TO THE QUEENES MOST EXCEL-LENT MAIESTIE, OVR MOST REDOVTED, MOST

HAPPIE, AND TRVE SOVERAIGNE LADIE ELIZABETH, BY THE grace of God Queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, principall defender of the faith, and next voder God, the onely, absolute, and full supreme head over all causes Ecclesiasticall and temporall through her Maiesties dominions:

Geffray Fenton prayeth a perpetuall increasing of the spirite of Gods holy feare, and a continual going on and consirmation of that godly course, wherein with so long peace and happinesse, her Maiestie hath gouer-ned the subjects and peoples of her Realmes and severall iurisdictions.

T is not without reason nor contrary to example, that I presume to offer vp to the peculiar & graue view of your Maiesty, these my compositions and labours: for that the generall argument being historicall, a doctrine wherein your Maiestie farre aboue all other Princes hath a most singular in-I fight and judgement, and the particular partes containing discourse of state and gouernement, in which God hath expressed in the person of your Maiestie a most rare and divine example to all other Kings of the earth, for matter of pollicie and found administration: All law of reason, of equitie, and of other impression what soeuer, do challenge to appropriate the addresse and instification of this workero your Maiestie onely, in whom, for your inspired science and spirit to judge of Monuments and euents of times, and for the felicitie of your gouernement in seasons so perillous and conspiring, all Kings, and kingdomes, and nations round about you, rife vp to reuerence in your forme of gouerning, that propertie of wisdome and vertue, which it seemes God hath restrained to your Maiestie onely, without participation to anie of them. And in that regard they hold you that facred and fixed Starre, whose light God will not have put out, though the deuises of men on all sides are busie to draw cloudes and darke vailes to obscure it.

I am also encouraged to make this oblation to your Maiestie, by the example of many notable writers, both of the primitive times and in all ages and posterities succeeding, such as for the grauitie and sidelitie of their pen and style, were cherished with the greatest Princes of those dayes, and under the authoritie and countenance of their names, their workes were with reputation and credit infinuated into many peoples, nations, and regiments: the same being an effect due to the vertue and pietie of great Princes, for that as it is God that giveth wifedome and science to men, so it is authoritie that chiefly sheweth it to the world, euen as the earth nourisheth the roote of a tree, but the comfortable Sunne doth much to bring foorth the bloffomes. So many are the testimonies and examples of this, and so familiar with your Maiestie is the doctrine of histories and information of times, that by so much lesse need I to stand vpon authorities of antiquitie, or declarations relative, by how much more is knowne to be happily laied vp in your Maiesties breast, and effectually expressed in the forme of your government and · reigne, all that which learning and bookes can set downe by rule and precept, your Maiestie being the onely consecrated lampe from whom all other dominions about you do draw their light, or rather that terrestriall Sunne, vpon whose influence God hath appointed to depend the motions of all the Regions and Climats of the whole common weale of Christendome: A calling and authoritie which all other Potentates do honor in you, with so much the more merite and reuerence, by how much amid so many occasions and oportunities to ambitio, they proue your equitie, pietie, and moderation of mind, to exceede all examples of former Princes and times, and farre furmount all humane expectation: for that having as it were a foueraigne power over them & theirs, you do not with standing dispose of things according to the law of meafure and right. In regard of which divine properties, accompanied with your Maiesties other vertues which God hath made infinite in you, and your felicitie which is the reward & effect of the same, I may with good comelinesse resemble the gracious reigne of your Maiessie touching these regions of Christendome, to the happie time and dayes of Cæsar Augustus Emperour of Rome: who, after a long and generall combustion and harrying of the whole world with bloud and warres, did so reforme and reduce the regions confining his Empire, that with the Scepter and seate of peace he much more prevailed, then ever he could have done with the fword: by his clemencie he brought to submission his neighbour that stood out against him, and by his constancie held them assured being once reconciled: his wisedome seemed an Oracle to the Nations about him to dispose of their counsels and sway their enterprises. And touching quarrels and controuersies of state, either for his grauity and iustice, the only arbitration and resolution was referred to him, or at least for the awe that was had of him, the factions durst not burst out to further limits then he liked of. Lastly, it was an approued Monarchie of God, for that Christ the sonne of God amid such an vniuerfall malice of man and mankinde, was contented to shew himselfe in slesh in the dayes of his reigne. Euen so though the singular persons be chaunged, yet the effects and bleffings of this time do nothing vary vnder the happie rule of your Maiestie, whom God hath raised & established a soueraigne Empresse ouer seueral nations and languages, and with the frutes of a firme and continued peace, hath plentifully enriched the peoples of your Dominios, restored Religion and the Church of Christ to dwell anew amongst vs, made your authoritie awfull to all your neighbours and borderers: and lastly hath erected your seat upon a high hill or fanctuarie, and put into your hands the ballance of power and iustice, to poise and counterpoise at your wil the actions and counfels of all the Christian kingdoms of your time: wherein fure according to the course your Maiestie holdeth, much lesse that either for the prefent or in posterities to come, can be justly objected anie matter of imputation against you, seeing of the contrarie, most of them that be wise and true ob eruers of your dealings, do daily confesse and publish, that in your Maiestie hath bene orderly fulfilled all lawes and offices of a deuout Neutralitie. For that like as amid their heavie afflictions wherein successively hath bene offered you no small causes to ambition, your Maiestie hath neuer stopped or cut from them the refuge of your amity and mercie: So neuerthelesse your compassion hath principally respected the equitie of the complaints of such as implored it, esteeming it not agreeable to the law of vertue and account of your conscience, to make your profit voon the divisions of your neighbours, though there haue not wanted reasons and titles to induce your desire.

If or beare to make declaration to your Maiestie of the life and learning of the first Author of this booke; a matter testified with sufficient credit and reputation in the high negociations and emploimeets which he managed long time vnder great Princes, Popes, & common wealess and I am bold (contrarie to the custome of some writers) to leave to grauitie he hath digested at large in so great a volume: Onely the man for his integritie and roundnesse was such a one, as whose vertues were farre from all suspition of partialitie, fauour, hatred, loue, reward, or any other propertie of humane affection, which might haue force to corrupt or turne from the truth the mind of a writer. And for the generall matter of his worke, it doth not onely containe the warres and diuerse accidents hapned in Italie and other parts for almost fortie yeares, but also he doth so distinctly set downe the causes, the counsels, and the fortunes of euerie principall partie introduced into those actions, that by his studie and judgement, is traced and made easie to the reader, the way to all those sweete and plentifull frutes which with painfulnesse are fought for in Histories of this nature.

And for mine owne part, where in all my dedications heretofore, not my will which was alwayes warranted by the gracious demonstrations of your Maiestie, but my maner of life instituted vpon private customes and exercises, hath holden me from approching the authoritie of this place, afore which nothing ought to be presented which hath not a full perfection of spirit and studie: yet now, taking my reason of the worthinesse of the worke, and obseruing the examples and inducements of others in like oblations, I am bold vnder feare and humilitie to prostrate these my last paines afore that divine moderation of mind which alwaies hath holden for acceptable all things respecting learning or vertuous labours: humbly befeeching your right excellent Maiesty, that where the worke is now to appeare in the open view of the world, and stand before the vicertaine judgements of so manie sundrie and straunge humours of men, you will vouchfafe to let it passe vnder the happie name of your Maiestie, and vnder your gracious authoritie to giue it defence & fauor against the emulation of such as either through malice or ignorance may rife vp to interpret me and my labours finisterly. The Lord bleffe your Maiestie with a long and a peaceable life; and confirme in you to the comfort of your people, that course of well long time liued vnder the felicitie of your name. At my lodging neare the Towre of London, vij. Ianuarij. 1578.

THE ARGUMENT.

Odowicke Sforce uncle and tutor to John Galeas Duke of Millan, fearing least Ferdinand king of Naples would make warre upon him, breaketh off from the league that had bene renewed betweene the sayd Ferdinand, John Galeas, and the common weale of Florence, against the Venetians: he procure th the French King Charles the viy. to passe into Italy to conquer the Kingdome of Naples: Pope Alexander the fixt allieth him selfe with the King of Naples: The French King, haning ordered th' affaires of the kingdome, descendeth into Italy, where he taketh many townes: Dinerse emotions happen in the kingdome of Naples: the Pope is in great perplexitie and tranell: Pisa rebelleth against the Florentines: the French King entreth into Florence and Rome, and from thence paslethto Naples.

AVING in hand to write the affaires and fortunes of Italie, I judged it Intention of Connenient to draw into discourse, those particularities that most nearest the author. resemble out time and memorie, yea even since the selfe Princes of that country calling in the armies of France, gaue the first beginning to so great The Italiane innouations. A matter, for the varietie, greatnesse, & nature of such things, causers of their werie notable, and well worthie of memorie: and for the heavie accidents, s hatefull, bloudie and horrible: for that Italie for manie yeares was trauelled with all those sorts of calamities, with the which, principalities, countreys, and mortall men, are wont to be afflicted, as well by the iust wrath & hand

But the better to make knowne the state and condition of Italie at that time, together with the become of the manual state wherein Italy occasions of so many afflictions happening, it is to be considered that their calamities begun with mas anno 1490 so much the more displeasure and astonishment in mens minds, by how much the vniuerfall estate and multitude of things stood quiet, pleafant & happie. For, it is true and well assured, that since the Romane Empire (weakened chiefly by the chaunge of auncient manners and customes) began a Sudden inuathousand yeares afore to decline from that greatnesse whereunto it was raised by a wonderful ver- sion is most datue and fortune: the principalities of Italy had not tasted of so great and generall prosperitie, nor which have lireioyced in a condition so happy, plawsible and well gouerned, as was that whereon it was with ued mosse. great furctie reapposed the yeare of grace 1490, and certaine afore and after: for that being on all carely. great furctie reappoted the yeare of grace 1490, and certains after and after the finder reduced into peace and tranquillitie, the hilles and barren places tilled, & made no lefte frute

in men rare and excellent in administration of common weales, and infinite in good wits, seene and fludied in all sciences and artes of excellencie and industrie : lastly, bearing also no small praise and glorie for the service in warre, according to the vse and discipline of that time, it reteined insty (by these gifts and bleffings) a peculiar merite and reputation amongst all other nations. This felicitie being gotten with diverfe occasions, there were many things to entertaine and preserve it, and amongst others, common voyce and confent gaue no small praise and deseruing to the industrie and vertue of Laurence de Medicis a citizen of Florence, in whom was expressed tuch an excellencie of spirit and authoritie aboue the other citizens of that regiment, that vpon his counsell was reapposed the gouernement of the affaires of that common weale, which was at that time more mightie for th'oportunitie of his fituation, for the excellent wits and inventions of men, and for the readie meanes and mines of filuer and metals, then for the greatnesse and circuite of Lordship or dominion: And by reason he was lately joyned by parentage with Pope Innocent the viij. whom he had brought to reappose almost an absolute faith and credit in his councels, his name was great through all Italie, and his authoritic mightie in the deliberation of common affaires. He knew well that it would be a thing prejudiciall to the common weale of Florence, and no leffe hurtfull to him felfe, if anie of the great Potentates of that nation stretched out further their power, and therefore he employed all his deuifes , meanes , and directions, that the things of Italic fhould be fo euenly great maintai- ballanced, that they should not weigh more on the one side then on the other. A thing which he could not make to fucceed, without the preferuation of peace, and a perpetuall care, diligence and

of Naples, a Prince for his councels deliberate, in his actions resolute, and touching his affections verie moderate, not with flanding often times before, he had shewed many ambitious thoughts, and farre offfrom all councel to peace. Wherein he was much gouerned in that time by Alphonso Duke of Calabria, his eldeft sonne, who ynwillingly suffered that Iohn Galeas Sforce his sonnein lawe Duke of Millan, more then twentie yeares of age, but of a judgement verie incapable and vnapt to hing of Naples, great affaires, and retaining onely the name of Duke, should be suppressed, and as it were kept fmothered by Lodowike Sforce his yncle, who, more then ten yeares afore, by the mifgouernement and ynchast life of Madame Bonne, mother to the said Galear, was seized ypon his minoritie, and by that meanes, had reduced by litle and litle into his power the strong holds, men of warre, tributes and treasures, and all other the grounds and foundacions of the state of Millan, perseuering in the gouernement not as tutor and regent, but (except the onely title of Duke) with all demon-Arations and actions of an absolute Prince. Ferdinand, with whom was more familiar the impresfion of prefent vtilitie, then his ancient inclination, or th'indignation of his fonne (how just so euer it were) defired that nothing should be innouated in Italie, nor the present policie fall into alteration: perhaps he had regard to the experience of the yeares before, wherein (to his great daunger) he had proued the hate of his Barons and univerfall subjects: and happily he had not forgotten (by the incrnorie of things past) what affection a great part of his people bore to the name of the house What infl and of Fraunce: which just and wife conjectures drew him to suspect least the discords of Italie might wifecomeclurs breed occasion to the French to inuade the kingdome of Naples: or perhaps, to make a counter heps Ferdmand strength against the might of the Venetians, (at that time redowted throughout all Italie) he judged it necessarie to ally him selfe with others, and chiesly with the estates of Millan and Florence. Touching Lodomike Sforce, not withstanding he was possessed with a mind trauelling, busie, and ambitious, yet by the necessitie of his condition, he was driven to embrace the inclination and purpose to peace, aswell for that they which commanded at Millan were no lesse threatened then others, with the danger which the refidue feared, touching the greatnesse of Venice: as also for that it was more easie for him by the benefit of tranquilitie and peace, to keepe the authoritie he had vsurped. then by the trauels and troubles of warre. And albeit he kept a continual dreade, iealousie and sudowike Sforce. spicion over the thoughts and deuises of Ferdinand and Alphonso, yet waighing with the disposition of Laurence de Medicis to peace, the iealoufie he had likewife of their greatneffe, and perfwading himselfe also that for the diversitie of affections and auncient hat reds betweene Ferdinand and the Venetians, it was a thing vaine to feare that betweene them should be contracted anie amitie firme and well affured: he held for certaine that they of Aragon could not haue the strength, societie, or affiftance of others to enterprise against him that, which alone and of their fingular power they were not fufficient to obtaine.

Thus Ferdinand, Lodowyke, and Laurence having one equall will and denotion to peace, part-If for the periwations aforefaid, and formewhat for other inducements and confiderations: the 20. years beleague and confederation contracted in the name of Ferdmand King of Naples, John Galeas Duke twen the king of Myllan, and the common weale of Florence, was eafily recontinued: it was begunne manie of Naples, yeares before, and afterward broken by many accidents, and now effloones renewed in the yeare Duke of Myl-1480. for xxv. yeares, being competitors and parties therein almost all the meaner Potentates of lan, and the Italy, in whom was any principall ende and purpose not to suffer the Venetians to become great: of Florence.

The Venetians (for their partes) being in deede more mighty and greater than one principal of Florence. The Venetians (for their partes) being in deede more mighty and greater then any particular of the confederates, but farre leffe and inferior to them all togither, held their councels separate from the common councell of the league, and watching to rayle and encrease their estate by the diffof the Ventcord and trauels of others, they had a continual preparation and readines to take the oportunitian, what tie of all occurrants and times, which might open vnto them the way to the Empire and Monar- occasions they chie of all Italy : whereunto it was clearely seene that they did aspire in diverse seasons, but chiefly sought to of when abusing the occasion of the death of Philip Maria Viscounte Duke of Myllan, they attemp- fend the Confeted vnder colour to defend the libertie of the people of Myllan, to make themselues Lordes of deraiss. that state, conspiring in like fort (but of late memory) to bring the Duchie of Ferrara by the way of open warre, to their scruitude and subjection.

This confederation did easily bridle the couetousnesse of the Senate of Venice, but it could not entirely knit the confederats in a true and faithfull amitie, for that being indifferently repleni-Thed with chuic and ielousie, they ceased not to keepe a continuall care, observation, and eye ouer the thoughts and behaulours of one an other, breaking mutually all their resolutions and plots by the which might come to any one of them enlargement of estate or reputation. A thing which made not the peace leffe stable, but revived in them all a generall readines to be careful to quench all fuch sparkes and brondes as might be the cause of new fires and burnings.

Such was the efface of the affaires, such were the foundations of the tranquillitie of Italy, difposed and counterpeised in such fort, that much lesse that there was any doubt of present mutation, feeing the wiledome of man could not eafily make coniecture, by what councels, by what accidents, or with what innouation or armies, fo great a tranquillitie could be troubled, when in the moneth of Aprill 1492, chaunced the death of Laurence de Medicis: a death very pitifull for Laurence de him in respect of his age (having not yet fortic foure yeares) but more bitter and intollerable to Medicio dyeth his countrey, which, for the wisedome and reputation of the man, togither with the naturall vo- 1492. lubilirie of his wit, rayled to all things concerning honour and greatnesse, flourished plentifully The death of with riches, loue, and civilitic, and with all other benefits and felicities, which in the affayres of Laurence Methe world are wont to accompany a long concord and peace. This death hapned also very ill for diencanse of the refidue of Italy, as well for his generall deuiles, cares, and actions for the common fewertie, great wars in as also for that he was a meane in particular to moderate and bridle the differences, councels, and 11aly. Suspicions, which for diverse occasions, were often kindled betweene Ferdinand and Lodomyke Sforce, Princes equall in ambition, and nothing inferiour in power. Like as when aduethities happen, it is seldome seene that one ill comes alone: So a litle after the death of Laurence (the time preparing every day occasions to the calamities to come) chaunced the death of the Pope, whose Pope Innocent life being in other things ynprofitable to the common weale, was at the least convenient in this, the vij, dieth. that leaving fodainly warre and armes vnhappily rayled in the entry and beginning of his Popedome against Ferdinand, at the incensing of many barons of the realme of Naples, hee turned foone after all his facultie, affections and spirite, to pleasures, vaine, dissolute, and idle, not acquainting his thoughts (neither for himselfe nor frinds) with any enterprise which might trouble the rest, selicitie, and good accord of Italy. To Innocent succeeded Roderyk Borgia borne at Valence, one of the chiefe cities of Spayne: he was an auncient Cardinall, and one of the greatest in all the court of Rome: one meane that railed him to the scate of the Pope, was the difference betweene Creation of the Cardinals Ascanius Sforce, and Iulian S. Petri ad vinela: but the chiefest thing that accom-der 6. plished his election, was, that with a new example for that time, he bought by the consent and knowledge of euery one, partly for money, and partly with promiles of offices and great digni- Corruption of ries, many voyces of the Cardinals; who rejecting the instruction of the Gospell, were not asha-med to passe to him by sale, an authoritie and power to make marchandize of the holy treasors, the research and that with the name of the celestiall authoritie in the most high and eminent part of the tenple. To which abominable negotiation many of them were induced by the Cardinall Ascamus, but that was not more with perswasions and sutes, then with his example: for that being corrupted with the infinite defire of riches, he made the Pope promife him for his hyer and recompence of so great wickednesse, the office of vicechauncellorshippe, (the principallest place in the Court of Rome) togither with benefices, callles, and his pallace of Rome full of moueables of great valour. But the Pope for all this, could not auoyde neither for the time to come, the iu-Itice and judgement of God, nor for the present, the infamy & just hate of men, in whom for this election, was no small impressions of astonishment and horror, not onely for that it was entangled with meanes dishonest, but also because the natures and conditions of the man chosen, were, (for the greatest part) knowen to many: many sentences and consectures were made of his successe, and amongest others, Ferdinand King of Naples, diffembling openly the gricfe he had of that of Pope Alex. election, fignified to the Queene his wife with teares (which he was wont to forbeare euen in the death of his children) that there was created a Pope, who would be most hurtfull to Italy, and the whole common weale of Christendome. A judgement not vinworthy of the wifedome of fuch a Prince: for that in Alexander the fixt (for so would this new Pope be called) was a fubriltie, sharpenes, and expedition of wit most singular, a councell excellent, a wonderfull efficacie in perswasion, and in all great affayres a judgement and care incredible. But these vertues were maruelloufly defaced by his vices, for, touching his manners and customes, they were very dishonest, in his administrations he expressed little sinceritie, in his countenance no shame, in his wordes small trueth, in his heart little faith, and in his opinion lesse religion. Of the contrary, all his actions were defiled with an infatiable couctoufnesse, an immoderate ambition, a barbarous crueltie, and a burning defire to rayle and make great (by what meanes fo cuer) his children, who were many in number, and amongest others, one, no lesse detestable then the father, to whose cursed councels he became a wicked instrument. Great was the chaunge in the affayres of the Church by the death of Innocent the eight, but no leffe revolution happened in the common weale of Florence, by the taking away of Laurence de Medicis, to whole greatnesse (without contradiction) fucceeded Peter the eldest of his three fonnes, who as well for his age being yet young, as also for his other qualities was not fit for the gouernement of so heavie a charge, and lesse capable to manage the affayres with that moderation which his sather was wont to vie in businesse both forraine and domesticall, and knowing discrectely howe to temporise betweene Princes confederate, he had whilest he lived augmented greatly the conditions and faculties both publike and private, and at his death, left vnto every one a firme opinion that the peace of Italy was principally preferued by his meanes. on Peter was no sooner succeeded to the administration of the common weale, then with a course directly contrary to the counsels of his father, and not communicating with those auncient citizens which were wont to be called to the deliberation of businesse of importance, he joyned himselfe so straitly with Ferdinand and Alphonso, perhaps by the perswasion of Virginio Vrfin his parent depending wholly upon them, that Lodowyke Sforce had just occasion to feare, that selous oner the as often as the Aragons would annoy him, they should be ayded (by the authority of Peter de amilies between Medicis) with the forces of the common weale of Florence. This intelligence, feminary, and origiand the Ara- nall of all the troubles, albeit at the beginning was debated withno leffe judgement & wifedome, then the resolution secret and private: yet by certaine obscure conjectures, it beganne even in the beginning to be suspected by Lodomyke, a Prince very watchfull and of right subtle understanding : for, as it hath beene an auncient custome in Christendome to fend Embassadours to congratulate with the newe Pope, as Christes Vicar on earth, and to offer him obedience: So Lodowyke Sforce, who appropriated to him felfe this peculiar custome to study to shewe him felfe more wife then the rest, and of inventions straunge and vnaduised to others, had given counsell The conceit of that the Embassadors of the confederats, should all enter Rome in one day, and prelenting themselues altogither in the publike consistorie afore the Pope, the Oration should be expressed by one of them onely in the name of them all: for that by that forme and order of doing, befides the encrease of their common reputation, it should appeare to all Italy that there was amongst them not onely a good will and confederation, but rather fo great a conjunction, that they feemed as one body, one Prince, and one inuested corporation. To this he adioyned, that as touching the ytilitie vtilitic of this conneell, it was not onely expressed with the discourse of reason, but instified with a late and familiar example, for that (as was beleeved) the last Pope taking argument of the difunion of the confederates, in that at fenerall feafons, and with councels feparate, they had done him obedience, he was the more readie to inuade the kingdome of Naples. Ferdinand approved eafily the aduile of Lodowyke: the Florentines allowed it for the authoritic of the one and other: and Peter de Atedicis was not against it in open councell, albeit in particular, the deuise was nothing agreeable to him: for that being one of the cleft Embaffadors for that common weale, and having an intention to make his legation glorious with proud and gorgeous demonstrations, he The ramitie of feared that if he should make his entry into the citie and the Popes presence amongest the other Pa. Med, in Embassadors of the confederates, the magnificencie of his traine would not be seene, no more trifles cause of then a little candle amiddea choyle fort of greater lights. This vanitie of the young man was great missingle confirmed by the ambitious councell of Geness Bishoppe of Arze, the other coembassador for Florence: to him belonged the authoritie of the oration in the name of the Florentines, by reafon of his dignitie and profession in the studies of humanitie. And seeing by this manner no lesse vilooked for then alwayes viaccultomed, he faw himfelfe depriued of the occasion to publish his eloquence in an affembly to honorable & folenme, he complayned as if he had fuffered wrong in his perpetuall reputation. For this reason, Peter de Aledicis, pushed on partly by his proper vanitie and lightnesse, and partly by the pompe and ambition of the other, required the King of Naples (albeit with this caution, to keepe from Loddnyke that he did impugne his councell) to confider, that that forme of legation could not be executed in common without great confufion, and therefore that he would take vpon him to perfwade, that the expedition might be feparate, and passe according to the examples passed. The king of Naples desiring to gratific him in his The first occademannd (but yet not without the displeasure of Lodomyke) satisfied him in the effect, but not simplession in the mainer, plainely declaring to Lodomyke, that he did not discondescend from the first plot amongest the and resolution for the Embassadors, for other occasion then at the instance and solicitation of Pe- Confederats. ter as Medicis. Lodowyke for this suddaine mutation, declated more perplexitie and trouble of revdinand a mind, then the nature and importance of the thing could descrue, and amid his complaintes, he diffembled impropriated to himselfe this degree of iniurie, that to diminish his reputation, they reuoked the friend. first deuise, whereof he was author, and alreadie had communicated it with the Pope and the whole court of Rome. But the point wherein he felt his most trouble and trauell of mind was, for that in this litle and vaine accident, he faw tokens, argument, and coniectures, that Peter de Medicis had secret intelligence with Ferdinand, which by the euents that followed he discouered daily more apparantly. Languilare, Cernetre, and other small castles neare to Rome, were in the possession of Francisquin Cibo, a Genoway, bastard sonne to Pope Innocent, and he after the death of his father being gone to dwell at Florence, perhaps under the fauour and focietie of Peter de Medicis, brother to M. his wife: fold immediatly after his comming thither to Virginio Vrim by the negotiation of Peter, those castles for the price of forty thousand duckats. A thing The second ocdebated chiefely with Ferdinand, who lent him most part of the money, perswading himselfe that casion of disait could not but turne to his profite, if the greatnesse of Virginio, who was his parent and in his nion among the pay, should enlarge and stretch farre about the confines of Rome. The king confidered that the confederates. power of the Popes was an apt instrument to trouble the Realine of Naples (an auncient freeholder & chiefe of the Church of Rome) both for that it had large borders vponthe ecclefiasticall territories, and he had not yet forgotten what differences he & his father had with them: and also he wifely forefaw that there is alwayes fome occasion of new contentions about the iurifdiction of Confines, both for tributes & collation of benefices, and for regard of entercourse of barons, with many other quarrels happing many times amongst estates borderers, and no lesse often betweene the vasfall and the Lord Peramount: for which reasons, he held alwaies for one of the firme foundations of his fecuritie, that all or the greater part of the mightiest barons of the territory of Rome, should depend upon him. A thing which in that time he wrought with so much the more care and diligence, by how much the world judged that the authoritie of Lodowyke Sforce was like to be Mary reason great with the Pope by the meane of Cardinall Ascanius his brother: And as many beleeved, he which moned was perhaps not the least pushed forward with feare, least in Alexander were concurrant the co-Ferdinand to uctousnes & hatred of his vncle Pope Calixim the third, who, saving that death gaue impediment by the cossiles to his councels) had immediatly after the decease of Alphonso father to Ferdinand, taken armes Vosin.

of Alphonio (in whose kingdome he was borne, and to whom he had bene a seruant long time) he had obteyned other ecclefiasticall dignities with a liberall fauour and aide to aspire to the pope-« dome. But it hath beene alwaies a thing very true, that wisemen haue not at all times a discretion " or judgement perfect, feeing it is necessary, that the signes of the weakenesse and frailtie of mans ce vnderstanding should many times be discouered. The king of Naples, notwithstanding he was recommended for a Prince watchfull, pollitike, & forefeeing, yet did he ouerfee to confider how much this deliberation deserved to be rejected, for that conteyning in no accident or fortune any other hope then of a small vtilitie, it bred on the other side, many degrees and properties of milchiefes and harmes irreparable, for that in the fale of those small castles was no little oportunitie Maples incur to innouate to new things, the minds of those to whom it did either appertaine, or had interest of profite to looke to the preferuation of the common peace & concord: for the Pope pretending that by fuch alienation made without his knowledge, they were divolued to the fea Apostolike by the disposing of the lawes, seemed not a litle injuried: and looking withall into the ends and purposes of Ferdinand, filled all Italy with complaintes against him, Peter de Medicis, and Virginio, whom he affured that fo farre as his power would firetch, he would not spare any thing nor let passeany meane to preserve the dignitie and right of the sea of Rome. Lodowyke Sforce was no lesse moued, to whom were alwayes suspected the actions of Ferdinand, and who, for the false opinion he had that the Pope would be governed by the councels of Ascanius & himselfe, estecmed it his proper losse, if any thing should be diminished of the greatnesse of Alexander. But that which yexed him most, was that he could not but doubt, that betweene the Aragons and P. do Medicis was contracted a fecret and an affured league, drawing his coniecture from this, that in that action they had proceeded wholly, vniformely, and reciprocally: And therefore to raile impediments to those plots and determinations as most daungerous to his affayres, and to make this occasion conuenient to winne the Pope, he stirred him vp as much as he could, to protect his proper dignitie: he perfwaded with him that there was not fo much necessitie to fet before his eyes things that were done presently, as to consider how much it imported him, to suffer in the first dayes of his pontificacie, to be despised the Maiestie of such a degree, euen by his proper vassals: he told him, he had not to believe that the couetousnesse of Virginio, or the importance of the castels, or other reason of that nature, had moved Ferdinand: but a certaine languishing defire (which he could no longer keepe fmoothered) to affay his patience & courage, with injuries bearing litle face and shew at the beginning, but afterwardes (if he would joyne sufferance to those inferiour wrongs) he would not be without boldnesse to tempt him euery day with offences of far higher and greater qualitie: he aduised him to beleeue, that the ambition of Ferdinand did nothing differ from his aunceftors kings of Naples, and perpetuall enemies to the Church of Rome, who had not forborne to perfecute the Popes with warres and annies, and sometimes had occupied Rome: That the example is fresh and greene, that the king now reigning, in the person of his sonne, disparthed two armies at two feuerall times against two Popes, and made inuafion euen to the wals of Rome: That he hath bene alwaies exercised in malice, conspiracies, and warres against his predeceffors: And now not only the example of other kings, not onely his naturall couctoufneffe to beare rule, did stirre him vp against him, but rather an olde infected defire of reuenge nowe Politicke dea- burst out by the memorie of iniuries received of Calixum his vncle. Therefore he advised him with great diligence to looke into those things, least by giving sufferance and patience to these first wrongs, he were not the breeder of his proper dishonour and derogation, making himselfe ced them of his to be honoured with ceremonies and vaine titles, and in effect followed with dispite, derision, and contempt of euery one. He tolde him that in this vnworthy tolleration was fecretly many oportunities of courage & boldnes to the partie to conspire against him many daungerous enterprises: where, if he would take this to hart, and call things into correction and justice, he should with more facilitie preserve the auncient majestie and greatnesse, with the true reverence due by all the world to the Popes of Rome. To these perswasions he joyned many offices and promises of no finall importance, but farre greater in efficacie and effect, for that he lent him readily forty thoufand duckets, and leuyed with him at their common charge three hundred men at armes, under this condition, that they should be employed where it best pleased the Pope. Notwithstanding

all this, Lodowyke, defirous to flunne the necessitie to enter into newe troubles, communicated with Ferdinand, and councelled him to dispose Virginio to appeale the Pope by some honest meane, least uppon so slender beginnings, there arose not displeasures and troubles heavy and flaunderous. But with greater libertie and efficacy, he admonished often times Peter de Medicie, that (confidering how connenient it was for the common peace of Italy that his father Laurence was alwayes as the mediator and indifferent friend of Ferdinand and him) he would rather take the wayes, examples, and directions of his father, specially touching a personage of so great valour, then beleeuing new councels, to be driven to give occasion to another, to make deliberations which in the end would proue hurtfull to eucry one: he willed him to remember what great reputacion and fewertie the Sforces and Medicis had given reciprocally to their houses: and with what wrongs and injuries the familie of Aragon had obtraded ypon his father, his aunceflors, and common weale of Florence: and lastly by how many meanes and times Ferdinand and Alphonso his father had conspired some times by armes and open force, and often by traines and suttelties, to make them felues Lordes of Tuskane.

These councells or advertisements brought foorth litle fruite according to the expectation of the author, for that Ferdmand, esteeming it much to his indignitie to give place to Lodowyke and Assumes, by whose workings he supposed the Pope was settled into those discontentments and indignations which he shewed: gave secret councell to Virgino by the incitation of his sonne Alphon/o, not to delay to take by vertue of his purchase, the possession of the castles, promising to defende him against all displeasures that might happen. And on the other side, governing him felfe with his naturall industrie, he communicated with the Pope diverse meanes of composition, fecretly incenting Virginio not withflanding not to confent to any but fuch, as might keepe the caltles in his polletion, fatisfying the Pope with fome portion of money: which comfortes fet Firginio into fuch a courage and resolution of mind, that many times afterwards he refused Fertinio first certaine of the conditions, even such as Ferdinand (not to incense the Pope too much) solicited hardened by him instantly to be accepted. By these actions it was plainely perceived that Peter de Medicis per-wardes against feuered to follow the authoritie of the king, and that all that was done to draw him away, was his will is the invaine and without fruite: therefore Lodowyke Sforce deepely restoluting how much it imported flimite, that the citie of Florence should be at the deuotion of his enemies, whose temperature and good gouernement was wont to be the principall foundation of his fecuritie, and feeming to fee in his fecret cogitation many impressions of daungers threatning him on all sides, determined to prouide for his proper fafety, and to thole new perils to appropriate new remedies, specially his conscience interpreting vnto him with what vehement desire the Aragons thirsted to take from him the gouernement of his Nephew: which iust ambition, albeit Ferdinand (to whom nothing was more familiar then to diffemble his intentions) had fought to couer in all his actions, yet in Alphonso, of nature more open and liberall, was not so great continencie and moderation, but that he complained publikely of the oppression of his sonne in law, pronouncing with more great libertie of wordes, then temperance of differetion, many injurious speeches tending to manifest threatning. To these coniectures, Lodowyke added this argument of sulpition: He knew well that 1/abell wife to lohn Galeas, a young Ladie of high stomacke, would vse a perpetuall diligence to incense her father and grandfather, that if thindignitie which was done to her husband and her, would not moue them, at least the confideration of the perils whereunto their own liues were exposed, togither with the lamentable ruine of their children, might draw them to compassion. But Causes moving that which chiefely occupied his mind with perplexitie & torment, was, that by the fuggestion of Sforfa to alter his proper conscience, he knew how hateful his name was to the subjects of the Duchie of Myllan, as well for the grieuous and vnaccustomed money tributes which he had imposed ypon them, as also for the compassion that every one had of John Galeas their rightfull Lord. And although he trauelled by all his best wayes to make them of Aragon suspected of a defire to impatronise themselves of that estate, as though they did assume a title by the auncient rights of the testament of Philip Maria Viscount, who had instituted his heire Alphonso father to Ferdinand, and under that pretence ment to wrest from him the government of his Nephew: yet, he found him selfe vnable by all these meanes to remooue the hatreds that were conceived against him, and much leffe so to fatisfie the world, but that all men might confider to howe many miseries and wickednesses the ambition and wretched defire to beare rule, leades mortall men. Therefore after he had made discourse and conference with no small studie and trauell of minde of the slate Tim new Con- of things present, and the daungers likely to happen, casting aside all other thoughts, his deutses at last brought forth this resolution; to search new confederates and new friends. Touching this refolution he found a great oportunitie in the Popes disdaine against Ferdinand, and in the desire which he beleeued the state of Venice had, that this confederation should chaunge & alter, which of long time had given no fmall impedimentes to their purpofes: he made folicitation to both these to contract in common a new confederacie for the publike benefite.

But the Pope reiecting all pathons of anger, and all other affection, had his mind onely possest Geof the Pope with an unbrideled couctous neffectorayse and make mightic his sonnes, in whom having setled a to inflife his blindfancie, he was not ashamed, contrarie to the custome of former Popes (who to cast some cloke ouer their infamy were wont to call them their Nephewes) to call them his children, and The plaine fub. expressed them to the world for such And not finding as yet other fit occasion to give beginning alety of popes to to his ambitious intention: he made instance to marry one of his two sons to the bastard daughcall their Jours ter of Alphonfo, demaunding a dowrie of fome rich cleate in the kingdome of Naples: from which hope fo long as he was not excluded, he harkened rather with his eare then his heart to the confederation offered by Lodowyke. whom was hatefull the ambition and pride of the Pope, denyed constantly his consent, and yet keeping his intentions diffembled, they made no open chalenge or diflike to the marriage, but laying all the difficulty vpon the qualitie of the dowrie that was demaunded, they fatisfied not Alexander, who rifing for this cause into discontentment, resoluted to embrace the councels of Lodomyke, his humors being turned all into disdaine and ambition, and his minde trauelled with feare, Causes why the for that not onely Virginio Visin was mercenarie to Ferdinand, and for the many fauous he had Pope embra- received of him and them of Florence, and being withall of the faction of the Guelffes, was at

P. advucta, a Cardinall of great reputation (then retyred to the Castle of Oftie, which he held as Bishop of the place, least the Pope should dresse some ambush against his life:) was now become a great friend to Ferdinand, to whom before he was a professed enemie, and had many times stirred the Popes Sevens and Innocent against him. But the Senate of Venice contrary to the opinion and expectation of the world, made no great shew of readines to this confederation: for, albeit they tooke it to happen to their commoditie, and held withall very agreeable the difunion of others, yet they tooke occasion in the infidelitie of the Pope, being every day more suspected to every one, to be flow to harken to the league, the remembrance of the alliances made by them with Sixtus and Innocent the Popes latest predecessors, serving much to their present distrust. This was when the warre was most hoat against the Duke of Ferrara, whereunto after he had prouo-The moderate ked them, and intangled them with the quarrell, receiving of the one great displeasures without andwife proce- any profit, and for Sixtus, he did not onely chaunge purpose, but also recompenced them with

These new councels moved not a little the mindes of all Italy, for that the Duke of Myllan remayned now deuided from that league, by the which for more then a dozen yeares, their common securitie was mainteyned, being in it expresly desended that none of the confederates shold enter any new alliance without confent of the refidue. And therefore feeing that vnitie was broken with vnequall division, wherein confished the equalitie of their generall and cemon busines, and the mindes of the Princes replenished with suspicions and displeasures, there could be no expectation of other fuccesse, then that to a generall and common hurt, there would refort fruites equall and conforma ble to fuch feedes. Now, the Duke of Calabria and P. de medicis, judging it Apraelife to more for the fewertic of their estates to preuent, then to be preuented, inclyned easily to Profeer and Fabricius Colonne, who being also secretly incensed by the Cardinall S. P. advincla, offered to surprise the towne of Rome with their companies of men at armes and the aide of the faction of the Gebelyns, to that the Frins would follow them, and the Duke of Calabria marchio neare, that he neight reskew them within three dayes after their entry into Rome.

But Ferdinand, who nowe defired no more to vexebut to appaile the courage of the Pope, and to correct that which heretofore had been done by a rash councell and without discression, rejected altogether those councels wherein he judged was insection of commotion, and carried not intention and matter to breede securitie, but to raise and nourish greater troubles and daungers: he determined now, not fainedly, but with all his hart, to do all he could to compound and accord the controuerfic of the castels, perswading himselfe, that that occasion of so great emotion and chaunge being taken away, Italy would speedily returne with little or no trauell, to her "Ferdinand first create. But it hapneth not alwayes, that in taking away the occasions, thesees doc cease, ha- ", repented all uing had of them their first beginning: for, as it often times hapneth that resolutions made by "toolise. feare, feeme to him that feareth, leffe then the perill: fo Lodowyke had no great confidence in that he had found a remedie fufficient for his fecuritie: But doubting, by reason the Pope and the Venetians had intentions and ends other then his, that his foundation could not long laft, which he had layd upon the confederation lately made with them, and that therefore his affaires by divers accidents should be in daunger to be reduced into hard termes and many difficulties: he applyed all his thoughts, more to cure even to the roote the original ill that he fet before his eyes, then to prouide a falue for fuch accidents as might happen by it, neither remembring how daungerous it, is to yfe a medicine stronger then the nature of the difease or complexion of the patient will suffer, ,, nor that to enter into greater perills can be the onely remedie for daungers present. And to the ,, end to build his fewertie upon forreine strength, seeing he had no confidence in his ownerforces, Ladowyke first and lesse expectation of trust in the Italian amities, he determined to doe all that he could to stirre rain ermes up the French King Charles the viij. to assay the kingdome of Naples, which he pretended to into Italy. appertaine to him by the auncient rights and difcents of the house of Anion.

The kingdome of Naples, which, in the inuestitures and bulls of the Church of Rome, whereof The title of the it is an auncient freehold, is abfurdly called the Realme of Sicyle on this fide the river of Far, and house of Anbeing virultly vsurped by Manfrey bastard some to the Emperour Fredericke the second, was iow, to the given in chiefe togither with the Ile of Sicile vnder the title of both Siciles, the one on this fide, kingdome of Raples, and the other beyond Far, by Pope Vrbynthe fourth, to Charles Earle of Provence and Anion, 1264. brother to that Lengs king of the french, who, much renowmed for his power and strength, but more recommended for the holinesse of his life, deserved (according to the vaine affections of the Frenchmen) to be translated after his death into the number of Saintes. This Charles with force of armes, obtained effectually, that, which by title was given to him with the authority of the Church: after his death, succeeded to the kingdome, Churles his sonne called by the Italians (to distinguish him from his father) Charles the second, who left the inheritance of the Realme to Robert his sonne, But because Robert dyed without issue male, Johane daughter of Charles Duke of Calabria sonne to Robert, who dyed in young age before his father, aspired to the kingdom: but her authoritie beganne immediately to be deiected, no lesse for thinfamic of her life and conditions, then for the common imbecillitie of that fexe: whereupon, with the increase of time, the Realme being throwne into many discordes and warres, not with straungers, but amongest the selfe successors of Charles the first, descending of diverse children of Charles the second: Iohane despayring not to be able to defend her selfe, adopted for her sonne, Lewys Duke of Anion, brother to the french King Charles the fift: he to whom the frenchmen gaue the furname of wife, for that he had obtained many victories without feeling the power of Fortune. This Lewys, after he had passed into Italy with a mighty armie (Iohane being aforehand decessed by violent means, and the kingdome transferred to Charles called Durazzo, descending likewise of Charles the first) died of a feuer in Apulia euen when he was almost in possession of the victorie: so that there came no other thing to them of Aniow by his adoption, then the earledome of Pronence, which had bene alwayes possessed by the issues of Charles the first, But yet of that rose the original of the colourynder the which afterwards, both Lewys of Amor, sonne to the first Lewys, and at an other time a fonnes fonne of the fame name both stirred up by the Popes, being then in variance with the same kings, to make many inuations upon the kingdome of Naples, but with great misfortune and premdice. Touching Charles Durazzo, Ladislao his sonne succeeded him, who dying without iffue in the yeare 1 4 1 4.the crowne divolued to his fifter Johane the second, Aname much accurfed for the kingdome of Naples, and no leffe vnhappie to both the one and other of the women, refembling one an other in diffolute gouernement and wanton cuffomes of life: for this lobane putting the pollicie and direction of the Realme into the hands of those persons with whom the communicated vuchaftly her bodie, was immediatly brought into fuch straites and difficulties, that being tormented with Lemys the third, with the aide of Pope Martyn the fifth, the was at last constrained for the last refuge, to make her some by adoption, Alphonso king of Aragen and Sieyle. But entring soone after into contention with him, she brake that adoption vnder colour of ingratitude, and made a new adoption, calling to her fuccours, the felfe Lewys, who perfecuting her with warre, compelled her by necessities of warre, to make the first adoption, In so much as having with force chased Alphonso wholly out of the kingdome, she enjoyed it in peace, all the refidue of her life: And dying without issue, she instituted for her heire (as the brute went) Rene Duke of Amon and Earle of Provence, brother to Lewys her sonne adoptyse, who perhaps died the fame yeare. But the fuccession of Rene displeasing much the Barons of the realme (befides a brute running that the testament was forged by them of Naples) Alphonso was reuoked by a part of the Barons and people: and from thence kindled the fire of the warres betweene Alphonio and Rene, which by many yeares brought many affictions to that noble realme, and yer the accidents and actions of the warre, were more by the proper forces of the realme, then by the strength of the parties. In this fort (the wils of men being different and contrary) were kindled the factions not altogether in that time quenched betweene the Aragons and them of Aniow, their titles and colours of rights chaunging with the time, for that the Popes following more their cultomes of couetoufnes, or the propertie of times, then iuflice or equitie, confented diverfely to the inuestitures of them. But touching the warres betwene Alphonso and Rene, the victory remained to Alphonfo, a Prince for his valure, more renowned, for his power, more mighty, and for his fortune, better fauoured: who dying foone after without lawfull heires, and without making any mention of Iohn his brother and fuccessor to the realme of Sieile & Aragon, bequeathed by testament the kingdome of Naples to Ferdinand his ballard sonne, as a just reward and testimonie of his proper getting and concueft, and therefore he judged it could not appertaine to the crowne of Aragon. This ballard, not with flanding he was immediatly after the death of his father, inuaded by John the fonne of Rene, and that by the supportation of the principal barons of the realine: yet with his fortune & vertue he maintained not only good defence, but also so chased his aduerlaries, that neuer after during the life of Rene (furniting many yeares his sonne) he neither had to debate with those of Anion, nor yet stoode in feare of their inuations. In the end Rene dyed, and having no issue male, he established as heire over his whole estates, Charles the sonne of his brother, who dying foone after without children, left by his wil his inheritance to the french king Lewys the xj.to whom did not only returne as to his Lord foueraigne the Duchie of Anion (which fuffreth no capacity of fucceffion in the women, for that it is a member of the crowne) but also he put himselfe in the possession of Pronence, not withstanding the Duke of Lorraine defeending of one of the daughters of Rene, instiffed the inheritance of his estates to appertane vnto him. And the faid Lewys by just vertue & pretogative of the same testament, had good power to pretend that the rights which those of Anom had to the kingdome of Naples, should be appropriated to him. All which inheritances being passed and continued after his death to the perfon of Charles the viij. his fonne, Ferdinand king of Naples began to haue a mighty enemy, befides the oportunitie generally offring to who foeuer defired to annoy him. For, at that time, this was the state of the realme of Fraunce: it was very populous in multitudes of men, for wealth & riches euery particular region most fertill and plentifull, for glory in armes most flourishing and renowmed: a pollicy well directed, discipline administred, an authoritie dreadfull, and in opinion and hope most mightie, lastly their generall conditions and faculties so well furnished, as perhaps it was not more happie in these mortall selicites since the daies of Charlemaine. It was newly amplified amplified in euery one of the three parts, wherein all Gamle stoode deuided by the anncients: for, xl. yeares before vinder Charles the vij. (a Prince for his victories obteined with great daungers called happie) Normandie and the Duchie of Guyen holden by the English, were reduced to the obedience of the french crowne. And in the last dayes of Lewys the xj. the Earledome of Prosence, the dukedome of Burgondy, almost all Picardie, togither with the Duchie of Britaine, were by a new mariage inuested in the power of Charles the viij. There was no want of inclination in this king to aspire to conquere by warre and armes the kingdom of Naples, as justly appertaining to him: which continuing from his infancie by a certaine naturall inftinct, was entertayned and nourished by such as were about him, and for the conformitie of humours, very agreeable with him: they raised his thoughts into vaine regions, and made him glorious about the triumphes of A right de-Cafar and Alexander: they told him that with his heroicall minde, vertues, and disposition, did fiription of concurre a present occasion to make him surmount the renowme of his predecessors, for that Parasites. in the conquest of Naples was a readie way for him to bring ynder his subjection the Empire of the Turkes.

Thefe things being knowne to many, brought many hopes to Lodowyke Sforce, to perswade eafily the thing he defired, who also reapposed much in the friendship and familiarity which the name of Sforce had in the french Court: for, both in him and in his brother Galeus afore him, was continued by many demonstrations and good offices, the amitie begunne by Francis Sforce their father, who xxx. yeares before having received in fee of Lewys the xj. (whose mind abhorred alwaies the things of Italy) the citie of Sauone, with the right which he pretended to have to Genes possessed aforetime by his father, neuer failed him in his daungers, neither with councell, succors, nor affection.

But Lodowyke to folicite in France with more credite and authoritie, and iudging himselfe vnable alone, both for the importance and daunger of the thing, to handle so great an enterprise: fought to communicate and perfwade all things with the Pope, in whom he knew had most dominion to stirring humors, ambition and disdaine: he told him that not by the fauors of the Princes of Italy, and much leffe by the meane of their armies and helpes, he should be reuenged of Lodo. Sforce Ferdinand, nor haue hope to compasse estates worthy and honorable for the aduancement of his feekethis draw fonnes. He found the Pope to beare a vehement and ready will to the matter, perhaps for a defire purpofe. to innouate and alter things, but more likely to confraine the Aragons by feare to come to that, which by consent and will they would not accord to him. After they had communicated their councels, they dispatched secretly into France, personages of trust, to sound the will of the king and fuch as governed him: who shewing them selves not farre from their intention, Lodowyke turning his whole wits to the deuise of this enterprise: sent in the sight of all the world (but shadowing it with other occasions) one Charles Balbyan Earle of Beliogense, who soliciting the king certaine dayes in priuate audience, and working particularly with fundry of his principall fauorites, was at last introduced into open councell, the king present, where in a publike hearing of the Prince, his Lords and Prelates of the Court, he deliuered this forme of discourse.

Most Christian King, The experience of the disposition of hearts diversly inclined, makes me , The Embast-doubtfull, whether vnder a direct and absolute forme, I should begin my discourse, or vsing the ,, sadowr of cultome of Orators, bring into queltion fuch objections as may be opposed against the present "Myllan permatter: for, in causes of perswasion, the one with the other must orderly concurre, least for want " frades the of due office in the speaker, the matter seeming to suffer imperfection and error, do not bring , french king forthresolution and effect according to the expectation of the parties for whom he solicites. And ,, to the voyage albeit the universal conjecture and onjoine of your Majestic resources. albeit the vniuerfall coniecture and opinion of your Maielties many vertues, and the graue afpect, and face of your right wife councell here affembled, promife no leffe ready confent and liking, ,, then the matter is sult and innocent: yet for your Maiesties better inducement, and generall sa-,, tisfaction of your Lords and Prelates affilling, I will ioyne my felfe to the refutation of that generall doubt which in negotiations of this nature, are commonly objected, more by cultome, ,, then just cause arising. If therefore (right Christian king) any man for what occasion so euer, will ,, hold for suspected the integritic of mind and faith, with the which Lodowyke Sforce comes to, councell you to beare armes to conquere the kingdome of Naples: he may eafily deliuer his mind, of that ill grounded suspition, if he either looke into the offers, offices, and conditions wherewith, he doth accompany his perswasion & councell, offering you the commoditie of his treasors, men, and all other oportunities: or at least will call to his memorie with what denotion both he, Ga-" Jeas his brother, and originally Francis his father, did honour the late king Lenys your father, conce tinued with no leffe constancie, faith, and pietie to the glorious name of your Maiestie. Let him confider also that by this enterprise, Lodowyke flands possible to many great daungers, with a ve-" ry naked hope of any profite: yea in this is conteyned the only benefite he shall haue, to see a just " reuenge of the ambushes and wrongs done by them of Aragon: where your maiestic by meane " of the victorie, that happily aspire to a most flourithing kingdome, bringing with it a greater gloire and oportunitie of farre more high and honorable merite, an action whereunto the thoughts of a mighty Princes ought to be fashioned. And on the other part, if it happen that you come not to the end of this enterprise: yet your maiestic looseth no reputation, nor your greatnesse the more diminished: for that onely the fortunes of Princes are subject to opinions, but not their estate and " maiestic impaired. But for Lodomyke, he is of nothing more sure then to suffer generall ill will and " contempt, and of nothing more valure then to find remedie in his perils: for that in him would concurre all the displeasures and slaunders which may concerne his estate, life, or reputation. And " therefore I fee not how should be suspected the councels of him, whose conditions and fortunes " are so vnequall and inferior to yours. But there be reasons stirring you to this honorable expedi-"tion, which for the fimplicitie, roundnesse, and innocencie they conteine, will admit no doubt: of for that in them are liberally concurrant all the grounds and foundations which in confulting of " enterprises, merit chiefest confideration: that is to say, the inflice of the cause, the facilitie of the " conquest, and the great fruite of the victorie: it is manifest to all the world, how resolute and ap-" parant be the rights which the house of Anion, to whom you are lawfull inheritour, hath to the " realine of Naples, and how iust is the succession which this crowne pretendes to it by the issues of "Churles, who first of the bloud royall of France, obteyind the fame kingdome, both with the au-" thoritie of the Pope, and by his proper valour. And it is no leffe easie to conquere it, then the acti-" on is just: for, who knowes not, how much the King of Naples is inferiour in force, authoritic, and " fortune, to the most mightie King of all Christendome. And no nation doubteth, with what ter-" rour and renowne the name of the french thundereth throughout the regions of the world, neisee ther with what aftonishment the brute of your armies, keepeth other countreys in dread. At no " time did the inferiour Dukes of Aniow affaile the kingdome of Naples: that they put it not in " great hazard: And it is too late to be forgotten, how Iohn sonne of Rene had in his hand the vi-" ctoric against Ferdinand now reigning; if Pope Pins had not taken it from him: but much more " Francis Sforce, who forbare (as is well known) to obey Lewys the xj.your father. If those small " forces trained with them fo great fortunes, what may be hoped for of the armies and authoritie " of so mightie a king, all oportunities being increased, and the difficulties objected against Rene " and John, diminished, seeing the Princes of those estates which gaue impediments to their victo-" ries, haue now vnitie and confederation with you: and in them be no finall meanes to offend the "kingdome of Naples: for, the Pope by land, by reason the territories of the Church are frontiers " to Naples, and the Duke of Alyllan by sea, applying to you the commoditie and service of Genes: "will be furtherers of your victorie, with many helpes, fauours, and commodities: befides thefe, "there is no potentacie or iurisdiction in Italy will oppose against you: for, it cannot be judged of " the Venetians, that they will throwe themselucs into expenses and daungers, and much lesse de-" prine their estate of the amitie wherein so long time they have bene intertained with the kings of " France: to preserve or protect Ferdinand an auncient enemy to their name and greatnesse: for se that amongst estates and kingdomes, the remembrance of injuries past keepes mens mindes from " reconcilement. And there is no reason to beleeue, that the Florentines will depart from the natu-" rall deuotion which they have borne to the crowne of France, feeing it is but just, to owe faith, " feruice and affection, to those who gaue them their first creation, dignitie, and greatnesse. But be cc it, that, following the common ingratitude of mortall men, they would object themselves against " you : what are they against so great a power, compounded upon so warlike a nation, which maor ny times, against the wils of all Italy hath passed the Alpes, and with a wonderfull glory and hapof pinesse, have brought home many victories and triumphes: And in what time hath the realme of "France bene euer more happie, more glorious, or more mightie, then at this hower? neither had se this crowne at any time heretofore so conuenient and readie meanes to establish a firme peace with all his neighbours. All which oportunities if they had so generally met togither in the daies

of your father, he would perhaps have bin more ready to this felfe fame expedition: And touching,, them of Aragon your enemies, the difficulties be no leffe augmented against them, then to you ,, the oportunities be fauouring, because in the fame realme both the faction of Anow is yet migh-, tie, and no leffe the intelligences of many Princes and gentlemen chased out vniustly within these ,, few yeares, befides, the iniuries done at all times by Ferdinand to the Barons & people, yea cuen, to them of the party of Aragon, have beene of so bitter taste and toleration, together with his ,, disloyalty fo great, his conetousnesse so infatiable, & the examples of cruelty in him and his eldest,, sonne Alphonso so notorious and horrible: that it is certaine that all the realme pushed forwarde ,, with a just hate against them, will rife into willing commotion at the brute of your comming (fo,, great authoritie hath as yet the remembrance of the liberalitie, finceritie, humanitie, and iuflice, which the French kings have vsed:) the onely deliberation to make the enterprise is sufficient to ,, make you victorious: for, your men at armes shall no sooner passe ouer the mountaines, nor the ,, armie at fea no sooner be prepared in the hauen of Genes, then Ferdinand and his sonne stricken, with the conscience of their wickednesse, will take more councell to slie then to fight : fo shall you, with great happinesse, recouer for the posteritie of your bloud, a kingdome, which albeit can hold, no comparison with the large realme of France, yet, besides his riches, amplitude and fertillity.it, well merits account and reckoning for the helpes and infinite commodities which by it may be, increased to this your imperiall crown, matters which I would particulate, were it not that the no-,, ble minds of the french reach vnto greater ends, and that the high and excellent thoughts of fo,, valiant and glorious a king, regard not so much profits prinate, or particular, as they behold the " vniuerfall greatnesse of the whole common weale of Christendome: wherein touching this, what ,, oportunitie more greater, what more ample occasions, what seat of countrey more proper or ,, convenient to manage warre against the enemies of our religion? The sea that devides the king-,, dome of Naples and Greece, containes not in some part aboue lxx, miles in largenesse: a prouince,, so oppressed and torne in peeces with the tyrannies of the Turkes, that they desire nothing with ,, more generall gladnesse, then to see the banners of Christians and men of warre marching for their, deliuerie. There is nothing more easie then to runne euen into the intrals of that Nation, and to ,, batter Const am inople, the soueraigne residencie of that Empire. This enterprise, for the maiestie, and nature of it, doth most worthily become your person and greatnesse, with whose high & aspiring thoughts it seemes to have a certaine lively affinitie. And for the reason and necessitie of it, ,, it can not so justly appertaine to any as to you bearing the surname of Most Christian, a title ,, wherein your predecessors have flourished with no small examples of triumph & glory, they issu-,, ing in armed maner out of this realme, fometimes to deliuer the Church of God from the oppreffion of tyrants, fometimes to inuade the infidels, & recouer the holy sepulcher, have raised even, to the third heaven their names and maiestic of the french kings: with these councels, with these, meanes, with these actions, with these ends, became great and Emperour of Rome, that mighty ,, and triumphant Charles, of whom as you beare the name, so now the time offereth you occasion, to communicate with his glory and titles. But it is a time vainely fpent to stand long vpon the recapitulation of these reasons, as though it were not more convenient and more agreeing with the ,, order of nature, to confider how to keepe, then how to get : for, confidering the oportunitie of ,, fo many and great occasions calling you, it could not but intangle your greatnesse with apparant,, infamy & dishonour, to suffer any longer Ferdinand to vsurpe you such a kingdome, which ,, for almost two hundreth yeares hath had continuall possession in the kings of your bloud. And ,, feeing by cleare inftice and all indiciall courfe of lawes, it appertaines vnto you, who doubts how iustly it agreeth with your dignitie to recouer it: but specially how much it concernes your pietie,, to deliuer from the cruell tyranny of those Catelyns, those people which beare deuotion to your,, name, and do craue by right to beare you the dutie and office of subjects? Thus most high and,, glorious king, is the enterprise proceed inst, easie, and necessary, and withall no lesse glorious and,, holy, as well for it felfe in particular, as for that it openeth the way to other enterprises worthy of ,, a right Christian king of France: whereunto not only the reasons of men, but even the selfe voice, of God, doth call you with great and manifest occasions, assuring you afore the beginning of a ,, most great happinesse and fortune, since no greater worldly happinesse can happen to no Prince, then to fee his deliberations and councels, (bringing glorie and greatnesse) to be accompanied, with fuch circumstances and consequences, that they concerne not onely the benefite and vni" uerfall fafetie, but much more do confider the exaltation of the whole communitie of Christen-

but specially of such, who for their nobilitie and opinion of wisedome held greatest authoritie: They judged that fuch a warre whereof he had opened the way and entry, could not but con-

taine many difficulties and daungers, both for the conduct of armies into a countrey straunge, and farre removed from the realme of France, and also against enemies bearing reputation of valour, pollicie, and discipline: for, for wisedome, forecast, and staied discretion, Ferdinand bare a high recommendation: and for valour, conduct and direction in warre, his fonne Alphonfo was The Nobilitie of France mif-

no lesse renowmed. Besides, they made this coniecture, that Ferdinand having raigned xxx yeares, and facked and confisked at fundry times many of the Barons, had heaped togither no finall treafure: on the behalfe of the king, they confidered that his capacitie was too greene to fulfaine alone so heavy a burden, and for the direction of warres and cstates, the councell weake, and the experience lesse assured of such as he beleeved most in. To these they added the want of money, whereof they esteemed to neede a great quantitie. They wished that the deceits and subtilties of the Italians might be deepely looked into, affiring themselves that it could not be pleasing, neither to others nor to Lodowyke Sforce himselfe : (a man confessed by all the Italians to be of little faith) that the kingdome of Naples should passe into the power of a king of France : they judged it hard to winne, and leffe eafiet o keepe those things that should be wonne. For that reason (said A true faying they) Lewys father to Charles, (a Prince in all his actions following more the truth, then the apof King Lewys parance of things) would neuer accept the hopes which were offered him of the matters of Italy, and much lesse make reckoning of the rights falne to him in the Realme of Naples: no, he sawe in his judgement, that to fend armies beyond the mountaines, was no other thing then to learch enemies and daungers with the walt of infinite treasure, and bloud of the Realme of France: they held it necessarie afore all things (if this expedition should proceede) to reunite controuersies with the kings borderers, for that with Ferdinand king of Spaine, was no want of occasions of quarrels and fulpitions, and with Maximilian king of Romaines, and Philip Archduke of Austrich his sonne, not onely many hartburnings and lealousies, but also displeasures & injuries: whose minds albeit they could not be recociled without codescending to some things hurtfull to the crowne of France, yet neuerthelesse such reconcilements would be more by demonstrations then effectes: for, fay they, if any ill accident happen to the kings army in Italy, what accord can be fo well affured, which will hold them from inuading the Realme of France, seeing this is familiar with Princes, to hold for suspected the greatnesse and fortunes of their neighbours, and are ouer nothing so by the Robbin watchfull as ouer oportunities and occasions. And touching the king of England, Henrythe vij. it was not to be doubted that the naturall hate of the English toward the french had not more force then the peace made with him two moneths before, for that it is manifest, that no one thing brought him more to the composition, then that the preparations of the king of Romaines aunfwered not the promises wherewith he had induced him to lay siege to Bollogne. Of this nature were the reasons alleaged by the great Lords, partly debated amongest themselves, and partly disputed in the presence of the king. The chiefest of those that instified these arguments afore the king, was one lames Grauille Admirall of France, whose greatnesse albeit was somewhat diminilhed, yet his authoritic fuffered no alteration, for the auncient name and credit of his wifedome rouing liberally thorough all the Realme of France. But the kings mind with a wonderfull greedinesse, was wholly inclined to the contrary aduise: what with the greenenesse of his yeares aspiring now to xxij. and by his vnstayed nature, not yet experienced in the affaires of the world, he was earied into a wonderfull ambition to enlarge his Empire, following an appetite of glory, founded rather upon a light will and furie of youth, then upon maturitie of councell, feeing that either by his proper nature, or rather the examples and admonifiments of his parents, he reapposed little faith in his Lords and Nobles of his realine. And since he came forth of the tutorship and iurisdiction of Anne Duchesse of Burbon his sister, he bare no more care to the councels of the Admirall, nor to others that had beene great in the government: but gave himselfe over to the directions of certaine men of base condition, trained up almost alwayes in the service of his person: of these, such as had most fauour and place with him, perswaded him greatly to embrace the enterprise, being partly corrupted, (for the councels of Princes are often times mercenarie)

with the promises and presents of Lodowykes Embassador, by whom was not forgotten any dili- King Charles gence or art to draw the fauours of fuch as might do most inthis action. They were partly pushed led by base might on by certaine hopes, either to be rayled to effaces in the kingdome of Naples, or to obtaine of and fuch as by the Pope, dignities and pentions in the Church. The principall of all thefe, was one Stephen de money were Vers, borne in Languedocke, of base place, but bred up of long time with the king, in whose chanber he yfed to lie, and by the kings creation made Seneshall of Beucarre: with this man did communicate one William Briconnet, who of a marchant created first generall of France, and after made Bishop of S. Malo, had not only the charge & administration of the kings revenew, (which the french call superintendent of the finances,) but also having confederacie with Stephen, had by his meanes a great entry into all the affaires of importance, albeit he had no great in fight in the policie and gonernment of matters of estate. To the helpe of this enterprise, were adioyned the perfwafions of Autouell of S. Seuerm, Prince of Salerne, and of Vernaedin of the fame family Prince of Bylignan, togither with many other Barons banished the Realme of Naples, who being with- The compleses drawen many yeares before into France, had continually folicited the king to that enterprise, laying before his eyes the great calamitie, or rather generall despaire of the whole kingdome, and the factions, and many followers, which they promifed themselves to have in the same.

