PREFACE TO THE EIGHTH EDITION.

IN issuing a new edition of his Dictionary the Author has, again, the pleasure to express his acknowledgments for the reception it has met with from the profession. The last two editions comprised about nine thousand subjects and terms not contained in the edition immediately preceding, many of which had been introduced into medical terminology in consequence of the progress of the science, and others had escaped him in the previous revisions.

That the author has not suffered his exertions to diminish, in the preparation of the present edition, is sufficiently manifested by the fact, that he has added about four thousand terms, which are not to be found in the last. These additions have necessarily required a great amount of labour, which has been cheerfully bestowed, however, in order that the work might be rendered still more worthy of the vast favour which it has experienced. It has been the anxious desire of the author to make it a satisfactory and desirable—if not indispensable—lexicon, in which the student may search without disappointment for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science; and the present very carefully revised, greatly enlarged, and accurately printed edition cannot fail to be more extensively useful, and to offer stronger claims to the attention of the practitioner and student, than any of its predecessors.

ROBLEY DUNGLISON.

PHILADELPHIA, 18 GIRARD STREET.

EXTRACT FROM THE PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints, made by the author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry,—especially of recent introduction,—in the medical dictionaries accessible to them. It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the author need but remark, that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The author's object has not been to make a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation, he has freely availed himself of the English, French, and German works of the same nature, and has endeavoured to add every subject and term of recent introduction, which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil, which every compiler of a dictionary must endure, is taken into consideration; a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER:

"Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux,
S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde."

EXPLANATION.

IF the simple synonymy of any term be needed, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient; but if farther information be desired, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For example, the French word Tronc is said to be synonymous with Trunk. This may be sufficient for the inquirer: should it not, the requisite information may be found by turning to Trunk.

ABERRATION, Aberratio, from aberrare, (ab and errare), 'to stray,' 'to wander from.' This word has several meanings.

1. The passage of a fluid of the living body into an order of vessels not destined for it. In this sense it is synonymous with the Error Loci of Boerhaave.

2. The flow of a fluid towards an organ different from that to which it is ordinarily directed; as in cases of vicarious hemorrhage. Aberrations of sense or judgment are certain errors in the perceptions, or certain derangements of the intellectual faculties.

The word is used in optics to designate the dispersion of the rays of light in passing through a lens.

ABERRATION, CHROMATIC, Aberration of Refractivity.

ABERRATION OF REFRACTIBILITY, Chromatic aberration, exists, when, as in a common lens, the rays that pass near the circumference of the lens are decomposed, so that a coloured image is observed. This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

ABERRATION, SPHERICAL, Aberration of sphericity.

ABERRATION OF SPHERICITY or spherical aberration takes place, when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus.

This aberration of sphericity in the human eye is corrected by the iris.

ABSORPTION, Resorptio, Inhalatio, Imbibitio, Absorptio, Anar'rophê, Anarrophe'sis, Catapno'sis, Rhoêbde'sis, Catarrhophê'sis, Catarrhophê; same etymon. The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function. 1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains from without the organs the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced by the exhalants.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cutaneous—resorptio cutanea seu cutis, inhalatio cutis,—intestinal or digestive, and pulmonary or respiratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molecular or interstitial, nutritive, organic, or decomposing, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of recremental secreted fluids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely, if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the recremental fluids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

Absorption does not effect the decomposition of the body immediately. It merely prepares the fluid which has to be eliminated by the secretory organs.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyloferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyloferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, must pass through the chyloferous vessels and thoracic duct.

Concentrated acetic acid, prepared by decomposing an acetate and receiving the acetic acid by distillation, has a very pungent and grateful odour, and an acid and acrid taste. Its s. g. is about 1.046, and it is very volatile.

It is stimulant, rubefacient, and escharotic, and is applied to the nostrils in syncope, asphyxia, headache, &c. It destroys warts.

An Aromatic Spirit of Vinegar, Ac'idum Acet'icum Camphora'tum, A. aceto'sum camphora'tum, is formed of this strong acid, $\frac{3}{5}$ vj, Camphor, $\frac{3}{5}$ ss, Ol. Caryoph. gtt. xv.

A strong Acetic Acid was ordered by the London pharmacopœia prepared from wood. It was called Vinegar of wood, Improved distilled Vinegar, Pyrolyg'neous Acid, Acet'um Ligno'rum, and its strength was such, that 87 gr. of crystallized subcarbonate of soda should saturate 100 grains of the acid.

A limpid, colourless liquid, having a peculiarly penetrating and slightly empyreumatic odour. Its density in the liquid state, is almost the same as that of alcohol, 0.7921. Its taste is disagreeable, and analogous to that of peppermint. It is miscible in all proportions with water, alcohol, and ether. It may be prepared by distilling a mixture of two parts of crystallized acetate of lead and one part of quicklime in a salt-glaze jar (gray-beard,) the lower part of the jar being coated with fire-clay; and a bent glass tube, half an inch in diameter, adapted to the mouth by a cork, so as to form a distillatory apparatus. The jar is supported on the mouth of a small furnace, by which the lower part only is heated to redness, and the vapours are conducted into a Liebig's condenser. The product is repeatedly redistilled from quicklime, until its boiling point is constant at 132°.

It has been brought forward as a remedy in phthisis pulmonalis; but evidently with unfounded pretensions. It is an excitant, and may be serviceable in chronic bronchitis. The dose is ten to forty drops three times a day, diluted with water.

Willan and Bateman have adopted the term in their Nosology of cutaneous diseases, and placed it in the Order, TUBERCULA. Acne, with them, is an eruption of distinct, hard, inflamed tubercles, sometimes continuing for a considerable length of time, and sometimes suppurating slowly and partially. They usually appear on the forehead, temples and chin, and are common to both sexes; but the most severe forms are seen in young men. (F.) Blafard, Nègre-blanc. A spanish word applied to individuals of the human race who have the skin and hair white; the iris very pale, bordering on red; and the eyes so sensible, that they cannot bear the light of day. This condition, which has been called Leuce'athio'pia, Alphi'ois Æthio'pica, Albin'ois'mus, Albinis'mus, Al'binism, Leucopath'a, is seen more frequently in the Negro. Both sexes are exposed to it. It does not seem to be true, that there are tribes of Albinos in the interior of Africa.

A strong, fibrous, and resisting membrane, which immediately envelopes the testicle, and has, at its upper part, an enlargement, called corpus Highmorium. The albugineous fibre is linear, cylindrical, tenacious, elastic, but little extensible, and of a shining, satiny appearance. It forms fasciæ or fasciuli, which constitute the tendons, articular ligaments, and aponeuroses; hence the name Albugineous membranes, given by Chaussier to the fibrous membranes.

Gauthier considered, that the rete mucosum consists of four layers, to two of which he gives the names membra'na albugin'ea profun'da and membra'na albugin'ea superficia'lis, respectively.

There is not much difference in chemical composition between animal and vegetable albumen, fibrin and casein: fibrin alone appears, however, to be possessed of plastic properties. Also, the white of the eye. See Sclerotic.

The alkalis are substances soluble in water, possessing generally a urinous, acrid, and caustic taste, turning the syrup of violets green, and restoring to blue infusion of litmus, which has been reddened by acids; reddening the yellow of turmeric, and having the greatest tendency to unite with acids, whose character they modify, and form salts with them. In medicine we understand by this term Potassa, Soda, or Ammonia.

This word was formerly synonymous with Chymistry; but, from the 7th century, it has been applied to the mysterious art of endeavouring to discover a universal remedy, and a mode of transmuting the baser metals into gold: an operation to which they gave the name Opus magnum, and Philosopher's stone.

Alchymy has also been called Scientia vel Philosophia Hermetica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor.

Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquor, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colourless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixirs, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c.

(F.) Aliment, Nourriture, from alere, 'to nourish.' Food. Any substance which, if introduced into the system, is capable of nourishing it and repairing its losses.

The study of aliments forms one of the most important branches of hygiene. They are confined to the organized kingdom,—the mineral affording none.

As regards the immediate principles which predominate in their composition, they have been classed, but imperfectly, as follows:—

TABLE OF ALIMENTS.

1. Feculaceous.	{ Wheat, barley, oats, rye, rice, Indian corn, potato, sago, peas, beans, &c.
2. Mucilaginous.	{ Carrot, salsify, beet, turnip, asparagus, cabbage, lettuce, artichoke, melon, &c.
3. Saccharine.	{ Sugar, fig, date, raisin, apricot, &c.
4. Acidulous.	{ Orange, currant, gooseberry, cherry, peach, strawberry, raspberry, mulberry, prune, pear, apple, sorrel, &c.
5. Oleaginous and Fatty.	{ Cocoa, olive, sweet almond, nut, walnut, animal fat, oil, butter, &c.
6. Caceous.	{ Different kinds of milk, cheese.
7. Gelatinous.	{ Tendon, aponeurosis, true skin, cellular texture; very young animals.
8. Albuminous.	{ Brain, nerve, eggs, &c.
9. Fibrinous.	{ Flesh and blood.

Dr. Prout has four great classes—the aqueous, saccharine, oleaginous, and albuminous:—Dr. Pereira twelve;—the aqueous, mucilaginous or gummy, saccharine, amylaceous, ligneous, pectinaceous, acidulous, alcoholic, oily or fatty, proteinaceous, gelatinous, and saline.

Liebig divides them into two classes:—the NITROGENIZED or PLASTIC ELEMENTS OF NUTRITION, in which he comprises vegetable fibrin, vegetable albumen, vegetable casein, flesh and blood; and the NON-NITROGENIZED ELEMENTS OF RESPIRATION, in which he comprises, fat, starch, gum, cane sugar, grape sugar, sugar of milk, pectin, ba'sdrin, wine, beer and spirits. The former alone, in his view, are inservient to the nutrition of organized tissue: the latter are burnt in respiration, and furnish heat.

The following simple arrangement is, perhaps, as little objectionable as any:

|--------------------------------------|--|
| 1. Nitrogenized Aliments. | { Fibrinous (Glutinous?)
Albuminous.
Caseinous.
Amylaceous.
Saccharine.
Oleaginous. |
| (Albuminous , of Prout.) | |
| 2. Non-nitrogenized Aliments. | |

The second division might be still farther simplified, inasmuch as amylaceous aliments are convertible into sugar during the digestive process; and, from both, oleaginous matter may be formed.

It is very apparent in quadrupeds, but not in the human species. As the allantois is developed, its walls become very vascular, and contain the ramifications of what become the umbilical artery and vein, which, by the elongation of the allantois, are brought through the villi of the chorion, into indirect communication with the vessels of the mother.

The patient lying on his mattress, the surgeon passes the linen belts beneath his body, attaching them to the hooks on the ends of the straps, and adjusting the whole at the proper distance and length, so as to balance the body exactly, and then raises it from the mattress by turning the handle of the windlass. ANATOMY, Anat'omē, Anatom'ia, Prosectio, from ava, and τεμνω, 'to cut,' (F.) Anatomic. The word Anatomy properly signifies dissection; but it has been appropriated to the study and knowledge of the number, shape, situation, structure, and connexion,—in a word, of all the apparent properties of organized bodies. Anatomy is the science of organization. Some have given the term a still more extended acceptation, applying it to every mechanical decomposition, even of inorganic bodies. Thus, Crystallography has been termed the Anatomy of crystallized minerals. Anatomy has also been called Morphol'ogy, Somatol'ogy, Somatol'omy, Organol'ogy, &c. It assumes different names according as the study is confined to one organized being, or to a species or class of beings. Thus, Androl'omy, or Anthropol'omy, or Anthropog'raphy, or Anthroposomatol'ogy, is the Anatomy of man:—Zootomy, that of the other species of the animal kingdom: and Veterinary Anat'omy is the anatomy of domestic animals: but when the word is used abstractly, it means human Anatomy, and particularly the study of the organs in a physiological or healthy state. Physiological Anatomy is occasionally used to signify the kind of anatomy which investigates structure with a special view to function. The Anatomy of the diseased human body is called Patholog'ical or Morbid Anatomy, and when applied to Medical Jurisprudence, Forensic Anatomy. Several of the organs possessing a similarity of structure, and being formed of the same tissues, they have been grouped into Systems or Genera of Organs; and the study of, or acquaintance with, such systems, has been called General Anat'omy, Histol'ogy, or Morphol'omy, whilst the study of each organ in particular has been termed Descriptive Anatomy. Histology is, however, more frequently applied to the Anatomy of the Tissues, which is called, also, Textural and Microscopic Anatomy. Descriptive Anatomy has been divided into Skeletol'ogy which comprises Osteol' ogy, and Syndesmology; and into Sarcology, which is subdivided into Myology, Neurology, Angiology, Adenology, Splanchnology, and Dermology. Surgical Anatomy, Medico-Chirurgical Anatomy, Topographical Anatomy, Regional Anat'omy, (F.) Anatomie Chirurgicale, A. des Régions, is the particular and relative study of the bones, muscles, nerves, vessels, &c., with which it is indispensable to be acquainted before performing operations. Comparative Anat'omy is the comparative study of each organ, with a view to an acquaintance with the modifications of its structure in different animals or in the different classes of animals. Transcendent' or Philosophical Anatomy inquires into the mode, plan, or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed; and Artificial Anat'omy is the art of modelling and representing in wax or other substance, the different organs or different parts of the human body, in the sound or diseased state. Phytology is the anatomy of vegetables, and Pictorial Anatomy, anatomy artistically illustrated.

ANEURISM, Aneurys'ma, Aneurys'mus, Aneuris'ma, Oedma, from ανευρυνειν, 'to dilate or distend.' Dilatatio Arteria'rum, Ectasia, Embo-ry's'ma, Exangi'a aneuris'ma, Artericury's'ma, Arterecury's'ma, Hæmatoccl'è arterio's'a, Absces'sus spirituo'sus, Arteric'e'tasis, (F.) Anévrysmé, Aneurisme. Properly, Aneurism signifies a tumour, produced by the dilatation of an artery; but it has been extended to various lesions of arteries, as well as to dilations of the heart.

There are various kinds of aneurism. The following are the chief.

I. When the blood, which forms the tumour, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the TRUE ANEURISM, Aneurys'ma verum, Hernia Arteria'rum, (F.) Anévrysmé vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called SPURIOUS or FALSE ANEURISM, Aneuris'ma spurium, Ruptu'ra Arteria'ria, Arteriorrhex'is, Arteriodial'ysis, Echymo'ma arterio'sum, (F.) Anévrysmé faux. The latter is divided into three varieties.

1. Diffused False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysmé faux, primitif, diffus, nonencapsulé ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the areolar texture of the part.

2. Circumscribed False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysmé faux, consécutif, circoscrit ou par épanchement, enkysté ou saciforme, tumour hémorrhagiale circoscrite, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighbouring areolar membrane.

3. Aneurism by Anastomosis, or Varicose Aneurism, Phlebarteriodial'ysis, Aneurys'ma venoso-arterio'sum, A. varicosum, (F.) Anévrysmé par anastomose ou variqueux, A. par érosion, A. de Pott, A. des plus petites artères, which arises from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and vein;—the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it.

III. MIXED ANEURISM, (F.) Anévrysmé mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other. Some authors have made two varieties of this.

1. Mixed external Aneurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the areolar is dilated.

2. Mixed internal Aneurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurys'ma Hernianiam Arteria'ria sistens.

Aneurisms have been likewise termed traumatic and spontaneous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. They have also been divided into internal and external.

The internal aneurisms are situate in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment.

The external aneurisms are situate at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by a debilitating treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated blood-letting, with food enough merely to support life. In external aneurism, the artery can be obliterated. This is usually done by applying a ligature above the aneurismal tumour.

ANEURISM, DISSECTING, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the laminae of the middle coat, between which the blood forms itself a channel.

ANEURISMS OF THE HEART, Cardion'chi, Cardiurys'ma, (F.) Anéurysmes du cœur, have been divided into active and passive. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart, better indicates their character. Passive uncurism, Cardiéc'tasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilatation of the heart are the following:—The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Partial or true aneurism of the heart—Cardiéc'tasis partia'lis, Aneurys'ma consecuti'vum cordis, is sometimes seen,—rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

It is an affection of great danger, and is often connected with ossification, or other morbid condition of the heart. It appears to be neuropathic, and has been termed Neuralgia of the Heart. Some, however, employ this last term for an acutely painful intermittent affection of the heart, which seems to differ from angina pectoris more in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

ANGIOTOMY, Angeiotomy.

ANGLE, An'gulus, from αγκυλος, 'a hook.' The space between two lines which meet in a point.

ANGLE, FA'CIAL, pointed out by Camper, is formed by the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth—the facial line—and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; whilst intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses:—so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

FACIAL ANGLES.

ANGLE, OCCIPITAL, OF DAUBENTON, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

ANGLE, OPTIC, (F.) Angle optique, is the angle formed by two lines, which shave the extremities of an object, and meet at the centre of the pupil.

The Anima of Stahl, An'ima Stahlia'na, was a fancied intelligent principle, which he supposed to preside over the phenomena of life,—like the Archæus of Van Helmont.

Under the term Anima mundi, the ancient philosophers meant a universal Spirit, which they supposed spread over every part of the universe.

The precise seat of the mind in the brain has given rise to many speculations. The point is unsettled.

With the ancient chemists, Anima meant the active principle of a drug separated by some chemical management.

In other respects it is often a matter of difficulty to determine what is an animal characteristic. The study of animals is called Zoö'ogy.

AN'IMAL, (adjective,) Animalis. That which concerns, or belongs to, an animal.

ANIMAL HEAT, Calor animalis, C. nativus, Cal'idum animal'e, C. imma'tum, Biolych'nion, Flam'mula vita'lis, Therma em'phytum, Thermum em'phytum, Ignis animal'is seu natura'lis seu vita'lis, (F.) Chaleur animale, is the caloric constantly formed by the body of a living animal, by virtue of which it preserves nearly the same temperature, whatever may be that of the medium in which it is placed. This formation seems to take place over the whole of the body, and to be connected with the action of nutrition.

The following are the natural temperatures of certain animals; that of man being 98° or 100°.

It is attached, externally, to the trapezium and scaphoides; and internally to the os pisiforme and process of the unciniforme. It keeps the tendons of the flexor muscles, median nerve, &c., applied against the carpus.

The posterior ligament is situate transversely behind the joint of the hand, and covers the sheaths of the tendons, which pass to the back of the hand. Its fibres are white and shining, and are attached, externally, to the inferior and ANTHRAKOK'ALI, Lithanthrakok'ali, from avθpαξ, 'coal,' and kali, 'potassa.' An article introduced as a remedy in cutaneous diseases. It is formed by dissolving carbonate of potassa in 10 or 12 parts of boiling water: and adding as much slacked lime as will separate the potassa. The filtered liquor is placed on the fire in an iron vessel, and suffered to evaporate, until neither froth nor effervescence occurs, and the liquid presents a smooth surface like oil. To this, levigated coal is added in the proportion of 160 grammes to 192 grammes of potassa. The mixture is stirred, and removed from the fire, and the stirring is continued, until a black homogeneous powder results. A sulphuretted anthrakokali is made by mixing accurately 16 grammes of sulphur with the coal, and dissolving the mixture in the potassa as directed above. The dose of the simple and sulphuretted preparations is about two grains three times a day.

In the latter case it is called Anthraxion, Vesicula gangrænosus, Anthracophlyctis, Pustula maligne; Bouton d'Alep, Feu Persique, (Persian fire), Malvat, Bouton malin, Puce maligne, and is characterized at the outset by a vesication or bleb filled with a sero-sanguinolent fluid, under which a small induration is formed, surrounded by an areolar inflammation, which becomes gangrenous. It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuvia of the bodies of such as had died of the disease, but it is now known to arise primarily in the human subject. This form of carbuncle has received different names, many of them from the places where it has prevailed;—Carbunculus contagiosus seu Gallicus seu Hungaricus seu Polonicus seu Septentrionalis, Morbus pustulosus Finnicus, Pustula gangrænosus seu Livida Esthoniae, Pemphigus Hungaricus.

Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c. &c. It generally consists in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood: hence the terms Hæmenceph'alus, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hémato'encephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. The general prognosis is unfavourable; especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplexia sanguinea, Cataph'ora coma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplex'ia serosa, A. pituitosa, Serous Apoplexy, Cataph'ora hydroceph'alica, Encephaloch'ysis senilis, Hydroceph'alus acutus senum, Hydro'encephalorrhéc, (Piorry), Hydropisie cérébrale suraiguë, Hydro'rhagie.

ARACHNOID OF THE EYE. The lining membrane of a cavity, supposed by some to exist between the sclerotic and choroid.

ARACH'NOID MEMBRANE, Meninx Me'dia, Arachnoid'cus, Arachno'des, from αράχνη, 'a cobweb,' and αἶος, 'form, resemblance'; Tu'nica ara'nea, Arachno'des, T. crystall'ina, Menin'gion. A name given to several membranes, which, by their extreme thinness, resemble spider-webs.—Celsus and Galen called thus the membrane of the vitreous humour,—the tunica hyaloidea. The moderns use it now for one of the membranes of the brain, situate between the dura mater and pia mater. It is a serous membrane, and composed of two layers; the external being confounded, in the greater part of its extent, with the dura mater, and, like it, lining the interior of the cranium and spinal canal; the other being extended over the brain, from which it is separated by the pia mater, without passing into the sinuosities between the convolutions, and penetrating into the interior of the brain by an opening at its posterior part under the corpus callosum. It forms a part of the investing sheath of the nerves, as they pass from the encephalic cavities. Its chief uses seem to be;—to envelop, and, in some measure, protect the brain, and to secrete a fluid for the purpose of keeping it in a state best adapted for the proper performance of its functions.

ARACHNOIDITIS, Arachnitis.

ARACK', Arrack; (East Indian.) A spirituous liquor made in India in various ways, often from rice, sometimes from sugar fermented along with the juice of the cocoa nut; frequently from toddy, the juice which flows from the cocoa-nut tree by incision, and from other substances. The posterior arch has its origin, likewise, from the side of the uvula, and passes downwards to be inserted into the side of the pharynx. ARCHE'US, Arche'us, from αρχη, 'commencement,' (F.) Archée. A word invented by Basil Valentine, and afterwards adopted by Paracelsus and Van Helmont. The latter used it for the internal principle of our motions and actions. This archæus, according to Van Helmont, is an immaterial principle, existing in the seed prior to fecundation, and presiding over the development of the body, and over all organic phenomena. Besides this chief archæus, whose seat Van Helmont placed in the upper orifice of the stomach, he admitted several of a subordinate character, which had to execute its orders; one, for instance, in each organ, to preside over its functions; each of them being subject to anger, caprice, terror, and every human failing.

ARCHIATER, Archiat'rus, Protomed'icus, Protia'tros, from αρχη, 'authority,' and ιατρος, 'physician.' The original signification of this word is a matter of dispute. Some consider, with Mercurialis, that it meant physician to a prince, king, emperor, &c.: others, with C. Hoffman, apply it to every physician who, by his situation, is raised above his colleagues. The former opinion seems to have prevailed, — Archiatre des Rois de France being applied to the chief physician to the kings of France.

AREOMETER, Aræom'eter, Gravim'eter, Alcôbom'eter, Aræostat'ic Balance, from araios, 'light,' and μετρον, 'measure;' i. e. 'measure of lightness.' An instrument, so called, because first employed to take the specific gravity of fluids lighter than water. The Areometer of Baumé, which is the most used in Pharmacy, particularly in France, consists of a tube of glass, largely expanded towards its inferior extremity, and terminating, below, by a small ball, containing mercury or lead, which serves it as a balance, so that it may remain upright in the fluid. This tube is furnished with a graduated scale. If the fluid into which the Areometer is plunged be heavier than water, the instrument rises: if lighter, it sinks. There are various Areometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Areometer is also called Hydrom'eter, (F.) Aréomètre, Pèse-liqueur.

