some direction as chairman of that committee as to whether this motion of the leader of the Opposition would be in order before my committee.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Minister would wish to speak—not to that particularly, but he was on his feet a moment ago.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, it may not be completely satisfactory just to indicate to the members of the House what I was going to indicate to the members of the committee tomorrow morning, that while we have all had representations from the Ontario teachers' federation—from the trustees' council—and from others who have responsibility in the educational structure in this province, these representations do not at this moment coincide.

There is a distinct difference of opinion, and I want to make it very clear, as I am going to tomorrow, that as far as the government is concerned we are not saying no to the principle of a transfer review board.

In light of the constructive criticisms by the leader of the Opposition, the member for Peterborough, the member for York South (Mr. MacDonald) during the debate on Bill 44, where there should be a continuing consultative process and—where you should try to bring these people together to resolve these problems, I am in the process of communicating both to the trustees' council and the Ontario teachers' federation that I shall make available from the department itself some officials who over the summer months and the early fall months will see if they cannot themselves reconcile this very important issue.

I share some of the views of the leader of the Opposition and yet I recognize, too, some of the problems that are expressed to me by the trustees' council. I think it would be very helpful indeed, Mr. Speaker, if there was a possibility that this matter be reconciled during the summer and early fall months. We can then deal with it, because from a very practical point of view the transfers themselves do not become operative until the fall of 1969.

Either in the fall, if there happens to be a fall session, or certainly in January or February, we could have an opportunity to consider this before it becomes a practical problem as it faces the boards when they meet their restructuring on January 1, 1969. The transfers would be indicated probably in April and May and they would not take effect until September of 1969, so that this Legislature would have an opportunity to discuss this matter in greater detail if some reconciliation is not brought about.

As I say, I have communicated this to the administrative secretary of the OTF, who at this moment, I believe, is in Fredericton. I have also communicated this to the executive secretary of the Ontario trustees' council and have told them that I anticipate they will be meeting over the next few weeks. I have said that we will make available officials from the department to see if there is any way from a practical standpoint that we can reconcile what is, I think, a problem that deserves the consideration of the members of this House. But in view of the fact that there is time—and I emphasize this—from the practical point of view to do this in a way that we involve all in the consultative process, as the hon. members opposite bring to my attention with great regularity, I would suggest that we adopt this procedure knowing that no one is going to be prejudiced in this intervening period of time.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peterborough.

Mr. Pitman: Point of order, Mr. Speaker; I would like to speak to this just for one moment. There is one thing that bothers me about this process as the Minister has placed it before the House. I think it is entirely appropriate that we in this House should attempt to have all the facts and should encourage the highest degree of co-operation and consultation which is possible. But I am wondering whether, when this bill is re-introduced and further amendments may come before this Legislature either in the fall or in the early months of 1969, we will be in the same situation as we are this afternoon.

I would be entirely unhappy to have to vote on a motion such as has been placed by the hon. leader of the Opposition in view of the fact that the transfer review board is not spelled out and there seems to be a great deal of confusion as to what exactly would ensue from the passage of this motion.

Is there going to be an opportunity for discussion in some detail and to be able to place before this Legislature a meaningful motion on this whole matter of a transfer review board when the legislation comes before the House either in the fall of 1968 or early 1969?

Hon. Mr. Davis: Just to speak to this one point without prejudging what your ruling may be, as I again read the member for Eglinton's motion, I would undertake now with the agreement of my Prime Minister that if this matter is not resolved and we wish to discuss this further, and if we face any technical problems, we would ask this House to instruct the committee on education to examine and enquire into the matters relating to the possibilities of a teacher transfer review board—or whatever terminology we may wish to use—very early in the session of 1969. In this way, without any technical problems, we can bring this matter to a point where we can constructively discuss it. I just make this suggestion.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, if I might speak to this point of order, I think that one of the problems that we may face in the committee tomorrow—unfortunately I will not be able to attend—will be the need for those who want to represent the requirement that this board be enacted at an early date, bearing in mind what the Minister has said, that the bill before us might possibly be amendable with regard to this board which does not appear in it by name. The chairman of the committee has asked for your advice on this. I am quite concerned about it myself and I hope that you will be able to indicate before we leave the matter just what your view is.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Waterloo North wishes the floor?

Mr. E. R. Good (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, is this subject completed? May I speak to the principle of the bill generally?

Mr. Speaker: No, we are still on transfer review board.