In this divertitie of perswafions, the deliberation remained suspended for certaine daies, others being not only in doubt what to determine, but also the kings will wauering and vincertaine, for that fome times inclining to his ambition and glory, and fometimes restrained with seares & dangers, he would often be irrefolute, and effloones turne to the contrary, of that which he had afore determined. But in the end, his first inclination, togither with the curied destiny of Italy, being of more force then any thing that could be faid to the contrary, the well gouerned & peafible councels of his Nobles were altogither rejected, and communicating only with the bishop of S. Malo, and the Seneshall of Bencaire, and partaking nothing with the affent & privitie of all others, there was a conucntion made with Lodowyks Embassador, whose conditions albeit were holden secret for many moneths, yet this is the capitulation and fumme of them.

The king Charles either going in person into Italy, or fending thither any army for the con- confederates quest of Naples, the Duke of Myllim was bound to give him passage thorow his jurisdictions, between the To fend thither with his men, flue hundreth men at armes paied : To fuffer him to arme at Genes king of Frace, fo many veffels as he will: And to lend him before he departed out of France, two hundreth thou- & Lod. Touching the king, he was bound to the defence and protection of the Duchie of Myllan against all men, with particular mention to preferue the authoritie of Lodowyke: to entertaine during the warre within the citie of Aft belonging to the Duke of Orleance, two hundreth launces to Great Promis give succours to the necessities of that Duchie. Lastly, he promised either at that time or soone fee flend rby after, by a writing subfigued with his owne hand, that having once conquered the realme of Na- performed.

ples, he should give to Lodomyke the principalitie of Tarente.

But let vs looke somewhat into the variation of times and things of the world: Albeit Francis > Sforce, father to Lodowyke, a Prince of rare wifedome and valour, was a professed enemy to those >> of Aragon, for the many displeasures he had received of Alphonso, Ferdinands father: and an aun- >> cient friend to the house of Arion: yet this was his moderation in the actions concerning those " two families, that in the yeare 1 45 7. When lohn sonne of Rene, inuaded the kingdome of Na- " ples, he ministred succours to Ferdinand, with such a wonderfull diligence and readinesse, that "Wife confrthe victorie was acknowledged to happen wholly by his helpe: he was firred to this for no other France reason, then that he saw it was too perillous for his Duchie of Atyllan, that the french his neare ", Sforce nos neighbours, should make themselves Lords over so michaely and the state of neighbours, should make themselues Lords ouer so mighty an estate. The same reason induced "followed. Philip Maria Viscount (abandoning them of Amon, to whom he had alwaies before borne fauor) to deliuer Alphonso his enemy, who taken of the Geneuoys in a battell at sea neare to Caiette, was brought to him prisoner to Myllan, with all the Nobilitie of his realmes: on the other fide, Lemys the xj. father to Charles, being often times perlivaded by many, and not with light occasions, to harken to the things of Naples, and being withall with great instance, called by the Geneuoys to be Lord ouer their countries, as Charles his father had bene afore him: did alwayes refufe to intangle himselse with the doings of Italy, as matters full of expenses & difficulties, and in the end hurtfull to the Realme of France. But now the opinions of men being chaunged, but perhaps not

chaunged the reason of things, we see how Lodowyke cals the french ouer the mountaines, not often change, fearing by fo mightie a king (if Naples should fall into his hands) that daunger which his father no of things alters leffe valiant in armes then he, would have feared, if but a little Earle of Prouence had conquered it. And on the other fide, we fee Charles now raigning inflamed with a defire to make warre in Italy, preferring the rashnesse of men of base place and vnexperienced, afore the counsell of his cfather: A Prince of fingular wifedome, temperance, and forecast. of Ferrara, his father in law, who, nourishing a vehement appetite to recouer Polefine de Ronigne, a countrey confining and importing much the fewertie of Ferrara, which the Venetians had taken from him in the warres ten yeares past, foresaw that the only meane to recouer it, was to fet all Italy in trouble, and innouate the states with most great emotions. Besides this, many beleeved, that albeit in Hercules appeared a difguiled apparance & will to wish well to his some in law, yet in secret he followed him with an extreme hatred, for that in the same warre all the refidue of Italy, which had taken armes for him, being farre more mightie then the Venetians, Lodo-A reunge ta- myke governing then the state of Myllan, and regarding his proper respects & particular interests, conftrayned the othersto make peace, with condition that Polefine should remaine to the Venetians: And therefore Hercules having no meanes to revenge fo great an injurie by armes & warre, " fought to execute his long smothered malice, by giving him a daungerous counsell: such are the " operations of malice, working in minds mighty, who feeldome hold it any breach of justice to be reuenged of him that offereth the first iniurie.

But now Italy being possessed with a brute of those things which were in practise on the other fide the mountaines, and whose first authors at the beginning were vncertaine, many thoughts & discourses appeared in the vinderstandings of men: to many, waighing with the power & strength of the french king, and the readines of that Nation to new broyles & innovations, the prefent divifions and factions of the Italians, it feemed a businesse of great quality & importance: others, interpreting the age & greennesse of the king, & judging much of the negligence naturallto that nation, and lastly, looking into the impediments which great enterprises haue, construed all not to 2 councell well grounded, but to a hot and unbridled affection of youth, which after it had a litle throwne out his finne and fire, would eafily vanish & diffolue. Ferdinand himselfe (against whom all this busines was conspired) shewed little appearance of seare, saying, it was an enterprise intangled with many difficulties, for that if they made their inuation by lea, they should finde him furnished with a plentifull nauie, armed able to give him battell in the plaine sea, his ports being furnished, and his forts well manned & victualed: neither was there any baron in the realme able to receive them, as had bene done afore to John of Anion, by the Prince of Boffane, & other great ones of the land. And touching their expedition by land, it was full of incommodites, suspicious to many, and a painefull march farre off, for that their way lying all along the length of Italy, the refidue of the Princes could not be without their particular feares, and perhaps Lodowyke Sforce more then the others, not with standing he made shew of the contrary, seeming as though a comon perill brought interest to enery particular: for that the proximitie and neighbourhood of Myllan with France, gaue vnto the king a greater oportunitie, (but in true likelihood) a greater defire to possesse & occupie that Duchie, And seeing the yong & true Duke of Myllan, was of neere kinred to the king, Lodowyke could not other waies affure himself, but that the king caried an intention to deliuer him from his oppression, having not many yeares before protested openly, that he would not endure that Iohn Galess his cofin should be so vinworthily restrained & kept vinder: That the state of them of Aragon, stood not vpon such termes & conditions, as the hope of their weaknesse might induce the courage of the french to make inuafions ypon the, for that they were plentifully furnished with many nubers of valiant men at armes, great troups of horses of seruice, many stores of munitions & artilleries, & all other necessary things for the warre, togither with so rich a mynt of money, that it sufficed against all wants, prouisions & fortunes: that besides many honorable Captaines trained and experienced, he had for the conduct of his armies, his eldeft fonne, Duke of Calabria, a leader of great renowne, & no leffe vertue, growen into a mind resolute, a coucell staied & well aduifed, & an affured experience, by following all the wars in Italy, for many yeres before.

The thoughts of Ferdinand King of Naples.

Ferdinand doth flatter himfelf.

To these forces he added the powers of his parents and allies, of whose readie aide and affistance he nothing doubted, having speciall expectation to receive plentifull succours from the King of Spaine his cofin, and brother to his wife, not onely in respect of the double knot of parentage, but also for that in good pollicie it stood him vpon, to hold for suspected the neighbourhood of the French men to Sicile.

This was the glorious humor of Ferdinand, bringing forth in publike many brags touching his owne power and greatuefle, and to the contempt and leftening of the forces and meanes of his aduerfaries. These be properties oftentimes familiar with Princes, to whom there can not be a " more fenfible and apparant token of their aduerfitie or ruine, then when they effective themselves 🤒 more then they are, and make their enemies leffe then they find them.

But Ferdinand, as he was a Prince of fingular wisedome and well assured experience: so, in him felfe he found his mind tormented with many very grieuous thoughts beholding with a fresh memorie, the troubles he hadreceiued of the french Nation in the beginning of his raigne : he debared deepely, that he should have to doe with enemies warlike and mighty, for their troupes of horfemen farre aboue him: in footmen infinite, in enfignes well appointed, trayned, and disciplined: for prouisions at fea, nothing wanting to an armie royall: for artilleries, plentifull, fun-what Ferdis drie, and terrible: for money, his mynes and myntings furnished about all wants that could hap-nand feared, pen: And of men, infinite in multitudes, refolute in minds, for seruice apt, of faith assured, of wils, tractable, for commaundement obedient, and laftly, bearing all one common defire to commit, their lines to any daunger for the glory and greatnesse of their naturall king. But of the contrarie, touching himselfe, all things were suspected to him, his Realme being sull of hatred against the name of the Aragons, or at least of no litle inclination to commotion, and the most part of the refidue, of an ordinary defire to haue haue new kings, wherein fortune may be of more power then faith: his firength was mightier in opinion, then in true forces: his treasure laide vp and referued, not fufficient to carry the necessarie expenses for his defence, since all things by the warre being turned into rebellion and tumults, his revenews would convert to nothing in a moment: he faw that in Italy he had many enemies, and with none any friendship firme or well assured, having at some times bene gricuous to all, either by armes, or other violent meanes. And for Spaine, ac- The manner of cording to the examples past, and conditions of the same realme, he had no expectation of other the Spamardie fuccours for his perils, then large promifes, with a great name of operations, but very flender and flow effects. Laftly, his feares were augmented by the vnfortunate predictions that went of his house, come to his knowledge at fundry times, partly by auncient writings found out of new, partly by the interpretations and words of men for the most part vncertaine of the present, and yet will referre certainely to things to come: those be things that in prosperitie we beleeue little, and in aduerfitie too much, specially if there arise any apparance.

The king of Naples wandring in these considerations, & his seares being greater without comparison then his hopes, he saw there were no better remedies against so great dangers, then either with all speed possible, to remoue by some agreement, such thoughts from the french kings mind, or at least to take from him part of the foundations which stirred him to the warre.

And therefore having fent Embassadors into France, to treat of a marriage betweene the king of Scots, and Charlot daughter of Dom Federicke his fecond fonne, the disposition of which mariage, was gouerned by the french king: for that the young Lady was nourished in his Court, and borne of a fifter of the mother of King Charles: he dispatched new committions for the matters prefent and running : he ioyned with them in deputation and affiftance, Camille Pandon, hauing beene ysed in negotiation for him there before, the better to labour privately, such as were chiefelt guiders of the kings councels, and others bearing inclination to profit, promifes, and corrupt offers : and if they could not by other meanes appeale or remoue the kings intention to the Ferdinarid in warre, then to offer him conditions of tribute, and other submissions: and so, if it were possible, to wife buston obteine peace. Besides this, he applyed not only all his thoughts, diligence, and authority to com- late. pose the difference of the castles bought by Virginio, (to whose intractabilitie and oblinacie, he referred the chiefe occasion of all these disorders) but also he studied to give a new life to the practifes of parentage, commoned upon before betweene the Pope and him. But about all others, his deepest care and thought was, to appeale and affure Lodowyke Sforce (first author and mouer of all the mischiese) perswading himselfe, that seare, more then other occasion, ledde him to se daungerous a councell. And therefore (according to the necessities that followed him) preferring his particular sewertie, afore the naturall respect and interrest of his Neece, or the safetie of the some borne of her: he offered by many embassages, to referre himselfe wholly to his will touching the things of lohn Galeas, and the Duchie of Myllan: In which offers more generall then honorable, he had no regard to the aduise of his sonne Alphonso, who to amaze, confuse, and threaten Lodowyke, judged it the readiest meane to make him giue ouer those new councels: wherein albeit he might take courage of the naturall fearefulnesse of Lodomyke, yet we often see, that no " leffe eafily is the timerous man carried by despaire into deliberations headlong and hurtfull, then "the rash man, by credulitie, furie, and want of consideration, runnes into enterprises, that bring

At last were appealed the controuerlies of the castles, after many difficulties proceeding more of Virginio then of the Pope, to the conclusion of which composition, came Dom Federike, fent to Rome by his father for that effect. The accord ranne, that they should remain ein the possession and right of Virginio, repaying to the Pope equall proportion of money, which he had given at first to Francisquin Cibo: togither with this, was knit up the mariage of the Ladie Sances bastard daughter to Alphonfo, with Dom Geffray youngest sonne to the Pope, (both the one and other, by reason of their greene age vnable to consummate or accomplish the mariage.) These were the conditions: That Dom Geffray should go to remaine at Naples after a few moneths: that he should receiue in dowrie, and respect of the mariage, the principalitie of Squillaco, valued at ten thousand The Pope doth duckets in yearely reuenew, and that Ferdinand should give to him an estate of an hundreth men at armes. This confirmed the opinion of many, that all that the Pope solicited in France, bare no other meaning, then by feate to draw them of Aragon to these conventions: this was one argument to approue their conicctures, that Ferdinand laboured to make a confederation with him for their common defence: but the Pope objected so many difficulties, that there was no other thing obtained of him, then a very fecret promife by writing to defend the kingdome of Naples, fo that Ferdinand would equally promife to protect the estate of the Church.

These things dispatched, the companies of men at armes, which the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan had fent to the Pope for his fuccours, retyred with licence and fauour out of the Church dominions: Ferdinand also beganne now with no lesse hope of happy successe to treat with Lodowyke Sforce, who with a wonderfull subtletie and art, shewed himselfe some times ill contented of Lod. Sforce, with the inclination of the french king to the matters of Italy, and sometimes excused and instified himselfe vpon his necessitie, for that by reason of his chiefe for Genes, and the auncient confederation with the house of France: he was constrained to tender the defires and requests made to him (as he faid) by the fame king. But sometimes he promised to Ferdinand in publike, and some times to the Pope and P. de Medicis apart and feuerally, to do all he could to moderate the kings defire, affaying to lull them a fleepe in this hope, to the end they conspired or dreffed nothing against him, before the affayres of France were well proceeded and established: wherein they were the more easie to beleeve him, by how much they judged the resolution to bring the frenth king into Italy, so ill for his owne sewertie, that in consideration of his particular perill, and the common interest of Italy, they supposed he would vtterly disclaime and shake it off. All this sommer past in this nature of doings, Lodowyke working under such disguised formes and manners, that without giving any suspition to the french king, neither Ferdinand, the Pope, nor the Florentins dispaired of his promises, nor yet altogether trusted him.

But in this meane while, were layd in France with no small studie, the foundations of the warre and expedition to come, whereunto (contrary to the councels of most of the greatest) inclined more and more the affection of the king, who, to be more at libertie, accorded the differences he had with Ferdinand and Isabell King and Queene of Spaine, Princes in those times of great reapport and name for gouernement and wisedome, both for that they had drawen their Realmes out of great troubles into a fetled tranquillitie, and also, had recoursed to Christianitie, with a warre of ten yeares continuance, the kingdome of Granado, vlurped by the Moores of Affrica for almost viij.hundreth yeares: it was expressed in this capitulation (folemnely iustified by publike oth of both parts in the Church) that in Ferdinand nor Isabell (for Spaine was gouerned under their comon name) should be no action of aide to the Aragons directly nor indirectly: no cotract of any new affinitie or alliance: nor that in no fort they should oppose against king Charles for the defence

ve his advantage.

The king, for the same occasion, made peace with Alaximilian king of Romaines, and with his some Phellip Archduke of Austrich, in whom was no want of occasion, either of old or new hatreds against him: but specially for that his father Lewys by the death of Charles, Duke of Burgondic and Earle of Flaunders, with many other countries conjoyning, did impatronize him-Telfe upon the Duchie of Eurgondie, and Earldome of Artoys, with many other places which the faid Duke possessed: whereof growing no small wartes between king Lewys, and Marie the only daughter of Duke Charles, married after the death of her father, to Maximilian: there was made at latt (Mary being dead, and Phillip the common sonne of Maximilian, & her succeeding to the inheritance of his mother) an accord amongst them, more by the wils of the people of Flaunders, then readines of Maximilian. The better to confirme this accord, Margaret the fifter of Phillip The Durbic of was married to Charles sonne of Lewys, & (notwithstanding she was very young) led into France: Britaine innewhere after the had remained many yeares, Charles refused her, & tooketo wife Anne, to whom fed in the by the death of Francis her father leaving no issue male, the Duchie of Bryttame was descended, crowne of This was a double iniury to Maximilian, being at one time made frustrate the marriage of his France. daughter, and his owne, having by procuration afore married the faid Anne: And yet, for that he was not able of himselfe to sustaine the warre recontinued by occasion of this injurie, and that the people of Flaunders (gouerning themselues by their proper councell and authoritic, by reason of the minoritie of Phillip) would not dwell in warre with the realine of France. And seeing lastly that the king of Spaine and England had diffolued their armies, which they had leuyed against the french : he consented to the peace, by the which king Charles restored to Phillip, his fister Margaret deteyned in France till then, togither with the townes of the Earledome of Artoys, referuing to himselfe the castles, but under bond to render them at foure yeares end, at what time Phillip being risen to his majoritie, might in good validitie confirme the accord past. Those townes when the peace was made by king Lewys, were acknowledged by common agreement as the proper right of the faid Margaret. The generall peace thus established with all the neighbours to the realmo of France, the resolution of the warroagainst the kingdome of Naples, was confirmed for the yeare following: in which time were prepared all prouisions necessary, continually solicited by Lodowyke Sforce: who (the thoughts of men advauncing from degree to degree) occupied his wits now not onely how to affure the government to him, but lifting vp his mind to higher conceits, he had an intention to transferre to himselfe the Duchie of Myllan, under the occasion of the warre against the Aragons, wherein to give some colour of instice to so great an injustice, and with more firme foundations to affure his affaires against all fortunes that might happen: he mar-

And in this greatnesse after they had continued many yeares, they fought (according to the common aduauncement of tyrannies, the better to disguise their vsurpation with a shew of right) to strengthen first colours lawfull, and after to set out their fortune, with most ample titles:

Galeas his new brother in law) with the inuestiture of the Duchie of Myllan, for him, his children, and offpring, as though that estate had remained without lawfull Dukes, euer since the death of Philip Maria Viscount. At the latter payment of the money, he promised to give him all

ried Blunche Mary fifter to John Galeas, & his Neece to Maximylian, newly aspired to the Em- Mariage of pire of Rome, by the death of Federike his father: to him he promised in dowrie to be paide with- Blanche Mary in a certaine time iii, hundreth thousand duckets of ready money, with lewels & other ornaments Sforce with to the value of xl. thousand duckets: and of the other part, Maximylian thirsing more after momey, then affinitie by his marriage, bound him selfe to indue Lodowyke, (to the prejudice of lohn

therefore after they had first obtained of the Emperours (of whom Italy beganne to know rather the name, then their power) the title of Captaines, and then Vicaires of the Empire: In the ende John Galeas (who for that his father in law John king of France had given him the Earledome of Vertus, called himselfe Earle of Vertus) obteyined of Vincislao king of Romaines for him and his iffues males, the dignitie of Duke of Myllan, in which succeeded him the one after the other John Maria and Philip Maria his fonnes. But the line masculine being determined by the death of Philip, albeit, by his teltament he had instituted as his heire Alphonjo king of Aragon and Naples, partly for the recompence of the amitic he shewed at his deliuery, but more, for that the Duchie of Ayllan defended by fo mighty a Prince, should not fall into the subjection of the Veneeians, alpining manifestly to it. Yet Francis Sforce, at that time a Captaine valiant & equally seene in affaires of peace and warre, being affifted with many occasions then occurrant, and more effecming to reigne then to keepe faith: held with armes the faid Duchie as appertaining to Blanche Maria his wife, the baftard daughter of Phelip. And albeit it was supposed, that soone after with 2 fmall portion of money, he might have purchased of the Emperour Federicke the inucliture of that state: yet trusting he was able to keepe it by the same meanes wherewith he had wonne it, he made finall reckoning of that office in the Emperour. Thus without inueffiture continued Galeas his sonne, and Iohn Galeas his later sonne: by reason wherof Lodonyke bearing himselfe wickedly at one time against his Nephew liuing, and doing wrong to the memoric of his father and brother deceased, maintained that not one of them were lawfull Dukes of Myllan, procuring himfelfe, as of an estate divolved to the Empire, to be invested by Maximilian, and by that reason bare the title not of the feuenth, but of the fourth Duke of Myllan, which thinges (folong as his Nephew lined) were not suffered to come but to a few mens knowledge. Besides, following the example of Cyrus younger brother to Artaxerses king of Persia, (which also he confirmed with the authoritie of many lawyers) he aduouched that he was before his brother, not in yeares and age, but for that he was the first borne after their father became Duke of Myllan. This reason togither with the first was bestowed amongst the imperiall priviledges, wherin to cloke with a vaine couer the ambition of Lodomyke, there was also written in letters separate, that it was not the cuflome of the holy Empire, to confent or passe any estate to any that asore had holden it under the authoritie of another, for which cause Maximilian had kept no reckoning of the petitions made by Lodowyke to obteine the inucititure for John Galeas, having afore acknowledged the fame Duchie of the people of Myllan.

Ridiculous reason confirmed by sorce.

> In this marriage made by Lodowyke of his Neece with Maximilian, Ferdinand tooke encrease of hope, that Lodomyke would estrange himselfe from the amitie of the french King: these were the reasons and arguments of his hope: for that he had knit himselfe with Maximilian enemie and Corriuall to the French king by many occasions: the departing with so great a summe of money might induce the kings suspition against him: And lastly, this new conjunction ministring occasion of courage and heart, he supposed he would not be fearefull to divide himselfe from the french doings. This hope Lodowyke nourished with great cunning, and with the vaile of the same so blinded all others, that at one time he communicated with Ferdinand and the other Potentates in Italy, and withall entertayned the king of Romaines, and yet kept the french from icalousic. Ferdinand also judged that it could not but be displeasing and intollerable to the Senate of Venice(to whom he had fent Embassadors) that a Prince so mighty about them should enter the hart of Italy, wherein they had the chiefest place, opinion, and authoritie: besides, he fed much of the hopes in the king and Queene of Spaine, who had promifed him great fuccours, if neither by perfwafions, offers, nor authoritie, he could not breake the enterprise. On the other fide, the French king having taken away all impediments, on that fide the mountes beganne to practife to remove fuch difficulties as might fall to his hinderance on the other fide the hils: In that action he fent Peron de la bache, a man not ignorant in the affaires of Italy, by the experience he had there vnder John of Anion: who after he had made knowen to the Pope, the Senate of Venice, and the Florentines, the resolution of his king to recouer the kingdome of Naples, he made petition to them all to enter focietie, fellowship, and communitie with him: But hee reaped no other frute then frayle hopes and generall aunsweres, for that the warre being not to be executed till the next yeare, euery one refused to discouer so long before, his intention. In like fort, the king required of the Embassadors of Florence, (fent to him a litle before by Fordinands consent to excuse them felues of the imputation that they inclined to the partie of the Aragons) to have passage and vi-Etuals for his armie in their iurifdictions at reasonable rate, & that to accompany him to the kingdome of Naples, they would furnish him with an hundreth men at armes, which he said he required as a figne that the common weale of Florence flood with him in amitie: Albeit they aunswered him with many reasons & declarations, that they could not in that fort protest without great perill vntill his armie were past into Italy: And albeit they affirmed, that he might be well assured that in all accidents and fortunes, that citie should not faile to minister to him, all those conuenient effects, of office, observance, & devotion, which of long time they had borne to the crowne of France: yet they were confirsined according to the french importunities to promife all those things, otherwaies they were threatned to fuffer privation of that great mart and traffike of marchandize which the Florentine nation had in that realme: it was known after, that these compulfions were inforced by Lodowyke, at that time the principall disposer of all the french practises

Peter de Medicis laboured much to perswade Ferdinand, that those demaunds imported so little the substance of the warre, that it would be more for his profit if the common weale and he continued amitie with the french king, having by that meane good way and oportunitie to make fome composition, then in refusing those small demaunds, to declare them selues his enemics, and to fuffer no possibilitie to doe good to him: he alleaged with all the generall complaints and hatreds which he should heape uppon himselfe, if the traffike of Florence were restrained in France: or that the entercourse there, to necessary to the vpholding of the citie, should suspend Good reasons and perhaps come in time to loofe his libertie and practife: he told him it was conuenient in good deleased by P. faith and meaning (the principall ground of confederations) that every confederate should suffer by him not executed. patiently fome incommoditie, to the end the other runne not into more greater harmes: But Fer- ented, dinand, who confidered how much of his reputation and fewertie would diminish, if the Florentines were deuided from him: was not fatisfied with these reasons, but complayned grieuously, that the faith and constancie of Peter beganne so soone not to aunswere his owne promise and the expectation he had conceiued of him: by reason whereof, Peter resolutely disposed aboue all things to continue in amitie with them of Aragon, yled many meanes to suspend and deferre the auniwere importunately demanded by the french, referring them in the end to vnderstand the full wils and intentions of the common wealeby new Embaffadors.

About the end of this yeare, the alliance made betweene the Pope and Ferdinand, beganne to waver and shake, either for that the Pope in objecting new difficulties, aspired to obtaine of him greater things then he had: or else that he perswaded himselfe to induce him by this meane to bring againe to his obedience the Cardinall S.P.ad vincula, whom (offering first for his securitie the faith of the colledge of Cardinals, of Ferdinand and of the Venetians) he defired much to fee returned to Rome: he held his absence much suspected, for the importance of the rocke of Oftia, holding in his hands about Rome, Roncellon and Grotaferare, by the fauours, opinion and authotitie which he had in the court: But chiefely he was iealous ouer him, for that naturally he was de- The Pope doith firous of innouation, and obstinate to hazard rather all daunger, then to be cut off from one point faile Ferdiof his councels and purpoles. In deede he had disposed Virginio to the composition, and for that effect had furnished him with the money which was given in repayment and recompence of the castles. The Pope received not these excuses, but with hard and bitter words complained of Fer-

With fuch a disposition of minds and confusion of things so apparantly drawing to new troubles, beganne the yeare 1 4 9 4. (I enterpret the yeare according to the vse of Rome.) A yeare very vnhappy for Italy, and in deede the first of the vnfortunate and miserable yeares, for that in it was made open the way to infinite and horrible calamities, whereof we may well fay, a great part of the world by many accidents, hath tafted euer fince. messengers of a king enemie, to depart with speede out of the realme of France: And almost in the same concurrance of time, the said Ferdinand dyed suddenly of an appoplexy being more trauelled with cares and perplexities of mind, then loaden with yeares, or weakned with old age:he was a Prince of fingular wifedome and industrie, with the which (accompanied with happy fortune) he kept himselfe in the kingdom newly obteyned by his father against many difficulties appearing even in the beginning of his raigne, and brought to it much more amplitude and greatneffe, then was done under any other king perhaps long before: A good king, if he had continued to raigne, in the fame manner he beganne: But either with the variation of times, or chaunge of manners, because he knew not (with most Princes now adaies) how to resist the fury of dominion and rule, or perhaps according to the judgement of euery one, his nature and inclination beginning now to disclose, which he had couered afore with great cunning: he was esteemed a man of little faith, and of fuch violent and cruell moodes, that even by his owne followers he was judged worthy of the name of inhumanitie. The opinion was, that the death of Ferdinand hapned very inconvenient for the common affayres, for that, where he would have proved all remedies to hinder the descending of the french men, it was not now to be doubted, but it would be more hard to make Lodowyke affure himselfe of the haughtie and immoderate nature of Alphonso, then it was to dispose him to renew amitie with Ferdinand, in whom was for the most part expressed a ready inclination (the better to avoide all quarrels with the state of Myllan) to yeeld and condescend to his will: And amongst other things, it is manifest that when I fabelt Alphonsoes daughter was brought to John Galeas her husband, Lodowyke at the first fight suffred himselfe to slide into so great affection towards her, that he defired her of Alphonso for his wife, and to that end (according to the vniuerfall opinion of Italy) he did so much by magicke and enchauntments, that John Galeus for many monethes was made vnable to the action of marriage. Ferdinand was not intractable to this mariage, but Alphonso so refused and refused it, that Lodowyke making no hope of it, tooke an other wife, by whom having children, he turned all his studies and thoughts to transferre to them the Duchie of Myllan: some suppose and write, that Ferdinand being determined (for the auoyding of the prefent warre) to fuffer all indignities and incommodities: had an intention, as foone as the calmeneffe of the time would fuffer, to go by lea to Genes, and from thence by land to Alyllan, to fatisfie Lodowyke in all his defires, and to bring againe to Naples his Neece, hoping that not onely with effects, but also with this publike consession, by the which he acknowledged to hold all his estate and well doing upon him, he should remoue his mind from the warre, or at least somewhat moderate his conspiring intentions, the rather for that it was seene to all men of observation, with what wonderfull ambition and desire, he aspired to be noted the only arbitrator & oracle of all Italy. Alphonfo immediatly after the death of his father, dispatcheth foure Embassadors to the Pope, who albeit shewed manifest signes that he was returned to the first inclination of amitie with the french, and had at the same time by buil subsigned by the colleadge of the Cardinals, promifed at the french Kings request, the estate of Cardinals to the Bishop of S. Malo, and retayned in common with the Duke of Myllan Prosper Colome whom the King afore had taken to his pay, togither with other Captaines and leaders of men of warre: yet he made no great difficultie to accord, in regard of the profitable conditions offered by Alphonfo, who defired much to be affured of him, and to bind him to his protection and defence: they made these open consuentions, that there should be betweene them a confederation for the defence of their estates, with equal leuies of men by both: That the Pope should conferre vnto Alphonso the inuestiture of the kingdom, with diminution of tribute obteyned by Ferdinand of other Popes for his life only: that the Pope should fend a Legat to crowne him: That he should create Cardinall Lodowyke fonne of Henry, bastard brother to Alphonso, who afterwards was called Cardinall of Aragon: That king Alphon of should pay immediatly to the Popethirtie thousand duckets: That he should indue the Duke of Candia with estates within the realine of xij thousand duckets reuenew yearely, togither with the first of the seauen principall offices that should be voyd: That he should entertaine him so long as the Pope lived in his pay with three hundreth men at armes, with the which he should be bound to serue the one and the other equally and indifferently: that he should give to Dom Geffray, (who for the pawne of his fathers faith, was now to goe to his father in law) the estate of Pronoi or and one of the seuen offices, ouer and besides the promises of the first contract: That he should bestoy the revenew of benefices in the Realme vppon Cafar Borgie

Confederation betweene the Pope and Alphonfo King of Naples.

Borgia the Popes fonne, who a little before was created Cardinall by his father, wherein, to avoid impediments of being a baltard (to whom it hath not been eaccustomed to graunt such dignities) he made proofe by subborned testimonies, that he was the sonne lawfull of another. Besides all this, Virginio Vrlin (who by the kings fending for, came to this capitulation) promifed that the King should aide the Popeto recouer the rocke of Ostia, if the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula refused to come to Rome. This promise King Alphonso affirmed without his consent or privitie, & well faw that in fo daungerous feafons, it would bring no litle prejudice to him to be depriued of the Cardinall, whose authority was not small ouer the towne of Genes, which he determined to surprife by the fetting on of the Cardinall. And because amid so great troubles and emotions, there might perhaps be treaties of councels, or other matters prejudiciall to the fea apostolike, he did what he could to vnite him with the Pope, who not fatisfied with any condition, if the Cardinall returned not to Rome, and the Cardinall being most obstinate to hazard his life under the faith of those Catylins, as he termed them, the diligence of Alphonso was in vaine, and his defire of no effeet: for after the Cardinall with many diffembled and flourishing shewes, had given almost affured hope to accept the conditions: he stale away by night from Offia in a brigantine well appointed, and at a time when was least reason to doubt any such enasion, leaning the rocke armed with fufficient garrison: And reapposing certaine dayes at Sauone, and spending some little time at Auigmon, (of which citie he was Legat) he went lastly to Lyons, where king Charles was come a little before, to prepare with better oportunite and reputation the provisions of the warre which he published he would execute in person: he was received of the king with great joy and honour, and immediatly joyned himselfe to those that studied to trouble Italy.

In this meane while Alphonfo, more by feare then proper inclination, forgot not to continue with Lodowyke Sforce, that which had beene begunne by his father, offering him the fame fatiffactions: But Lodowyke, to whom nothing was more familiar, then to differ ble, denifed to entertaine him with diverse hopes, but with demonstrations that he was confrained to proceede in such exact order and confideration, least the warre determined against others, tooke not his beginning against him, he left not for all this to folicite and vrge the preparations in France, wherein to expresse the denotion of his mind with better effect, and to resolue all particularities occurrant in that expedition, and laftly, leaft the execution of all things determined should suffer suspence or haue flow action : he fent thither (colouring it with a brute of the Kings pleafure) Galeaz of S. Severin husband to one of his bastard daughters, and in whom he reapposed great considence and fauours. According to the councels of Lodonyke, king Charles fends to the Pope foure Embaffadors, with charge that in paffing by Florence, they should make instance for the declaration Thefrench & of that common weale. The Embassadors were Eberard Daubigny a Scottish Captaine of Na- fondesh Emtion, the generall of France, the Prefident of the parliament of Provence, and the fame Pergn In baffadors to the Bache, that had bene with them the yeare before. They according to their instructions (fet downe Pope, Florenchiefly at Myllan) recounted in both the one and other places, the rights which the french king (as successfor to the house of Anson, and for want of issue in Charles the first) pretended to the realme of Naples, togither with his royall determination to passe that yeare into Italy in person, not to intrude into any thing that belonged to another, but to reobtaine that which justly was his owne: And to give his voyage a more plawfible paffage in the minds of men, they faid his minde and meanings were not fo much fixed upon the conquest of Naples, as that afterwards he would turne his forces against the Turkes, for the service of Jesus Christ, and glory of his name. They declared to the Florentines, how much their king affured himselfe of that citie, having beene reedified by Charlemaine, and fauoured alwayes of the kings his predeceffors, and lately of king Lemys his father, in the warres vniustly managed against them by Pope Sixtus, by Ferdinand last dead, and Alphonso now raigning. They willed them to looke into the great profits comming to their Nation by traffike and entercourse in the realme of France, where they were fauoured with familiaritie and offices, as if they were naturall of the region it felfe. And with that example they might hope to have in the kingdome of Naples, (if he became Lord of it) the felfe same libertie of trade. fewertie and benefit, where, of them of Aragon they neuer received other things, then domage, daungers, and displeasures. They recommended to their good councels, the considerations of these things, and to protest by some token, that they would joyne with him in this enterprise, But if they were restrained by some just impediment, reason or excuse, at least that they would graunt

libertic of passage to his armie through their territories, and refreshing, and victuals for his money. They debated these things with the common weale and generall state, but they recommended particularly to P.de Aledicis, the respect of many good-turnes and honors done by Lewys the xj. to his father and aunceftors: how he in very lealous and daungerous feafons, had made many demonthrations for the preferuation of their greatnesse, and in signe of amitie, had honoured them with the Scotchions and armes proper to the house of France: where, Ferdinand not latisfied to persecute them with open and violent warre, did also with a mind sworne to their ruine, take part with the civill conspiracies, wherein Iulian his yncle was killed, and Laurence his father fore hurt. The Embaliadors went out of Florence without resolution, and being at Rome, they preferred to the Popes remembrance, the auncient merits and perpetuall deuotion of the crowne of France to the sea apostolike, whereof were autentike testimonies, all recordes both auncient and present, and of the contrary, they infinuated the ordinary contumacie and disobedience of them of Aragon, and referred the proofe to the view and construction of their actions past. Then they demaunded that the tealme of Naples might be inuefted in the person of their king, as justly appertaining to him. They allured him with many hopes, and made many offers, so that he would be fauourable to the enterprise which their king had taken upon him, as much by his perswasions and authority, as for other occasions. To this demaund the Pope aunswered, that the inuestiture of that realine, having beene graunted by so many his predecessors, to three kings of the house of Aragon succeffinely, (for in the innelliture graunted to Ferdinand, Alphonfo was comprehended by name) it was not conuenient to giue it to king Charles, afore it was declared by forme of iustice, that he had good right, whereunto the inuestiture graunted to Alphonso was not prejudiciall, for that for fuch confideration it contained expresse mention, that it was ment without the prejudice of any person: he told them that the realine of Naples did directly belong to the sea apostolike, whose authoritie he knew was farre from the kings will to violate, and no leffe contrary to the intentions of his auncestors, who had beene alwaies the principall defenders of the same: But if he should doe any violent action vpon Naples, it could not be without manifest intrusion and transgression of the holy sea, and bring dishonor to the reputation and merits of his elders: it would better become his dignitie and vertues, to seeke to justifie his pretence of right by course of justice and moderate equitie, wherein as Lord, Patrone, and onely judge of fuch a cause, he offcred him selfe readie to administer to him: And that a Christian king ought not to demaund more of a Pope, whose office was to restraine and forbid, and not to entertaine and nourish wars betweene Princes christened: And though he should so farre incline to the kings will, yet he shewed many difficulties and daungers, both by the neighbourhood of Alphonso and the Florentyns, whose vinticall Tu/kane followed, and also for the consanguinitie and aliance of so many Barons, holding of the king of Naples, whose estates stretched even to the gates of Rome. Notwithstanding all this, he enforced himselfe, not to cut off their hope altogither, albeit he bare privately this settled resolution, not to depart from the confederation made with Alphonfo. At Florence the inclination was great and generall to the house of France, for the liberall mart and traffike which that stare had with the french: for an old opinion (but vntrue) that Charlemaine was the reedifier of their citie destroyed by Tottila king of Gothes: for the auncient conjunction and amitie, which their auncestors the Guelffes have had long time with Charles the first, king of Naples, and with many of his line protectors of the faction of Guelffes in Italy. And lastly, for the memory of the warres, which the old Alphono, and after him Ferdinand in the person of his sonne, had areared against that citie. By the reason, recordation, and memorie of these things, the communaltie and multitude, cried to consent to free conduct and passage, desiring no lesse the best authorised and wise citizens in that common weale, to whom it feemed a great partialitie and overlight to pull vpon the countrey of Florence, (for the controuerfies of another) fo present and daungerous a warre: they held it no pollicie, to oppose themselves against so mighty an army, managed in the person of a king of France, descending into Italy with the fauour of the state of Myllan, and no resistance of the gouernement of Venice, though they publish no manifest consent : this councell they confirmed with the authoritie of Colmo de Medicis (efteemed in his time one of the wifest in Italy) who, in the warres betweene Iohn of Anion and Ferdinand, gaue alwaies this counsell, that the citie of Florence should not object it selfe against John: notwithstanding the Pope and Duke of Myllan were joyned with Ferdinand. They remembred withall, the example of Laurence father

to Peter, who was of the same aduise vppon enery brute of the returne of them of Aniovo: yea fo much was he amazed with the power of the french, fince the fame king obtayned Britaine, that he would often times fay, that great troubles were prepared for all Italians, if the king of Fraunce knew his owne strength. But Peter de Medicis, who measured things more by will then by wisedome, abused him seife too much with his owne opinion, beleeuing that these emotions would rather refolue into brutes, then into effects: wherein being gouerned by forme his speciall fauorits, corrupted perhaps with the prefents of Alphonio, determined resolutely to continue in amitie with the Aragons, whereunto in the end, all the refidue of the Citizens must condescend by reason of his greatnesse: Ambition is an viquiet humout in man: it may be that Peter not content with the authoritie which his father had got in the common weale (and yet fuch, by his disposing, that though Magistrates were created, yet they determined no matters of importance without his aduise) aspired to a power more absolute, cuen to the title of Prince: he did not debate with discretion the conditions of that citie, who, at that time being populous in multitudes, and mightie in riches, and nourished by many ages with an apparance of a common weale, the principall citizens being accustomed to participate in the government, rather in forme of companions then subjects, would hardly endure so great and fuddaine mutation: And therefore, Peter knowing that to the holding up of his ambition must be iouned foundations extraordinary: and the better to have a mighty piller to support his new principalitie, he restrained himselfe immoderately to the Aragons, determining in their course to communicate with their fortunes. This perhaps was furthered by this accident: not many dayes before the Embaffadors of the french arrived at Florence, there came to light certaine practifes, which Laurence and John de Medicis, young men, rich, and neare in bloud to Peter, and lately become his enemies vpon certaine light occasions of youth, conspired with Lodowyke Sforce, and by him with the french king, directly against the greatnesse of Peter: But being arrested by the Magistrates, they were with light punishment returned to their houses in the countrey, for that the temperance of the Magistrates, prevailing with Peter not without some difficulties, induced him not to suffer the lawes to execute any extreme action vpon his kinred and bloud: But receiving warning by this accident, that Lodowyke Sforce thirsted after his ruine, he esteemed it so much the more needfull to remaine still in his first purpose. At last the Embassadors were answered, but much to their discontentment, and more contrary to their defire: in place of the conclusion they hoped for, they were told with words reuerent and respective, with what natural denotion the people of Florence, honoured the house of France, The Florence togither with their common defire to fatisfie fo great a king : on the other fide, they made decla- aunswere the ration of their impediments, as that there could be nothing more vnworthy of Princes and com-french Enmon weales, then not to keepe faith promifed, which valeffe they should apparantly defile and balladors. breake, they could not now fatisfie his demaunds, and content the time togither: They faide, as yet was not ended the confederation, which by the authoritie of king Lemys his father was made with Ferdinard, with covenant, that after his death it should stretch to Alphonso: wherein they were bound by speciall condition, not onely to defend the realme of Naples, but also to give no passage thorough their countries to any that went about to inuade it: Lassly, that it brought no fmall gricfe to them, that there was fuch difference betweene their defires and wils, and that they had no power to make other resolutions, then such as must either make the king displeased, or bring great prejudice to their whole estate: Onely they hoped that the king being wife and just, would interpret them according to their good wils, and referre to those reasonable impediments that which they could not promife.

The king made angry with this aunswere, commaunded immediatly the Embassadors of Flo- The freeds rence to depart out of France, and following the councell of Lodowyke Sforce, he banished out king any of Lyons, not the generall marchants, but onely the factors and bankers of P. de Medicis, to the with the Flor end that they might judge at Florence, that he acknowledged this injurie particularly upon Peter, reminerans. and not vpon the bodie of the state.

The other Potentates of Italy being divided amongst themselves, some bearing favour to the french, and some fearing calamities and extreme fortunes, the Venetians onely determined to remaine newters, and with an idle eye to behold the issue of all things, perhaps they were not much troubled that Italy should fall into garboyle, hoping that the long warres of others, would give them oportunitie to enlarge their estate: or perhaps the opinion of their greatnesse, would not The french king prayeth amitie of the Venetians.

fuffer them to be doubtfull of perils: And therefore not fearing that the victors could have any fortune ouer them, they judged it a folly to make proper to them, the warres of others, and had no apparant necessitie. And yet Ferdinand ceased not to solicite them continually, and the french king the yeare before, and even then had fent to them Embassadors, who forgat not to declare that betweene the house of France, and that common weale, was alwaies amitie and good will, and as occasion offered, mutuall effects and offices expressed. The which disposition, the king seeking to augment and ratifie, he defired of that wife Senate counsell and fauour in this enterprise; whereunto they answered with this moderation and breuitie: that the king for himselfe was so wife and forefeeing, and enuironed with a councell fo graue and ripe, that it could not be without too much preluming to joyne to him their opinions and councels. They would be alwayes glad of his prosperities and good fortunes, for the observances which they had alwayes borne to the crowne of France: They were not a litle grieued, that they could not accompany the readineffe of their minds, with those effects they defired, for that by the suspition wherein the Turke kept them continually, wanting neither defire nor oportunitie to vexe them, necessitie compelled them to keepe alwayes with great charges, many Iles and coall townes fronting uppon him, the same being the cause that they could not make themselves parties to the warre of another. But the preparations which were made on all fides, as well by land as fea, were of farre greater importance, then either the orations of the Embassadors, or the aunsweres made to them: for, king Charles had fent Peter d' I'rfe, his great Esquire, to Genes (ouer which citie the Duke of Myllan commaunded by the aide of the faction of Adorne and I. L. de fie fco figno) to rigge vp a mightie armie of ships and gallies, causing also to be armed other vessels in the ports of Ville Franche and Marfelles. This was the cause of the brute in his court, that he determined to enter the kingdom of Naples by sea, as had done afore time John sonne of Rene against Ferdinand. In France albeit many beleeved, that what for the youth of the king, and the base condition and slender conduct of fuch as stirred him to this expedition, togither with the want and necessitie of money, these preparations in them would dissolue and vanish into smoke: yet to satisfie the desire of the king, who by the aduife of his fauorites, had newly taken upon him the title of king of lerusalem and both Cicylies, (then the title of the kings of Naples:) There was generall and diligent order given on all parts for the prouitions of the warre: as making of musters, gathering of money, remouing of men, with other industries due to such expeditions: and no councell had, but with Galeas de S. Severin, who held inclosed in his mind, all the fecrets and purposes of Lodowyke Sforce. On the other side, Alphonso, in whom had wanted no pollicie or diligence, to fortiste himselfe by sea and by land, (judging now there was no more time to fuffer him felfe to be mocked with the hopes of Lodowyke Sforce, and that it ferued better for him to amaze and vexe him, then to trauell to affire or appaile him) commaunded the Embassador of Myllan to retyre out of Naples, and reuoked his that was refident at Myllan: he sequestred also, and tooke into his possession the reuenewes of the Duchie of Bary, which Lodomyke had enjoyed many yeares by the gift of Ferdmand. And not content with these things, which were rather demonstrations of open harred, then wrongs or offences, he disposed all his wits, to turne from the Duke of Myllan, the citie of Genes, a matter of right great importance for the present affayres, for that by the revolt and chaunge of that citie, would happen many meanes to trouble Lodomyke in his government of Myllan, and from the french king should be taken away all oportunities to molest the realme of Naples by sea: Therefore having made fecret pact with Cardinall Paule Fregole, afore times Duke of Genes, and still followed with many of the same family: and with Objetto de fie gue, two principall men both for the towne and sea, togither with some particulars of the Adorneys, all banished out of Genes for diverse occasions: he determined to aslay with a strong army at sea, to set them all in the towne againe (following that he was wont to fay, that warres are ouercome either in preuenting the enemie, or diverting him : he determined in like fort to go him felfe into Romagnia. with a mightie army, and to make fuddaine inuation upon the lands of Parma, where publishing the name of John Galean, and displaying his banners, he hoped that the peoples of the Duchie of Myllun, would rife against Lodowyke: And be it that in this were found many difficulties, yet he iudged it profitable, that the warre should begin farre from his realme: he efteemed it also to be great importance for the fubstance of the warre, that the french men should be surprised with the winter in Lombardy: wherein having great experience in the warres of Italy, (whose armies attending tending the riping of graffe and forrage for the feeding of horfes, were not wont to take the field afore the end of Aprill:) he judged that to eschue the sharpenesse of winter, they would be conftrained to ftay in a countrey of their friends till fpting time: In whichintermiffion and respite of time, he hoped that some occasion for his benefite might happen. Besides, he sent Embassadours to Constantinople, to demaund succours as in a common daunger of B. Ottoman Prince of the Turkes, for that it was resoluted in the french kings intention to passe into Greece after he had won Naples, which daunger he knew well the Turke would not despise, for that by the memory of the warres made in times paltagainst the Infidels in Asia by the french nation, the feare which the Turkes had of their armes was not little.

Whilest these things were thus solicited on all partes, the Pope sent his men to Ofia, under the government of Nicholas Vr sin Counte of Petillane, to whom Alphons fent Arength and succours both by sea and land: he tooke the towne without difficulty, and then began to batter the castell, which (by the meane of Fabrice Colonne, and consent of loba de la Ronere prefect of Rome, and brother to Cardinall S. P. ad vincula) was easily rendred to him by the castell keeper, with this condition, that the Pope neither with centures of the Church, nor temporall armes, should purfue the Cardinall nor the prefect, if they gave him no new occasions: And it was suffered to Fabrice, in whose hands the Cardinall had left Grotta Ferrara, to continue the possession of the fame with the fame rights, paying to the Pope ten thousand duckats. But Lodowyke Sforce (to whom the Cardinall when he passed by Sanonne, had made knowen that which Alphonso by his meanes and councels negociated fecretly with the exiles of Genes) declared to king Charles what a great impediment that would give to his enterprise, and therefore induced him to fend to Genes two thousand Swyzzers, and dispatch into Italy with speede three hundreth launces, to be ready under the government of Monsieur D'aubygny, (who returning from Rome, staied by the kings commaundement at Myllan) both to assure Lombardie, and to passe surther according to occasions and necessities. To these should be joyned fine hundreth men at armes, Italians, entertained at that time in the Kings pay under John fr. de S. Senerin Counte of Gaiazze, Galcot Pico Counte of Myrandola, and Radolphe of Gonfague, together with fine hundreth which the Duke of Myllan was bound to furnish: who not leaving his old shifts and subtelties, continued to confirme in the Pope and Peter de Medicis his inclination to the peace and furety of Italy, nourifhing them with variety of hopes which were not without their apparant demonstrations.

It can not almost be, but that which men make great furety of, ingendreth some doubt, even in ,, the mindes of fuch as have determined to beleeve the contrary: for albeit there was no great faith,, giuen to the promises of Lodowyke: yet it happened not for all that, that their determined enterprifes suffered in any fort flow successe or proceedings: and the Pope and P.de Medicis could have bene well content that the enterprise had bene proued to surprise Genes: But because in the action they should directly offend the estate of Myllan, the Pope, (Alphonso requiring his gallies, and to joyne his men with him in Romagnia,) confented to the feruice of his men for the common defence in Romagna, but not to passe further. And touching the gallies, he made difficulty, faying it was not yet time to put Lodowyke fo much in dispaire. The Florentyns being required to receive Alphonfoes army by fea in the port of Lynorne, and to refresh them, remained in suspence upon the matter, for that making excuses to the demaunds of the french king, and being acquited under the pretence of the confederacion passed with Ferdinand, they were very vnwillingly disposed to doe more without necessity, then they were bound vnto by that confederacion.

Matters being now not able to fuffer any longer delay, the army by fea of Alphonfo departed The king of at last from Naples under the charge of the Admiral Dom Federyke: & Alphonfo in person affem- Naples fenbled his army in Abruzze to passe into Romania. things that were to be done for their common fafety.

The Pope and Alphonso met together the xiij. of July at Viconare, a place appertaining to Firginio Vrsin, where after they had spent three daies, they returned well agreed. In this meeting and confultacion, it was determined by the counsell of the Pope, that the person of the king of Naples should passe no further: his army contained little lesse then a hundreth squadrons of men at armes, accounting xx. men to a squadron: and very neare three thousand crosse-bow shot and light horsemen: Of this army it was agreed, that one part should stay with him upon the frontyers of Abruzze for his fafety and furety of the state ecclesiastike: and that Virginio should remaine in the towne of Rome to make head against the Collonoys: for dread of whom, also it was agreed that two hundreth of the men at armes of the Pope, and a part of the light horsmen of the king, should not shire out of Rome. That the expedition into Romania should be perfourmed in the person of Ferdinand Duke of Calabria, (that was the title to the eldest son to the king of Naples) a young Prince of great hope: leading with him lxx. fquadrons with the refidue of the light horfemen, and most part of the Popes companies, such as he erected for defence: There were joyned with him (as moderators of his youth) John Lacques Trinulso, governour of the fouldiers of the king of Naples, and the Count Petillane, who from the Popes pay was become mercinary to the king of Naples, both Captaines of great experience and reputation: Seeing they ment to leade an army into Lombardy, it was thought good that it should passe in the person of Ferdinand, for the fociety of bloud and double parentage which he had with Iohn Galeas husband to Isabelthis fifter, and sonne of John Galeas, brother to Hippolita who was mother to Ferdinand. But touching the actions of this parliament betweene the Pope and Alphonfo, that of most importance, was, concerning the Collonois, for that it was different by manifest fignes that they aspired to new intelligences: seeing that Prosper and Fabricius having served in the pay of the late king of Naples, and by him recompensed with estates and honourable places: Prosper (the king being dead) after many promifes made to Alphonso to reenter into his pay, was by the working of Cardinall Ascamus, entred into the common pay of the french king and the Duke of Myllan, refu-In the Italian fing afterwards to take the Popes pay being much folicited: and Fabricius, who had continued in the service of Alphonso, having regard to the disdaine of the Pope and the king of Naples against Profeer: made difficulty to goe with the Duke of Calabria into Romania, if first by some conue-Duke of Milia, nient meanes were not reeltablished and affured the affaires of Prosper and all the family of Coloane: This was the colour of their difficulties: but fecretly they both were become mercenary to the french king, (partly drawne by the great amity they had with Cardinall Ascamus, who forfaking Rome a few dayes after for suspicion of the Pope, was retired to their landes) and partly for hope of larger payes, but much more moued with displeasure, that Virginio Vrfin chiefe of the contrary faction, bare greatest rule with Alphonfo, and participated more then they in his prosperities: But to keepe this thing conceiled untill they might with furety declare them selues his souldiers, they treated continually with the Pope and Alphonfo, by whom was made great instance, that Profeer taking pay of them, would leaue the wages of the Duke of Myllan, for that otherwise they could not be affured of him. The Collonois made show of defire to accord with them, but to

and French copies, it is read, of the Pope and the

In that practife, there was diverfity of willes betweene Alexander and Alphonfo, for that Alexander defiring to dispoile them of the places they held about Rome, cherished the occasion to affaile them: and Alphonso who had no other intencion then to affure them, was not inclined to the warre but for a last remedy: but he durst not oppose against the couctousnesse of the Pope. At last they determined to constraine them by armes, and appointed forces and orders how it should be done, affaying not withstanding afore, if within few dayes their controucrsies

The beginning of the warre.

The king of Naples ledesh out an army to take the tity of Genes.

Thefe things, with many others, were debated on all partes, mens wittes wandering and their mindes vnrefolute, their feares generall, but their hopes full of suspicions and incerteinties, in their willes no confent or vnity, and all their coniectures and judgementes full of errour, no, none that could moderate their expectation, and much leffe judge what would be the end of those tragicall preparations: but at the last the warre of Italie tooke beginning by the going of Dom Federyke to the enterprise of Genes, leading an army no doubt of greater proportion and better prouision, then had bene seene of long time before runne ouer the streams and sea of Tyrrennum: it contayned xxxv. light or futtle gallies, eighteene shippes, with many other lesser vessels, great quantity of artillery, and three thousand so temen to put on land. By reason of which great equipage, and leading with them the exiles, the army departed out of Naples with great hope of the victory: but their lingring and flow departing, caused by those difficulties which commonly follow great enterprises, and partly abused by the cunning hopes which Lodowyke gaue them, and partly for that they stayed in the portes of Sienna to leuy to the number of v. thousand sootemen, made hard and daugerous, that, which being affayed one moneth afore, would have bene easie and without perill: for, the enemies (by their flow proceedings) had leyfure to dreffe a strong prouifion, putting within Genes the bayliste of Dyon, with two thousand Smyzzers leuied and paid by the french, and already ordered and rigged a great part of the shippes and gallies which were armed in that port, and one part of the veffelles furnished at Marfeilles, being there arrived also. Befides, Lodowyke for his part spared for no expences, but dispatched thither Gasper de S. Senerin, called Fracasse, with Anthone Maria his brother, with many sootemen: and because he would compound his strength no lesse vpon the good willes and hearts of Genes, then of forraine forces, he confirmed with gifts, penfions, and promifes of many recompences, the courage and intention of John Loys de Fiejquo, brother to Obietto, the Adornes, and many other gentlemen and populars much importing to keepe that city in his deuotion: he had also called to Myllan many factions of the banished men, as well of the towne as rivers of Genes. To these provisions mighty enough of them felues, did give great reputation and furety the person and presence of Lowys Duke Duke of Orleance, who about the same times that the Aragons fleete was discourred in the sea of of Orleansen Genes, entred that city by commission of the french king, having first communicated in Alexan-treth Genes, drea upon the common affaires with Lodowyke Sforce, who (as the doings of mortall men are full and preferres of thicke darkneffe) had received him with great gladneffe and honour, but as a companion, not knowing how foone his whole estate and life would fall into his power.