There are some hydrometers which have a general application for determining the specific gravities of liquids,—as Fahrenheit's, Nicholson's, Guyton de Morveau's, and the common glass hydrometers, including Baumé's, Cartier's, Twaddle's, Zanetti's, and the specific gravity beads; others intended for special application,—as for estimating the comparative strength of spirits; the comparative densities of syrups, oils, &c.,—as Guy Lussac's, Sikes's and Dicit's hydrometers, and the saccharometer, urinometer, and elærometer.

ARGEN'TI NITRAS, Argentum Nitra'tum, Sal argenti, Argentum Nitricum, (F.) Nitrate d'Argent, Azotate d'Argent, Nitrate of Silver. This preparation is sometimes kept in crystals, the Nitras Argenti in crystallis concretus, Nitrate d'Argent crystallisé of the Codex of Paris, Luna potabilis, Crystalli Lunæ, Argentum nitricum crystalliatum, Nitras argenti crystallinus, Nitrum luna'rē, Hydragogum Box'LEL. Generally, however, it is in the fused state: and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Nitras Argenti, is called Nitras argenti fusus, Caus'ticum luna'rē, Lapis infernalis, Argentum nitricum fusum, and lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale.

In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Take of silver, in small pieces, ℥j.; nitric acid, ℥ʒviij.; distilled water, ℥ʒij. Mix the acid with the water, and dissolve the silver in the mixture in a sand bath; then crystallize, or gradually increase the heat, so that the resulting salt may be dried. Melt this in a crucible over a gentle fire, and continue the heat until ebullition ceases; then immediately pour it into suitable moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic, and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.; locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1-8 to gr. 1-4 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate colour of the surface, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

ARGENTI OXIDUM, see Argentum.

ARGENTILLA VULGARIS, Potentilla anserina.

ARGENTINE, Argento'sus, same etymon as the next. Pertaining to silver; as an 'argentine solution,' or solution of a salt of silver.

ARGENTINE, Potentilla anserina.

ARGENTUM, Ar'gyrus, from argos, 'white,' Silver, Luna, Dia'na, (F.) Argent. A solid metal of a shining white appearance; insipid; inodorous; highly sonorous; malleable and ductile; somewhat hard; crystallizable in triangular pyramids; fusible a little above a red heat, and volatilizable; s. g. 10.4. Not used in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. SILVER LEAF, Argentum foliatum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose.

ARGENTUM DIVI'SUM, metallie silver, in very fine powder, has been recommended internally in syphilis.

The CHLORIDE (Argen'ti chlor'idum, Argentum muriat'icum, A. chlora'tum, A. sali'tum, Chlorure'tum Argenti, Chlor'uret or Mu'riate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent) the CYANURET; the IODIDE (Argen'ti Iod'idum, Argentum Ioda'tum, Iodure'tum Argenti, Iod'uret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent); the OXIDE (Argen'ti ox'idum, Argentum oxyda'tum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent, and the CHLORIDE OF AMMONIA and SILVER (Argen'ti et Ammo'niæ chlor'idum, Argentum muriat'icum ammonia'tum, Chlorure'tum Argenti et Ammo'niæ, Chlor'uret of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque, have been used in syphilis. At first, these different preparations were administered intraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide and the iodide in the dose of 1-12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1-14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver and divided silver in the dose of 1-8th and 1-4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1-10th, and of the iodide to 1-8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver—used internally as well as intraleptically—as antisypilitics, but they are not to be depended upon.

The Cyanuret or Cyanide of Silver, Argen'ti Cyanure'tum, A. Cyan'idum, Argentum cyanogena'tum, (F.) Cyanure d'argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Ph. U. S. (1842.) Argent. Nit. ʒxx. Acid Hydrocyan., Aq. destillat. ʒʒij. Having dissolved the nitrate of silver in the water, add the hydrocyanic acid, and mix them.

Wash the precipitate with distilled water and dry it. In the last edition of the Pharmacopœia, (1851.) it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Nitrate of Silver, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated glass receiver; Peroxyanuret of Potassium, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated retort, previously adapted to the receiver. Dilute Sulphuric Acid is added to the solution in the retort; and, by means of a sand-bath and a moderate heat, distillation is carried on until the liquid that passes over no longer produces a precipitate in the receiver. The precipitate is then washed with distilled water, and dried.

The Oxide of Silver, Argenti Oxidum, has been introduced into the last edition of the Ph. U. S. (1851.) It is made by precipitating a solution of the Nitrate of Silver by solution of Potassa, drying the precipitate.

A compound, which has been proposed as more efficacious than either the iodide of arsenic or the iodide of mercury. It is made by triturating 6.03 grains of metallic arsenic; 14.82 grains of mercury; 49 of iodine, with a fluidrachm of alcohol, until the mass has become dry, and from being deep brown has become pale red. Eight ounces of distilled water are poured on, and, after trituration for a few moments, the whole is transferred to a flask; half a drachm of hydriodic acid, prepared by the acidification of two grains of iodine, is added, and the mixture is boiled for a few moments. When the solution is cold, make the mixture up to f℥viii with distilled water. This is called by Mr. Donovan, the proposer, Liquor Arsen'ici et Hydrar'gyri Iodidi, each drachm of which by measure consists of water ℥j, arsenious acid gr. 1-8th; peroxide of mercury gr. 1-4th, iodine converted into hydriodic acid gr. 3-4ths. In the last edition of the Ph. U. S. it is directed to be made of Arsen'ici Iodidum and Hydrar'gyri Iodidum rubrum, each gr. xxxv; and Aqua destillata Oss; dissolving by rubbing, heating to the boiling point, and filtering.

ARTERIAL BLOOD, (F.) Sang artériel. Red blood is so called because contained in the arteries. The pulmonary veins, however, also contain red blood: hence the name arterial veins, (F.) Veines artérielles, applied to them.

ARTERIAL DUCT, Cana'lis arterio'sus, Ductus arterio'sus, D. Botalli, (F.) Canal artériel, C. Pulmo-aortique, is the portion of the pulmonary artery which terminates in the aorta in the fœtus. When this duct is obliterated after birth, it is called Arterial Ligament, (F.) Ligament artériel.

ARTERIO'TOMY, Arteriotom'ia, from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and τομω, 'I cut.' This word has been used for the dissection of arteries. Most commonly, however, it means a surgical operation, which consists in opening an artery, to draw blood from it. Arteriotomy is chiefly used in inflammatory affections of the head, when the blood is generally obtained from the temporal artery. See Blood-letting.

ARTERITIS, Arteri'tis, Inflamma'tio Arteriarum, (F.) Artérite, Inflammation des artères; from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and itis, a termination denoting inflammation. Inflammation of an artery. Inflammation of the inner coat of an artery is termed Endo-arteri'tis, or Endoarteri'tis; of the outer, Exo-arteri'tis or Exarteri'tis.

ARTERY, Arte'ria, (F.) Artère, from αρη, 'air,' and τηρειν, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They, at first, gave the name Artery to the trachea, αρτηρια τραχεια, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, φλεβες to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Vena micant'es pulsat'iles. Arteries, with the moderns, signify the order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish white colour; little dilatable; easily lacerable; and formed, 1. Of an external, laminated or areolar membrane, of a dense and close character. 2. Of a middle coat composed of fibres, which does not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus; and 3. Of an inner coat, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the other arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta: and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. ARTERIA PULMONALIS.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

The arch of the Aorta gives off, to the left, two considerable trunks—the Arteria carotidea primitiva, and A. subclavia; and, to the right, a single trunk, which is larger—the A. innominata, or Brachio-cephalica, which divides into the primitiva carotid and subclavian.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE ARM, Circumflex arteries of the arm.

ARTICULAR ARTERIES OF THE KNEE arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibio-femoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number; one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the azygous articular. The first, Ramus anastomoticus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex; and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

ARTICULAR FACETTES are the contiguous surfaces, by means of which the bones are articulated.

ARTICULAR PROCESSES, see Vertebrae.

ARTICULAR VEINS of the knee follow the same course as the arteries.

ASTHMA, from ἀσθμα, 'laborious breathing;' from αω, 'I respire.' A. spasiticum adultorum, A. Seniorum, A. Convulsivum, A. spasiticum intermitens, Dyspnœa et orthopnœa convulsiva, Malum Caducum pulmonum, Broken-windedness, Nervous asthma, (F.) Asthme, A. nervosa. Difficulty of breathing, recurring at intervals, accompanied with a wheezing sound and sense of constriction in the chest; cough and expectoration.

Asthma is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. Excitant and narcotic antispasmodics are required.

There are no pathognomonic physical signs of asthma. In some cases, the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form, the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves, Bronchoparaly'sis, Paraly'sis nervi vagi in parte thoracica, more frequently of the former—all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action—narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

The structural changes induced are enlargement of the bronchial tubes, expansion of the pulmonary tissue, and phthisis.

A disease of infants, characterized by suspension of respiration at intervals; great difficulty of breathing, especially on waking, swallowing, or crying; ending often in a fit of suffocation, with convulsions. The pathology of the disease has been supposed to consist in an enlargement of the thymus gland, or of the glands of the neck pressing on the pneumogastric nerves. (?) The ear, on auscultation, at a distance from the chest, detects an incomplete, acute, hissing inspiration, or rather cry; whilst the expiration and voice are croupal, both at the accession and termination of the paroxysm. The heart's action has been observed to be distinct and feeble.

These symptoms are often accompanied by rigidity of the fingers and toes; the thumb being frequently drawn forcibly into the palm of the clenched hand, whence the name Carpo-pedal spasm, applied, at times, to the disease.

The act of hearing, The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simply hearing.

BALSAM, Balsamum, Bo'leson, Bel'eson, (F.) Baume. This name is given to natural vegetable substances, concrete or liquid, but very odorous, bitter, and piquant: composed of resin, benzoic acid, and sometimes of an essential oil;—which allow benzoic acid to be disengaged by the action of heat; readily dissolved in volatile oil, alcohol, and ether; and, when treated with alkalies, afford a soluble benzoate, and throw down resin. We know of only five balsams:—those of Peru, and Tolu, Benzoin, solid Styrax or Storax, and liquid Styrax. (See those different words.) There are, however, many pharmaceutical preparations and resinous substances, possessed of a balsamic smell, to which the name balsam has been given; but they differ essentially in composition and properties: hence the distinction of balsams into natural and artificial. BAND, PRIMITIVE, see Nerve Fibre.

BANDAGE, Desma, Syndes'mus, Hypodes'mis, Hypodesma, Hypodes'mus, (the last three signify properly an under bandage.) A binder, from Sax. bindan, 'to bind.' This word, with the French, is generally used to express the methodical application of rollers, compresses, &c., Ban'daging, Syn'des'is, to fix an apparatus upon any part,—corresponding to the words deligat'io, fascia'tum, fascia'rum applicat'io, epid'esis. With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself;—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one-third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the moussé; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reversed, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BANDAGE or ROLLER, Fas'cia, Tæ'nia, Epi-des'mos, Vin'culum, the Bande of the French, is derived from (G.) binden, 'to bind.' It may be made of linen, flannel, or other stuff capable of offering a certain resistance. The two extremities of a bandage are called tails, (F.) chefs, and the rolled part is termed its head, (F.) globe. If rolled at both extremities, it is called a double-headed roller or bandage, (F.) Bande à deux globes.

BANDAGE, BODY, Manti'le, (F.) Bandage de Corps, is used for fixing dressings, &c., to the trunk. It is formed of a towel, napkin, or some large compress, folded three or four times; the extremities of which are fastened by pins. This is again fixed by means of the scapulary bandage, which is nothing more than an ordinary bandage, stitched to the anterior and middle part of the napkin, passing over the clavicles and behind the head, to be attached to the back part of the napkin.

BANDAGE, COMPRESSING, or ROLLER, Fascia compressi'va seu convolut'a, (F.) Bandage compressive ou roulé, is the simple roller with one head; and is employed in cases of ulcers, varices, &c., of the limbs. Whenever this roller is applied to the lower part of the limbs, it is carried upwards by the doloire and reversed methods above described.

BANDAGE, EIGHTEEN-TAILED, Fas'cia octod'ecim capit'ibus, (F.) Bandage à dix huit chefs. This bandage is made of a longitudinal portion of a common roller; and with a sufficient number of transverse pieces or tails, to cover as much of the part as is requisite. It is a very useful bandage, inasmuch as it can be undone without disturbing the part.

BANDAGE, IERNIAL, see TRUSS—b. Immoveable, Apparatus, immovable.

BANDAGE, INGUINAL, Fas'cia inguin'al'is. A bandage for keeping dressings applied to the groin. It consists of a cincture, to which is attached a triangular compress, adapted for covering the groin. To the lower extremity of this, one or two bandages are attached, which pass under the thigh, and are fixed to the posterior part of the cincture. This bandage may be either simple or double.

Other bandages will be found described under their various names.

BANDAGE, PERMANENT, Apparatus, immovable—b. of the Poor, see Cancer Galeni; and Bandage, Galen's.

The leaves and flowers of Cannabis are narcotic and astringent. They are chewed and smoked. An alcoholic extract of the plant, Churras, has been used in India, and since then in Europe and in this country as a narcotic, and anti-convulsive, in the dose of from half a grain to ten or more. It requires, however, great caution in its administration. The pure resin—Cannabine—is active in the dose of two-thirds of a grain.

BLOOD, Anglo-Saxon, blōd, from bledan, 'to bleed.' Sanguis, Cruor, Lapis animalis, Hæma, 'αἷμα, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscs and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded, which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, an animal colouring substance, a little fatty matter—hæmatelæum, and different salts; as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, subcarbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, and lactate of soda, united with an animal matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red colour, strong smell, temp. 100°; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red; temp. 98°; s. g. 1.051. The difference in colour has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter, black. The former, which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, and probably differs in composition. It likewise contains different substances absorbed. Venous blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery, supernatant fluid; and the cruor, coagulatum, crassamentum, hepar seu placen'ta sanguinis, placen'ta cruo'ris, in'sula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water, holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, colouring matter—hæmotosin, a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Le Canu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin, 3.565; colouring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

Fibrin, }
Albumen, } In solution forming Liquor Sanguinis, Salts, } nis.

Red Corpuscles—suspended in the Liquor Sanguinis.

In coagulated blood they are thus combined:

Fibrin, }
Red Corpuscles, } Forming the crassamentum or Albumen, } clot.
Salts, } Remaining in solution, forming } serum.

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Le Canu, and MM. Andral and Gavarret—fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790.

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be anti-epileptic; that of the goat, dried, Sanguis hirci siccatus, sudorific and antipleuritic.

BLOODING, Bloodletting.

BLOODLESSNESS, Anæmia.

BLOOD-LETTING, Missio seu Detractio Sanguinis, Hæmactis, Cataschasmus, Bleeding, Bleeding, (F.) Saignée, Émission sanguine. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw blood from it. When practised on an artery, it is called Arteriotomy; on a vein, Phlebotomy, Venæsectio, Venæsection; and on the capillary vessels, local or capillary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed general. Blood-letting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1. To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed so freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turbulence in any particular organ—(F.) Saignée révulsive, Revulsive bloodletting or bleeding, Venæsectio revulsoria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near.) 3. To diminish the consistence of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative. The immediate effects of blood-letting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Blood-letting from the veins—phlebotomy, is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the fore-arm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or phleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salvatella. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid by the course of the blood being obstructed: the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Capillary or local blood-letting is practised on the skin or mucous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

BRIGHTON, CLIMATE OF. The air of this fashionable watering place, on the south coast of England, is dry, elastic, and bracing. According to Sir James Clark, its climate appears to the greatest advantage in the autumn and early part of the winter; when it is somewhat milder and more steady than that of Hastings. Accordingly, it is adapted for all cases in which a dry and mild air at this season of the year proves beneficial. In the spring months, owing to the prevalence of, and its exposure to, north-east winds, the climate is cold, harsh, and exciting to the delicate. It is well adapted for convalescents, and for all who require a dry and bracing sea air.

It is met with chiefly in sea-water, and in many animal and vegetable bodies that live therein. It has likewise been found in many mineral waters of this and other countries. In its chemical relations, it may be placed between chlorine and iodine. With oxygen it forms an acid,—the Bromic, and with hydrogen another—the Hydrobromic.

PURE BROMINE, BROMIDE OF IRON, (dose, gr. i or ij,) and BROMIDE OF POTASSIUM, have been used medicinally, and chiefly in scrofulosis,—internally, as well as applied externally. Bromine may be dissolved in forty parts of distilled water, and six drops be commenced with as a dose. BROMIDES OF MERCURY (Hydrargyri Bromida) have been given in syphilis. The protobromide and the tribromide are analogous in composition and medicinal properties to the corresponding iodides of mercury.

BRONCHIES, Bronchia—b. Ganglions lymphatiques des, Bronchial glands.

BRONCHI, Bronchia.

BRONCHIA, Bronchia, Bronchi, from βρογχος, 'the throat.' The Latins used the term

Bronchus, for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchia, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs.—Caul'ula pulmonum.

BRONCHIA, DILATATION OF THE, Dilated Bronchia. The physical signs of this condition are the following:—Percussion usually clear, but not unfrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, or lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

BRONCHIA, OBLITERATION OF OR COMPRESSION OF THE. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

BRONCHILE, see Bronchia.

BRONCHIAL, Bronchie, Bronchia'lis, Bronchicus. That which relates to the bronchia.

BRONCHIAL ARTERIES, (F.) Arteres Bronchiques. These are generally two in number, one going to each lung. They arise from the thoracic aorta, and accompany the bronchia in all their ramifications.

BRONCHIAL COUGH, (F.) Toix bronchique, T. tubaire. This generally accompanies bronchial respiration. They both indicate obstruction to the entrance of air into the air-cells.

BRONCHIAL GLANDS, Glandula Vesalia'na, Glands of Vesalius, (F.) Glandes bronchiques ou Ganglions lymphatiques des bronches, are numerous glands of an ovoid shape; of a reddish hue in the infant, and subsequently brown and black, seated in the course of the bronchia. Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumours in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, whilst there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

BRONCHIAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs bronchiques, are furnished by the two pulmonary plexuses.

BRONCHIAL PHTHISIS, see Phtthisis bronchial—b. Respiration, see Murmur, respiratory.

bronchial tubes. This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnoea, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tussis senilis, Catarrhus senilis, Rheuma catarrhalis, Peripneumonia notha, Bronchorrhœa acuta, Winter cough, Chronic Catarrh, may be confounded with phthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times mucopurulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry, dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrhe Sec.

When bronchitis affects the smaller tubes, it is termed capillary bronchitis, bronchitis capillaris, bronchocacœ infantilis (?), and is often fatal to children. Vesicular bronchitis is the term proposed by MM. Rilliet and Barthez for the vesicular pneumonia of children.

This is no rupture, but consists of an enlargement of the thyroid gland. It is common at the base of lofty mountains in every part of the world; and has been supposed to be owing to the drinking of snow-water, but it occurs where there is no snow. The tumour is sometimes very extensive. Iodine has great power over it, and will generally occasion its absorption, when the case has not been of such duration as to have ended in a cartilaginous condition.

BRONCHOCEPHALITIS, Pertussis.

A surgical operation, which consists in making an opening either into the trachea, (Tracheotomy;) into the larynx, (Laryngotomy;) or into both, (Tracheo-laryngotomy;) to extract foreign bodies or to permit the passage of air to the lungs. These different parts are divided transversely or vertically, according to circumstances.

BRUIT, (F.) 'Sound.' A French term, applied to various sounds heard on percussion and auscultation, viz.

BRUIT DE CRAQUEMENT, B. de Tiraillement, Bruit de cuir neuf, 'sound of crackling, or bursting, or of new leather.' A sound produced by the friction of the pericardium, when dried and roughened by inflammation.

BRUIT DU CŒUR FŒTAL, Battemens doubles; Double bruit du Cœur du Fœtus. The pulsations of the foetal heart heard in auscultation in the latter half of utero-gestation.

BRUIT MUSCULAIRE. The sound accompanying the first sound of the heart, referred by some to muscular contraction. Called, also, Bruit rotatoire, in consequence of its having been thought to resemble the rumbling of distant wheels.

BRUIT MUSICAL, Sifflement modulé.

BRUIT DE PARCHEMIN. 'Parchment tone.' A sound as if produced by two sheets of parchment applied to each other. It is said to be produced by thickening and rigidity of the valves of the heart.

BRUIT PLACENTAIRE, B. de soufflet placentaire, B. utérin, Souffle utérin, Souffle placentaire, Placental bellows' sound, Utero-placental murmur, Uterine murmur. The bellows' sound heard on auscultating over the site of the placenta in a pregnant female. It does not appear to be owing to the placental vessels: but to the uterine tumour pressing upon the large vessels of the mother.

BRUIT DE POT FÉLÉ; 'Sound of a cracked vessel.' This sound is heard on percussion, when a cavern in the lungs is filled with air, and has a narrow outlet.

BRUIT DE RACLEMENT, 'Sound of scraping.' A sound produced by the scraping of hard, solid membranes, as the pericardium, against each other.

BRUIT DE RÂPE, 'Sound of a rasp.' A sound heard during the contraction of either the auricles or ventricles. It is constant; and the contraction of the cavity is more prolonged than natural, and emits a hard, rough, and—as it were—stifled sound.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves be concerned,—near the base if the semilunar valves be the seat of the disease.

BRUIT ROTATOIRE, Bruit musculaire.

BRUIT DE SCIE, or 'saw-sound,' and BRUIT DE LIME À BOIS, or 'file-sound,' resemble the Bruit de Râpe.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLE À DOUBLE COURANT, Bruit de Diable.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET, Bruit de Souffle, 'bellows' sound,' 'blowing sound.' A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease in that organ,—whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed. An Encephalic bellows' sound, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head; and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET PLACENTAIRE, Bruit placentaire—b. de Tiraillement, Bruit de craquement.

BRUIT DE TAFFETAS. 'Sound of Taffeta.' 'Sarcenet sound.' A respiratory sound, so named, by M. Grisolle, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatization of the lung, limited to the surface, in pneumonia.

BRUIT TYMPANIQUE, 'Tympanic sound.' The clear sound afforded by percussing the stomach and intestines when containing air.

It is situate at the posterior and inferior part of the foot; is articulated above and a little anteriorly with the astragalus; anteriorly, also, with the os cuboides. Its posterior surface,—called Heel, Talus, Calx, (F.) Talon,—gives attachment to the tendo-achillis: the lower has, posteriorly, two tuberosities, to which the superficial muscles of the sole of the foot are attached. The small Apoph'ysis or lateral Apoph'ysis of the Calca'neum, (F.) Petit Apophyse ou Apophyse latérale du Calcanéum, is a projection at the upper surface of this bone, on which is formed the posterior portion of the cavity that receives the astragalus. The great Apoph'ysis, anterior Apoph'ysis of the Calca'neum, is the projection which corresponds, on one side, with the cuboides; and on the other forms the anterior part of the facette which receives the astragalus.

CALCUL, Calculus.

CALCULEUX, Calculous.

CALCULI, see Calculus—c. Articular, see Calculi Arthritic; and Concretions, articular.