I would comment very briefly on the appeal from the chairman of the committee, the member for Carleton East, to say that so far as it would appear to me, the committees of the House are under the rules and constitution of this House and operate under the authority of the Chairman in accordance with those rules. It would certainly not be in order for Mr. Speaker to direct a Chairman how he could deal with matters in his committee.

If, when the committee meets, there are matters which cannot be properly dealt with or ascertained or about which the committee has any doubts, then I think it is quite proper for the committee to report to the House and at that time request assistance or guidance. But at the moment the actual situation has not arisen and judging from the remarks of the Minister it could be that it might not arise.

I would point out, of course, that while the committee may discuss many of these points in accordance with the terms of reference read by the Minister, it is my opinion, and in that I am supported by sound advice, that there could be no actual amendment to the bill in committee; that would have to be done by the House. But the committee at least could discuss it and embody in their report their views if they were different from those expressed by the bill.

Now, I am not sure whether or not that will be of any great assistance to the Chairman, but I am quite sure that he has the knowledge and the capability of dealing with this matter when it comes to the committee tomorrow. If the committee then wishes to refer to Mr. Speaker and the House, I will certainly endeavour to be prepared to deal with the problem then.

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, before leaving this point—and you can call it a new point of order if you will permit—there are two matters that I think are of application. Probably the best way to deal with this, since it is giving some difficulty under the rules, would be for a new bill to be presented by the Opposition, if it were not forthcoming from the government. But we must remember that we have been in session since February 14, the bill has just now been presented on Monday of this week, and it would make it inordinately difficult to prepare such a bill which would be perhaps better dealt with under the rules which you have suggested.

The second thing, before leaving this point, is that I think, sir, you might make it clear that in this House there are not two pro forma ways of amending the second reading of a bill. The hon. member for Windsor West has indicated that the amendment was out of order simply on the basis of its form rather than its content. You were good enough to indicate that just a few weeks ago, another amendment to second reading which did not come under either of those two basic forms, had been accepted by you. And just as the Minister of Education is anxious that we do not embark on a precedent at this time, I hope it can be made clear, sir, that in second reading we do permit in this House amendments of the nature that I have put before you, this one having been ruled out of order because of other reasons.

Mr. Speaker: I will be most pleased to make sure of my views and ruling with respect to that matter. Actually, I would say to the House in any event that it could make little difference, depending on how the House divided, because on the loss of any of these motions, the second reading of the bill is automatically passed. So that the end result is the same. But I would be very pleased if the leader would allow me to check into that and I will bring it up at a later date and clarify the situation with respect to that type of motion.

The member for Waterloo North now wishes to speak to the principle of the bill?

Mr. Good: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to a principle of this bill as it affects a certain group of people in the province of Ontario, and I speak of the Amish and Mennonite brethren who are seated in the Speaker's gallery. Their way of life has been such that under the former Schools Administration Act they have been permitted, through proper reasoning and within the scope of the Act, to have their children, who will be further educated in agriculture at their homes, to leave school at the age of 14. Under the provisions and principles of this amendment to the Act, this would no longer be possible. This I think is a matter that will affect their lives, their way of life, and their conscience, and I would ask that the members of this House, as they consider the principle of this bill, do so with this thought in mind.

These people have been engaged in agriculture all their lives; their children are engaged in agriculture. Under the provisions of this Schools Administration Act as it now stands, they have been permitted by this department not only to establish their own private schools for the education of their children, but to terminate their education where it is necessary for them to work at home and to further their agricultural education at the age of 14. The principle of this bill would destroy that and I would ask that between now and the time this bill goes to committee, the department and the hon. Minister give this serious consideration and thought between now and tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Peterborough has the floor.

Mr. Pitman: Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to place the views of this group in relation to the amendments which have been brought before the House under this Act to amend The Schools Administration Act.

It is very difficult to assess the principle of a bill, which is simply the amending of a number of aspects of existing legislation. I do not think it is a housekeeping amendment because I think there are some very definite issues involved in these amendments which have been brought forward and on which I would like to make at least a comment or two. As already has been indicated, there are areas where amendments might have been appropriate but have not received attention as yet.

I do not intend to continue the dissertation which went on in relation to the point of order, more than simply to say that our group has already indicated its concern about the need for a transfer review board and the regulation that there would be larger units of administration. There may very well be teachers who have bought homes and assumed responsibilities as much as 100 miles away from a school to which they might very well be transferred. At the same time, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would recognize that it would be entirely irresponsible and unlikely for a board to make appointments in that way.