These accidentes were the causes why the Aragons (determined before to present their fleete afore the port of Genes, under hope that the parties and confederates with the exiles would draw into forme infurrection) chaunging now councell with the occasion, resoluted to assayle the river: and after fome diversity of opinions, whether in the river of Lenant or the West, were best to beginne: the aduise of Obsetto prevayled, who promising him selfe much upon them of the waters of Leuant, they addressed them selves to the towne of Portonenere, to the which they gaue affault for many houres in vaine, for that it was refurnished from Genes with four hundreth footemen, and the courages of the inhabitantes well refolued and confirmed by John Lowys de Fiefquo lately come thither: Being out of hope to cary the towne by affault, they retired to the port of Lynorne, to reuittell their shippes, and refurnish their companies of sootemen: for, when they understood that the townes and peeces uppon the river were in good condition of defence and prouision, they judged that to that action was necessary a greater supply of force. At Lynorna, Federyke (being aduertifed that the French army inferiour to his in gallies, but mightier in shippes, was in preparation to fall out of the port of Genes) fent backe againe to Naples his shippes, to be able with more readinesse by the swiftnesse of his gallies to keepe aloofe from the enemy, if with their shippes and gallies together they should set on him, hoping notwithstanding to vanquish them, if their gallies were separated from their shippes, either by aduenture, or by will.

Octanian founc to Ieronimo de Riare, was Lord of Furly and Gmola, with a title of vicaire of the Chutch, but in minority and under government of Katherine Sforce his mother, with whom many moneths before, the Pope and Alphonfo had practifed to entertaine Ottanyan in their common pay, with condition to defend his estates: but the matter remained unperfect, partly by the difficulties she alleaged, to the end to get better conditions: and partly for that the Florentyns dwelling still in their former purpose not to exceed the bondes they had with Alphonso to the presudice of the french king, could not be resolved to be concurrant in this practise, to the which their consent was ncceffary, because the Pope and the King would not alone fustayne the charge: but much more for that Katherine would not put in daunger that city, vnlesse with the others, the Florentynes would be bound to the gard and defence of the estates of her sonne. These difficulties were taken away by the meeting and speaking together, which Ferdinand, (drawing his army by the way of

In the felfe fame feafons, the Duke of Calabria marched towardes Romania, with the ar- The Duke of Marrechia into Remania) had with Peter de Medicis in the village of S. Sepnicher: where he offeredhim in the name of his father king Alphonso, franke power to dispose of him and his armie in all the feruices which he had intention to execute for the affaires of Florence, Siena, and Faensa: these offers giving a new life to the auncient courage of Peter, as soone as he was returned to Florence, he ordeined (notwithstanding the disswasions of the wisest Citizens) that the accord should be subsigned, for that Ferdinand had instantly defired him. This being dispatched at the common charges of the Pope, Alphonfo, and the Florentines, not manie dayes after, they had the Citie of Bologma at their deuotion, enterteyning John Bentiuole (vnder whose authoritie and direction the Citie was gouerned) in the same manner the Pope promised, having withall the faith of king Alphonso and Peter de Medicis, to create Cardinall Anthonie Galeas his sonne, then Pronotorie of the sea. These things gaue to the armie of Ferdinand a great reputation, which yet had bene more great, if with those successes he had sooner entred into Romania: But by his slow speede to march out of the kingdome, and the diligent care and watching of Lodowyk Sforce, Ferdinand was no sooner arrived at Cesena, then Monsteur D'aubignie, and the Count Caiazze, gouernour ouer the companies of Sforce, togither with a great part of the armic appointed to make head against the Aragons, being passed without let by Bolognia, entred the countrey of Ymola: by meanes whereof, Ferdinand having lost his first hopes to passe into Lombardie, was compelled to fettle the warre in Romania, where (other cities following the partie of the Arrgons)R anenna & Cernia, cities of the Venetian iurisdiction, bare fauour to neither side. This litle countrey stretching along the river of Pan, & in the possession of the Duke of Ferrara, spared no one commoditie to the companies of the french & Sforce. Touching P.de Medicis, neither the difficulties happing in the enterprise of Genes, nor the impediments occurring in Romana, could bridle his rashnesse: for, being bownd by a fecret conuention without the knowledge of the common weale, made with the Pope & Alphono; to oppose himself opely against the french king: he had not only consented, that the Neapolitan army at lea should be received & refreshed in the haue of Lynorne, with power to leuie footnien through the whole territory of Florece: but also restraining his rashnesse to no limit. he wrought fo, that Anniball Bentinole, some of John, mercenary to the Florentins, went with his charge, & the companies of Astor de Manfreddi, & joyned with the camp of Ferdinad, as soone as he entred into the countrey of Furly, and fent besides, to the said Bentuole, a thousand sociemen with artilleries. Such a like disposition was alwayes discerned in the Pope, who, besides the prouifions of warre, not contented to have exhorted king Charles by writing the yeare before, not to The Pope com- passe into Italie, but to proceede by way of instice and not armes, reinioyned him estsoones by an other figneture, the felfe fame things, ypon paine of the Church censure: and by the Bishop of Calagorre his Nuncio at Venice, (whither for the same effect were gone the Ambassadours of Alphonso, and they of Florence, who notwithstanding made not such open demandes) he perfwaded much that Senate, that for the comon benefite of Italie, they would protest publike refi-stance against the French purposes, or at least to give Lodomyk roundly to understand, that he was The Venetians much discontented with this innouation. But the Senate aunswered by the Duke, that it was farre from the office of a wife Prince, to pull the warre vpon his owne house, and take it from an other, nor to consent to do (either by demonstrations or effectes) any thing that may displease either of the parties: And because the king of Spaine (solicited instantly by the Pope and Alphonso) promifed (for the fuccours of Naples) to fend into Sciente an armie by fea well furnished, and at last made excuse, that it could not be so soone ready for want of money: the Pope gaue cosent (befides a certaine portion which Alphonso sent him) and power, that he might convert into that vse, the moneyes gathered in Spaine by the Apostolike authoritie, under colour of the Croysade, which ought not to be employed against others then the enemies to the faith Christian . Alphonso also, befides those he had already fent to the great Turke, dispatched of new Camilla Pandon, with who was sent secretly by the Pope George Buciardo a Genomay, whose service Pope Innocent had vsed there afore: who being received with great honor of Baiazet, & dispatched with no leffe expedi> tion,brought home large promifes of fuccours : which albeit was coffrmed a litle after by an Ambassadour sent by the Turke to Naples, yet either for the distace of places, or for the distrust he had of the Christias, those promises brought no effect. In this time, Alphoso & P.de Medicis, seeing their > armies succeeded not happily by land norsea, they laboured to beguile L. Sforce, vsing his owne crafts and cunnings, but their industrie brought forth no better issue, then their forces. It was the opinion of many, that Lodowyke, for the confideration of his proper daunger, was not content Confectures as that the french king should conquere Naples but his plot was, that assoone as he was made Duke gainst the subof Myllan, & that the french armie had paffed into Tuscane, to worke some accord, by the which wyke Sforce Alphonso should acknowledge himselfe tributarie to the crowne of France, with assurance to the king of office and observancie, and so the king (the places which the Florentins held in Lunigiane, reuerting perhaps out of their handes) to returne into France : So that the Florentines by this meane should remaine battered, the king of Naples diminished of force and authoritie, and he become Duke of Myllan, should have got for his sewertie so much as was sufficient, without feare vaine hopes of to fall into the daungers which might happen by the victorie of the french : he had hope also that Lod. Sforce. the winter comming on, the king would fuffer fuch difficulties as would let the courfe of his victorie: Lastly, he judged that waighing with the impatience of the french, the kings slender prouifion of money, and the wils of many of his people estranged from the enterprise, there would not want meanes to worke composition.

This was a groffe error in his pollicie, to breede the storme, and leaue the desence to possibi-, lities doubtfull: it is too daungerous to broach a vessell of poyson, and have the vertue of the an- » tydote vincertaine: fire fuffered to runne, burnes without lymit, euen to the confuming of fuch » as first kindled it. But whatsoeuer was his secret intention, it is certaine, that albeit at the beginning Lodowyke studied to separate P. de Aledicis from the Aragons, yet after he perswaded him fecretly to perseuere in his opinion, promising him so to worke that the french king should not march at all, or at least if he did passe, he should with the same speede returne afore he did anie action on that fide the mountes: this he did often reiterate by his Embassador resident at Florence, either for that fuch was his inflintention, or else having determined to ruinate Peter, he defired that he might bring him to doe fo much against the king, as there might be no meane to reconcile them. But Peter determining by the confent of Alphonso to make these behauiours knowen to the french king, called one day into his house, the Embassadour of Myllan, under colour of being ill disposed of his person: afore he came, he caused to hide secretly the french Embassadour resident at Florence, in a place where he might easily heare their communication. There Peter repeated to the Embassadour plainely, distinctly, and at large, the perswafrom and promifes of Lodonyke, and that for his authoritie he was vnwilling to confent to the demaunds of the french king : taking occafion to complaine grieuoufly, for that with fo diligent infrance he folicited the king to passe: he concluded, that seeing the effects answered not his words, he was constrayned to joyne himselfe to the enterprise, to avoide his proper and present perill: The Myllanoy. Embassadour aunswered, that he ought not to doubt of the faith of Lodomyke, if for no other reason, at least for this, that in comparison and consideration of things, it was no lesse daungerous to Lodowyke then to any other, that the french should enjoy Naples: And therefore with all the councell, courage, and reasons that he could, he perswaded him to perseuere in his first opinion, least by such hurtfull alteration of mind, he were not the cause to bring himselfe and all Italy into perpetuall feruitude. This difcourse with all his actions and circumstances, the french Embaffadour with prefent speede communicated with the king his maister, affuring him that he was betrayed by Lodowyke, whose deuise tended all to his particular purpose and prosite, and all his intentions differibled and difguifed.

This pollicie and private manner of Peter, bred not the effect which Peter and Alphonfo hoped for, but, on the contrary, the matter and manner being reuealed to Lodowyke, euen by the french themselues, the disdaine and hate conceived afore against Peter, redoubled and tooke a ftronger qualitie, and Lodowyke with a new diligence and quickneffe, folicited the french king to confume no more time vnprofitably.

But now, not onely the preparations that were made in so great plenty both by sea and land, Foreshown of but also the consent of the heavens and of men, pronounced to Italy their calamities to come: the calamities for that fuch 2s made profession, to have judgement eyther by science or divine inspiration in the of Italy. things to come, affured with one voyce that there were in preparing, both more great mutations, and more straunge and horrible accidents, then for many worlds before, had beene difcerned in any part or circuit of the earth. There were feene in the night in Pouylle three funnes in the middest of the firmament, but many cloudes about them, with right searefull thunders and lightnings: In the territorie of Aretze, were visibly seene passing in the ayre, infinite numbers of armed men vpon mightie horses, with a terrible noyse of drums and trumpets: The Images & figures of Saints did manifeltly sweate in many parts of Italy: In euery place were brought foorth many monsters of men and other creatures, with many other things against the order of nature, concurring all at one time, but in diuerle places: by meanes whereof the people wete caried into incredible feares, being already amazed with the brute of the french powers and furie of that Nation, with the which according to the testimonic of histories, they had afore time runne ouer all Italy, facked and made desolate with fire and sword the citie of Rome, and subdued in Asia many Prouinces, and generally no part of the world which had not felt the vertue of their armes: But albeit these judgements are often times fallible, and rather conjectures vncertaine, then effects happing, yet the accidents that drew on, brought to them, in the spirits of fraile men, an absolute faith, credite, and religion: for, king Charles, holding his first purpose, was now come to Viena in D'auphine, and would not suffer himself to be staicd from his personall expedition into Ituly, neither by the just and generall petitions of his whole realme, nor with the confideration of his vinuerfall wants of money, which were fuch, as he had no meane to furnish the necessities prefent, but by pawning for a great fumme of money, certaine iewels lent him by the Duke of Saker, the Marquelle of Mount ferat, and other great Lords of the Court: of the fummes he had gathered before of the reuenewes of France, and fuch as were lent to him by Lodomyke, he had employed a great quantitie vpon the armies at fea, wherein at the beginning was reapposed a great hope of the victorie: and of the refidue, he had made many indifference liberalities to diverfe perfons before he went from Lyons: And his Princes and Noble men, having at that time not fo readie wayes to exact money vpon their peoples, as their immoderate couctousnesse hath brought them fince, without regard to God or men, it was not easie for him to leavy new tributes: so slender were the prouisions and grounds of so great a warre, fury and rashnes guiding the king more then wifedome and councell.

But as it often hapneth in the execution of things new, great, and difficult, that albeit all things are orderned and foreseene : yet the reasons that may be considered in the contrary, come then to appeare in the understanding of men, when the enterprise is toward his action and beginning: So, the king being upon the point to depart, yea his fouldiers marching towards the mounts, there arose a great murniure throughout the Court: some brought into consideration the difficulties ordinary in so great an enterprise, and some disputed of the generall daungers and infidelitie of the Italians, but specially there was an universall ielousie of Lodowyke Sforce, both for the advertifement lately come from Florence, and also certains money expected from him, remained yet behind: So that not onely fuch as had alwaies reproued this enterprife, rose vp esisones to resist it with more audacity (as hapneth in those cases when councell is confirmed by the euent of things) but even those that had bene the principall workers, as chiefly the Bilhop of S. Malle. began so to shake, that the brute comming to the eares of the king and the whole Court, inclyning to mermure and confusion of opinions, caused such an inclination in the king to passe no further, that fuddenly commaundement was given to make flay of all the bands and companies of fouldiers: by meane wherof many that were already on their way, returned with willing speed to the court, following a report published, that it was a resolution set downe, that the campe should not passe into Italy: it was then beleeved that all had turned into alteration and change, if the Cardinall of S.P. ad vincula, (the fatall instrument both at that time, before, and after, of all the miseries of Italy) had not with his authoritie and vehemencie, given a new life to the expedition, recomforcardinal S.P. ted the heart of the noble men, and brought againe the spirit of the king to his first determination: ad vincula, " he laide before him not onely the reasons that had first stirred him up to so glorious an enterprise, "but also with a sharpe and quicke eloquence, willed him to looke into the infamy which might runne throughout all the world, for so light a mutation of so noble a councell: he asked his Mase iestie for what occasion, in restoring the places in the countie of Artoys, he had weakened on that ee fide, the frontiers of his realme: why had he with fo great displeasing of his Nobilitie and popuce lars, made open to the king of Spaine, one of the ports of France, in giving him the countie of « Russillon: other kings his predecessors had not wont to consent to those things, but either to be deliuered from great and imminent perils, or at least, in counterchaunge of profits more imporce ting: he made not those restitutions by any necessitie, his perils were but reasonable, and for frute

or recompence, there was no other expectation, then that with a great price, he had bought a prefent losse, which would perpetually nourish griefe, dishonour, and infamy: what new accidents ,, haue appeared (faith he) or what strange daungers and difficulties are disclosed since the enterprise hath bene published throughout all the world? No, rather the hope of the victorie is encreafed, the foundations being shaken whereupon the enemy had built all the hopes of his defence, " for that if both the armie at sea of the Aragons, shamefully retyred to the port of Livorne, after ,, they had given a vaine affault to Portonenere, was able to attempt no further action against Genes, ,, fo well defended with fouldiers and a nattie more mightie then theirs, And also in their armie by ,, land stayed in Romania, by the relistance of small numbers of the french, was left no courage to, passefurther: what would be their feares, when they heard by all the countries in Italy, that the ,, king was to passe the mounts with an armie royall: townes would fall into tumults, men would, draw into munitie; having their minds amazed, how could they be flayed or coteined? The Pope, would not be a litle amazed, when he should see from his proper pallace, the armes of the Collo-, noys at the gates of Rome: No leffe would be the aftonishment of P. de Medicis, who hath for ,, his enemies his owne bloud, knoweth what affection the towne of Florence beareth to the name, of the french, & is not ignorant how defirous it is to recouer the libertie which he holdes opprest: ,, That there was no impediment, no difficultie, no daunger to stay the futious descending of the ,, king upporthe confines of Naples, which he should no sooner approch, then he should find all, things disposed to flight or to rebellion: he told him, the feare was vaine to doubt want of money, " for that his artillerie should be no sooner hard thunder, then the Italians with a swift liberalitie, ,, would supply him from all patts: And if he should find any refistance or defence, the spoyles, the ,, booties, the riches of the vanquished would suffice to nourish his armie, for that Italy for many yeares, having bene more accultomed to apparances of warre, then trayned in the true experience, of warres, there was no strength, foundation, nor power to sustaine the sury of the french. In a ,, matter debated with fo long councell, and prepared fo neare to his action: in an enterprise fo polfible, and bringing so many profits: in an expedition so hautie and glorious, and given over, so vile and infamous: he aduited him to be firme and resolute, and for feares, suspitions, and icaloufies, he willed him to thinke them as dreames, rifing vpon fome superfluous humour, or as shadowes to whom can be affigued no bodies: he told him it became justly his name and greatnesse " to march on with the same magnanimitie and courage, wherewith not foure dayes since he vaunted to be able to vanquish Italy being vnited all togither: he said, he had to consider, that his coun-, cels were now no more in his owne power, & that things had got to great forwardnes by reason ,, of the alienation he had made of many lands and territories, for the Embassadors he had heard, fent, and banished, for the great charges he had fullayned, for so many and mighty prouisions, and ,, laftly, for the renowne that runne thorough the world, and his person being brought almost to,, the toppe of the Alpes: And finally, faith he, albeit the enterprise were neuer so perillous, yet,, necessitie constrained him to follow it, seeing betweene glorie and infamy, betweene dishonour and triumph, betweene the opinion to be effected a king, and a man vile, private, and abiect, ,, there remained no meane. These speeches in substance deliuered by the Cardinall, but according to his nature, in more graue and vehement gesture, kindled such a new life & courage in the king, that without hearing any, then fuch as perfwaded him to the warre, hee departed the fame day from Vyena, accompanied with all the Barons and Captaines of the Realine, except the Duke of Burbon, to whom in his absence, he left the administration of the kingdome, and the Admirall, with certaine others appointed to the gouernement and gard of Prouinces most importing: himfelfe with the armie palling into Italy by the mount Geneura, which yeeldes a farre more easie paffage then the mount Cenis, and by the which (but with incredible difficulties) Hanniball of Carthage made his way into Italy: entred into the towne of Ast the ix. of September, a thousand The french foure hundreth ninetie and foure, leading with him into Italy the feedes of innumerable cala- king in Af. mities, and most horrible accidents, with a chaunge almost and innovation of all things: for, of his passage, did not onely take beginning, mutation of estates, subuersion of realmes, desolation of countreys, destruction of cities, and murders civill and most cruell: but also he brought with him new fashions of habites, new customes, new and bloudie manners of making warres, and discases till those times vnknowen, yea he did so disorder the instruments of peace and concord in Italy, that being neuer able fince to reorder and reduce them, orther Nations strange & barbarous, haue had good meane to oppresse them miserably: And for the increasing of the inselicitie (because their shame and dishonor should not be diminished by the valour and vertues of the victor) he whose comming brought all those calamities, (albeit he lackt nothing of the liberalities and fauours of fortune) was voide almost of all the giftes of nature and the mind : for, it is most certain that king Charles from his infancie was of complexion very delicate, and of bodie vnfound and difealed, of small stature, and of face (if the aspect and dignitie of his eyes had benetaken away) foule and deformed, his other members bearing fuch equall proportion, that he feemed more a monster then a man: he was not only without all knowledge of good sciences, but scarcely he knew the distinct caracters of letters: his mind desirous to command, but more proper to any other thing, for that being enuironed alwayes with his familiars and fauorits, he retey ned with them no maiestie or authoritie: he rejected all affaires and businesse, and yet if he did debate and confider in any, he shewed a weake discretion and judgement: And if he had any thing in him that caried apparance of merit or praise, yet, being thoroughly waighed and sounded, it was found further off from vertue then from vice : he had an inclination to glory, but it was tempered more with raffineffe and futie, then with moderation and councel; his liberalities were without differetion, measure, or distinction: immoueable often times in his purposes, but that was rather an ill grounded obstinacie, then constancie, and that which many call bountie, deserved more reasonably in him the name of coldnesse and slacknesse of spirite.

The fame day the king arrived in the towne of Ast, the famours of fortune beganne to appeare to him with a joyfull token or prediction: for, there came from Genes glad newes, that Dom Federicke (who after his retyre from Portonenere to the hauen of Lynorne, & that he had refreshed his army by fea, and leuyed new companies of landmen, was effloones returned into the fame riuer) had put on land Obietto de Fiefquo, with three thousand footemen, who without difficultie had made himselse Lord of the towne of Rapalle, which is twentie miles from Genes, and then sent companies to espie and spoyle the countrey there about: That such a beginning being of no little importance, for that touching the affaires of the towne of Genes, all emotions how little fo euer they were, would be daungerous, confidering the contagiousnesse and multitude of parties and factions, those within the towne esteemed it not good, that the enemies should have further aduantage: and therefore, leaving part of their companies to the gard of Genes, the two brethren S. Seuerins and John Adorne, brother to Augustine governour of the towne, with the Italian footmen, put themselues on the way to goe to Rapalle, the Duke of Orleance with a thousand Swizzers, leading thither the army by fea, which contained xviij. galleys, vj.gallions, and ix. great Thips. And being all joyned neere to Rapalle: they furiously gaue upon the enemies that made head against the bridge which was betweene the suburbes of Rapalle, and a litle straite plaine that stretched to the fea: That besides, the proper forces of the Aragons, the seat of the place fought with aduantage for them, by whose steepenesse and sharpnesse more then other munition or art, the places of that river are well fortified: the beginning of the skirmilh feemed prosperous to the enemie, the Swizzers being in a place very unproper to bestow their ordenance, beginning almost to retyre: but by the continual concourse and flocking of the peasants running after the faction of the Adornes, for their agilitie and experience in those stonie and mountenous places, men of speciall merit in seruice, & the Aragons beaten in slanke with the artilleries of the gallies of France, which were brought as neere the bankes as could be: they beganne very hardly to sustaine the charge: And that lastly, as they were beaten from the bridge, Obietto was aduertised (in whose fauour his partakers did not yet stirre) that lohn Lewys de fie fquo, was at hand with a great troupe offootemen, and therefore fearing to be charged on the backe, they fled to the mountaines, Objetto being the first, according to the custome of rebels: That there was slaine of them in this encounter, partly by fighting, and partly by flying, more then a hundred bodies: a flaughter not litle, confidering the manner of the warre in Italy in those times: with these aduertisements came accompanied the reapport of the prisoners taken, amongst whom was Iulius Vrsin, who with xl. men at armes, and certaine crosbow shot on horsebacke, had followed the sea armie of Alphonso, in whose pay he was: Fregosin sonne to the Cardinall Fregose and Orlandin of the same familie, remained also prisoners. This victorie assured altogither the affaires of Genes, for that Dom Federicke (who as foone as he had put his footmen on land, spred himselfe ypon the maine sca, as not to be constrained to fight with the enemie in the gulph of Rapalle) despairing to do any profitable feruice feruice at that time, retired his army once againe to the port of Linorne: where albeit he furnished his numbers with new fouldiers, and had many plots to affaile the rivers in some other place: yet (by vnfortunate beginnings of enterprises often times men lose both courage and counsels) he atcempted no other action of consequence, leaving a just occasion to Lodowyke to vaunt, that with his industry and his counsels, he had given the bay to his adversaries, seeing there was no other thing that faued the state of Genes, but their too slow speede to depart, whereof Lodon, ke was the cause by his cunning, and vaine hopes breeding their deceitfull security.

At this time went Lodowyke Sforce to visit the king at Ast, whither he caried with him Bean Lodo, Sforce grix his wife, followed with great pompe, and a traine of the most honourable and singular faire goeth to visio Ladies within all the Duchy of Myllan: he was also accompanied with Hercules Duke of Ferra-the french king ra. Therethey debated of their common affaires, and by generall councell it was refolued, that in Affa the army should march with as much speede as was possible: wherein for the more diligence and expedicion of things, Lodowyke who had not a little feare, that the hard featon of the yeare happening, they would folourne all the winter in the territories of his Duchy, lent eftfoons to the king a great quantity of money, whereof he had not a litle necessity and want: Notwithstanding, the king falling into the difeate which we call the small pockes, he remay ned about a moneth within the towne of Ast, the army being dispersed into quarters and places thereabouts. Touching the numbers of his army, (as may be truely gathered out of fo many divertities) it contained, (befides the two hundreth gentlemen for his guard, and reckoning the Swyzzers gone before to Genes, and The number the companies intertaining the warre in Romania, under Monsieur D'aubygny) xvj. hundred men of the french at armes, allowing to every of them according to the cultome of Fraunce, two Archers, fo that kings army. vnder euery launce (for fo they call their men at armes) are comprehended vi, horses: of the Smyzzers vj. thousand footemen, and vj. thousand of the realme of Fraunce: whereof the one halfe were Ga/come fouldiers, for their furniture gallaunt and well appointed, and for their naturall aptneffe to the warres, a people aboue all others, soonest traynd to seruice. And to some to this army, there was carried to Genes by fea, a huge proportion of artilleries of fundry natures, both for battery and feruice of the field, but of fuch forts as Italy neuer faw the like.

This hell or torment of artillery being deuised many yeares since in Germany, was brought first How & when into Italy by the Venetians, having warre about the yeare 1 3 80. with the Genomates: wherein great flot the Venetians vanquished by sea, and much afflicted by the losse of Chioze, were ready to receive Italy, fuch conditions as it pleafed the victors, if in fo good an occasion, there had not bene want of moderate councell. The greatest fort was called bonibardes, which, after the inuention was spreade through Italy, were employed to the battering of townes: some of them were of yron, and some of braffe, but contayning such groffe and huge proportion, that for their waight, and ignorance of men, and instruments vnapt, they were carried flowly, and with great difficulty: and being with intollerable trauels planted afore towns, yet there was so much respite betweene one shot and an other, that in comparison of their vse at this day, they gave little fruite or successe to the service, but left to the defenders leyfure and oportunity at will, to recuforce their rampiers and fortifications. And yet, by the violence of the faltpeter, with the which their powder had his mixture. the bullets flew into the aire with fuch horrible noise and fury, that that instrument (yea afore he had his perfection) put to skorne and filence all thofe engines and deuifes, wherewith the auncients were wont to pull downe townes, to the great fame of Archymedes, and other notable enginiftes. But the french men forging peeces of farre greater facility, and of no worfe mettall then braffe, which they called cannons, vling bullets of yron, in place of those of those of the first inuention, vied to draw them vpon wheeles, not with oxen (as was the cultome in Italy) but with horses, and with such agility of men and instrumentes appointed to that service, that they almost kept march with the army: and being brought afore townes or walles, they were braked and planted with an incredible diligence, and with a very final intermission betweene the shottes: they battered with such violent fury, that, what before was wont to be done in Italy in many daies, they dispatched it in few howres. These deuilish instruments they yield also in the field, making fometimes the cannon feruic eable there, and fometimes peeces of lefter forge, haled according to their proportion, with the felfe famespeed and nimblenesse. Those artilleries were the cause, that all Italy stood in great feare of the kings army, which was also holden more redoubted and dreadfull, not by the numbers, but for the valour of the fouldiers: for, the men at armes, being almost all of the kings subjects, gentlemen and not of the popular fort, were not simply under the direction and discipline of Captaines, nor payed by them, but by the kings officers: by which meane, companies and bandes had not onely their compleate numbers, but they were men of choyfe, and in good point for horfe and armour, being well able to make their owne furnitures) and contented in service, as well for the defire of honour, (which naturally is nourished in the hearts of men of noble race) as also that by their actions in armes and fight, they might aspire to recompence, as well out of warre as the warre during, and by degrees, rife worthely to the name and places of Captaines. The fame respectes pushed forward the Captaines, Barons, and great Lordes, or at least fuch as did communicate in honourable discent and bloud; for the most part subjects of the crowne of Fraunce, who having their numbers set and limited, for according to the warres of that realine, there is in no company aboue a hundreth launces) had no other intention, then by feruice to merite well of their king: So that there was not amongst them any humour of inconstancy, either by ambition or couetousnesse to chaunge their Lord, or for enuy to exceede other Captaines in numbers of men at armes: cultomes meare contrary to the ordering of the men at armes in Italy: where many of the men at armes, are either peafantes, or populars, subjectes of an other Prince, and depending wholly of their Captaines, with whom they contract for their pay, and serue vnder their arbitracion: they have neither by nature nor by accident, any extraordinary spurre or prouocation to serue well. The Captaines are very rarely vaffalles of him that entertaines them: they have for the most part diverse interestes, purposes, and ends: full of enuy and hatreds: And being bound to no tearme fixed for their payes, and absolute commaunders ouer their companies, they oftentimes beguile the service with lesse numbers then they are payed for: and sometimes not contented with honest conditions, they put their patrones vpon euery occasion to raunsome: At their pleasures they will passe from the seruice of one, and enter into the pay of an other, ambition, couetousnesse, or other particular interestes, making them not onely inconstant, but also vnfaithfull. There was also seene no lesse difference betweene the footemen of Italie, and those that served under king Charles, for that the It alians fought not in squadrons set and ordered, but in troupes, and dispersed in the field, and oftentimes retyring to the aduauntages of hilles and ditches: But the Smyzzers (a nation warlike, and by the long vie of warre and many victories, had renued their auncient glory and hardineffe) yfed to fight with bandes ordered, and diffinct in numbers certaine: and neuer forfaking their ranckes, they ysed to stand against their enemies as a wall, firme, and almost inuincible, fo farre forth as they fought in a plaine or place large to stretch out their battell: euen with the fame discipline and orders, but not with the like courage and vertue, did fight the footmen of the french and Gascoynes.

Whilest the king by reason of his sickenesse, soiourned in the city of Ast, there happened a The Colonneys new tumult about the borders of Rome: for, the Colonneys (notwithstanding Alphonio had accorded to all their moderate demaunds) as foone as Monsieur D'aubygny was entred Romania, declared them selues for the french king without more dissembling, and tooke the rocke of Oftia by intelligences they had with certaine Spanish footemen left there in garrison. This raised the Pope into passion, and made him bitterly complaine to all Princes in Christendome, of the iniuries done to him by the french: he addressed his complaints chiefly to the king of Spaine, and Senate of Venice, of whom (but in vaine) he praied aide and succours according to the contract of confederacion made betweene them the last yeare before: And turning altogether his wits, authority and courage, to the prouisions of the warres, after he had cited Profer and Fabricius, (whose houses he caused to be rased in Rome,) and assembled his companies with part of those of Alphon-To, under Virginio, at the river of Tyuerone, neate Tyuoly: he fent them all upon the landes of the Collonnoys, whose strength was no greater then two hundreth men at armes, and a thousand footemen: But afterwards the Pope doubting least the french army at fea supposed to come from Genes to the fuccours of Oftia, thould be received into the port of Neptune, belonging to the Collonnoys: Alphonso after he had gathered at Terracina all the companies that the Pope and he had in those quarters, established his campe there, hoping to have it easily. Notwitstanding the Collannoys defending it with great francknesse of courage, and being also passed into their countreys without impediments, with the companies of Camylla Vitelli, of the city of Castello, and the bands of their brethren which thefrench king had newly taken into his pay. The Pope reuoked to Rome, part of his people which were in Romania with Ferdinand, whose affaires continued not with that felicity and fortune which they feemed to show in the beginning: for, as he was arrived at Villefranche, betwene Furly and Faenze, and from thence was entred into the high way of Ymola: the army of the enemy encamped neare to Villefranche, feeing their forces interior, retired betweenethe forrest of Lugo and Columnare, neare the forde of Geniuola: a place very strong by nature, and appertayning to Hercules d'Effe, out of whose countreys they were vittelled: So that Ferdinand, seeing that by the strength and situation of the place, he could not charge them, but with manifest and generall perill, islued out of Ymola, and went to encampe in Toskanella, neare the village of S. Peter in the countreys of Bolonia: for, being defirous to fight, by the show he made to goe towardes Bolonia, he fought to put the enemies (to whom he would not leave liberty to passe further) in necessity to incampe in places not so strong: But they, approching certaine daies after neare I mola, pitched their campe uppon the river of Santerne, betweene Lugo and S. Agathe, the place being well fortified, and had for their backe, the river of Paw. The fame day Ferdinand encamped fixe miles from them ypon the same river neare Mordane and Bubane, prefenting his army the day after in battell ringed within a mile of them: where, after he had looked for them in vaine for certaine houres, the place ministring all commodities to fight, by reason of his scope, largenesse, and plainnesse, and sceing he could not set ypon them in their trenches without absolute daunger, went to encampe at Balbrana, not holding any more the way of the mountaine as he had done till then, but accoasting the enemy, he marched alwaies with this intention, to constraine them, if he could, to for lake their trenches fo full of advantage and strength.

It hath feemed till now that the affaires of the Duke of Calabria, carried good estate and fortune, and a gouernement with reputation, feeing the enemies had apparantly refused to fight, defending them selues more with the strength and situation of their trenches, then with actions of armes, and in all encounters of the light horiemen, the Aragons caried away alwaies the best: but the campe of the French and Sforce, receiving continual! Itrength by supplies of companies, which at the beginning remayned behinde, the effate of the warre began to chaunge: for that, the Duke, whose heate and forwardnesse was moderated by the councell of the captaines that followed him, to the end he would not commit all to fortune without aduantage, retired to S. Agathe, a towne of the Duke of Ferrara, where, finding diminution of his footnen, and of that part of the horsemen of the Church, which the Pope had called backe, and lastly in the middest of the countreys of the Duke of Ferrara, began to looke to fortifie him selfe: But after he had remayned there certaine daies, he understood by espiall, that there was expectation in the enemies campe, of two hundred launces, and athousand Swyzzer footemen, which the French king had caused to march as soone as he entred into Ast: and therefore he retyred to the wast of Faenza, a place betweene the walles of the fame towne, and a ditch which reculeth about a thousand pases from the towne, and enuironing it round about, makes that fituation very strong. And by reason of his retraite, the enemy came to S. Agathe, which he had abandoned. Surely both thefe armyes shewed great tokens of courage, when they faw their enemy inferior: but when thinges were brought to an equality, the placeapt, their forces indifferent, and all other oportunities confenting, each one eschewed to assay the fortune of battell, and in them both was approued that which very rarely happeneth, that one councell was pleafing to two armies, being enemies: For, the French thought they should accomplish their intention, for the which they were come out of Lombardie, if they hindered the Aragons for passing further: And Alphon/o judged it greatly to his benefit, if he could amuse and hold the enemies bridle vntill winter; and therefore gaue expresse charge to his sonne, and John Jucques Tryunso, with the Count de Petellane, that without great occasion, they should not put in the power of fortune, the realine of Naples, which was vtterly lost, if that army were defeated. But these remedies sufficed not for safety, for that king Charles, whose forwardnesse could not bee restrayned, neither by the season of the time, nor any other difficulties, marched into the field with his army as fooneas he had recouered his health: And because tohn Galeas Duke of Atyllan, and his cosin germayne (for the King and he descended of two fifters, daughters to Longs the second, Duke of Sauge) lay fore ficke in the castell of The french Pause, he went with great humanity to visite him, making his way by the towne, and lodging in king visites the same castell: The speeches he vied to him were generall for the presence of Lodonyke, onely duke of Mil-

expressing how much grieued he was for his sickenesse, and perswaded him to take hope and land courage to recouer his health: But touching the effect of the mind, the king with althose that were with him, had great compassion on him, enery one judging for certaine, that the youg gentleman, by the wickednesse of his Vncle, had not long to line. This compassion was much encreased by the presence of Isabell his wife, who not onely full of many forrowes for the infirmity of her hulband, and estate of her little sonne borne by him, but also much afflicted for the perill of her father and his adherentes, she fell with great humility, in the publicke presence, at the feete of the king, recommending to him with pitifull teares, her father, and his house of Aragon: towardes whom, albeit the king, for her age, for her beauty, and her present fortune, expressed an apparant inclination to pity, yet, being not able to stay the course of so great a matter, for so light occasion, he aunsweredher with fignes of will to doe that he could not, faying, the enterprise being fo farre aduaunced, he was constrayned to prosecute and continue it. From Pauya the king marched to Plaisance, and during the abode he made there, newes came of the death of Iohn Galeas, by which occasion Lodowyke, that had followed him thither, returned in no small diligence to Myllan, where by the principals of the councell, which the Duke

had fuborned, it was propunded, that in regard of the greatnesse of that estate, and the daungeaspiring of Lo- rous times that prepared now for Italy, it would be a thing prejudiciall, that the sonne of John Gadowyke Sforce leas, (hauing not five yeares in age) should succeede his father: and therefore, as well to keepe to the dukedom the liberties of the state in protection, as to be able to meete with the inconveniences which the time threatneth: they thought it iust and necessary (derogating somewhat, for the publicke benefite, and for the necessity present, the disposition of the lawes, as the lawes themselues do suffer) to constraine Lodowyke, for the better stay of the common weale, to suffer that into him might be transported the title and dignity of Duke, a burden very waighty in so conspiring a season; with the which colour, honefly giuing place to ambition, the morning following (vfing fome forme of relistance) he tooke vpon him the name and armes of the Duchy of Myllan, having secretly Dake of Myl- protelled before, that hereceived them as appertaying to him, by the innefliture of the king of lan by rsurga. Romaines: It was published that the death of Galeas happened by immoderate cohabitation, but the vinuerfall indgement of Italy was, that he died not of infirmities naturall, nor by incontinency, but by poylon and violent compulsion, whereof Theodor de Pauya, one of the Phisitions, affilling when the king visited him, affured the king to see most apparant and manifest signes: And if he were dispatched by poison, there was none that doubted that his Vncle was innocent either directly or indirectly, as he, who not content with an absolute power to be gouernor of the flate, but aspiring according to the common desires of great men, to make them selves glorious with titles and honours, and specially hee judged that both for his proper surety, and the succession of his children, the death of the lawfull Prince was necessary, and therefore fought to establish in him selfe the power and name of Duke, wherein ambition and couetoushesse prenailed aboue conscience and law of nature, and the jealous desire of dominion, enforced his disposition (otherwaies abhorring bloud) to that vile action. It was beleeued of many wife men, that he hath had that intencion euer fince he began to folicite the french kings journey into Italy, judging the occasion and the time would well concurre to aduaunce the effect, for that the french houering upon the borders of that state with a maine army, it would alter mens coniectures and humours, and cary their wits from remembraunce of an act fo wicked. But fome having opinions more particular, supposed both for the suddainnesse of his death, and diligent transferring of the impery to the other, that it happened by a new thought proceeding of feare, least the king (the councels of the french are fodaine) would turne him felte with a contrary course to deliuer his cofin Galeas from fo great a subjection, being induced thereunto, either for respect of parentage and compassion of his age, or that he might thinke it was a thing more sure for him selfe, that the Duchy of Wyllan were in the power of his cosin, rather then commaunded by Lodowyke, whose fidelity many of his great Lords laboured continually to make suspected with him. But because Lodowyke had got the yeare before the inuestiture of the Duchy of Myllan, and a little before the death of his nephew, had dispatched with diligence the imperial primiledges, it makes a congruent construction, that it was a deliberation voluntary and foredeuised, and not sodaine, nor in respect of the present daunger. The king stayed certaine dayes at Pluisance, not without inclination to returne into Fraunce, for that as well the want of money, which being the more generall, was so much more intollerable, as not seeing any new thing in Italy discouer in his fauour, he had many doubtes of his fuccesse, having withall no litle suspition of the new Duke of Myllan who notwithstanding when he parted, sayd he would returne, yet the judgement was, that he would not come againe at all: it is not out of all likelihood, that being vnknowen to the nations on the other fide the mounts that wicked cultome to poylon men, which is a practile very common and familiar in all partes of Italie: but that the king and all his Court, befide the fulpition they had conceived against the faith of Lodowyke, had his name in honour, yeathe king esteemed it an injurie done to his owne honour and greatnesse, that he had solicited his comming into Italie, to be the better able without daunger to execute an act fo abhominable: yet in the end, the refolution was to march on, Lodowyke continully labouring him thereunto, with promise to returne & to visite the king within few dayes, for that both the kings aboad in Lombardie, and his hastic returne into Fraunce, were wholly contrary to his intentions.

The fame day the king departed from Plaifance, Laurence and lohn de Medicis came to Laurence and him, who being fecretly fled from their houses in the countrey, made great instance that his Ma- Iohnde Mediiestie would come neare Florence, promising him much of the affections and good will of the in with the people towardes the house of France, and no lesse of the hate against Peter de Medicis, against whom the king was aggranated by occasions new & greene: for, the king sent from Ast an Ambafladour to Florence, to propound many offers: if they would graunt himpaflage, and abstaine hereafter from ayding of Alphonfo: and on the other fide to pronounce threatnings to them, if they perseuered in their former councell: wherein to assonish them the more, he gaue expresse charge to his Ambassador to returne immediatly, if they would not give speedy resolutio; he was aunswered with excuses to deferre and expect, for that the chiefest Citizens of the government being withdrawneto their houses of solace in the countrey, according to the custome of the Florentines in that season, they could not with such speede give him an aunswere certaine, but would with all diligence aduertise the king of their intention by a particular Ambassadour. It is most certaine, that it was agreed in the kings councell without contradiction, that the armie should rather take the way that leades thorow Tuskane, and the territories of Rome directly to Naples, Theway the then that, which, lying along Romania, and la Marque, paffing the river of Troute, entred into A- the French ar bruzze, not for that they did distrust to give the chase to the bands of the Aragons , which with well to difficultie refished Monsieur D'aubygny: but for that it seemed a thing vnworthy of the greatnesse of fuch a king, & no leffe infamous to the glory of his armies, (the Pope & Florentines being declared against him) to give occasion to men to thinke that he eschewed the way for distrust, that he was not able to force them: but much more because they esteemed it daungerous to make warre in the realme of Nuples, and Icaue as enemies at their backes, the state Ecclesiastike & Tuskanes and therefore the armie turning to the way of Tuskane, it was determined to passe rather the Appenyn, by the mountaine of Parme, then to march the direct way to Bolonia. This was Lodomiks direction, when he was at Ast, for that he had a defire to make him felfe Lord of Py/a.

So that the vauntgard, ouer whom was gouerner and leader, Gilbert de Montpensier, of the M, Montpensi house of Bourbon, and Prince of the bloud: and the king following, with the refidue of the ar- fier leader of mie, passed to Pontreme, a towne of the Duchy of Myllan, set at the foote of the Appenya, vpon the vaunt gard. the river of Magre, which divides the country of Genes, (aunciently called Liguria) fro Tuskane: fro Pontreme Monsieur Monspensier entred the country of Lunigiana, a part of which obeyed the Florentins, certaine castels belonged to the Genoways, and the residue were subject to the Marquis of Malelpine, who maintained their small estates under the protection sometimes of the Duke of Myllan, formetimes of the Florentines, and sometimes of the Genoways. About those quarters iouned with Monsieur Montpensier, the Smyzzers, which had bin at the defence of Genoway, togither with the artillerie which was come by fea to Spetia: and being come neare the towne of Finizana, beloging at that time to the Florentins, whither they were guided by Gabriell Malespina, Marquis of Fodifione, who was recommended to them, they tooke it by force, & fackt it, making flaughter of all the fouldiers stragers that were within, & many of the inhabitats:a maner of making war very new, & fo much the more terrible to all Italie, accustomed for many yeares past to warres rather flourishing in pompes and fine furniture, like to warres shewed by maskers in stage. playes, then to skirmishes bloudy & daungerous. The Florentins were determined to make their principall refistance at Serezana, which they had greatly fortified, but not with strength sufficient & necessary to result so mighty an enemy, because they had not furnished it with any Captaine of warre, that had authorize to minister discipline, nor yet souldiers, neither resolute nor seruiceable, other then such as lost heart at the first voyce of the approch of the French armie: yet they of Florence were of opinion that it could not be easily taken, specially the Castell; and much lesse the rocke Serezana, both well surnished, and bearing his situation vpon the hill about the towne: Besides, it was not possible that the armie should remaine long time in those places, the countrey being barreine and straite; and being inclosed betweene the sea and the mountaines, was nor sufficient to nourished so great a multitude, and their vituals comming farre of, could not observe such instrume and oportunitie, as to serve their present necessities: by reason whereof it seemed the kings affaires began to fall into hard termes, & that his armie stood possible to many daungers & distresses, albeit he couldnot with convenient impediments be let from affailing Py/a, leaving behind him the town & castell of Serezana, & the rocke, nor kept by the country of Lucques, (which Citie, by the working of the Duke of Myllan, had secretly determined to receive them) that he entred not an other part of the territorie of Florence: yet he could hardly be brought to that deliberation, and much lesse of selection to it, because he had a perswassion in his secret sancie, that is he wonne not the first towne that resisted him, it would diminish much his reputation.

But so it was ordained, that either by the grace and bleffing of fortune, or by an ordinance of more high power, (if at the least the indifcressions and faultes of men deserve such excuses) to fuch an impediment hapned a fuddeine remedie : feeing that neither the courage nor conflanstancie of Perer de Medicis, were greater in his aduersities, then had benehis modestie and difcreffion in his prosperities: By this must be understood, that the displeasures which the Citie of Florence had received from the beginning, for the impediments which were given to the king, were continually multiplied, both for a new chase and banishment of their marchants out of all parts of the Realme of France, and also for feare of the power of the French, which did so much the more grow rifing in the hearts of men, by how much they heard that the armie had begunto passe the Appenyn mounts: but specially they fell all into dread & feare, by the crueltie shewed at the taking of Finizana: for these causes every one did publikly detest the rathnesse of Peter de Medicis, who, without necessitie, beleeuing more in his owne weening, and the councels of certaine rash ministers, men arrogant in times of peace, and ynprofitable, and cowardes in times of warre: the following the directions of those Citizens that were friends to his father, and had alwayes instructed him with no leffe grave councels: had so indiscreetly provoked the armes of so mightie a king, affifted with the Duke of Millan: feeing withall, he was ignorant in the affaires of warre, leaving the Citie, and other places of their obedience not fortified, but ill furnished with souldiers and munitions necessarieto make defence against so great a force: Besides that, there had as vet appeared none of those Aragons, for whom they had exposed them selues to so great daunger: fo that their countrey abandoned of every one, remained in the deepe hatred of fo mightie a king, and was ready to fall as a manifest pray to him, who with so great instance, had sought not to fall into occasion and necessitie to hurt it.

This disposition which was almost in all those of the towne, was further kindled by many noble Citizens, much displeased with the present gouernement, and that one onely familie had risen so much in presuming, as to appropriat to him selfe the rule of the whole comon weale; in so much as one increasing the seares of an other, and all labouring in one common dread, and ministring stomacke and courage to such as desired new things, they had so stirred the braynes & spirites of the people, that there was generall seare of some tumult in the towne, whereunto the nultitude was the rather prouoked by the pride and immoderat behauiours of Peter, who, in many things for saking the ciuill customes and modestie of his auncestours, had been followed from his infancie with a perpetuall hatred and ill will, by the generalitie of the Citizens: his father seemed to haue a great speculation in his vices and vile conditions, for that he would offe say to his secret friends, that the indiscression & arrogancie of his some, would one day be the cause of the ruine of his lousse. It is a good propertie of wisedome in fathers, to finde out the dispositions of their chil-

Peter

[«]c dren, but it is a principall effect of their judgemess, to cut off with discipline all course of humours, that seede and minister to their natural corruptions, which is an office no lesse just in parents, then

[&]quot;it belongeth to the art of the Philition, first to feeke out the humour that offendes, & then to ap-

Peter being now amazed with the perill, which with raffinesse he contemned afore, and seeing

he fayled of the fuecours and aydes which were promifed by the Pope and Alphonfo, who as well for the losse of Ostia, & siege of the port Neptune, as for seare of the French armie by sea, had even their hands and heads full: determined with a councell fuddeine and particular, to go fearch of the enemie that fafetie, which he hoped no more to finde in his friendes, following therein the example of his father, who, in the yeare 1 4 79. being brought to desperate termes of daunger, by a warre which Pope Sixtus & Ferdinand king of Naples, managed against the Florentines, went to seeke Ferdinand in the towne of Naples, from whom he brought to Florence publike peace & private suretie. But it is a thing very dangerous for mento gouerne themselves by exam-,, ples, if there be not a concurrance of the felfe reasons, not onely in generall, but even in all par-, ticularities: & if things be not ruled with the fame wisedome: and if lastly, ouer and besides all other, foundations, the felfe fame fortune have not her part. Being parted from Florence in this deliberation, and not farre on his way, he had aduertisement that the horsemen of Paule Vrsin, and three hundreth footemen fent by the Florentines to enter Serezana, were broken by certaine companies of the French, which were come scouring even on this side the river of Magre, the most of them either slaine or made prisoners. This made him tarie for the kings safe conduct at S. Peters, whither went for his conduct and furetie the Bishop of S. Mallo, with certaine Lords of the Court, in whose companie he arrived at the campe the same day that the king, with the refidue of his fliength joyned him felfeto the vauntgard, which incamping before Serezanella, battred that rocke, but not with such successe as there was hope to carie it: After he was present P. de Medicio ted to the king, who enterteined him with good countenance, but more in apparance, then in comes to the affection: he appailed immediatly all his displeasures, in consenting to his whole demaunds, which French king. were great and immoderat: namely, that the fortreffes and Castels of S. Peter, Serezana and Serezanella, which were (as it were) the keyes of the dominions of Florence on that fide, and the fortrefles of Pyla, and the port of Lyuorne (members principall of their estate) should be all put into the hands of the king, who, for his part, should bind him selfe by promise and by his proper fi- penerde Me. gniture, to redeliuer them, as soone as he had conquered the kingdome of Naples: That Peter dies accordes should do so much, that the Florentines should lend to the king two hundreth thousand duckats, with the Frech and that then he would receive them into his alliance & protection. Touching the ratification of king. which promifes, made with fimple wordes, it was fayd there should be letters dispatched to Florence, by the which the king meant to passe: but the confignation of the castels and fortresses was not deferred: for, Peter ioyning meaning to his words, caused to be deliuered (without tarying) to the king those peeces, Serezana, S. Peter, and Serezanella, and not many dayes after, according to the agreement, the like was done of the peeces of Pyla, and port of Lynorne.

The French men wondred, that Peter with so great facilitie accorded to things of so great importance, for that there was no doubt but the king would have bene contented with farre meaner conditions. I will not let passe in this place without reapport, that which was suttelly anfwered to Peter de Medicis, by Lodowyke Sforce, arriving the day following at the camp: As Peter in going to meete him to do him honour, excused him selfe that he had miscaried, for that Lodowyke was formewhat gone out of the way : he answered very properly : That the one of them two went out of the way, but perhaps (fayth he) it lights vpon your felfe, as reproching vnto him that he was falne into fo great difficulties and daungers, for not giving faith to his councels: But the euents of things falling out afterwardes, did well declare, that they both had gone out of the right way, but it was with a greater infamic and calamitie to him, who rayled into greater degree, made profession with his wisedome, to be the guide of all others.

This resolution and accord of Peter de Medicis, did not onely assure the king of the things of Tuskane, but it tooke out of his way all blockes and obstacles in Romagnia, where the Aragons began now much to decline: for, as it is a thing very hard to him that scarcely defendes him selfe from daungers imminent, to prouide in one scason for the perils of an other: So, whilest Ferdinand remained in furetie within the ftrog fort of Faenza, the enemie returned to the country of Ymola, where, after they had with a part of the armie assailed the borough of Bubane, but in vaine, because by his litle circuite, small strength sufficed to defend it, and for his base situation, the country ranne ouer with waters: They tooke by force the towne of Mordane, notwithstanding it was very strong, and plentifully furnished with souldiers to defend it: but such was the fury of the artil-

lerie, and fuch the desperat hardinesse of the French in the assault, (many being drowned as they passed ouer the waterie ditches) that there was no abilitie of resistance by those that were within, against who the victours accompanied their fortune with such bloudy crueltie, without regard to age or fex, that they filled all Romania with generall feares & aftonishments. By reason of this accideut, Katherine Sforce despairing ofsuccours, accorded with the Frenchmen, to auoy de the perill present, and promised to their armic all commodities of the estates subject to her sonne: the same being the cause that Ferdinand (now doubting of the wils of the of Faenza, yea & held it so much the more daungerous, to remaine in the middest of Ymola and Furly, by how much he was well advertised of the going of P.de Aledicis to Serezana) retired neare to the wals of Cesena, shewing fo great a feare, that because he would not passe neare to Furly, he led his armic by the hils, (a way more long and combersom) neare to Castrocare, a borough of the Florentines. And within few dayes after, hearing of the convention which Peter had made with the French, for which cause the bandes of the Florentines for sooke him, he tooke the way to Rome: Like as also Dom Federike being parted from the port of Lynorne, retired with his armie towardes the kingdome of Naples, where begun to be necessarie for Alphonso, those armies which he had sent abroad with fo great hopes to inuade the cftates of others: for, his affaires were full of many aduerfities on his fide, feeing that the fiege of the port of Neptune not fucceding, he had led backe his armie to Terracina. And the armie by fea for the French, whereof were leaders the Prince of Salerne, and M. de Serenon, were discouered aboue Ostia, but yet giving it out that they would not offend the states of the Church, they put nomen on land, nor shewed any token of displeasure to the Pope, notwithstanding their king many dayes before had refused to heare Frauncis Perolhomins, Cardinall of Siena, Legat, sent by the Pope to his Maiestie.

The Florende Medicis,

But to returne to Peter de Medicis, after the Florentines were aduertised of the conventions times dissorten- he had made, so greatly to the diminution of their territories, and with so slaunderous and daunted with Peter gerous a wound and gall to the common weale, there was no litle displeasure and discontentment throughout all the Citie: befides their great losses, their harts were moued against him for that with a new forme and order of dealing, and contrarie to the examples of his predeceffours, he had alienated without the councell of his Citie, and solemne decree of the Magistrates, so great a part of the flate of Florence: in fo much, that to the bitter complaintes made against him, were iouned the murmures and secret grudgings of the people, incensing one an other to rise and recouer their libertie, without that any of those that in their hearts bare fauours to the doings of Peter, durst either with force, or perswasion, set them selves against so great an inclination: Albeit the Florentines having no strength to defend Pysa and Lyuorne, had also no hope to turne the kings will from having them: yet because they would separate the councels of the common weale, from the councels of Peter, or at the least that that should not be attributed to one in particular, which appertained to them all in publike, they addressed to him many Ambassadors of those families, which were ill contented with the Medicis. But Peter knowing that that was a beginning of a mutation of estate, to the ende to prouide for his affaires afore greater disorders hapned, applied his deliberations to the time, and tooke leaue of the king, under colour to give persection to that he had promised. At this time also the king parted fro Serezana, to go to Pysa, & Lodomyke Sforce returned to Myllan, having obtained for money, that the investiture of Genes, graunted by the king a few yeares before to Iohn Galeas, for him and his iffue, should be transferred to him and his posteritie: he went away very much discontented, for that the king would not leaue in his keeping (as he fayd he had promised) S. Peter and Serezana, which places feruing him as a ladder to rayle him to the Citie of Pyla, he demaunded as vniustly taken fro the Genoways, a few yeares before by the Florentines. But when Peter was returned to Florence, he found the Citic estraunged from him, and the mindes of his chiefe friendes in suspence, for that against their coucell, & against the oportunitie of the time, he had viidiscreetly gouerned all things: The communaltie also was drawne into such an vprore and mutunie, that as the next day after his returne, he would have entred into the pallace, wherein rested the authoritie & great magistracie of the common weale, it was forbidden him by certaine Magistrats which kept the gate armed, of whom the chiefest was laeques de Nerly, a young man of equal nobilitie and riches. This being spread abroad thorow the Citie, the people ranne with swift turnult to armes, being the more moued to this yproare, for that Paule Vrsin, who Peter had sent for, was at hand with his band of armed men . The aspe of and consideration of these daungers, caused Peter (eftsoones returned to his house) and having lost both courage and councell, and whilest the state declared him re- P. de Medicia bell, to flee in great half out of Florence, follwing him John Cardinall of the Church of Rome, & flyeth out of Iulian his brethren, vpon whom in like fort were imposed the paynes ordeined against Rebels: Florence. he went directly to Bolognia, when Iohn Bentsuole, desiring in an other that constancie and refolution of courage, which he could not show fince in his owne aduersities, reproued him bitterly at the beginning, for that not onely to his owne prejudice, but also to the ill example of all that oppressed the libertie of their countreys, he had so cowardly without the death of one man, abandoned such a greatnesse. In this fort, by the rashnesse of one young man, did at that time fall the house of Mease is from that rule and power, which vnder the name & apparance almost of a civill administration, it had obtained in Florence three score yeares: it began in Cosmo his great grandfather, a Citizen of fingular wifedome, and infinite wealth, and for those regardes very notable through all the partes of Europe: But much more was he recommended, for that with a wonderfull magnificence and hart truely royall, regarding more the eternitie of his name, then the profit of his posteritie: he employed more then foure hundreth thousand duckats, in building of Churches, erecting of Monasteries, with other buildings of sumptuous costes, not onely in his owne countrey, but also in many places of the world: And his sonnes sonne Lawrence, a man for vnderstanding and judgement, excellent, in councell graue and singular, in liberalitie equall with his grandfather, and for greatnesse of hart, nothing inferiour, for ministration in the common weale, of authoritie more absolute, but for wealth, of lesse abilitie, and of life farre more short: gate generall reputation through out Italie, and with many straunge Princes, which after his death, was turned into a cleare monument and memorie, for that it hath feemed ever fince, that the concord and felicitie of Italie ended with his life.