CALCULI, ALTERNATING, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, ARTHRITIC, Tophi, Tubercula arthritica, Chalk-stones, Nodes, (F.) Pierres crayeuses, Calcules arthritiques, Nœuds. Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. They are composed of uric acid, soda, and a little animal matter; very rarely, urate of lime and chloride of sodium are met with. Similar calculi are found in other parts besides the joints.

CALCULI, BILIARY, Calculi biliarii seu fellæi seu biliarii, Biliary Concretions, Gall-stones, Chololithus, Cholelithus, (F.) Calculs biliaires, Pierres au fel. Some of these contain all the materials of the bile, and seem to be nothing more than that secretion thickened. Several contain Picromel; and the greater part are composed of from 88 to 94 parts of Cholesterin, and of from 6 to 12 of the yellow matter of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choledochus. The first are called Cystic; the second Hepatic; and the last, sometimes, Hepatocystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. Often they occasion no uneasiness, and at other times the symptoms may be confounded with those of hepatitis. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistulæ, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected. Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon. They cannot reach the calculi.

CALCULI, BONE EARTH, see Calculi, urinary—c. Compound, see Calculi, urinary—c. Cystic, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE EARS, (F.) Calculs de l'Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated cerumen. They are a frequent cause of deafness. They can be easily seen, and may be extracted by appropriate forceps, after having been detached by injections of soap and water.

CALCULI FELLEI, Calculi, biliary—c. Fusible, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, LACHRYMAL, (F.) Calculs lacrymaux. Concretions sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they occasion abscesses and fistulæ, which do not heal until they are extracted. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI, LITHIC, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE MAMMÆ, (F.) Calculs des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish-white colour, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

CALCULI, MULBERRY, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI OF THE PANCREAS, (F. Calculs du Pancréas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no reason for this belief.

CALCULI OF THE PINEAL GLAND, (F.) Calculs de la Glande Pinéale. These have been frequently met with. No symptom announces their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

CALCULI OF THE PROSTATE, Prostat'ic calculi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

CALCULI PULMONARY, (F.) Calculs pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Phthisis calculense, of Bayle. At times they are expectorated without the supervention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

CALCULI, SALIVARY, Calculi salivales, Sialolithi, (F.) Calculs salivaires. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substance of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may generally be detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Calculus sublingualis and Ranula lapideæ.

CALCULI, SPERMATIC, (F.) Calculs spermaticques. These have been sometimes found in the vesiculæ seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life. No analysis has been made of them.

CALCULI OF THE STOMACH AND INTESTINES, Enterolithus, E. Calculus, Coprolithus, Concre-

ti'ones alci'na, (F.) Calculs de l'estomac, C. intestinaux, Pierres stercorales, Concrétions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculs intestinaux, are not uncommon in animals (see BEZOARD;) but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and not inflammable. They are formed, ordinarily, between the valvulæ of the small intestines, or in the cells of the large, and sometimes in old herniæ. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptoms. At times, the movable tumour which they form may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

CALCULI OF THE TONSILS. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils. (F.) Calculs des Amygdales. They are easily recognised by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasioned by their presence. They have not been analyzed.

CALCULI, TRIPLE, see Calculi, urinary — a Uric, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, URINARY, Urolithi, (F.) Calculs urinaires, Pierres urinaires. Concretions which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and which are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., form the nucleus. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing probably as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

Modern chymists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz., Lithic Acid, Phosphate of Lime, Ammoniaco-Magnesian Phosphate, Oxalate of Lime, Cystic Oxide, and Xanthic Oxide, with an animal cementing ingredient. The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of these ingredients, are thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHYMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR URIC.	FORM, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1.500. Colour , brownish or fawn-like. Surface , smooth. Texture , laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid . When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalis.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs finely tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY.	Colour , dark brown. Texture , harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface , studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime , and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime .	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-coloured, resembling heapsæd .
3. BONE EARTH	Colour , pale brown or gray; surface , smooth and polished; structure , regularly laminated; the laminae easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime . It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Colour , generally brilliant white. Surface , uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminae small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammoniaco-magnesian phosphate , generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalis decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Colour , grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globule
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogenous.	It consists of cystic oxide . Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odour. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalis, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminae.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chymical analysis.

1. Renal Calculi, (F.) Calculs rénaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there is no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied with bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, animal matter, and oxalate of lime, with, sometimes, phosphates. The treatment will have to vary, according to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi of the Ureters, (F.) Calculs des Urétères. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distention of the whole of the ureters above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is sometimes very violent, extending to the testicle of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local blood-letting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Calculi, Vesical; Stone in the Bladder, Lithia Vesicalis, Lithiasis cystica, Lithiasis vesicalis, Cysto-lithiasis, Dysuria calculosa, D. irritata, Calculus vesicæ, (F.) Calculus vésicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine—are the chief signs which induce a suspicion of their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganization of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Calculi Urethral. They almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction, which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumour, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision.

5. Calculi of Fistulous passages. These arise when there is some fistulous opening into the urethra. They can be readily recognised, and may generally be extracted with facility. (F.) Calculs placés hors des voies urinaires. See Urinary Calculi.

CAL'CULI OF THE U'TERUS, (F.) Calculs de l'Utérus. These are very rare. The signs, which indicate them during life, are those of chronic engorgement of the uterus. Their existence, consequently, cannot be proved till after death.

CAL'CLUSUS, Lapis, Lithos, λίσθος. A diminutive of calc, a lime-stone. (F.) Calcul, Pierre. Calculi are concretions, which may form in every part of the animal body, but are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammae, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances, which compose them, from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some chronic irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable: spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

CANCER, 'a crab.' Car'cinus, Lupus canero'sus. A disease, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab: called also Carcino'ma. It consists of a scirrhus, livid tumour, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands; and occurs chiefly in the secretory glands. The pains are acute and lincinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumour, ultimately, terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer,—Ulcus canero'sum. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into ocult and open; the former being the scirrhus, the latter the ulcerated condition. At times, there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organs, at others, an encephaloid or cerebriform, and, at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three species of carcinoma:

The use of irritants in cancerous affections is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situate that excision can be practised, the sooner it is removed the better.

Encephaloid.	Scirrhus.	Colloid.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter. Is commonly opaque from its earliest formation. Is of a dead white colour. Contains a multitude of minute vessels. Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulose-fibrous septa. Has a semi-transparent glossiness. Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint. Is comparatively ill-supplied with vessels. Is exceedingly firm and dense.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed. The contained matter is strikingly transparent. Greenish yellow is its predominant hue. Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet. The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a colloid mass is, however, firm and resisting.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass. The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula. Occasionally attains an enormous bulk. Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body. Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject. Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation. The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscular do not exist in it. Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange. Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited. Is not unusually solitary.	The pultaceous variety has been detected in the veins. Is composed of shells in a state of enboitement. Observes a mean in this respect. Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only. Has rarely been met with in more than one organ.
When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opaque matter of creamy consistence. Subcutaneous tumours are slow to contract adhesion with the skin. Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Ordinarily grows slowly. Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes. Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter. Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent. Scirrhus ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; and fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhus character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed.	Grows with a medium degree of rapidity. Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid. It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself. Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	There is not such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in. Is much less common before puberty.	Has so far been observed in adults only.

It receives the superior cardiac nerves of opposite sides of the neck, and a branch from the pneumogastric, and gives off numerous branches to the cardiac plexuses.

CARDIAC NERVES, (F.) Nerfs cardiaques. These are commonly three on each side; a superior, middle and inferior, which are furnished by corresponding cervical ganglia. Commonly, there are but two on the left side; the upper and middle, which draw their origin from the last two cervical ganglia. Scarpa calls the superior — Cardi'acus superficialis; the middle — C. profundus seu C. magnus; and the inferior — C. parvus seu minor. There are, besides, Cardiac filaments, (F.) Filets cardiaques, furnished by the par vagum or pneumo-gastric nerve, which become confounded with the above.

It is formed by the convergence of the middle and inferior cardiac nerves; and by branches from the pneumogastric, descendens noni, and first thoracic ganglion. 2. The anterior cardiac plexus is situated in front of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by filaments from the superior cardiac nerves; from the cardiac ganglion; and from the great cardiac plexus. Filaments from this plexus accompany the left coronary artery, and form the anterior coronary plexus. 3. The posterior cardiac plexus is seated upon the posterior part of the ascending aorta near its origin. It is formed by numerous branches from the great cardiac plexus. It divides into two sets of branches, which together constitute the posterior coronary plexus.

The disease commonly occurs between the third and ninth month, and is characterized by excessive dyspnoea, accompanied by a loud croupy noise on inspiration; the thumbs being locked, and the hands and feet rigidly bent for a longer or shorter period. The seat of the disease is evidently in the cerebro-spinal axis, primarily or secondarily: generally, perhaps, it is owing to erethism seated elsewhere, but communicated to the cerebro-spinal centre, and reflected to the respiratory and other muscles concerned. It seems to be connected with dental irritation, and consequently, in the treatment, where such is the case, the gums should be freely divided; after which, cathartics and revulsives, with the use of narcotics and appropriate diet, will generally remove the affection; for although extremely alarming, it is often not attended with great danger. A deprivation of sight, which comes on, as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis.—The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opaque body, of variable colour, but commonly whitish:—the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spurious and genuine. The former, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule. A lenticular cataract is where the affection is seated in the lens;—a capsular or membranous, in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior, and complete capsular cataract. When the capsule is rendered opaque, in consequence of an injury, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Cataracta arida siliquosa. Cataracta Morgagniana lactea vel puriformis, is the milky variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracta lacteuse; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The capsulo-lenticular affects both lens and capsule, and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called hard, soft, (Phacomalacia), stony, (F. pierruse), milky or cheesy, (lacteuse ou caséuse, Galactocataracta, Cataracta lacteolor), according to their density:—white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their colour:—fixed or vacillating,—cataracta capsulo-lenticularis fixa vel tremula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Cataractæ marmoracia, fenestratæ, stellatæ, punctatæ, dimidiatæ, &c., according to the appearances they present.

They may also be simple, or complicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and primary or primitive, when opaque before the operation;—secondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

The following classification of cataracts is by M. Desmarres:

- Fibrinous.
- Purulent.
- Sanguineous.
- Pigmentous.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congenital. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it is not until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. 1. Couching or Depression, Hyalonix's, Hyalonyx's, (F.) Abaissement, Déplacement de la Cataracte. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the sclerótica and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. 2. By absorption,—by the French termed broiement, or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humours of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By extraction, which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Keratonyxis, which see.

CATARRH', Catar'rhus, Catar'rhopus, Catar'rhema, Rheuma, Deflux'io, Catastag'ma, Phlegmatorrhag'ia, Phlegmatorrhœ'a, from kata, 'downwards,' and ρρω, 'I flow.' A discharge of fluid from a mucous membrane. The ancients considered catarrh as a simple flux, and not as an inflammation. Generally it partakes of this character, however. Catarrh is, with us, usually restricted to inflammation of the mucous membrane of the air-passages: the French extend it to that of all mucous membranes; (F.) Flux muqueux, Fluxion catarrhale.

It is commonly an affection of but little consequence, but apt to relapse and become chronic. It is characterized by cough, thirst, lassitude, fever, watery eyes, with increased secretion of mucus from the air-passages. The antiphlogistic regimen and time usually remove it.—Sometimes, the inflammation of the bronchial tubes is so great as to prove fatal.

A substance, used for 'firing,' burning or disorganizing the parts to which it is applied. Cauteries were divided by the ancients into actual and potential. The word is now restricted to the red-hot iron; or to positive burning. It was, formerly, much used for preventing hemorrhage from divided arteries; and also with the same views as a blister. CAVERNOUS BODIES, Cor'pora Cavernosa of the penis, Cor'pora nervosa, C. Ner'vco-spongiosa Penis, (F.) Corps Caverneux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, composed of cells; separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum, Septum pectiniformè, and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, and terminates obtusely behind the glans. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine Arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance, and the smooth muscular fibre has been traced into the fibrous parietes of the cells, as in the case of all erectile tissues.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the Clit'oris, are two hollow crura, forming the clitoris.

CAVERNOUS BODY OF THE VAGINA, Corpus Cavernosum Vaginæ, Plexus retiform'is, is a substance composed of blood-vessels and cells, similar to those of the penis and clitoris, which covers the outer extremity of the vagina, on each side. It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition.

CAVERNOUS RESPIRATION, (F.) When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition, the cough is cavernous likewise, (F.) Toux Caverneuse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of the respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphoric, from amphora, 'a flask.' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not attended to.

The Cavernous Sinuses are venous cavities of the dura mater, filled with a multitude of reddish, soft filaments, intersecting each other; and, as it were, reticulated. They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthalmic sinus.

CAVERNOUS TEXTURE or TISSUE, (F.) Tissu caverneux. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lace-work of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood; and probably, also, by virtue of some property inherent in it.

It fills the lower occipital fossæ below the tentorium, and embraces the tuber annulare and medulla. It is composed, like the brain, of vesicular and tubular substance, arranged in laminae, as it were; so that, when a section is made of it, it has an arborescent appearance, called Arbor vitæ. The cerebellum is divided into two lobes or hemispheres or lateral masses, and each lobe is again subdivided into Montic'uli or Lobules. In the cerebellum are to be observed the crura cerebelli, the fourth ventricle, the valvula magna cerebri, the processus vermiculares, superior and inferior, &c.

CEREBRAL AR'TERIES are three on each side:—the anterior or artery of the corpus callosum, and the middle, arte'ria Sylviana, are furnished by the internal carotid:—the posterior or posterior and inferior artery of the brain, A. profunda cerebri, arises from the vertebral. Chaussier calls these arteries lobaires, because they correspond with the anterior, middle, and posterior lobes, whilst he calls the trunks, whence they originate, cerebral.

CEREBRAL NERVES are those which arise within the cranium, all of which, perhaps, with the exception of the olfactory, originate from the medulla oblongata. See Nerves.

CER'EBRUM or CER'E'BRUM. The brain. (F.) Cerveau, Cervelle. This term is sometimes applied to the whole of the contents of the cranium: at others, to the upper portion;—the posterior and inferior being called cerebellum. The brain, properly so called, extends from the os frontis to the superior occipital fossæ. Anteriorly, it rests on the orbital vaults: behind this, on the middle fossæ of the base of the cranium; and, posteriorly, on the tentorium cerebello superextensum. The upper surface is divided by a deep median cleft (Scissure interlobaire, — Ch.) into two halves, called hemispheres, which are united at the base by the corpus callosum. At its surface are numerous convolutions. The inferior surface exhibits, from before to behind, three lobes, distinguished into anterior, middle, and posterior. The middle is separated from the anterior by the fissure of SYLVIVS; and from the posterior, by a shallow furrow which corresponds to the upper portion of the pars petrosa. Internally, the brain has, on the median line, the corpus callosum, septum lucidum, fornix, pineal gland, and third ventricle:—and laterally, the lateral ventricles, in which are the corpora striata, optic thalami, &c. It is contained in a triple envelope, (see Meninges.) Its texture is pulpy, and varies according to age. Two substances may be distinguished in it—the white, medullary, tubular or fibrous — medull'a cerebri, and the cortical, cineritious, vesicular, or gray. The former is white; and occupies all the interior and base of the brain. The latter is grayish and softer. It is situate particularly at the surface of the organ.

The brain receives several arterial vessels, furnished by the internal carotid and vertebral. Its veins end in the sinuses. It is the material organ of the mental and moral manifestations. According to Gall, each part is the special seat of one of those faculties, and the brain and cerebellum, inclusive, are called by him 'the nervous system of the mental faculties.' See Craniology.

The substance of the nervous system—Neurine has been analyzed by Vauquelin, and found to contain water, 80.00; white fatty matter, 4.53; red fatty matter, called cerebrine, 0.70; osmazome, 1.12; albumen, 7.00; phosphorus, 1.50; sulphur, acid phosphates of potassa, lime, and magnesia, 5.15.

CHATON (F.), 'a husk.' In pathology, it means a funda or cavity formed by the irregular or hour-glass contraction of the uterus, in which the placenta is often retained or enchatonné after the birth of the child. It is detected by passing the fingers along the cord as far as the part which is contracted, when the placenta will not be discoverable.

The treatment consists in relaxing by a large dose of an opiate, then passing the fingers along the cord, and gradually dilating the opening through which it passes, until it permits the hand to go through. The placenta must then be

A cutaneous affection, characterized by one or more broad, irregular-shaped patches, of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, occurring most frequently on the front of the neck, breast, abdomen, and groins. The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally—in any and every form—generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed.

CHLORINE, from χλωρος, 'green.' Chlo'rinum, Chlorin'ium, Chlora, Oxy muriat'ic Acid Gas, Oxygenated Muriatic Acid Gas, Dephlogisticated Marine Acid, Hal'ogene, Mu'rigenè, Chlorum, (F.) Chlore. So far as we know, this is an elementary substance. It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste; incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is, that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colours. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A very dilute solution, Aqua seu Li'quor Chlo'rini, (F.) Chlore liquide, has been administered internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. Immersion of the hands and arms in it has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

CHLORINE, BISULPHURET OF, Sulphur, chloride of.

CHLOROFORM, Chloroform'um, Carbo'neum chlora'tum, Superchl'oridum formyl'icum, Perchloride and Terchloride of Formyl, called also, but not correctly, Terchloride of Carbon, and Chloric ether, Æther chl'oricus, (F.) Chloroforme, so called on account of the connexion of chlorine with formic acid, is a colourless, oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odour, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste. The specific gravity of that of the Ph. U. S. is 1.49. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol,—rectifying the product by redistillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose, fʒss to fʒj, diluted with water. It has likewise been prescribed with great success as an anæsthetic agent in spasmodic diseases; and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition,—especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution. See Anæsthetic.

CHLOROFORM, TINCTURE OF, Ether, chloric.

A disease which affects young females, more particularly those who have not menstruated. It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and, at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name chlorose hémorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-coloured, and deficient in red corpuscles; and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) re-enforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c., (see Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hemorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics—as iron—are usually required in the treatment,—the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system.

CHOCOLATE, Chocolatum, Chocolata, Succola'ta, Succocolla'ta. Dr. Alston says, that this word is compounded from two East Indian words: — choco, 'sound,' and atte, 'water,' because of the noise made in its preparation. An alimentary paste prepared from the kernels of Theobroma cacao or Cacao, with sugar, and often aromatics. (See Cacao.) The chocolate thus simply prepared — as it is met with, indeed, in commerce — is called in France Chocolat de santé. It is not very easy of digestion.

The chocolat à la vanille contains three ounces of vanilla and two of cinnamon to twenty pounds of common chocolate. The addition of the aromatic renders it somewhat more digestible. Chocolates may likewise be medicated.

In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In the malignant cholera of India, bleeding at the outset, without regard to the signs of apparent depression, and large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of the practitioner.

CHOLÉRA-EUROPÉEN, see Cholera—c. Indian, see Cholera—c. India, see Cholera.

CHOLERA INFANTUM, Choleric Fever of Infants; Cholera of Infants. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the middle states of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather, hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness; and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns; differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Watery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as sinapisms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

CHORION, χοριον, 'skin,' from χωρειν, 'to contain, include;' Camis'ia Fœtus: the chemise or shirt of the fœtus in utero. A thin, transparent membrane, formerly confounded with the decidua, which surrounds the fœtus in utero on every side, and appears to be developed from nucleated cells formed in the Fallopian tube. Some histologists, however, consider, that it exists in the ovary. The general opinion is, that it is formed as above described; and perhaps, also, from the zona pellucida, which disappears in the tube. In the uterus, villous prolongations are formed on its surface, which have given it, with more recent writers, the name 'shaggy chorion.' These villi are probably the agents of the absorption of nutritive matter furnished from the lining membrane of the uterus.

By many anatomists, the chorion is considered to be formed of two layers; the outer, called by Burdach Exochorion: the inner, Endochorion. By others, the distinction of laminæ is denied. It is exterior to the amnion.

CHORION also means the true skin. See CUTIS.

It is situate between the sclerotica and retina, has an opening, posteriorly, for the passage of the optic nerve; and terminates, anteriorly, at the great circumference of the iris, where it is continuous with the ciliary processes. According to Ruysch, the choroid consists of two layers, to the innermost of which his son gave the name Tu'nica Ruyschida'na, Membrana Ruyschia'na, (F.) Membrane Ruyschienne. The internal surface of the membrane is covered with a dark pigment, consisting of several layers of pigment cells, called *Pigmentum nigrum, Stratum pigmenti, Ophthalmochroï'tes, Æthiops animal, (F.) It is of a whitish appearance; is separated from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines, and is absorbed by the chyloferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a coagulable part and of serum. Chyle corpuscles or globules, exist in it, the average size of which is about 1-4600th of an inch. See Chyme.

(F.) Chimie ou Chymie. A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the nature and properties of bodies, simple and compound, inorganic and organized; and to study the force or power, by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organic Chemistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochem'i'a, is the chymistry of organized substances,—animal and vegetable.

Animal Chym'istry, Zoëch'em'y ou Zoëch'y'my, Zoëchem'i'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been farther subdivided into physiological, when it considers the changes produced in organized bodies in health, pathological, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropochymy, Anthropochem'i'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeutical or Pharmaceutical, Pharmaco-chymi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceu'tica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenic medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygien'ic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy aliments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c. on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Medical Chym'istry, Phytochymistry; at others, the term comprehends only the Animal, Vegetable and Pharmaceutical subdivisions.

Vital Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is executed under the influence of vitality.

A knowledge of chymistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseases require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination, which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

Their use seems to be, to prevent the entrance into the eye of light bodies flying in the atmo- sphere; and to diminish, in certain cases, the intensity of light. Also, the tarsi. Also, a pecu- liar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, vibratory or vibratile cil'ia, Cil'ia vibra- toria, (F.) Cils vibratils, which are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body, which are habi- tually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all ver- tebrated animals except fishes, having been dis- covered on the respiratory and uterine mucous membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms "vibratory motion" and "ciliary motion" have been used to express the pheno- mena exhibited by the moving cilia; and it is prob- able, that this motion is concerned in the pro- gression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has been observed only in the direc- tion of the outlets of canals.

CILIAIRE, Ciliary.

CILIARY, Cilia'ris, (F.) Ciliaire. Relating to the eyelashes, or to cilia. This epithet has, also, been applied to different parts, which enter Iriennes* of Chauss.) two in number, which, by the anastomoses of their branches, form two arterial circles at the anterior surface of the iris: and, 3. The anterior, Arte'ria cilia'res anterior of Haller, the num- ber of which is variable. These pierce the scler- otic a few lines from its union with the cornea; and are principally distributed to the iris.

CILIARY BODY, Corpus Cilia'rè, Nexus Stamin- eus Oculi, Coro'ua Cilia'ris, Ciliary Disc, (F.) Corps ciliaire. A ring of the choroid surround- ing the crystalline in the manner of a crown; placed behind the iris and the ciliary circle. It resembles the disk of a radiated flower, and is formed by the union of the ciliary processes. See Ciliary Muscle.

CILIARY CANAL, Canal of Fonta'na. A small, extremely narrow circular space, formed between the ciliary circle, the cornea, and the sclerotic. It can be filled with injection, and it is not cer- tain that it is not the cavity of a blood-vessel.

(F.) Ligament on Cercle ciliaire, Cercle de la Chorôide, Ceinture blanche de la Chorôide. A species of greyish ring, of a pulpy consistence, situate between the choroid, iris, and sclerotic. The internal surface of the choroid is uniform, until it approaches within ten lines and a-half of the edge of the cornea; here a dentated line is observed, termed ora serrata. The outer surface presents the an'nulus al'bidus seu gangli'iform'is, the anterior edge of which unites to the inner surface of the sclerotic and constitutes the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY MOTION, see Cilia.