What I think teachers are concerned about is that there may be an effort to use the stick of a transfer to a distant school as a means of disciplining a member of the profession or possibly of circumventing a board of reference by attempting to get rid of a recalcitrant faculty member. I think this is entirely inappropriate and I am sure the Minister recognizes the need to deal with this question as quickly as possible. And I am sure over the next few months there will be, I hope, fruitful conversations between both the teachers and the trustees.

If I might turn to perhaps other areas which I think are more relevant to the amendments which have been presented, I do think that the repealing of the provisions allowing students to leave at 14 either for employment or for work on the farm, recognizes, you might say, the new reality that Ontario is no longer a rural community where this is a needed stipulation; also I think it is recognized that education is more important and more relevant to a young person than any employment. In a way, though, I must say that we may very well be placing a redundant amendment before the House at this time, or at least it may be redundant within a few years, because I think that we are reaching the point where our educational system is becoming more free and permissive within, allowing students to take the courses they wish to take, with less concern over streaming, less concern over grades, a greater degree of freedom of selection, all these things. It seems incongruous that we should be hardening up the compulsory education to the age of 16 aspect of this legislation.

We may very well be coming into a society, Mr. Speaker, where young people will leave school at 13 or 14 and then return at 16 or 17. So we may very well recognize that education is not a process which starts at the age of five or below—if certain recommendations of the Hall-Dennis report are considered—to the age of 15 or 20, but is a process which goes on and on and on. We are fast moving towards a society where people will return to the educational system in their adolescent years, their adult years, and I would hope that we will soon reach the point where we recognize that the full support of people who are trying to educate themselves at any age is one which is acceptable to the philosophy of education in this province.

I think the repealing of this provision allowing students to leave at 14 recognizes the new educational opportunities which are available to every student, at least to the age of 16. There was a time when meaningful education ended for many students at the age of 14. I do not think that is true; I think we have moved, in the last few years, a long distance towards providing special schools and courses for students at the age of 14 who may not be academically oriented or motivated.

One of the aspects of the bill which I found rather exciting—and this has come up in the Legislature before a number of times—is the provision to allow for the joint use of the facilities between muncipalities and the department of education. There is a fantastic expenditure in school buildings and school facilities in all parts of Ontario. We have not yet really recognized the possibilities for the use of these plants, if you want to use the term—in the recreation and education-for-adults education—in many communities in the province. I think that this particular provision will make it much easier. I think that it will encourage school boards to make these kinds of arrangements with municipalities, which will allow for the use of these facilities month after month.

I find, for example, it is really incongruous that for the next two months many schools will be completely unused. Here they are, million-dollar buildings, with two and three gymnasiums. The swimming pools, of course, usually have been integrated into the recreation programmes of most municipalities, but there are rooms where one could study the arts, ballet and music, which are unused all summer long. For example, in my own community, one young man had started a boxing club and there simply was no space in that entire municipality, none whatsoever, where he could carry on the activity which was already begun and where there were young people already taking part and where he was keeping young people off the streets. Yet the facility was simply not available.

I would hope that we will not have the difficulties which the member from Sudbury explained to us in rather harrowing detail some months ago when he discussed the rising cost of use of facilities for political meetings and other meetings, and I would hope that this would encourage the constant use of facilities across this province. I will not belabour the Minister with the obvious needed acceptance of a higher degree of financing on the part of the province in providing the facilities, and for the support of these facilities.

The amendment which relates to the honorarium for trustees is particularly important and it recognizes the greater responsibilities of trustees and I hope that it recognizes the greater status of the trustees in the province. I think that what we have done here today is a recognition of these trustees and that their feelings should also be given a hearing in the halls of this building. I think that one of the problems which I have found in talking to school trustees, and this problem will become greater as these larger units create greater responsibility and more travel and more expense, is that those who should be taking part actually in the planning and development of the school system, are left out because of the very minimal honorarium which was forthcoming in the past.

I have noticed for example that the make-up of school boards tends very much to be that of lawyers, doctors and other professional people, business men, managerial personnel, and often a few clerics, but very rarely do we find enough people who are concerned about education and who have children in the school, who may be daily or hourly rated workers. I think that it is very difficult for an hourly rated worker to take this first step in the public life that is very often at the public school board level. He has to take a considerable loss in his yearly stipend. It is much easier for professional people who can work at odd hours to do so.