The same day the state of Florence fell into chaunge, the French king being in the Citie of Pyfa, the townesmen in popular troupes with cryes and showtings, ranne to him, and demaun- The Pyfano dedlibertie, complayning grieuously of the oppressions and wrongs which they sayd they had offer to renote received vnder the government of the Florentines: certaine of the kings councell affilting, assured him that their demaund was just, for that the Florenines held them in to hard seruitude. The king not feeing into the importance of their request, nor how farre it was contrarie to the contract of Serezane, told them, they should have libertie: with the which aunswere the Pylans ranne to armes, throwing downe to the earth all the enseignes and armories of the Florentines, they put them selues into an absolute libertie so long defired: Notwithstanding, the king, contrarie to him felfe, and no leffe ignorant in the things he had accorded, would that the Florentin officers should still administer their accustomed jurisdictions, and on the other part, left the old citadell in the hands of the Pifans, and kept to him felfethe new, offarre more importance. In these accidents of Pysa and Florence, may be well discerned a true experience of the old saying, or common prouerbe as we call it: That men when their aduerfities approch, lofe chiefly that >> wisedome, with the which they might have hindred or avoyded the ills that happen: And this is >> common to men and kingdomes, that draw towardes their destinies, that when their ill fortune comes, it blindes their eyes that they can not difcerne it, and byndes their hands, that they can " not helpe it, making them inftruments against them selves in the execution of their mishaps: for, ... both the Florentines, who in all times have held the fidelitie of the Pysans suspected, seeing so daungerous a war at their gates, forgat to reuoke to Florence the principall Citizens of Py/a, as for their better furetie they had wont to call home a great number of them, ypon neuer fo light occafions, or litle accidents: and P. de Medicis, feeing a concurrance of fo many great difficulties togither, was too much ouerfeene, that he did not arme the place & publike pallace with fuch streeth of straungers, as he had oftentimes done before in farre lesser suspition: That foresight had kept him Itill in his estate and rule, and such provisions had much hindred those great mutations: But touching the affaires of Py/a, it is manifest, that that which gaue them greatest incouragement to make this commotion (naturally hating the name of the Florentines) was the authoritie of Lodowyke Sforce, who to that ende had intertained certaine intelligences and practifes with some Citizens of the place banished for private offences: and the day present of the revolt, Galeas de S. Senerm, who he had left to be alwayes about the king, inceled the people to the tumult, by which meane Lodowyk perswaded himselfe, that the dominio of Pyla would fall speedily into his hands, manifest, that certaine of the Citizens communicating the night before with the Cardinall S. P. ad vincula, what they had defire and refution to doe: the Cardinall, who, perhaps till that day had neuer bene author of pealible councels, admonithed them with wordes graue and well in-P. advincu- flructing, that they should not consider onely the superficiall and beginning of things, but see la prinades deepely that which with time, & in time may happen he told them libertie was a thing precious, & the Pylaus not of very vehement defire, well meriting that men should oppose them selues to all daungers, hateruols. ce ting a true and sensible hope to be able to defend it on all sides: But as touching their Citie, na-« ked of peoples, and mearely drayned of wealth and substaunce, he saw verie weake possibilities co to institute it against the power of the Florenines: and to promife to them selues that the authoritie of the French king should be turned to their protection, were hopes deceiptfull, and an expe-" Ctation too full of incertainties and doubts: for that albeit the moneyes and treasures of Florence "Ihould do litle with him, (as it is like they may preuaile a great deale, specially looking into the contract of Serazana) yet his armies would be alwayes in Italie, according to the experience and judgement of examples past. Besides, it were too great an indiscretion to binde themselves "to a perpetuall petill, vpon foundations frayle, and not perpetuall: and for most vncertaine "hopes, to leuie against enemies farre more mightie then they, a warre certaine and absolute, "wherein they could promife them felues no fuccours, fecing they depended upon the will of an cother, and that which more is, of verie diuerse accidents; yea, be it they should obtaine succours, comuch leffe were that to anoyde or shake of, but rather to redouble and make greater, the cala-"mities of the warre, being vexed at one time by the inuafions of fouldiers of the enemie, and tormented with the oppressions and insolencies of the men of warre that come to their succours. Which miferies (he fayd) would be fo much the more grieuous to them to beare, by how much in the end they would come to fee and know, that it was not for their proper libertie, they tooke carmes, but for the imperie of a ftraunger, chaunging one feruitude for an other: for that this is reproper to all Princes, notto enterinto the trauels and expenses of a warre, but to raigne ouer se those for whom they fight: And yet your warre(sayth he) seeing the great wealth & neighbour-"hood of the Florentines, (by whom you shall find many and perpetuall vexations) you can not be " able to fuftaine, but with verie great difficulties.

The French king drawes coward Florence.

In this generall confusion of things, the king departeth from Pyla towards Florence, and is not resolued what forme he would give to the affaires of the Pysans, he stayed in a place called Signa, feuen myles from Florence, to be aduertised, afore he entred the Citie: whether the tumult of the people were in any fort reappaifed, who had not discotinued their vproares, since the day that Peter de Aledicis was chased out of the Citie: he had withall this intention, to give time to Monfieur D'aubignie, whom he had sent for, (to the ende his entry might so much the more astonish the Florentines) with direction to leave the artillerie at Custrocare, and give leave to the five hundred men at armes Italians, which were with him in Romagnes, togither with the men at armes of the Duke of Myllan, except the Count Cainzee, which followed Monsieur D'aubyonse with three hundred light horsemen: it was supposed by many tokens and conjectures, that the intention of the king was, to draw the Florentines by feare of his power, to yeeld vnto him the dominion absolute of the Citie: A thing which him felse could not diffemble with their Ambaffadours, hauing often recourfe to Sizna, to make perfect the accord that was contracted: it was without doubt, that the king bare a minde inflamed against them, and nourished many ill disposed meanings against their Citie, for that they fought to hinder him in his enterprise: And albeit it was manifest, that that refistance proceeded not of the will of the common weale, which in reasonable fort had inftified them felues: yet he could not eafily forget and diffolue the impression of the offence, being (as it was supposed) much induced to their disfauours, by many of his councell and Lordes: who, judging it not meete to let passe the oportunitie to make himselfe Lord ouer the Citie, or perhaps pushed forward with their proper ambition and couctousnesse, were loth to lose the occasion to sacke a Citie, abounding in such treasures and wealth: in so much as there ranne a brute thorow the camp, that the Citie had deferued to be punished, to ferue as an example to others, being the towne in Italie that had prefumed to oppose against the power and armic of Fraunce. There were also of the chiefest of his councell, that solicited him to restore 'Peter de Medicis to his former degree: for whom with a peculiar diligence aboue the residue, did labour Philip Lord of Breffe, brother to the Duke of Sauoye, being induced to that office by the private friendships and promises that had passed between them: in so much, that either by the periwations of them that could do most, (notwithstanding the Bishop of S Mallo councelled the contrarie) or by a hope to make the Florentines more inclined to his will by this feare, or lastly to haue occasion to take vpon the suddeine what part or way he would: the king wrote to Peter, causing also the Lord Philip to do the like, and aduised him to come neare to Florence, for that for the auncient friendship that had bene betweene their houses, and for his owne particular readinesse and good will shewed in the confignation of the fortresses, he was determined to readdresse him, & restore him to his first authoritie: But these letters found him not at Boloma according to the kings weening, for that what by the rough words of lohn Betinole, & doubt he should be purfued by the Duke of Atyllan, and happily also by the French king, he was for his misfortunes retired to Vence, whither they were fent to him by his brother, the Cardinall remaining then at Bolonia. At Florence they doubted much of the kings will: and yet, not feeing with what force, or with what hopes they might relift him, they agreed as a councell least damagerous, to receive him into their Citie, hoping there would fome meane arise to appeale him. And yet making the best of their perils, and because they would be prouided for all fortunes, they ordained that the houses of most of the Citizens should be secretly replenished with men naturals of the dominion of Florence, and that the Captaines which were in the pay of the common weale, (diffembling not withflanding the occasion) should enter the Citie with many of their bandes and souldiers, and that euery one within the towne and places about it, should stand vpon ready garde to take armes at the alarme of the great bell of the publike paliace. After this the king marched to Florece with his the alarme of the great bell of the publike paliace. After this the king material of the view with its armie, wherein was expressed no litle pompe, as well by the glorie and magnificence of those of the French armie, wherein was expressed no litle pompe, as well by the glorie and magnificence of those with the perfect the general transfer of the perfect that the perfect the perfect that the perfect the perfect that the perfect his Court, as by them of the towne: he entred in figne of victorie, armed him felfe and his horse, Florence, with his launce voon his thigh, & immediatly began to speake of composition, but that was not without many difficulties: for, besides the immoderate fauours which some of the French Court bare to Peter de Aledicis, and the demaundes of money intollerable made by the king, he demaunded openly the imperie of Florence, alledging that according to the orders of warre in the Realme of Fraunce, he had lawfully wonne it, feeing his entry was armed, according to the customes of Conquerours: from which demaund, albeit he went in the end, yet fought he to leave at Florence certaine men of the long coate, (so are called in Fraunce Lawyers, Doctors, & men of Iuflice) as his Ambassadours, with such authoritie, that according to the institutions of France, he might pretende to be given to him for ever no litle jurisdiction: But on the contrary, the Florentines were obstinate to preserve their full libertie, happing what perils so euer, in so much that communicating togither with fuch a contrarietie of wils, albeit the mindes of both partes were continually kept in hoat and angry moodes, yet neither faction shewed readinesse to determine the difference by armes: for, the people of Florence given of long to the following of marchandize, & not to the exercise of warre, suffered no small feares, having within their own wals one fo mightie a king with his armie full of nations vnknowen & furious: And to the French men, was no litle amaze the confideration of the great multitude of peoples, who, fince the dayes that the gouernement chaunged, had gathered boldneffe and audacitie aboue expectation: They were attonished besids at the common brute, that at the alarme of the great bell, there would slocke infinite troupes of people from all parts confining. In which comon feare on both fides, at the noyfe of enery false alarme that was heard, either part for his proper suretie, tooke armes, but not one did affaile or prouoke an other. The foundation which the king fought to worke by Peter de Medicis, was supplanted, for that Peter wavering betweene the hope that was promised him, and the feare that he should be given vp as a pray to his adversaries, asked councell of the Senate of Venice, touching the kings letters: Truely there is nothing more necessarie in great deliberations, ,, and on the other fide nothing more daungerous, then to demaund councell: And albeit councell, is leffe necessarie to men discreet, then to such as are not tempered, yet no doubt the profites are,, not few which wife men reape by councels, feeing no man hath that perfect wifedome to confidet alwayes and know all things of him selfe, & in reasons contrarie or different, is able alwayes,, to discerne the better part. But what assurance bath he that asketh councell, to receive councell, according to the faith he reappoieth: feeing if there be no equal fidelitie nor affection, but re-,, gard to particular interests, as profit, reuenge, or some other motion: he that giueth the coun-,, « cell, dresseth it to that end which best aunswereth his purpose: So that those endes being for the most part vnknowen to him that comes to aske counsell, he perceineth not (if he be not wise) the " treason and infidelitie of the councell. The experience was seene in the condition of Peter de Medicis: for, the Venetians judging, that if he returned into his country, it would be a cause to give the king a greater facilitie to his demaundes and defires of the Florentines, (a thing prejudiciall to them, and contrary to the course of their affaires) perswaded him by many lively reasons, (councelling rather for them selues then for him) that he should not put him selse in the power of a king of Fraunce, holding him selfe injured by him: Wherein the better to encourage him to the imitation of their councell, they offered him to imbrace his affaires, and as time and necessitic required, to minister to him all meanes and fauours convenient for his restitution, wherefore the better to be affured that he should not then depart Vemce, they set vponhim, (if the common brute be true) very fecret espialt and guard. But now for Florence, in this meane while mens hearts were inflamed on all partes, and almost caried into manifest contention: the king would nothing abate of his later demaundes, northe Florentins be bownd to fummes of money fo intollerable, and much leffe consent to any jurisdiction or preheminece in their estate. All which difficulties not being able almost to be dissolved without armes, were even presently decided by the vertue of Peter Cappont, one of the foure deputed to treate with the king: this Capponi was a man of spirite and great courage, and speciall reputation in Florence, as well for his partes and qualities, as for that he was of an honorable familie, and discended of personages, who had borne great rule in the common weale. As he and his companions were one day in the presence and audience of the of refold part king, and that one of the kings Secretaries read the vnreasonable capitulations offered by the king, of a Commoller, at the last, he, in a great furie snatched the articles out of the Secretaries hands, and tare them before the eyes of the king, faying with a heart refolute, and voyce framed; Seeing you demaund of vs things fo dishonest, found you vp your trumpets, and we will ring our bells, let all things be ruled by the sentence of the sword, and in the same heate slings with great suddeinesse out of the chamber, being followed of his companions. The wordes of this Citizen whom the king and his Court had already knowen, for that a few monethes before he had bene in Fraunce in legation for them of Florence, aftonished them all in such fort, specially for that they could not beleeue that fuch a boldnesse was without occasion: that they called him backe againe, and without fpeaking more of demaundes, whereunto the Florentines had no will to condifeend, the king and the Citie fell to composition in this fort: That all quarrels and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the Citic of Florence should be friend, confederate, and in the perpetual protection of the crowne of Fraunce: That for the furetie of the king, the Citie of Pyfu and towne of Lynorne, with . all their castels, should remaine in his hauds: And that he should be bownd to restore them to the Florentines, without any expenses or charges, as soone as he had brought to end his enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, the which should be construed to be at an ende whensoeuer he should haue conquered the Citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meane of peace or truce for leffe then two yeares, or that for any other occasion his person should be gone out of Italie: That those that had the keeping of the fayd Castels, should be sworne from the present to render them in the > cases aforesayd: That in the meane while the imperie, the iurisdiction, the gouernement, and the revenue of the townes should be in the administration of the Florentines, as they were accustomed: That the like should be of S. Peter, Serezane, and Serezanelle: But (for that the Genoways pretended right to them) the king should procure either by composition or instice some reasonable ende betweene them, and if within the time aforefay dhe could not determine the titles, that then he should restore them to the Florentmes: That the king might leaue at Florence two Ambaffadours, and that during his expedition for Naples, there should be nothing debated concerning that action, without their privitic and calling them to it: And that during the fay dtime, they should not chuse a Captaine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the fayd Ambassadours: That all the other peeces taken away or revolted from the Florentines, should be immediatly rendred, and that they might be fuffred to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to ayde the king in his enterprise, they should give him fittie thousand duckats within fifteene dayes, fortie thousand in the moneth of March, and thirtie thousand in Iune next comming: That the Florentines should pardon the Pyfans their rebellions, and other faults committed during their revolt: That they should deliver Peter de Medicus and his brethren from con-

deinnation and confiscation, with this condition notwithstanding, that Peter should not come by an hundred myles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was because he should not remaine at Rome) nor his brethren nearer then a hundred myles of the citic of Florence: These were the articles of most importance in the capitulation made between the king and the Florentines, which after they were lawfully passed and contracted, were, in great ceremonie published in the great Church at divine service, where the king in person (at whose request this was done) and the Magistrates of the Citic, promised by solemne othe vpon the high altar, in the presence of the Court and the whole sace of Florence, to observe the contents of the same. Within two dayes after the king less Florence, & went to Siena, which citie being confederate with the king of Naples, and with the Florentines, had followed their authoritie, vntill the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper safetic.

Stena, a Citie well peopled, and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had The French bene the most renowined and mightie towne of Tuskane next to Florence, was gouerned by a king at Siena. peculiar pollicie proper and particular to it felfe, but fo, as it knew rather the name of libertie then the effectes: for that being divided into many factions or members of Citizens, which they call orders, it obeyed that part which according to the accidents of times, and fauours of forreine Potentates, was more strong then the others: At that time held most rule and authoritie the order of Mont None. After the king hadtaried a very few dayes at Siena, he planted a garrison there, (for that having bene alwayes at the devotion of the Empire, he held it suspected) and tooke his way to Rome, rifing every day more infolent then other, for his fuccesse and fortunes, which were alway es greater then ever were his hopes: And being also favored with the ayre, and weather more then the naturall temperature of that season had wont to shewe, he determined to put diligence to his fortune, & vse those prosperities, not only as terrible to his enemies manifest and professed, but even to those that were conjoyned with him, or at least had not prouoked him in any thing: therefore, the Senate of Venice, and the Duke of Myllan, no lesse associated with these succeffes, then doubtfull that the kings thoughts would not bee at rest by the conquest of Naples, (specially seeing him possess of the Florentines, and to leave a garrison at Siena) began for a remedie of their common daunger, to make a new confederation, whereunto, they had with more speede and ease given perfection, if there had bene made that resistance to the king at Rome that was hoped for, the intention of the Duke of Calabria (with whom were joyned in one strength the bandes of the Pope, and Virginio Vrfin, with the residue of the Aragons armie) being to incampe at Vicerba, to give impediment to the king for palling further: To this he was drawne, befides many occasions, by the oportunitie of the place, inuironed with townes of the Church, and neare the states of the Vrsins: but all the circumference and countreys about Rome, drawing into tumult by the incursions which the Colonnoys made beyond the river of Tiber, and for the impediments of the vituals (by meane of Oftio) which should come to Rome by sea, he durst not abide there: he doubted withall, the intention of the Pope, for that fince he vnderstood that Peter de Medacis was turned, he had begun to open to his eares to the demaundes of the French, for the which, and the reasons of them, Cardinall Askanius went to him, after, in pledge of his furctie, the Cardinall of Valence was come to Alarina, a towne of the Colonnoys: And albeit Askanim was gone without resolution certaine, for that Alexander distrusted much the intention of the king, and on the other fide was in great feare of his forces, which bred no fmall torment and coffict in his heart: yet after the king was parted from Florence, they returned effloones to common of the accord: wherein for the more diligent accomplishment of things, the Pope dispatched to the king the Bilhops of Concorde, and Ternie, and M. Gratian his confessour, with commission that they should compound aswell for the affaires of Alphonso, as for his owne. But the king was of a contrary meaning, having fetled his resolution to accord onely and particularly with the Pope: and for that cause he sent to him the L.de la Trimouille, and the President of Ganme being there also for the same occasion: the Cardinall Askanius & Profeer Collonne, who were no tonner come to Rome, then the Pope (for what cause I know not) chaunging aduite, bestowed the Duke of Calabria within Rome, with all his armie: he caufed to be arrelted Askanius & Prosper, and restraining them within the tower of Adrian, of old called the Castell of Crescence, and now named the Caltell S. Ange, he demaunded of them restitution of Ostia. In this tumult also the French Ambassadours were made prisoners by the Aragons: The Pope caused them with a present speede to be redeliuered, and within a few dayes after, restored to libertie Askanius and Profest, constraining them notwithstanding to depart suddenly out of Rome. After this, he fent to the French king lying then at Nepi, Cardinall Federike of S Seuerin, beginning to treate onely of his proper affaires, and yet in great doubt and declining of minde, for that some times he determined to stand to the defence of Rome, and therefore gaue sufferance to Ferdinand and the Captaines to looke to fortifie it in the parts most weake; and earst againe, he judged great hardnesse & impossibilitie to defend it, for the impediments of vituals restrained by those of Oftra: In which respectes, waighing also with the infinit numbers of straungers, being of mindes and of wills different, the diversitie of factions even amongst the Romaines, he began to thinke to go from Rome, requiring in the Colledge that every Cardinall would promife by a writing lubfigned, to follow him: And even standing amazed with the daungers and difficulties imminent, vpon every one of his deliberations he turned his minde to accord: But whilest his minde wauered in these ambiguities, the French men forbare not to ouerrunne the whole country on this fide Tyber, making them selues Lordes of one towne after an other, no place offering resistance to their incursions; no, not one peece or fort which gaue not place to their importunat furic, according to the example of the others, no, not fuch as had good occasion to oppose them selues against them, as Vrginio Vrfin , drawne by fo many bondes of faith , office , and honour to the house of Aragon, Captaine generall of the armie of Alphonfo, grand Costable of the realine of Naples, & very neare parent to Alphonfo, for that lahn lordan his fonne had maried a bastard daughter to the late king Ferdinand. But he turning all things into forgetfulneffe, and as vithankefull for the flates and fauours he had received in the kingdome of Naples, as vnmindefull that the calamities of the Aragons were first kindled for his occasions, and nourished chiefly in his particular interestes: confented that (his person continuing still in the pay of the king of Naples) his children should compound with the French, and be bound to give them passage & libertie of vituals and other friendthips, through all the estates which he held of the dominions of the Church, leaving the French men not a litle amazed with his example and forme of dealing, being not acquainted with these suttle and vnaccustomed distinctions of the souldiers of Italie: he suffered withall that Campagnane, and certaine other places were put in deputation into the hands of the Cardinall of Gurcie, who promised to restore them so soone as the armie was out of the territories of Rome: This forme of agreement was vied also by the Count do Petillane, with all the residue of the samilie of the Vrfins. Immediatly vpon these accordes, king Charles went from Nepi to Bracciane, a chiefe towne of Virginio, and fent to Oftia Lowys the L. of Ligny, and Tues L. of Alegre, with five hundred launces, and two thousand Smyzzers: to the end that passing Tyber, and joyning with the Collomoys, they might make a strength to enter Rome, and that so much the better, by how much the Collomoys, by the meane of their factions and partakers within Rome, had a resolute hope to make their entry in what fort to euer it were, notwithstanding by the feafon of the time being rough and stormy, the difficulties were much increased. By this time Cinitaneche Cornette. and in the end almost all the territorie of Rome were brought to the deuotion of the French, when a man might have feene all the Court amazed, all the Cardinals doubtfull, and all the communaltie of the Čitie full offeares & emotion, demaunding vehemently peace: in fo much that the Pope driuen to daungerous termes, seeing the foundations which he had layd for his defence, shaken on all fides, was not retained with any other thing, then with the remembrance that he was one of the first that stirrred the French king to the enterprise of Naples: and had since without occasion giuen, obstinatly resisted him with authoritie, with councels, and with force: the same making him justly doubt, that the faith which he should receive of the king, should be like that the king had received of him. To these feares he felt an other torment nothing inferiour, vnderstanding the Cardinall S. P. advincula was veriegracious in the kings fight, with many other Cardinals, his enemies bearing no litle authoritie and rule in the kings doings: By the perswasions of whom, and for the regard of the title of right Christian which the kings of France beare, and for the auncient name which that nation hath to be verie religious, and lastly for that in ill men the conscience guiltie and infected, suspecteth not onely the worst, but also their mindes caried in shadowes, they expect and dread great things of those that are knowen to them but by name onely: he feared leaft the king would turne his wits (according to a vayne brute) to reforme the government of the Church: the fame being a right trembling thought & coniecture to him, when he remembred with what infamie he was come to the Popedome, performing his ministration with manners of life and meanes not differing from so fowle and vile a beginning: But he was cleared immediatly of these suspitions, by the diligence and promises of the king, full of efficacie and defire to aduaunce aboue all things his going to the Realme of Naples : and for that cause letting nothing passe that might take out of the way the blockes and impediments of the Pope, sent to him eftsoones as Ambassadours, the Seneschallof Beucaire, the Marcshall of Gie, and the fayd Prefident of Gannay: they laboured to perfwade the Pope that the kings intention was not to medle with any thing that apperteined to the authoritie of Popes, and that his demaundes stretched not but to things reasonable and necessarie for the surerie of his passage: They required him instantly to agree with good will to the kings entry into Rome, affiring him, that it was a holie and peculiar defire in his Maiestie: (Not that it was not in his power to make his entry by armes, but because he would not be constrained to forbeare) to vie those actions of reuerence, which had bene alwayes done by his elders to the Popes of Rome: They affured him that affoone as his Maiesties person were possessed of the presence of the Pope within Rome, all those quarrels that had bene raised between them, would be converted into reconcilement, vnitie, and conjunction: It feemed to the Pope a hard compulsion, to despoyle himselfe afore all things of the ayde of his friendes, and committing his efface and life into the power of an enemie, to receiue him within the walles of Rome, afore he had compounded or affured his affaires: Not with standing, making election of the daunger that was of least qualitie, he confented to all their demandes, and caused to depart out of Rome the Duke of Calabria, for whom albeit he obteined of the French king a fafe conduct for his fafe passage through all the dominios of the Church, yet the Duke, accounting it a diminution of his reputation and courage, refused it, & issued out of Rome by the gate S. Sebastian, the last day of the yeare 1494 at the same houre, that at the gate de S. Maria de Popolo entred with the armie of Fraunce, the French king armed, with The French his launce upon his thigh as he entred Florence. At the fame time the Pope full of incredible feares king entreth and perplexities, was withdrawne to the castell S. Ange, and not accompanied with other Cardi-Rome. 1494. nals then Baptista Vrsin, & Oliner Caraffe a Neapolitan: But now began the Cardinals, ad vincula, Askanius, Collonne, & Sauelle, with many others, to solicite the king with vehement instance, that taking from the sea a Pope full of vices, and abhominable to all the world, he would create & set some Cardinals vp an other: they told him it would be no leffe vertuous in him to deliuer the Church of God fro to the French the tyranny of a wicked Pope, then it was great glory to Pepin & Charlemain his predecessiours, king to depose to take the Popes of holy life out of the perfecutions of those that did vniustly oppresse the: that the Popes the action was no leffe necessary for his fecuritie, then greatly concurring for his glory: for, there was no expectation of faith or trust in the promises of the Pope, being a man naturally full of fraude, infatiable in ambirion, shameleffe in all his doings, & according to the testimonie of experience, extremely hating the French, with whom the reconciliation that now he made, was more by necessitie and seare, then of inclination or good will: partly by these perswasions, and parrly for that the Pope in the coditions that were debated, refused to let the king have the castel of S. Ange, for the suretie of those things he promised him: the artillerie were drawne twise fro the pallace of S. Marke where the king was lodged, to be planted before the castell: But the king bearing no in-clination to offend the Pope, and the presents and promises of Alexander working much with betweene the some of those that gouerned most the kings councels: they fell to accord in this fort: That the Pope and the Pope should give to the king, to hold for his suretie till he had conquered the kingdome of Na-Fiench king. ples the Citadels of Civitanechia, Terrachine, & Spolete, & yet this last was not put into his hads: That the Pope should keepe no remebrance of any offence or injurie of the Cardinals or any Baros fubiects to the Church that had followed the kings partie: That the Pope should inuest him in the kingdom of Naples: That he should give to the king Gemyn Ottoma brother to Baiazet, who, after the death of their father, had bin perfecuted by the fayd Banazet, according to the barbarous customes of the Ottomar, seeking to establish their succession in the Empire, with the bloud of their brethre, their nearest kinne, & copetitors: in which perill for fafetie of his life, he was fled to Rodes, from whence he was brought into Fraunce, & lastly past ouer into the power & custodie of Pope Innocent: By which occasion Banazet, seruing his turne of the couetousnesse of the Vicaires of Christ, as instruments to hold in peace the Empire enemie to the Christian faith, payed every yeare (vnder the name of allowance towards his norriture and keeping) fortie thousand duckats to the

Popes, to the end they should be leffe ready to deliuer him into the hands of other Princes to serve their turnes against him: The king was so much the more desirous to haue him, by how much he fupposed to turne him to many vses and oportunities for the aduauncing of his pretended enterprise against the Turkes, (being greatly caried into glory by the vaine flatteries of many of his fauorits) which he incant to begin as foone as he had accoplished the coquest of the Aragons: And because the last fortie thousand duckats sent by the Turke, were taken at Sinigalle by the Prefect Rome, herequired that the Pope would remit both the punishment and restitution. To these Cardinall Va- capitulations were added, that the Cardinall of Valence should follow the king three moneths as lence the Poper Legat Apostolicke, but in meaning it was to stand as ostage for the promises of his father. The accord thus made and past, the Pope returned to the Vatican, where is his pallace Pontificall: and after, with pompes and ceremonies accustomed at the receiving of great kings, he received The Fresh king the king in the Church of S. Peter, & there (according to the manner) having kissed his feete kneeling, was afterwardes received to kiffe his cheeke: An other day he affifted in presence the Popes Masse, where he had his place the first after the first Bishop Cardinall, and according to the auncient cultome, gaue water to the Pope celebrating Masse: which offices, humilities and ceremonies, the Pope, to continue the memorie to all posterities, caused to be curiously drawne in a table purtrayed, and hong up in a gallerie of the Callel S. Ange. In this action, the Pope to gratifie the king, created and published Cardinals the Bishop of S. Mallo, and the Bishop of Maus, of the nation of Luxumburg, forgetting nothing that might expresse how sincerely and vnfaynedly he was reconciled.

The king parand draweth

The king remaining in Rome about a moneth, forgat not to fend bands and troupes of foultest fro Kome diers even upon the confines of the kingdome of Naples: where was already fuch generall comsowards Na- motion, that Aquila, and almost all Abruzza, displayed enseignes afore he parted from Rome, as also Fabricius Collonne occupied the quarters of Albe and Taille Cosse: The whole residue of the kingdome was almost in no more peasible estate, for that as soone as Ferdinand was parted fro Rome, the fruits of the hatreds which the people had long borne to Alphonfo, bega to appeare, of Maples be- helping much the remembrace of many rigours which his father Ferdinad had vied against them: ganeth to con- vpon these they raised ready occasions to complaine vehemently of the iniquities of the gouerne-fire. ments passed, togither with the cruckies and pride of Albanes. ments passed, togither with the cruckies and pride of Alphonso, expressing in these humours apparant defire that the French might come, and that in fuch fort, as the contemplation of the aimcient relikes and monuments of fuch as held with the house of Anion, albeit they were joyned to the memoric of so many Barons as had bene chased and emprisoned at fundry times by Ferdinand, (things of them felues of great confideration, and of no litle power to worke a chaunge) did litle in this time, in regard of the other occasions: so vehemently were the hearts of all the kingdome inflamed against Alphonso: who for his part, as soone as he understood that his sonne was gone out of Rome, entred into fuch present seares and astonishments, that, turning all memorie or regard to the great renowne and glorie which with fo long experience he had got in many warres in Italie, into a present despaire not to be able to refist this fatall storme, determined to abandon the kingdome, and leave to Ferdinand the name and authoritie royall. In this deuife perhaps he had hope that taking away with him felfe the generall hatred, and leaving to the people for their king a young Prince of great expectation, not yet hauing offended any of them. but gracious and plaufible to the vniuerfall multitude, he should make lesse in his subjectes their defire to have the French: which councell if it had bene fooner taken, would happily have wrought to better purpose, but being differred, till things were not onely in motion and shaking, but even beginning to fall, it was not able to ftay fo great a ruine. It was fayd alfo (if it be lawfull not to despise such things altogither) that the spirite of Ferdinand appeared three times in fundrie nights to lames chiefe Surgeon of the Court, charging him first with foft and myld wordes, and after with many threatnings, to warne Alphonso from him, not to hope to be able" to refift the French king, because it was a resolution in destinie that his race trauelled with infinite aduentures and fortunes, and deprined at laft of fo large a kingdome, should now end and determine: he fayd their enormities began now to appeare in inflice, and the many tyrannies by them committed were the causes, but about all others that, which by his perswasion he had done in the Church of S. Leonard in Caiaia neare Naples comming from Pozzolo: for that he expressed them no more particularly, men supposed that Alphonso had in that place perswaded Ferdinand to pur to death fecretly many Barons, whom he held prisoners long time before: But of what nature so ever was the occasion, it is most certaine, that Alphonso vexed with his proper conscience, bued day and night in a discontented spirite, for that in his sleepes the shadowes and ghostes of those dead Lordes were lively afore him, and on the daies hee beheld the people prepared greatly to insurrections, for revenge of his rigorous dealings. In which perplexity of minde applying his councels to his fortunes, he communicated onely his intention with the Queene his mother in law, keeping it from his brother or his sonne, and departed from Naples accompanied with source light gallies loaden with implements rich and precious: he was so afflicted with dread and confusion, that at the earnest instance of his mother he would not stay two or three daies (a time to end the whole yeare of his raigne,) and at his departure expressing some timerous disposition of minde, as is she had bene enuironed with the french men; he sailed to a towne in Sicile called Mazare, which Ferdinand the king of Spaine had given him in the yeare before; but his seares left not to follow him no more then his fortunes, shewing at curry brute or small noise, no lesse perpetitive and terror, then if the heavens and elements had conspired against him.

As the french King departed out of Rome, he received advertisement of the flying of Alphon-6: and as foone as he was arrived at Vellitre, the Cardinall of Valence fled fecretely from him: with the which albeit the Pope shewed him selfe much discontented, offering to give the king such affurance as it pleafed him: yet wife men beleeued that it was not without his practife and commaundement, as one that fought to have in his power to observe or not observe the conventions he had made with his maiesty: an action agreeing with his ambition, which most gouerned him, but farre from the office of his profession which he least esteemed, making nothing valawfull, for that he challenged to him felfe to have power to dispence with all things. From Vellitre the yauntguard marcheth to Montforeyn, a towne of the Church seated in la Campagnia, and subject to lacques a gentleman Romaine, who had at first followed the pay of the french King, but since (the late he bare to the Collonnoys preuayling more with him then his proper honour) he was becomemercenary to Alphonfo: the place being well shaken with the great artillery, was taken (notwithstanding his strong situation) within fewe houres by the french, who executed by the Tword all that were found within it, except his three sonnes, and certaine others that retired into ahe Caltell, but made prisoners as soone as they saw the artillery planted: from thence the army marched to Mount S. John, a towne of the Marquesse of Piscaire, seated in the said Campagnia, sypon the confines of the kingdome: this towne, befides it was frong by nature and industry of rnen, yet it was well furnished with fouldiers to defend it, having in it three hundreth footemen ffraungers, and fine hundreth of the inhabitants well appointed for all daungers: In fo much as it was not thought pregnable, but by a hard and long fiege. But after the french men had fomewhat fearched the wals with their Canons, they gaue in the prefence of the King (then come from Vernue) so hot and violent assault, that vanquishing all difficulties, they tooke it by force the same day. And following their naturall fury, as also to warne others by this example not to be so obstinate to refult, they made lamentable flaughters, wherein sparing no fort of barbarous cruelty, they followed the defolation of the place with fetting fire on houles: a manner of making warre not vfed in Italy in many ages before, and therefore filled the whole realme with more generall feares and terrors: for, in Italy in all victories obtained in what order foeuer, the most extreame and last action wherein the Victor would stretch out his cruelty, was to difarme and spoile the fouldiers, & so let them go vanquished: and for towns taken by force, to put them to sack & pillage, and the inhabitants to ranfom, pardoning alwaies the life of men not flaine in the heat & fury of the fight.

This was all the refilfance, the paine, and impediments which the french King had to conquere to large, fo rich, and fo populous a kingdome: for the defence whereof, there was not flewed in any fort any vertue, any courage, any councell, any force, any faith, nor any defire of honor: for, after the Duke of Calabria, (after his going out of Rome, retired to the borders of the kingdome, audition thence called to Naples, by the flying of his father) had taken vpon him the authority and title of King, (but more with folemnities, then with pompe and ioyes accustlemed) and that he had affembled his army contayning fifty squadrons of horsinen, & fixe thousand footmen of choise, and led by the best reputed captains in Italy: he encamped him selfe at S. German, to stop the enemy for passing further, being drawn thither by the oportunity of the place, enuisoned on the one side with high & rough mountains, & on the other with a countrey ful of marshes.

and waters, and had in the front the river of Garillan, which the Auncients called Liri, albeit it was not fo deepe in that place, but at fome times it was passible at a foord, by reason whereof, and that the passage is very narrow and straight, they say with good reason that S. Germaine is one of the keys of the kingdome of Naples. He fent also bandes and troupes to the next mountaines to keepe the way of Cancella, but all was in vaine; and in these doings he did no other thing then keepe his minde in languishing, like as the Surgeon tormentes his patient by applying variety of medicines to a wound that refiftes all cures and remedies: for, his army already stricken with a generall terrour with the onely name of the french men, declared apparant tokens of pufullanimity and faintnesse: and the Captaines and leaders, partly tendring the safety of them selues and their owne estates, distrusting already of the defence of the kingdome, and partly defiring innouations and new things, began to waver no leffe in faith then in courage. Lastly, all the kingdonie being in infurrection, it was not without feare, that at their backes should happen some perillous disorder: Therefore councell giuing place to cowardize, and fraile feares ouerruling resolution and constancy of minde, understanding after the taking of Mount S. John, that the Mareshall de Gie was at hand with three hundreth launces, and two thousand footemen, they discamped with shame from S. Germaine, and retired to Capua with such confusion and seare, that they left by the way eight great peeces of artillery without guard, giving the enomy a meane to helpe forward their destruction with their owne weapons. This city, the new king (reposing much in the amity of the towne towards the house of Aragon, and in the throng seate of the place) he hoped to defend, and to keepe also Naples and Caierta, not making distribution of his forces to other places. The french men went after, but difperfed and out of order, marching more after the maner of trauellers, then like men of warre, and without all regard either to keepe under their enfignes, or to be ruled by the direction of their Captaines: they tooke liberty to goe where so euer they thought to finde pillage: and so neare was the encounter of these two armies, that one part of them most often lodged the nights in places where the Aragons were dislodged in the mornings: Neither in Capua was any greater demonstration of vertue or fortune, for that after Ferdinand had there bestowed his army, much diminished in numbers since the retraict from S. Germaine, he was fent for by letters from the Queene, expressing that since the losse of S. Germaine, there were such murmures and mutinies within Naples, as without his presence, there was manifest daunger of a generall tumult: for which cause he went thither with a small company, by his presence to give impediment to the perill present, promising to returne effloones to Capua the day following. Iohn lacques Trinulee to whom he had left the guard of the city, had secretly sent to the french King for a Herauld, to come under furety to speake with him, which being graunted, Trivulce with certaine gentlemen of Capua, went to Calui, where the fame day the King was entred: This did Trinulce, not with standing that many others of the city well disposed to keepe their faith to Ferdinand, did speake against it with many braue and haughty words: but being presented to the King all armed as he came in, he told him in the name of the Capuans and fouldiers, that they feeing their forces, defence, and strength, to faile in Ferdinand, whom they had faithfully serued whilest there remained any apparance of hope: were now come to make offer of their feruices to him, bringing mindes to follow his fortunes where fo euer he will employ then under honest conditions, adding withall, that he doubted not to bring him Ferdinand himfelfe, so that he would entertaine and acknowledge him as appertayned. The King made him this gracious aunswere, that he accepted the offers of the Capuans and the souldiers, as also the comming of Ferdmand should be no lesse welcome: onely that he should retaine no portion of the kingdome of Naples how little so euer it were, but that he would endue him with estates and honours in the realme of Fraunce.

Iohn Iacques Trinulce goeth to the french king.

It may be doubted with what manner of inducements this Triunlee, a Captaine valiaunt and particular in the profession of honour, was drawne to reuolt and leaue his King: Touching himfelfe, he affirmed, that he went by the will and direction of Ferdinand to folicite forne composition with the french, and being altogether excluded from all hopes, and the judgement manifest that the kingdome of Naples could be no longer defended by armes, he thought it not only lawfull, but also allowable to prouide at one time for the safety of the Capuans, and security of the foldiers; but the common opinion of menmade an other construction, referring his reuolt to a defire he had that the french King might be Victor, for that he hoped when he had made a conquest

of Naples, he would looke into the meanes by the which he might in like fort make him felfe maister of Myllan: in which city, he being borne of a most noble family, and because for the priuy fauours which the house of S. Senerin had with Lodowyke Sforce and with other occasions, he had not place according to his vertues and merites: he was wholly estraunged from Lodowyke. For those occasions many wise men judged, that he had councelled Ferdinand to proceede in the actions and service of Romania, more temperately then perhaps the occasions required: But in Capua, afore the returne of Truulce, all began to decline to revolt, the fouldiers had facked the pallace, armories, and stables of Ferdinand, the men at armos made divisions of them selves, and were bestowed in fundry quarters: and Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with their companies to the city of Nola, belonging to the saide Count by the donation of the Aragons, fending first to the french king to demand fafe conduct for them and their people. Ferdinand returned according to his word and promife, having somewhat appealed according to the time the humours of the Neapolitaines, by giving them hope of the defence of Capua: he was come within two miles of the city all ignoraunt of the chaunge that happened fince his departure: But the towne hearing of his returne and so neare approach, and the people wholly exclaiming against his reentry, drew into armes, and by a common voice and councell fent forth to meete him certaine of the nobility, to aduertise him to passe no further, for that the city sceing he had left it abandoned, that Truulce governour of the men of warre was gone to the french, his owne fouldiers had made a spoile of his pallace, and Virginio and the Count Petillane left them to their fortunes, and that almost all his army was broken: they were constrained for their proper safety to give place to the conquerour. With these newes no lesse heavy then troublesome, Ferdinand (after he had made vaine instance cuen with teares to be received) returnes to Naples, being well affired that the example of Capua would draw the refidue of the kingdome to reuolt, as the city of Auer/e scated betweene Capua and Naples, drawne into emotion dispatched present Embassadours to offer themselves to the french king: And the Neapolstanes consulting also manifestly to doe the like, the infortunate king determined not to refift fo obstinate a will of fortune, and therefore affembling vpon the place of the new castell many of the pobility and people he deliuered to them this last and lamentable speech.

I may call Godto witnesse and the consciences of all those men, that heretofore have had a- ,, The young ny information of my thoughtes and conceites, that no defire made me more to aspire to the saking Ferdicrowne, then to expresse to the world with what griefe I misliked the rigorous governments of " nand speake my father and grandfather, and with a recompence more iust and plausible to reclaime by moderation and benefites those heartes and affections which they had lost by their hard dealing, multitude, and cruelty: But the infelicity of our house would neuer suffer that I should receive this fruit, ,, which I esteeme more excellent and honourable then the kingdome it selfe: seeing that to be a King, is a thing that often times dependes upon fortune, but to be such a King as to turne all his ,, cares and endes to the welfare and felicity of his peoples, that dependes onely of him felfe and, his proper vertue. These bee hard tearmes in nature, to detect my parentes, and chalenge their a-,, butes to those, to whom nothing is more welcome then the occasion of reuenge, nor any thing ,, further off, then heartes and affections to forgive or forget. I could say enough to suffifie my ,, felfe, for that it is easie for innocents to finde wordes to speake, but seeing there is so little com-, parison between their offences past, and the merite of my innocency present, it were but in vaine, to vrge a hatefull temembrance of them, and yet nothing the more acquite you of the calamities ,, that approach: No, in cases of aduersity it is a better temperance to prouide for the ill that is ,, comming, then to amuse the time in complaintes against the Authors supposed, leauing the confideration of the cause to God, with whom no mortall creature hath familiarity in the vnderstanding and ordering of his iustice. I see our affaires suffer hard fortunes, and the extre-,, mity wherein they are falue is of that nature, that we may complaine more to haue lost the, kingdome by the infidelity and feares of our armies and Captaines, then our enemies can vaunt, to have wonne it by their proper vertue: And yet our forrune leaveth vs not alrogether withouthope, if we sustaine yet a little time, for that both by the King of Spame, and all the Princes, of Italie, is preparing a mighty fuccour, their eies being now opened that afore could not confi-, der, that the fire which burnes our realme must in like fort (without prouidence) cast his flames, into their seuerall estates: And for me, at the least, corage should not want to determine together, ethe kingdom and my life, both with that glory which becomes a yong king difeended by fo long fuccession of so many Kings, and also aunswering the expectation which hitherunto you have " had of my merites and vertues: But because things cannot be put to triall, without committing ce the common patrimony to desperate perill, I am determined rather to giue place to fortune, and « keepe hid my vertue, then in striuing to lose the kingdome, to be the causer of effectes contrary to athole ends for the which I have alwaies defired to be King. Therefore with teares I give you this « connell, that standing no more against the fury of the time, you fend with speede to make your accord with the french King. And to the end you may be in better power, to do it without staine co to your honours, I absolue you willingly of the homage and oath which you made to mea few daies past: wherein I exhort you according to the necessity of your fortune, not to defer your o-66 bedience, humility, and readinesse to receive him, as by that meanes to stay the course of your " proper aduerfities, and helpe to moderate the naturall pride of that nation. If at any time their barco barous customes and manners cause you to hate their rule and impery, and desire my returne, I will remaine in place apt to minister aide to your will, and be ready to offer vp my life for the re-"dreffe of your oppressions and harmes: But if their gouernment content you, this realmesshall ne-" uer receiue vexation or trauell by me, your well doing and benefite feruing as a perpetuall con-" folation to my miseries: and that so much the rather, if I may know that there remaine in you any " memory, that neither in the person of an eldest some to a King, nor in the power of a King, I have " done no wrong to any creature: My thoughts were neuer subject to motions of ambitio, my mind " neuer defiled with inclination to cruelty, mine owne finnes bring me not this affliction, but by a "dinine inflice I fuffer for the wickednesse of my parents: I am determined not to be the cause, that " either to preserve the realine, or to recover it, any subject of the same be oppressed: No, it is more " forrow to me to lose the meane to make amends for the transgressions of my parents, then to forcogoe the roiall dignity and kingdome it felfe: for, albeit I shall be estranged from you, and banished " from my patrimony, yet I will not hold my felfe altogether wretched, if to the memory of these things, you ioyne a stedfast beliefe, that I would have bene King rather like to old Alphonso my " great grandfather, thento Ferdinand, or the last Alphonfo. It cannot be that these words were de-" liuered without great compassion: but albeitthey wrought many forrowfull impressions in the harts of the hearers: yet, it did nothing to the stay of the tumult, so hateful was the name of the two last kings to the people, and so sweete the desire of the french gouernment to the nobility: he was no sooner retired into the castell, then the multitude began to sacke his paullions and hales then pitched in the place: which being an indignity farre vnworthy his merits, and more then he could endure, he returned with great courage to the place to drine them from the spoile, the maiesty and presence of a King being yet of such authority in a city rebelled, that the souldiers restraining their fury, euery one abstained from pillage: but as soone as he was returned to the castell, and had set on fire and funcke most of the shippes in the hauen (hauing no other way to depriue the enemy of them) he began by tokens certaine to doubt that the Lanceknights, which were the guard of the castell containing in number fine hundred, conspired to take him prisoner: and therefore the daunger being present, he vsed this sodaine councell, to give them his wardrobs, goods, and furnitures that were within the castell, and whilest they were busie to divide and share them, he slipt out of the castell by the gate of succours, delivering first out of prison all those Barons that had benerestrained by the cruelty of his father: he mounted vpon the light gallies that attended him in the hauen accompanied with Dom Federyke, and the old Queene wife to his grandfather, who caried with her lane her daughter: and being followed with very few of his people, he failed into the Ile of Y schia, called by the ancients Enaria, distant thirty miles from Naples. On his way, folong as his eies were fed with the prospect and fight of the kingdom, he made many repetitions with a pitifull voice of this verse of the Pfalme, That they watch in vaine which keepe the city, if it be not kept by the Lord. But finding now no more comfort of fortune, then when he was amidde the daungers of Naples, it fell to him to make triall of his vertue in Yichia, together with an experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of fuch as rife vp against those wretched persons that are perfecuted with fortune: for the Caltell keeper of the place refusing to receive him but with one man onely, he fell upon him with fuch furie, that what by his agilitie and valour, and the impression of a King and maiesty royall, he brought immediatly under his power both the castell and the keeper. This aduct fity albeit was much inferior to the loffe and prination of his kingdome; yetit afflicted him no leffe, then if the action had bene of higher moment, for that in all miseries >> nothing more mitigates the perturbations of the minde, then to remember that the greatest milhaps are past, as in forrowes, it is a speciall comfort to know the vttermost: But fortune is infi- » nite in her afflictions, and leaves no expectation of remedy where a ruine is determined, the fame making good the experience of the old faying, that to the man vnfortunat one ill neuer happeneth alone, but when they begin to fall they thunder all at once. After Ferdinand was gone >> out of Naples, every one gave way (as to a violent land-floud) to the onely name and renowne of the victors, and that with fuch cowardize, that two hundreth horsemen of Monsieur Lignies went to Nole, whither V reginio and the Count Petillane were retired with four hundreth men at armes, and tooke them priloners without refiltaunce: either they had confidence in the safe conduct that was graunted them, or elfetheir feares were no leffe then the others, feeing without triall or show of valour, they suffered them selves to be ledde captives to the rocke of Mondragon, and all their companies to fuffer pillage and spoile. In this meane while, the Embassadours whom the Neapolitanes had fent to prefent to the french king the keyes of the city, found him at Averse, from whence after he had accorded to them with great liberalities, many priviledges and exemptions, he went to Naples, and made his entrey the xxj. of February: he was received with The French generall reloying on all fortes, neither person, kinde, age, condition, quality, nor faction of men, king entreth iparing to runne to behold him, as if he had bene their patrone and first founder of the city: yea, "Maples. there was a plentifull and willing prefence of those, who either in them selues, or in their anneeflours, had bene rayled to honours and estates by the house of Aragon: with this affluence and concourse of people, after he had visited the great Church, he was led (because the new castel was vet to the enemies) to be lodged in the castell of Capua, the auncient resort and residence of the kings of France, having with a wonderfull course offelicity farre about the example of lulius Ce-(ar, rather vanquished then seene his enemy, and that with so ready fortune and facility, that during the whole expedition, he neuer had neede to display one paulion or tent, and much lesseto breake a launce. And touching helpes and provisions, he had so great plenty and superfluity, that his army at fea prepared with fo great expences, being caried by violence of weather into the Ile of Corfe, was fo long in approching the shoares of the kingdome, that the king had accomplished his conquest afore there was necessity of their service.

Thus by civill difcordes which fo long had blinded the Princes of Italy, to the great dishonor and fcome of the men of warre of that nation, and common daunger and ignominy of euery region of the fame, was transferred one of the most goodly and mighty parts of Italy, and of the Empire of Italy, to an Empire and government of a nation beyond the mountes: for, albeit old

Ferdinand was borne in Spaine, yet, for that from his youth he hadhis trayning in Italy, either king or the fonne of a king, and holding no other principality in any regionelle, where together that his fous and fonnes fonnes were bred vp in Naples: I may with good right approper them to the countrey, and call them Italians.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE

historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGUMENT.

HE Pysians continue their rebellion against the Florentynes: The french king takes the castels of Naples: The Pope, the Venetiuns and other Princes make league against the King; who returning into Fraunce is fought withall neare the river Taro: Ferdinand wins against Naples: Nonaro is besieged by the confederates: The king makes peace with the Duke of Alyllan, and returnes into Fraunce.

In the booke before have bene fet downe the foundacions of the french warres in Italy, both out of what fountaine they fprong, and with what course and motions they had their proceedings, even to an action of conquest farre above the memory and examples of all times and ages before. But as in all powers and causes naturall, this is a property infallible, to have their revolution by the same swist and violent returne, wherewith they did rife to their exaltation and fulnesses. So, the french king, rising with his felicity, into humours of security, saw the declination of his fortune and great triumphes, in the like measure and proportion of time by the which he aspired to them. And suffering together the privation of the kingdome, with the honour of his new conquest, he shewed him selfe more happy to get glory, then able to keepe it. Then whilest things went in this course at Rome and the kingdome of Naples; there kindled in an other part of Italy, sparkes of a little fire, wherein was nourished a smoothering heat, ordained to burst out to a great burning, to the hurt of many, but specially to the ruine of him, who, by too great a defire of dominion and rule, first kindled it and set it on flame: for, albeit the king was bound by the contract of Florence, that Pyla remayning in his hands till he had conquered the realme of Naples, the iurisdiction and revenues should be administred by the Florentynes: yet, at his departure, he had fet no order for the execution of his word and promife: in fo much that the Pyfans, prefuming much of the Captaines and fouldiers left by the king for the guard of the city, did determine no more to returne to the obedience of Florence. And therefore expulsing some of their officers and others that folicited there for the city, they made the refidue prisoners, with confiscation of all their goods, and confirmed wholly their rebellion, both by demonstrations and actions. In this revolt, to be the better able to continue it, they dispatched not onely Embassadours to the king to pray him of defence and protection to their doings, but also, for their stay and strength more affured, they recommended their caufe under many arguments of compaffion to the cities of Syena and Lucques, who, being auncient enemies to the name of Florence, could heare of nothing more to their liking and gladnesse, then of the reuolt of the Pysans, to whom in common they sent forthwith a proportion of money, and Syena apart furnished them with an ayde of horsmen. Inlike fort the Pylans fent Embassadours to Venice, to sound the willes of the Senate, of whom albeit they were graciously received, yet they brought away nothing but hopes doubtfull and vneertaine: But they reposed their chiefest confidence and foundation in the Duke of Myl-Lun, for that as he was the first breeder of their rebellion, so they hoped he would not faile to support them withfuccours, countenance and councell. The Duke, albeit he made other shewes and demonstrations to the Florentines, yet he folicited fecretly the confirmation of this revolt, and breathing courage into them with many offers, perswasions and promises, he communicated pre-fently with the Genoways, to furnish the Pylans with armor and munitions, and to fend to them a commissioner, with three hundred footmen. There hath bene ancient quarrell betweene the Flo- Two partiesrentines and Genoways, rifing at first by the conquest of Pyla, and continued by many degrees of larcan, es of displeasures, both for buying the port of Lynorne of their Duke Tomasim Fregosa which they postweene I lorice selled, and also the taking away of Pietra Santa and Serezana: The memory of these, ioyned to and the Genethe occasion offered, was sufficient to arme them with a wonderfull readinesse to do all things mays, that might annoy the Florentines: occupying euen already many of their places in the countrey of Luniquane, and were become Lords of the borders of Pietra Santa, vnder colour of a letter obtained from the french king for the restitution of certaine goods confisked. The Florent ines, complayning of these actions at Myllan, were aunswered by the Duke, that according to the contract and capitulations which he had with them of Genes, he could not well doe any thing to the restraint and impediment of them: And labouring to content them with wordes and diversity of hopes, he forbare not with a fludy more fecret and futtle, to practife and execute the contrary, as one that nourished an ambitious expectation to draw Pyla to his obedience, if the Florentines did not eftfoones recouer it, a thing much defired by him, no leffe for the quality of the city, then oportunity of the fituation. Neither was this defire new, but had bene nourished in him euer fince he was expulsed Myllan, a little after the death of Galeas his brother, for a lealousic which the Lady Bonne, mother and tutor to the little Duke had of him, at what time following many moneths upon the borders of Py/a, he cast many plottes and deuises to get the rule and impery of it: wherein, as touching the title, he was holpen with a record and meniory, that Py/a, afore it came The pretended into the intifdiction of the Florentines, had bene possessed by lohn Galeas Viscount, first Duke of title of the Myllan: by reason whereof, he thought it would be an increase of his glory, to recouer that which Duke of Mylhad bene possessed by his elders, and seemed that he might pretend a consour of right, in not making lawfull, that lohn Galeas might leave by testament (to the prejudice of the Dukes of Myllan his fuccessours) to Gabriell Maria his bastard some, the state of Pyfa, which he had gotten, (albeit with the treasures and armies of the Duchy of Myllan: the Pylans, not content to have drawn their city from the obedience of the Floreutines, fought to obtrude upon all the places and peeces of the generall de Mayne, all which for the most part (in a generall sturre examples may doe much) following the authority of the city, received their commissioners even in the first dayes of the rebellion, the Florentmes making no refillance in the beginning, for that they we're otherwise bufied in affaires of greater importance, not having as yet composed with the french king, and did perhaps expect that he would apply remedy to those harmes according to his bond protested by publicke and folemue oth. But finding his order too flow and lingring, and happily answering the care he made, they tent thither bandes and companies, who eftfoones recouered partly by force, and partly by composition, all that was occupied except Casine, Eruti, and Vicopisan, into which places the Pylans (being not firong enough to make refiftance against the whole) had withdrawne their forces. Touching the king, the doings of the Pyfans did nothing displease him, and much leffe was the manner of their proceedings difagreeing from the effate of his endes and purpofes: Their cause was apparantly fanoured of many of his court, induced perhaps by a compassion that they had bene straightly gouerned by the Florent mes, the same not with standing being more in opinion then in truth: But some of the chiefest both in his councels and of his court, under the occasion to pity the Pylane, objected them selves against the Cardinall of S. Mallo being wholly for the Florentines: of these was principall the Senethall of Beaucaire, with whom the money of the Pylans had much preuailed, but much more the discontentment he had of the greatnesse of the Cardinall, from whom (according to the variations of Court) he began to be estranged and separate, being moued with the felfe fame ambition to embafe him, with the which he had rayfed him in the beginning. These men not having respect to that which concerned the honor and promiled faith of fo great a king, perswaded that it agreed best with the profite and estate of his other enterprises, to keepe the Florentines in this necessity, and not to moderate the doings of the Pyfans, at the least till he had made perfect his expedition upon the realme of Naples. The king caried with these perswasions, framed him selfe to entertaine both the one and other party with seuerall hopes, and therefore whileft he remayned yet at Rome, he called for the Embaffadours of Florence to heare in his presence the complaintes made to him by the Pysans, for whom spake The coplaints Burgundio Loli Citizen of Py/a, and advocate of the confistory in the Court of Rome: he com- afore the plained bitterly that the Py/ans had bene holden foure feore yeares in such an yniust and cruell french king.

ce feruitude, that that city, which with many honourable victories heretofore had stretched out her " iurisdiction euen to the parts of Lenant, and had bene alwayes one of the most mighty and gloricous members of all Italy, was now by the feuerity and couetousnesse of the Florentines, come to ce her last desolation: That the towne of Pysa was almost made naked of inhabitants, for that the 🔐 most part of the naturall and free borne Citizens, not able to beare so heauy yokes, had willingly abandoned the place of their patrimony, possessions, and delightes, whose councell hath bin proec ued wife by the miseries of others, whom the loue of their countrey hath made to abide to serue cc as a wretched spectacle to all eyes of pity, conscience, or humanity. That they, for the great exactions of the Magistrates, and insolent robberies of persons private, were dispoyled almost of all ce their fubstance, and yet in no liberty nor way to nourish their liues, for that with a tyranny and consulting firange and barbarous, they were forbidden to manage trades of marchaundife, or to exercise any art except of the hand. They had no accesse or function in any office of quality, nor in the administration of the gouernment of Florence, no not in things which were transferred to ec persons strange and forraine: That the Florentines by many arguments exercised all forts of cruelcty against the health and benefite of their liues, and to have a more ready way to their generall destruction, they have of late yeares shaked off an auncient and necessary care to preserve the control bankes and cawfleys of the countrey of Py/a, maintained alwayes from age to age by the Lordes cof that countrey with no finall study, for that otherwaies it was impossible, (feeing the shallower neffe of the contrey, subject to inundations and water flouds) that they should not be every yeare or stricken with diversity of diseases: that by this decay, were made ruinate even flat with the earth, c Churches, Pallaces, with many honourable buildings both publicke and private, erected by their or predeceffours, with no little expence and charge: That it was no shame to particular cities or townes, if, after the raigne and course of many worldes they fell into seruitude, for that all morectall and earthly things beare their proper destiny and subjection to corruption: But the memory " of their nobility and greatnesse, alwaies disposed into the maiesty of a gouernment or common weale, ought to breede in the spirites of conquerours more compassion then rigour, chiefly euery co one having to confider, that it is not onely in the power of time, but also incident to the just course coand deffiny of earthly things, to bring upon them the felfe fame end which is ordained to happen co to all other Cities and Empires: That in the Pylans there rested no more, wherein the inhumani- ty and infatiable couetousnesse of the Florentines could be exercised with further scope: and therco fore the yoke of those burdens bearing a waight about their strength, and the variety of their miof feries fo infinite and intollerable, they had with one minde determined, rather to abandon their countrey, to give yp their lives, and to forbeare the vse, society, and delight of their goods, friends, and kindred, then to return eeftfoones vnder fo vniust, so tyrannous, and so vile a gouernment: ce befeeching laftly the king with teares (which he befought him to imagine to be the plentifull tears " of the whole people of Py/a miscrably prostrate at his feete) to remember that with the same piece ty, with the fame iuffice, and with the fame religion and confcience, he had reftored them to that « liberty, of the which they had bene fo vniuftly dispoyled: he would effoones as a Prince reform " lute and constant, defend and keepe them in the fame benefite, seeing the election was more honoarable, more godly, more worthy his name and greatneffe, to beare the name of the father and de-« liuerer of this city fo ancient and innocent, then in redeliuering it vp into a feruitude fo wretched, to become the infamous minister of the robberies, oppressions, and tyrannies of the proud Florentines. To these accusations aunswered, with no lesse vehemency, Frauncis Soderyn Bishop of Volterre, afterwards made Cardinall, and at that time one of the Embassadours for Florence: "He shewed that the title of his common weale was just, for that they had bought Py/a in the yeare teth thoje complaint. " 1404, of Gabriell Maria Viscount the lawfull Lord, by whom they were no sooner put in possesfion of their purchase, then the Pylans redeliuered themselues by force: By which occasion they were driven to feeke to conquere it by a long warre, whose end was no lesse prosperous, then the so occasion was just, and no lesse praiseworthy the humanity of the Florentines, then the victory coglorious: for that having in their discretions to perish all the people of Py/a (languishing already es with hunger) when they entred with their army into the city, they brought with them a greater committy of victuals then of weapons: and fo in place to take away their lines by inftlaw of conacquest and victory, they breathed new lives with their refreshing and victuals, into bodies miseracible and not worthy of life: That the city of Py/a at no time had obtained any greatnesse in the

firme land, and much lesse had bene able in power to winne forraine and straunge peeces, seeing >> they could neuer make them felues Lordes ouer Lucques, a city communicating with them in >> neare neighbourhood and borders: but they stood alwaies restrained and inclosed in a straight >> territory, not feeking to make their fortune greater then was their vertue. And for their power at » fea, neither hath it bene so mighty as there is left any monument of it, nor of such continuance as " it hath any prescription of time: for that, by the just judgement of God, whom they had proudked by many actes of prophane impiety, and for a scourge of the long civill discordes amongst » them selves, it was long time before the purchase of the Florentins, salue from all estate and greatnesse, drayned of all wealth and habitants, and at last reduced to such a naked weaknesse, that one >> lacques d'Appian a simple notary of the countrey, was of power to make him selfe Lord ouer " them, leaving the city and territory as a fuccession to his children: That the land and countrey of » Pyla was of little importance to the Florentines, except for the oportunity of the fituation, and " conveniency of the sea, seeing the revenues that were drawen from thence were of little consideration, the exactions being to easie and light, that they exceede very little the necessary expences, » and yet the most part were leuied vpon marchant strangers, and by the meane of the port of L_{γ} norne. That touching trade of marchandise, artes, and offices, the Pysans were not bound with 12 other lawes, then did regulate all other cities subject to the Florentines, who, acknowledging to " liue vnder a moderate and easie pollicy, had no desire to chaunge Lordes, not having in deede that oblinacy and pride of mind which is naturall in the Pylans, nor yet infected with a difloialty " so notorious, as it is made generall and famous by the auncient prouerbe of all Tuscane. And al- >> beit, fince the Florentines had gouernment in Pyfa, fundry of the Citizens tooke a willing banish- » ment : yet it concludes nothing against the Florentines, but detectes inftly their owne proud sto- >> mackes and impacience, bearing no mindes to accommodat them selues to their owne forces nor » fortune. And much leffe that under the government of the Florentines, Pyfa is diminished either >> in treasure or inhabitants, seeing on the contrary they have at a great charge recovered the haven » of Lyuorne, without the which their city would be no leffe vnprofitable then inconvenient. They » haue also introduced the publicke study of all sciences, together with many other benefites, and » lastly, diligently continued the reparations of the banckes, the better to replenish them with in- " habitants. The truth of which things did shine with too cleare a light, then that the clouds of false " complaints were able to ouershadow and darken it: he saide it was suffered to every one to de- >> -fire to aspire to a better fortune, but withall it was an office iust in all inferior degrees to beare » without grudging the ordinance and sentence of their lot: otherwise there would be confusion » of all Empires and governments, if it were suffered to every one that is subject, to aspire to liber- » ty. Lastly he told the king that to the Florentines, it was neither necessary nor any way apper- >> taining to their office, to perswade Charles a Christian king of Fraunce what he had to doe, for " that being a Prince wife and just, they doubted not that he would fuffer him felfeto be caried by " fo vaine complaints and flaunders: that of him felfe he would remember him felfe of his promife " made afore his army was received into Py/a, together with his word and oath of a king published folemnly at Florence, for that by how much a king is mighty and great, by fo much is it more me- >> ritorious and glorious to him to vie his power and greatnesse for the preservation of his faith and » iustice. The king hearing the differences thus disclosed by both the Embassadours, bare an in- " clination partiall to the Pylans, and wished that during the warre of Naples, there might be a furceasing of armes betweene the two parties, or at least that the Florentines would confent that he might hold the whole countrey, affuring them that as foone as the conquest of Naples were accomplished, he would make perfect all his promises given at Florence. This the Florentines refufed, holding even now for suspected all the kings words, and yet they forbare not with great constancy to presse him to keepe his promise: wherein, to make show that he would satisfie them (his intention in deede being to have of them before the time lxx. thousand duckats which they had promifed him) he dispatched at the same instant he departed from Rome, the Cardinall of S. Mallo as Embaffador to Florence, making as though he fent him thither to fatisfie their demands: But in fecret he charged him, that nourithing them with hopes till they had made payment of the money, he should leave things in the same estate: of which shift of time, albeit the Florentines made sufficient doubt, yet they aduaunced xl. thousand duckats afore the tearme, which as soone as the Cardinall had received, he went to Pyfa, promising to recontinue the possession of the estate to the Florentines: But he made a speedy returne without any effect of his promise, and lesse anfwering the expectation of them of Florence, afore whom he excufed him felfe by the obstinacy of the Pyfans, and that being not able of him felfe to dispose them, his authority was leffe sufficient to constraine them, having no expresse commission from the King. Lastly it was not conuenient for him being of holy profession, to take or follow any councell whereon might rise effusion of Christian bloud: yet he bestowed a new garrison within the new Citadell, and had done the like in the old castell, if he could have got the consent of the Pysans, who grew daily more and more in courage and forces by the fecret helping of the Duke of Myllan, who judging it necessary, that there should be within Py/a a greater strength, and a leader of experience & valour, had sent to the (couering him felfe not with standing as he was wont with the name of the Genomays) Luke Mawezze, with new bands and companies. And letting paffe no occasion that might keepe the Florentines in businesse, the better to hold them from offending the Pysans, he entertained into pay in common with the Siennoys, lacques d'Appian Lord of Plombyn, and lohn Sauelle, the rather to encourage the faid people of Sienna to defend Montpulcian, a place newly revolted from the Florentines and accepted by them of Sienna, without having regard to the confederation which they had together. At the fame time also the Florentines were in no leffe care and trauell for sodaine businesse newly happened within the city: for immediatly after the King was departed from Florence, the better to reestablish their gouernment, they had in their parliament (which in their cuflome is a congregation affenibled of all the Citizens in the place before the towne house, who deliberat with free voice vpon matters propouded by the great Magistrat) instituted a kind of pollicy, which, under the name of a government popular tended in many things, more to the power of a few, then of cuery one in generall: The which being grieuous to many, who fashioned in their mindes a greater liberty, and having the private ambition of some one of the principall Citizens concurring, there was necessity to dispute vpon a new forme of government, wherein as it was commoned ypon one day amongst the principall Magistrates and persons of greatest reputation, Paule Anthony Soderyn, a Citizen, wife and much respected, deliuered his opinion in this sort.