CILIARY MUSCLE, Mus'culus cilia'ris. The part of the orbicularis palpebrarum in the vicinity of the ciliary margin. Also, the greyish, semi-transparent structure behind the ciliary ligament and covering the outside of the ciliary body. By its contraction the ciliary processes, and with them the lens, must be drawn towards the cornea. It appears to be the same muscle as the Tensor chorôidæ or choroid muscle of some anatomists.

CILIARY NERVES (Nerfs Iriens,—Chauss.) (F) Nerfs ciliaires. These are 12 to 16 in number. They arise from the nasal nerve, and particu- larly from the anterior part of the ophthalmic ganglion; and unite in two fasciculi, which pass around the optic nerve, and pierce the sclerotic near the entrance of that nerve into the eye. They are lost in the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY PLEXUS, C. Ligament.

CILIARY STRIÆ are numerous, pale, radiated striæ in the posterior portion of the Corpus ciliare, but so covered by the Pigmentum nigrum as not to be distinctly seen till the paint is removed. The ciliary processes are formed by these striæ.

CILIARY VEINS, (F.) Veines ciliaires, follow nearly the same course as the arteries. In the choroid they are so tortuous, that they have received the name Vasa vortico'sa. They open into the ophthalmic vein.

CILIARY ZONE, Zona seu Zo'nula Cilia'ris, Membran'ula Coro'næ Cilia'ris. Under the corpus ciliare, the capsule of the vitreous humour sends off an external lamina, which accompanies the retina, and is inserted, with it, into the fore-part of the capsule of the lens, a little before its anterior edge. This is the Zonula ciliaris, Zonula Zin'ni or Zonula of Zinn, Coro'na Cilia'ris, Orbic'ulus Cilia'ris. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humour.

CINARA HORTENSIS, Cynara scolymus—c. Scolymus, Cynara Scolymus.

CINCHO'NA. So called from the Spanish Viceroy's lady, the Countess de Cinchon, who was cured of fever by it at Lima, about 1638. Called also Cortex seu Pulvis Jesuit'icus, Jesuit's Bark or Powder, Cortex Patrum, because it was introduced into Europe by the Jesuits; and also Pulvis Comitissæ or the Countess's Powder, and Cardinal del Lugo's Powder, Cortex Cardinal'is de Lugo, because he introduced it at Rome. It is the pharmacopœial name of several kinds of barks from various species of Cinchona, from the western coast of South America. Nat. Order, Cinchonaceæ. Sec. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. Called, also, Cortex Bark, Peruvian Bark, English Remedy, Cortex Chinae, Cortex Chinae Regius, China, Chinch'na, Palos de Calentura, Kina Kina, (Bark of Barks), Kink'na, Cina Cina, Quina Quina, Quinqu'na, Magnum Dei donum, (F.) Quinquina.

CINCHO'NÆ CARIBÆ'Æ CORTEX, from Exostem'na Caribæ'um, Caribæ'an Bark; Saint Lucia Bark, (F.) Écorce de Saint Lucie, Quinquina Piton, from Exostem'na floribund'um; and the Pitaya Bark, Quinquina bi'color, from an exostemma (?) or from strychnos pseudoquina (?), are useful substitutes for the cinchona of Peru. These are the most important spurious barks. They contain neither quinia nor cinchonina.

CINCHO'NÆ CORDIFO'LE CORTEX, Cortex flavus, Cinchona officina'lis cortex flavus, Yellow Bark, Calisay's Bark, (F.) Quinquina jaune ou jaune royal, Calasaya. Odour aromatic; taste strong, bitter, astringent. Not rolled; often without the epidermis, which is very thick and inert; light, friable; fracture fibrous. Active principle Quinia.

CINCHO'NÆ LANCIFO'LE CORTEX, Cortex Peruvia'nus, Cortex pallidus, Cinchona officina'lis cortex commun'is, Cinchona pallida, Pale Bark, Loza Bark, Crown Bark, (F.) Quinquina gris de Loza, Quinquina Orange. Its odour is aromatic; taste pleasant, bitter, and astringent. The pieces are rolled in double or single quills. Epidermis brown, cracked; fracture resinous. Internally of a cinnamon colour. Its active principle is Cinchonia.

CINCHO'NÆ OBLONGIFO'LE CORTEX, Cortex ruber, Cinchona officina'lis cortex ruber, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge. Odour and taste the same as the pale, but more intense: in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red colour. Although this variety of bark is assigned to the Cinchona oblongifolia by some, it would seem, that nothing is certainly known as to its source. Active principles, Cinchonia and Quinia.

The last three are the only official varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States. There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an official position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admits, indeed, Cinchona cinerea, Grey bark, Silver bark or Huanuco bark, which is obtained around Huanuco in Peru, and belongs to the class of pale barks. Amongst the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which, in commerce, are variously called Carthagena, Maracaybo and Santa Martha barks.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark has been thought equal to any of the others, but the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their active principles is one of the most important gifts of modern chymistry. Still, in pernicious intermittents, the bark, in substance, is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone, but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally, it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ℥ss to ʒj or more.

ESSENTIAL SALT OF BARK, as it is called, is an extract, prepared by macerating the bruised substance of bark in cold water, and permitting the infusion to a very slow evaporation.

CINCHONINE, Cinchoni'na, Cinchonin, Cinchola'nia. The active principle of Cinchona lanceifolia. An organic, crystalline alkali; of a white colour, and bitter, slightly astringent taste; very soluble in alcohol and ether, but almost insoluble in water.

Sulphate of Cinchonina, which is formed directly from cinchonina, is soluble in water and alcohol. The action of the sulphate of cinchonina is similar to that of the sulphate of quinia; but it is less energetic, and consequently requires to be given in a larger dose.

CIRCULATION, Circula'tio, Cyclophor'ia, Periodus sangui'nis, from circulus, 'a circle;' or rather, from circum, 'around,' and ferre, latum, 'to carry.' (F.) Circulation. Physiologists give this name to the motion of the blood through the different vessels of the body—sanguinatio; —to that function, by which the blood, setting out from the left ventricle of the heart, is distributed to every part of the body by the arteries;—proceeds into the veins, returns to the heart, enters the right auricle, and passes into the corresponding ventricle, which sends it into the pulmonary artery to be distributed to the lungs, whence it issues by the pulmonary veins, and passes into the left auricle. From this it is sent into the left ventricle, and is again distributed by means of the arteries.

An ancient operation, performed by some nations as a religious ceremony. It consists in removing circularly a portion of the prepuce of infants;—a custom, which was probably suggested with a view to cleanliness. In cases of extraordinary length of prepuce, or when affected with disease, the operation is sometimes undertaken by surgeons. A similar operation is performed, amongst the Ægyptians, Arabians, and Persians, on the female, Circumcis'io feminarum, by removing a portion of the nymphæ, and at times the clitoris.

Pott gives it a different signification. Varicocele, he calls the tumour formed by the veins of the scrotum; Circocœle, Funiculus varicosus, the varicose dilatation of the spermatic veins. The scrotum feels as if it contained earthworms. It is commonly an affection of no consequence, demanding merely the use of a suspensory bandage.

They were once used in convulsive and epileptic cases. The leaves, Folia Aurantii, have a bitterish taste, and furnish an essential oil. They have been used for the same purposes as the flowers. The yellow rind of the fruit, Cortex Aurantii, Orange Peel, is an aromatic bitter, and is used in dyspepsia, and where that class of remedies is required. The Juice, Succus Aurantii, Orange juice, is a grateful acid, and used as a beverage in febrile and scorbutic affections.

The outer rind, Cortex Limo'num, Lemon Peel, Zest, Flave'do Corticum Citri, is used in the same cases as the Cortex Aurantii.

The juice, Succus Limo'nis, (F.) Suc du Limon, Suc de Citron, is sharp, but gratefully acid, the acidity depending upon the citric acid it contains, and is given as a refrigerant beverage in febrile affections. In doses of half an ounce to an ounce, three times a day, it has appeared to exert a markedly sedative influence on the circulation, and has been given, apparently with benefit, in acute rheumatism and rheumatic gout. Alone, or combined with wine, it is prescribed in scurvy, putrid sore throat, &c. Its general properties are refrigerant and antiseptic. Sweetened and diluted, it forms Lemonade. Artificial lemon-juice is made by dissolving an ounce of citric acid in fourteen fluidounces of water; adding a few drops of essence of lemon.

Lemonpeel tea, or water, is made by paring the rind of one lemon, previously rubbed with half an ounce of sugar: the peelings and sugar are then put into a jar, and a quart of boiling water is poured over them. When cold, the fluid must be poured off, and a tablespoonful of lemon juice be added.

It is an agreeable drink in fevers.

CLIMA, Climate.

CLIMACTERIC, Olimacter'icus, Climater'icus, from κλιμακτηρ, 'a step.' (F.) Olimactérique ou Climater'ique. A word, which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical.

At present, the word Olimacteric is chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes: that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

CLIMACTERIC YEARS, Anni Olimacter'ici, are, according to some, all those in the life of man, which are multiples of the number 7, Septenniada. Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year as the Grand Olimacteric:—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, (Anni hebdomad'ici, septa'ria, grada'rii, septa'siles, genethliaci, natabit'ii, fata'les, crit'ici, decreto'rii, hero'ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

CLIMATE, Clima, Inclina'tio cœli, (F.) Climat, Gr. κλιμα, 'a region.' In geography, the word climate is applied to a space on the terrestrial globe, comprised between two circles parallel to the equator, and arbitrarily measured according to the length of the days. In a hygienic point of view, we understand by climate, since Hippocrates, a country or region, which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. Climate, indeed, embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region,—circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections; cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under catarrhal or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone affords these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months, there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In the whole continent of North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. It is not uncommon for the range to be 40°, between two successive days. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c.

Certain of the tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months—but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean temperature.

In the United States, the most favourable region for the phthisical invalid is that of Florida, —especially of Pensacola. St. Augustine is frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the out-door movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter retreat. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome, and Pisa, —and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavourable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to such as are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system — as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philad. 1844.)

The second, O. dextra media, Colica media, Ramus colicus medius, Arteria media anastomot'ica, (C. droite, Ch.) and the third, O. dextra inferior or Ileo-colica, (A. cæcale,—Ch.) Of the three Colicæ sinistrae, the first or superior is called, by Chaussier, Colica magna sinistra; the second or media is not distinguished from the preceding, as they often arise from a common trunk; and the third is called by Chaussier Colica parva sinistra. To these arteries as many veins correspond, which open into the great and little mesenteric.

In its etymological acceptation, Colic signifies an affection or pain in the colon. But it is employed in a more extensive signification. It includes every acute pain of the abdomen, aggravated at intervals. The word has often, however, epithets affixed to it, which render it more or less precise. See Termina.

The treatment required resembles that proper for the next variety.

COLICA CALLO'SA. Colic attended with sense of stricture in some parts of the intestinal canal; often of flatulency and pain; the flatulency gradually passing off by the stricture; the bowels tardy; and at length discharging small liquid stools.

COLICA CONVULSIVA, C. Spasmodica, C. pituitosa, C. nervosa, C. idiopathica, Enterospasmus. Colic, not the symptom of any other affection. It is characterized by griping pain in the bowels, chiefly about the navel, with vomiting and costiveness,—the pain increasing at intervals. The indications are to clear the intestines, and allay spasm. Calomel and opium—castor oil and opium—emollient and cathartic enemata, with fomentations, wet or dry, to the abdomen, usually succeed.

COLICA CRAPULOSA, C. accidentalis, C. heliolum, Crapulent colic, Surfeit, Colic from overeating, (F.) Colique d'Indigestion. A colic, arising from eating indigestible aliments, or digestible aliments in too great abundance. The remedy is obvious.

Dysentérovie Saturnine, Colique de Poitou, Colique végétale (?), Colique des peintres, Colique de plomb, C. métallique, C. Saturnine, C. des barbouilleurs.

Under this head is generally described the colic produced by lead, as well as the other colics mentioned in the synonymy; and they certainly resemble each other greatly, although some of them are more like bilious colic. There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be treated by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

COLICA NEPHRETICA, Nephretic Colic, (F.) Colique Néphrétique. Acute pains, which accompany nephritis, and especially calculous nephritis, or the passage of a calculus into the ureter.

COLICA STERCO'REA, Colica Stipitata, Stercoraceous Colic, (F.) Colique stercorale. A species of colic, ascribed to the retention of fecal matters in the intestines. The retention is itself, however, an effect, that may be caused in the same manner as the colic pains themselves.

When applied to a part, the ether evaporates, and the solid adhesive material is left, which contracts. Hence it is used in cases of wounds, to keep their edges together. It forms, also, a coating, and has been applied in abrasions, and in cases of burns. In various chronic cutaneous diseases, it has been applied with advantage; and has been employed to give a coating to pills, which it deprives of their taste, without interfering with their action.

COLLYRIUM, Collurium, Collurion, from κωλυω, 'I check,' and ρω, 'I flow,' or from κωλλα, 'glue,' and ουρα, 'tail,' (F.) Collyre. The ancients designated, by this term, a solid medicine, of a long, cylindrical shape; proper to be introduced into the vagina, anus, or nostrils. That portion of the large intestines which extends from the cæcum to the rectum. It is said to have been so called from κωλον, 'hollow,' or from κωλυω, 'I arrest,' because the excrements are arrested, for a considerable time, in its sacs,—cellulæ. The colon is usually divided into four portions. 1. The right lumbar or ascending, Colon dextrum, situate in the right lumbar region, and commencing at the cæcum. 2. Transverse colon, Colon transversum, transverse arch of the colon, the portion of the colon which crosses from the right to the left side, at the upper part of the abdomen. 3. (F.) Béton. The first milk after accouchement. It contains more serum and butter, and less casein than common milk, and seems to possess an evacuant property, which renders it fit to aid in the expulsion of the meconium. Colostrum formerly meant an emulsion prepared of turpentine and yolk of egg.

COLOUR-BLINDNESS, Achromatopsia.

COLOURS, ACCIDENTAL, Opposite colours, Complementary and Harmonic colours. If the eye has been for some time regarding a particular colour, the retina becomes insensible to this colour; and if, afterwards, it be turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the colour that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer. This bluish-green image is called an ocular spectrum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the colour bluish-green, is said to be the accidental colour of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colours, other accidental colours will be observed, varying with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table:—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental colour, or colour of the ocular spectrum.
Red.....	Bluish green
Orange.....	Blue.
Yellow.....	Indigo.
Green.....	Violet with a little red.
Blue.....	Orange red.
Indigo.....	Orange yellow.
Violet.....	Yellow-green.
Black.....	White.
White.....	Black.

If all the colours of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental colour of any particular colour will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colours have been termed opposite colours. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary colour, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental colour, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum—white light. The accidental colour, in other words, is what the primitive colour requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colours are, therefore, complements of each other; and hence accidental colours have also been called complementary colours. They have likewise been termed harmonic, because the primitive and its accidental colour harmonize with each other in painting.

These terms have been applied to the extraordinary phenomenon of a rapid destruction of the human body, by being reduced to ashes either spontaneously or by the contact of an ignited substance. It is said to have occurred in the aged, and in those that were fat and hard drinkers. In such, Dr. Traill has found a considerable quantity of oil in the serum of the blood. Vicq d'Azyr, Lair, and Dupuytren think it necessary, that the body should be placed in contact with an ignited substance. Le Cat, Kopp, and Marc are of opinion that this is not necessary. The former appears to be the more probable view.

COMPLEXIO, Coition, Complexio, Confusio, Temperament.

COMPLEXION, Complex'io. This is often employed, in English, for the colour of the face, as "He has a good complexion,"—a "allow complexion," &c. It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. It means more than constitution, for which it is used synonymously in many cases; and differs from temperament, which is less the external condition of the body than the state or disposition of the organs in health.—H. Cloquet.

COMPLEXUS, Complex.

COMPLEXUS MINOR, Mastoïdeus latera'lis, Trache'lo-mastoïdeus, (F.) Trachélo-mastoïdien, Muscle petit Complexus. It arises from the transverse processes of the last four cervical vertebrae, and is inserted into the mastoid process.

COMPRESSIO, Compression, Thlipsis.

COMPRES'SION, Compressio, Enerci'sis. Same etymology. Pressure; methodical compression. An agent frequently had recourse to in surgery. We compress a limb, affected with œdema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is compressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdominis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pressure aids the contractility of parts, and excites the action of the absorbents; so that large tumours at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, compresses, &c.

COMPRES'SION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumour, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine.

COMPRESSIVE, Compressivus. That which compresses. A compressive baudage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

COMPRESSOR or COMPRESSORIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect;—that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

COMPRESSOR NARIS, Renaus, Nasalis, Transversalis Nasi, Myctifornis, Dilatator alarum nasi, Constrictor Nasi, C. Narium, C. Naris, Triangularis Nasi, (F.) Maxillo-narial, Susmarillo-nasal, — (Ch.,) Compresseur du nez, Transversal du nez. A muscle, situate at the sides of the nose; flat and triangular. It arises from the inner part of the fossa canina, and passes to the dorsum of the nose; where it is confounded with that of the opposite side.

COMPRESSOR URETHRÆ. A muscle consisting of two portions—one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guthrie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wilson's muscle.

COMPRESSOR VENÆ DORSALIS PENIS. A small muscle, distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Houston, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

CONCEPTION, Conceptio, Conceptus, Cyesis, Syllepsis, Androcoep'sia, from concipio, (con and capio), 'I conceive.' The impregnation of the ovum by the positive contact of the male sperm, whence results a new being. The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows. During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter seize hold of the ovarium; and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a matured ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tube, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion, that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tubes, or uterus.

CONCEPTION, FALSE, Falsus Conceptus, Spurium germen, (F.) Fausse conception, Faux germe. An irregular, preternatural conception, the result of which is a mole or some similar production, instead of a properly organized foetus. See Mole.

CONCRETION, Concre'tio, Concremen'tum, from concre'scere, (con and cre'scere,) 'to condense, thicken, become solid.' Pexis, Sympex'is, πηξίς, συμπηξίς. The act of becoming thick or solid. It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together, — as, "concretion of the toes." Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excremential fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrementum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphate of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

In all severe injuries; in sudden encephalic hemorrhage, and in overwhelming emotions, a concussion or shock is felt to a greater or less extent in the nervous system, which requires the careful attention of the physician.

CONCUSSION OF THE BRAIN, Commo'tio Cer'ebr'i, Apoplex'ia nervosa trawmat'ica, Enccephalosis'mus, (F.) Commo'tion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo, tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing. Pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here, till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles, — by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savour of food, and contain but little nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

CONDIT, Confection.

CONDITUM, same etymon. A pharmaceutical compound of wine, honey, and some aromatics, especially pepper. Also, a confection.

It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of seven or eight inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular,—as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions,—as to the concave articular surfaces at the upper extremity of the tibia. As the word Condyloïdien means—'that which has the shape of a condyle,'—it has been judiciously proposed by some French anatomists that condyliën should be used in preference, in the case of the foramina and fossæ.

Physiologically, a breath, or a sound produced in the larynx, which suffers more or less interruption in its passage through the vocal tube.

A state of the bowels, in which the evacuations do not take place as frequently as usual; or are inordinately hard, and expelled with difficulty. It may be owing either to diminished action of the muscular coat of the intestines, or to diminished secretion from the mucous membrane, or to both. Cathartics will usually remove it; after which its exciting and predisponent causes must be inquired into and obviated to render the cure permanent.

CONSPIPATUS, Constipated.

CONSTIPÉ, Constipated.

CONSTITUENS, Vehicle, see Prescription.

CONSTITUTIO, Constitution, Habit of body — c. Acris, Constitution of the atmosphere — c. Epidemica, Constitution, epidemic — c. Nervosa, Nervous diathesis.

CONSTITUTION, Constitu'tio, Catas'tasis, Status, from con, and statuere, from stare, 'to stand.' A collection of several parts, forming a whole. In medicine, Constitution means the state of all the organs of the human body considered in regard to their special and relative arrangement, order, or activity. A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly labouring under, or unusually susceptible of, disease.

CONSTITUTION OF THE ATMOSPHERE, Constitu'tio A'ëris, (F.) Constitution Atmosphérique. The condition of the atmosphere, as regards dryness and humidity, temperature, heaviness, direction of the winds, &c., considered as respects its influence on the animal economy.

CONSTITUTION, EPIDEM'IC, Constitu'tio epidem'ica, Medical Constitution, (F.) Constitution médicale, C. épidémique. The aggregate of meteorological conditions, so far as they are appreciable, during which diseases prevail epidemically.

CONSTITUTIONAL, (F.) Constitutionnel. Belonging to the constitution of an individual; to his manner of being; as constitutional phthisis, c. gout, &c. By some, this epithet has been given to diseases, produced by the constitution of the atmosphere; but this acceptance is not common.

CONSTRICTEURS DE LA VULVE, Constrictores cunni — c. du Vagin, Constrictores cunni.

CONSTRIC'TIO, Astriction, Systole.

CONSTRIC'TIVA, Styctics.

CONSTRIC'TOR, from constringere, (con, and stringere), 'to bind.' (F.) Constricteur. That which binds in a circular direction. A sphincter. Different muscles are so called.

Small muscles, which originate beneath the clitoris, descend along the sides of the vagina, and terminate by becoming confounded with the transversus perinæi and external sphincter ani muscles. Their use is to contract the entrance of the vagina.

CONSTRICTORES ISTHMI FAUCIUM, Glossostaphylinus.

CONSTRIC'TORES LARYN'GIS. Lieutaud describes, under the name Grand constricteur du Larynx, the muscle Crico-arytenoïdeus lateralis with the Thyro-arytenoïdeus.

CONSTRICTORES ORIS, Orbicularis oris — c. Palpebrarum, Orbicularis palpebrarum.

CONSTRIC'TORES PHARYN'GIS, Constrictors of the Pharynx, Sphincter Gulæ. Muscular expansions which assist in forming the parietes of the pharynx. Three of these are generally admitted.

1. The Constrictor Pharyngis inferior, Crico-pharyngeus and Thyro-pharyngeus, (F.) Crico-thyro-pharyngien. It is broad, very thin, quadrilateral, seated superficially, extending from the thyroid and cricoid cartilages as far as the middle of the pharynx, and uniting, on the median line, with that of the opposite side. 2. The Constrictor Pharyngis Medius, Hyo-pharyngeus and Chondro-pharyngeus, Syndesmo-pharyngeus, (F.) Hyo-glossobasi-pharyngien, occupies the middle part of the pharynx. It is triangular, and attached, anteriorly, to the great and little cornu of the os hyoides; to the stylohyoid ligament; and terminates, posteriorly, by joining its fellow of the opposite side. 3. The Constrictor Pharyngis superior, Ceph'alo-pharyngeus, Glossopharyngeus, Mylo-pharyngeus, Pter'gyo-pharyngeus, (F.) Pter'gyo-syndesmo-staphili-pharyngien, is quadrilateral, and extends from the internal ala of the pterygoid process, from the inter-maxillary ligament, from the internal oblique line of the jaw, and from the base of the tongue to the posterior part of the pharynx.

The constrictors of the pharynx contract it. They can likewise approximate the ends to each other. Chaussier considers those and the stylo-pharyngeus as but one muscle, and includes all under this last name.

CONSTRICTORES VAGINÆ, C. cunni — c. Valvæ, C. cunni.