Very often, working on the school board demands meetings during the day. It often demands meetings with teachers and people who are really only available during the day, and I think that this is extremely difficult for those who cannot take part in that way. I think that in many cases it has been the children of those who are perhaps labourers, or those who are at the lower levels of our employment system, or those who are hourly rated workers whose children have in the past received less advantage from the school system.

I do not want to get into the next position, once again, of the Porter thesis which refers to the fact that those in the higher incomes receive a greater benefit from the school system for so many reasons, which are largely sociological. I certainly do not want to go over the statistics.

However, I do want to say that I do think a greater representation of people who are from the lower income level of employment and who have children in the schools, can recognize and are sensitive to those factors in the school system which make the educational experience, and I think it is fair to say this, less effective and less successful for children from these lower class homes, than for those from a more advantageous level.

I notice one other section which I thought was rather interesting, and I am not going to belabour each section, but this was the emphasis given to advisory committees. I was surprised in some ways that the Minister might not have taken this opportunity to enlarge the community participation in the educational system.

I know that he is aware of the fact that the Hall-Dennis report suggested that there should be advisory committees in each school. The idea was that they could be made up of teachers and parents, and I would suggest that there might very well be a place for students on the advisory committees. I think that it is in this bill that this kind of thinking should be reflected.

I see in this bill a considerable recognition of the need and expense involved in providing vocational committees for the mentally retarded, this aspect of the school system in the new bill that was before the House and the advisory educational committees. But I think that there is a great need—and this is particularly true with the larger units because I think that there is this great feeling that in some of the larger units there will be a feeling of disorientation and that people will feel that they do not have any control or feeling for what is going on in the schools—for amendments to come before the House to provide appropriations as there has been in other jurisdictions, to allow the Minister to encourage school boards to set up advisory committees within each school.

It is within that level that the community can play its greatest role in not just raising money to provide equipment and sweaters for the team, but to take a deep look at the curriculum, as it relates to the group of people in the community and the administrative procedures within the school and how they relate to the school philosophy. I think that these are the dealings which we find coming forth in the Hall-Dennis report which, I suspect, will be quoted in the future as often as the McRuer report has been over the past few months. I think that these are areas in which I am sure members will want to see come before this chamber very soon.

There are a number of other matters with which I will deal very briefly—the reimbursement of school children who must be given residence at the elementary school level. I know that the member for Sudbury East (Mr. Martel) had brought this matter before the Minister some weeks ago and the Minister said that he would be dealing with this matter, and I am sure that the members for the north particularly will be pleased to see that particular amendment in the bill.

There is another amendment which has particular significance and this is the greater opportunity to allow school boards to develop the natural science area. I am surprised that the leader of the Opposition did not jump on this one with particular enthusiasm, but I think that this is an important part of the legislation.

We in this chamber have talked about pollution at great length and we have almost polluted the chamber, but I think that, to a large extend, this is a matter of education and that if we are going to do something about pollution, it will not come entirely by a new thrust by The Departments of Health or Energy and Resources Management, but largely from the feeling of concern from the people of Ontario which will result from an education in priorities and the need for this as a major priority. Of course, these natural science centres will provide an opportunity for young people to go outside of the classroom and this surely again is an emphasis of the Hall-Dennis report.

I am particularly pleased to see the amendment of section 82, which deals with the supervisory offices. Now, the Minister and the members who were part of the educational committee listened with some concern to representations before the committee from those who were quite worried that we would set up within our school board administration, some two-headed monsters in which there would be a division of authority in which you might very well have a continuing consultation of either the business administrator, or whatever we wish to call him, and the educational officer or the chief educational officer on the one side.

Now I see reflected in section 82 the Minister's interest in seeing that there be a single line of command, at the same time recognizing that the secretary and treasurer, those who are concerned with the business aspects of the operation of the board—school system, will have an opportunity to place their views before a board.

But there simply must be one person who is essentially responsible for the educational system in each jurisdiction and this should be the chief educational officer and I see in section 82, a recognition of this aspect.

May I conclude by saying, Mr. Speaker, that there is a need to keep this legislation on the move. It is a piece of legislation that will continue to come before this House each year. We face a period of massive change and I think we must be concerned that we not allow inflexible modes of school administration to hold us back from these kind of changes. We face a period of widening community responsibility. Once again, we must not hold back on this increasing democratization of decision making in the area of education by a bill which has not been amended quickly enough.