Albeit the estate popular is lesse esteemed then that wherein things are referred to one alone, derinteals. "ent and almost naturall in this city, and the conditions and estate of our Citizens are equally proing a forme." portioned, which is a peculiary ground of conditions and estate of our Citizens are equally pro-" portioned, which is a necessary ground of popular governments: I might maintaine by easie and ment for Flo-" reasonable discourse, that it ought to be preferred before all other, were it not that the disputati-"tion would be superfluous, seeing in all our assemblies since the parliament, it hath bene alwaics Caufes of po-" determined by a confent univerfall, that the city should be governed in the name and with the authoriry of the people: But the diversity of opinions is risen vpon this, that certaine particulars, in things ordained in the Parliament, sceke to come neare and resemble that forme of common ec weale, under the which the city was gouerned before our liberty was oppressed by the family of ce the Medicis and others, (of which number I confesse I am) supposing that the government so ceftablished, bare in many things rather the name then the effectes of a pollicy popular, and feace ring the accidents which often happen by like gouernmentes, defire a forme more perfect and comore regarding the preservation and protection of the concord and surety of the Citizens: A thing which neither by reason, nor experience of times passed, can be hoped for in this city, but ce vinder a gouernment depending altogether upon the power of the people, so that it be well and ce duely ordained and regulated, which thing confiftes principally in two foundations: The first is, se that all ministrations and offices as well in the city as through the whole demeane, be given (for cc a certaine time) by a councell vniuerfall, which according to our lawes may participate in the gocucrnment; without the approbation of which councell, new lawes can not be established: By ce this meane, not being in the power of Citizens private, nor of any particular faction or intellice gence to distribute dignities and authorities, no man shall be excluded by passion or partiality co of others, but offices shall be bestowed according to the vertues and merites of men: And verec tue bearing this property to transferre dignities to those persons to whom her selfe is conjoyned, ce it will be a meane and encouragement to enery one to strine by his vertues and good partes, with ce the aide publicke and private, to open his way to honours and reputation: it shall be necessary ce that every one abstaine from vices, and for beare to hurt one an other, and finally eschew both the ce fludy and action of all hatefull things in a city well instituted. And it can not be in the power of one or a few to introduce with new lawes, or with authority of a Magistrate, an other gouernment, this being not to be chaunged, but by the will and prinity of the councell vinuerfall. The fecond ground is, that the deliberations and councels of importaunce, fuch as apportaine to peace and warre, to the construing and examination of new lawes, and generally to all things necessa-,, ry for the administration of such a city or empire, be managed by Magistrates particularly ap-,,, pointed to that charge, and by a councell more private compounded of wife and experienced citizens to be deputed and ordained by the councell popular: for that the knowledge and judge-,,, ment of fuch affaires, falling not familiarly into the vnderstanding of cuery one, it is never flary they be gouerned by fuch as are capable of them, and requiring oftentimes diligence and fecreey, they ,, are not to be confulted or communicated with the multitude, as not being necessary for the preferuation of the publicke liberty, that fuch things be handled in too great audience and company, ,, feeing the liberty is affured as often as the diffribution of Magistracies, and deliberation of new lawes, depend of the vniuerfall confent. These two foundations thus laide, you have a true popular gouernment ordained, the liberty of the city grounded, and a perpetuall and commenda-,, ble forme of common weale confirmed. There bee many other things which tend to make this, gouernment more perfect, but they are referred more conveniently to an other time, to the end ,, not to confound in this beginning the mindes of men, which both infpicious by the memory of ,, tyrannies palt, and not accustomed to manage gouernments free, can not wholly know all things ,, necessary to be ordained for preservation of the liberty: and there bethings, which for their little importance and confideration, may without daunger be differred vntill a time more apt, and bet-,, ter occasion. No doubt, the Citizens will embrace more and more this forme of common weale, ,, and being by experience, made daily more capable of the truth, they can not but defire that their ,, gouernment be polished and brought to his full perfection: Neither can it but be sustained and ", holden vp by these two soundations, which, how casic it is to lay and establish, and what sruite ", they bring, is not to be proued onely by many reasons, but also appeares plainely by examples: ,, for, albeit the gouernment of the Venetians standes properly vpon gentlemen, those gentlemen, yet are no other then Citizens private, and what for their numbers, so many, and for their condi-,, tions fo diuerfe, it can not be denied, that it doth not much participate with a gouerment popular,,, although in many things it can not be imitated of vs: and yet it is principally founded you thele,, two pillers and bases, by the which having bene continued by many ages, together with a liberty, ,, vnity, and concord civill, it is rifen to the glory and greatnesse which the world feeth. The vnity,, and strength of the Venetians hath not growen as many suppose, by their situation, for that in the ,, fame may be and haue bene many discordes and seditions: but it hath proceeded for that they ,, had a forme of pollicy fo well forted and proportioned to it felfe, that necessarily it brought forth, precious and wonderfull effectes, agreeable to the firme and found foundations. Our owne ex-,, amples ought to moue vs no lesse then straungers, if we consider in the contrary, that because our,, city had neuer a forme of gouernment like vnto this, it was the cause that our estate and affaires,, haue bene so subject to ordinary mutations, sometimes troden under feete by the violence of ty-,, rantes, and sometimes rent and dismembred by the ambitious and couctous discordes of certaine particulars, and sometimes confounded by the vnbridled liberty of the communalty. Infomuch, that where cities were built for the rest and happy life of the inhabitantes, our tranquillity, our fe-,, licities, and our ioyes have bene the confifcation of our goods, with banishment and execution of ,, our miserable Citizens. The gouernment brought into the Parliament, different not from the pollicies heretofore ordained in this city, which being all infected with discordes and calamities, after ,, infinit trauels both publicke and private, they finally ingendred tyranines, like as in the time of our aunceftors; for none other then these occasions, the Duke of Athens oppressed the liberty, and in , the times succeeding, Como de Medicis followed his example, whereof it is not to be maruelled: for, when the distribution of Magistracies, and deliberation of the lawes, have not community with the common consent, but depend woon the arbitration of the leffer number: then the Citizens not carefull of the publicke benefite, but feeking their profites and endes private, rife into sectes and conspiracies particular, whereunto are joyned the diusions of the whole city; a plague ,, most certaine to all common weales and Empires: So that it can not but be a better discretion ,, to eschew those formes of government, which by reasons, and examples in our selves we finde to be huttfull, and draw neare to those pollicies which with the reasons and examples of others, we

"discerne to be wholsome and happy. And thus much I take boldnesse to auouch (the truth and 65 fincerity of the matter much enforcing me) that the pollicy of our city running alwaies in that " order that a few Citizens shall have an vinneasured authority, will prove to be a government of "afew tytants, who will bee so much more daungerous then one tyrant alone, by how much the "ill is great, and hurts more, by how much it is multiplied: And if there should bee none other "ill or mischiefe at all, yet at least wife, what for the diversity of opinions, and for the ambition and "different concrousing field of men, there could be no expectation of long concord: and discord, as "it is hurtfull in all feafons, fo it would be most daungerous at this time, wherein you have fent in-"to exile one so mighty a Citizen, and wherein you stand depriued of one of the principallest parts " of your effate . And lastly, Italy having even in her heart and intrals forraine armies, stands on " all fides entironed with manifest perill: albeit very feldome or possible, neuer it hath bene abso-" lutely in the power of all the city to put order to it felfe according to our owne liking, yet feeing "by the goodnesse of God you have that power, lose not the occasion to institute a free gouern-" ment, and fo well erected, that not onely you shall be made happy by it whilest you liue: but also "may promife the fame to your posterity, and leave as an inheritance to your children such a trea-"fure and felicity, as your ancestours never had nor knew.

To the contrary of this, did reason Guid Anthoni Vefpueci, a lawyer notable for his judgeopinion reaso- ment, and no lefte singular for his facility and sharpnesse of wit: If the government (saith he) inneth Guids " Or The Language of the state of Anth, Vef. a flittled in the forme of Paul Anthony Soderyn, would as eafily bring forth the fruits that are defi-" red, as he hath liberally recounted them: fure we should shew great corruption in judgement, " reason, and discretion, if we would wish to our countrey any other fort of pollicy, & right vnwor-"thy should we seeme of the reputation and benefits of good Citizens, if we would not embrace a "forme of a common weale wherein the vertues, merites, and valours of men, should be about all other things honored and recompensed. But I can not fee how it may be hoped that a gouern-" ment put wholly in the power of the pepole, can bring forth formany benefites: feeing no man "doubts but it is a leffon in reason, a triall in experience, and an aurhority confirmed by great men, "that in fo great a multitude can not be found that discretion, that experience, nor that order, as may " be promifed that they will preferre the wife afore the ignorant, the good afore the ill, and the ex-"perienced afore fuch as neuer knew what it was to manage affaires: for, like as of a judge inca-" pable andignorant, can be no expectation of judgements righteous and just: fo, in a people full of confusion and vanity, is no hope (but at aduenture) of election or deliberation wife or reasona-" ble: That which in publicke gouernments, wife men and fuch as follow the fludy of no other af-" faires, can hardly differne, let vs neuer believe that a multitude vnexperienced, ignorant, com-" pounded offo great diversity of spirites, of conditions and customes, and wholly given to things "that concerne them particularly, can diffinguish and know it: Besides, the immoderat perswasion "that every one will have of him felfe, will kindle in every one a covetoufneffe of honors, not fuffi-" cing to men in popular gouernment to enjoy the honest fruites of liberty, but they will aspire all " to the degrees principall, and feeke to have place in the councels of things of most importance and " hardnesse, for that lesse in vs then in any other city, raigneth the modelly to give place to such as "know most, and deserve best: And so nourishing our selves with perswasion that of right we ought to be all equall in all things (the power refting in the multitude) places of vertue, valour, and merit will be confounded, and this couctous nesses stretched out into the greatest part, will bring to " passe that such may doe most as know least and merite lesse, for that being most in number, they " will have most power, opinions being rather counted then considered. These things well waighed, what affurance is there, that contenting with the forme which now you would bring in, they would not immediatly fall to diforder, and confound with inventions new and lawes undifcreete which wife men could not refiff, the waies to gouerne a common weale which had bene wifely " deliberated and established: which things being dangerous at all times in such a fort of common weale, would bring farre more perill at this prefent, feeing it is the nature of men when they come " out of one extremity wherein they have bene holden by force, to runne with a swift course to an other extremity without flaying in the middeft: even fo, men drawne out of a tyranny, if they be " not reftrained, run headlong into an ynbrideled liberty, which justly may be called a tyranny : becaufe in the feactions a people and multitude is like to a tyrant when he giveth where is no caufe " of merite, and taketh from him that hath well deserued, confounding the degrees and distinctions of persons, yea haply their tyrannie is so much the more hurtfull, by how much their ignorance, (containing neither waight, measure, nor law) is greater then the malignitie, which yet perhaps, is gouerned by some rule, with some bridle, or subject to some limit: We ought not much to,, be moved with the example of the Venetians, for that in their behalfe the fituation makes some-,, thing, and the forme of gouernement received of long time may do much, togither with the or-,, der and disposition of things ruled in such fort, that the councels of importance rest more in the ,, power of a few then of many, and their spirites happily not being by nature so suttle as ours, they ,, are more easie to be kept quiet and contented. Besides, the pollicie of the Venetians standes not ,, onely vpon the two foundations that have bene confidered, but for their perfection and firme-,, neffe it importes much that they have a Duke perpetuall, with many other ordinaunces, which,, who would introduce into this common weale, should feeme to bring in innouations, and finde,, many refistaces, seeing our citie takes not now her being, nor at this present the first time of her institution: and therefore auncient cultomes impugning often times common profit, and men fu-,, specting that under collour of preservation of the libertie, there would be raysed a new tyrannie, ,, wholesome councels will be of litle force, euen as in a body infected and replenished with ill hu-,, mours, medicines are not of that seruice, as in a body purged: for which reasons, and for the na-,, ture of humane things which commonly go impairing, it is more to be feared, that that which in ,, this beginning shall be imperfectly ordained, will be wholly disordered with time, then to hope,,, that by time and with occasions, it may be reduced to perfection: we have examples of our own, ,, and neede not the iustification of authorities and experiences of others: for, at what time hath the people gouerned absolutely this Citie, that it hath not bene full of discordes, that it hath not suf-,, fered deformitic and difmembring, and laftly that the flate hath not immediatly chaunged? And ", if we stand so much upon the examples of others, why do we not remember, that the gouerne-,, ment wholly popular, bredin Rome so many tumultes, that had it not bene for the science, diligence, and discipline of warre, the life of that common weale had bene short. Let vs remember, ,, that Athens a most florishing and mighty Citie, lost not for other occasion her Empire, and so fell, into feruitude of the Citizens and straungers, then for that they did dispose of great affaires with ,, the deliberations and councels of the communaltie. But I fee not for what occasion it may be fayd, that in the forme introduced in the Parliament the libertie is not there wholly found, feeing ,, all things are referred to the disposition of Magistrates, and they not perpetuall, but changing, are ,, not elected offew, but approved of many, and ought according to the auncient cultonie of the citie, to be referred to the arbitrement of the lot: then they can not be distributed by factions, or by ,, the appetite of Citizens particular: we shall have a farre greater assurance whe the affaires of most, importance shall passe by the examination and direction of the most wife, the most practised, and,, most graue men, who are to manage and gouerne them with an other order, an other secrecie,,, and an other judgement, then would be expressed in a multitude or communaltie incapable of ,, fuch things, fornetimes when is least neede, prodigall in expences, and eftfoones in businesse, great and waightie, so sparing and restrained, that often times for fauing a very litle, they fall into ,, great expences and daungers, euen as men that leaping ouer a great blocke, stumble vpon a litle, Atraw. Indeede as P. Anthoine hath fayd, the infirmitie of Italie, & particularly of our countrey, ,, is great and of no litle confideration, euen fo the folly is fo much the greater, when having neede of ,, Philitions experienced and wife, we will put our bodies into the hands of fuch as haue least skill, and discression. Lastly, you have to consider that you shall maintaine your people in greater rest, ,, and leade them most easily to councels wholesome both for them selues, and to the benefite of,, cuery one, in giuing them in the common weale a moderate part and authoritie, feeing if you re-,, ferre all things to their arbitration, there will be daunger that they will become infolent and whol-,, ly disagreeing from the councels of your wise, carefull, and affectioned Citizens.

In this councell, whereunto was not admitted the great number of Citizens, the adulfe then tending to a forme of gouernement not fo large and popular, had caried it, if amongest the deliberations of men, there had not bene mixed authoritic diuine, pronounced by the mouth of leronmo Sauonarola a Religious man of the order of Frier Preachers, This man having bin continu- I eronimo Sa. roumo Sauonarola a Religious man of the order of triet reachers, this matter and having wonarola effect ally exercised for many yeares in the publike preaching of Gods word at Florence, and having wonarola effect all years in the published for a Troioyned to his fingular doctrine, a generall brute of holinesse of life, had gotten in the opinion of the in Floa most part of the people, the name and authoritie of a Prophet: for that at times wherein in Italie rence, was no other apparance in mans reason, then of common tranquillitie, would in his Sermons Prophecie of the comming of forreine armies, with fo great aftonishment of men, that neither walls nor campes were able to refift them: which things with many others of other nature, he would affure that he did not foretell by discourse humane, or knowledge of the Scriptures, but fimplie did foresee them by reuelation divine: In these wonders and warnings he would fometimes touch the mutation of the state of Florence: at that time he detested publikely the forme of gouernement agreed vpon in the Parliament, affirming that it was the will and pleasure of God, that they diderect a pollicie mearely popular, in fuch fort that there should not be power in a few Citizens to alter neither the furetie nor the libertie of the refidue: in fo much that for the reuerence of one of fo great a name, ioyned to the defire of many, fuch as were of the other opinion, should no be able to refult so great an inclination. Therefore this matter being many times propounded and debated, it was lastly determined, that there should be made a councell of all the Citizens, wherein should have no accesse (so it was spread in many places in Italie) the dregges of the people, but onely fuch as by the auncient lawes of the Citic might participate in the gouernement. In this counsell should not be handled, nor they should not dispose of other things, then of the election of all the Magistrats for the Citie & for the demeane, and of the confirmation of prouisions of money, together with all the lawes ordained before by the Magistrats & other councels more private and fraite. And to the end that the occasions of civil discordes should be taken away, and the spirits of every one the more assured, it was prohibited by decree publike according to the example of the Anemens, not to remember the errours and transgreffions committed in the times past in the affaires of cstate: vpon which foundations, might perhaps have bene constituted a government well regulated and established, if at the same time they had introduced all the ordinaunces which then came into the confideration of wife men; but fuch things being not able to be deliberated without the confent of many who for the memory of things pall were full of suspitions: it was judged and determined that for the present, the grand councell should be established, as a ground and foundation of the new libertie, referring to accomplish that which wanted vntill a better oportunitie of time, and vntill (by the meane of experience) the publike vtilitie should be knowne of such as had no capacitie to know it by reason and judgement this was the course and condition of the affaires of Tuskane. But in this meane while, the French king, after he had with a readie fortune conquered the Citie of Naples, to giue a full perfection to his victorie, he had principally to looke to remoue two impediments: The one how he might get new Castell, and the Castell of the egge, which are two fortresles of Naples, holding good yet for Ferdinand, but for the towne of S. Vincent, builded for the gard of the hauen, he had it without much refulance: his other confideration was, how he might reduce the whole kingdome to his obedience. In which two things fortune still followed him with a full fayle of her fauours; for, new Castell, the habitation of the kings builded vpon the banke or shoars of the sea, by the couetousnesse and cowardize of fine hundred Launceknights holding garrison there, was rendred, with condition that they might depart in fafetie with all the goods and moueables they were able to carie: In this Castell was found great quantities of vitualls, whereof the king without confideration to that might happen, made prodigall liberalities to certaine of his owne people: And touching the Castell called the egge, built within the seavpon a rocke, afore times parcell of the firme land, but now deuided from it by the operation of Lucullus, was joyned with a narrow bridge to the next brinkes or shoares of Naples: they within the rocke, feeing them selues battered without ceasing with a perpetuall furie of the artillerie, which might well shake the walls, but nothing moue the rocke, agreed to yeeld vp the place, if within eight dayes they were not fuccoured. The Barons also and governours of the communalties, would go many dayes journeyes to meete the French Captaines and companies of fouldiers fent into fundrie partes of the Realme: whose example in yeelding, and the humanitie and inclination of the French in receiuing them, bred such a generall minde of revolt in Cities, fortes, and peeces particular, that almost all the places of strength were rendred by those that kept them, either with no refistance at all, or at least without perill or difficultie: yea the rocke of Caietta not withstanding it was made strong with men, virtuals, munition, and things necessarie for defence, yet after a few light assaultes, it yeelded to the discression of the victors. This selicitie of the king followed with so full streame, that within a very few dayes, and with a wonderfull facilitie, all the kingdome was brought brought into his obedience, except the Isle of Yschia, the Castels of Brondussia and Galipoly in Powylla, and in Calabria the rocke of Reggi, situate in the point of Italie right ouer against Sicile, the Citie holding for the king: and except also Turpia and Mantia, who in the beginning displayed the banners of Fraunce, but resuling to line under the subjection of other then the king, who had already disposed them to certaine of his fauorits, they chaunged councell, and returned to their first Lord. The like was done within a litle time after by the Citic of Brondusia, to the which the French king having fent no men, but vling negligence where was necessitie of care and councell, did scarcely heare their Magistrates sent to him to Naples to capitulate: by which occasion ioyning with the oportunitie offered, those that kept the Castels in the name of Ferdinand, had good meane by perswasions to draw againe the Citie to the deuotion of the Aragons: by which example allo, the Citie pf Otrante lately declared for the French, and no creature fent thither to receive them, continued not long in their affection: All the Lordes and Barons of the Realme (except Alphonso Danalo Marquis of Pisouire, who left within new Castell by Ferdsnand, was gone to him when he perceived the inclination of the Launceknights to yeeld: and except two others, who (for that the French king had given away their estates, were fled into Sicile) came to do homage to the new king: who, defiring to affure wholly fo great a conquest by the way of concord, called afore him under fafeconduit afore he had wonne the rocke of the egge, Dom Federike, who, aswellfor that he had remained many yeares in the Court of Fraunce in the time of the kings father, as also for that he touched his Maiestie in parentage, was much fauoured of all the Lordes of Fraunce. The king told him, he would indue Ferdinand (leaving all that was The Frech king his in the Realme of Naples) with estates and large revenues in Fraunce: And touching him, to makes offers to recompence him liberally with all that he possessed there . But Federike, well knowing that his ne- Dom Federike phew was determined to accept no condition, except he might have Calabria, aunswered with a countenance of humilitie and reuerence, and wordes graue and wife: That feeing God, forunfwereththe tune, and the good wills of men have concurred in his present selicities, to give him the kingdome king. of Naples, Ferdinand was not determined to make relistance against so fatalla disposition, but, rather effecting it no shame to give place to a king so happie and mighty, he would no lesse then others, remaine in his obedience and deuotion, fo that his Maieltie would contribute to him fome part of the kingdome (touching Calabria by a fectet meaning) to the end that dwelling therein not as a king, but in the condition of one of his Barons, he might honour the elemencia and magnanimitie of the French king, in whose feruice he hoped to haue once occasion to shew that vertue which his malicious fortune would not fuffer him to expresse in the action of his owne fafetie: That, nothing could turne more to the glorie of king Charles then that councell, bearing refemblance and affinitie with the councels of those kings whom antiquitie doth so much recommend vnto vs, who, by fuch operations had rayled their names to immortalitie, and eltablished amongst peoples and nations, diuine honours: That, it was a councell no leffe for his furctie then for his glorie; for that Ferdinand brought to his deuotion, the Realme would be affureal to him, that he should not hereafter feare the chaunge of fortune, who had this common propertie: that as often as victories were not affured with moderation and discression, she would defile by some accident vnlooked for , the vertue and reputation of the glorie gotten. ,, But the king doubting that if he communicated any part of the kingdome with his competitor, he should open a way to manifest perill for the residue, Dom Federike parted from him without any thing doing. Ferdinand, vnderstanding of the rendring of the Castels, sayled into Sicile with fourteen light gallyes slenderly appointed, wherein he passed from Naples: This he did to be ready vpon all occasions, leaving the gard of the rocke of Y schia to lanicke Daualo brother to Alphon/o, bothmen of great vallour, and of fingulat faith towardes their Lord. But the French king, to take from the enemie that receptable very convenient to trouble the Realine, fent thither his armie by sea, which arrived at length in the port of Naples, and finding the towne abandoned, they forbare to affayle the rocke, wherein, for his innincible strength by situation, they discerned many impossibilities to prevaile: And therefore, to give a greater helpe to heir vertue, the king The Frich king description of the strong health and armie description of the strong health and armied health and armied health and armied health and armied health armied health and armied health armied health and armied health determined to affemble all the vessels of Provence and of Genes, to take Yschia, and affure the fea to invade Yswhich Ferdinand vexed fometimes: But their councell and diligence were not equal to their for- chatune, seeing, according to the infirmitie of all their doings, all things had a slow proceeding, and were guided in most great negligence and confusion: for, the French king turning the prosperitie of his affaires to serue his vanities, his companies in like fort, by so great selicitie became more infolent then of cultome, and let go at aduenture the affaires of importance, not receiving into their thoughts any other impression then of feasting and pleasures: and such as were great in the councels and fauours of the king, cared not but for their owne particular, and to draw of the victory all the profit they could, without respecting the dignitie or vtilitie of their Prince.

The death of Turke, kept in refuge by the Pope.

About this time died at Naples Gemyn Otto to the great displeasure of the king, who layed up Gemyn Octo a in him many foundations and oportunities for the war he determined to make against the Empire of the Turkes. It was beleeued his death was brued in a cup of poyfon, which the Pope had given him, to worke his end in a certaine time: or that having delivered him against his will, and so depriued of the fortie thousand duckats which his brother payed him yearely, he tooke for consolation that he that had take him away, should receive by him no commoditie or profit: or at least for enuy he bare to the glory of the French king: or lastly for feare, that things succeeding happily with him against the Infidels, he would afterwardes turne his thoughts to reforme the abuses of the Church, which being wholly aliened from the auncient deuotion, cultomes, and pietie, made euery day of lesse authoritie the Religion of Christ, euery one withall having an assured expectation that they would further decline before the end of his raigne, which being gotte by wicked meanes, was haply neuer in the memorie of ma administred with worse orders: And there were that beleeued(for the corrupt nature of the Pope made credible in him all wickednesse) that Baiazet after he vinderstood that the French king prepared to passe into Italie, practised with him by the meane of George Bucciardin corrupted with money, to oppresse the life of Gemyn: And yet the king nourishing still his inclination to the warres of the Turkes (more vpon a greene humour of youth and volubilitie of mind, then by maturitie of councell) ceased not for his death to fend into Greece the Archbishop of Duraz, of the nation of Albania, who put the king in hopes by the meane of certainefactions of the banished, and other vaine intelligences, to stirre vp some commotion in that prouince: But new accidents constrained him to turne his spirits to new thoughts.

Lodo . Sforce beginneth too late 10 feare she greatnesse. of the French.

It hath bene set downe before, how the desire to vsurpe the Duchie of Myllan, joyned to a fearethat Lodomyke Sforce had of the Aragons and Peter de Medicis, induced him to procure the French king to passe into Italie, by whose comming after he had obtained his ambitious pretence, and that the Aragons were brought into those necessities, that there was no abilitie remaining to defend their proper safetie: A second feare both more great and reasonable then the first, began to occupie his thoughtes, his eyes, and all his senses: that was the seruitude and thraldome houering ouer him, and all the Italians, if the kingdome of Naples were joyned to the power of the crown of Fraunce, desiring for that cause (as hath bene noted) that by the Florentines should be objected many difficulties and impediments against the resolution of his enterprife. But when he faw his Maieltie was eafily joyned with that common weale, and with the fame facilicitie had ouercome all the impediments of the Pope, and lastly without resistance had prenailed ouer the Realme of Naples, the danger feemed every day fo much the greater to him, by how much the course of the French victories aduaunced more and more with facilitie, fortune and felicitie. A like feare also began to stirre in the mindes of the Senat of Venice, who in all their counsels hitherunto had constantly perseuered in newtralitie, gouerning their abstinence with so great discression, no lesse in action then in demonstration, that there was no meane to suspect their inclination more to one partie then to an other: They had for Ambassadours with the king Anthonie Loredan & Dominicke Trensfan, albeit they lingered so long to send them, that the king was not onely passed the mounts, but arrived at Florence afore they were presented to him: But now looking with judgement and studie into the violent course of so great felicities, his armies running, like a thunder, without refistance thorow all Italie, they began to esteeme as their owne the domage of their neighbours, and to feare least in the ruine of others, their destruction were also conspired, but chiefly the king having made him selfe Lord of Pysa and other fortresses of the Florentines', leauing garrison in Sienna, and almost wonne the like imperie in the state of the Church: they construed all to argumets absolute, that the ambition of his thoughts was not limited within the Realme and rule of Naples: for these causes the Senate gaue willing eare to the periwasions of Lodowyke Sforce, who assoone as the Florentines had yeelded to the king, had begun to folicite them to joyne with him in a common remedie against common dangers: wherein it was beleeued, that if the French king had met with any impediments either at Rome, or at his entry into the Realme of Naples, they had altogether taken armes against him: But the kings fortune preuented their councels, and in his victorie was more suddeinnesse and expedition, then in all the impediments that could be objected. The king also, doubting of the practises and sactions of Lodomyk, had reteined in his pay fince the conquest of Naples, John Lacques Triunice with an hundred launces, under a pension worthie and honorable, and joyned vito him with many promises the Cardinall Fregosa and Objecto de Fiesque: the one for that they were mightic instruments to trouble and rayle emotions in the towne of Genes: and the other, for that being a chiefe leader of the Guessfer faction at Myllan, caried a minde much deuided from Lodomyke: To whom as yet the king refused to give the principalitie of Tarenta, saying his bond had no force till he had reduced into his power all the Realme of Naples. These things being bitterly displeasing to Lodomyke, he restrained twelve gallyes which were armed for the king at Genes, and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes, and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes, and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes and denounced the appointing of any more vessels which were armed for the king at Genes and the cause that he did not efficiency which has been described by the series of Testes.

the rocke of Yschia.

Thus suspitions and disdaynes growing on all partes, and the suddeine conquest of Naples representing to the Venerians and the Duke of Myllan the present perill of their estates: they were constrained to ioyne vertue to their councels, and deferreno longer to put their thoughts in execution: wherein, for the furthering of their resolution and courage, they had the consideration of the mightie companies of confederats: for that to this the Pope was leffe ready (to whom the greatnesse of the French was fearefull and suspitious) then Maximilian king of Romaines wholly disposed, to whom about all other for many occasions of hatred to the crowne of Fraunce, and for the many injuries received by the king raigning, the prosperities of Fraunce were hatefull. But the chiefe groundes and foundations whereupon the Venetians and Lodowyke wrought, were the King and Queene of Spane, who being a litle before bound to the French king (not for other respect then to draw from him the Earledome of Rossellson) not to hinder him in the conquest of Naples, had cunningly referred to them selves till that time a free power to do the contrary: for, (if their brutes be true) there was a clause annexed to the capitulations made for restitution of the Earledome of Rossilloin, which bare, that they should not be bound to any thing that touched the prejudice of the Church: of which exception they inferred, that if the Pope, for the interest of his chiefe, desired them to succour the Realme of Naples, they had good right to do so, without breaking their faith, or corrupting their promises: To this they added afterwardes, that by the same capitulations they were forbidden to oppose them selues against king Charles, in case it appeared that the fame kingdome did judicially appertaine vnto him. But what difference fo euer was betweenethe truth and their constructions of things, it is certaine, that having got that they defired, they began not onely to give hope to the succours of them of Aragon, and secretly to solicite the Pope not to abandon their cause, but also, as they had in the beginning exhorted the French king with wordes moderat, as louers of his glorie and zealous to Religion, to convert his armies rather against Infidels then the Christian nations: So they continued effloones that course, but with so much more efficacie and wordes suspected, by how much the victorie of the king aduaunced and flourished. And to the end they might couer their doings with more authoririe, and to nourish in greater hopes the Pope and the Aragons, (& on the other part giving out a brute that they had regard onely to the gard of Sicilie) they were ready to fend thither an armie by fea, which arrived there after the loffe of Naples, but yet with equipage and furniture more in demonstrations then in effectes, for that it contained not aboue eight hundred horsemen mounted vpon iennets, and a thousand footemen Spaniardes: They vsed their apparances vntill the taking of Ostia by the Collomors, and the threates of the French against the Pope gaue them a more honest occasion to advaunce that which they had fashioned and resoluted in their mindes: And following their deuise to an action and beginning, they protested openly to the king whilest he was at Florence by their Ambassadours, that according to the office of Princes Christian, they would take the defence and protection of the Pope, and the Realme of Naples (a chiefe of the Church of Rome) wherein having already begun (affoone as they understood of the flying of the Aragons) to negociate with the Venerians and the Duke of Myllan for confederation, they effloones folicited them with a new instance, to communicate with them for their common suretie against the French men.

G iii

A confederat league against the French king.

So that, as well by the solicitation of the king of Spaine, as occasions of the time present, threatning indifferent perils to all the principalities in Italie: there was at length in the moneth of Aprill and in the Citie of Venice, where were the Ambassadours of all those Princes, contracted a confederation betweene the Pope, the king of Romaines, the king of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Myllan. The title and publication of this league was onely for the defence of the states of one an other, referuing places to who foeuer would enter it with conditions reasonable. But they all being of opinion that it was necessary so to temper things as the French king might not hold Naples, it was agreed in capitulations more fecret, that the bands of Spaniardes arrived in Sicilie should be a succour for the recovering of that kingdome to Ferdinand of Aragon, who with a great hope in the wills of the people, laboured to enter into Calabria: That the Venetians at the fame time with their armie by sea, should assayle the sea coastes of the sayd kingdom: That the Duke of Myllan (to hinder fuccours that might come out of Fraunce) should do what he could to get the Citic of Aft, wherein was the Duke of Orleans with a very small strength: That to the kings of Romaines and Spaine should be contributed by the other confederates a certaine quantitie of money, to the end that either of them should make warre upon the Realme of Fraunce with a puillant armie: The confederats withall defiring that all Italie would be vnited in the fame concord of will, made instance to the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara to participate with this league: But the Duke being dealt withall after the league was published, refused to take armes against the French king, and yet, with an Italian futtletic he consented that Dom Alphonso his eldelt sonne should take pay of the Duke of Myllan for a hundred & fiftie men at armes, with the title of Lieutenant ouer all his companies.

But the cause of the Florentines was otherwise, having no lesse instruction to leave the Frech king, then allured to the confederation with many great offers: for that immediatly after the publication of the league, Lodowyke offered them in the name of all the confederates (fo that they would communicate in the league) all their forces to reful the king, if, in his returne from Naples. he would vexe them, and to joyne with them affoone as might be for the recovering of Pyla and Lysorne, And on the other fide, they faw the king neither make reckoning of the promifes he had giuen at Florence, and much lesse had in the beginning restored them to the possession of their townes, nor fince the conquest of Naples redeliucred the Castels of the same: They saw him make his faith and othe inferiour to the councels of those, who, fauouring the cause of the Pylans, perswaded him that the Florenines, assoone as they were restored would white with the other Italians: They faw also, that notwithstanding the great summes of money and other corruptions which they had bestowed upon the Cardinall S. Mallo, yet he refisted coldly such as incensed the king against them, as one that would not for the love of the Florentines come to contention with the great ones of the kings Court: As well in these causes generall, as in matters more particular, they found in the king by demonstrations manifest, that to the violation of his faith, he had joyned carelesse estimation of them, their merites, and amities: in so much that one day their Ambaffadours complaying of the rebellion of Atompulcian, and furnmoning him according to his bond to compell them of Sienna to render it: he aunswered in scorne, what had he to do if their fubiccles rebelled, because they were ill gouerned. But all these notwithstanding, the Florentines, framing their councels according to the termes & necessities of their affaires, would not fuffer disdayne to carie them against their proper profit, esteeming it to agree best with their prefent fortune, not to beare inclination to the requestes of the confederates: as well not to prouoke against them of new the armie of Fraunce in the kings returne, as for that they would yet expect and temporise, and hope to have restitution of their places by such as kept them: and sastly, for that they reapposed litle in those promises, knowing that they were hated of the Venetians, for the impediments which at fundry times they had given to their enterprises, and knowing manifeltly that Lodowyke aspired to the imperie of Pyla.

But now, as all things earthly are subject to their seasons of revolution, and in mortal selicities can be no assurance nor perpetuitie: So, about these times the reputation of the French began to diminish in the kingdome of Naples, for that making their prosperities serve to their pleasures, & governing all things at adventure, they looked not to chase the enemie out of those sewe places be the holden by them, which they might easily have done, if they had sollowed their fortune: They still little considered, that armes do little advance, where pollicie is not concurrant, and victory brings a very short glorie, where the gouernement is unperfect. But much more began they to decline in ... opinion, affection, and friendthip: for, albeit the king expressed many honorable aspectes and liberalities towardes the people, in graunting throughout the Realme formany priviledges and ex-The French emptions, as they amounted to more then two hundreth thousand duckats by yeare: yet other king "feth nethings were not redressed nor governed with that order and discretion that appertained; for that gligence in orthe king holding it an action inferiour to his authoritie and greatnesse, to heare the complaints and things of Nofutes of men, referred over the whole charge of the affaires to fuch as governed him felfe, and they ples. partly by incapacitie, and partly by particular couctoufnesse, confounded all things: for, the nobilitie were not embrased with that humanitie they looked for, and much lesse had recompenses equall to their merites; yea they found many difficulties to enter into the chambers and audience of the king: There was made no diffinction of persons: the merites and seruices of men were not confidered but at aduenture: The mindes of fuch as naturally were estraunged from the house of Aragon were not confirmed: many delayes and difficulties were subborned touching the restitution of the states and goods of those that were of the faction of Aniew, and of the other Barons that had bene banished by the old Ferdinand: fauours and graces were imparted to such as procured them by corruption and meanes extraordinary: from many they tooke without inflice or reafon, and to many gaue without occasion or deferuing: Almost all offices and dignities were transferred to the French, in whom were also inuested (to the great griefe of the natural Lords) all the townes of the demayne (fuch they call those that are wont to obey immediatly the king) things so much the more grieuous, by how much the king had promifed there should be no alteration of nature, estate, or possession of those governments. The discontentment of these things was much increased by the infolencie and naturall arrogancie of the French, aggrauated much by the facilitie of the victorie, which caried them into those opinions and weenings, that they esteemed nothing of the whole Monarchie of Italie, attributing that to their proper vertue and valiour, which chanced by their fortune and felicitie: And these publike and generall insolencies were made more intollerable by many private and inferiour abuses, as the armie being furried in many partes of the Realme, and the bands dispersed more at aduenture then by discression, liued in such vnbridled inconcinencie, that those wives and daughters that had escaped their dissolution in the time of hofilitie, were violently dishonored bearing the name of their hostes & friends. In so much as these doings drawing with them a fuspition of a perpetual servitude, that love, that defire, that affection wherewith they honored them before, had now taken contrary qualitie, and not onely turned into hatred, conspiracie, and accursings against them, but also in place of the malice they bare to the Aragons, there was new infinuation of compassion to Ferdinand, no lesse for the generall expectation of his vertue, then for the memory of the gracious speech which with so great sweetneffe and constancie he delivered to the Neapolitans the day of his departure: the same so working that that Citie and almost all the kingdome expected with no lesse desire, an occasion to reappeale the Aragons, then a few moneths before, they had defired their destruction. Now began to be agreeable to them the name so hatefull of Alphonso, calling just severitie, that which they had wont to note in him for crueltie : and interpreting to true finceritie of minde, that which wrongfully, they had wont to conster pride and fiercenesses such is the nature of communalties and peoples inclined to hope more then they ought, and endure lesse then is necessary, alwayes thirling after innouations, and neuer contented with the time present. This infection chiefly goeth thorow the inhabitants of Naples: who, of all the regions in Italie are most noted of inconstancie and defire of new things.

Before this new league was made, the French king had determined to returne into France with speede, moued more with a light sancie, and a vehement desire of his Court, then with confiderations discreet or well tempered: seeing that in the kingdome of Naples remained undecided many and great affaires of Princes and estates, and the parts of the Realme being not fully con-The French quered, his victorie had not yether in the perfection. But after he knew that so many Princes were king taketh drawne into league against him, he was much moued in his minde, and sell to deuise with his connected of his Lords what he were best to do in so great an accident, specially every one assume that it was do against the long since those Princes had consented in conspiracie against him. Those of his councell were of league of Conaduise, that he should dispatch his departure, doubting that by how long he taried, by so much federate. Should he give oportunitie to the difficulties to increase, seeing the Cosecates would win time to make greater provisions, the brute running already that a great levie of Almaynes should passe into Italie, & that men began to speake much of the person of the Emperour. They perswaded that the king would prouide that there might passe with diligence out of Fraunce, new bands of souldiers to the towne of Aft, both to garde that Citie, and to keepe the Duke of Myllan in necessitie to defend his owne countrey, and withall to be in readine se to passe further according to the occasions and necessities of his Maiesties services : it was also determined in the same counsell, to labour with all diligence and corruption of offers, to separate the Pope from the other confederates, and to dispose him to transferre to the kings person the inuestiture of the Realme of Naples, which (not with landing he promifed absolutely at Rome,) yet he had denied it till that day, and with declaration that that graunt or concessió should not beare prejudice to the title & rights of an other. In a deliberation so graue, and amongst so many thoughts of such importance, was not lost the memorie of the affaires of Pyja: for, the king, desiring for many regardes, that in him might remaine power to dispose of that cleate, and doubting least by the ayde of the confederats the people of Pyfa would bereauchim of the citadell, he fent thither by fea together with the Ambassadours of the town which were with him, six hundreth French sootemen, who being arriued there, conceived the fame affection which others that had bin left there, had: for, being gouerned with defire to spoyle and pray, after they had received money of the Pyfans, they went with their companies to encampe afore the towne of Libra frate, where the Pyfans (whose Captaine was Luke Maluozze) had bin in campe certaine dayes afore, vpon an aduertifement that the Florentines had fent part of their bands to Montpulcian, and hearing of the approch of their enemies, were raifed and gone the day before : but returning thither effloones with the supply of the French men, they tooke it in fewe dayes, for the Florentme armie fent to fuccour it, could not passe the river of Serele for the violence of waters, neither durst they take the other way by the walls of Lucques, for the ill disposition of that people, who were much moued, and fauoured greatly the libertie of the Pyfans. These bands with those of the French that remayned of the conquest of Libra frate, ranne ouer the whole countrey of Pyfa as enemies manifest to the Florensines: who, when they complained, the king gaue no other aunswere', then assoone as he should come into Tuskane, he would redeliuer all those places he had promised, desiring them to beare with patience that litle respit.

But the meanes of departure were not so easie to the king, as was ready his defire : for that his armie was not so great, as, being deuided into two partes, it was able to bring him into ASE without daunger, and to fuffice both to auoyd the impediments of the confederats, and defend the kingdome of Naples against so many exactions as are in preparing. In which difficulties he was constrained (to the end the Realme should not be naked of defence) to diminish the prouisions referued for his owne fafetie, and yet to keepe his person from manifest perill, his necessities enforced him not to leaue in the kingdome fo strong an armie as was needefull: fo he determined to leave there halfe of his Swyzzers, and a part of the French footenen, eight hundreth launcemen of Fraunce, and about fine hundreth men at armes of the Italians which were in his pay, deuided under the enseignes of the Presect of Rome, the Collonnoys and Anthonie Sanelle, Captaines who had tafted plentifully of his liberalities, in the distribution of the townes & estates of the kingdome, but specially the Collonnoys: for that to Fabricius he had give the covitrey of Alba & Taille Coffe possessed before by Virginio Vrsin: & Prospero, he had indued with the Duchie of Tracette, and the Citie of Fondi, with many Castels which belonged to the familie of Caetane and Montfortin, together with many other peeces adioyning, taken from the house of the Comtes . To these forces, he made reckoning that in all necessities, he should vnite the forces of those Barons, who for their owne furetie, were constrained to defire his greatnesse: but specially he reapposed much in the powers of the Prince of Salerne, whom he had restored to the office of Admirall, and of the Prince of Bisignian: He created as Lieutenant generall ouerall the Realme, Gilbert de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, a Captaine more esteemed for the greatnesse of his house, and that he did participate in the bloud royall, then for his proper vertue: he affigned other Captaines in many sheking Lieu- partes of the Realme, on whom he had bestowed estates and reuenues; of these the chiefe was zenant on Na- Monsieur D'aubigny, whom he had made great Constable of the Realme for Calabria: In Caiette. the Seneshall of Beaucaire whom he had raised to the office of high Chamberlaine: And in Abruzze Gracian a valiant Captaine of great reputation: promifing them all in one generall faith and word of a Prince to fend them speedy rescue of money and men: But in the meane while to enterteine the warre, he left them no other prouision, then the assignation of those moneys which should be dayly gathered of the reuenucs of the Realine, which began already to waner & shake, The Realine of for that the name of the Aragons began to review in many places: For, at the same time that the Marles beginking would depart from Naples, Ferdinand accompanied with the Spanish armie that came by neth to refea into the Isle of Sicile, was discended into Calabria, to whom flocked with a swift readinesse elaime the many troupes of the countrymen, the Citie of Regge rendring it felfe to him, whose Castell had ragons, bene alwayes kept in his name. At the fame time was discouered about the shoares of Pouyllathe Venetian armie by sea, ouer whom was Capraine Anthonie Grymany, a man in that common weale of great authoritie: But neither for these, nor many other signes of chaunges towardes, the king did not forbeare , no not once fuspend or linger his deliberation to go his way : for, befides that haply they were driven by necessitie, the defire was incredible in the king and all his Court to returne into France, as though fortune that was sufficient to make them get so great a victorie, had bin fo still able to preserve it for them: he did not remember that the getting of a victorie is referred to fortune, but the losse of a kingdome is imputed to the king, who standes then in most necessitie of councell and discression, whenfortune makes him believe he is in most securitie: it is familiar with fortune to do more harme in one day, then she doth good in many yeares, "vfing for her delite to rayse vp vaine men for her glorie, and suffer them estsoones to fall with the waight of their proper vanitie and want of gouernement. In this time also held good to Ferdenand, the Isles of Y schia and of Lipara, which albeit were neare to Sicile, yet they are members " of the kingdome of Naples: he held Reggi which he had newly recoursed, & even in Calabria, he commaunded Villeneusue with the Castell, and places about Brondusa where Federik was retired; also Galspoli, la Alantia, and Turpia.

Before the king parted from Naples, many things were in negociation betweene him and the Pope: not without great hope of concord: In which action was sent from the Pope to the king, & after returned to Rome the Cardinall S. Denis, and for the French king, Al. Franci: The king defired greatly the inuestiture of Naples, and that the Pope, if he would not joyne with him, at the least that he would not be for his enemies, and that he would receive him into Rome as a friend. To which demaunds, albeit at the beginning the Pope bare some inclination, yet, distrusting much in him felfe of the king, and esteeming that to separate him selfe from the confederats, and consent to the inuestiture, would be supposed a meane sufficient to make a faithfull recociliation with him: he objected many difficulties to the other demaunds, & to that of the inuestiture, (albeit the king would condifiend to take it under this condition, not to be prejudiciall to the rights of an other) he aunswered, that he wished the lawes might be looked into afore, to see to whom the right apperteined: And on the other fide, feeking to give impedimet by force to the kings entry into Rome, he fent to the state of Vence, and to the Duke of Myllan, to refurnish him with succours & strength of fouldiours; who, immediatly fent him a thousand light horsemen, and two thousand sootemen, with promife of an ayde of a thousand men at armes: with which bandes ioyned to his own forces he hoped to be able to make refistance: But the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan confidering afterwardes, that it was a thing too daungerous to fend their strength and companies so farre from their own estates, seeing that neither the whole armie agreed vpon was yet in order, and part of their peoples occupied in the enterprise of Ast, and joyning withall to these doubts the infidelitie of the Pope, remembred in a late experience when king Charles past that way, he called Ferdinand into Rome with his armic, and fuddenly with a councell chaunged, made him issue forth againe: they began to perswade him to withdraw to some place of suretie, rather then to aduenture his person to so great a daunger in striuing to defend Rome. These things increased the kings hopes to come to composition with the Pope.

The Frenchking departed from Naples the twentie day of May: but for that he had not taken in the beginning with the ceremonies accultomed, the titles and enseignes regall of the kingdom: a few dayes afore his departure, he received folemnly in the cathedrall Church with great pomple The French and celebrations the royall ornaments, the honours, other and homages, accustomed to be done king crowned to new kings. At this coronatio, the oration was pronounced in the name of all the people of Na- king of Neples by Iohn Iouian Pontan, to whose prayses very cleare and shining for the excellency of his doctrine, his life, and civilitie of manners, this action brought no small stayne and a slaunder, for that as he had bene of long a principall Secretarie to the kings of Aragon, and of very prinate and familiar authoritie, and the teacher and maister of Alphonfo : fo whether it were to observe instly the partes proper to Oratours, or to shew his affection to the French, he tooke too great a libertie to speake in the disprayses and derogation of the kings by whom he had bene so much ad-« uaunced. So hard it is formetimes for a man to keepe in him felfe that moderation and those rules, which he following with fo great doctrine, had taught to others writing of morall vertues, and ec by his wit and knowledge had made him selfe wonderfull to the world in all kindes of Philoso+ ce phie and learning. The king led with him eight hundred French launces, two hundred Gentlemen for his garde, a hundreth launces under the Lord Trinulce, three thousand Smyzzers

footemen, a thousand Frenchmen, and a thousand Cascoyns, having ordained that in Tuskane Camylla Vitelli and his brother should io yne with him with two hundreth and fiftie men at armes, and that the armie by fea should draw towardes Lynorne . Virginio Vrfin and the Count Petillane followed the king without other gard or furetie then their faith not to go away without leane: their cause, for that they reasoned that they were not instly made prisoners, had bene kings priforers, disputed in the kings councell, afore whom they alledged, that at the time they yielded them be reddingred, felues, the king had not onely graunted to those that they fent, but also set downe in writing under his owne fignature, their lafe conduit, whereof being aduertifed by their folicitors, which attended the dispatch of the Secretaries, they had under that trust at the summons of the first Herald that went to Nola, erected and displayed the enseignes of the king, and ginen the keyes to the first Captaine having with him but a few horsemen, notwithstanding their strength being foure hundreth men at armes, they might eafily have made refistance: They preferred besides, the auncient denotion of the familie of Vr fins, who taking part alwayes with the faction of the Guelffes, had alwayes borne both in themselnes and in all the predecessours of that house, perpetuall impressions of honour, reuerence, and service, to the crowne, of Fraunce: And as from those regardes had proceeded, that with so great a readinesse they had received the kings Maiestie into their estates bordering vpon Rome: So therefore, it was neither convenient nor inst, both having regard to the faith given by the king, and the merite of their operations and actions, that they should be holden prisoners. But they were aunswered with no lesse roundnesse by Monsteur de Lygny, whose souldiers tooke them within Nola: that the safe conduit, albeit it was determined and subfigned by the king, yet it is to be understood, that it was not perfectly given. but when it was confirmed with the kings feale, and with the feale of the Secretaric, and fo deliuered to the partie: That in all graunts and letters pattents fuch was the auncient custome in all Courts, to the end that if any thing were inconfideratly passed the mouth of the Prince, by reafon of many thoughts and affaires, or for not sufficient information of things, it might be moderated and go forth with his due perfection: he alledged that the confidence of that moved them not to yeeld to fo fmall a companie of fouldiers, but they did communicate in the generall neceffitie and feare, for that there remained no meane either to defend or to flie, the whole countrey about them swarming with the armies of the victors: That what they alledged of their merits was false, which if it should be affirmed by an other, them selves ought to denie it for their honour: for that it was manifest to all the world, that not of will or free consent, but to auoyd danger (leauing in aduersitie the Aragons, of who in prosperitie they had received great benefits) they agreed to give the king passage thorow their lands: therefore seeing they were in pay of the enemy, and bare mindes eltraunged from the name of the French, and that they had perfectly no fafe conduit or furetie, they were made prisoners by good law and right of armes. These reasons thus auouched against the Vrsins, & susteined by the power of Monsieur de Ligny, and authoritie of the Collonnoys, who aswell for auncient enuics, as for the diversitie of the factions, quarrelled them openly there was no refolution nor fentence, onely they were commanded to follow the king, leauing them naked hopes to be deliuered when his Maiestie was come to Ast. But albeit the Pope, (the confederates having councelled him to go his way) was not with.

out inclination to be reconciled with the king, with whom he negociated continually: yet, fufpition audiclousie being strong in him, he noutished the king with hopes that he would attend him: and yet after he had bestowed a sufficient garrison within the Castell S. Ange, two dayes before the king should enter Rome, he went to Orniette accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals, and two hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and three thousand footemen:he left behind him as Legat, the Cardinall of S. Anastasio, to receive & honour the king, who entred by that quarter on the further side of Tyber, to the end to awayd the Castell S. Ange: and resusing the lodging that was offered him by the Popes comission in the Pallace of the Mount Vatican, he went and lodged in the suburbes: And when the Pope understood that the king came neare to Viterbe, notwithstanding he enterteined him with new hopes to copound with him in some place convenient betweene Viterbe and Ornette, he lest Ornette and went to Peronse, with intention (if the king tooke that way) to go to Ancona, the better to have meane, by the comoditic of the sea, to retire to some place absolutely assured. All this notwithstanding, the king being not a litle discontented with his unjust steares and ielousies, rendred the Castels of Cuntanevelua and Terracina, reserving Ostia, which when he came out of Italie, he gave up to the power of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vineula, who was Bishop thereos: he passed in like sort by the countreys of the Church, as thorow the dominions of a friend-saving that they of Tuskanella resulting to receive into their owne his vanntgarde, the souldiers tooke it by force, and sackedit, not without murder and flaughter of many.

After this, the king remained without any occasion at Sienna fix dayes, not considering [neither of him selfe nor by the straite aduertisements of the Cardinall de S.P. ad vincula, and by Triunice) how hurtfull it was to give time to his enemies to make their provisions and vnite their forces: neither did he recompence the losse of the time, with the profit of councels or deliberations: for there was debated at Sienna the restitution of the fortresses of the Florentines promised by the king at his departure from Naples, and confirmed by many voluntary graunts on the way: And therefore, the Florentines, besides that they were ready to pay the thirty thoufand duckats remaining of the fumme agreed at Florence, offered to lend feuentie thousand more, and to fend with him till he were arrived at Ast, Francisco Secco their Captaine with three hundreth men at armes, & two thousand footmen. The necessity which the king had of money, the oportunitie to augment his armie, ioyned to the counsideration of his faith and othe, induced almost all those of his councell to perswade effectually the restitution of the Castels and precess of strength referuing Petra Santa and Serezana, as convenient instruments to draw more easily to his deuotion the hearts of the Genomays: But it was a resolution in destinie, that the matter of new calamities should remaine kindled in Italie: for , Monsieur de Ligny , a man for his youth more ready to enterprise, then rype in councell, and whose experience had not yet wrought in him a perfection of judgement, being borne of one of the kings fifters, and of no fmall favours with him, made his lightnesse together with the disdaine he bare to the Florentines, for that in all their futes they addressed their meanes to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the onely impediment to this deliberation, alledging no other reason then the pietie & compassion of the Pyfans: And touching the offer of the forces which the Florentines made, he despised them, vaunting that the armie of France was able to fight with all the men of warre in Italie knit in one Arength: Monsieur de Pienes was a supportr of his opinion, for that he thought the king would bestow vpon him the jurisdiction of Pyla and Lyuorne: There was debating also at Sienna of the gouernement of that Citie, for that many of the orders of the people & of the reformers (to plucke downe the brotherhood of the order of Montenoue,) made instance, that erecting a new forme of gouernement, the garde which they of Montenone kept at the publike Pallace might be taken away, and the place supplied by a garde of French men vnder the leading of Monsieur de Ligny: And albeit this councell was rejected in the councell of the king, as a thing of litle continuance and impertinent to the time present: Alonsieur de Ligny who had layed a vayne plot to make him felfe Lord of it, obtained that the king would take into his protection that Citie vnder certaine conditions, binding him felfe to the defence of it and all the circumstances except Montpulcian: which he fayd he would not intangle him felfe withall, neither for the Florentines nor for the Siennoys: The communaltie of Sienna ('albeit 110 mention was made of any capitulation) chused by the consent of the king Monsieur de Ligny for their Captaine, promifing him twentie thousand duckats by yeare, vpon condition, that he would keepe there a Lieutenant with three hundreth footemen for the gard of the place, which ftrength he left there culled out of fuch as were of the French armie: The vanitie of which deliberations appeared immediatly, for that the order of Montenone having eftloones reconquered with armes their authoritie accultomed, chased out of Sienna the gard, & gaue leaue to Monsieur de Liste whom the king had left there for his Ambassadour.