CONSTRINGENTIA, Astringents, Styptics.

CONSUETUDO, Habit — c. Menstrua, Menses.

CONSULTATION, Consulta'tio, Delibera'tio, Cœnolog'ia, Conten'tio, Symboleu'sis, from consulere, consultum, 'to hold council.' This word has several acceptations. In English, it means, almost always, the meeting of two or more practitioners, to deliberate on any particular case of disease. In France, it signifies the written result of such deliberations, as well as the opinion of a physician, given to a patient, who consults him, either personally or by writing.

CONSULT'ING PHYSIC'IAN or SUR-GEON, (F.) Médecin ou Chirurgien consultant.
One who consults with the attending practitioner, regarding any case of disease. Some physicians, surgeons, and accoucheurs confine themselves to consulting practice.

CONSUMMATUM, Consummé.

CONSUMMATUS, from con, cum, 'with,' and summus, 'the whole.' Confirmed; established; developed,—as Phthisis consummata, 'confirmed consumption.'

CONSUMPTION, from consumere, (con and sumere,) 'to waste away,' Consump'tio, Consum-tio, Syntex'is, (F.) Consumption. Progressive emaciation or wasting away. This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis:
on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption.—See Phthisis. Fièvre de Consumption, Consumptive fever, is the same as Hectic fever.

CONSUMPTION OF THE BOWELS, Enterophthisis—
c. Pulmonary, Phthisis pulmonalis.

CONSUMPTIVA. Same etymology. Caustics, used for the destruction of fungi. Burnt alum, lunar caustic, &c., were formerly so called.

CONSUMTIO, Consumption.

CONTABESCEN'TIA, from contabescere, (con and tabescere,) 'to grow lean.' Consumption, marasmus, atrophy, &c.

CONTACT, Contactus, from con and tangere,
'to touch.' The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient labouring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him.
The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected.

CONTA'GION, Contag'io, Conta'ges, Contagium, Aporrhœ'a, Apoc'rysis. Same etymon.
The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied, by some, to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gra-vior, and in measles and scarlatina. Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer, have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous.

Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact; as measles, scarlet fever, &c., whilst infection is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases, which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specific contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

CONTA'GIONIST. One who believes in the contagious character of a particular disease,—as of yellow fever.

CONTA'GIOUS, Contagio'sus. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact;
—as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c.

CONTAGIUM, Contagion, Miasm.

CONTEMPLABLES DIES, Critical days.

CONTEMPLATIF, (F.) Contemplati'vus, (con and templum.) Appertaining to contemplation.

the monomaniac—is sometimes called contemplative.

cover,') 'to weave,' 'to make a web.' Arrangement of parts;—texture. A name given, metaphorically, to the structure of organized bodies;
as the texture of muscles, fibres, &c. See Tissue, and Texture.

CONTIGUITY, DIARTHROSIS OF, see Continuity.

CONTINENCE, Continen'tia, from continere, (con and tenere, 'to hold or keep,') 'to contain oneself;' 'to restrain.' Restraint. Abstinence from, or moderation in, the pleasures of physical love.

CONTINENS, Continent.

CONTINENT, Continens. Restrained. This word is synonymous, also, with Continued; (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Causa conjuncta, is a cause, real or presumed, which, having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A continent fever, Febris continens, is one which preserves during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterruptedly, has been also called Eripathi'a, Acipathi'a or Aipathi'a.

CONTINENTIA, Continence.

continens, F. anabat'ica, F. assid'ua*. A fever which presents no interruption in its course.
Continued fevers form a division in the class
Pyrexia of Cullen, and include three genera,— Synocha, Synchus, and Typhus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continual fever, συνεχης, febris continua, and the synchus or febris continens. Thus, Rhases states that the synchus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; whilst the continua is allied to intermittents.

CONTINU'ITY, Continu'itas. An adhesion of two things between each other, so that they cannot be separated without fracture or laceration.

CONTINUITY, DIARTHRO'SES OF, (F.) Diarthroses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immodiately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGUITY, Diarthroses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINUITY, SOLUTION OF, Solutio continui, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

CONTONDANT, Contunding.

CONTORSIO, Contorsion—c. Columnæ vertebralis, Rhachiostrophosis.

CONTORSION, Contortio, from contorqueo, (con and torquere, 'to wring,') 'I twist about.' Violent movement of a part, accompanied with a kind of torsion; as contortion of the face.

CONTRAAPERTURA, from contra, 'against,' and aperio, 'I open.' A counter-opening; Contra-incisio, Incisio priori opposita, (F.) Contre-ouverture. An incision, made in the most depending part of a wound or abscess, when the first opening is not situate in a manner favourable for the discharge of the pus.

CONTRAEXTENSIO, Counter-extension.

CONTRACTILE, Contractilis, from contractere, (con and trahere,) 'to draw together.' Capable of contracting. The fibre of muscles is contractile.

CONTRACTILITÉ, Contractility—c. par défaut d'Extension, Elasticity—c. de Tissu, Elasticity.

CONTRACTILITY, Contractilitas: same etymon; (F.) Contractilité. That vital property, which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain:—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

CONTRACTILITY, Irritability.

CONTRACTIO, Contractio, Systole.

CONTRACTION, Contractio. Same etymon; Systolē. Action of contracting. When we speak of the contraction of a muscle, we mean the phenomenon it exhibits during the time it is in action.

CONTRACTOR UTERI, Abortive.

CONTRACTURA. Same etymon. Acamp'sia, Entas'ia articularis, Rigor artuum, Muscular Stiff-joint. A state of permanent rigidity and progressive atrophy of the flexor muscles, which prevents the motions of extension beyond a certain limit. The affected muscles form hard cords beneath the skin. On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It succeeds, frequently, other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica pictonum, &c. The warm bath, vapour bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

CONTRAFISSURA, from contra, 'against,' and fundo, fissum, 'I cleave;' Repercussio, Resonans, Catig'ma Fissura contra'ra'vus, Apeche'ma, Anticon'ma, Antic'opē, Antic'usis, Antic'usma, Infortu'nium, Counterstroke, (F.) Contre-coup, Con- tre-fente, Contre-fracture. A fracture, contusion, or injury, produced, by a blow, in a part distant from that which is struck. Five species of contrafissura or contre-coups may occur in the skull. 1. When the internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbour is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighbouring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonance.

CONTREINDICATION, Counter-indication.

CONTREOUVERTURE, Contra-apertura.

CONTREXEVILLE, MINERAL WATERS OF. Contrexeville is a town in France in the department of Vosges, four leagues from Neufchâteau. The waters contain carbonate of iron, chloride of calcium, and carbonate of lime, chloride of sodium, a bituminous substance, and free carbonic acid. They are frequented by those labouring under cutaneous, serofulous, and calculous affections.

CONTRIT'IO, Syntrim'ma, Syntrip'sis, Tritu'ra, Tritus, Trit'io, Tripsis, from contero, 'I bruise or make small.' Comminution, Trituration.

CONTROSTIMULANT, Contrastimulans, Hyposthen'ic, from contra, 'against,' and stimulus, 'that which excites.' A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of Contro-stimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

CONTROSTIMULUS. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, about thirty years ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the contro-stimulant property attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name excitability, a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthen'ia: when too little, there is deficiency or Hyposthen'ia. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthenic; 2. Hyposthenic; 3. Irritative. The contro-stimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines—stimulants and contro-stimulants.

CONTUND'ING, Contu'sing, Contundens, from contundere, (con and tundere,) 'to bruise.' (F.) Contondant. That which causes contusions. An epithet given to round, blunt, vulnerating projectiles, which bruise or lacerate parts without cutting them.

CONTUS, Contused.

CONTUS, Penis.

CONTU'SED. Same etymon. (F.) Contus. Affected with contusion. Thus we say—a contused wound.

CONTU'SION, Contu'sio, a Bruise, Collis'io, Phlasma, Thlasis, Thlas'ma, Th.contu'sio, Rhegē, Rhegma, Rhegmus, Famca, Famis, Famix, (F.) Meurtrissure. Same etymon. An injury or lesion—arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface—which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous areolar tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture of the parts has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep contusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcoth'lasia, and Sarcothlas'ma.

CONUS ARTERIOSUS, Infundibulum of the heart. The portion of the right ventricle from which the pulmonary artery proceeds, forms a prominence on the right side of the anterior furrow of the heart, and is prolonged towards the left, becoming narrower at the same time, so as to form a funnel-shaped projection, which extends a little beyond the base of the ventricles. This is the Conus arteriosus.

CONUS VASCULOSUS, see Coni Vasculosi.

CONVALES'CENTE, Convalescentia, Analep'sis, Anas'tasis, Reconvalescentia, from convalescere, (con and valescere) 'to grow well.' Ex-anas'trophē. Recovery of health after disease. The time which elapses between the termination of a disease and complete restoration of strength.

Its operation is cathartic, the resinous part griping violently. Dose, 10 gr. to ʒss. A drop or two of any essential oil may prevent it from griping. An active principle has been separated from Jalap, to which the names Jalopin and Cathartin have been given.

CONVOLVULUS MAJOR ALBUS, Convolvulus sepium—c. Maritimus, Convolvulus soldanella.

It is given in gonorrhœa, gleet, leucorrhœa, &c., in the dose of grt. x to ʒj, twice or thrice a day. Should symptoms of urticaria or diarrhœa arise, the dose is too large, and must be diminished. It can be inspissated by means of magnesia so as to be made into pills, and a plan has been devised for enveloping it in gelatin, so that its taste is entirely concealed. See Capsules, gelatinous.

Cullen uses the word synonymously with Dysœcœa, and Pinel with Parac'osis or Parac'œe. According to Sauvages, Cophosis differs from both,—from Dysœcœa, because in it the sonorous rays cannot reach the labyrinth; and from Parac'osis, which consists in a confused state of hearing.

Cophosis seems, usually, to be synonymous with deafness,—Parac'osis Sur'ditas.

It arises from the coracoid process of the scapula, and is inserted at the middle part of the inner side of the humerus. It carries the arm forwards and inwards, raising the humerus a little. CORACO CLAVICULAR LIGAMENT,—called, also, Omo-clavicular,—serves to unite the clavicle to the coracoid process. It is very irregular, and formed of two fasciuli, which the greater part of anatomists have described as particular ligaments, under the names Conoid and Trapezoid.

It is fixed to submarine rocks, in the form of a shrub; and is of a bright red colour. It is the habitation of a multitude of animals, of the Zoophyta order, and is formed of a calcareous substance, secreted by the animals themselves. It is in very hard, concentric layers; covered, externally, by a species of porous bark, full of cellules, each of which contains one of these animals. Linnæus calls the red coral, Isis nob'ilis, and M. de Lamarck, Corallium rubrum. It is much fished for on the coasts of Barbary and Sicily. Coral was formerly esteemed tonic, absorbent, astringent, &c.; but analysis has shown, that it contains only carbonate of lime and a little gelatin.—Dioscorides, Pliny, Orithasius, the Geoponica, &c. It contains gelatin, albumen, chloride of sodium, phosphate, carbonate and sulphate of lime, carbonate of magnesia, silica, oxide of iron, and a colouring principle. varying in thickness, observed on blood drawn from a vein during the existence of violent inflammation, pregnancy, &c. It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite, that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles, with increased aggregation of those corpuscles. Under such circumstances, the buffy coat assumes a concave appearance on its upper surface, and the blood is, therefore, said to be cupped.

The buff is generally believed to consist of fibrin; but, according to the researches of Mulder, it is composed of a binoxide of protein, which is insoluble in boiling water, and a tritoxide which is soluble. These oxides are comprehended by him under the name oxyprotein.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy.

CORK, Suber.

CORMUS. In botany, when the stem of a plant, without creeping or rooting, is distended under ground, retaining a round or oval form, it is so called. The Cormus is vulgarly termed a root,—radix.

CORN, (Saxon corn,) (G.) Kern. In England, this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds, which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States, Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, Clavus, Clavus Pedis, Ephy'ma Clavus, Gemur'sa, (F.) Cor, Ognon, from cornu, a 'horn.' A small, hard, corneous tumour, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts, by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumour, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed, by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustic, or by paring them down and pulling them out by the roots; but these operations are not always as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and, for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, the lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

or Sclerotic. It is convex, anteriorly; concave, posteriorly; forming nearly one-fifth of the anterior part of the eye, and representing a segment of a sphere about seven lines and a half, or in. 0.625 in diameter. It seems to be constituted of laminae in superposition, but of the precise number anatomists are not agreed. Henle assigns it four; the third, a very solid cartilaginous lamella, being called Membrane de Demours or M. de Descemet. Messrs. Todd and Bowman assign it five layers.

Scattered through the plexus formed by the blood-vessels and uriniferous tubes in the kidney, a number of small dark points may be seen with the naked eye, which received their name from Malpighi, their describer. Each of these, under the microscope, is found to consist of a convoluted mass of blood-vessels, which constitutes the true glandule, corpuscle or glomerule of Malpighi. It was at one time supposed that the tubuli uriniferi originate in them; but this does not appear to be the case. Their use is not positively known, but as they have been traced by Mr. Bowman into the commencement of the urinary tubes, in which they lie uncovered, it has been supposed that their office may be to separate the watery portions of the blood to be mixed with the proper urinous matter.

It then proceeds to the end of the corpora cavernosa, and terminates in the glans penis, which it forms. They cover the region of the kidneys and renal capsules, which are formed afterwards; and they are presumed to be the organs of urinary secretion during the first periods of foetal existence.

They appear, however, to have been depicted in 1741 by Lehmann, from a preparation by A. Vater, who called them Papilla and P. nervæ. Hence, it has been proposed by J. C. Strahl (1848) to call them Vaterian corpuscles or Corpuscles of Vater (Vater'sche Körperchen). Small bodies connected with the cutaneous nerves of the palm and sole. They have also been found sparingly and inconstantly in nerves at the wrist and elbow; in the upper arm, fore-arm, and thigh, and intercostal nerve, the sacral plexus, solar plexus and the plexuses adjacent to it. In each corpuscle there is the termination of a nervous filament. Their uses are not known.

CORSE, Corra.

CORSET, from (F.) corps, 'the body.' Stethodesm'ium, Stethodesm'is, Stethodesm'us, Tu'nica Thora'cis, Thorax, Pectora'lē. An article of dress, which closely embraces the trunk, and is much used by females in civilized countries. When corsets or stays are worn very tight, many serious evils result from the unnatural compression.

Different bandages, more or less complicated, which embrace the greater part of the trunk, are likewise so called.

CORSET DE BRASDOR. The name of a bandage invented by one Brasdor, to keep in situ the fragments of a fractured clavicle.

CORTALON, Senecio.

CORTEX, Phloios, Phloos, Phloos, Lemna, Bark, (F.) Écorce. This word has often been applied exclusively to Cinchona: thus, we say Bark—the cortex or bark κατ' ἴσχυριν. It means, also, any bark.

CORTEX ADSTRING'ENS BRASILIEN'SIS. An astringent bark introduced from Brazil into Germany in the year 1828. It is said to be obtained from Mimosa cochleocarpa seu virginat'is. CORTEX CER'EBRI. The Cortical, Cinerit'ious, Vesic'ular or Gray substance of the Brain. The gray portion observed at the exterior of the cerebrum and cerebellum; so called because it forms a kind of bark to the medullary substance. Gall considers, that this substance forms the nerves; and therefore calls it Substance matrice des Nerfs.

The name cortical is likewise given to the external substance of the kidneys, because it is of a deeper colour than the inner part of the organ, and forms a kind of envelope to it.

CORTEX CHACARILLÆ, Croton Cascarilla—c. Chinæ, Cinchona—c. Chinæ regius, Cinchona—c. Crassior, Laurus cassia—c. Cullaban, see Laurus Cullawan—c. Cullawan, Laurus Cullawan—c. Elcutheriæ, Croton cascarilla—c. Flavus, Cinchona cordifoliæ cortex—c. Lavola, see Illicium anisatum—c. Magellanicus, see Wintersaromatica.

CORTEX OVI, Cortical membrane. This membrane, so called by Boer and Granville, is usually regarded as a uterine production, and designated Decid'ua reflex'a. They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connexion takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider, that the Cortex Ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. This Dr. Granville calls membra'na pro'pria. See Decidua membrana.

CORTEX PALLIDUS, Cinchona lancifoliæ cortex—c. Patrum, Cinchona—c. Peruvianus, Cinchona—c. Profluvii, Nerium antidysentericum—c. Ruber, Cinchonæ oblongifoliæ cortex—c. Striata dentiam, Enamel of the teeth—c. Thuris, Croton cascarilla—c. Winteranus, see Wintersaromaticum—c. Winteranus spurius, Canella alba.

The false ribs are the remaining 5: the uppermost three being united, by means of their cartilages, to the cartilage of the last true rib. The others are free at their external extremity, and, hence, have been called Floating ribs, Côtes flottantes. The vertebral extremity of each rib is slightly expanded. It is called the head of the rib—Capitulum Costæ: the space between this and the tubercle is the collum or neck. Anterior to the tubercle is the angle. CRANIOLOGY, Cranios'copy, Cranio'log'ia, Phrenology, Cranioscop'ia, C. Gallia'na, Encephaloscop'ia, Doctri'na Gallia'na. Words, introduced, since Gall, into medical language. The first two terms are respectively derived from κρανιον, 'cranium,' λογος, 'a discourse,' and σκοπειν, 'to examine.' They signify a description, or simply an examination of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from thence a knowledge of the different intellectual, and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cranioscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Craniology, Organology or Cranology, as it has been variously termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone, as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 faculties. The following Table exhibits these supposed organs, and their seat.

A fundamental principle with the Craniologists or Phrenologists is,—that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs: but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

The cremaster is a very thin, muscular fascia—sometimes hardly perceptible—which detaches itself from the internal oblique muscle; passes through the abdominal ring, and vanishes around the tunica vaginalis; serving to draw up the testicle, and to move it slightly. Some mean by crisis of a disease, when it augments or diminishes considerably, becomes transformed into another, or ceases entirely. Some have used the word to signify only the favourable changes which supervene in disease; others, for the change going on in the acme or violence of the disease. Others, again, have given this name only to a rapid and favourable change, joined to some copious evacuation or eruption; whilst others have applied the term to the symptoms that accompany such change, and not to the change itself;—thus including, under the same denomination, the critical phenomena and the crisis.

Internun'cii*, (F.) Jours critiques, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favourably on the 7th day, and many on the 14th;—these two days being the most propitious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 18th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called by Galen, the Tyrant, rupavos, because the crises that happened then were generally unfavourable. After this, the most unfavourable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it being neither favourable nor unfavourable. Days were, also, divided into Intercalary, on which the crises happened less frequently, and were less complete than on the critical or indicatory;—and into vacant and non-decretory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:

Critical days 7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th, 40th, 60th, &c.

Indicatory days 4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.

Intercalary days 3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.

CRURAL ARCH, In'guinal Arch, Fem'oral Arch, (F.) Arcade crurale, A. inguinale (Ch.), Poupart's Ligament, L. of Fallo'pius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a fasciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of GIMBERNAT'S Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

CRURAL ARTERY, Fem'oral Artery, (F.) Artère crurale, A. Pelvi-crurale,—(Ch.) is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Artère crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries; embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

CRURAL CANAL, Crural Ring, Fem'oral canal or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémoral. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he has named Septum crurale, Orural septum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior parietes formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata: the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia iliaca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal, that Femoral or Crural Hernia, Hernie inguinale of Chaussier, occurs: which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situated.

CRURAL NERVE proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæna nerve. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Accessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

CRURAL PLEXUS of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves, and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

CRURALIS, Cruræus. A part of the Triceps crural of the French, or of the Trifemororotulien of Chaussier. The cruralis is situate at the anterior, outer, and inner part of the thigh. It arises, fleshy, from between the two trochanters, adheres firmly to most of the fore part of the os femoris, and is inserted, tendinous, into the upper part of the patella, behind the rectus. Its use is to assist the vasti and rectus in the extension of the leg. Under Muscle Triceps Crural, the French describe the cruralis and the two vasti. Some small muscular slips, sometimes found under the crurus muscle, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the knee-joint, have been called Sub-cruræi.

CUBITAL ARTERY, Arteria cubitalis, A. ulna'ris, arises from the humeral a little below the bend of the elbow; proceeds along the anterior and inner part of the forearm; passes anterior to the ligamentum annulare of the carpus, and goes to form, in the palm of the hand, the superficial palmar arch. Besides the numerous muscular branches, which it gives off in its course, it sends posteriorly the common trunk of the interosseous arteries, and internally, the two cubital recurrents, anterior and posterior,—articular branches, which anastomose on the inside of the elbow with the divisions of the humeral artery.

CUBITAL MUSCLES are two in number. 1. The Cubitalis anterior, C. inter'nus, Flexor carpi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris inter'nus, Epitrochli-cubito-carpien, Cubito-carpien—(Ch.), is a long muscle, situate at the anterior and inner part of the forearm. It arises from the inner condyle of the os humeri, at the inner side of the olecranon, and from the posterior edge of the ulna, and is inserted by a tendon into the os pisiforme. Its use is to bend the hand on the forearm, by directing it slightly inwards. 2. The Cubitalis posterior seu exter'nus, Exten'sor Carpi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris exter'nus, Cubite'us exter'nus, Cubito-sus-métacarpie'n—(Ch.), is situate at the posterior part of the forearm. CUBITAL NERVE, Ulnar nerve, Cubito-digital—(Ch.), is furnished by the last two or three nerves of the brachial plexus, and is distributed to the inner and anterior side of the forearm; to the inner part of the palm and of the back of the hand, and to the last two or three fingers.

CUTANEOUS EXHALATION AND ABSORPTION are those which take place from the skin.

CUTANEOUS, MIDDLE POSTERIOR, see Sciatic nerve, lesser.

CUTANEOUS NERVES, Cutaneous Nerves, so called, of the upper extremity, are two in number. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous, Cubito-cutané, (Ch.,) descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio-cutané (Ch.,) Musculo-Cutaneus, Perforans CASSE'RII, passes outwards, perforates the coraco-brachialis; descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm; passes as far as the middle fold of the elbow under the median cephalic; and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Cutaneous nerves, Middle cutaneous, two in number, are branches of the crural or femoral nerve. They are distributed to the integument of the middle and lower part of the thigh and of the knee.

Nervus Cutaneus Minor, Lesser internal cutaneous nerve, Nerve of Wrisberg, takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Radial and Cubital Cutaneous.

CUTIS, Pellis, Pella, Corium, Derma, Deris, Anthropè, Anthro'pen, Skin, (F.) Peau. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body; and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epidermis, rete or more properly corpus mucosum, and corium. Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, which are generally regarded as essentially nervous and vascular. The skin is our medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch, and through it are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords useful information in pathological investigations. Its colour, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The colour of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general rule, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-coloured, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to the races, &c.

(F.) Cyanose, Maladie bleu, Ictère bleu. A disease in which the surface of the body is coloured blue. It is often symptomatic, and commonly depends on a direct communication between the cavities of the right and left side of the heart. Such communication does not, however, always occasion the blue disease, but it is generally thought that the disease never exists without this state of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyanosed, (F.) Cyanosé.

It comprises the following chief varieties.

CYNANCHE EPIDEMICA, Cynanche maligna—c. Externa, C. Parotidæa—c. Faucium, C. tonsillar

—c. Gangrænosa, Cynancho maligna—c. Laryngea, Laryngitis.