We must keep our administrative procedures in line with our philosophy and with our aims and objectives in the educational field. We cannot divorce administration of education from education and from the aim and objectives of that philosophy of education.

Mr. J. R. Breithaupt (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I would rise to add a few brief comments to those made by the member for Waterloo North, my colleague in our part of Waterloo county. This is, of course, with respect to the proposal within this Act to repeal the provisions that allow certain pupils to leave school after attaining the age of 14.

I would call to the attention of the members of this House that the first portion in the interior of this province to be settled was that of the Waterloo county area. This was settled around the year 1800 by the ancestors of people who have worked hard in some of the best agricultural land in our province. Their approach to education has been one of wishing their children to have a basic education, one which will fit them into the carrying on of their rural livelihood. They live in exceptionally fine farms in areas that have been well maintained for almost 175 years.

I would ask that the members of the House reconsider their approach to the passage of this section which would repeal the right that these people have. I would suggest that they are probably the greatest number of people taking advantage of this provision, and that the members of this House should realize that a repeal of this provision, which is permissive and is used only by a small number of persons within the province, is one which would strike, as my colleague said, at the roots of this approach to life which these people have.

As members of the Mennonite faith, as persons who dress in a different fashion than many of us do and who prefer a plain way of life, they have over the past many years built their kind of rural communities, worshipped in their plain manner and have asked for very little from either the provincial or federal governments. They take care of their own. They live with a strong sense of community and with a strong interest in the benefit of their portion of Ontario.

I feel that, as no doubt there are other members involved in the areas of Perth and Oxford, into which Mennonite communities have developed, they too will take an interest in encouraging the House to allow this permissive section to remain in the Act. I think we can say that the persons who wish to take advantage of it will do so only for very strong personal reasons, reasons which in this case have a certain religious connotation to them. I feel that we should honour these reasons and that for those who wish to take advantage of them, we should be prepared to continue this permissive portion of the Act.

Mr. Speaker: Is there any other member wishing to speak to this bill before the Minister concludes the debate? The Minister has the floor.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, there is very little need to reply to much of what has been said. I imagine we will be discussing most of this tomorrow. In fact, after listening to the member for Peterborough I somehow feel it is a much better bill than even I thought it was when I introduced it here. I was really quite encouraged by his response.

I would only refer to the one section that has been mentioned by the members for Waterloo and for Kitchener. I recognize their interest as members in their constituents. I should point out, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House, really it was at the invitation of the Minister of Education that our friends are with us here in the gallery today. I asked them to come in—

Mr. Nixon: Suggested by the member for Waterloo North.

Hon. Mr. Davis: Not quite. No, this was a commitment which was given and they are here and they are going to appear before the education committee tomorrow morning. I recognize the problem and I certainly share the views expressed by the member for Kitchener as to the contribution these people have made to our communities. But, Mr.

Speaker, one must also recognize that the utilization or the use of this particular section has not been confined to Mennonite communities.

We are in a position where we are doing everything we can to encourage young people to stay within the school system for longer periods of time, and if the hon. member for Kitchener had been here some four years ago and listened to the then leader of the Liberal Party, the compulsory attendance age would have been 18, not 16, because this was the platform of the then leader of the Liberal Party and he emphasized this very enthusiastically one day in this House. I recall it very vividly because I asked him, "How do you force a student who has left high school, finished at the age of 18, to attend a post-secondary institution?"

Mr. Nixon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Hon. Mr. Davis: Well I just—all right I will not—I am just pointing out—

Mr. Nixon: Point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the Opposition has a point of order.

Mr. Nixon: His name has been mentioned but he is not here to speak for himself. I well recall that occasion and certainly I am sure that the Minister of Education agreed with the principle of the gentleman's remarks at that time, that we ought to offer continuing education to a more advanced degree than we were at that time. The Minister has really followed along on the suggestions that were made by the former leader.

Hon. Mr. Davis: I will take any worthwhile suggestion emanating from across the House, but I do recall very specifically, Mr. Speaker, there was reference to the compulsory attendance age raised to, I believe, certainly 17; I believe it was 18. However, that is not the point here on this occasion.