But there were now great stirres and emotions in Lombardie: for the Venetians, and Lodowyke Sforce (who had even then received from the Emperour with much solemnitie the priviledges of inuestiture of the Duchie of Alyllan, and made publike homage and othe of fidelitie to the Ambaffadours that brought them) rayled great preparations to floppe the king that he should not reand Ledowyke turne into Fraunce , or at least to affure the Duchic of Myllan , to come to the which he must Sforce prepare passe ouer so great a circuit and space of countreys . To these endes, every of them readdressed their forces, and leautied of new, partly in common, and partly at expences separate, many men at armes, obtaining after many difficulties, that lohn Bentynole whom they had taken into their comreturning into mon pay, should sticke to the league with the Citic of Bolognia: Lodowyke armed at Genes for the garde of the same Citie, ten galleys at his owne charges, and soure great shippes at the common expences of the Pope, the Venetians and him felfe: And being at the point to execute that whereunto he was bound by the couenants of the confederation touching the towne of Ast, he fent into Germanie to leavie two thousand sootemen, and converted to that enterprise Galeas S. Severin with seven hundred men at armes, and three thousand footemen: in so much as affuring him of the taking of that towne, and to achieue all things to his honour, (he was naturally very in-Lodo. Sforce tolent in his prosperities) he sent this message to the Duke of Orleance the more to terrifie him: sendeth haugh- That hereafter he should forbeare to vsurpe the title of Duke of Myllan, which title Charles his failer had taken fince the death of Philip Maria Viscounte: That he suffered not new bands to passe out of Fraunce into Italie: That he caused to returne home againe such as were already within the towne of Ast: And for the affurance of these things, that he should put the towne of Aft into the hands of Galeas S. Senerin, in whom the king might reappose trust as well as in him, hauing the yeare before bene received by the king into the brotherhood and order of S. Michaell in Fraunce: he vaunted much in the same kinde, of boasting of his forces, of the provisions the confederates made to make head against the king in Italy, the great preparatios of the king of Romaines & the king of Spanneto moue war beyond the Mounts, But the Duke of Orleance was made nothing affrayd with these vaine threates, and being well affured that there was made a new confederation, he studied to fortific Ast, and solicited with great instance to send out of Fraunce new fupplies & companies, who, understanding that they were to be employed in the proper succours of the kings person, began with great diligence to passe the mounts: By reason whereof the Duke of Orleans not fearing his enemies, marcheth into the field, and takes in the Marquildom of Saluce the towne and Castell of Galfimeres which Anthony Maria of S. Senerin possessed: which being knowen to Galess, who had a litle before taken certaine small villages, retired with his armie to Anon, a towne of the Duchie of Myllan neare to Ast, neither having hope to be able to offend, nor feare to be offended: But the nature of Lodonyk alwayes inclining to entagle him felf with enterprises which demaund great expences, & yet of a condition to flie & feare (yea euen in greatest necessities) things that brought costes and charges, was the cause to commit his estate into right. great daungers: for that by reason of his very spare and needy payments, a very few sootemen . came out of Germany, & for the same niggardnesse, the bands that were with Galeas were diminilhed euery day: where, on the cotrary, were increased continually the supplies that came out of Fraunce, who for that they were called to the rescue of the kings person, marched with such diligence, that the Duke of Orleans had already affembled three hundreth launces, three thousand Swrzzers footemen, & three thousand Gascoynes: And albeit theking by a commaundement speciall and peremptory had aduertifed him, that abftaining from all enterprise, he should stand upon continuall readinesse and preparation to meete his Maiesty when so ever he should be sent for vet (it is hard for a ma not to make reckoning of his proper profit & to refift it) he determined to accept the occasió to possesse the city of Novaro, whrein he was offred to be put by two of the Opizans, Gentleme of the same citie hating much the Duke of Myllan, for that as well vpo the as many other of the town, he had with vniust fentece & judgement vsurped certaine conduits of waters & other possessions: The enterprise & the manner of it being resoluted vpo, the Duke of Orleans pasfed by night the river of Paw at the bridge Sturo, within the iurisdiction of the Marquis of Montferat, having in his companie the Marquis of Saluce: he was received by the conspiratours of the enterprise into the towne with all his forces, and found no refistance: And from thence making. fuddeine incurfions with part of his horfemen euen untill Ligenena, it was beleeved that if he had

drawne his whole army with speede towards Alillan, there would have rifen no small insurrections, for that the loffe of Novaro and the prefent face and confideration of troubles towards, kindled in the Mellanoys a wonderfull inclination to renolt and change: wherein Lodowike, no leffe timerous in aduerfity, then infolent in prosperity, was seene with teares ynprofitable to acknowledge his cowardize (for the most part is joyned in one selfe subject, insolency and timerousnesse:) they also that were with Galeas, in whome onely confisted his defence, remayning behind, shewed them selues in no place to his rescue: but because the conditions and disorders of the enemy, are not alwaies knowen to the other Captaines, it happeneth often in warres that many goodly occasions are loft, there being also no apparance that so sodaine a mutation could succeede against fo great a Prince, feeing withall it is a principall pollicy in Princes in feafons daungerous and conspiring, to make their strength at home free from seare, iealousie, or suspition. The Duke of Orleans, to affute the conquest of Novaro, determined to have the castell, which the fift day accorded to yeeld, if within xxiiij, houres they were not fuccoured: during which time, Galeas de S.Senerm had leafure to conuay his companies to Vigenena, and the Duke (who the better to reconcile the mindes of the people, had by proclamation called in many exactions imposed afore vpon the communalty) good respite to encrease and resurnish his army. All which not withstanding, the Duke of Orleans having ranged his bands nearethe walles of Vigenena, offered battell to his enemies, on whom fell to generall aftonishment, that they were vpon the point to abandon the town, and passe the river of Thesia by a bridge they had made upon boates, and other matter necessary to their fuccours in the passage. The enemy refusing to fight, the Duke of Orleans retired to Trecas: from this time the affaires of Lodonike began to faile with a better gale, many supplies of horfmen and footmen arriving in his army: for the Fenetians being content that the charge to meete the french King, should be in effect to them alone, consented that Lodowike should call backe part of those bandes he had sent upon the coasts of Parmesan, and withall they refurnished him with foure hundreth stradiots: infomuch as the meane to passe further, was taken from the Duke of Orleans, who making a road with flue hundreth horsemen enen to Vigenena, and the horsemen of the enemy encountring with them, a great losse light vpon the Duke of Orleans. This encounter gaue courage to Galeas S. Seuerin, both superiour in forces, and nothing inferiour in fortune, to present battell to the Duke at Trecas. At length all the army being affembled (wherein besides the Italian fouldiers, was arrived a thousand horsmen, and a thousand footmen of Alemains) incamped within a mile of Novaro, whither the Duke of Orleans was retired with all his regiments."

The newes of the reuolt of Nouaro, procured the King being then at Sienna, to make way: and therefore he auoyded all occasions that might make his departure flow, or hinder his resolution: wherein being well aduertifed that the Florentines, warned by the perils past, and newly falne into fulpition, for that Peter de Medic is followed him, albeit they had determined to receiue him into Florence with honours due to his greatnesse, yet for their more surety, they filled their towne with men of armes and piked bandes: hee drew to Pyla by the lands of the Florentines, leaving the city on the right hand: In the towne of Poggibonfe met him Ieronimo Sauonarola, who accor- Ier. Sauonading to his cultome, vfing the name and authority of God to his purpose, shewed him vnder vehe-rola a Friar ment inucctives and getture, that he ought to reflore to the Florent mes their towne, joyning to his preacher in perswasions, threatnings absolute and terrible, that if he observed not that he had sworm with so great folemnity, and that upon the holy Gospels, yea almost afore the eyes and presence of God, a punishment would follow equall to his infidelity and periury. The King made him fundry anfweres according to his inconstancy, having as little conscience to keepe his faith, as he had regarded to give it: somtimes he promised the Frear to make restitution as soone as he was come to Pifa, and immediatly (wrefling his promife and oth) he fayd he had fworne to the Pyfans, to protect their liberty afore he made any oath at Florence: and yet he gaue hopes alwaies to their Embaffadors, for the restitution of their peeces as soone as he was come to Pifa: where being arrived, the matter was effloors proposed in the kings councell, for that the preparations, vnity, & strength of the confederats about the borders of Parma increasing daily, they begato look into the difficulties to paffe through Lombardy: for which cause many defired the moneys & other succors offered by the Florentines: But to these councelles were contrary even those Captaines and gentlemen who had refilted them at Sienna: They alleadged, that albeit there happened by the opposition of the enemy, any diforder or difficulty to passe through Lombardy, yet it were better to have in their power the city of Pifa (whither they might retire) then to leane it in the hands of the Florentines, who, having once reobtayned the places they demaunded, would be of no better faith, then had bene the other Italians. They added, that in comparison of commodities, it was very conuenient for the furety of the kingdome of Naples, to hold the port of Lynorne: for that the plot layd to alter the state of Genes succeeding well to the King (whereof the hope could not be doubtfull) he should be soueraigne Lord almost of all the seas, even to the haven of Naples: sure these reafons were able to doe much in the mind of the King, as yet little capable to choose the best councell: but of farre greater power were the petitions and teares of the Pifans, who in great concourse of men, women, and children, sometimes prostrate at the Kings feete, and eftsoones recommending to euery one (yea euen the least of his Court, and the fouldiers, with lamentable cryings and compaints bewayled their miferies and calamities to come) the infatiable hatred of the Florentines, and the last desolation of their countrey: which should not have cause to lament for any other thing, then for that his maiesty had put them in liberty, and promised to protect them in it: in affurance whereof, they beleeuing the word of a right Christian King of Fraunce, to be a word firme and resolute, they had taken boldnesse so much the more to prouoke the harred of the Florentines: with these complaints and exclamations accompanied with the present aspect and view of their miferies, they descended with such compassion into the harts even of the most simple men at armes, the archers of the army, and many of the Swezzers, that they went in great numbers and turnult to the King, whom (Salzart one of the Penfioners speaking in the name of them all) they befought with instance, ychement, and humble, that for the honour of his person, for the glory of the Crowne of Fraunce, and for the consolation of so many of his seruants, prepared alwaies to put their liues in hazard for him, and who perswaded him with a faith more loyall, simple, and innocent, then such as were corrupted with the money of the Florentines, he would not take from those poore and naked Pysans, the benefite which so graciously he had bestowed upon them: They offered him, that if for want of money, he fuffered him felfe to be caried into a deliberation so infamous, he shouldrather take their chaines, their iewels, and their treasures, yea and retaine in his hand their paies and penfions which they were to receive of him. This vehement affection of the fouldiers tooke fo great a liberty, that a timple Archer had boldnesse to threaten the Cardinall of S. Mallo, and others by his example with lealous and braue speeches quarrelled with the Mareshall of Gie, and President of Gannay, whom they knew to labour the redelinery of the Pylans to the feruitude of Florence. Infomuch that the King somewhat consused by so great a variety of his people, let things hang in suspence, and was so farre off to take any certaine resolution, that at one time he promifed the Pifans neuer to passe them into the power of the Florentins, and the Embassadours of Florence attending at Lucquea, he gave intelligence, that that which he did not at that present for just occasions, he would doe immediately after he was arrived in willing that their common weale should send Embassadours thither.

The King departed from Pysa after he had chaunged the Captaine, and left sufficient garrison within the Citadell, doing the like in the other fortresses and peeces of defence: and as it agreed with the greennesse of his youth to embrace enterprises, and no lesse equals to his greatnesse and title to nourish ambition, so carrying a desire incredible to conquere the towne of Genes, being rethin the fur- fet on by the Cardinals of Rouere and Fregofe, and by Obsetto de Frefquo, and others of the banished, who gave him hopes of a sodaine mutation there: he fent with them from Serezana (contrary to the opinion of all his councell, who allowed not to diminish the forces of the army) the Lord Phillip de Brexe, brother to the Duke of Sanor, with fixe hundreth lances, and five hundred footemen newly arrived out of Fraunce by sea, ordayning that the men at armes of the Vitellis, comming behind with a flow march, and therefore not able in time to joyne with him, should follow them: and that certaine others of the banished, together with the bandes supplied by the Duke of Sanoy, should enter the river of the West. And lastly, that the army by sea, reduced to scauen gallies, two gallions, and two foystes led by the Captaine Miolaus, should go to make backe to the army by land.

By this time the vantgard guided by the Marshall of Gie, was come to Pontreme, which towne, after it had difinified three hundred footmen strangers, left there for the gard of the place, did yeeld fodainly by the meane of Triunice, with couenant, that they should not be vexed, neither in their persons, nor in their goods: but the faith given by the Captaines, could doc little for the surety of the towne, for that the Swizzers, whose fury being long kept smothered, burst out now to a greater flame, & taking occasion of reuenge, for that when the army going to Naples passing through Lunigiana, about xl. of their nation (for a quarrel hapning at aduenture) were flaine by the of Pontremathey lacked & burnt the town, after they had made barbarous flaughters of the inhabitants.

In these times, the army of the confederates assembled diligently about the borders of Parma: The army of they contayned about two thousand, two hundreth men at armes, eight thousand sootemen, and the confedemore then two thousand light horsmen, the most part Albanois & of the provinces near to Greece, rates, who brought into Italy by the Venetians, retained the fame name they had in their countrey, and were called Stradiots: of this army the finewes and principall strength were the bands of the Venetrans, for that those of the Duke of Millan (having turned most of his forces to the service of Nouaro) made not the fourth part of the whole army: ouer the bands of the Venetians, wherein were many notable Captaines, commaunded as generall Francis Gonzague Marquesse of Manua, a man albeit very young, yet what for his great courage and naturall defire of glory, his expectation furmounted his age: with him were joyned as commissioners two of the chiefest of the Senat, Luke Pisanand Melchior Trenisan: ouer the regiment of Lodomike Sforce, commaunded under the same title of generall, the Count Caiazze, in whom Lodowike reapposed much: but for his partes, being nothing equall in armes to the glory of his father, he had rather got the name of a fuhrill and polliticke warriour, then of a hardy and refolute Captaine, and with him was Commissioners Francis Barnardin Viscount chiefe of the faction of Gebelins at Millan, and therefore vsed as opposite to John Lackes Triunice. Amongest these Captaines and principals of the army, confulting whether they should goe incampe at Furnone, a little village at the foote of the mountaine: it was determined, for the ftraightnesse of the place, and perhaps (as was afterwards spred abroad) to give occasion to the enemy to descend into the plaine: that they should lodge in the Abbey of Guiarnola distant three miles from Furnoue. This aduse was the cause that at Furnoue was lodged the vantgard of the french, which had paffed the mountaine much afore the refidue of the army being hindred by the great artillery, which with many difficulties was drawne ouer that Tharpe mountaine of the Appenin, and yet had passed with farre greater troubles, if the Swizzers (defiring to fatisfie the fault they had done to the Kings honour at Pontrema) had not applied 2 wonderfull readinesse, diligence, and force.

The vauntgard being arrived at Furnoue, the Mareshall of Gie sent a trompet to the Italian campe, to demaund passage for the army in the name of the King, who not offering to offend any perion, and receiuing victuals at conueniet prices, had to passe that way to returne into his realine of France, dispatching at the same instant certaine light horsinen to view the enemy and the country, who were broken and put to flight by certaine Stradiors which Francis Gonzague fent to the encounter: if this occasion had bene followed, and that the Italians had given you the trenches of the french, they had eafily (by all difcourse and conjecture of warre) broken the vantgard, and fo taken away all possibilities of the Kings passage: This occasion remained in their fauour also the day following, notwithstanding that the Mareshall after hehad considered the daunger, had retyred hispeople into a place more nigh: but there lacked refolution of minde to the oportunity that was offered, for the Italian Captaines had not boldnesse to assail them, as well for the aduantage of the place whither they were retired, as for that they feared the ouergreatnesse of the vantgard, and that they were the maine army: It is certaine that euen then the confederats had not affembled all their forces, specially the bands of the Venetians, who were so slow to ionie in one strength at Guaruola, that it is manifelt, if the King had not dallied fo long vpon the way at Py(a, Sienna, and other places without all occasion, he might have passed without impediment or encounter of the enemy: hee was joyned at laft to the vauntgard, and lodged the day after with all his army at Furnoue. The Princes confederate neuer beleeved that the King durst have passed the Appenin by the high way with so small an army, for they were of opinion, that leaving the greatest part of his people at Pifa, he would return into Fraunce with the refidue by sea: and afterwardes understanding that he continued his way by land, they supposed, that to eschew their army, he would lay his plot to passe the mountaine by the way of the boroughs of Vandetar, and by the hill Centeroig very sharpe and hard, and from thence to the borders of Vrioney, hoping to meete the Duke of Orleans upon the confines of Alexandria: But when they knew certainely that he was come to

Furnoue, the Italian army, very well resolved afore, both for the show of courage in so many valiant Captaines, and for the reapport of the little number of the enemies, began now to water and shake, making opinions fearefull of the valour of the men at armes of Fraunce, and the vertue of the Swizzers, to whom without all comparison, the Italian footemen were esteemed much inferior: they confidered much of the agility of fuch as managed the great artilleries: but specially (which moueth much the mindes of men when they have taken a contrary impression,) they redoubted greatly the vnhoped for hardinesse of the french, who, not waighing the inequality of their numbers inferior to theirs, durst yet affront them: for these considerations, the courage of the Captaines being well moderated, they held a councell amongst them selues what answer they should make to the trompet fent by the Mareshall of Gie: on the one side it seemed too danngerous to put the state of all Italie in the discretion of fortune, and on the other side it could not but bring preindice to the valour of all the fouldiers and men of feruice in Italy, to show that they had no courage to oppose against the army of the french, who, being farre inferiour in numbers, and lesse expectation of other oportunities in a countrey straunger, durit yet offer to passe euen in the face and eies of them. In this councell the aduife of the Captaines being diverfe, and all the best experienced and flayed, either given over wholly to feare, or at least very vnresolute, after many disputations, they lastly agreed to fend aduertifement to Millan of the Kings demaund, and to execute that which should be determined by the Duke and the Embassadours of the confederats: who being drawne into councell as a matter of generall importance, the Duke and the Venetians being most nearest the daunger, were of this opinion, not to stoppe the way of the enemy, seeing he would goe, but rather (according to an old councell) to make him a bridge of filuer: otherwaies (according to many auncient examples) there might be daunger, that necessity turned into despaire, he would make his owne way with great effusion of bloud of such as undiscreetely would hinder him. But the Spanish Embassadour, desiring that without the danger of his King, they would make a triall of fortune, perswaded vehemently and almost with protestation not to let passe the King, nor to lose the occasion to breake that army, which passing in quiet, the matters of Italy would remaine notwithstanding in greater daungers then before: for that the french King keeping Ast and Nouaro, all Piemont obeyed his commaundements: And having at his backe the realme of Fraunce, a realme mighty and rich, and the Smizzers his neighbours ready to come into his pay in what numbers he would: and lastly being a great encrease of his reputation and courage, if the army of the league so farre aboue him in numbers, would consent so cowardly to his pallage: he would eftsoones torment Italy with greater courage, knowing that the Italians either would not or durst not fight with the french men. All this notwithstanding, the fure opinion prenailing most in this councell, they determined to write to Venice, with whom bare rule the fame aduise.

But these consultations were in vaine, like as the arrow being shot, it is too late to wish it may doe no hurt where it falles: for, the Captaines of the army after they had written to Myllan, waighing that by reason of the extremity of time, they could not have returne of answere in season convenient, how much it would touch in dishonour all the men of warre in Italy, to leave the pasfage free to the french men, fent backe the trompet without any aunswere certaine, being resolued to affaile the enemy, and charge them in the passage: the Commissioners of Venuce being of the same aduise, but Tremsan much more then his companion. The french men marched on with great arrogancy and boldnesse, as they that till that time having encountred no resistance in Ita-1, were perswaded that either the army durst not oppose any impediment, or at least if they did, they judged their proper vertue inuincible, & disdaining the strength of the enemies, they thought their fortune would be the fame in this fight, that it was in their late conquest of Naples: but when in difcending from the mountaine, they discourred the army lodged in infinite numbers of tentes and pauilions, and in a place so large that (according to the custome of Italy) they might range them selues all in battell: and waighing what by their great numbers, and lodging so neare them, with other demonstrations of resolution of minde, that there could want no wils nor disposition to fight: their late arrogancy beganne to take an other habite, and in their councels began to fall fo many coniectures of feare & doubt, that they would have received it for a good newes, to heare that the Italians would be content to let them passe. This feare was redoubled by this occasion; The King, fince the aunswere, had written to the Duke of Orleans to meete him with all the power he could make, and to march with such speede as he fayled not at the day and place appointed. But the Duke returned aduertisement, that the army of Sforce (opposed against him standing upon a strength of nine hundreth men at armses, twelne hundred light horsemen, and sue thousand sootenen,) was so mighty, that without manisest perill he could not aduaunce to observe his maiesties appointment, considering besides, that he must be enforced to leauepart of his bands for the gard of As and Nonaro. These necessities constraying the King to turne his mind to new councels, he commanded A.D. Argenton (who, a little before had bene his Embassiadour at Venice, where Pisan and Trenssan now their deputy Commissioners perswaded him to dispose the kings mind to peace) to fend a Trumpet to the sayd Commissioners, to let them understand that he would common with them for the common benefit: they accepted his desire, and appointed the next morning to meete in a place convenient between both the armies: but the King, either for that in that place he had want of victuals, or for some other occasion, chaunged aduic, and would not in that place attend the issue of that meeting.

The front of the tents and trenches of the one and other army, was distant little lesse then three miles, flretched out along the right shore of the river Taro, which is rather a land floud then a river, for that falling from the hill Appenin, after it hath runne through a little valley inclosed with two banckes, it discends into the large plaines of Lomburdie, and so falles into Pun: vpon one of the fetwo banckes, which was that of the right hand discending even to the shore of the riucr, was lodged the army of the confederates, incamped by councell of the Captaines rather on that fide, then on the left shore (where must be the waies of the enemies,) to the end they should not have meane to turne to Parma: of which city for the diversity of factions, the Duke of Alyllan was not without suspition, the rather for that the french King had by the appointment of the Florentins for his conduit to Aft Francis Secco, whose daughter was maried into the house of Iorelle, a family noble and mighty in the territory of Parma. The lodgings of the confederats were fortified with ditches and rampiers, and well furnished with artillery, by the mouth of the which, the french men going to Aft, must of necessity passe Taro on the side of Furnous, and march, no other thing remaining betweene them and the Italians then the river. All the night the french were in great trauell for the vexations of the Italians, who made their estradiots to make incursions even to their campe, which was so ready at every brute, as if there had bene a continuall alarme: to this trouble and perplexity of minde, was joyned a fodaine and most thicke raine mixed with lightnings and thunders fearefull, with many horrible crackes and flashes, that they tooke it as a foreshewing of some forrowfull accident; a matter which did more amaze them then the army of the Italians: not onely for that, being in the middest of mountains and enemies, and in a place which (if they prevailed not by fight) favored them with no hopes or meanes of fafety, the confideration of those great difficulties, gaue themiust occasion of extreame feares: but also (to mindes fearefull all fancies and conjectures feemethings of truth) they made confituctions of the threatnings of the firmament, not accustomed to shew it selfe ill disposed, but towardes some great variation, the storme (in their opinions) raging most toward that part where was the perfon of the King of so great maiesty and power.

The morning following being the fixt day of Iuly, the french army began by the peepe of the The battell of day to passe the river: afore, marched the most part of the artillery, being followed with the Taro, vauntgard, wherein the King (supposing that against it would be bent the greatest forces of the emerny) had put three hundreth and fifty french launces, Triuntce with his company of a hundreth launces, and three thousand Swizzers which were the sinewes and hope of that army, and with them on soote Engilbers brother to the Duke of Clemes, and the bayliste of Dion that had leavyed them: to these, the King adioyned three hundred archers, and certaine crosse-bownenon horse-backe of his gard, whom he made alight on soote, and almost all the sootemen which he had with him: After the vauntgard marched the battell, in the middest whereof was the person of the King armed at all parts, and mounted ypon a fierce course: & neare to him, to gouerne with his councel & authority that part of the army) was the Lord of Trimonille, a leader much renowmed in the realm of France: Then followed the arearegard guided by the Could be Foix & in the last place was bestowed the baggage of the army. Notwithstading this marching of the army, & the present readinesses of the sing, who could have bene contented with some accord, so licited Argenton to go and negociat citions with the Venetian Commissioners, even at the same time that the

campe began to moue: But the Venetian army being all in armes, and the Captaines determined to fight, the shortnesse of the time and nearenesse of the enemy, left no respite or space of time to entertaine Parley: for, now began the light horsemen on both sides to skirmish, the artillery from all quarters to shoote off with a noise horrible, and the Italians issued out of their tents, had fpred vpon the shoare of the river their esquadrons and rancks prepared to the battell. These things not with standing, the french men forbare not to march, partly vpon the breach or greaue of the river, partly by the skirts or stretching out of the bancke, for that in so straight a plaine they could not display their ordinance, and the vantgard being now led to the right way of the campe of the enemies, the Marquesse of Mantua with an esquadron of fixe hundreth men at armes of the gallantest of all the army, and with a great band of stradiots and other light horsmen, followed with five thousand footenien, passed the river at the backe of the arearcgard of the french, leauing upon the bancke on the other fide Anthony of Montfeltre bastard to Federike late Duke of Vrbyn with a great esquadron, to passe when he should be called to refresh the first battell: he ordained befides, that when the fight was begunne, another part of the light horfmen should charge the enemy in flancke, and the refidue of the estradiots passing the river at Furnoue, to give vpon the baggage of the french, which either for want of men, or (as was bruted) by the councell of Tribulce, was left without guard to who would make pray of it: on the other fide, the Count Caiazze with foure hundred men at armes (amongest whom, was the company of Dom Alphonso D'Este come to the campe without his person, for that his father would it so) and with two thoufand footmen, passed the river of Taro to assaile the french vantgard: having in like fort left on the bancke on the other fide Annyball Bentyuole with two hundred men at armes, to give refeue when he should be called. And for the defence of their lodgings and tents, remained two great companies of men at armes, and a thousand footmen, for that the Commissioners of Venice would referue in all fortunes a whole fuccor for their fafety. But the King feeing that (contrary to that his Captaines had perswaded him) so great a strength came to charge that arearegard, he turned his backe to the vantguard, and began to draw neare to the arearegard with the battell, hashing so diligently with an esquadron afore the rest, that when the charge began, he was in the forefront with the first that fought. Some have written that the companies of the Marquesse past the river not without diforder, both for the height of the banckes, and for the impediments of trees, of blockes, and boughs, whereof commonly the rivers of land-flouds are full. To this others have left in memory, that his footmenfor the fame difficulty, and because the water was swelled with the raine that fel in the night, either came late to the service of the battell, or at least all were not there, a great part remaining on the other side the river: how socuer he was followed, it is most certaine, that the charge which the Marquesse gaue was resolute and furious, and was no lesse valiantly anfwered by the french, the efquadron on both fides entring the conflict Pellmelle, & not according to the cultome of the warres of Italy, which was to fight one esquadron against an other, and in place of him that was weary and began to retire, to supply the fight with a fresh, making in the end but one great elquadron of many elquadrons, in so much as for the most part the skirmish or triall of armes wherein commonly died but very few people, endured almost a whole day, and oftentimes the fodaine comming of the night was the cause that they brake off wirhout victory certaine on either partie. The launces being broken, at the encounter of whom fell to the earth as well on the one part as on the other, many men at armes, and many horses, every one beganne with the fame fury, to lay handes vpon their mases, estockados, and other short weapons, the horfes fighting with their feete and their teeth, and with the shocke, no lesse then the men that gouerned them: And truely the vertue of the Italians gave a great show in the beginning, but the valour and resolution of minde in the Marquesse, who being followed with a valiant company of young gentlemen and Lancepezzades (these are braue and proued souldiers intertained about the ordinary compaines) forgot nothing which appertained to a Captaine couragious: The french men fultained with great valour so hoat and furious a charge, but being ouerlayed with such ods of numbers, they beganne almost manifestly to shake, not without the daunger of the King, within a very few pases of whom the bastard of Burbon was made prisoner, notwithstanding he fought with great vertue: the fortune of him put hope into the Marquesse, to have the same succeffe against the person of the King, being undiscreetly led into a place so dangerous, without that gard and order which was conuenient for fo great a Prince: The Marquesse with his people, made

made many aduentures to come neare him: against whom, the King albeit he had few of his people about him, yet his vertue defended his person, and his naturall courage ouercame his present daunger, the fiercenesse and agility of his horse doing more to his safety, then the succours of his people. In these great perils, there wanted not in him, those councels, which in actions dangerous are wont most to appeare in mens memory and fancies: for that in so great a distresse of fight feeing him felfe almost made naked of his gard, and abandoned of fortune and worldly fuccors; he had recourse to the heavenly aides, making a vow to S. Denys and S. Martyn, reputed protectors particular of the realme of Fraunce, that if hee passed safe into Piemont with his army, he would, as soone as he was returned on the other side the Mounts, make personall visitation, and that with great gifts, to the holy temples dedicated to their names, the one flanding neare to Parus, and the other in the towne of Tours: and that every yeare with most solemne seasts and sacrifices, he would honour and celebrate fo great a grace received by their meane. After this contemplation and promise to accomplish these vowes, he entred into a new courage, the strength of his body redoubling in the spirit and comfort of his minde, and so began effloone to fight with greater valour then his complexion could naturally beare. The daunger of the King so touched and enflamed those that were left farre off, that running to couer with their persons the person of the King, they sustained the Italians: and his battell which remained behind, pressing in at the fame time, an esquadron of the same charged so furiously the enemy in the slancke, that it moderated formewhat their heate, and prefently reskued the kings danger: whereunso was added this helpe, that Rodolphe Gonzague Vicle by the mother to the Marquesse of Mantua, a Captaine of great experience, as he encoraged the fouldiers and reordered fuch as hee faw out of order, doing alwaies many other good offices of an excellent Captaine, as he raifed by chance his beauer, was so hurt in the face with an estockado by a french man, that falling from his horse, his people could neuer refcue him in fo great a confusion and tumult, and so thicke troupes of fierce horses raging without gouernment; but having other men and horses falling vpon him, he diedrather flifted and finoothered with the throng of horfes feete and treadings, then by the armes or blows of the enemies: A chaunce truely vnworthy such a man, for that in the councelles of the day before, and the same morning, he perswaded (contrary to the will of his nephew) to abstaine from fight, judging it a great want of discretion to hazard them selues to the will of fortune without any necessity. Thus the battell changing by diverse accidents, and no advantage appearing more for the Italians then for the french men, the difference was now more then euer to whom the victory would remaine: in so much that hope and feare being equall on both partes, they fought with an incredible fury, every one effeeming that the victory rested in his right hand and strength, and not at the disposing of fortune: An auncient perswasion in old souldiers, that in actions of " battell and warre, the successe of the victory followeth not the number of the souldiers, but resteth " in the resolution of their mindes and innnocency of their cause. The french menhad a desperate " courage, as well for the presence and daunger of their King (for that nation hathalwaies borne no leffe reuerence to the maiesty of their kings, then to things of divinity) as for that they were hemmed into fuch straights and places, as gaue no hopes of their fafety, but by the onely victory: The Italians were encouraged, by the couctousnesse of so rich a pillage, by the honorable example of the Marquesse leading them to the battell with so happy successe, and with the great number of . their army, by whom they had expectation of great fuccours from their friends and countreys enuironing; a thing which the french could not hope for, for that either their whole companies were already in the fight, or at least attended every instant to be charged and brought into the fortune of their fellowes. But it is not doubted, that the power of fortune is great in all our humaine acti- " ons, more mighty in matters of warre then in any other thing, but most infinite and inestimable » in the feates of armes, where, one commaundement ill vnderstood, one order ill executed, one » rafhnesse, one vaine voice, yea sometimes euen of the meanest souldier, carieth many times the victory to fuch as feemed euen then vanquished and ouercome, and where ynlooked for do happen » many fodaine accidents, which it is impossible to the Captaine by his experience to forsee, or let " by his councell, or affure by his wifedome: In fo much as, in fo great a doubt, not fayling of her custome, she did that, which neither the vertue of men, nor the force of armes had not yet done: for, the estradiots sent to charge the tents and baggage of the french, having begunne to spoyle without any refulance, and beginning to leade away to the other fide the water, fonce mulets, H iiij fome fompters; and fome armour: not onely the other estradiots appointed to charge the french in the flancke, but even fuch as were already within the fight, stirred vp with the fight of the gaine wherewith they faw their companions goe laden to their tents, left the battell, and turned their weapons to pill and spoile that that was left of the french pillage: and one cause, one respect, and one example drawing the refidue, you should see many horsemen, and sootmen issue by troupes out of the battell, to doe the like. By which occasion, not onely the succours ordained, failing the Italians, but even the number of those that fought dininishing with so great disorders, and Anthony of Montfeltre not remouing for that no ma called him, Gonzagua being flaine, vpon whole calling he depended, the french men beganne to winne formuch ground, that now nothing did more fultaine the Italians (manifeftly declining) then the vertue of the Marqueffe, who expresfing in his person all the actions required in a valiant Captaine, made head yet against the new fortune and fury of the enemies, and labouring with enery possibility to keepethen from the victory, fometimes he encouraged his people by his owne example, and eftfoones with fweet and pearcing speeches perswaded them, rather to lose their lives then their honors, seeking to resolve their mindes with all those respects of honor, profit, reputation, and necessity, which make the fouldier goe to the battell. But it was impossible that in a few should be continued long resistance against many, or that the vertue which is not fauoured with fortune should not at last faile. The enemies multiplied ypon them on all fides, a great part of their owne were flaine, and many hurt without hope of further helpe to the seruice, yea euen of the particular band of the Marquesse: by which extremities, they were driuen to fall into disorder, and flie to repasse the river, which by the raine ouer night, and the hailes and watery flormes falling in great aboundance during the fight, was risen so high, that it gaue great impediments to such as were forced to repasse ouer it. The french men followed the chase with a fury equall to their fortune, even to the river, regarding nothing more then to make flaughter of those that fled, without taking any prisoner, or respecting the spoils and gaine of the chase: onely they cried with redoubled voices; Companions remember Guiquegate: Guiguegate is a village in Picardie neare to Teronaue, where, in the later yeares of the raigne of Lowis the xj. the french men almost victorious in a battel against Maximilian king of Romains, being disordered because they beganne to fall to pillage, were put to flight. But at the same time that on that fide of the army the fight was valiant and obstinate, the vauntgard of the french (against the which the Count Caiazze led one part of the horsemen, came to the battell with so great a fury, that the Italians altonished when they saw they were not followed of their peoples, inclined of them selves so fast to disorder, that many of their leaders being slaine, amongest whom was John Piccingu and Galeas of Correge, they returned in manifelt flight to the great equadron. But the Mareshall of Gie, discerning (besides the squadron of the Count)an other regiment of men at armes prepared to the battell on the other fide the river, would not fuffer his fouldiers to follow them; which afterwards by some was reputed a councell discreete and wife, and by others, looking perhaps leffe into the reason then into the euent, it was judged a resolution rather cowardly, then constant: for that, if they had pursued them, the Count and his companies had given him their backes, by which difaray he had so amazed the residue of their strength remaining on the other fide the water, that there would have bin great impossibility to retaine them, seeing that the Marquesse slying as well as the others, and repassing the river as strongly and in as good order as he could, found them in fuch tumults and feparations, as every one thinking to faue him felfe with his cariage, the high way that goeth from Plaisance to Parma was already full of horses, of men, and cariages which drew to Parma. This turnult partly was stayed by the presence and auethority of the Marquesse, who reassembled them, and put est soons all in order: But much more did e reassure the divided mindes of the Italians the comming of Count Petillane, who in so generall a confusion of both the armies, vsing the occasion, fled to the Italian campe: where dispersing comof fort to euery one, and affirming that amongst the enemies, was no lesse disorder and amaze, he eftsoones confirmed and reassured their mindes: In so much that both by opinion and reason, cuery one supposed that without him, either at the instant, or at least the night following, all the campe had dispersed in great terrour. Thus the Italians retired to their campe, except such as being caried with confusion and tumult, and thinking to finde safety in flying, were separate into fundry places, whereof many falling into the hands of the french men, found at one instant an end of their life and fortunes. The king with his people drew to his vauntgard which had not stirred: And

And there deuling with his Captaines, whether he should suddenly passe the river and give vpon the enemies in their lodgings, he was councelled by Truncle and Camilla Vivellis, (who was come to the battell with a few horsenier), hatting sent the residue of his company to the enterprise of Genes) to set vpon them: and Francis Seece surthering the expedition more then any other, told the King that the way that was seene so farte off, was full of nen and horses, which argued that either they were fled to Parma, or having begunne the chase, were estisons returned to the campe: But truely the difficulty to passe the river was not little: and the bands that partly had sought, and partly were kept armed in the field, were so weary and ouer-travelled, that by the councell of the french Captaines, it was determined to seek harbour: and so they went to lodge vpon the hill in the village of Medesane, of little more distance then a mile from the place of the battell: there they pitched their lodging without any order, but with great incommodity, for that the most part of their baggage and stuffe was made pillage by the enemy.

This was the discourse of the battell betwene the Italians and the french ypon the river of Taro, not vinworthy of memory, for that it was the first of very long time that was fought in Italie with flaughter and bloud, seeing that in all battels or actions of warre in that countrey, the liues of men were wont more to be put to raunsome, then fold with the price of bloud. But in this, notwithflanding of the french part, the flaughter fearcely contained three hundreth bodies, yet of the Italians were found dead more then three hundreth men at armes, and of others as many as made vp the number of three thousand persons, amongest whom was Ramiccio de Farneze leader of the Venetian horsemen, with many other gentlemen of marke. Barnardin de Montone also a Captaine of horsemen under the Venetsans, whose name was more populous and renowmed by Braccio de Montone his grandfather, one of the first beautifiers of the Italian discipline of war, then by his proper vertue or fortune, received a blow with a mafe under his helmet, with the which being fallen from his horse, he was left on the ground for dead. This slaughter was so much the more wonderfull to the Italians, by how much the encounter endured not aboue an houre, every one on both fides fighting with his proper force and valour, without helpe of the artillery or shot. Touching the honour of the journey, either part laboured to appropriate to his particular, the renowme and glory of the victory: The Italians occupied this reason, for that their tents and cariages remained vntouched, where the french on the contrary, had their lodgings rifled, and lost much of their best stuffe, yea part of the proper paulions of the King: They alleadged further, that they had vtterly discomfitted the enemies, if one part of their people appointed to enter the battell, had not turned to the pillage of their trenches; a thing which the french confessed to be true. The Venetians were so partiall, that with a peculiar glory they made them selucs victors, and by publicke commaundement through all the landes of their obedience, and specially at Venice, they made bonfires, with other feaftes and testimonies of gladnesse. This publicke example was followed with no lesse affection of fundry particulars, for that vpon the sepulchre of Melchsor Trenifan, were flamped these caracters of letters in the Church of the Frear minors; He fought prosperously vpon the river of Taro against Charles King of Fraunce. But by the vniversall content of men indifferent, the palme, merit, and true glory of the victory, was adjudged to the french men, both for the numbers of the dead, to farre different and vnequall, and for the chase of the enemics ouer the river, and also for that they wonne their liberty to passe further, which was the controuerfie for the which they came to the battell. The king remained all the day following incamped in the fame place, procuring (by the meane of Argenton) a parley with the enemies, by which was accorded a truce til night: that abstinence or truce was not vnwelcome to the King, for that he defired to passe with surety, knowing that many of the Italians army had not yet sought, and remaining in order about their trenches, the march of so many daies iourney through the Duchy of Millan with the enemy in his taile, could not but be daungerous: Besides, he knew not what resolution to take, such was the simplenesse of the councell with whom he vsed most conference and direction in his most waightiest deliberations, rejecting for the most part the aduises of men graue and experienced. No leffe doubt and incertainty trauelled also the mindes of the Italians, who albeit at the beginning were falne into no small assonishment, yet they were estsoons fo reassured, that the night after the battell, they held councell, (by the encouraging and comfort chiefly of the Count Petillane) to inuade the french campe in the night, being difordered with many incommodities, and not fortified: by the plurality of voices this councell was rejected, as bringing more perill then profite. There ranne a brute through all Italy, that the bands of Lodowike Sforce, according to his fecrete direction, would not fight much, least having fo strong an army of the Venetians upon his estates, he was in more feare of their victory, then of the fortunes of the french, touching whom he was indifferent whether they were victours or vanquished; and therefore for his better furety in all chaunces, he was blamed for his fubtelty to keepe his forces whole, vpon which was imposed the occasion that the Italians army did not obtaine the victory. This opinion was maintained by the Marquesse of Mantua and the other Venetian Captaines, to make their reputation the greater: neither was it received with leffe will of all fuch as defired the augmentation of the glory of the Italian fouldiers: But I have heard this brute confuted, by a personage of judgement and grauity, and remaining then at Mullan in such degree, as the absolure and true knowledge of affaires was brought to him: he purging Lodowike, affured the world, that having fent most of his forces to the siege of Nonaro, he had not so many at the battell of Taro as were of great consequence for the victory, which in deede the army of the consederates had obtayined, if their proper diforders had not hurt them more then the want of a great number of men, feeing withall, that many whole companies of the Venetians fought not at all: and where the Count Carazze fent against the enemy but one part of his companies, and that very coldly, he did it perhaps, for that the vaunt gard of the french was fo strong, that the daunger was apparant to commit him felfe to fortune, and perhaps because ordinarily actions couragious and venterous haue made him more wonderfull, then fuch wherein was furety: notwithstanding, the companies of Sforce were not altogether unprofitable, for that albeit they fought not, yet they kept at a bay the vauntgard of the french, and were the caufe that it gaue no fuccours to the king, who with the leffe or most weake part of the army, fulfained with the great daunger of his perfon, all the brunt and fwaigh of that daies fight. In my judgement this testimony is no more confirmed with authority then with reason: for, how is it likely that if that intention had bene in Lodowike, he would not rather have instructed his Captaines, to disswade from letting the french men to passe: seeing that if the victory had falne on the french, his bands being so neare the enemy, had bene no more in fafety then the others, notwithstanding they medled not in the battell: and with what discourse, with what consideration, or with what experience of things could he promise to him selfe, that comming to the fight, fortune would be so equall, that the french king should neither be victor nor vanquished.

The morning following, the King departed with his army before day, without found of frompets, to couer his discamping as much as he could: and for that day he was not followed by the army of the confederates, who though they had had will to have purfued him, yet they should have found impediments in the waters of the river, which were so much increased by raines that fell in the night, that there was no possibility of passage for the day following: Onely at the declining of the Sunne passed ouer not without daunger, the Count Caiazze with two hundred light horfemen, and following the trace of the french men, who marched the right way towardes Platfance, he gaue them the day following many alarmes and impediments: and yet, all wearied and trauelled as they were, they kept their way without diforder, the villages refreshing them with plenty of victuals, partly for feare to receive hurt by them, and partly by the meane of Trinules, who icouring before for the fame effect with the light horsemen of the army, made perswasions to men, formerimes by threats, and formetimes with his authority, great in that Duchy with all fortes, but more great with the family of the Guelffes. The army of the league which removed the day after the discamping of the french, and but little disposed (specially the provisors of the Venetians) to put them selues any more in the arbitrement of fortune, came neuer so neare them, as to annoy them with any little discommodity: but being lodged the fecond day upon the river of Trebia a little beyond Plaisance, (the Swizzers and two hundreth launces and almost all the artillery remaining betweene the river and the city of Plaisance for the commodity of incamping,) the flouds were so great by reason of the raines falling in the night, that not with standing their extreame diligence, it was impossible that either the footemen or horsemen could passe but at high daies, and then with difficulty, although the waters began to abate; notwithflanding all which oportunities favoring the army of the league, yet they neuer executed any action against the french but a farre off, nor yet the Count de Catazze who was entred within Plaisance, for suspicion of renolt or tumult: which suspicion was not altogether without occasion, for that it was beleeved, that if the King according to the councell of Trinulce, had displayed his ensignes under the name of Frauncis the little fonue of Iohn Galess, the Duchy would eafily have falne into some mutation, so plautible was the name of him whom they held for their lawfull Lord, and so hatefull the remembrance of the vsurper, and of speciall importance the credit and friendships of Trivulce. But the King in whom was letled no other impression then to passe on, would not be entangled with new practites, but followed his way with diligent and speedy march, finding great want of victuals after the first daies trauell, and in all places, the forts and peeces well garded, Lodowike having distributed what into Tortone under lasper S. Seuerin, surnamed Frecasse, and what into Alexandra, many horfmen with twelve hundred lance-knights, which he had drawne from the campe of Nonaro. After the King was passed Trebia, his army was alwaies vexed in the taile by the Count Caiazze, who had ioyned to his light horsemen fluehundreth launce-knights of the garrifon of Plaisance, not being able to obtaine to be sent to him from the army, all the residue of the light horsemen and soure hundreth men at armes, for that the Venetian Commissioners, warned by the perillat the battell of Taro, would give no confent eftfoones to hazard their forces: at last the french men taking (when they were neare to Alexandrsa) their way more high towardes the mountaine where the river of Tanaro runnes with shallowest water, were brought without losse of men in eight remoues or soiournings of the campe afore the wals of Ast: in which city after the King was entred, he dispersed his men of warre into the champion, with intention to encrease his army, and to abide in Italy untill he had fuccoured Novaro: and the campe of the league which had purfued him to the countrey of Tortone, dispairing now to vexe him more, went and joyned it selfe to the companies of Lodowike Sforce besieging the sayd city of Nonaro: which even now began to suffer great scarcity of victuals, for that by the Duke of Orleans nor his people had bene vsed any diligence for prouision, which by reason of the fertility of the countrey, they might have done in great plenty and at casie rate: but like men either blinded with security, or else of litle pollicy, they neuer confidered of the daungers, till the meane of the remedy were past, consuming without sparing all the store of victuals which they found there.

About this season returned to the King those Cardinals and Captaines, who with ill success The french had bene at the enterprise of Genes: for after the Kings army by sea had taken the towne of Spe-Kings attempt tia, it set vpon "Rapalle and possess tia, it set vpon "Rapalle and possess tia, it set vpon "Rapalle and possess the case of the port of Genes a nauy of seasons to see the case of the port of Genes and possess the case of the port of Genes are nauy of seasons to see the case of the port of Genes are nauy of seasons the case of the port of Genes are not provided the case of the port of Genes are not provided to the provided to the port of Genes are not provided to the provide eight light gallies, one carracke, and two barks of biskayes, which by night put on land feuen hundreth footenien, who without any difficulty tooke the borough of Rapalle, with the french garrison that were within, and then accoasting the french nauy retired to the gulfe, after long fight they remained victors, taking and burning all their vessels, the Captaines made prisoners, and the place by this victory made more renowmed, for that in the yeare before, the Aragons were there defeated: neither was this aduerfity recompenced by the army that went by land, who guided by the East river to Valdibifague, and so to the suburbs of Genes, found them selves deceived in their hopes, that in Genes would rife tumults: and therefore understanding of the spoile and losse of the nauy by sea, they tooke way with no lesses speeds then feare, to the mountaine sharpe and vneasie, and from thence descended to the valley of Pozzenere, which is on the other part of the city: from whence, not with standing their troupes were strong and great by the concourse of payfants and other populars, whom the Duke of Sanoy had fent in their fauours, they drew with the fame diligence towards Piemont . In the action of this enterprise it is certaine, that if they within the towne had not benerestrained from issuing forth, for doubt least the faction of Fregosa would make some innouation, they had wholly broken the french army and put them to flight. The horsmen also of Vitelli (now come to Chiauere, understanding the successe and great disorder of those with whom they went to ioyne in strength) retired with no lesse hast then daunger, to Serezana: in so much, that except Specia, all the places of that river that had bene occupied by the banished, reappealed or called againe forthwith the Genowayes, as did in like fort in the river of the Ponent, the city of Vintemille, which in the fame daies had bene occupied by Paul Baptista

Fregofa, and certaine others of the banished.

In the same times, the warre was also as hoat in the realme of Naples, as in the partes of Lum- Ferdinand 10 bardy, but with a more diverse fortune: for, Ferdinand after he had taken Regge, considered how recover his he might recover the places bordering, having in his army six thousand men, comprehending such the horse and Sicile, as willingly followed him, together with the horsemen and soomen of

of the Spanish, ouer whom was Captaine, Confaluo Ernandes of the house of D' Aghilar, and countrey of Cordone, a man very valiant and long exercised in the warres of Granado. This man, at his first comming into Italy, being called (by a Spanish bragge) the great Captaine, the better to fignifie with this title, the fourraigne power that he had ouer them, did well deferue by many goodly victories which he there atchieued, that that furname might be justly appropriated, confirmed, and perpetuated in him by vniuerfall confent, in teltimony of his great vertue and excellency in the knowledge of warre. To this army, which had already stirred up a great part of the countrey, Monsieur D' Aubigny presentes him selse neare Seminara, a towne vpon the sea, with the men at armes of Fraunce remaining for the gard of Galabria, and fuch bands of horfmen and footenen as the Lords of the countrey of the french faction had fent to him: and being come to the battell, the valour of the fouldiers which were of traine and exercife, caried the victory against the ignorance of the other little experienced: for, not onely the Italians and Sicilians which Ferdinand had gathered in half, but also cuen the Spaniards, were fouldiers new and vntrained to fernice; with whom not with flanding, he maintained the skirmish with great stoutnesse, for that the vertue and authority of the Captaines failing nothing of their place and office, full ained fuch as for all other regards, were much inferiour: Ferdinand about the refidue, applying vertue to the innocency of his quarrell, behaued him selfe as well appertayned to his vertue: in so much as his horfe being flaine under him, he had in all coniecture, remained either dead or taken, if 10hn de Capua brother to the Duke of Terminy, (who had bene his Page from his childhood, and whon' he entirely loued in that floure of age) had not alighted and remounted him you his horse, and with an example of faith and loue very notable and worthy, offered his owne life for the fafety of his Lord, in whose presence he was slaine vpon the place: Consaluo fleeth along the mountaines to Reage, and Ferdinand to Palma, which lieth vpon the sea neare to Seminara, and there tooke gallies and fayled to Messina. And as inaduersities necessity is mighty to make men resolute, so by this ouerthrow, there encreased in him a new courage and will to assay againe the trial of fortune: for, he was not onely aduertifed, that the whole city of Naples thirsted with great defire to haue him, but also by secret intelligence he knew, that he was generally called by the principals of the nobility and people: and therefore eschewing delaies where was so great necessity of expedition, and fearing least lingring ioyned to the reapport of his ouerthrow in Calabria, might not eftfoones, make cold that new disposition: after he had assembled (besides the gallies which he had led from Y (chia, and the foure that feruedhis fathers first departure from Naples) the other vessels that brought the Spaniards into Sicile, with all others that he could recour of the cities and Barons of Sicile, he hoyfeth faile out of the port of Aleffina, not tarrying, for that he had not men of warre fufficient to arme them: wherein wanting forces convenient for fuch an enterprise, he was constrained to furnish and serve his turne, no lesse with demonstration and apparaunce, then with the effect and substance of things: he departed from Sicile with Ixx, vessels of cable and ancker, and twenty others of leffe proportion, accompanied with Ricaiense of Catelogma, Captaine of the Spanish vessels, a man whose experience was equall to his resolution internices at sea the had fo finall proportions of fighting men, that in most part of these vesselles, there were almost no other fortes or natures of men, then fuch as necessarily were appointed to the service of the nauigation: In this fort his forces were finall, but great towards him were the fauors and good wils of the people:in fo much that being atriued in the road of Salerne, Salerne it felfe, the coast of Melff, and of Cano, hoifed their streamers to the wind. Afterwards he remained two daies aboue Naples, in expectation to heare of some tumult, in the towne: but for the time his fortune being flow, made his defire vaine, for that the french men running prefently to armes, & planting fure gard vpon places of perill, suppressed immediately the rebellion that euen already was kindled: yea, they had put remedy to altheir dangers, if they had valiantly followed the councel of fome amongst them, who geffing that the veffels of the Aragons were ill manned with fouldiers able to fight, aduifed Monfieur Montpensier to refurnish the french vessels which were in the hauen, with bodies resolute and men of action, and fo give the charge to the enemy. The third day Ferdinand despairing of commotion in the city, turned his failes into the feaward to retire to Y schia. by which it hapned, that the conspirators with Ferdinand, considering that their faction & intelligence was now discouered, and therefore his cause was become theirs, and proper and generall to every one of them, drew them to an affembly, and determined to be blinde against all daungers and difficulties, making of their common common necessitie a speciall vertue: This deliberation was followed to effect, for that they dispatched fecretly a litle boate to call home Ferdinand, befeeching him to put on land either all or the greatest part of his companies, to the end to joyne meane and courage to such as were inclined to make infurrection in his fauour. V pon this intelligence, Ferdinand returned eftfoones aboue Naples, and the day after the battell of Furnoue, he approched neare the shoare to take land at Alagdalena a myle from Naples, and where the river of Sebeta falls into the sea: it is rather a finall brookethen a river, which yet had lyen vnknowen if the verfes of the Poets of Naples had not given it a name: Monfieur Montpensier to whom all things were disclosed, shewedhim selfe no leffe hardy & ready to charge them when was cause to feare them, then he was vnresolute and fearefull the day before when courage was necessary: In so much that issuing out of the Citie almost with all his strength to stop the descending of Ferdinand, the Neapolitanes taking the opor-The Citie of nitie of the occasion (which was such as they could not have defired better) rose suddeinly into Naples rifeth armes: and founding alarme by ringing the great bell of the Friers next to the walls of the town, nand, all the other Churches doing the like, they seazed vponthe gates of the towne, and began to publish the name of Ferdinand. This suddeine tumult so amazed the French men, that holding it a place of no furetie to remaine betweene the enemics and the Citic rebelled, and leffe expectation to returne by that way they issued out, they determined to reenter Naples by the gate that belonged to the new Castell: for the accomplishment whereof they must take a long way, full of hills and troublesome, and compassing the walls of the towner. But in this meane while Ferdinand being entred, and mounted on horsebacke with certaine of his followers by the Neapolstanes, rode through the towne, to the incredible love and gladnesse of every one, the communaltic receiving him with great cryes and showtes, and the Ladies and women beholding him our of windowes and calements, could not be fatisfied to couer him with flowers & fweet finelling waters: yea mamy of the Nobles ranne in the streetes to embrace him and wype the sweat from his face, not being negligent for all this in things necessary for the defence of the Citie: for, the Marquis of Pifcarre accompanied with the fouldiers which were entred with Ferdinand and the youth of Naples, looked to the intrenching and fortifying of all places for their defence against the French: who after they were come vpon the greene of the new Castell, and doing what they could to reenter into the hart of the Citie, were so repulsed by crosbow men and small shot, that finding at all the entreyes and commings to the streetes, a refistance strong and sufficient, and the night now drawing on, they retired to the Castell, leaving almost (of all fortes) two thousand horses upon the greene, having no place nor feeding for them in the Castell: within the Castell were inclosed with Monsieur Montpensier, Messier Yues a' Alegro, a Captaine of reputation, and Anthone Prince of Salerne, with many others French and Italians of marke: who albeit spent certaine dayes in skirmilhing, aswell on the Castell greene as about the port, discharging their artillerie into the towne, yet finding in their repulses a redoubled vallour in the enemie, they remained voy de of hope to be able to recouer the Citie of them felues.

The example of Naples was immediatly followed by Capua, Aner (a, the tocke of Montdragon, and many other peecesthere abouts, yea most part of the kingdome was suddenly in reuolt: Amongest whom those of Caleeta taking armes with more courage then force, and their hopes farre greater then their fortune, for that certaine galleys of Ferdinand were discouered afore the hauen, they were with generall flaughter oppressed by the French garrisons there, who with a furie agreeing with the cause given, sacked all their Citie.

At the fame time the naule of the Venetians being come neare to Monopoly one of the Cities of Powylla, after they had fet on land their Estradiots and many of their sootemen, assaulted it both by fea and land, where Peter Bembo owner of one of the Venetian galleys was flaine with a shot out of the towne. But in the end fortune yeelding to vertue, the Citie was taken by force, and the Castell likewise rendred, for feare which the French Captaine had that kept it: the said nauy tooke also by composition the towne of Puligniane.

Ferdinand was not without apparant hopes to hauethe new Castell and the Castell of the egge, for that famine (which is an enemie trouble some) served more for him then his force or pollicie, there remaining a verie small quantitie of victuals in regard of the proportion of men that were within ; and winning ypon them cotinually the places about the Castell, to the end to keepe them at a straiter compasse: the French men succouring the adversities of their fortune with industry &

pollicie, seeing their armie by sea had no suretie in the haue, which conteined fiue ships, soure light galleis, a galliot, & a gallion: they retired them betweene the tower of S.V incent, the egge calleli, & Pizsfalcone, which yet they held, as also the hinder parts or skirtes of new castell where were the gardins of the kings: in so much as keeping peeces enento Capella, & fortifying the monasterie of the croffe, they made incursions even to Piegrotte & S. Martin. Against whom Ferdinana having taken & fortifyed Hipodrome, & made couert wayes by Incoronato, he possessed the Mount of &. Herme, & afterwards the hill of Presfulcone, the Frech holding the castell seated in the highest part of it. To hinder the succours that were to come fro it (for in taking it they might endomage & batter fro the steepe places the nauy of the enemy) Ferdinand assailed the monasteric of the crosse :at whose first approch they received such harmes by the artillery, that dispairing to win it by force, they deuised to betray it by practise and intelligence; a deuise very vnhappy and wretched to him that was the authour: for that a More which was within, having frauduletly promifed to the Marquis of Pifcare (aforetimes his mafter) to put him within the place, & in that action, having made him come by night by a ladder fastened to the wall of the monastery to speake with him, to the end to agree youn the manner and time to enter it the fame night: he was by great treason and dou-Pifcare flaine. ble intelligence flaine with the shot of a crosbow running through his throat.

so the pay of Ferdinand.

It was not of litle importance for the affaires of Ferdinand, the revolt first of Profeer and then colling returne of Fabrice Collonne, who during the bond of their feruice and oath contracted with the French king, (going with the streame of the time) returned to the pay of Ferainand almost associated had recovered Naples: They excused them selves, that they were not saisfied in time of their due payments promifed; and that to Virginio Vrsin and the Count Pellutane (with small regard to their merites) were given many favours and advauncements of the king: a reason that seemed to many very weake, and farre inferiour to the greatnesse of the benefites which they had received of him: But it may be doubted, that that which reasonablic ought to serue as a bridle to restraine them, was the very motion that led them to do the contrary, feeing by how much the benefites. they had received were great and many, by to much perhaps was great in them the defire to keepe them, looking withall into the ill disposition of the affaires of the French, which began euen

then to shake and decline.