Angine gangrænuse, A. Maligne. It is characterized by crimson redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces and tonsils; ulcerations, covered with mucus, and spreading sloughs, of an ash or whitish hue; the accompanying fever typhus. It is often epidemic, and generally contagious; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever,—giving rise to the variety, Scarlatina maligna. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid.

CYNANCHE MAXILLARIS, c. Parotidæa—c. Œsophagea, Œsophagitis.

CYNANCHE PAROTIDÆA, Empres'ma Parotit'is, Parotitis, P. epidem'ica, P. crysipelato'sa, P. contagio'sa, P. spur'ria, P. sero'so-glu'tinû' tuens, Parot'ia, Parotid'itis, Cynanché Parotides, C. exter'na, Angina maxilla'ris, G'issa, Angina externa, Ang'na parotidæa exter'na, Erythroche'ras, Cynanché maxilla'ris, Genyo'cyan'chê, Gnathocynanché, Inflammati'io parotidum, Inflatti'io parotidum, Catar'rhus Bellinsulæ'us, Branks (Scotch), Mumps, (F.) Inflammation de la Parotide, Oreillons, Ovules. The characteristic symptoms are:—a painful tumour of the parotid gland, or of the cellular tissue surrounding it, or of both, not of the suppurative kind; frequently extending to the maxillary gland. It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testes in the male, and of the mamma in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious. (?) The treatment is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mamma or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Parotit'is or Mumps is also termed Parotit'is polymor'pha, P. epidem'ica, P. spec'if'ica.

CYNANCHE PHARYNGE'A, Empres'ma Paristhm'itis Pharyngea, Isthm'itis, Pharyngit'is, Inflammati'io Pharyng'is, Parasynanché, Anginæ inflammatoria, Sp. iv.—(Boerhaave.) (F.) Angine Pharyngée, Catarrhe pharyngien. Inflammation of the pharynx.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment, from Cynanche tonsillar. The same may be remarked of the Cynanché Œsophage'a, Œsophagit'is.

CYNANCHE PRUNELLA, C. Tonsillar—c. Purpuro-parotidæa, Cynanche maligna—c. Simplex, Isthmitis—c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

CYNANCHE TONSILLARIS, Empres'ma Paristhm'itis Tonsilla'ris, Synanché, Cynanché faucium Amygdal'itis, Branci, Branchi, Hyan'chê, Tonsill'itis, Cynanché Prunella, Paristhm'ia, Paristhm'itis, Dysph'agia inflammato'ria, Anti-ad'itis, Angina inflammato'ria, A. emu'to'rè, A. tonsilla'ris, A. Synochal'is, A. Squin'cea, A. vera et legit'ima, Inflammati'io Tonsilla'rum, Antiadon'cus inflammato'rius, Inflammatory Sore Throat, Common Squinancy, Squinsy or Quinsy, (F.) Amygdalite, Inflammation des Amygdales, Angine tonsillaire, Pharyngit'is tonsillaire, Esquinancie, Squinancie, Catarrhe guttural, Angine gutturale inflammato'rie. The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent, — in addition to this, — bleeding, local or general, or both, — purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapisms or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as pus shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

CYNANCHE TRACHEALIS; the Cynanche laryngea of some, Suffocatio strid'ula, Angina perniciosa, Asthma infantum, Cynanche strid'ula, Catar'rhus suffocativus Barbudensis, Angina polyposa sive membrana'cea sive pulpo'sa, Empres'ma Bronchitis, E. Tracheitis, Morbus Strangulato'rius, Tracheitis, Tracheitis, Tracheitis, Diphtheritis trachealis, Expectoratio Sol'ida, Cunna Bronchitis, Croup, Roup, Hives, Chোক, Stuffing, Rising of the lights, (F.) Angine laryngée et trachéale, Laryngite avec production de fausses membranes, Laryngite pseudo-membraneuse. A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing, or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnoea and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnoea, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some places than in others, and hence the success obtained by different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general rule, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age, — the warm bath, blisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early, it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croups, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath.

Considerable diminution or total loss of hearing. It may be the effect of acute or chronic inflammation of the internal ear, paralysis of the auditory nerve or its pulpy extremity, or of some mechanical obstruction to the sonorous rays. In most cases, however, the cause of the deafness is not appreciable, and the treatment has to be purely empirical. Syringing the ears, dropping in slightly stimulating oils, fumigations, &c., are the most likely means to afford relief.

DEATH, (Sax. deað,) Apobio'sis, Abio'sis, Ex-tinctio, Ob'itus, Psychorag'ia, Psychorrhag'ia, Letum, Letum, Mors, Inter'itus, Than'atos, Death, (F.) Mort. Definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life. Real Death, Apolluana'sia, is distinguished from asphyxia or apparent death:—the latter being merely a suspension of those same functions. But it is often difficult to judge of such suspension, and the only certain sign of real death is the commencement of putrefaction. At times, therefore, great caution is requisite to avoid mistakes. Death is commonly preceded by some distressing symptoms, which depend on lesion of respiration, circulation, or of the cerebral function, and which constitute the agony. That which occurs suddenly, and without any, or with few, precursory signs, is called sudden death. It is ordinarily caused by disease of the heart; apoplexy; the rupture of an aneurism, or by some other organic affection. Death is natural, when it occurs as the result of disease: violent, when produced by some forcible agency. It may likewise affect the whole body, or a part only; hence the difference between somatic and molecular death.

The chief varieties of the modes of death may be thus given:—

Death beginning at the heart,	{ Suddenly—Syn- eope: Gradual— Asthenia.
“ “ in the lungs—Asphyxia.
“ “ in the brain—Apoplexy.	{ Paralysis of pneumogastrics, medulla, &c. in the blood—necræmia.

DEBILITANTS, Debilitant'ia, Antidynam'ica, Philodynam'ica, from debilitare, itself from debilis, quasi debilis, 'weak,' 'to weaken.' Remedies exhibited for the purpose of reducing excitement. Antiphlogistics are, hence, debilitants.

DEBILITAS, Debility—d. Erethisica, see Irritable—d. Nervosa, Neurasthenia, see Irritable—d. Visus, Asthenopia.

DEBILITY, Debilitas, Asthenia, Blaci'a, Anenergy'sia, Anenergy'a, Weakness, (F.) Faiblesse. A condition, which may be induced by a number of causes. It must not be confounded with fatigue, which is temporary, whilst debility is generally more permanent.

Debility may be real, or it may be apparent; and, in the management of disease, it is important to attend to this. At the commencement of fever, for example, there is often a degree of apparent debility, which prevents the use of appropriate means, and is the cause of much evil. Excitement is more dangerous than debility.

DÉBOITEMENT, Luxation.

DÉBORDEMENT (F.), from déborder, (de and border) 'to overflow.' A popular term for one or more sudden and copious evacuations from the bowels. It is chiefly applied to bilious evacuations of this kind—Débordement de Bile.

DÉBRIDEMENT (F.). Fræno'rnu solutio, from (F.) débrider, (de and brider), 'to unbridle.'

The removal of filaments, &c., in a wound or abscess, which prevent the discharge of pus. In a more general acceptation, it means the cutting of a soft, membranous or aponeurotic part, which interferes with the exercise of any organ whatever: thus, in paraphimosis, débridement of the prepuce is practised to put an end to the inflammation of the glans: in strangulated hernia, débridement of the abdominal ring is had recourse to, to remove the stricture of the intestine, &c.

DECIDUA, Decidua membrana.

DECID'UA MEMBR'NA, Decid'ua, Decid'uons Membrane, from decidere, 'to fall off,' (de, and cadere.) So called on account of its being considered to be discharged from the uterus at parturition. A membrane, formerly defined to be the outermost membrane of the fœtus in utero; and still so defined by some—as by Dr. Lee. Chaussier calls it Epicho'rion: by others, it has been called *Membra'na cadu'ca Hunteri, M. flocculen'ta, M. cellulosa, M. sinuosa, M. commun'is, M. præexistens, Decidua externa, Tu'nica exterior ovi, T. cadu'ca, T. crassa, Membra'na cribrosa, Membra'na ovi mater'na, M. mucosa, Decidua spongio'sa, Epi'o'nè, Placen'ta uteri succenturiat'us, Subplacen'ta, Membra'na u'teri inter'na evolu'ta, Nidamentum, Anhis'tons membrane, (F.) Caducque, C. cræic, Membrane caducque, Épione, Périone. Prior to the time of the Hunters, called Cho'rion spongio'sum, C. tomento'sum, fungo'sum, reticulat'um, &c., Tu'nica filamentosa, Shaggy Chorion, Spongy Chorion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed, regarding this membrane and its reflected portion. It exists before the germ arrives in the uterus,—as it has been met with in tubal and ovarian pregnancies; and is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau and others consider it to be a sac, without apertures, completely lining the uterus, and that when the ovum descends through the tube, it pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except at the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane, which covers the ovum, forms the Membra'na decid'ua reflex'a, (F.) Caducque refléchie, Membrane caducque refléchie, according to them;—the part lining the uterus being the Decidua U'teri. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflexa disappears. The* very existence of a Tunica decidua reflexa has, however, been denied. This last membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regarding it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cortex ovi. It has also been termed Juvol'erum membrana'ecum, Membrana retiformis cho'rii, Membrana filamentosa, M. adventitia and M. crassa, Ovidine and Decidua protrusa. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus and others, is situate between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gave the name membrana decidua scrotina.

Histological researches seem to show, that the decidua is an altered condition of the lining membrane of the uterus, with a whitish secretion filling the uterine tubular glands. The decidua reflexa is probably formed by the agency of nucleated cells from the plastic materials thrown out from the decidua uteri; in the same manner as the chorion is formed in the Fallopian Tube from plastic materials thrown out from its lining membrane. That the decidua reflexa is not a mere inverted portion of the decidua uteri is shown by the fact, that the texture of the two is by no means identical.

DECIDUA PROTRUSA, Decidua reflexa.

DECIDUOUS MEMBRANE, Decidua (membrana).

DEC'IGRAMME, Decigramma, from decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.' The tenth part of the gramme in weight; equal to a little less than two grains. French; 1.543 Troy.

DECLAMATION, Declamatio, from de, and clamare, 'to cry out.' The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied with gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease; the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,—accompanied by the great excitement, sometimes experienced,—is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

DÉCLIN, Decline.

DECLINATIO, Decline.

DECLINE, Declinatio, Inclinatio, Decrementum, Remissio, Paracmē, Paracmāsis, (F.) Déclin, from de, and clinare, 'to bend.' We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'age, L'age de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Phthisis, and Tabes.

DÉCLIVE, (F.) Declivis, from de, 'from,' and clivus, 'acclivity.' Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumour or abscess.

DECOCTION, Decoctio, from decoquere, 'to boil,' (de and coquere.) Epsēsis, Apozēsis, Zesis, Hopsēsis, Aphēpsis, (F.) Decoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoctum, Zema, Aphēpsēma, Ap'ozem, Apozēma, Hopsēma, Chylus and Epsēma, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product;—as præparatio is used for the act of preparing; præparatum, for the thing prepared.

The French say—Decubitus horizontal, sur le dos, sur le côté, sur, lying in the horizontal posture, on the back or side.

DECURTATUS, μειωρος, or μειωριων, from de, and curtus, 'short,' 'shortened, curtailed,' 'running to a point.' When applied to the pulse, it signifies a progressive diminution in the strength of the arterial pulsations, which, at last, cease. If the pulsations return and gradually acquire all their strength, it is called Pulsus decurtatus reciprocus.—Galen.

The faeces generally accumulate in the colon, being prevented by the annulus at the top of the rectum from descending freely into that intestine. In producing evacuations, therefore, in obstinate constipation, it is well, by means of a long tube, to throw the injection into the colon, as suggested by Dr. O'Beirne.

Inspection of the parts is the chief criterion of defloration having been forcibly accomplished; yet inquiry must be made, whether the injury may not have been caused by another body than the male organ. Recent defloration is infinitely more easy of detection than where some time has elapsed.

DEGREE, from dégré, originally from gradus, 'a step.' A title conferred by a college, — as the 'degree of Doctor of Medicine.' Galen used this expression to indicate the qualities of certain drugs. Both he and his school admitted cold, warm, moist, and dry medicines, and four different 'degrees' of each of those qualities. Thus, Apium was warm in the first degree, Agrimony

In the second, Roche Alum in the third, and Garlic in the fourth. Bedegar was cold in the first, the flower of the Pomegranate in the second, the Sempervivum in the third, Opium in the fourth, &c. In different authors, also, we find the words, Paraph'ora, Paraph'rotës, Paraphrene'sis, Paraphren'ia, Phrene'sis, Phructi'asis, &c., for different kinds of delirium. Delirium is usually symptomatic.

A state of delirium and agitation, peculiar to those addicted to spirituous liquors, with great sleeplessness. It is preceded by indisposition, lassitude, watchfulness, headach, and anorexia; the delirium and tremors most commonly recurring in paroxysms. It is caused by the habitual and intemperate use of ardent spirits or of opium or tobacco; or rather by abandoning them after prolonged use. The treatment is various. Many have regarded stimulants, with large doses of opium to induce rest, to be indispensable. It is certain, however, that the expectant system will often, if not generally, be successful; and, it is probable, a cure effected in this manner will be more permanent than when produced by excitants.

DELIRUS, Delirious.

DÉLITESCENCE, see Repercussion.

DELITESCENTIA, see Repercussion.

DÉLIVRANCE, (F.) An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, libera'tio, but in the practice of obstetrics, means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery — partus secundarius, secundina'rum expul'sio vel extractio, is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained; and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which this becomes necessary. 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child, and, — 5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

DELIVERY, FALSE, False water.

DÉLIVRE, Secundines.

DELOCATIO, Luxatio.

DELPHINIUM, from δέλφιν, or δελφιν, 'a dolphin,' which the flowers resemble. D. consol'ida seu Sec'ctum seu Versic'olor, Calce'tra'pa, Consol'ida Rega'lis, Branching Larkspur, Stag gerweed. Family Ranunculaceæ. Sex. Syst. Polyandria Trigynia. (F.) Pied d'alouette des champs. It has been employed as a vermifuge. The flowers have been used in ophthalmia, and the seeds have the same property as those of Stavesacre.

DELPHINIUM CONSOLIDA, Delphinium — d. Setgetum, Delphinium.

DELPHINIUM STAPHISAGRIA. The systematic name of the Staves'acre, Staphisogria, Phtheiroctonum, Phtheirium, Staphis, Pedicularia, (F.) Staphisaigre, Herbe aux Poux, Dauphinelle. The seeds have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge: owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. The active principle of this plant has been separated, and received the name Delphinia. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratrin, in tic douloureux, paralysis and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x to xxx, or more, to ℥j,) applied externally.

DELTOID, Deltoides, Deltoides, Deltoides, Deltiformis, from the Greek capital letter Δ, delta, and eidos, 'resemblance.' Sous-acromio-clavic-huméral of Rumes; Sus-acromio-huméral of Chaussier. A triangular muscle forming the fleshy part of the shoulder, and covering the shoulder-joint. It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula, to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

DELUSION, Hallucination.

DEM EL MUCA. A name given by Prosper Alpinus to a disease, which, he says, is proper to Egypt. He considers it to be inflammation of the brain; but others describe it as a pernicious intermittent.

DEMANUS, Acheir.

DÉMENGE, Dementia — d. Innée, Idiотism.

(F.) Démence, Bé'tise. In common parlance, and even in legal language, this word is synonymous with insanity. Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholy are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Dotage is the Dementia of the aged — Mo'ria demens lere'ma, Lere'na, Lere'sis, Lernus, Delir'io Senum, Amen'tia Sen'lis, Pueril'itas, Delir'ium Sen'ile, Anil'itas, Senile Insanity, Senile Dementia, Insanity of the aged, — a form of moral insanity, in which the whole moral character of the individual is changed.

DEMUL'CENTS, Demulcentia, Involucen'tia, Obvolucen'tia, Lubrican'tia, from demulcere, (de and mulcere,) 'to soothe,' 'to assuage.' (F.) Adoucissants. Medicines supposed to be capable of correcting certain acrid conditions imagined to exist in the humours. Substances of a mucilaginous or saccharine nature belong to this class. Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents. — See Diluents and Emollients. The following are the chief demulcents; — Acaëz Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdalæ; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

A disease, which first appeared in the years 1827 and 1828, in the West Indies, and in the southern states of North America. It was extremely violent in its symptoms, but not often fatal. It usually commenced with great languor, chilliness, and pain in the tendons about the smaller joints. To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlogistic treatment was adopted, and successfully.

The teeth of the upper jaw, e. g., receive their arteries from the infraorbital and superior alveolar, — themselves branches of the internal maxillary. The teeth of the lower jaw receive their branches from the inferior dental or inferior maxillary, which is given off by the internal maxillary, and runs through the dental canal, issuing at the mental foramen, after having given numerous ramifications to the teeth and jaw.

DENTITION, Dentit'io, Dentit'is, Odontoph'ia, Teething, Odont'asis, Odonto'sis, from dentire, 'to breed teeth.' The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentes lactei or milk teeth, (F.) dens de lait, are visible in the fœtus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molars are not yet all united. Gradually the fang becomes developed; and at about six or eight months begins what is commonly called, the first dentition, Odontia dentitio'nis lactantium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw; afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molars: the canine or eye-teeth, at first, those of the lower, and, afterwards, those of the upper jaw, next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molars—2 above and 2 below, 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding or milk-teeth, (dentes temporarii), (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The eruption of the milk-teeth takes place, approximately, in the following order:

Central incisors.....6th to 8th month.
Lateral incisors.....7th to 10th month.
First molar.....12th to 14th month.
Canines.....15th to 20th month.
Second molar.....20th to 30th month.

The second dentition or shedding of the teeth, odontia dentitio'nis puerilis, Dedentit'ion, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth—to the number of 32—as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the fœtus, with the exception of those of the small molars, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molars; at eight or nine months, in the canine; about three years, in the molars, $\mathfrak{z}l$ in the second great molars, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the permanent teeth, Dentes serotini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous, amounting till the age of 25, (sooner or later,) to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called Dens sapientie or wisdom tooth, Dens serotinus, Dens sophororeticus, D. sophronis'ta, D. sophronis'ter, (F.) Arrière-dent, Dent de sagesse, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32.

The eruption of the permanent teeth is remarkable for its general regularity; so that it constitutes an important means for ascertaining the age of the individual during the early period of life.

First molars.....7th year.
Central incisors.....8th year.
Lateral incisors.....9th year.
First bicuspids.....10th year.
Second bicuspids.....11th year.
Canines.....12th year.
Second molars.....13th year.

The teeth of the lower jaw precede by a few weeks those of the upper.

During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhoea, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teething, Odontia dentitio'nis, Odont'asis, Odontalgia dentitio'nis, Oda'ris'mus.

A disease, characterized by great augmentation and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst, and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species:—Diabetes insip'idus and D. Mellit'us; the former, (F.) Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète, being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste: the latter, *D. The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; each pint containing sometimes 2½ oz. saccharine matter. This replaces the uræ, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those labouring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with, sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus.

D. insipidus, Hyperuræ'sis aquosa, Hydruria, Hydruræ'sis, Paruria incontines aquosa, Diabete's spurius, Urorrhæ'a, Ureal Diabete's, (F.) Polyuric, Hyperurorrhæe, Diabete insipide, Faux diabete, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hystericus, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

It is commonly caused by errors in regimen, the use of food noxious by its quality or quantity, &c., constituting the Diarrhœa stercora'ria, D. Crapulo'sa of writers. It may be acute or chronic. Many varieties have been made by some nosologists—e. g. mucous.—Diarrhœa mucosa, Blennoche'sia, Blennoche'sia, bi- ious.—Peco-cholo'sis, Diarrhœ'a bilio'sa; serous, —Hydrochœ'zia, Hydrodiarrhœ'a, Orrhochœ'zia; dependent upon the matters evacuated. Diarrhœa requires different treatment, according to its nature. If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colliquative. The indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails amongst the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœ'a hec'tica, because, like hectic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and, in general, to defy the most powerful remedies.

DIDYMAL'GIA, from διδυμοί, 'the testicles,' and αλγος, 'pain.' Pain in the testicles.

DIDYMIS, Epididymis.

DIDYMITIS, Hernia humoralis.

DIDYMOS, Gemellus.

DIDYMUS, Testicle—d. Symphogastrius, Gastrodidymus—d. Symphyohipogastrius, Hypogastrodidymus—d. Symphyoepinæus, Pygodidymus—d. Symphyothoracogastrius, Thoracogastrodidymus.

DIECBOL'ION, from δία, and εβαλλω, 'I cast out.' A name given, by the ancients, to a remedy which they believed capable of producing abortion.

DIERENBACH, MINERAL WATERS OF. Dierenbach is a city in Bavaria, two leagues from which is a sulphurous spring.

DIERVIL'LA TRIF'IDA, Bush honeysuckle. An indigenous plant of the Honeysuckle tribe—Lonicereæ—whose flowers appear from June to August. It has been used as a diuretic; and in gonorrhœa and syphilis.

DIES, Hæmera, A day, (F.) Jour. The day is, properly, the period during which the solar light illumines our horizon: but commonly, also, we designate by the word day the period of 24 hours or Nycthe'meron, which is frequently divided into four parts—morning, midday, evening, and midnight. In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours,—universally in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine, so that if a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

DIES CANICULARES, see Canicula—d. Contemplabiles, Critical days—d. Contemplantes, Indicating days—d. Critici, Critical days—d. Decretorii, Critical days—d. Indicantes, Indicating days—d. Indicatorii, Indicating days—d. Indices, Indicating days—d. Internuntii, Critical days—d. Judicatorii, Critical days—d. Radicales, Critical days.

DIET, Dia'ta, Diate'ma, Ra'tio victûs. Originally, this word signified nearly the same thing as Hygiene and Regimen, that is, Diet was the employment of every thing necessary for the preservation of health and life. At the present day, it signifies a particular kind of food, and, at times, a privation of food and drink;—abstinence. To put any one upon diet, (F.) mettre quelq'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment:—milk diet means a diet of milk, &c. See Aliment, Dietetics, Hygiene, and Regimen.

DIET SCALE. Every well regulated hospital has certain dietetic regulations. The following Table of Dietary shows the particular regimen selected for the sick, in certain hospitals.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allows from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces are vegetable, and the rest animal—9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh.

That of the Navy of the United States is as follows:—Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.;—40½ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45½ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2½ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45½ oz.

In the Edinburgh workhouse the total allowance of dry food is about 17 ounces—13 ounces vegetable, and 4 ounces animal. In the Edinburgh children's poor-house, the diet consists of milk and porridge, barley broth and bread, amounting to 13 ounces of vegetable food to 4 ounces of animal. These allowances have been found ample for the maintenance of health. Perhaps the case of the smallest quantity of food on which life was vigorously supported was that of Cornaro,—not more than 12 ounces a day, chiefly of vegetable matter, for a period of 58 years.

DIET DRINK. A decoction or potion, variously composed, and used in considerable quantity, for the purpose of purifying the blood. The Decoctum Lusitanicum or Lisbon Diet-drink, is one of the most celebrated. See Decoctum Sarsaparillæ Compositum.

DIETARY, TABLE OF, see Diet Scale.

DIETETICS, Diætelicē, Diætelica, Medicina Diætelica; same etymon. (F.) Diététique. A branch of medicine, comprising the rules to be followed for preventing, relieving, or curing diseases by diet. Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene. A well regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. A proper knowledge of dietetics is, indeed, as important as that of the Materia Medica, strictly so called.

Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

DIÉTÉTIQUE, Dietetics.

DIETETISTS, Diætētistæ. Physicians who apply only the rules of dietetics to the treatment of disease.