I just pointed out that it is not all that simple and it is not confined just to one group within this province. This is not factually the case, but I think that tomorrow morning at the education committee these gentlemen will have an opportunity to express their views to the committee, point out the problems, and they can be considered at that time.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to usefully add to discussion of the bill until we carry on with it tomorrow morning.

Motion agreed to; second reading of the bill.

Clerk of the House: The 14th order, House in committee of supply; Mr. A. E. Reuter in the chair.

ESTIMATES, DEPARTMENT OR FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS

On vote 703:

Mr. F. Young (Yorkview): Mr. Chairman, I have in my hand a form which was brought to me by a friend of mine who was applying for a fidelity bond. The form is that of the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, Baltimore, Maryland. In that form, my friend was very disturbed because of the questions in that form and the kind of things that he had to answer in order to get the bond. It does go through the usual intimate things that are asked in the general forms, but the thing to which he objected particularly were the final sentences. It says this:

> I also agree that in the event said company should cancel such bond, it shall be under no obligation to disclose its reasons therefor, the provisions of any law to the contrary being hereby expressly waived by me.

In other words what is being said there is that this form takes precedence over the law of, I suppose, the province of Ontario or the Dominion of Canada. Also it goes on to say this:

> Anyone is hereby authorized to furnish the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company any information concerning my character, habits, ability, and financial responsibility, and particularly the cause of the termination of my employment at any time, and I hereby release them from any liability for damages on account of furnishing such information.

My friend points out to me that the company concerned might ask a person who does not like him about these things and that person might give false information, might damage his character, and might blemish his reputation and make it very difficult for him in the future to get a job. Because of the signature of the applicant on this form, he has given away any liability or any chance whatsoever of recourse against the person who has damaged him.

He said this to me: "I cannot get this bond from this company unless I sign these statements, and if I do not sign then I do not get the job that I am applying for". It was a job for which he was well qualified and which he wanted. I would like to call this to the attention of the Minister and ask him the status of a form of this kind, whether or not these provisions which are in the form can be enforced and whether the applicant is bound by them in the province of Ontario. I could send the form across to the Minister if he wished.

I would like it returned, it is the only copy I have. I will make a photostat and make it available to the Minister later.

Hon. H. L. Rowntree (Minister of Financial and Commercial Affairs): Mr. Chairman, I have not looked at one of these forms but a fidelity bond is a contract between the underwriter, the insurer, and the applicant which is a negotiable contract between the two parties, and there is no law that I know of which forces anyone to sell or to issue a fidelity bond to everybody or anyone who might make application for it. There are a number of factors which go into this situation.

I would say that I do not think your statement is quite accurate when you say that the form and the questions involved overrule the laws of Ontario and of Canada. I think the law prevails in spite of the agreement which is entered into in the contract. I would be glad to look into this and to see the extent of the use of this type of form, and if you would like to send me the name of the person involved, we will deal with it as quickly as possible, having in mind your own statement that you thought he was highly qualified for the job and he was anxious to have it.

Mr. Young: Mr. Chairman, from what the Minister says I would gather that an applicant who signs this form can ignore those sentences which say that he is giving up his rights for the protection—

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: I did not say that at all. You know that I did not say that.

Mr. Young: Well then, the thing remains that if he signs this, he is waiving his rights even though the law says he has the rights.

Hon. Mr. Rowntree: You can waive your rights.

Mr. Chairman: The member for High Park.

Mr. M. Shulman (High Park): Mr. Chairman, we have discussed the world of auto insurance at some length and I would like to go into a different aspect of insurance, particularly the role of the superintendent of insurance. It was my belief, perhaps naively, up until fairly recently that the role of the superintendent of insurance was to protect the policy holder and to act, if necessary, on his behalf if he was unfairly treated by an insurance company.

Unfortunately, certain incidents have occurred which have made me question that belief and I would like to draw this to the attention of the House and, through you, sir, to the Minister, because I think it is essential that when we have perhaps two contesting parties, one of whom is a policy holder with very small resources, and the other is an insurance company with millions and perhaps billions of dollars of resources, that the policy holder has some level of government to which he can go as an advocate or an equalizer, or a place where he can get justice. Now I always believed this was the superintendent of insurance; perhaps it is not.

In addition, coincidentally with this subject I wish to discuss the subject of health insurance in this province and certain problems that have nothing to do with medicare. I wish to discuss the problems of health insurance as sold by private plans and certain abuses which have developed with that, which the superintendent of insurance has not seen fit to interfere with.