But now the Castell thus hemmed in, and the searestrained by the nauies of Ferdinand, the want of victuals increased more and more, and they that were befreged interteined them selves onely with hopes to have succours out of Fraunce by sea, the rather for that the king (assoone as he was arrived at Aft) had dispatched Peron de la Basche to rigge in the hauen of Ville Franche neare Nice an armic at sea of two thousand Gascoynes and Snyzzers with prouision of victuals, whose leader and Captaine should be Monsieur d'Arban, a man warlike, but not experimented in the service of the sea. This nauie being put under sayle and arrived as far as the Isle of Poreze, discovering thereabout the nauie of Ferdinand conteining thirtie fayles and two great ships of Genowa, retired and fell forthwith into flight: and being purfued vnto the Isle of Elba, they made way in such feare to the hauen of Lyuorne, with the losse of a litle shippe of Biscay, that it was not in the power of the Captaine to withhold most of his men from going on shoare, and against his discipline & will to runne amaine to Pysa. By reason of the retire and desseate of this armie at sea, Al. Mompensier with his companies, pressed with want of victuals, accorded to render the Castell to Ferdinand, having now endured the fiege three moneths, & fro thence to go to Provence, if they were not rescued within thirtie dayes. This contract included suretie of life & goods to all such as were within the castell, giving oftage to Ferdinand, Tues d'Alegre with three others for assurance of the coditions. But the shortnesse of time made impossible all hope or expectation of succours, other the fuch as they had within the realme: In which respect M.de Persie one of the Captaines of the king, accopanied with the Swyzzers and part of the Frech launces, & the Prince of Byligman with many other Barons, drew straight to Naples: against whom Ferdinand having espiall of their comming, fent out to Eboly the Count of Matalono with an army for the most part confused, compounded of bodies whom he trusted, & esteemed his friends: This armie albeit much superiour in numbers & furniture, yet encountring the enemy at the lake of Pizzola, which is a litle borough neare Eboly, they fell into generall diforder & prefent flying without fighting. In which chafe was taken prisoner Venantio sonne of Iulius Varano Lord of Camaryn: but being not pursued by the Frech, they retired without great losse to Nola & so to Naples. The Frenchme taking courage by this felicitie) followed their enterprise to succour the Castels, and that with so great reputation for the victorie obteined, that Ferdinand was at point once againe to abandon Naples: but receiuing courage by the comfortes of those of the towne, who were no lesse pushed forward perhaps with the feares their had of their lines, (remembring their rebellion) then with the friend-Thip they bare to Ferdinand, incamped at Capella: and the better to let the enemies for approching the Castell, casting a trench from the Mount S. Hermo vntill the egge Castell, he furnished with artillerie and footemen all the hills vnto Capella and aboue Capella: In fo much that albeit the Frenchmen, who being come to Nocere by the way of Salerna, passing by the caue and the hill Piegrotte, were guided to Chiase neare to Naples: yet all things having good defence, and by the vallour of Ferdinand, the artilleries thundring vpon the Frenchmen, but specially those that were planted upon the hill of Pizifolcone which comanded the egge Castell (where earst were the fingularities and pompes so much renowmed of Lucullus) they could passe no further, nor approch Capella: and having no meane to make further abode there, for that nature favoreth the place with all pleafures and commodities fauing fresh waters, this necessitie constrained them to retire fooner then they would, leaving behind at their discamping three peeces of artillerie, and part of the relieffes which they had brought to reuichuall the Castels: they tooke their way towards Nola, against whom Ferdinand opposed him selfe, leaving the Castell besieged, and incamped with his companies in the plaine of Palma neare to Sarnie. Monfieur Alontpensier seeing by their departure, nothing but an otter losse and privation of all hopes for rescues, leaving three hundreth men within the Castell (a number no lesse proportioned for the victuals which now were fhort , then for the service and defence) and a garrison within the egge Castell: drew away with him the refidue (which were in all two thousand fine hundreth souldiers) and by night embar-pension flear king him felfe and his companies in the veffels there, he went to Salerna, not without the great leth from Nacomplaintes of Ferdinand, who pretended, that is was not lawfull for hun (during the terme ples. wherein he had promifed to yeeld) to depart with fuch a companie, vnleffe he had rendred both the Castels according to the contract. This escape wrought many passions in Ferdinand, in whom was no want of inclination (according to the rigour of the contract) to revenge the injuric and infidelitie of Montpensier, vponthe bloud and life of the Ostages: for that the Castels not redeliuered at the terme accorded, he had abused the wordes of his promise with a meaning diffembled: Notwithstanding extremities redoubling with time vpon those that remained, not able any longer to keepe force against the rage of hunger, within lessethen one moneth after he was parted, they rendred the Castell with conditions to have the oftages delivered. And almost at the same time, and for the same occasion they that were within the egge Castell, agreed to yeeld the first day of the next Lent, if they were not rescued before. Much about this time dyed at Messina, Alphonso of Aragon: the glory and fortune of whom (by which whilest he Alphonso king was but Duke of Calabria, his name was made honorable and famous,) were converted into of Aragon a great infamie and infelicitie when he came to be king of Naples: It was faid, that a little before his death, he made instance to his sonne to returne to Naples, where the hatreds that were generall against him before time, were now almost reconverted into affections and good likings: To whom it is supposed that Ferdinand (ambition & desire to reigne bearing more tule in him the reverence and respect to his father) aunswered no lesse suttlely then in scorne, that he should attend & expect till he had so assured the Realme, that he should not estsoones be driven to abandon it and slie.

Ferdinand, to entetteine him in the friendships of the king of Spayne with a bond more straite Ferdinal maand assured, tooke to wife with dispensation of the Pope, Jane his aunt, daughter to Ferdinand his rieth his Aunt.

grandfather, and of lane lifter to the faydking of the Spanish.

In this meane while that the fiege was continued with diuerfe fuccesse about the Castels of Naples (as hath bene fet downe) the fiege of Novaro also was still holden and brought to very straite and hardtermes: for the Duke of Myllan had there a puissant armie, which the Vene- The sege of tians had fuccoured with fuch a readinefle, that in no enterprife within memorie have they bene Youare. knowen to make leffe sparing of charges, nor yfed more fidelitie and diligence: there were in this campe of the confederates three thousand men at armes, three thousand light horsenicn, a thousand Almaines on horsebacke, & five thousand sootemen Italians: but the principal strength of their armie flood upon the ten rhoufand Launceknights (for fo are the Almaines footemen called) entertained most part by the Duke of Myllan, to be opposed against the Smy zers, for that the

Italian footemen could not endure their name, and much leffe heare speake of them without feare, so greatly were they diminished in reputation and courage, since the French men had action in Italie: ouer them were gouernours many Captaines of vallour, resolute, and for experience generally recommended, amongest whom bare a name most fingular George Pietrepante of the countrey of Austrich, who a few yeares before, being in the pay of Maximilian king of Roengines, conquered with an honorable prayse vpon the French king, the towne of S.Omer in Picardie. The Senate of Venice was not onely carefull to fend to this fiege many bands of fouldiers, but also to entertaine them in a greater courage, they created gouernour and Captaine generall ouer the armie, the Marquis of Mantua, honoring in him by the collation of that dignitie, the vertue he shewed in the battell of Furnoue or Taro, and with an example worthy of eternall memorie, they had not only increased the payes of such as shewed vallour there, but also indued with pensions and fundry recompences the sonnes of many that dyed in that battell, and transferred dowrie to their daughters. The fiege of Nouaro was continued with this mighty armie, for that the councell of the confederates (referring all things apperteining to that action to the will of Lodowyke Sforce) was not to hazard the triall of battell with the French king, vnlesse they were constrained, but rather in fortifying about Nouaro the places necessarie, their intentions were to let victuals for entring: They hoped that those within could not hold out long, for that they had · leffe store of victuals then would serue their numbers and proportion, and no expectation of remedie in a case so restrained: for, besides the people of the Citie, and the paysants which were thither retired, the Duke of Orleans had of French and Smyzzers more then seven thousand of choise . In which respectes, Galeas de S. Seuerin, giuing ouer all cogitation to take the towne by force, for the multitudes of men of warre that were within, had incamped him felfe with the Dukes armie at Mugnes, a place of furetie vpon the high way, very convenient to give impediments to the provisions that might come to Verceill: and the Marquis of Alantna with the bands of the Venetians, taking at his arrivall by force, certaine peeces there about, together with the Castell of Brione, a service of some importance, had also refurnished Camarian and Bolgare which are betweene Nouaro and Verceill, distributing the armie into fundry places about Nouaro, the better to stoppe the course of victuals, and fortifying every particular lodging and trench. to be the more casie and ready to resistance.

On the other fide the French king, to have more oportunitie to the fuccours of Novaro, was removed from Ast to Thuryn: and albeit he made many journeyes even to Chyars, to make court to a Lady remayning there, yet that vanitie brought no negligence to the common affaires, for that they ceased not without intermission to consider of the provisions for the warres, soliciting continually the companies come out of Fraunce, with intention to put to the field two thousand French launces: They were no lesse diligent to solicite the descending of ten thousand Swyzzers, for the leuve of whom was dispatched the Bayliffe of Dyon: Their resolution was, that assoone as the armie was possessed of them, to aduaunce all meanes possible to rescue Nonaro: without the strength of the Swyzzers, there was litle abilitie in the French to accomplish any worthy enterprise, seeing the Realme of Fraunce in those times albeit mighty in horsemen, and well furnished with artilleries and men most apt and nymble to manage them, yet it was verie weake infootemen of the proper region: The reason was, that armes and exercises of warre resting onely in the Nobilitie, the auncient vallour of that nation was fayled in the multitudes of men of base codition, ignorant in service martials for the long time they had not managedarmes. in place of which they had given them selves over to trades, profites, & delights of peace: for, many of the auncient kings before, fearing the fury of the popular fort, by the example of diverfe conspiracies and rebellions hapning in the same kingdome, thought it necessary in pollicie to disarme them, and draw them from the vse and practile of armes. For these reasons the Frenchmen, not trusting in the vertue of their owne footemen, neuer went to the warres with courage, vnlesse their armie were strengthned with certaine bands of the Swyzzers: which nation (in all ages refolute & hardy in armes) had about twenty yeares before much increased their reputation, for that being affayled by a mighty army led by Charles Duke of Bourbo (he that for his power & fiercenesse was much redoubted, not onely in the realme of Fraunce, but of all his neighbours) they had in lesse then one moneth put him thrise to flight, & at the last chase, either as he fought, or as he fled (the certaine manner being doubtfull) they tooke from him his life: So that what for their resolute vallour, and that the Frenchhadno controuersse with them, and lesse feare to doubt them for their interests particular, as they had of the Launceknights, they enterteined no other forreine fouldiers then the Swyzzers, vling their leruice in all their warres of importance: but more willingly at that time then at any other, for that they faw how hard a thing it was and full of daunger, to releue Nonaro enuironed with fo great an armie, & wherein were fo many bands of Launceknights go-uerned by the same discipline that the Smyzzers were.

The Citie of Verceill is firuated in the mid way betweene Thuryn and Nouaro, and having Vereill given in auncient times bene a member of the Duchie of Atyllan, it was given by Phillip Maria I if to the Duke of counte (during the long warres he had with the Venetians and the Florentines) to Ayme Duke Saury. of Saurye, to separate it from them. Into this Citie was not yet entred any bands of either part, for that the Duchesse mother and tutor to the young Duke of Sanoye, who in her hart was wholly French, would not discouer her felfe for the king till he were more strong, giving in the meane while to the Dike of Myllan gracious wordes and hopes: but affoone as the king was strongin men and come from Thuryn, a Citie of the same Duchie, she consented that he and his fouldiers should enter within Verezul, when by the oportunitie of that place he entred into a greater hope to be able to fuccour Novaro when all his strength should be assembled. And on the other. Ale the confederates, for the fame reason began so to doubt, that to debate with a more type and full councell haw they should proceede in such difficulties, Lodowyke Sforce went to the armie with Beatres his wife, who ordinarily accompanied him no leffe in matters of importance, then in actions familiar: in the prefence of whom, and (as the brute went) chiefly by her councell, the Captaines after many reasonings, concluded with one consent, that for the more common furetie of them all, the bands of the Venetians should be joyned to the armie of the Duke of Alegnes, leaving fufficient gard in all the other places about Novaro feruing to the fiege: That Volgaro should be abandoned, for that being within three myles of Verceell, it was necessary, if the French men came with Brength to get it, either to loofe it with infamie, or to succour it with the whole armie: That in Camarian three myles from Mugnes where the campe was, the garrison should be refurnished: Lastly, that the whole campe being fortified with trenches and rampiers, and supplyed with sufficient artilleries, the Captaines and affiltants should daily enter into other councels according to the behaviours of the enemie. They forgat not in this confult, to giue order to spoyle and cut downe all the trees even to the walls of Novaro, to giue incommodities to men and forage for horses, whereof there were great quantities in Nonaro. These resolutions established, and a general muster made of the whole armie, Lodowyke returned to Myllan to make with more readinesse such provisions as daily should grow necessarie for the service: wherein to give favours to the forces temporall, with the authorize and armes spirituall, the Venetuans and he wrought so much with the Pope, that he sent one of his officers at the mace to the The Pope come king, commaunding him within ten dayes to depart Italie with all his armie, and within an other mandes the short terme to fend all his people out of the Realme of Naples: otherwayes that under the spiri- French king to rituall paynes wherewith the Church is wont to threaten, he should appeare before him personal- 50 out of Italy. ly at Rome. This remedie the auncient Popes have vsed in tymes before: for according to traditions written, Adrian first of that name, constrayned with no other armes then these, Defiderise king of Lombardes (going with a flrong armie to trouble the Citie of Rome) to retire from Ternie (where he was arrived) to Pania: but the reverence and feare which for the holinesse of their life, was nourished in the harts of men, being now fayled, it was a thing hard to hope, that of manners and examples fo contrary, would come like effectes: the fame enabling the French king (fcorning at his comandement) to answer the messenger, that the Pope refusing at his returne from Naples to tarie him in Rome, whither he went devoutly to kiffe his feete, he could not but maruell, by what reason he could require him now to go thither: notwithstanding he sayd, that to obey him, he would looke to open his way, and prayed him least he tooke those paines in vaine, to attend him there till he came.

In this time, at Thuryn the king contracted with the Ambassadours of Florence new capitulations, not without the great contradiction of fuch as afore times had made relistance: who now had fo much the more occasion to impugne it, by how much the Florentines (after they had recouered the other boroughes and strong places of the hills of Py/a) their campe being afore Pone de Sac, and the fouldiers that were within rendring it with condition to have their lines faued:

puttothe Iword by the Florentines.

Capitulations betweene the French king and the Floretines.

The Gascopnes they did (contrary to their faith and promise given) put to the sword almost all the Gascopa footemen which were found with the Pylans, and vied many cruelties against the bodies dead: this accident albeit hapned against the wills of the Florentine Commissioners, who with great difficultie faued a great part of them, but altogether by the stirring vp of certaine fouldiers, who being prifoners to the French, were very rigorously dealt withall: yet in the Court of the king, all being taken by their aduerfaries as a figne manifest of mindes malicious to the name of all the Frenchmen, many impediments were objected to the folicitation and practife of the accord, which notwithanding had his paffage aud full conclusion, having more power then all other respectes, not the memorie of promises and othes solemnly made, but the vegent necessitie and want of money, and other commodities to fuccour the affaires of the kingdome of Naples. This was the accord: That without any delay, all the townes and Castles which were in the kings possession, should be reflored to the Florentines, vpon condition that the state of Florence should be bound to deliuer (within two years next comming at the pleafure of his Maiestie receiuing sufficient recompence for them) Pietrasanta and Serezana to the Genomays, in case their estate should fall to the iurisdiction and obedience of the king: That under this hope, the Florent mes should make present payment of the thirty thousand duckats remaining of the capitulation made at Florence, receiving a pawne of iewels for their furetie and restitution, if for any occasion their places were not rendred: That after the redeliuerie of their places, they should lend to the king vpon bonds of the Generals of the Realme of Fraunce (so are called the foure officers royall which receive the revenues of the crowne)three score and tenthousand duckats, and to send part of them in his Maiesties name to the bands which were in the Realme of Naples, & an other part to be ministred to the Collonors, in case they were not recociled & reaccorded with Ferdinad, whereof his Maiestie albeit he had some apparace, was not yet in fuch certaintie as to beleeue it: That if they had no wars in Tuskane, they shouldsend to Naples to the ayde of the French armie there, '250 men at armes : And in case their warres were but for the quarrell of Montpulcian, yet they should be bound to send the thither to accompanie the bands of Vitelli, and not to entertaine them in that feruice longer then the moneth of October: That they should remit and pardo the Pyfans for all their offences committed, giving them a forme certaine for the restitution of their goods which had bene taken from them, together with conuenient and liberall meanes to exercise their traffikes and marchandise: That for the furety and observation of these things, they should deliver as oftages at the election of the king, fixe of the principall Citizens of Florece, & they to remaine a certaine time in his Court. This accord concluded, and the thirty thousand duckats (which were immediatly fent to make a leavie of Smyzzers) given vnder gage of the kings iewels, the commissions and commandements of the king were immediatly dispatched to the Captaines of the places, to make present redeliucrie to the Florentines without any difficultie or standing.

The French kings I ewels are pawned.

But within Nouaro albeit the vertue of the fouldiers was great, & most great (for the memorie of the rebellion) the obstinacie of the townesmen to defend the towne, yet things divolued daily to more hard & difficult termes, the store of victuals so fast diminishing, that they began eue now to be pinched with the want of necessaries, & (according to the nature of extremities) their hopes to be relieued were no lesse desperate then their desires great, and their present lackes grieuous: Notwithstanding the Duke of Orleans, fornewhat to ease and fauour the hardnesse of their condition, had ryd out of the towne all mouthes and members vnprofitable: yet it was no remedie fufficient to fo great a calamitie, for that many fouldiers of the French and Swyzzers not able to beare the fretting anguish of hunger, '& lesse enured to the other discommodities of a close siege, began to languish in difeases and sicknesse: By reason whereof the Duke, being also troubled with a feuer quartaine, made many folicitations to the king by messengers and letters not to deferre their fuccours: which could not be aduanced with fuch readineffe as might be able to minifler to their generall necessities, for that there was not assembled such sufficiet streigth as imported the estate of their daunger: The French armie for their parts, shewing more forwardnesse of actio then able to do good, made many attempts to reuichall the towne by night, vfing to that purpose the feruice both of horfemen & footmen: but being alwayes discoucred by the enemie, there succeeded no other fruits of their enterprises then great harmes to them selues, and no lesse disapointments to their friends, being made more wretched by their ill fortune. But to ftop altogether the passage of victuals into the town, the Marquis of Mantua, assayled the Monasterie of S. Frauncis, Randing standing neare to the walls of Nonaro, and taking it, he manned it forthwith with a garrifon of two hudrethmen at armes, & three thousand footemen of the Almaines: By this meanes the armic confederate was discharged of a great care, the way being now made sure by the which reliefe was brought into the towne, the way also of the gate that leades to the mount Biandrane was flopped, for that in it was most facilitie to enter Nouaro: The day after he tooke also the Bastill made by the French vpon the point of the suburbes of S. Nazare, and the night following were furprifed the whole fuburbes together with the other platformes neare to the gate, wherein he beflowed a gard and fortified the suburbes, the Count Petillane (whom the Venetians had taken into their pay with title of gouernour) being hurt there with a finall shot neare the girdle place and in great daunger of death: For the successe of these places, the Duke of Orleans distrusting to be able to defend any more the other suburbes which he had at his entrey into Nonaro, he let fire on them the night following, and drew all his strength to the defence and gard of the Citie only: And touching the extremitie of famine, he yet nourished him selfe with hopes of succours, the rather for that the Swyzzers beginning now to arrive at the campe, the kings armie paffing the river of Steffa was marched out of Verceill a myle to lodge in the field, and having bestowed a garde in Bolgare, expected the refidue of the Smy zzers: who being once affembled, the armie was refolued to minister succours to Nonaro: an action notwithstanding full of many difficulties, for that the Italian bandes were lodged in places of aduauntage well furnished and fortified, and the way from Verceill to Nouaro, full of lakes and waters, and very vneasie for horsemen almost impassible, for the broad and deepe ditches thorow the whole countrey: Befides, betweene Bolgare holden by the French, and the campes of the Italians, was Camarian, which the Italians garded . In respect of these difficulties, there appeared not in the minde of the king nor of the others, a readinefle answering the expectation of those that attended in distresse: and yet it was supposed, that if the Smyzzers had fooner arrived, they had adventured the fortune of battell, the event whereof could not but be doubtfull to either of the armies : and therefore, they both having regard to the daunger present, there wanted no secret trauell to solicite an accord betweene the king and the Duke of Myllan, albeit it was with finall hope for the indifferent distrust that was betweene those two Princes, and for that both the one and other, for their greater reputation, made shewes that they had no deuotion to peace. But fortune layed open another meane more expedient for so great a conclusion: for about the same times, the Lady Marquise of Asomeerat being dead, and being in debate, who ought to take the gouernement of a lide sonne whom she had lest, to which Regentship aspired with one desire, the Marquis of Saluce, and Constantin brother to the said Lady deceassed, one of the auncient Lordes of Macedonia, which Mahomet Ottoman had occupied many yeares before: the French king fanouring much the tranquillitie of that estate, sent Argenton to Cafar Ceruas, to ordaine and establish a Protectorship according to the consent of the Tubiectes: and being gone thither also as a mourner for the death of the Lady one of the principall officers of the Marquis of Alantua, they two meeting vpon the way, fell into discourse and deuifes to have a peace, alledging many benefites that would redound to both parties: This voluntarie reasoning betweene them two succeeded to so good fruite, that the Lord of Argenton tooke oceasion to write to the Venetian Commissioners, reiterating the reasons and matters which had bene begun to be debated euer fince they were at Taro, and they fauouring the motion with very forward affections, communicated immediatly with the Captaines of the Duke of My.lan,& fo with one agreement, sent to require the French king (now come to Verceill) that he would affigne fome of his councell to meete in fome place convenient, to common with fuch as they should appoint in deputation for their part : whereunto the king consenting with a The counsel of readinesse equall to his defire, there assembled the day following betweene Bolgare and Cama- the king and of rian for the Venetians the Marquis of Mantua, and Bernard Contarin gouernour of their Estra-the Venetians diots: for the Duke of Myllan was sent Frauncis Barnardin Viscounte: & for the French king the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the Prince of Orange (to who being newly come to the campe, the king had giuen the principall charge ouer the whole army) the Mareshall of Gie, Monsieur de Pienes, and Orange gene-Monseur d'Argenton who making many meetings and certaine particulars of them making jour - rall of the neyes from the one armie to the other, the differences and chiefe controuerfies fell at last vponthe French armie. citie of Novaro: for that the French king making no difficultie in the effect of the restitution, but in the manner, the leffe to offend his honour, laboured that it might be referred (in the name of the king of Romaines direct Lord of the Duchie of Myllan) into the hands of one of the Almanne Captaines which was in the campe of the Italians: On the cotrary, the confederats required that it might be left frankly. These and other doubtes hapning, not being able to be resoluted with that speed which they that were within Nouaro required, being now falne upon such extremities, that what by famine, and other raging dileafes rifing by it, there were dead of the Dukes companie about two thousand bodies: a truce was made for eight dayes, with sufferance to the sayd Duke and the Marquis of Saluce, to go with a small companie to Verceall, but vnder promise and faith to returne to Nonaro with the same companie, if the peace proceeded not : and for the suretie of the Dukes person (for that he was to passe thorow the campe of the enemie) the Marquis of Mantua went to a tower neare to Bolgare in the keeping of the 'Count de Foix : the fouldiers that were to remaine in Novaro, would not have suffered him to depart, if he had not given them his faith, that within three dayes he would returne, or else by his meane they should have libertie to go out, the Mareshall of Gie being there for his conduit, leaving also one of his nephewes for ostage; for that not onely the victuals were consumed which ordinarily serued for the sustenance of man, but also the vucleane and filthy scrappes, from which they could not abstaine in so great an extremitie. Immediatly after the Duke was come to the kings presence, the truce was effoones proroged for a certaine few dayes, with condition that all his companies should go out of Nona. ro: that the towne should be left in the power of the people, and they to make an othe not to give it to either partie without common confent : and that thirtie footemen, who should be victualled daily by the campe of the Italians, should remaine in the Castell for the Duke of Orleans. Thus all the fouldiers issued out of Nouaro, whom the Marquis of Mantua & Galeas de S. Seuerin prorected and conducted till they were in place of suretie. But so much were they weakened & confumed with hunger, that they were no fooner arrived at Verceill, then many of them dyed, and the refidue remained altogether unprofitable for the feruice of that warre.

About this time, the Bailiffe of Dyon arrived at the campe with the residue of the Swyzzers, of whom albeit his commission was to leauie but ten thousand, yet he could not chuse but at the reapport of the kings money, there descended by troupes a far greater number, rising in the whole to an armie of twentiethouland: The one halfe was admitted to joyne to the campe neare Vercestl, & the refidue remained ten myles off, because in pollicie it was not thought sure that so great a proportion of men of one nation should be at one time in one campe: if their comming had bin fomewhat fooner, the practifes of peace had bene eafily broken, feeing without them there were in the campe eight thousand French footemen, two thousand of those Smyzzers which had bene

at Naples, and eighteene hundreth launces.

Butthings being now so far aduaunced, and Nouaro already abandoned, the enterviewes did not discontinue, although the Duke of Orleans vsedall his labour to the contrary, having many of the greatest of the Court of his opinion: Therefore the Deputies were every day at the campe of the Italias to folicite with the Duke of Myllan, who was newly returned thither, to the end to debate him selfe in a matter of so great consequence, doing all things (notwithstanding) in the prefence of the confederate Ambassadours . At length the Deputies returned to the king, bringing the last conclusion of all things that they could for the accord. First that betweene the French king and the Duke of Myllan, there should be a peace and friendship perpetuals (the Duke nothing deand the Confe. rogating notwithstanding his other confederations:) That the king should confent that the towne of Nouaro should be rendred to the Duke by the people, together with the Castell left to his Maiestie by the gard of thirtie footemen: That the towns of Specia and all other places occupied by either part, should be rendred: That it should be lawfull to the king to arme at Genes (his freehold and chiefe) so many vessels as he would, seruing his turne of all the commodities of that Citie, so that it were not in fauour of the enemies to the state of the same: That for assurance of this article, the Genoways should give him certaine oftages: That the Duke of Myllan should cause to be rendred to the king, the veffels loft at Rapale, and the twelve galleys reftrained at Genes, and to arme for him presently at his proper charges two grosse carrakes of Genes, which with source others of his owne he determined to fend to the fuccours of Naples: That the Duke should also deliuer to the king the yeare after, three others in the same maner: That the Duke should give free & friendly passage to the companies that the king should send by land to the same succours, under this comenant, that there should not passe by his estate more then two hundreth launces at a time: That if the king returned eftsoones to the same enterprise, the Duke should follow him with certaine bands of men: That the Vinetsans should have power to enter this contract within two moneths: and if they did enter, then to retire their armie by sea from the kingdome of Naples, and to be bound to give no frecours to Ferdinand: but if they did not observe this, and the king should leuy warre against them, the Duke should be bound to ayde him, reaping to his vse all that should be conquered of the Venetian estates: That the Duke should pay fiftie thousand duckats in the next march to the Duke of Orleans for the charges of the warre of Nouaro: and acquite the king of foure fcore thousand duckats parcell of the money he had lent his Maiestie when he marched first into Italie, the residue to be rendred by his Maiestie at a longer terme: That Iohn Lackes Trisulce should be absoluted of the confiske and condemnation wherein he had bene conuicted by the Duke, and enjoy restitution of all his goods: That the bastard of Bourbon taken in the journey of Furnoue, & the Lord of Alyolans taken at Rapale, together with all other prisoners should be redeliuered: That the Duke should withdraw from Pyla, Fracasse, who he had sent thither a litle before, together with all his bands and the companies of the Genoways: That he should give no impediment to the Florentines to recouer that which apperteined to their iurifdiction: That within one moneth he should put by way of confidece the Castell of Genes into the hands of the Duke of Ferrara, who called to that end by both the parties, was now come to the campe of the Italians, and that the fayd Duke of Ferrara should keepe it two yeares at their common charges, and to be bound by oath to redeliuer it within the fayd time to the hands of the French king, in cafe the Duke of Myllan should not hold his promises: who immediatly upon the conclusion of the peace, should give oftages to the king for affurance to affigne the Castell at the time agreed vpon. These conditions brought to the king by his Deputies that had debated them, were propunded in his publike and private councell, wherein being found no leffe variation of mindes, then contrarietie of reasons, every one disputing particularly, Molieur Trymonille reasoned in this fort. If in the coun-Monsieur Tricell present we had not to debate but of meanes to encrease the glorie to the crowne of France touching the by actions of vallour and vertue, I should not perhaps be so forward to encourage your Maicsties peace. person to new daungers, although the example of your selfegiues you councell to the contrary, ,, feeing being earled with no other affection then a defire and ambition of glorie, you determined, the yeare pall, against the councels and humble petitions of the face and body of your Realme, to,, descend into Italie to conquere the kingdome of Naples: where your enterprise drawing a fucceffe happy and with encrease of your name and honour, it is a thing manifest that now we have, not onely to deliberate, whether the occasion to winnenew honours and glorie is to be rejected, ,, but also if we may eftsoones lose againe that reputation which you have got with so great adventures, charges, and daungers, and converting the honours already wonne into imputations and in-,, famies perpetuall, whether you ought to be the personage so impugnant and contrary to your,, proper refolutions, as to reprehend and condemne the councels established by your felse: for your Maiestie might without any losse to your reputation have remained in Fraunce, and that which, now the world will wrap in opinions of dishonorable feares and cowardize, could not as then be, referred to any other then to negligece, or to an age occupied in pleasures: your Maiestie assoone,, as you had bene arrived in Aft, might eftsoones have returned into France, with the same speed, ,, and leffe shame, making as though the matters of Nouaro concerned you nothing at all: But now, by the presence of your armie so long incamping here, you have published your intention, and,, that you were touched with defire to deliuer the towne from siege, for which regard also having,, affembled out of Fraunce to great a proportion of nobilitie and a leavye of Smyzzers at a charge, intollerable: who will doubt, that if you depart and not fatisfie these expectations, but leave the,, towne to her perils, that your glorie, with the reputation of your whole Realme, will not take a ,, contrary conversion of just reproch and infamie perpetuall. But (if in the harts of great kings may be motions more violent then defires of renowne and glory) there be yet reasons more mighty, or ;, at least more just and necessary: seeing our retrait into Fraunce, consenting to the losse of Nonaro, ,, neither is, nor will be thought any other thing then the loffe of the whole kingdome of Naples,,, and the vnworthy flaughter of so many Captaines & Nobles of Fraunce left there for the defence,, of the fame, vpon your hopes, joyned with your faith and promifes, to fend them speedy succours: wherein, how miserable will be their expectations, but more wretched and desperate their estates,, and conditions, when they shall understand that your Maiestie incamping upon the frontiers of

" Italie with an armic so populous, and forces so resolute, shall yet retire and give place to the enemie: The successe of warres, dependes partly of reputation, which when it declines, declineth with all the vertue of the fouldiers, the faith of the peoples diminisheth, and the reuenues apcopointed to sustaine and defray the warres, fall to wants and diminutions: As of the contrary, the " enemie increaseth in courage, such as wander in feares and doubts, come to be resolute and well " affured', and all difficulties are aggrauated to their aduauntage: So that, for so wretched and miferable a newes, the strength and vertue of our armie falling into faintnesse and feeble doubtes, and the vallour and reputation of our enemies rifing into greater glorie and arrogancie, who doubtes not to fee with this alteration and chaunge, the revolt and rebellion of all the kingdome of Naples: together with the defolation of our whole armie; and fo that honorable enterprise begun with fo great felicitie, to bring forth in the end no other fruite their harmes wretched for the " present, and dishonorable to all ages hereaster: for he that is perswaded that this peace is made with good faith and meaning, lookes with flender judgement into the condition of things preof fent, and much leffeknoweth the natures of those with whom we deale: seeing it is a thing of easie comprehension, that we shall no sooner haue turned our backes to the region of Italie, then all "these treatises, promises, and contractes, will vanish and turne into smoke : yea in place " to minister those aydes they have promised, their infidelitie will carie them to applie succours " to Ferdinand . Lastly , these bands whose impudencie will fill the whole world with bragges that they have chased vs out of Italie, will march to Naples to make them selves rich with the 66 spoyles of our countreymen, made wretched by our cowardize: which infamie me thinkes " might be easilier borne, if by any probable reason we might doubt of the victorie: But it is a "doubt vayne, and by no fense can settle in the mindes of any, who making consideration of "the greatnesse of our armie, and the oportunities of the countrey adioyning, will remember how " ouerwearied and trauelled with a long marche, disfurnished of victuals, our numbers small, " and in the middest of the countrey of the enemie, we fought against a most huge armie at the " river of Taro: making the river by our vallour swell higher with the bloud of our enemies then "with his proper streames: At what time also we opened our way with the sword, and as Con-" querours rode eight dayes iourney thorow the Duchy of Myllan, enemie to our enterprises and " greatnesse: We have now twife as many horsemen, the numbers of our French sootemen re-"doubled, and in place of three thousand Smyzzers, our armie embraceth at this instant two and twentie thousand: And albeit the enemie is stronger then before in Almaine footemen, yet in " all discourse of reason, they cannot hold comparison with ours : neither are their horsemen o-"thers then the selfe fame, and their Captaines euen those, that having once yeelded under the force " of our armes, and by our furie suffered so great harmes, will not eftsoones returne to the fight " but with mindes fearefull and appalled . But it may be objected, that the profites of the victorie " are so small, that they ought not to stand in regard or computation with vs: No, of the contra-"ry, they are fuch for their nature, and so great for their vie, that we ought to aspire to obteine with what great daunger so euer: for that they include not onely the prescruation of so great a glorie gotten, the fuccours of fo rich a kingdome as Naples, the iuft fafetie of fo many of your "Captaines, and the honorable deliuerie of fuch a proportion of your Nobilitie: but also they " make a secret offer to inuest you in the whole empire of Italie, which if we remaine here with the or vpper hand, will be the pray, fruite, and recompence of our victorie: for what other bands, what other armies remaine to the enemies, in whose campe are assembled all the forces, all the compaor nies, and all the Captaines, which they could leavy, either by fauour, authoritie, or money: one trench which we shall winne, one rampier which we shall force, will put into our bosomes (things honorable and great) not onely the empire and treasures of Italie, but also the meane to "be reuenged of all our common and private wrongs: which two spurres or motions alwayes ac-" customed to pricke forward minds base and cowardly, if they stirre not with an other quicknesse " our nation warlike and refolute, we may justly fay that our vallour hath rather fayled vs then our " fortune, by whom is prepared the occasion to winne in so litle place, and in so few houres, so great " and worthy recompences, that the wifedome and defires of men reasonable can wish no more: "The time, the place, the occasion, our fortune, and all other oportunities and circumstances to be " condered in enterprises, offer vs the victorie, there wanteth nothing but action men, which for fo "much ought to be more ready in vs, by how much it importeth me of vertue not to loofe the honour

nor they have gotten, nor leave in suspicion, that want of vallour makes then vnworthy of that, which their fortune offereth with fo great fauour and further reputation . The Prince of Orange ,, bauing a contrary affection, spake against this opinion in this fort.

If your affaires (right Christian king) were not so much pressed with time, but that they , The Prince would give you leasure to accompanic your forces with industrie and discression: or if they ,,o/ Orange flood not vpon degrees and conditions to immoderate, as you are constrained (if you will con- " feeleth. tinue the warre) to proceede with importunities contrary to all the preceptes and directions >> of warre: I could be one of those would give councell to reject the peace: for that by many >>> reasons we are encouraged not to accept it', as also it cannot be denied, but that it would be a " thing honorable to continue the warre, and no leffe convenient for the affaires of Naples: But 3 the termes whereunto are brought the towne and Castell of Nouaro., not prouided of victuals ,, for one day, compell vs (if we will fuccour it) to fet speedily vpon our enemies, and with are-,, foliution fuddeine to take away respite which makes them strong and able, and increaseth in our " armie incommodities hurtfull and daungerous: and if (in fuffering it to be loft) we meane to tranfport the warreinto an other part of the state of Myllan, the season of the winter now at hand very visit to make warre in places so low and full of waters, and the qualitie of our armie for the " nature and grat multitudes of Smy zeers, who being not speedily employed may be more preiudiciall to vs then to our enemies : and lastly our generall want of money making our abode >> here impossible for any long time, enforce vs (not accepting the accord) to seeke the meane to put suddeinly an end to the warre: A thing which can not be done other wayes, then directly ,, to go and charge the enemies, which aswell for their conditions, as the difauauntages of the " countrey, is fo daungerous, that in reasonable conference of things, the action can not but hold of rathnesse and indiscression: for that their campe is so strong by nature and art, according to the time they have had to rampier and fortific it, the places round about where their garrifons >> are so convenient for their defence, and so well manned: the countrey, for the quantitie of dit- >> ches and impediment of waters, fo vnapt to the service of horsemen: that to go seeke them directly, and not to accoast them with commodities and advauntages, and (as the faying is) to » winne vpon them by litle and litle: is no other thing then to tempt fortune, and aduenture vp- " on perils most certaine and desperate: for with what discourse, with what reason of warre, or >> with what example of notable Captaines, may we with such rashnesse and importunitie inuade » fo great an armie, and that in trenches fo strong and well furnished with artillerie? No, it is better (if you will proceede otherwayes then at aduenture) to seeke to drive them from their trenches by winning some place which they commaund, or at least in restraining their victuals: wherein I can see no other thing to assure our hopes, then by proceeding deliberatly and with the length of » time, which we have no meane to attend, (our affaires bearing nothing more prejudicially then to " temporife and expect:) Befides, our horfemen conteine neither those numbers, nor that vallour, which happily many do weene, for that many are made weake by diseases, many returned in- » to France with leaue and without leaue, and many of those that remayne, ouertrauelled with " this long watte, haue more defire to go home then to fight: And touching the Smyzzers, who for their vertue are the principall forces of our armie, yet their great number may happily be more ,, hurtfull, then would be vnprofitable a leffer proportion: for fuch hath bene alwayes the experience of the customes and nature of that nation, that to manage them being so strong and many together, can not almost be without certaintie of some daungerous tumult, (specially things (as is ,, necessary) proceeding with sufferance and length of time:) During the which, by reason of their " payments wherein they are infatiable, and other accidents which follow of courfe, may happen a » thousand occasions to turne and chaunge them, & so we should remaine uncertaine whether their ,, ayde would ferue vs as a medicine or a poyfon: and in fuch an vncertainty we canot establish any thing in our councels, & much leffe refolue our mindes to any enterprise of vallour or importance. No man doubteth but the victory is more honorable and fure for the defence of the kingdome of ... Naples, then the agreement to peace: but in all actions of men, and specially in warres, we mult » accommodate our councels to necessitie, and not for the desire to obtaine that part which is hard, and impossible, to put the whole in manifest perill, seeing it is an office as equal and instina Captaine to shew wisedome in his actions, as courage. The enterprise of Novaro (Sir) was not your " principall intention, neither doth it touch you but indirectly, for that you pretend no right to the

56 Duchie of Myllan: and much leffe are you come out of Naples to flay to make warre in Piemont; " but to returne into Fraunce, to give order to leavie treasure and men, to the end with more mighce tie fuccours to minister ayde to your companies at Naples: who in the meane while, what with the refcue of your nauic departed from Nyce, & what with men and moneyes of the Florentines, ce will have so good meane to defend their condition, that they may without daunger attend the se great prouisions which you are to areare at your returns into France. I am none of those that will affure that the Duke of Myllan will justly observe these capitulations, yet receiving of lages of him and the Genoways, and the Castellalso committed according to the forme of the contract, you are not without pawne and furctie. It is also reasonable in him to demaund peace, because lying nearest the dayinger of your forces, his feares are no lesse just, then his perils likely. Besides, leagues, which have many competitors, of their proper nature have not that stabilitie and concord, but vpon occasions they come to disagree and fall off one from an other, in which case, every litle hole that they shall make, yea even the smallest cranell or crevish that shall appeare, will make to vo the victorie no leffe easie then well assured : So that seeing your affaires stand in these degrees, and 66 that God hath made it impossible to mortall Princes to rule the time, my aduise is, that your Maiestie striue not against the streame of the time, but to frame your inclinations to the peace; not that ce it is of it felfe profitable or commendable, but becauseit is an office in Princes wife and offlayed condition, in causes difficult & daungerous, to allow for easie & commendable, that that is necesce farie and convenient, or at least wife such as are least intangled with davingers, & nothing at all decorogate reputation & honour. The Duke of Orleans rebuked sharpely the speeches of the Prince of The lye ginen Orange, either of them taking such libertie of passion, that falling from wordes to reproches and so the Prince injuries, the Duke gaue him the lye in the whole presence of the councell: but the inclination of most part of the councell, and consequently of the multitude of the armie, was to embrace the peace, bearing so much power in them all, & no lesse in the person of the king, a sweet desire to returne into Fraunce, that they were not able to discerne the daunger of the kingdome of Naples, & much leffe to fee how flaunderous it was to fuffer to be lost afore their eyes the Citic of Nonaro, and lastly to depart out of Italie with conditions so vnequall, considering the incertainty of the observation: which disposition was so vehemently favoured by the Prince of Orange, that many doubted left o gratifie the king of Romains, to whom he was most affectioned, he had no leffe regard to the profit of the Duke of Myllan, then to the commodities of the French king, with whom truely his authoritie was great, partly for the excellencie of his wit, and partly for credit of his yallour, but most of all, for that it is a custome and propertie with Princes, to esteeme most wise, such as are most conformed to their inclinations.

The Swyzzers
offer to stay the king for pay.

At last the peace was made, which was no sooner sworne by the Duke of Myllan, then the king, rejecting all other thoughts then fuch as made for his returne into Fraunce, went forthwith to Thuryn: his hast was the more importunate to depart from Verceill, for that those bands of the Smyzzers that were in the campe, to affure their payes of three whole moneths (according to the custome of Lowys the xi. as they alledged) began to speake of staying the king or the Chiesteines of his Court for the furetie of their pay: notwithstanding they could not clayme so much by promile, nor yet had ferued fo long time: from which daunger albeit the person of the king was deliuered by his fuddeine departure, yet they having made prisoners the Baylisse of Dyon and others that leavyed them, he was in the end conftrained to affure all their demaundes, as well with promises as with oftages: fro Thuryn the king desiring to make a perfect establishment of the peace. fent to the Duke of Myllan the Mareshall of Gie, the President of Ganuay, and Argenton, to induce him to speake with his Maiestie: The Duke seemed to be of the same defire, but it was not without fome doubt of treason: In so much, that either for that suspition, or objecting perhaps fome expresse difficulties, as not to give occasion of ielousie to the confederates, or for that his ambition would not fuffer him to come in a behauiour inferiour to the French king: he propounded to have the meeting upon the middest of a river, where a bridge being made either with barks or other matter, there should be between them a barre of wood: A manner of commoning together vsed herctofore by the kings of England & Fraunce, and other gaeat Princes of the West. This the king refused, as a thing vnworthy his greatnesse, and therefore without any enteruiewe, he received his oftages, and dispatched Peron de la Basche to Genes to receive the two carrakes that were promifed him, and to rigge foure others at his owne charges for the fuccours of the Castels stels of Naples, which he knew had not received the rescues sent from Nice, for that they suffered fo many impediments as they could not be profitable to the seruice of Naples. In which respect, his peoples there befreged, had made composition to render vp the castels if they were not succored within thirty daies. The King made his plot to arme the faid veffels with three thousand Smizzers, and to adioyne them to the fayd nauy parted from Nice now retired to Linorne, and to certaine other vessels expected from Pronence. All which (without the great ships of the Genomays) had not bene sufficient for that succours, the hauen of Naples being now full of a huge army by sea, both for the vessels of the prouisions of Ferdinand, and also for twenty gallies and source ships fent thither by the Venetians. The King after he had dispatched Monsier Argenton to Venice, to solicite the Senate to enter into the peace and participat with the accord, tooke his way into France with all his Court, and that with fuch equall speed and defire to be there, that there was nothing could flay him any few daies in Italy, no not till the Genoways had deliuered him their oftages promised upon the contract at Verceill, which certainely they had accomplished, if his hasty departure had not preuented their true intention and meaning. Thus then ypon the end of October 1 4 95. his maietty returned on the other fide the mounts, refembling rather a personage vanquithed, then a Prince victor (notwithstanding the conquest and victories he had obtayned:) he left as his Lieutenant in Aft (a city which it should seeme he bought of the duke of Orleans) lohn lac- Triuslee left ques Trinulce with fine hundreth french launces, who not many daies after of their proper autho- 10 guide Aft, rity followed the King, by whom was left no other fuccours for the kingdome of Naples, then the followeth the natties preparing at Genes and Pronence, and the affignation of the aides and moneys promifed by King. the Florenines.

After the discourse of other things, me thinkes it cannot be out of purpose (specially it being a The french destiny fatall, that the calamities of Italy should take their beginning of the passage of the french pocks and their men, or at least were imputed to them) to leave to memory and tradition in what fort began the beginning. disease, which the french men call the euill of Naples, and the Italians name the botch, or more commonly the difease of France: It happened as an infection to the french men whilest they were at Naples, and by them in their returne from that warre, was dispersed and spred through all Ita-1/2: This discase either altogether new, or at least vnknowne in that age in our hemispheare otherwayes then in the most extreame and furthest parts, was for certaine yeares so horrible, that it well deserueth mention and monument, as a calamity grieuous and lamentable: for it appeared alwaies either in vile botches or buttons, which oftentimes proued vicers incurable; or elfe they tormented the whole body with paine and aches in the joynts and finewes: and the Phifitions hauing no experience in maladies of that nature, and therefore ignorant in the remedies proper and naturall, applied oftentimes cures directly refifting and contrary, which inflamed the infection to greater rage, even to the killing of many bodies of all ages and fexes. Many became deformed with them, and subject almost to perpetual torments, yea some such as seemed to be deliucred of them, returned efcloones in short time to the same misery: But after the course of many yeares (either the influence aboue being appealed which bred them fo horrible and raging, or by long experience their proper remedies and cures being found out) the difease began to be lesse malitious, changing it felfe into diverfe kindes of infirmity, differing from the first calamity, whereof truly the regions and people of our times might justly complaine, if it hapned to them without their proper diforder, feeing it is well approued by all those that have diligently studied and observed the properties of that euill, that either neuer or very rarely it happeneth to any otherwayes, then by contagious whoredome or immoderate incontinency. The french thinke it reasonable to acquite them of the ignominy, for that it is knowen since, that such a disease was transported out of Spaine to Naples, and yet not proper or naturallof that nation, but brought thither from the Iles, which in those scasons began to be made familiar to our regions, by the nauigation of Christopher Columbia a Genomay: in which iles by the fauor of nature, are remedies ready to the cure of that ill by drinking onely of the juice of a wood (most fingular for many other worthy properties) which growing plentifully in those places, is a remedy no lesse easie, then absolute and assured to theinhabitants there.

THE ARGVMENT.

ODOWIKE SFORCE keepeth not the treaty of peace: The Venetians take the towne of Psfa into their protection: The french King determineth to returne into Italy: The King of Romaines besiegeth Lyuorne: The Pope makes warre vpon the Vrsins: The french King dieth at Amboyse: Frear Ieronimo Sauonarola is hanged at Florence.

Y the dishonourable returns of the french King ouer the Mountes proceeding notwithstanding more of indiscretion and disorders, then by pufillanimity or weakenesse of his army; wise men grew into hopes and iudgements, that Italy, after so many scourges and grieuous stormes of infelicities, would now at last resume her liberty, or at least, be redeliuered of the infolent jurisdiction of the french: wherein by fo much more were worthy and notable the vertues and actions of the Senate of Vemice and Duke of Millan, by how much the taking armes with a wife and resolute councell, were the onely lets, that so goodly a part of the world fell not into the seruitude of flrangers. But as nothing can fatisfie the couctoufnesse of man: so if they had not bin caried with ambitious respects touching their interests and defires particular, nor (to their proper infamy and common harmes) had so corrupted the vniuerfall benefite and common weale of that region: no man might have doubted that Italy, (readdressed by their armies and councels, and efficiences repossessed of her ancient dignities and prerogatives) had not bene for long time assured against the importunities, furies, and violent inuations of the proud nations beyond the Mounts: but ambition, which would not fuffer either of them to be contented with his limits, was the cause not onely to returne vpon Italy new inuafions and troubles, but also that they could not enjoy the frute of the victory, which their fortune brought into their handes, against those miserable remainders of the french in the kingdome of Naples: a victory which the negligence and vnwife councels of the king made of easie action to them, for that the succors which he had leaused at his departure out of Italy, were either vtterly vaine, or at least of so litle fruit, that they brought no comfort to his people, his prouisions of nauigation, and the aids promised by the Florentmes, serving also to like effect.

This is a rule in the nature of man, that to him that is iniuried and can not have justice, nothing « is more sweet then the passion of reuenge; eucn so by how much the remembrance of the offence ce is greene and fresh, by so much stronger is the desire of reuenge in the mind grieued, and so much ce less the trust or confidence in the party that hath offended: Lodowike Sforce consented not to the peace with the King, with a found faith and meaning, for that remembring the iniuries he had *doue him, he thought it stoode not with his surety, estsoones to commit him selfe to the fidelity of the King: but the defire to recouer Nouaro, and deliuer his owne estate from the incommodities of the warre, induced him to promife that which he had no defire to keepe, following the Kings humor with wordes, and keeping his intentions diffembled: and it may be supposed, that in the peace made with this femblance, did participate the confent of the Senate of Venice, willing to disburden their state without their infamy, of the very huge and great expences occupied v-Lodowike fib. pon the warre of Nouaro: But Lodowike, to whom in actions of shift and cunning, nothing was tile in different more familiar then moderation of wit, because he would not in viaduised fort breake the articles of the capitulation, but shadow his doings with some colour, accomplished that which he could not deny to be in his power: he deliuered of lages: he fet at liberty the prisoners, paying their raunions of his proper treasures: he restored the vesselstaken at Rapale: he withdrew from Pila

Frecaste,

Frecasse whom he could not dissemble to be in his pay. Lastly, he put the castell of Genes into the handes of the Duke of Ferrara, who went thither in person to receive it: But on the other side, he Shifter of Lod. left within Pifa Luke Malnezzo with many bandes of fouldiers, as though he were in the wages Sforce to break and payes of the Genomages: he suffered that two carrakes which were armed at Genes, went to the peace. Naples for the seruice of Ferdinand, vsing this excuse, that for that he had entertayned them afore the conclusion of the peace, they of Genes would not consent that they should be denied to him: he laboured fecretly that the Genoways should not delitter in their offages to the King: And that which was of greater confequence for the loffe of the castels of Naples, after the King had armed and manned the foure shippes, and that he had furnished him of the two for the which he was bound: he wrought so with the Genoways, that making semblaunces of seare, they gaue impediments that the Kings foldiers should not be armed, if first they received not of him sufficient caution, that he should not employ them against them selues, nor attempt with that force to chaunge the government of Genes. For these cavillations, the King complaymed by men expresse to Lodomike, who (according to his cultome in euafions) aunswered him with exceptions, sometimes that he had promifed to furnish him with the shippes, but without consent that they should be manned with french fouldiers: And formetimes he alleadged that the jurifdiction which he had of Genes was not absolute, but limited and restrayned to such conditions, as he had no power of compulsion, and much leffe was his authority to enforce their willes to his defires, specially in things which they pretended to be daungerous for their estate, or to derogate the liberties of their city: wherein the better to justifie his excuses, he wrought so, that the Pope commanded the Genoways and him vpon paine of the Church censures, that they should not suffer to be drawne from Genes by the french King, any vesselles of no fort or nature: In so much as the succours expected with so great defire by the french, which were wretched in the kingdonie of Naples, forted to no comfort or reliefe to them. No more did the aides and moneys promifed by the Florentines: feeing after the accord made at Thurin, Guind Anthoine Ve pucci one of their Embassadours assistant at the conclusion, departing immediatly with all the necessary dispatches, and passing without suspicion through the Duchy of Millan, for that the common weale of Florence was not declared enemy to either part: he was retained in Alexandria by the Dukes commission: and all his papers and dispatches taken from him, he was led forthwith to Millan, where the capitulations and promifes of the Florentins being bewraied, the Venetsans and the Duketooke counsell, not to suffer the Pilans to perish: who as soone as the french king was gone out of Italy, had by new Embassadors recommended their affaires to Venice and Millan, Their resolution to rescue the Pssans, was not without The Venetians the consent of the Pope and the Embassadours of the other consederats, under pretence to hinder in mind to refthe money and aides which the Florentine (teentring into Pifa and their other places) were to fend chethe Pofans. to the realme of Naples: and also for that being conjoyned with the french King, and by the recouering of that city, made more mighty, they might in many forts endomage the common fafety of Italy: but the principal humor that fed that motion, was their ambition and great defire to make them selues Lords ouer Pifa: a sweet pray to entice ambitious mindes; and as it had bene afore time vehemently aspired by Lodowike, so the Venetians began now in like fort to looke into it with couetous eies; as people, who seeing the auncient unity of other Potentats broken, and one part of those weakened which had wont to oppose against them, embraced already with thoughts and hopes the Monarchy of all Italy: whereunto they esteemed the impery of Pisa a very conuenient instrument, to beginne with the commodity of his hauen (which they thought could not be long kept by Florence not holding Ps/a) to firetch out their limits even to the inferiour fea: having withall by the oportunity of that city, an entry of great importance into Tuscane. The Duke of Millan shewed most readinesse to minister to their succors, who entertaining at the same instant the Florentins with diverse practiles, had ordained that Fracasse, under colour of his private businesse(for he had possessions in that countrey) should go to Pifa, & the Genomays to refurnish them with new supplies of sootemen: The Venetians also forgot not to nourish them with promises and comforts of speedy succours, and accordingly dispatched one of their Secretaries to Genes, to make a leavy of footemen, and perswade the Genoways not to abandon the Pisans: yet they were long in fending their stregth thither, perhaps by this opinion, that so long as the citadell was holden by the french King, and so long as he were in Italy, it was not convenient to lay any great foundation of those things. On the other side, the Florentines, aductised of the new couenants made with the King by the Embassadours at Thurin, had increased their army, to be the more able to constraine the Pylans to receive them, as soone as they saw the dispatches of the King. And albeit as you have heard, they were restrained together with their Embassadours by the Duke of Millan, yet they forbare not to take the borough of Palage, and so planted their campe afore Vicopifan: the belieging of which place was of no effect, partly for that the Captaines (eyther by ill councell, or for that they judged their strength not sufficient to bring their Campe on that side towards Pyla, the Pylans having erected a bastillion on a mount neare the towne) encamped on that fide vinderneath towards Bientina: a place of little commodity to hurt Vico; and keeping it, the way of Pyla and Calina lay open to those that were belieged: partly for that Paule Vitelli having received three thouland duckats, went thither to defend it, entring with his companies and the bandes of his bretheren, under a fained colour to haue letters of the King, and commandement from the generall of Languedock, brother to the Cardinall of Saince Mallo (remaining ficke at Pietra Santa) to protect Pyla and the appurtenance, until other order were taken. Certainely it is a thing right wonderfull in reason, and no leffe rare in experience and example, that the Pylans were at one time defended by the fouldiers of the french King, and aided by the fuccours of the Duke of Millan, and nourished also with hopes by the state of Venice, not with standing that Seanate and the Duke of Millan were in open warre with the french King. But fuch is the rage of ambition, and so sweet the infinuation of rule and impery, that in whom they have kindled their inse fection, they cease not to inflame more and more their desires, without respect to fidelity, conc science, difficulty, or common observancy, holding all things lawfull that make for their purpose, and nothing vnfeemly that may ferue to fatisfie their infatiable aspiring thoughts. With the rescue that came with the bands of Vitelly, Vicopifan defended it felfe cafily, and gave no little domage to the campe of the Florentines, the fame being pitched in a place so open & discouered, that it receiued many harmes by the artilleries, which the Pifans had caried within Vico: in fo much that hauing endured the harmes by many daies, the Captaines found it necessary to their fafety, to leavy the fiege to their reproach and shame. After this, the Kings dispatches being at last come (which written into copies, were fecretly fent out by many waies) the towne, castell, and port of Linorne were immediately rendred to the Florentines, by Salliane Lieutenant to Mounsier Beaumont, to whom the King had given them in charge: when M.D'Isle Deputy Commissioner, to receive of the Florentines the ratification of the accord made at Thurin, and to fee the restitution executed, began to treate with Entragues Captaine of the Citadel of Py/a, and of the castels of Psetra Santa and Mutton, to resolue with him of the day and manner to religne them vp: but Entraques induced either by the felfe fame inclination common with the other french men that were then in Pifa, or by some secret commissions from M.de Ligm, vnder whose name, and as depending upon him, he was preferred to that charge, or perhaps drawne by the loue which he bare to a litle Graciana, daughter of one of the citizens of $P_{2/2}$, (for it is not credible that only the defire of money led him, fince he might receive a greater quantity of the Florentines) he began to oppose many difficulties: fometimes giuing to the Kings letters pattents an interpretation contrary to the true fence: and formetimes he alleaged, that at the beginning he had commandement not to render them but by secret aduertisements from Mounsier de Ligni: vpon which impediments, after they had in vaine disputed certaine daies, it was necessary for the Florentines to make a new instance to the King, remaining yet at Verceill, to remedy that disorder expressed with so great an offence to his maiesty, & hurt to his special profit. The king became much moved with the disobedience of Entragues,& commanded M.de Ligni (not without indignation) to constraine him to obay, determining to fend thither a man of authority with new letters pattents and threats from the Duke of Orleaes, whose feruant he was: But the resolute obstinacy of M.de Ligni, and the fauours which he had in Court, being of more power then the flender councell of the king, the dispatch was delaied certaine daies, and in the end fent not by a man of authority, but by M. Launcepugno a simple gentleman: with whom went Camilla Vitelli to lead his companies to the realme of Naples, and withal to conduct thither one part of the money to be defrayed by the Florentines, to whose army, as soone as the Kings letters pattens were arrived, were loyned the men of war of both the Vitellis. This dispatch wrought no more effect then the first, not with standing the Captaine had received two thousand duckats of the Florentines, to entertaine (vntill the Kings aunswere came) the bands of footemen which were in gatrison within the Citadell: And to Camilla were payed three thowsand duckats,

because otherwayes he would have hindered that the Kings letters should not have bene presented: for the Captaine of the Citadell (to whomas was supposed de Ligm, had sent by an other way, Commissions quite contrary) after hee had many dayes abused their expectation, and judging that the Florentines (for that there were within the towne besides the inhabitants, a thoufandfootemen forreyners) could not force the suburbes of S. Marke joyned to the gate of Florence, leaning to the Citadell, where the Pyfans had made a great ballillion, and that to he might come to the end of his intention without manifest objecting against the Kings will : he sent to the other Florentine Commissioners, to present their army afore the fayd gate, (which they could not doe vnleffe they wonne the suburbes) for that if the Pyfans would not receive them in by accord, he would force them to abandon it, the same gate being so subject to the artillery of the Citadell, that it was not able to maintaine defence against the will of such as had it in gard. The Florentmes inclining readily to this deuise, went thither with a great preparation, a courage resolute, and an inflamed disposition of all the campe then lodging at Saint Remy, a place neare to the suburbes: and with fuch valour they affayled the baltillion on three fides (in the forme, feate, and rampiers whereof, they had bene fully instructed by Paule Vitelli) that they brake and put to flight fuch as floode in defence, and pursuing the chase, they enter Pellmelle the suburber by a draw bridge which joyned to the battillion, killing and making prisoners the most of them. In this fury there was no doubt, (without the ayde of the Citadell) but at the same instant they might have made perfect the conquelt of Pyla by that gate, many of their men at armes being entred, for that the Pylans put to flight, made no refiltaunce: But the Captaine of the Citadell feeing things succeede otherwayes then he looked for, began to discharge the artillery youn the Florenrines: with which accident vnlooked for, the Commissioners and leaders maruelling not a little, many of their fouldiers flaine and hurt by the artillety, and Paule Vitelli wounded in one of his legges, they founded the retraite, holding it impossible to take Py/a at that time for the furious refiftance of the Citadell: yea within few daies after, they were constrained for the harmes they receitted by the artillery, to abandon the suburbes which they had brought into their power, and foretired with great discourage and no lesse discontented to Cassina, till the King had reformed so manifest a disobedience of his subjects.