DIEU-LE-FILT, MINERAL WATERS OF. The waters of Dieu-le-filt, in France, are chalybeate, and much sought after.

DIEURYSMUS, Dilatation.

DIEX'ODOS, from δια, and εξοδος, 'an exit or way out.' Di'odos. Any opening by which an excretion takes place.

DIFFERENTIAL DIAGNOSIS, see Diaïctica signa.

DIFFICULTAS INTESTINORUM, Dysentery.

DIFFLATIO, Perspiration.

DIFFORMITÉ, Deformation.

DIFFUSED BLOWING SOUND, see Murmur, respiratory.

DIFFU'SIBLE, (stimulants) from diffundere, (dis, and fundere, fusum, 'to pour,') 'to pour apart or abroad.' Those stimulating medicines are so called, which augment the action of the vascular and nervous systems in an acute but transitory manner.

DIGAS'TRICUS, from dis, 'twice,' and γαστρον, 'a belly.' Biven'ter, B. Maxill'æ, Dep'rimentis Maxill'æ Biven'ter, Bigas'ter, (F.) Mastoidohyogénien, Mastoido-génien—(Ch.,) Digastrique, Abaisseur de la machoire inférieure. The name Digastricus was formerly given to several muscles. It is now restricted to one of the muscles of the superior hyoid region. The digastricus is thick and fleshy at its extremities, thin and tendinous at its middle. It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fossa at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastricus is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forwards or backwards, as in deglutition.

The strong double-helical muscle, which forms the gizzard of birds, is also called Digastricus.

DIGASTRICUS CRANII, Occipito-frontalis.

DIGASTRIQUE, Digastricus.

DIGERENTIA, Digestives.

DIGES'TIBLE, Concoctus hab'ilis. Capable of being digested. All food is not equally digestible, and some of the most nourishing is the least so:—the fat of meat, for example. Certain substances, again, are entirely rebellious. The following table exhibits the time required for the stomachal digestion of different alimentary substances, in a well-known case, which fell under the care of Dr. Beaumont. The table is extracted from the Author's Human Health, Philadelphia, 1844. The most digestible substances are taken as the standard, which has been arbitrarily fixed at 1,000; and accordingly, aponeurosis, the first article in the table, requiring 3 hours, whilst pigs' feet soured, rice, &c., require but one, its digestibility, compared with that of these aliments, is placed as 333 to 1000; and so of the others. It need scarcely be said, that all these tabular results apply, in strictness, to the individual concerned only; yet they afford useful comparative views, which with exceptions depending upon individual peculiarities, may be regarded as approximations applicable to mankind in general.

ALIMENTS.	Form of preparation.	Time required for stomachal digestion.		Ratio of digestibility compared with the most digestible articles in the table.*	ALIMENTS.	Form of preparation. * Pigs' feet soured, rice, and tripe soured, being the most digestible articles in the table, are estimated at 1000.
 † In the case of oils, and other substances of similar nature, which undergo little digestion in the stomach, the time merely indicates the period that elapses before they are sent into the duodenum.

DIGESTIO DEPRAVATA, Dyspepsia — d. Difficilis, Dyspepsia — d. Laesa, Dyspepsia.

DIGESTION, Digestio, from digere, 'to dissolve'; Coctio, C. Cibo-rum, Pep'sis, Digestive Proc'ess. Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of this is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy; the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz. 1. Prehension of food. 2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the feces.

DIGESTION is also a pharmacutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstruum, at a slightly elevated temperature,—in a sand-bath, for example, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

DIGESTIVE. See Digestives — d. Principle, Pepsin—d. Process, Digestion.

DIGESTIVE TEXTURE. The particular organic condition of substances which affects their digestibility.

DIGESTIVE TUBE, Canal, alimentary.

DIGESTIVES, Digestiva, Digerentia; same etymon as Digestion. (F.) Digestifs. A term given, by surgeons, to substances, which, when applied to a wound or ulcer, promote suppuration; such as the ceratum resina, warm cataplasms, fomentations, &c.

DIGITAL, Digitalis; from digitus, 'a finger;' having the shape of a finger; digitated. Belonging to the fingers.

The Appen'dix vermiformis cæci is sometimes called DIGITAL APPEN'DIX.

DIGITAL ARTERIES, VEINS, and NERVES are those distributed to the fingers.

DIGITAL BLANC, Clavaria.

DIGITAL CAVITY, Acyroid cavity, Cornu de-ventri'culi lateralis. The occipital portion of the lateral ventricle of the brain.

DIGITAL HUMAIN, Clavaria.

DIGITAL IMPRESSIONS are the slight depressions observable on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the cerebral convolutions.

DIGITALÈ. Same etymon. (F.) Doigtier. A finger stall. The term Doigtier d'Asdrubali has been given to a small iron instrument used for measuring the dimensions of the pelvis. Placed at the end of the index finger, it adds to its length and enables it to reach the promontory of the sacrum.

DIGITALINE, see Digitalis.

DIGITALIS, from digitus, 'a finger,' because its flower represents a finger; Digitalis purpurea, Fox-glove, Baccharis, Bacchar, Baccar (?); Family, Scrophularinæ. Sec. Syst. Didynamia Angiosperma. (F.) Digitale, Gants de notre dame, Doigtier. The leaves of this plant, which are indigenous in Great Britain, are powerfully sedative, diminishing the velocity of the pulse, diuretic, and sorbefacient. In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hicough, convulsions, and death:—all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Digitaline. It is a hundred-fold stronger than the most active preparation of digitalis.

Digitalis has been administered in inflammatory diseases, phthisis, active hemorrhage, dropsy, &c.; but although it is a powerful remedy, it has not been as much employed as it probably would have been in particular cases, owing to the over-strained eulogiums, which many have passed upon it in almost all diseases. The average dose is one grain, in the form of pill, which may be repeated every six or eight hours.

DIGITALIS MINIMA, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITATION, Digitalio, Productio dentata, Inserio denticulata, L. digitalta. A division into processes having the form of fingers. Several muscles, as the serrati, exhibit digitations, similar to those which the fingers form, when held separate.

When used so as to obtain a view of parts, as by the speculum, it is termed Diop'tris'mus.

These agents differ from each other: the chief are—prepared sponge tents, gentian root, bougies, sonds, dried peas for issues, &c.

DILATOR, Dilatatorius, Diastoleus, (F.) Dilatateur or Dilatatoire. A muscle, whose office it is to dilate certain parts; such as the inspiratory muscles, which dilate the chest.

When employed to obtain an inspection of internal parts, it is termed Speculum, Diop'tra or Diop'tron. There are several instruments of this kind, each taking its name from the part to which it is applied; as Speculum Oris, S. Nasi, S. Uteri, &c.

DILATOR, ARNOTT'S. A modification of the old dilators for strictures of the urethra. It consists of a tube of oiled silk, lined with the thin gut of some small animal to make it air-tight, and fixed on the extremity of a small canal, by which it is distended with air or water, from a bag or syringe at the outer end, whilst a stop-cock or valve serves to keep the air or water in, when received. As soon as the bag is passed within the stricture or strictures, as much air is to be injected into it as the patient can easily bear. The instrument is not much used.

DILATORES ALARUM NASI, Compressor naris.

DILL, Anthem graveolens.

DILLY, Anthemis cotula.

DILUENTIA, from diluo, (dis, and luere), 'I wash away.' (F.) Délayants. Medicines which have been conceived proper for augmenting the fluidity of the blood and other animal liquids. All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases, where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. It is also obvious, that in cases of inflammation of the mammae, in nurses, diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents: their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine,—the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

DILWEED, Anthemis cotula.

Also, an institution in which the poor are furnished with advice and necessary medicines. (F.) Dispensaire. This word is also used by the French synonymously with Dispensatory.

A Dispensatory differs from a Pharmacopœia, in containing the physical and medical history of the various substances; whilst the Pharmacopœia is mainly restricted to the mode of preparing them. The Pharmacopœia too, is published under the authority of, and by, the members of a college or association; whilst a dispensatory contains the whole of the Pharmacopœia or Pharmacopœias, with additions by the author, under whose authority, alone, it usually appears. The Pharmacopœia, in other words, is official; the Dispensatory, generally, private. Formerly, the words were used indiscriminately. See Formulary, and Pharmacopœia.

DISPOSIT^{ION}, Disposit^{io}, from dis, and ponere, 'to put or set.' A particular condition of the body, which renders it susceptible of altering, suddenly, to a state of health or disease;—of improving, or becoming changed for the worse. The disposition to phthisis pulmonalis is sometimes so strong, owing to original conformation, that the disease will make its appearance, notwithstanding every care. See Diathesis.

DISTILLA^{TION}, Destilla^{ti}o, Stalag^{mos}, from destillare, (de, and stillare,) 'to drop, little by little.' Catastalag^{mos}. An operation, by which—by the aid of heat and in close vessels—the volatile are separated from the fixed parts of bodies, with the view of collecting the former, when condensed in appropriate receivers. The ancients distinguished distillation per latus, per ascensum, and per descensum, according to the direction which the volatilized matters were made to take. In distillation per latus, the apparatus is so arranged, that the vapour passes horizontally through a succession of spaces before reaching the receiver. Distillation per ascensum is the ordinary method by the still. In distillation per descensum, the fire is applied above and around the top of the apparatus; and it is so arranged that the vapour must pass downwards. When dry organic matter is placed in an apparatus for distillation, and heat is applied until all volatile matter is driven out, the process is called dry or destructive distillation.

These consist, chiefly, 1. In testing them with water, for the purpose of seeing whether the lungs are specifically heavier or lighter than that fluid. This is called Docimasia Pulmonum hydrostat'ica or the Hydrostatic Test. If lighter, it would be some evidence that the foetus had respired: 2. In comparing the weight of the lungs with that of the whole body; the weight of lungs in which respiration has taken place being nearly twice as great. They excite an intolerable, prurient sensation when applied to the skin; but do not irritate the mucous membrane over which they pass, when administered internally. The Dolichos is a mechanical anthelmintic, and is useful in cases of ascariæ lumbricoides, and oxyures vermiculares. Dose, gr. v to x, of the pubes, in molasses.

DOS, Dorsum.

DOSE, Dosis, *Præ'biu*m. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, and idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution!—A matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances

TABLE OF DOSES ACCORDING TO AGE.

Age 24	Let the full dose be	1	1 drachm.
18	will require	2-3ds.	2 scruples.
14	- - - -	half.	½ drachm.
7	- - - -	1-3d.	1 scruple.
4	- - - -	1-4th.	15 grains.
3	- - - -	1-6th.	10 grains.
2	- - - -	1-8th.	8 grains.
1	- - - -	1-12th.	5 grains.

The table of doses, according to age, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, differs in some respects from the above. Either affords a sufficient general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

$$\text{Thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i. e., } 1-7\text{th} = \frac{2}{2+12}$$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

This term is applied to a column of fluid, of a determinate nature and temperature, let fall upon the body. Pumping is a variety of the Douche. In using this kind of bath, the fluid is directed upon the part on which we are desirous of acting. The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus,—the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c.

Douches of air are, also, occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. They are sent from an air-press—of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Ord.* Aroideæ. Sex. Syst. Tetrandria Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. The property on which its medicinal virtues are dependent, resides in a volatile principle, which is impaired by long keeping, especially in powder. Dose, of the dried root, Dracontium, (Ph. U. S.) ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafoetida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

DRACONTIUM ANGSTIS'PATHA, Symplocarpus Angustis'patha, Narrow-spathed Skunk-cabbage, is possessed of similar properties.

A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the areolar membrane and between the muscles; especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumour like a boil, which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

DRAGONNEAU, Dracunculus.

DRAINING, Desiccatio, (F.) Desèchement. The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

DRAITSCH WATER, Godesberg, mineral waters of.

DRAKENA, Dorstenia contrayerva.

DRAPEAU, (F.) Vexillum, from drap, 'cloth.' A bandage, used in wounds, &c., of the nose, to keep the dressings in situ. It is composed of a small triangular compress, having two openings at its inferior part, corresponding to those of the nostrils. It is fixed by means of a bandage, passing from its superior angle over the head, and another passing round the head, under the orbits, so as to join the first at the nape of the neck. Also, Pterygion.

Fluid, taken during a meal, aids in the digestion of the food. Some drinks are exciting and tonic, as the different varieties of beer, wine, and spirits, which we use at table. In a therapeutical point of view, drinks are used to appease the thirst which prevails in febrile affections, or to act as diluents in those and other cases.

The ordinary drinks, according to their chemical composition, are—1. Water, spring water, river water, well water, &c.—2. Juices and infusions of Animal and Vegetable substances, lemon juice, currant juice, whey, tea, coffee, mattee, &c.—3. Fermented Liquors, wines, ale, beer, cider, perry.—4. Spirituous Liquors, brandy, alcohol, ether, kirschwasser, rum, arack, gin, whiskey, ratafia, cordials, &c.

The duodenum is the first part of the intestinal canal, commencing at the pyloric orifice of the stomach, and terminating in the jejunum. Its length is about twelve fingers' breadth, and as it is only partially covered by the peritonium, it is susceptible of considerable dilatation; hence its name Ventriculus succenturiatus. In the duodenum, chylification takes place after the admixture of the biliary and pancreatic fluids with the chyme.

 cal nor chemical causes, are sometimes termed dynamic.

DYNAMIC DISEASES, see Organic.

 DYNAMICUS, Dynamic.
 DYNAMIS, Faculty, Force.
 DYNAMOMETER, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, from δυναμις, 'force,' 'vital power,' and μετρον, 'measure.' An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier, for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 30 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.
 From experiments made by Peron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Diemen's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17
 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14
 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

NATIVES OF	STRENGTH of the arm.		of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Diemen's Land.	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland.	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor.	58.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France.	69.2	138.4	15.2	310.08
5. England.	71.4	142.4	15.2	332.52

DYNAMOMETER or DYNAMETER, MEDIC'INAL.
 An instrument, invented by Dr. Paris, for the purpose of showing the quantity of active matter contained in a given weight or measure of any official compound, with the dose of any preparation, which will be equivalent in strength to a given quantity of any other of the same class.
 The instrument is more ingenious than useful.

Flux dysentérique, Flux de Sang.* Inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine; the chief symptoms of which are:—fever, more or less inflammatory, with frequent mucous or bloody evacuations; violent tormina and tenesmus. When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia alba or simple Dysentery. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air, and imperfect nourishment; and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy. Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compositus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it.

The whole management in acute dysentery must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

Catamenia passed with great local pain, especially in the loins:—with sometimes a membranous discharge. Dysmenorrhœa is very difficult of removal, and prevents conception. In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon erethism of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are:—loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heart-burn; sense of fullness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course, more serious.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living; either in the quantity or quality of the food taken; and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute alkaline indigestion or neutral indigestion.

EAGLE-STONE, Ætites.

EAR, Auris, Ous, ovs, Ae'oŷ, Saxon, eare, (F.) Orcille. The organ of audition. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bones; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions;—the outer or external ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the internal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrinth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the membranous labyrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnus, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed, by De Blainville, vitrine auditive, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humour of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other,—the one termed the Sacculus vestibuli; the other Sacculus. Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otolithes of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

ELECTRICITY, Electricitas, from ηλεκτρον, 'amber,'—the substance in which it was first noticed. Electricity is used medicinally as an excitant. It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c., but it is uncertain, and not much used; and the cases are not always clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath—Bain électrique, as it has been called; which consists in placing the patient upon an isolated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The fluid may be communicated by points, sparks, or by shocks, according to the required intensity.

A convenient form consists of a battery of six curved permanent magnets, and an intensity armature, around whose cylinders 1500 yards of fine insulated copper wire are coiled. The ends of the wire communicate respectively, with a pair of directors, each of which holds a piece of sponge, dipped in vinegar or a solution of common salt. When the armature is rotated, and a portion of the body is interposed between the directors, a succession of shocks is received.

ELEPHANTIASIS, Elephantia, Elephantiasismus, Elephas, Lazarus morbus vel malum, Phænicæus morbus, Phymatosis Elephantiasis, from ελεphas, 'an elephant.' Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generically applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugose, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE ANTILLES, Barbadoes Leg, Glandular disease of Barbadoes, (F.) Jambe de Barbade, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Buene'mia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen; skin thickened, livid, and rugose, often scaly; serotum, arms, or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Buene'mia Tropica, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

ELEPHANTIASIS ARABICA, Maladie glandulaire, Ladrerie, Tyria'sis, Elephas, Elephantiasis, E. Indica, Elephantia Arabum, Lepra Arabum, (of some.) In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the disease is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of an elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous areolar tissue: the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF CAYENNE, Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE GREEKS, E. Græcorum, is probably the same disease as Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF INDIA is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumours, formed in the areolar texture. At a more advanced period the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened, and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. It likewise belongs to lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS ITALICA, Pellagra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF JAVA is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large white tumours on the toes and fingers, resembling scrofulous tumefactions. These tumours ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

ELEPHANTINUM EMPLAS'TRUM, Elephantivum. An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of ceruss, 45 of wax, oil lbs, water lbj. — Castelli. Oribasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but they are by no means similar in composition.

ELEVATOR, from elevare, (e, and levare), 'to lift up.' (F.) Élévateur. A muscle, whose function it is to raise the part into which it is inserted. See Levator.

ELEVATOR, Elevatorium, Vectis elevatorium. A name given to different surgical instruments employed for raising portions of bone which have been depressed, for raising and detaching the portion of bone separated by the crown of the trepan, and for removing stumps of teeth.

ELEVATOR ANI, Levator ani—e. Labii inferioris, Levator labii inferioris—e. Labii superioris proprius, Levator labii superioris proprius—e. Labiorum communis, Levator anguli oris—e. Oculi, Rectus superior oculi—e. Patientiæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Scapulæ, Levator scapulæ—e. Testiculi, Cremaster—e. Urethræ, see Transversus perinæi.

ELEVATOR, COMMON. This is a mere lever, the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

ELEVATOR OF LOUIS differed from the last only in the circumstance of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

ELEVATOR OF PETIT consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its but-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned. By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

ELEVATOR, TRIP'LOID, Vectis triploides. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.

This term is commonly applied to any white, crepitant, shining, elastic, indolent tumour, caused by the introduction of air into the areolar texture. Injuries of the larynx, trachea, or lungs; fractures of the ribs, or wounds penetrating the chest, are the most frequent causes of this affection, which is owing to the air escaping from the air-passages and insinuating itself into the areolar texture surrounding the wound. There are some cases of emphysema, which are owing to internal causes; and hence a division has been made into the accidental and symptomatic, and the spontaneous and idiopathic.

EMPHYSEMA ABDOMINIS, Tympanites.

A considerable pressure or contusion of the chest, or any violent concussion of the lung, may produce a laceration in that viscus, without injury being done to the parietes of the thorax, and may give place to the infiltration of air into the areolar texture, interlobular emphysema. Laënnec has described another species of emphysema of the lungs, Vesicular emphysema, consisting in excessive dilatation of the air-cells, some of which become as large as hemp-seed, ultimately break, and give rise to irregular vesicles at the surface of the lung, some of which are as large as a hazel-nut. Physical signs. The thorax externally, generally or locally, appears unnaturally convex and prominent. The intercostal spaces are widened, but depressed. The inspiratory efforts are increased. The sound on percussion is morbidly clear, but not tympanitic. On auscultation, the inspiratory murmur is feeble or suppressed. The expiration, which is more frequently audible is prolonged, laborious and wheezing. There are no certain physical signs which can distinguish interlobular emphysema from the vesicular.

EMPIRIC, Empiricus, from εμπειρία, (ev, and πειρα, 'a trial,') 'experience.' One who follows only experience. A sect of physicians, who rejected all theory, and took for their guide experience alone. It was opposed to the dogmatic sect. The Empiric sect prevailed till near the time of Galen. Among its most eminent members, after Philinus and Serapion, were Apollonius, Glaucias, Bæchius of Tanagra, and Zeuxis, both disciples of Herophilus, —Heraclides of Tarentum, Clephantus, master of Aselepiades, Menodotus of Nicomedia, and Theudas of Laodicea. They occupied themselves, chiefly, with discovering the properties of drugs, and did important service, in this manner, to medicine.

At the present day, the word Empiric is only taken in a bad sense, being employed in nearly the same signification as charlatan or quack.

EMPYÆ'MA, Em'pye'sis, Em'pyæ, from εν, 'in, and πους, 'pus.' Apost'e'ma em'pye'ma. A collection of blood or pus, and, conventionally, of other fluid, in some cavity of the body, and particularly in that of the pleura. Empyema is one of the terminations of inflammation of the pleura, and is called, also, Pyothorax verus, Pleurothorac'ica purulen'ta, Diap'pye'ma, E'c'pye'ma, E'c'pye'sis, Em'pye'sis pect'oris, P'yo'sis pect'oris, Hydrothorax purulen'tus, Dyspno'a pyothorac'ica, Pncuono'nia suppurato'ria, Abscessus pect'oris, A. Thorac'is, Pleuroposte'ma, Pleuro'pye'sis, (F.) Pyopleuritis.

The operation for empyema properly means the making of an opening into the thorax for the purpose of giving issue to the matter collected in the cavity of the pleura, although it has been used for the operation required for the evacuation of any fluid from the chest, or synonymously with Paracentesis thoracis.

EMPYE/SIS; same etymon. Suppuration. An eruption of phlegmonous pimples, gradually filling with a purulent fluid, and terminating in thick scabs, frequently leaving pits or scabs. Pustulous Exanthem. A genus in the order Exanthematica, class Hæmatica of Good. See Empyema.

EMPYOS, Purulent.

EMPYREU'MA, from εμπυρευω, (εν, and πυρ, 'fire,') 'I kindle.' The burnt smell and acrid taste, which volatile products—gaseous and liquid—contract, when animal or vegetable substances are decomposed by a strong heat. The cause of this smell is seated in an oil, called empyreumatic, which does not exist in the substance subjected to the operation, but is the result of its decomposition. If the empyreuma occurs when the organic substance is placed in a still with a liquid, it is owing to the solid matter touching the bottom of the vessel to which the fire is applied.

EMPYREUMAT'IC, Empyreumaticus: same etymon. Belonging to empyreuma,—as an empyreumatic odour.

EM'PYROS, Febricitans, from πυρ, 'fire or fever.' One who has fever.—Hippocrates.

The enamel is of a milky-white colour, and sufficiently hard to strike fire with steel. Its surface is very smooth and polished, and it forms a thicker layer towards the part where the teeth come in contact, and becomes thinner towards the cervix. The fibres of the enamel are perpendicular to the surface of the teeth, on the ivory of which they seem, as it were, planted. This gives them a velvety appearance, when examined by the microscope. The enamel has no blood vessels, and is not renewed when removed. It is formed of phosphate of lime, and a very small portion of animal matter.

It is either encysted, in irregular masses without cysts, or infiltrated into the texture of the diseased organ. ENDEMIC, Endem'ic, Endem'ia, Regiona'lis morbus, Endem'icus, from εν, 'in,' and δημος, 'the people;' Encho'rios, Enchorion'osus, Vernac'ulus seu Endemius mor'bus, Endemy. A disease is said to be endemic, or to arise from endem'icity, (F.) endémicité, when it is owing to some peculiarity in a situation or locality. Thus, ague is endemic in marshy countries; goitre at the base of lofty mountains, &c. Some authors use the term in the same sense as epidemic. We have no accurate knowledge of the emanations or other circumstances which give occasion to endemic affections. We seem to know that some emanation from marshy lands does produce intermittents; but we are ignorant of the nature of such emanation.