In order to do that I have a number of examples here, but I am going to give you only two examples because they spell out the problems so very well and so very typically. These two examples show how residents of this city purchased health insurance, thinking thus to protect themselves against loss of income due to illness and found that the insurance worked perfectly well so long as they remained healthy.

The cases involve different companies, but in both of these cases and in others, the superintendent of insurance was apprised of the facts and you may find some surprise in his reaction to those facts.

The first case is that of Czeslaw Kaczynsky. He lives at 1528 King Street West in Toronto, and on July 18, 1965, he was visited by a salesman from the Allstate Insurance Company who sold him Allstate income policy No. 81702625. On the cover of this policy it reads: "You are in good hands with Allstate". On the back it reads, "Our pledge to help you continue to be a good provider to your loved ones when accident or sickness strikes".

Inside the policy are the words, "Allstate will pay you the monthly sickness income benefit—$300—for each month of your total disability which results from sickness and commences while this coverage is in force". The premium was $96 a year.

Attached to the policy, but not a part of it, unfortunately, and so having no legal effect, is a letter signed by one Judson B. Branch, chairman of the board of Allstate, and reading:

"Dear friend of Allstate"—and I am leaving a bit out here—"with this protection, you have security in knowing it is guaranteed renewable to age 65. Only you can cancel regardless of any change in your health".

Let me stress, Mr. Chairman, that is a letter attached to the policy, it is not in the policy, it does not have a personal signature on it, it has a printed signature on it, therefore the Allstate company was subsequently able to say, "Well, that letter is not a part of the policy."

But to my mind, if the company has issued a letter like that, and I have the original here, Mr. Chairman, with a policy they should—if not a legal obligation, we seem to talk a lot about moral obligations here—but they should have a moral obligation to live up to that guarantee.

Well, Kaczinsky, perhaps naively, believed everything he read in this policy, including the letter attached. A few months after taking out the insurance he developed a nose infection which led to surgery. He was in hospital and he was off work for several weeks and the insurance company paid up—he collected $480. Apparently, the system is, with these policies, that you are allowed one illness. He then remained well for a year when he began to devolop stomach pains. On a visit to Europe he became much worse; he visited a doctor and was told that he had a stomach ulcer. Now, on October 14, 1966, that is somewhat over a year after he took out the policy, he notified Allstate of his illness and submitted a claim.

On February 27 and this is October 14, because the dates are important—the policy was taken in July 1965—he submitted the claim, and on February 27, 1967, he received a letter from Allstate. I have the original here and it is a classic of its type and I would like to read it. Insurance letters are classics and I am considering publishing this letter.

Mr. R. Haggerty (Welland South): You should write a book.

Mr. Shulman: That is a very good idea, and I will give you a royalty for that suggestion. The letter reads as follows, and I quote: February 27, 1967, on the letterhead of Allstate Insurance Company, 790 Bay Street, Toronto 2.

Dear Mr. Kaczinsky,

Your Allstate income policy was issued July 18, 1965, in reliance upon information provided by written application. A copy of this application is attached to your policy. Medical information in our possession shows that on October 30, 1963, you consulted Dr. Starkman. Question 7(a) on the application asks specifically: "to your best knowledge and belief have you consulted a doctor for any reason in the last five years?" In answer to the question you made no mention of this consultation, nor is there any reference to the condition for which medical treatment was sought elsewhere in the application.

Had accurate and complete information been made known on the application for insurance, our underwriters could not have issued the policy. For this and whatever reasons may exist, whether expressly stated or not, we are denying liability. We therefore elect to void the policy from its inception date. Since July 1965, you have paid premiums in the amount of $189.60. However, we have paid a claim amounting to $480.00. You, therefore, owe us the difference which is $290.40. We would appreciate it, therefore, if you would forward us your cheque for this amount along with your policy in the enclosed prepaid envelope.

Yours sincerely,
N. Brown,
Allstate Insurance Company.

Copy to Mr. Bob Parks, 790 Bay Street.

An hon. member: They spent the four cents!

Mr. Shulman: You are in good hands with Allstate! Here is a man who gets ill, and I am going to dissect this letter a little further as to the reasons why they cancelled, but let us for the moment accept everything in the letter as true, and, by heaven, it is not—but let us for the moment accept everything as true, and see what they have done.

They have carried a man along for close to two years; then he got ill and developed ulcers and was forced to go to hospital. They then say: We are predating our cancellation