ENDÉMICITÉ, see Endemic.

ENDEMICITY, see Endemic.

ENDO-AORTITIS, from ενδον, 'within,' and aortitis, 'inflammation of the aorta.' Inflammation of the lining membrane of the aorta.

ENDOCARDIAC, Endocardial, Endocardiacus: same etymon as the next. Relating to the endocardium, or to the interior of the heart; as 'endocardiac sound or murmur,'—a sound produced within the cavities of the heart, in contradistinction to exocardiac or exocardial sounds or murmurs, which are induced by conditions of the external surface of the organ.

ENDOCARDITIS, Carditis interna, Inflammatio superficialis interna cordis, lateralis Carditis, Inflammatio of the internal membrane of the heart, from Endocardium, the lining membrane of the heart, and itis, inflammation. In this disease, the heart's action is visibly increased, and very manifest to the touch; the hand is strongly repelled, and, at moments, is sensible of a trembling vibratory motion. Percussion gives a dull sound over a surface of several inches, owing, according to Bouillaud, to the inflammatory turgescence of the heart, and the engorged state of its cavities. On auscultation a bruit de soufflet is generally heard, masking one or both sounds of the heart; and the ear is sensible of a metallic ringing with each systole of the ventricle. The pulsations are rapid as well as strong, and, with few exceptions, irregular, unequal and intermittent. The pulse, by the way, does not always indicate the force or number of the heart's contractions.

ENDOCARDIUM, from ενδον, 'within,' and καρδια, 'the heart.' The membrane that lines the interior of the heart.

ENDOSMOSE, Endosmosis, Inhibitio, Inhibitio, from ενδον, 'within,' and ωσμος, 'impulse.' A term used by Dutrochet, to express the action by which fluids pass from without to within organic membranes. The action of two fluids on each other, when separated by a membrane. The general conditions of the phenomena are:—first, that they should have an affinity for the interposed membrane; and secondly, that they should have an affinity for each other, and be miscible.

At the present day, endosmose is generally used to signify the passage of the more transmissible fluid, whilst exosmose signifies that of the least transmissible. The rapidity with which endosmose is accomplished varies according to the nature of the septum or tissue and of the penetrating body, and to the penetrability of the tissue.

ENDOSMOTIC, Endosmoticus; same etymon. Belonging to endosmose:—as an 'endosmotic current.'

ENDOSTEITIS, from ενδον, 'within,' οστειον, 'a bone,' and itis, denoting inflammation. Inflammation of the internal periosteum.

ENDUIT (F.), from inducere, 'to put upon,' 'to put on.' A coat; a fur. This term is often applied to a layer of greater or less thickness which covers the surface of certain organs, and particularly of the tongue and the interior of the mouth. The enduit is designated variously, according to its appearance,—enduit bilieux, jaune, blanc, &c.—a bilious, yellow, white coat or fur, &c. It is at times owing to the evaporation of the watery portions of the secretions; at others, to a morbid condition of the secretions:—generally, to both causes combined.

Inflammato'ria*, Feb'ris intestino'rum, F. ili'aca inflammato'ria, Enterop'gra, (F.) Entérite, Inflammation des Intestins. The essential symptoms of this disease are:—violent abdominal pain, increased on pressure; with vomiting and inflammatory fever. Enteritis may affect both the peritoneal and the mucous coat of the intestines; and, in violent cases, all the coats may be implicated. The structure of the mucous and peritoneal coats is different; so are their functions in health and disease. The inflammation of the serous coat, Sero-enteritis, resembles that of the cellular membrane; the inflammation of the mucous coat that of the skin. The former is usually, therefore, of a more active character. Inflammation of the mucous coat, Eso-enteritis, Endo-enteritis, Muco-enteritis, Enteritis, Phegymen'itis enter'ica, is generally attended with diarrhoea, and its pathology is identical with that of dysentery. Inflammation of the peritoneal coat is, on the other hand, generally attended with constipation.

Enteritis of the peritoneal coat, for such usually is the meaning of the word in the abstract, requires the most active treatment. Copious bleeding, followed up by a large dose of opium—and, if the symptoms be not decidedly ameliorated, repeating the bleeding and opium—warm fomentations, and blisters, are the chief agents to be relied upon. Purgatives ought not to be exhibited until the inflammation and spasm are abated by the use of the bleeding and opium. When the physician is called early, this plan will usually succeed. Sometimes, Enteritis passes into a chronic state, requiring much careful management. Broussais considered inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and intestines as the proximate cause of the phenomena of fever.

In surgery, it means an operation, little used, which consists in opening the intestines, in order to evacuate the faecal matters accumulated in it; for example, in certain cases of hernia, accompanied with contraction of the intestinal canal; in operations for an artificial anus, performed on the new-born, where the rectum is imperforate or not existing, &c.

A name given to the inversion or turning inwards of the eyelids, so that the eyelashes are directed towards the globe of the eye; irritate and inflame it, and give rise to the affection called Trich'iasis.

The contact of the hair with the surface of the eye occasions considerable irritation of the conjunctiva, which is soon followed by chemosis, ulceration of the eye, and other symptoms, such as fever, watchfulness, &c.

If the disease be entropion, as above defined, that is, dependent upon the inversion of the eyelids, it must be remedied, — either by dispersing the œdema or swelling of the eyelids, or by cutting out a portion of the skin. When the disease is dependent on a vicious direction of the cilia, they must be plucked out and the bulbs be cauterized.

It may depend on too great irritability of the bladder, or on distension, or injury of the fibres about its neck, paralysis of the organ, Cysto-paral'ysis, Cysto-ple'gia, the presence of an irregularly shaped calculus impacted in the urethra near its commencement; rupture of the bladder and urethra; renal disease; or on pressure exerted on the bladder by the distended womb or by a tumour. It often occurs after difficult labour, but generally yields, in the course of a week or ten days; the catheter being introduced twice a day in the mean time.

The treatment must of course vary according to the cause; and when the affection, on which it is dependent, cannot be removed, the discharge of urine may be prevented by exerting a degree of compression on the urethra, by means of appropriate instruments; or a urinary may be employed to receive the urine as it passes off.

A disease which attacks at the same time a number of individuals, and which is depending upon some particular constitutio aeris, or condition of the atmosphere, with which we are utterly ignorant. It differs from endemic, the latter being owing to locality; but it is obvious, that should a particular epidemic constitution of the air—epidemie'ity, (F.) epidemie'ité—exist along with a favouring endemic condition, these combined influences may act in the causation of several of those serious and fatal complaints, which at times visit a district, and are never afterwards met with, or at least not until after the lapse of a considerable period.

A transparent, dry, thin membrane, devoid of nerves and vessels, which covers all the surface of the body, except the parts that correspond to the nails. It appears to consist of minute scales, placed one above the other. Chaussier considers it to be formed and reproduced by an excretory action of the true skin; to act like a dry varnish, which prevents the immediate contact of bodies with the nervous papillæ, and consequently to deaden tactile impressions, which, without its intervention, might be painful. The Epider'mic, Epider'meous, or Epider'moid (as Bichat called it) System, in general anatomy, comprises three parts. 1. EPIGASTRIC AR'TERY, Ar'teria epigas'trica, A. sus-pubiennæ, (Ch.) It arises from the external iliac, on a level with the crural arch; sometimes by a trunk proper to it, at others by one common to it and the Obturator artery. It ascends upwards and inwards, behind the spermatic cord, follows the outer edge of the rectus abdominis muscle, and anastomoses, towards the umbilicus, with the internal mammary. EPIGLOTTIC GLAND, Periglot'tis, Caro glandulosa. A collection of small, glandular granula, situate in the adipose, areolar texture at the base of the anterior surface of the epiglottis, in a triangular space, bounded anteriorly by the thyro-hyoid membrane and thyroid cartilage. It pours out an unctuous and mucous fluid, which lubricates the epiglottis, keeps it supple and movable, and prevents the larynx from being irritated by the constant passage of the air, in the act of respiration.

EPIGLOT'TIS, from επι, 'upon,' and γλωττις, 'the glottis.' Epiglot'tic cartilage, Lig'ula, Operculum laryngis, Lingua Ex'igua, Lingula fistulæ, Subling'ium, Superlig'ula. Its form is oval; texture elastic; thickness greater below than above, and greater in the middle than at the sides. By its smaller extremity, which is the lower, it is attached to the thyroid cartilage; its two surfaces are covered by the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx. The special use of the epiglottis would seem to be to cover the glottis accurately at the moment of deglutition, and, thus, to assist in opposing the passage of alimentary substances into the air tubes.

Sancti Valenti'ni*, Malum caducum, Analeptica, Catapto'sis, Insa'nia cadiva, Apoplezia parva, Caduca pas'sio, Lues divina, Vitium caducum seu divinum seu Herculeum, Falling sickness, (F.) Mal caduc, Mal divin, Mal Saint-Jean, Mal de Terre, Haumal. The word is derived from επιλαμβανω, 'I seize upon.' It is a disease of the brain, which may either be idiopathic or symptomatic, spontaneous or accidental, and which occurs in paroxysms, with uncertain intervals between. These paroxysms are characterized by loss of sensation and convulsive motions of the muscles. Frequently, the fit attacks suddenly; at other times, it is preceded by indisposition, vertigo, and stupor. At times, before the loss of consciousness occurs, a sensation of a cold vapour is felt, hence called aura epileptica. This appears to rise in some part of the body, proceeds towards the head; and as soon as it has reached the brain the patient falls down. The ordinary duration of a fit is from 5 to 20 minutes. Sometimes it goes off in a few seconds; at others, it is protracted for hours. In all cases, there is a loss of sensation, sudden falling down, distortion of the eyes and face; countenance of a red, purple or violet colour; grinding of the teeth; foaming at the mouth; convulsions of the limbs; difficult respiration, generally stertorous; with, sometimes, involuntary discharge of feces and urine. After the fit, the patient retains not the least recollection of what has passed, but remains, for some time, affected with head-ach, stupor, and lassitude.

The disease is in the brain, and is generally organic; but it may be functional and symptomatic of irritation in other parts, as in the stomach, bowels, &c. The prognosis, as to ultimate recovery, is unfavourable. It does not, however, frequently destroy life, but is apt to lead to mental imbecility. Dissection has not thrown light on its pathology.

To the attacks of epilepsy which are unaccompanied by convulsions, as is sometimes the case, the French give the name Petit-mal, and Epilepsie Vertige. When furious mania succeeds to a paroxysm, it is termed Mania epileptica and Epileptic Delirium.

In the treatment, the cause must be sought after, and if possible removed. In the paroxysm, but little can be done; but as the tongue is liable to be injured by the teeth, the jaws may be kept open by putting a cork or piece of wood between them. If the fit has been brought on by indigestible food, the stomach must be cleared. It is between the paroxysms that the great effort must be made. Generally, there is considerable irritability and debility of the nervous system, and hence tonics have been found the best remedies. Of these, perhaps the most powerful, in epilepsy, is the argenti nitras, given regularly and continued for months, if necessary. Preparations of iron, copper, and zinc, have also been used, and vegetable tonics and antispasmodics in general. Counter irritants, as blisters, moxa, &c., may be employed, if necessary, along with this course.

Unfortunately, in many cases, these means are found insufficient, and all that can be done is to palliate, removing carefully the exciting causes; such as the use of spirituous liquors, strong emotions, violent exercise, &c.; and regulating the diet.

Hæmorrhagie nasale, Saignement du nez, Hémorrhinie*. This is one of the most common varieties of hemorrhage; the organization of the Schneiderian membrane being favourable to it, as the blood-vessels are but slightly supported. It does not generally flow from both nostrils, and is very apt to recur. Puberty is the period at which it is most common. Its exciting causes are:—any thing that will induce local congestions, as running, coughing, blowing the nose, &c., provided there be a predisposition to it. A common case of epistaxis requires but little treatment, especially if in a young person. Light diet and a dose or two of the sulphate of magnesia will be sufficient. In more severe attacks, cold and astringent washes of alum, sulphate of zinc, weak sulphuric acid, or creosote, may be used, and the nostrils be plugged anteriorly; but if the bleeding goes on posteriorly, the posterior nares must be plugged likewise,—the patient being kept with the head raised. The flow of blood has been arrested by directing the patient to stand up with his head elevated, compressing the nostril whence the blood flows with the finger, raising the corresponding arm perpendicularly, and holding it in this position for about two minutes. A less vigorous circulation through the carotids appears to result from the increased force required to carry on the circulation through the upper extremities when raised.—Négrier.

To prevent the recurrence, strict diet must be inculcated.

EPISTER'NAL, Episterna'lis, from ἐπι, 'upon,' and στερον, 'the sternum.' An epithet applied to two bones which form part of the sternum, and are situate upon its superior and lateral part. It is spread over the mouth, pharynx and oesophagus, conjunctiva, vagina, and entrance of the female urethra. Cylinder epithelium is found in the intestinal canal, beyond the cardiac orifice of the stomach; in the larger ducts of the salivary glands; in the ductus communis choledochus, prostate, Cowper's glands, vesiculæ seminales, vas deferens, tubuli uriniferi, and urethra of the male; and lines the urinary passages of the female, from the orifice of the urethra to the beginning of the tubuli uriniferi of the kidneys. ERECITHITES HIERACIFOLIA, Senecio hieracifolius, Fireweed. An indigenous plant, Order, Compositæ, which flowers from July to September. It is said to be an acrid tonic, and astringent, and in large doses emetic.

ERECTILE TISSUE, Tela erectilis, from erigere, (e, and rigere,) 'to erect,' 'to become erect.' A tissue, whose principal character is:—to be susceptible of dilatation, i. e. of turgescence and increase of size. It is formed of a collection of arteries and veins, intermixed with nervous filaments; which form, by their numerous anastomoses, a spongy substance, whose areolæ communicate with each other. Smooth muscular fibres have been detected in it. This tissue exists in the corpora cavernosa of the penis and clitoris, at the lower and inner surface of the vagina, in the spongy part of the urethra, the lips, nipples, iris, &c. Sometimes it is developed accidentally, and constitutes a kind of organic transformation.

ERECT'ION, Erect'io, Arrect'io; same etymon. The state of a part, in which, from having been soft, it becomes stiff, hard, and swollen by the accumulation of blood in the areolæ of its tissue, as in the case of the penis;—Syma, Styxis.

It is characterized by great depression of strength; anxiety about the præcordia; irregular action of the heart; frequent sighing; tremors; small, quick, sometimes intermitting, pulse; occasional vomiting; pale, contracted countenance, and sense of coldness; but the tongue is seldom furred, nor are the vital and natural functions much disturbed. In this state any sudden exertion may prove fatal.

Ergot is generally considered to be the result of a disease in rye, occurring most frequently when a hot summer succeeds a rainy spring. Decandolle, however, regards it as a parasitic fungus, and calls it, Sclerotium clavus; whilst Leveillé esteems it to be a fungus giving a coating to the diseased grain; the medical virtues residing in the coating. This parasitic fungus he calls Spha'ce'lia seg'etum. More recently, it has been maintained, that it is a diseased state of the grain occasioned by the growth of a fungus not previously detected, to which the names Ergota'tia abortans seu abortif'iciens, Oidium abortif'iciens, Ergot-mould, have been given. It is found projecting from among the leaves of the spike or ear; and is a long, crooked excrescence, resembling the spur of a cock; pointed at its extremities; of a dark brown colour externally, and white within.

This substance has been long used in Germany to act on the uterus, as its names Mutterkorn and Gebärpulver (womb-grain, pulvis parturiens) testify. Upwards of forty years ago, it was recommended in this country, by Dr. John Stearns, of Saratoga County, New York, for accelerating parturition; and since that period, numerous testimonials have been offered in its favour. Half a drachm of the powder is gently boiled in half a pint of water, and one-third part given every 20 minutes, until proper pains begin. Some recommend the clear watery infusion; others advise the powder; others the oil, and others the wine. It is obvious, that in many cases the uterine efforts would return in the period which would necessarily elapse in the administration of ergot, so that several of the cases, at least, of reputed efficacy, may not have been dependent upon the assigned agent. Ergot also possesses—it is affirmed—narcotic virtues, which have rendered it useful in hemorrhagic and other affections of excitement.

Bread, made of spurred rye, has been attended with the effects described under ERGOTISM.

Boerhaave admitted several orders of capillary vessels, the diameters of which went on decreasing. The largest received red blood: those which came next received only white: others only lymph; whilst the last of all were destined for yet more subtle fluids — for a kind of vapour. When the red globules entered vessels destined for the white, or the white those intended for the thinner fluids, there was, according to the theory of Boerhaave, an error loci, the proximate cause of inflammation and other mischiefs. See Aberration.

A disease, so called because it generally extends gradually to the neighbouring parts. Superficial inflammation of the skin, with general fever, tension and swelling of the part; pain and heat more or less acrid; redness diffused, but more or less circumscribed, and disappearing when pressed upon by the finger, but returning as soon as the pressure is removed. Frequently, small vesicles appear upon the inflamed part, which dry up and fall off, under the form of branny scales. Erysipelas is, generally, an acute affection: its medium duration being from 10 to 14 days. It yields, commonly, to general refrigerant remedies. Topical applications are rarely serviceable. At times, when the disease approaches the phlegmonous character, copious bleeding and other evacuations may be required, as in many cases of erysipelas of the face; but this is not commonly necessary.

In most cases, indeed, the general action seems deficient, and it becomes necessary to give tonics.

When erysipelas is of a highly inflammatory character, and invades the parts beneath, it is termed Erysip'elas phlegmonodes, (F.) Erysipèle phlegmonæ: when accompanied with phlyctenæ, and the inflammation terminates in gangrene, Erysip'elas gangrænosum, (F.) Erysipèle gangræneux; and when associated with infiltration of serum Erysip'elas œdematosum, (F.) Erysipèle œdemateux.

A rash. (F.) Élevure. Under this term, is comprehended, by some, every kind of eruption, of which the skin is the seat. Others comprehend by it those eruptions that are accompanied by fever, Febres exanthemat'icæ; including, under the head of the major exanthemata, those which attack a person but once in his life, and which are communicated by specific contagion; and, under the minor exanthemata, those which are not marked by these characteristics. Small-pox, measles, cow-pox, &c., belong to the major:—chicken-pox, herpes, lichen, &c., to the minor. The general acceptation of Exanthem is, however, a more or less vivid, circumscribed, or diffuse redness of the skin, which diminishes or disappears transiently under the pressure of the finger.

The chief active exercises are:—walking, running, dancing, hunting, fencing, playing at ball, cricket, racket, quoits, swimming, declamation, singing, &c. Exercise is an important prophylactic, particularly for those disposed to be plethoric. It improves the digestion; augments the secretions; and, when used in moderation, gives strength to the body; but when carried to excess, produces debility and disease.

EXERRHO'SIS, from εξ, 'out of,' and ρῶ, 'I flow.' The discharge which takes place by insensible perspiration.

EXFËGATION, see Pregnancy.

EXFOLIA'TION, Exfolia'tio, Desquama'tio, Eclep'isis, from ex, and folium, 'a leaf.' By this is meant the separation of the dead portions of a bone, tendon, aponeurosis, or cartilage, under the form of lamellæ or small scales. Exfoliation is accomplished by the instinctive action of the parts, and its object is to detach the dead portions from those subjacent, which are still alive. For this purpose the latter throw out fleshy granulations, and a more or less abundant suppuration occurs, which tends to separate the exfoliated part,—now become an extraneous body. The ancients distinguished exfoliation into sensibile and insensibile, according as the dead portions of bone were detached in fragments of greater or less size, or in very thin pieces, and in an almost insensible manner. When the dead part embraces all or almost all the substance of a bone, it takes the name Sequestrum.

EXFO'LIATIVE, Exfoliativus, Desquamato'rius. That which takes away by leaves or scales. The term has been applied to certain medicines, which were regarded as proper to hasten exfoliation, such as alcohol, oil of turpentine, tincture of myrrh, &c.

EXHALANT, Exhalent, Exhalans, from exhalare, (ex, and halare, 'to breathe,') 'to exhale,' 'throw out.'

EXHALANT VESSELS, Vasa exhalantia, are very minute, and rise from the arterial capillary system. They are situate in every tissue of the body, and on the surface of the mucous and serous membranes and skin; on which each pours its particular fluid. Bichat distinguished three sets. 1. The external, terminating on the mucous and external dermoid system, where they pour the matter of perspiration. 2. The internal, comprising those of the areolar and medullary tissues, and of synovial surfaces; and, 3. The nutritive exhalants, which vary in each organ where they are found, and preside over the phenomena of composition and increase of every part of the body. The exhalants are the antagonists of the absorbents. They are imaginary vessels, inasmuch as they cannot be detected.

A function, by virtue of which certain fluids, obtained from the blood, are spread, in the form of dew, in the areolæ of the different textures, or at the surface of membranes; either for the sake of being thrown out of the body, or to serve certain purposes. The sweat is a liquid, excrementitious exhalation; the serous fluid of the pleura, a liquid, recrementitious exhalation.

Judicial investigations relative to the body of the person inhumed. 2. The removal of a body from one cemetery to another; and, 3. The evacuation of cemeteries or sepulchral vaults. The operation is attended with much unpleasant smell and annoyance, and requires the use of disinfecting agents, of which the most powerful is chlorinated lime. See Disinfection. The putrid effluvia from animal substances are not, however, found to excite endemic disease.

Hernia occurring at the navel. This affection happens more frequently in infants, and takes place by the umbilical ring. In adults, it occurs more commonly in females than in males; and, when it does so, the sac passes in the vicinity of the umbilicus. The organs, found in this kind of hernia, are particularly,—the epiploon, the jejunum, the arch of the colon, and sometimes the stomach. The tumour is, in general, round, and presents all the characters of hernia. It is, commonly, readily reducible, and not subject to strangulation. It must be reduced, and retained by an elastic bandage, made in the form of a girdle, and furnished with a pad at its middle part. When strangulated, the stricture may be divided upwards and towards the left side.

The treatment of course depends upon the cause.

Exostoses are sometimes distinguished into the true, which seem to be a projection of the osseous substance, and which have the same organization and hardness as that substance; and the false or osteo-sarcoma. Exostosis may depend on syphilis, scrofula, rickets, gout, &c. In such cases, it is important to get rid of the primary disease.

There is probably no such thing as a direct expectorant. The following are the chief reputed expectorants:—Ammoniacum; Asafetida; Galbanum; Ipecacuanha; Myroxylon; Myrrha; Inhalations of Iodine, Stramonium, Tar, Burning Wool, Tobacco, &c.; Scilla; Senega, and Tolutanum.

EXPERIENCE, Experientia, Peira, Empe'ira, from ἐξ, and πειρα, 'a trial.' A knowledge of things acquired by observation. In medicine, this knowledge can be obtained both by the practitioner's own experience, and by that obtained from tradition and from books. To profit by experience requires a mind capable of appreciating the proper relations between cause and effect; and hence it happens, that false experience, Experientia fallax, is extremely common; and that a man had better, in many instances, trust to that which he has learned from others, than to his own fallacious observation.

The union of accurate observation by the physician with that handed down by medical writers constitutes perfect experience, so far as it is attainable in any individual case.

EXPÉRIENCE, Experiment.

EXPERIMENT, Experimentum; same etymon. (F.) Expérience. A trial, made on the bodies of men or animals, for the purpose of detecting the effect of a remedy, or of becoming better acquainted with their structure, functions, or peculiarities. In a more general sense, it means any trial instituted with the intent of becoming better acquainted with any thing. By experiments on living animals, we have obtained much valuable information in the various departments of medicine; but particularly in physiology and toxicology.