In this meane while also, the Florentines were not without their perplexities, for new and dan- Peter de Megerous practifes stirred up principally by the Potentates of the league: who to give the more dich at the ingerous practices three up principally by the Potentates of the league: Who to give the more impediments to the conquest of Py/a, and by some new necessities at home, to enforce them to sufficiently the sufficient of the confederates. leaue the alliance of the french King, incenfed Peter de Medicis io make triall, with the aide of Vir - determined to gimo Vrsin, (fled from the french campe the day of the battell of Taro,) to returne to Florence: a returne to matter of right easie perswasion both to the one and other: for that to Virginio it sorted to good Florence. purpose (what so ever came to the enterprise) to reassemble at the charges of others, his auncient bandes and partakers, and readdresse himselfe estioones in the reputation of armes: And Peter according to the custom of men banished, had no want of diverse hopes for the multitude of friends which he had in the city, by whom he had intellligence that the government popular was displeafing to many of the nobles, and no leffe intollerable to many of his faction and followers, which, by reason of the auncient greatnesse of his house, was almost vniuerfall through the whole dominion of Florence: It was beleeued that this plot tooke his first deuise and beginning at Millan, for that Virginio was no sooner escaped out of the hands of the french, then he made his first office to goe visite the Duke: but afterwards the resolution succeeded at Rome, where did negociat many daies with the Pope, the Embassadour of Venice, and the Cardinall Acanim, who proceeded by Commission from Lodowske his brother. These were the grounds and hopes of this enterprise; that befides the bandes which Virginio should leavy of his old fouldiers, and with tenthousand duckats gathered by Peter de Medicis of his owne, and by the liberalities of his friends, Iohn Bentinole (being then in the pay of the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan) should at the same instant make war against them upon the frontier of Bolognia: and also that Katherine Sforce, whose some took pay of the Duke of Mullan, should vexe them by the cities of Ymola and Furly, confining upon the landes of the Florentines. Lastly they made promise to them selves (not in vaine) to have at their denotion the Stennoys, no leffe inflamed with an old hatred against the Florentines, then defirous to embrace occasions to preserve Montpulcian, a towne which they distrusted not to be able to defend of them selues, for that having attempted not many moneths before with their owner

ffrength, and the bandes of the Lord of Plombyn, and John Sanelle (whom the Duke entertayned in common with them) to make them selues Lordes of the countrey of the marrish of Chianes, which marrish had bene long time the limite or marke stone of that side betweene the Florentines and them, and to that end they had begunne to make neare to the bridge of Valiane, a bastillion to beate a tower erected by the Florentines upon the point towards Montpulcian: things fell out contrary to their hopes and expectation: for that the Florentines, moved with the daunger of the losse of this bridge, which not onely tooke from them all meanes to molest Montpulcean, but also gaue entrie to the enemies into the territories of Cortona and Aretze and other peeces, which on the other fide of Chianes appertained to their iurifdiction, fent thither a strong fuccour, which forced the bastillion begunne by the Sienneys: and for their full furety of that peece, they planted neare the bridge (but on the other fide Chianes) a baltillion convenient to be-How many fouldiers in: by whose helpe and commodity they made roades even to the gates of Montpulcian, vexing with like actions all the townes of the Siennoys on that fide. To which fucceffe was joyned this fortune, that a little after the passage of the french King, they had broken neare to Monipulcian, the bands of the Siennoys, and made prisoner John Sauella their Captaine. But Virginio and Peter de Medicis hoped to obtaine place of retraite with other commodities of the people of Perusia, not onely for that the family of the Basllons, (who with armes and aides of their followers were almost become Maisters of that city) were vnited to Virginio in a common fidelity to the name and faction of the Guelffs, and had withall familiar and straight friendships with Lawrence and Peter de Medicis whilest he ruled in Florence, by whose fauours and other ministrations they had special countenance against all action of their enemies: but also being the subjects of the Church (but more in demonstrations then in effects) it was beleeved that in things concerning principally their estates, they would yeeld to to the will of the Pope, having community therein the consent of the Venetians and Duke of Millan . Virginio then and Peter de Medicis departed from Rome with these hopes, and occupying amongst them selues these perswasions, that the Florentines trauelled with civill divisions at home, and vexed by their neighbours abroad under the name of their confederates, could hardly make refishance: and remaining certaine daies betweene Terni and Tods and these confines, where Virginio studying by all meanes to plucke downe the Gebelin faction, leavied men and money of the Guelffes. At last they settled their campe in fauour of the Perusins, before Gualde, a towne possessed by the communalty of Fuligni, but sold before by the Pope for fixe thousand duckats to the Perusins, who were no leffe inflamed with a defire to haue it, then incenfed with the contention of the parties, by reason of whose dealings all the townes about inclined then to emotion and infurrection: for not many daies before, the famuly of the Oddies, banished from Perousa and chieftaines of the faction contrary to the Baillons, hauing aides of them of Fuligni, Afcele, and other peeces there adjoying, which embraced the part of the Gebelins, were entred Corciana, (a strong peece within flue miles of Peronsa) with three hundreth horse, and five hundreth footmen: for which accident, all the countrey being risen (for Spolette, Camerin, and other places of the Guelffes, wete fauourable to the Bailions) they of Odai within few daies after entred by night within Perou[a, and that with fuch aftonishment to the Bayllons, that having lost hope and ability of defence, they began to put them selves to slight: but the Oddies, by a small and vilooked for adventure, lost that victory, which the power of their enemies could not deprive them of: for that being come without impediment to one of the entries of the principall place, and one of them who for that purpose caried a hatchet, offering to cut in peeces the chaine drawne ouer the way according to the custome of cities in faction: and being lo troublesomely enuironed with the presse of his companies, that hee had no space to lift up his arme to hew the chaine, cried with a loud voice, giue backe, giue backe, to the end that having more roome, his liberty might be more furthering to the action he went about. This voice being wrong understood, and repeated from hand to hand by such as followed him, and so deliuered an enterprise, to others in a sence sounding to retire and flie, it was the cause that all the companies without other encounter or let, fell fodainely to flie, not one knowing by whom they were chafed, nor for what occasion they fled. This disorder restored the adversaries to such present courage, that reaffembling their frength, they charged them in the chase, and made great slaughter, taking prisoner Troyllo Sauello, who for the same affection to the faction, had bene sent to the succours of the Oddies, by Cardinall Sanella: and applying their forces to the occasion that was offered, they followed followed the chase enen to Corciana, which they recovered in this action and with the same su-

ry: and lastly not contented with the death of such as they had slaine in the chase, they hanged many at Peroufa, following the cruelty which for the most part other factions are wont to vsc:of which tumults, many murders happening in the places bordering, for that in feafons doubtfull, the parties are carefull, and doe cultomably draw into infurrection, either for defire to cut off their e- Factions breed nemies, or for feare to be preuented by them. The Perusins inflamed against the Fulignians, had insuressions. fent the campe to Gualda, and having given the affault to it in vaine, with no leffe distrust to cary it by their owne strength, they accepted the aides of Virginio who offered him selfe to them, to the end that at the brute of booty and spoile, the souldiers might runne with more readinesse to the warre: and albeit they were pressed by him, and by Peter de Medicis to minister openly to their enterprise, or at least to give some peece of artillery or place of retraite for their people at Challillion du lac confining upon the territory of Cortone, with commodity of victuals for the army: yet they consented to neuer one of the demaunds, notwithstanding the Cardinall Ascanius made in the name of the Duke of Millan great instance, and the Pope commaunding no lesse by writtes vehement and full of threats. All this was, for that fince the taking of Corciana, the Florentines lending them money, and giving yearely pension to Guido and Radolpho chiefe of the Baillons, and lastly, having taken into their pay John Paule sonne to Radolpho, they were of their side and conjoyned with them. Besides these, they were estraunged from the amity of the Pope, for that they feared he stood favourable and inclined to the cause of their adversaries, or at least, by the occasion of their divisions, they suspected that he aspired to put absolutely that city under the obedience of the Church. In this time, Paule Vrfin, who with three fcore men at armes of the old company of Virginio, had remained many daics at Montpulcian, and afterwards was gone to the borough of Piena, intertained (by the direction of Peter de Medicis) a practife in the city of Cortone, with intention to execute it at fuchtime as the bandes of Virginio should approach, whose numbers nor vertue aunswered not the first plots: but during that respite of time, the practise being discouered, which was builded upon the foundation and meane of one of the exiles of base condition: one part of their generall groundes and deuises began to faile, and withall many great impediments to appeare: for the Florentines, in whom was alwaies nourished a carefull pollicy to The Florentines provide for dangers, leaving in the countrey of Pyfa three hundreth men at armes, and two thou-enerpalities. fand footenen, had fent to encampe neare Cortone, two hundreth men at armes, and two thoufand footenen under the leading of Count Rinucce de Marciane, whom they had made Mercenary in their pay. And to the end the bands of the Syennoys should have no oportunity to ioine with Virginio, according to the practife betweene them, they fent to Poggi imperiall vpon the borders of the countrey of Sienna under the government of Guidobalde of Montfeltre Duke of Vrbin. (whom they had entertained into their pay a little before) three hundreth men at armes, and fifteene hundreth footmen, besides many banished from Sienna (with whom they adjoined) to keepe the city in greater feare: But after Virginio had given many affaults to Gualda, where Charles his baltard fonne received a wound with a fmall shot, and having embraced the moneys sent secretly to him, as was supposed by the Fuliginans, he raised his campe without mention or respect to the interestes of the Perusins, and marched to the tabernacles, and so to Panicale, in the countrey of Perousa, making new instance that they would be declared against the Florentines: a thing which they did not onely deny to him, but also for the discontentment they had of his actions at Gualda, they compelled him almost with threatnings to depart out of their territories: In so much that Peter and he going first with foure hundreth horse to Orsaia, a towne neare to Cortone, hoping that in that city (which to auoyde the harmes of the fouldiers had refused to receive the men at armes of the Florentines) they should finde some tumult. After they saw all things in quiet and stability, they passed ouer Chianes with three hundreth men at armes, and three thoufandfootemen, but the most part in confusion and ill order, because they had bene driven backe, having but a very small proportion of money: They retired upon the countrey of Sienna neare to Montpulcian betweene Chianciana, Torrite, and Asinalongue, where they remained many daies without other action then certaine incursions and pillages, having the bandes of the Florentines, (which passed Chianes at the bridge of Valunce) encamped directly opposite vpon the hill Sanjo-Berthude remin, and other places thereabouts. Neither of the side of Bolognia (as they hoped) was any in-with the confe furrection, for that Beneinole, not determining for the interestes and regards of an other, to enter deratis, withstanding the perswasions of the confederates, to whom he made many excuses, and vsed no leffe delayes, neither was he curious to confent, that many demonstrations should be made by Iu-lian de Medicis, who being come from Bolognia, labored to stirre vp the friends which they were accustomed to have in the Mountaines of that countrey. Amongest the confederates there was not one consent of will and inclination, for that it was very acceptable to the Duke of Mellan, that the Florentines should be vexed with those trauels, thereby to be lesse able for the matters of Py-(a: but it nothing pleased him, that Peter de Medicis (so greatly iniuried by him) should returne to Florence, notwithstanding (to declare that hereafter he would wholly depend vpon his authority) he had fent to Millan in folemne order his brother the Cardinall: And touching the Venetians, they liked not to have the burden of that warre imposed upon them, and much lesset o embrace alone the quarrell: besides, the Duke and they were busie to leavy provisions to expulse thefrench out of the kingdome of Naples: In which respects, fayling in Peter and Virginio not onely the hopes which they expected, but also the moneys greatly diminishing to entertaine their bandes of footmen and horsemen, the necessities of their estates, and consideration of their proper safeties, caused them to withdraw to Bagno Rapulano in the countrey of Chinfa, a city subiect to the Siennoys: where not many dayes after (Virginio being drawne by his deftiny) arriued Camilla Vitelli and M. de Gemel, fent by the french King to entertaine him into his pay, and leade Tirginio Vrfinin pay with him into the kingdome of Naples, where the King defired to ferue his purpose of him, hearing of the defection of the Colomoys. This offer (albeit many of his friends impugned it, adulfing him rather to follow the feruice of the confederates, who made great folicitation to him, or elfe to become for the Aragons) was embraced and accepted by him, either for that he hoped by that meane to be more able to recouer the landes and countrey of Alba and Taille coffe, or elfe, remembring eftfoones how things happened in the loffe of the kingdome, and feeing the authority of the Collonnoys his ancient aduerfaries was fo great with Ferdinad, that there was no confidence of reconciliation, and much leffe to be readdreffed into his former greatneffer or laftly, for that he wasmoued, (ashim telfe did affure) with a discontentment which he had of the Princes confederate, fayling to accomplish those promises which they made to him to minister fauors to Peter de Medicis: Virginio then entred pay with the french King, receiving contract as well for him, as for others of the house of the Vrins for fixe hundreth men at armes: notwithstanding under this obligation (fuch be the fruites of those that once have made their faith suspected) to send his sonne Charles into Fraunce for the Kings surety: And being possessed of the kings money, he prepared their forces being equall, it appeared their dispositions did not differ, for that they consumed the time viprofitably in skirmiffing without any action worthy of memory: fauing that feuen hundred of the army of Ferdinand, as well footenen as horfemen, being led by a double intelligence to enter the borough of Gifone, neare the towne of S. Seuerin, remained almost all vpon the place either flaine or made prisoners. But the bandes of the Pope being come to the succours of Ferdmand, and by that meane the french made more inferiour, they retired from Nocere, which by that occasion, together with the castell, was taken by Ferdinand with a great slaughter of such as had followed the french quarrell. In this time Mounfier Montpenfier had foreseene to furnish of horses, and other things necessary for the warre, such as were come with him from the new castell; with whom, after he had remounted them in good order, he went to ioyne with the others, and after came to Ariana, a towne abounding with victuals: on the other fide, Ferdinand feeing Wants the bin. him selfelesse strong then the enemy, stayed at Monfuskule to temporise, without assaying of forderance of the tune vntill the confederates had refurnished him with a greater succour: M. Montpensior tooke french in Na- the towne, and afterwards the castell of S. him selfe to goe with the Vitellies to the kingdome of Naples, where both before the losse of the castels and after, was continual infurrection in many places with diverse accidents and fortunes.

- For, after Ferdinand had in the beginning made head in the plaine of Sarny, the french men that were retired from Piedgrotte, were incamped at Nocere within four miles of the enemy, where whose effects might aunswere the forces he had: In such like actions were consumed by the one and other army, about three moneths: in which season, Dom Federike having with him Cafar of Aragon, made warrein Ponylla: he was ay ded by those of the countrey, against whom made head the barons' and peoples that embraced the french part: on the other fide, Gracian de Guerres made valiant defence in Abruzze against Ferdinand; and the Prefect of Rome, who had the kings pay for two hundreth men at armes, vexed with his estates the landes of Monteasin, and the countrey thereabouts, where was fomewhat declined the prosperity of the french, by the long sicknesse of M. d' Aubigny, the same breaking the course of his victory, although almost all Calabria and the principality remained at the denotion of the french King: But Confaluo, who with a flrength of the Spanish bandes, with such of the countrey as bare friendship to the Aragons (now well encreased by the conquest of Naples,) had taken there certaine places, and made strong in that prouince the name of Ferdinand, where the french found the same difficulties which were in the army for want of money: Notwithstanding the city of Cosenze being drawne into rebellion against them, they recoursed it and fackt it . But in these great necessities and dangers, appeared no suc- The King necours at all out of the realine of France: for that the King staying at Lyons, amused the time a- glesteth his bout justes, torneys, and other pleasures of Court, leauing there all his thoughts of the war: And marres in Naalbeit he affured his councell alwayes, that he would effloores confider of the affaires of Italy, yet Ples. the effects and actions that proceeded from him, discredited the promises he had made to have remembraunce of them: And yet Argenton brought him this answere from the Senate of Venice, Comineus. that they pretended to have no disfriendship with him, for that they entred not into armes vntill he had gotten Nocere, and yet for no other cause then for the desence of the Duke of Millan their confederate: and therefore they thought it a thing superfluous, to ratific effloones the auncient friendship with a new peace: Besides they offered him, that by the mediation of persons indiffe- offers made rent, they would induce Ferdinand, to give him prefently fome funme of money, with conflitute by the Venetition of a tribute of fifty thousand duckats by yeare, and to leave in his handes for his security, Ta- am for Ferdirent a vntill a certaine time. The King, as though he had had a prepared and puissant succour, re-nand, fused to open his eares to these offers, not with standing, (besides these perplexities of Italy) he was not without vexations vpon the frontiers of Fraunce: feeing Ferdinand King of the Spanish (come in person to Parpignian) had made incursions into Languedock, where they did no small harmes, adding to their present fury, other demonstrations of far greater emotions. Besides it was not long fince the Daulphin of Fraunce, the onely sonne of the King, died; all which things (if he had bene The death of capable to make wife election of peace or watre) ought to have brought him with more facility the Daniphin. to condescend to some accord.

About the end of this yeare, were determined the controuerfies happening by reason of the Citadell of Pyfa: for the french King understanding by good information the obstinacy of the captaine, fent thither at last Mounsier Gemel, with threatnings and commaundements rigorous, not onely addressed to him, but generally to all the french appertaing to the charge and service of the l'ayd Citadell: And a little after, he dispatched thither expressy M. Bonne cosin to the Captaine, to the end that being informed by a person whom he might trust, both of the kings message, and also the meane to satisfie with present obedience his former faults and contumacy: and of the other part, the daunger wherein he stood continuing in disobedience: he might with more readinesse proceede to the execution of his Maiesties commandement and just will. All these could not remoue the Captaine from his first resolution, who abiding in his transgression, made no reckening of the message of Gemel, staying there a few dayes according to his Commission to goe with Camella Vitelli to finde Virginio. And much leffe was the comming of Bonne (who was hindered many dayes, for that by direction of the Duke of Millan he was retained at Serezana) to any purpose to turne the Captaine from his obstinacy. But having wrought Bonne to his consent and o- 1496. pinion, he made a contract with the Pylans (Luke Malnezze commaunding in the name of the The citadell Duke) by vertue wheteofhe deliuered to the Pyfans the first day of the yeare 1496, their Ci-deliuered for tadell, receiuing of them twenty thousand duckats, whereof twelve thousand to remaine to him fand duckats, felse, and eight thousand to be devided in shares amongest the particular souldiers. This money was not leautied of the flores or wealth of the Pylans, in whom was no meane to entertaine their proper condition, and much leffe to refurnish expences extraordinary; onely not to lose the oportunity of the Citadel, they prayd the aides of their friends, having foure thousand of the Venetians, foure thousand of the Genoways and Luckoyes, and soure thousand of the Duke of Alillan: who vfing at the fame time his ordinary shiftes and practifes (whereunto was given little faith) he folicited faintly to enter with the Florentines into firme intelligence and amity, & was already agreed of conditions with their Embassadours.

It can not in any construction cary likelihood of truth, that Monsier de Ligni, or the Captaine. or any other would have vied fo great transgression without the Kings will and liking, seeing chiefly the matter was so much to his disaduauntage: for that albeit the Captaine had capitulated, that the city of Py/a should continue in the obedience of the crowne of Fraunce, yet it remained manifestly at the deuotion of the confederates: and for that the restitution tooke not effect, the french men that were left in the realme of Naples were naked of the fuccours of men and money. promised in the contract of Thurin: The Florentines observing diligently the action of all things, (albeit in the beginning they made great doubt) were possess at last with this opinion, that all was done contrary to the will of the King: a thing which might feeme incredible to all others that The King con. knew not what was his nature, nor what were the conditions of his wit and customes, nor how lisemmed by his the authority he bare amongst his people; and lastly, how easily men are emboldened against a owne Subjects. Prince that is false into indignity and contempt.

Reasons why

the Pyfans offer them felues

so the Duke of Millan.

After the Pylans were entred by heapes into the Citadell, they razed it flat with the earth: and knowing their owne strength not sufficient to beare out the defence and protection of their cause, they sent at the same instant Embassadours to the Pope, to the King of Romaines, to the Venetians, to the Duke of Millan, to the Genoways, to the Siennoys, and to the Lucquoys, praying fuccours of every one by particular fute and discourse, but with greater instance of the Venetians, and Duke of Millan, towards whom they nourished a francke inclination to transferre the iurisdi-Stion of their city: wherein they had this cogitation and feeming, that they were constrained not fo much to looke to the preferuation of their liberty, as to eschew the necessity to returne estsoons into the power of the Florentines. Their hopes also were more partiall in him, then in any of the residue, for that besides he was the first stirrer of them to rebellion by reason of neighbourhood, yet reaping from the other confederates no other thing then generall hopes, they had alwayes receiued from himpresent and ready succours: But the Duke (notwithstanding his desire and ambition were importunate) floode doubtfull whether he should accept it, for scare least the other confederates would grow divided by it, in whose councels was now begunne to treate of the affaires of Pyla, as of a common cause. By reason whereof, sometimes he would desire the Pilans to deferre, and some times aduised them that it might be done in publicke action, and in the name of the Sainet Severins, and he to disclose that all was done to his profite, when he should see his time: But in the end(defire of dominion is troublefome till the appetite be fatisfied) when he faw the french King was gone out of Italy, and finding withall that his necessities and occasions with the confederates were not now fo great, he determined to embrace it.

But this inclination of the Pysans began to grow cold, for the great hopes they had to be succoured by the Senate of Venice: and withall, they had this councell of others, that more cafily might they defend their chate with the aide of many, then to stand upon the succors of one alone. finding by this meane a more greater hope to maintaine their liberty with full protection: according to these considerations, after they had obtained the Citadell, they laboured to bring to their defence and strength, the fauours and succours of euery one, for the furtherance of which intention, the disposition of the estates of Italy served to good purpose: for the Genoways, for the malice they bare to Florence, and the Siennoys and Lucquoys for hatred and feare, were alwaies to mimifter ande to them in some fort, wherein to proceed with more resolution & order, they solicited to make a contract with obligations resolute for that effect: To the Venetians and Duke of Millan, entertayning one defire to be their foueraigne Lords, it could not but be intollerable that they returned to the rule of the Florentines: and with the Pope and the Embassadours of the Spanish. much helped them, their common defire to plucke downe the Florentines, as being too much inclined to the doings of Fraunce: So that having bene graciously heard in every place, and obtayned of the elect Emperour the priviledge of confirmation of their liberty: they brought from Venice and Millan the same promises, to preserve them in their liberty which they had made afore with one common confent, to helpe to deliuer them from the french. And the Pope in the name and consent of all the Potentates of the league, incouraged them by a speciall signeture, with

Duke of Millan, the Duke augmenting the number of men that were there first, and the Senat resumishing them with a proportion sufficient: an action wherein if they had both continued, the Pifans had not bene constrained to slicke more to the one then to the other of them, and by that meane also, the common benefite had bene more eafily preserved: But as in all things not followed with the same industry wherein they are begunne, the end is leffe then the expectation: fo it happened to the Duke of Millan, who (fearing alwayes great expences, and being inclined of nature to proceed in all acti- Lodwike inons with apparances and shifts) made his accompt that the jurisdiction of Pifa could not but fall elined to shifts into his handes, and therefore began with small proportions to furnish things which the Pisans demaunded of him: In which diffrust and incertainety of dealing, they tooke occasion to transfer all their inclinations to the Venetians, in whom they found a plentifull reliefe in all their necessities without any sparing: from whence proceeded, that a few moneths after the french had redeliuered the Citadell, the Senate of Venuce required by the generall and importunat futes of the Ps/ans, The Venetidetermined to take the city into their protection, the Duke of Millan rather perswading them to ans in mind to it, then making any show of misliking. It is most certaine, that neither the defire to preserve the liberty of their neighbours (which in their owne countrey they loue much) nor any regard to the common benefite and fafety (as they did alwayes publish with honourable wordes) but the onely defire to get the iurisdiction of Pi/a, were the causes that the Venetians made this resolution: By the meane whereof they doubted not in short time to reape a sweete fruite of their ambitious desire; euen with the will of the Pysans them selues, in whom was a willing election to liue under the rule of Venice, the better to be alwayes assured, not to be repassed eftsoones into the servitude of the Florentines. And touching the Duke of Millan, how can it be believed, that he accultomed to be ca-,, ried sometimes by ambition and hope, somtimes by suspition and feare, and now being stirred no leffe with difdaine then lealousie, to see transferred to the Venetians, that pray which he had sought,, by so many meanes and studies for him felse: will not rather be ready to bring new troubles vpon ,, Italy, then endure that Pifa should be occupied by others then him selfe: And albeit with words and councels he declared the contrary, yet let it be an opinion absolute, that those apparances were ,,

will and commaundements of his King: with which rules measuring things to come, and judging the wifedome and pollicy of all others to be farre inferiour to the excellency of his spirite, he flatteredhim felfe to be alwaies able to addresse and gouerne the affaires of Italy as he would, and with his industry to turne and winde the mindes of every one. This fond perswafion he could not disfemble neither in him felfe, nor in his peoples, and no more in words and geftures, then in demonstrations and actions, making it a thing acceptable to him, that every one beleeved and spake so by him: in fo much that Mullan day and night was replenished with voices vaine and glorious, celebrating with verses latine and vulgar, and with publicke orations full of flattery, the wonderfull wisedome of Lodowike Sforce, of the which they made to depend the peace and warre of Itathey magnified his name even to the third heaven, and the furname of More, (imposed upon him from his youth, for that he was of complexion browne, and for the opinion of his crafts which now were manifelt) hee was contented to retaine willingly fo long as he remay ned Duke of Millan: Then no lesse was the authority of this More in the other castelles of the Florentines, then it had bene in the Citadell of Pefa, so that in Italy, it seemed that as well enemies as friends, were ruled by the measure of his will, so cloaking his subtelties with apparaunces of friendship, that his intentions were not discerned, till his purposes were executed: For albeit the King of the french, hearing the grieuous complaints made to him by the Embassadours of Florence, was not a little discontented, and to the end at least wife that their owne places might be rendred, had dispatched Robert de Veste his Chamberlaine with new commissions, and letters speciall from Mon-Genr de Liguy: yet his authority bearing no more power with others, then with him felfe, the audacity of Monsieur de Ligny was so great (assuring many that he proceeded not but by the Kings will) that his Maiesties commaundements bare small reputation, by meane of his new committions ioyned to the froward will of the castell keepers: In so much that the bastard of Vienna Lieutenant to Ligny in Serezana, after he had drawne his companies thither with the commissioners of the Florentines, to receive possession of them, he gave them to the Genoways for the price of five and twenty thousand duckats. The Captaine of Serezanella did the like for a summe of money, of which the author and onely meane was the More, who having opposed against the Florentines (but vnder the name of the Genoways) Frecasse with a hundreth horse and source hundreth footenien, gaue hinderance that the Florentines, who by meane of their bands fent to receive Serezana, had recoured certaine peeces in the countrey Lunigane, should not recour all their places they had lost there. And a little after, Emraques late Captaine of the Citadell of Pisa, vnder whole gard also remained yet the castels of Pietra Santa, and Mutron, together with that of Librafrate, which not many moneths after he gaucto the Pifans, fold the residue to the Lucquoss for fix and twenty thousand duckats, as precisely was directed to him by the Duke of Millan who first wished they might fall to the Genoways, but afterwards chaunging aduise, he thought it better to gratifie them of Lucque, to the end they might have occasion to minister ready aides to the Psfans, and to reduce them more to his denotion by this benefite. All these things were caried into Fraunce, for the which albeit the King shewed him selfe much discontented with Ligny, and pronounced Entragues banished out of all his realmes, yet at the returne of Bonne (who not participating with the money of the Pifans, had treated at Genes the fale of Serezana) his iustifications were accepted, and graciously received an Embassadour of the Pisans, sent with him to perfwade the King that the Pifans would remaine faithfull fuhiects to the crowne of Fraunce, and to protest their fidelity by oath, albeit a little after, his commissions not being liked, he had francke leaue to depart: to Monsieur de Ligny was imposed no other paine, then (to shew that he had no more the Kings fauor) rhe grace to lie in his Maicsties chamber as he was wont, was taken fro him, to the which he was immediatly restored: and Entragues remayned onely in contumacy, but no long time: to which things gaue good aide (befides the Kings nature with other meanes and fanours) a true perswasion that was made, that such were the necessities of the Florentines, that they could not endure separation from him: for that the ambition of the Venetians and Duke of Millan being manifest, it was a certaine probability in discourse and reason, that if they were not repossessed of Pifa, they would never accord to be confederate with them for the defence of Italy, whereunto they fought to enduce them by threatnings and meanes rigorous, and did not for the present, assay any other thing against them, but rested sufficed, (with the bandes they had put into Py/a) to support that city, and not suffer her wholly to lose her iurisdiction (the daunger

of the kingdome of Naples drawing them from all other care) for Virginio, who had gathered at Bagno de Rapolano and in the countrey of Perusin, many companies of souldiers, marched with the other Vrsins towardes Abruzze, holding also the same way with their bands, Camylla and Paule Vitelle, by whom the borough of Montlion (refusing to give them victuals) was put to the facke: which so amazed the other places of the Church by the which they should passe, that notwirhstanding the expresse defences of the Pope, they were received in all townes and relieued with victuals. By the reapport of those marchings, but much more for the brute of an affured succour comming by fea out of Fraunce, by which the French affaires feemed to stand upon good termes in the kingdome of Naples: Ferdinand no leffe deflitute of money, then environed on all fides with afpectes of daungers and difficulties of warre, and not able without great fuccours, to fullaine fo great a burthen, was constrained to study for new remedies to his present desence. It is fo, that in the beginning the other Potentates had not comprehended him in their league: and albeit fince he had recourred Naples, the king of Spaine made instance to have him admitted to the confederation, yet the Venetians would never agree to that point, perswading them selves that his necessities would be a ready meane to aduaunce the expectatio of their plot, that one part of that Realme might fall into their obedience: So that Ferdinand left to the miferies of many aduerlitics, and made naked of all hopes (for he expected no new fuccours from Spaine, and the other confederates would not intangle them felues with fo great expences) was constrained to couenant with the Senate of Venice, (promising with all observances to the Pope and the king of Spaine:) That the Venetians should fend to his succours into the Realme of Naples, commants bethe Marquis of Muntua their Captaine with seuen hundred men at armes , fine hundreth light tweene Feedihorsemen, and three thousand footemen, maintaining still their armie by sea which was nand king of there alreadie: with this condition notwithstanding, to reuoke those aydes at all times when Noples and they should have neede to imploy them in their proper affaires: That they should lend to the Venetians. him fifteene thousand duckats to serue his necessities present: And for the securitie of these expences, Ferdinand to affigne vnto them Otrante, Brundusa, and Trane, with consent that they might still retaine Monopols and Pulsgniana, which then were in their hands, under this couenant to render them, when their expences should be restored and satisfied: prouided alwayes, that neither by reason of the warre, nor for the garding or fortifications which they should make, they should not redemaund of him aboue two hundred thoufand duckats. Those portes being in the sea superiour, and therefore of great oportunitie to Venice, augmented much their greatnesse: which (no man now opposing against them, and fince they embraced the protection of Pyla, not hearing more of the councels of such, as wished that to windes so fauourable, they had given lesse tayles) began to be stretched through all the partes of Italie: for befides the things of the kingdome of Naples and Tuskane, they had of new take to their pay, After Lord of Faenza, & accepted the protectio of his estates: a man very convenient to keepe in feare the Florentines, the Citie of Bolognia, with all the residue of Romagnia.

To these particular aydes of the Venetians, were added other succours of the consederats; the Pope, the Duke of Myllan, and they, sending to Ferdinand a 10ynt supply of bands of men at armes intertained at their common pay: and albeit the Duke of Alylan, in whom remained as yet many femblances to keepe the accord at Verceill, (notwithstanding the most part of those things were directed by his councels) would not either in the leavies of men or money, or other demonstrations, that his name were vsed: yet heagreed secretly to contribute enery moneth ten thousand duckats for the succours of the kingdome of Naples.

The marching of the Ursins and the Vittellies affured greatly the affaires of Abruzze (which were in no small confusion) against the French men : seeing Terame and the Citie of Chiesa were drawne into rebellion, with great doubt that Aquileathe principall towne of that region, would do the like: which they at their comming having reconfirmed in the deuotion of the French, and recovered Terame by composition, and sacked Inhanone, almost all Abruzze was with one fortune eftfoones fo reeltablished, that the affaires of Ferdinand began to shew manifest declination through the whole kingdome: for that almost all Calabria was in the power of M. d'Aubigny, notwithstanding his long sicknesse, for the which he stayed in Terace, gaue oportunitie to Confaluo to keepe the war kindled in that province, with the Spanife bands, & Itrength of fonce

Lordes of the countrey: Besides, Caietta with many places assisting followed the obedience of the French: The Prefect of Rome, with his companie and the forces of his estate, after he had recouered the peeces of Montcasin, inuaded the land of Lanora on that side: and Monsieur Montpensier, albeit by the want of money he was much restrained to vse his forces, yet he compelled Ferdinand to inclose him selfe in strong places, being vexed with the same necessitie of money, and many other wants, but wholly reapposed vpon the hope of the succours of Venuce, which for that the contract betweene the was made not long before, could not be aduaunced with readinesse and expedition equall with the expectation of his affaires. Montpensier laboured to betray Benevent by intelligence, but Ferdinand either having doubt or some advertisement of the practile, preuented the execution by his suddeine entring the towne with his bands. The French not with standing came neare to Benevent, and lodging vponthe bridge of Fynoche, they tooke Sinezana, Apice, and many other townes bordering: but these places bearing no fauour to their armie for victuals, they discamped, having also regard to the time drawing on to gather the tribute of the cattell of Powylla, one of the greatelt reuenues of the kingdome, for that it was wont to amount every yeare to foure score thousand duckats, which were all gathered almost in the space of a moneth . Monsieur Montpensier to deprive them of this commoditie, and no lesse for the extreme necessities of his people, turned his way to Powylla, whereof one part was holden by him, and the other at the denotion of Ferdinand, marching after him by the fame way, with intention rather to hinder by art and diligence the actions of the enemie vntill his fuccours were arrived. then to fight with them in plaine battell.

The French name arrived at Caietta, About this time arrived at Cavetta, an armie by sea of the French, of sisteene great vessels, so seven other of lesser burden, in which were imbarked at Sanone eight hundreth Launceknights, leavied in the countreys of the Duke of Gueldres, and those Smyzzers and Gascoines appointed before by the king to be sent with those great shippes which were to be armed at Genes. To this navie the armie of Ferdinand which were about Cavetta to stoppe the passage of victuals (being indeede for want of money ill appointed) gave such place, that they entred the hauen without impediment, set their sootemen on land, and with the same fortune tooke stry with other places assisting: and after they had made a great pray through the countrey, they hoped to have Sesse by the meane of Dom Bapits Caraccol, by whom they had promise to be put secretly within it: but Dom Federyke (who with his bands that followed him being withdrawne to the borders of Tarenta, was afterwardes sent by Ferdinand to the government of Naples) being advertised of the conspiracie, marched thither with speede equall to the daunger, and made prisoner the Bishop with certaine others consenting to the treason.

In Powylla, where was the force and strength of the warre, the affaires succeeded with diuerfitie of fortunes to both the one and the other armie, which were dispersed into the townes, aswell for the sharpnesse of the season, as straitnesse of the place not sufficing to receive one of the armies wholly: their exercises were to make incursions and roades on horsebacke to pill and pray the cattell, vfing rather industrie and agilitie, then vertue or force of armes. Ferdinand was lodged in Forge with one part of his people, and had beltowed the refidue, partly in Trage, and partly in Nocere: where understanding that betweene S. Senera (within which towne was lodged Virginio Vrfin with three hundreth men at armes come to be vnited with the armie of Montpenser)& the towne of Porcina (where was Marian Sauella with a hundreth men at armes) was brought almost an infinite quantitie of Muttons and other natures of cattell: he marcheth thither with fix hundreth men at armes, eight hundred light horsemen, and fifteene hundreth sootemen: and comming by the breake of the day afore S. Seuera, he planted him felfe there with his men at armes to give refistance to Virginio if he made any eruption, and making his light horsemen to scoure abroad, they overspread forthwith the whole countrey, and led away almost three score thousand head of cattell: wheteto Marian Sauella offering to make resistance, and issuing forth of Porcina, they constrained him to retire with the losse of thirty men at armes. This losse and shame procured M. Montpensier, (reassembling all his forces) to march towardes Fogge, for the recouerie of the pray and honour loft: where being fauoured with a fuccour aboue his hopes or expectation, he encountred betweene Nocere and Troye, eight hundreth Launceknights newly arrived by sea, and entred into the pay of Ferdinand: these Launceknights departing from Troye where they were incamped, went to Fagge to joyne with Ferdinand: a journey more vpon their owne brayne and rashnesse, then by the kings commaundement, and altogether against the councell of Fabrice Collonne, incamped likewise at Troye: And albeit they saw by the extremitie of their perill and place, that their fortune had left them no possibilitie of safetie, either by flying or fighting, yet they were oblimate and refused the libertie of the law of armes to be made prisoners, but were killed euery creature of them, exchaunging their lines with a great death and flaughter of the enemie. After this, Montpensier presented him selse before Fogge in aray of battell : but Ferainand not suffering others to go out then light horsemen, the French men went to incampe in the wood of Nicoronata, where after they had remained two dayes with no small difficulties for victuals, and having recovered the most part of the cattell, they appeared eftsoones afore Forge, and abiding there a whole night, they returned the day following, to S. Senera, but not with all the pray they had recoursed, for that in their retraite, the light horsemen of Ferdinand tooke a great part from them, in so much, as the cattell being harried by the one and the other, neither part drew any great profit of the reuenues of that tribute. Not many dayes after the French men made wearie with want of victuals, went to Campobasso which was holden by them, and tooke by force Coghoneffa or Grigon ffa a towne fall by, where the Smyzzers against the will of the Captaines, vied fuch execution and crueltie, that albeit it brought great aftonishment vpon the countrey, yet it eltraunged from them the affections of many: and Ferdinand laying to defend his estate as well as he could, whilest he yet expected the Marquis of Mantua, he reordeined his bands, by the meane of fixteene thoufand duckats which the Pope had fent him, and with fuch other proportions as he could leavy of him felfe.

About this time, did io yne with Montpensier the Swyzzers, and other footebands which were come by sea to Canetta, as also on the other part, the Marquis of Mantua, now entredint the of Mantua for kingdome of Naples by the way of S. Germyn, taking in his matching, partly by force, partly by the Venetians composition, many places, albeit of small importance: about the beginning of sune, he vnited his in the kingdom forces with the king at Nocere, whither Cafar of Aragon led the bands that had lyen upon the of Naples. borders of Tarenta: and fo by reason of the places, the forces of both the factions being almost made neighbours, the French more strong in footenen, and the Italians more mightie in horsemen, the euent of things feemed very doubtfull, being not possible to discerne to whether of the parties the victorie should incline.

In this meane while, the French king made care for prouifions to refcue his people, and vnderitanding of the losse of the Castels of Naples, and that his bands were not succoured by the i lorent mes neither with men nor money, for that they had not restitution of their fortresses: seemed to draw to him a new spirite, and awaking out of that slumber of negligence with the which he seemed to have returned out of Fraunce, he began estiones to turne his thoughts to the actions of italie: wherein to be more at libertie from all things that might retaine him, and (flowing to acknowledge the benefites received in his daurigers) that he might with more confidence haue recourse agains to the aydes celestiall, he takes a journey in post to Tours, and after to Pu-The French ris, to satisfie to the vowes he made to S. Martin, and S. Dens the day of the battell of Furnoua: him makes a and returning from those places, with the same diligence to Lyons, he kindled more and more mage to Teurs in those desires and thoughts, whereunto of his owne nature he was most inclined: for he inter- and S. Denu. preted it as an action much to his reputation and glorie, to have made a conquest of such a kingdome, being the first of all the French kings, in whose person have bene renewed in Italie these many worlds, the memorie of the armes and victories of the French: he made perswasion to him felfe that the difficulties which he encountred in his returne from Naples, proceeded more by his proper disorders, then by the powers or vertue of the Italians, whose name (concerning the action . of warre) caried no reputation with the French. To his inclinations to descend effoones into Ita-150, were not a litle furthering the inticements of the Ambassadours of Florence, of the Cardinall of S.P. ad viacula, and of Trivulce, who was come to the Court for the fame occasion, with whom were affiliant in that inflance Vitellezze & Charles Vrfin, together with the Count Montoire, fent to his Maiestie in that negociation by the Barons of Naples holding part with the French: as also there came to him at last by sea, the Seneshall of Beaucaire, by who were declared many hopes of the victory, in case his Maiestie did not deferre to send a sufficient succour: as of the cotrarie to delay a relieffe so necessary, were to abadon the kingdome & be guilty of the death of so many noble Captaines & fouldiers: To these were joyned the fauorable perswasions of many the great Lords of France, even such as afore had given councell against the enterprise of Italie: they advised the king to give a new life to that expedition, to anoyd the dishonour that would fall vpon the crown of Fraunce, to lofe by cowardize that which they had conquered with fo great felicitie & fortune, but much more to preuent the spoyle of so great a part of the Nobilitie, as lay open to destruction in the Realme Naples: Neither were these councels hindred by the emotions which the king of the Spanish made on the frontier of Parpignian, seeing the preparations being greater in brute the in effect, and the forces of that king more mightie to defend his proper Realmes, then meete for the inuation of an other, it was judged fufficient to fend to Narbone and other townes vpon the frontiers of Spaine, bands of men at armes with convenient companies of Smyzzers: So that in the presence of the councell of the king, wherein were assembled all the Lords & persons notable then at the Court: it was determined that Trivulce should returne to Ast with as much diligence as he could under the tirle of the kings Lieutenant, leading with him eight hundreth launces, two thousand Smyzzers, & two thousand Gascoyns: That after him the Duke of Orleans should passe the Mounts with other bands: and laftly should march the kings person with all other prouisions: and passing with a power royall, there was no doubt but the stares of the Duke of Sauoye, of the Marquis of Montferat and Saluce, (very fit instruments to make warre vpon the Duchy of Myllan) would be for him: Like as also it was beleeved, that except the Canton of Berne, who had promised the Duke of Myllan not to move against him, all the other Smyzzers would refort to the kings pay with no leffe readinesse then full numbers. These resolutions were made with confents so much the more generall, by how much was great the defire of his Maiestie, who afore they entred into councell, had much conjured the Duke of Bourbon to set forth with vehement & liuely speeches, how reasonable and necessary it were to make a strong warre: and of him selfe in open councell, with the fame affection he refuted the Admirall, who (not so much in impugning directly, as propunding many difficulties) affayed to qualifie indirectly the wills of the councell, having but a few favourers of his opinion : the king advauncing his particular defire above all councell, affured them publikely that it was not in his power to make other resolution, for that fuch was the will of God that he should in person march effoones into Italie: it was agreed in the same councell, that a nauie of thirtie shippes, (whereof was one most huge carracke called the Norman, and an other groffe carracke of the region of the Roads) should passe along the coast of the Ocean into the hauens of Prouence, where should be armed thirtie galleys and gallions with a mighty fuccour of men, money, munition and victuals for the service of Naples, which was supposed to stand upon such conditions of necessities and wantes, that afore this nauic could be disgested into order and point, it was determined to send forthwith certaine vessels charged with victuals and fouldiers: it was ordained also in this councell, that Regault the kings Steward should go to Myllan, for that the Duke, (notwithstanding he had not redeliuered the two carrackes, nor fuffered to rigge a nauie for the king at Genes, but onely restored the vesselstaken at Rapale, and not the twelve galleys restrained in the port of Genes) laboured to excuse him selfe vpon the disobedience of the Genoways, and had alwayes with fundry practifes interteined some of his people about the king, to whom he had newly fent Anthoine Maria Paluoism, both to affure his Maiestie that he was disposed to observe the accord past, and to demaund prolongation of terme to pay to the Duke of Orleans the fiftie thousand duckats promised in the same accord: of which deceipts and futtleties, albeit he reaped but a very litle fruite, the king being well informed of his intention. as well by the examples of his actions past, as for that by his letters and instructions which were furprised, it came to light that he stirred up with continual solicitation the king of Romaines and king of Spaine to make war in Fraunce: yet hoping that feare perhaps would induce him to things whereunto his will was estraunged, Rigault was charged, that (without speaking of the disobedience past) he should signifie to him that it was in his power to deface the memorie of offences, in beginning to obserue, as to restore the galleys, to redeliuer the carrackes, and by giving sufferance to arme a nauie at Genes: And that he should adde to these aduertisements, that the king was determined to returne into Italie in person, which should be to his great harmes, if whilest he was. offered the meane, he would not reenter into that amitie, whereof his Maiestie was perswaded, that he had undiscreetely made account, rather by vaine suspitions, then for any other occasions. This brute of these great provisions being come into Italie, much troubled the mindes of the confederates: but aboue all Lodomyke Sforce standing in the mouth of the daunger, and to be the first opposed

opposed to the furie of the enemie, fuffered no lesse perplexities then the consideration of his perill required, specially, understanding that since the departure of Rigards, the king had dismissed and given leave to all his agents with hard wordes and bitter demonstrations: by reason whereof, looking deepely into the greatnesse of his daunger, as rpon whose estate would fall the substance of the warre: he had eatily accorded to the kings demaundes, had it not benefor the suspition and conscience of the offences he had made to him, the same causing on all sides such a dithrust, that it seemed more hard to finde a meane to assure both the one and the other, then not to accord to the articles: for taking from the furctie of the one, that which was confented to affure the other, the one would not referre to the faith of the other, that which the other refused to referre to his owne: So that necessitie compelling Lodonyk to take the councell that was most grieuous, he thought (at least to make flow his daungers) to intertaine Rigault with the same cunnings which he had vied to that prefent, affuring him with great firmenesse, that he would bring the Genoways to obey when socuer the king would give into the Citie of Augmon sufficient securitie for the restitution of the shippes, and that both parties would promise (giving mutually oftages for all observations) not to enterprise any thing prejudicially one to the other: which practise continuing many dayes, had lastly for many cauillations and difficulties objected, the same effect which others had had before . But Lodowyke to whom it belonged not to wast time vnprofitably, dispatched during these reasonings, Ambassadours to the king of Romains, to induce him to passe into Italie with the ayde of him & the Venetians, to whom also he sent messengers, to require that Senate(to the end to prouide for the common perill)to contribute to that charge, and to lend into Alexandria a sufficient proportion of force to make head against the French. To this they offered aready action: but they shewed not such facilitie to affilt the passage of the king of Romains, bearing little friendship to their common weale for those peeces which they possessed in the firme land appertaining to the Empire and house of Austrich: neither were they content, that at a common expence, should passe into Italie an armie, which should wholly depend upon Lodowyke. Notwithstanding Lodomyke continuing still to solicite and make instance, for that besides the other reasons that moved him, the onely forces of the Venetians in the state of Alyllan were suspected to him: the Senat also fearing least he, in whom they knew was no litle feare, would suddeinly draw to reconcilement with the French king, gaue in the end their confents, and for the same occasion, sent Ambassadours to the king of Romaines: Besides these coniectures, the Venetians and the Duke feared, least the Florentines, assoone as the king were passed the Mounts, would make alteration or infurrection in the river of Genes: To meete with which accident, they fent to John Bentyuole (intertained in the pay of the cofederates with three hundreth me at armes) to make war ypon the Florentines in the frontier of the countrey of Bolognia, promising that at the same time they should be vexed by the Siennoys: wherein as to give him more courage to this actio, they offered to be bound, that if he tooke the town of Pifloya, to keepe it for him: so albeit he fed them with hopes, yet his minde was farre removed from that Teruice, and fearing not a litle the comming of the French, he fent fecretly to the king, to excuse him selfe for matters past vpon the necessitie of the place wherein Bologma was feated, and to offer a good will to depend upon his Maiestie hereafter, and for his fake, to abstaine from vexing the Florentines.

But touching the prouisions for Naples, the will of the king (albeit very vehement and forward) was not sufficient to put in execution the resolutions of the councell, notwithstanding as well for his honour, as for the daungers of the kingdome, there needed a most readic expedition: for the Cardinall of S. Mallo, in whose directio, besides the managing of the treasure, rested the substance of the whole government, albeit he impugned not these doings apparantly, yet he made so flow all expeditions with delaying the necessary payments, that not one prouisson was advanced in due time: it was thought that he did thus, either for that he indged it was a better meane to perpetuate his greatnesse (not making any expence which appertained not to the present profit or pleasures of the king) not to have occasion to propound enery day the difficulties of the affaires & needstities of money: or else for that (as many doubted) being corrupted with presents and promises, he had secret intelligence with the Pope, or with the Duke of Asyllan: To which dilatorie and icalous dealings, the expersescent with the remaining to the king sull of disdaine redoubled with wordes reprochfull, could gue no remedie: for that according to the experience he had of his nature, he satisfied him alwayes with promises contrary to the effects: Inso much as the execution of things determined, having bene begun to be lingred by his meane; there hapned an accident, by the which they became more subject to delayes, and almost desperate altogether: for the king in the end of May, and when was generall expectation of his speedic passage into Italie, determined to go to Paris, alledging thele reasons, that following the custome of the auncient kings of Fraunce, it was necessary afore he parted out of Fraunce, to take leave of S. Denis with all the ceremonies viuall, and likewise of S. Alartin in passing by Tours: and that being determined to march into Italie with a great prouision of money, it was needfull (to anoyd the necessities wherin he hadfalne the yeare before) that he induced the other Cities of Fraunce to contribution by the example of Paris, by whom he should not obtaine that he defired, valefie he went thither in perfon: That being in those quarters, he should make to march in greater diligence the men at armes that came from Normandse and Pscardse: he assured them that afore he departed from Lyons, he would dispatch the Duke of Orleans, & would make his returne thither again within one moneth: But it was supposed that the most true and principall cause of his going, was for that he was amorous of one of the Ladies of the Queenes chamber, being gone a litle before to Tours with her Court: wherin he was so resolute, that neither the councels of his peoples, nor the importunate humilities followed with teares of the Italias, could withdraw him from a voyage of fuch denotion: They shewed him, how hurtfull it would be to wast time proper for the warre, specially in so great necessitie of his service in the kingdome of Naples: to what slaunder he should be subject in the mouthes of all Italie, to draw backe when he ought most to go forward: That the reputation of enterprises chaunged for euery litle accident and light brute: That it was hard to recouer it, after it began once to decline, yea though he flould make greater offers, then afore were either promifed or needfull: That of all worldly things, nothing was more voluble then renowme, which falling once into a cloud of shadow, shines neuerafter with a cleare light. These perswasions much leffe that they could draw his wavering minde from wandring, feeing with an obstinacie vnruled he vtterly dejected them, efteening it perhaps a breach in his Religion, to go out of Fraunce afore he had gone on pilgrimage to the Sainct he so deuoutly worshipped: In so much that after he had yet taried a moneth longer at Lyons: he tooke his way to go to Tours, not having otherwayes difpatched the Duke of Orleans then onely by fending Tribulce into Aft with a verie flender conpanie, not so much prouided for the warres, as instructed to confirme in his friendship and deuorion, Phillip new succeeded to the Duchie of Sauoye, by the death of the Duke his Nephew: And touching the prouision for Naples, all that was done afore his departure, was the dispatch of fix thips loaden with victuals to Caietta, carying many hopes that the mayne armie by fea should follow with speede: And to set order with the Marchants (but very late) to aduaunce fortie thoufand duckats to Montpensier, to whom the Swyzzers and the Launceknights had protested, that if they were not payed before the end of Iune, they would passet the campe of the enemies. The Duke of Orleans, the Cardinall of S. Mallo, and all the councell, remained at Lyons, with commiffion to haften the prouifios, wherein if the Cardinall proceeded flowly in the prefence of the king, it was nothing to the lingring he vsed in his absence.

But the affaires of Naples could not attend fuch flow remedies, the daungers being drawne into those termes (both for the assembly of armed bands on every side, and many difficulties difclosed by both the parties) that if the delayes were long, the warre would determine by necessistie: for Ferdmand after he had joyned to his peculiar force, the bands of the Venetians, tooke the towne of Castelfranke, where arrived at his campe accompanied with two hundreth men at armes John Sforce Lord of Pefere, and John Gonsague brother to the Marquis of Mantua, Captaines of the confederates: In fo much as the proportion of his campe amounted to twelue hundreth men at armes, fifteeene hundreth light horsemen, and soure thousand sootemen. At the same time the Frech men were incamped at Circelle ten myles from Beneuent, towards whom Ferdinand marched, and approching them within foure myles, he pitched his campe before Frangette de Monto fort, a place of fo good prouision, that it was not taken at the first assault: The French raised their campe from Circelle to rescue it, but they came not in time, for that the Launceknights which were within yeelded them selues for seare of the second assault, and left the place to discression: which occasion knowne to the French, had bene the cause of their felicitie, if either by indiscreffion or ill fortune, they had not suffered it to be lost: for (as was confessed generally) they had at ease that day broken the whole armie of the enemy, so vniuerfally confused in the sacke of Fran-gette that they gaue no regard to the directions of the Captaines, who feeing no other distance between the French & them then a valley, laboured with all diligence to reassemble them: Montpensier faw well enough into the occasion, and Verginio was not ignorant in the oportunitie offered, the one commaunding, and the other perswading the victory to be certaine, desired with teares in their eyes, to march ouer the valley, whilest in the campe of the Italias all things were in tumult, some of the souldiers busie in the pillage, & some labouring to packe away the things they had pilled, no one within rule or commaundement of his Captaine: Alonsieur de Persie one of the Chieftaines of the armie next to Monsieur Montpensier, ouerruled either with the naturall lightnesse of a young man, or else enuying the glorie of the Duke Mompensier, perswaded vehemently against the passage ouer the valley, alledging that they should rise even under the feete of . the enemie, which waighed with the strong situation of their campe, he made an argument to the fouldiers of no finall daunger, and therefore wishing openly that they should not fight, he was the onely hinderer of so good a councell, and ioned to their misfortune a perpetuall dishonour: the rather for that the Swyzzers and Launceknights receiving courage by him, drew into mutinie and demaunded money. For this cause Montpensier compelled to retire, returned to Circelle, where, as they were they day after in the action of the affault, Camylla Vitelli, whilest Camilla Vitelabout the walls he did the office of an excellent Captaine, was striken in the head with a quarrell, whereof he dyed: for which accident the French men leauing the inuation of the place, brake vp from thence, and marched towardes Argana, disposed to assay the hazard of battell if occafion were offered: To which resolution was flat contrary the councell of the armie of the Aragons, with whom specially the Commissioners of the Venetians consented in opinion, for that feeing into the condition of the enemies, they judged that to their present want of victuals was ioyned a generall lacke of money, and waighing withall that the fuccours out of Fraunce were intangled with delayes and respites, they hoped that their misaduentures and necessities would rife dayly growing and increasing. , Itanding subject to as great displeasures in other parts of the kingdome: for that in Abruzze, Annyball naturall sonne to the Lord of Camerin, being voluntarily gone to the fuccours of Ferdinand with foure hundred horsemen leauyed at his proper charges, had newly broken the armie of the Marquis of Bitonte: befides there was expectation of the comming of the Duke of Vrbin with three hundreth men at armes lately entred, into the pay of the confederates, whose fortune and greater conditions having determined to follow, he had abandoned the alliance of the Florentines (to whom he was yet bound for more then a yeare) under this excuse, that being feodarie of the Church, he was bound in reason and equitie of office to obey the commandements of the Pope: And Graciano d'Aquerre, who had taken the field to encounter him, was charged in the plaine of Sermone by the Count of Celane and the Count de Popols, with three hundreth horses and three thousand sootenien, whom he put to flight . But with the losse of the occasion of the victorie about Frangette, the fortune also of the French began manifeltly to decline, concurring in them at one time these natures of difficulties, extreme The Freeh bewant of money, scarcitic of victuals, hate of the people, difagreement of the Captaines, difobe-ginto decline dience of fouldiers, and the stealing away of many from the campe, partly by necessitie, and part- "Naples. ly by will: They had no meane to draw out of the kingdome any great proportion of money, neither had they received from Fraunce any fumme notable, fince the fortie thousand duckats leauved for their reliefe, were too late fent from Florence: in fo much as no leffe for that cause, then for the neighbourhood of many townes supported by the armie of the enemie; they could not raife prouitions necessary for their food and sustenance: and in their armie was nothing but disorder, alwell for that the courages of the fouldiers were abated, as for that the Swyzzers and Launceknights drawing into tumult, demaunded importunatly their payes. And touching the difcord of the Captaines, that which most hurt all their deliberations, was the continuall contradiction of Perfie against Minipenfier: to be short, such were their necessities and disorders, that the Prince of Bisigman was compelled to depart with his people to go to the gard of his own estate, for feare of the bands of Confaluo, by whose examples, the particular souldiers of the countrey abandoned the campe by troupes, wherein they had reason, for besides they never received pay, yet the French and Swyzzers vsed them very ill, aswell in the division of booties., as in distribution of victuals. These difficulties, but chiefly the extreme want of victuals, constrained the French armie by litle and litle to retire and wander from one place to an other, which diminished greatly

their reputation with the people: And albeit the enemies followed them as it were in a continuall chase, yet they had no hope to be able to fight, as was specially defired by Montpensier & Virginio: for that not to be enforced to battell, they incamped alwayes in places of Itrength, & where no impediment could be giuen to their commodities. At last, the French being incamped under Montcaluole and Casalarbore neare to Arriana, Ferdinand ouertaking them within the shoot of a crosbow (but alwayes keeping him in strong places) brought them into great necessitie of victuals, taking from them inlike fort the vse of fresh water: in so much as by the aspect and consideration of these perils, they thought it best to draw towardes Pomylla, where they hoped to find commoditie of victuals, and fearing by reason of the nearenesse of the enemies, the difficulties that ordinarily follow armies that retire, they rayled their campe in the beginning of the night, not making any brute to bewray their going, and marched fine and twentie myles afore they rested . Ferdinand followed them in the morning , but dispaying to make that speede to ouertake them, which they did to go from him, having fo much leffe time, as they had more, he incamped before Gefauldo, a towne which heretofore had fultained a fiege of foureteene moneths, and now taken by him in one day, greatly to the disappointing of the French: for that determining to put them selues within Venoula, a towne strong by situation, and most plentiful with victuals, the opinion they had that Ferdinand could not to easily take Gefnaldo, was the cause that they amufed them selves about the sacke of Attella which they had taken, and for the time they lott there, afore their departure, they found the armie of Ferdinand at their backes, who affoone as he had taken Gesnaldo, dispatched way: And albeit they repulsed diverse scoutes and foreriders, yet feeing the mayne armie marched after with fuch speede, as they had no meane nor ablenesse to recouer Venousa which was eight myles distant, they remained in the towne of Attella, with intention to expect if fuccours would come from some part, hoping that for the nearenesse of Venoula & many other peeces thereabout holding yet for them, to receive fauours with many commodities of victuals and reliefe. Ferdinand with a speede according to his fortune, incamped before Attella, labouring onely (for the hope he had to obtaine the victorie without perill & bloud) to cut them from victuals: for the better advancement whereof, he cast many trenches about Attella, and loft no oportunitie to make him felfe Maister of the places adioyning, forgetting no "diligence, trauell, or action of a Captaine pollitike and valiant: and as in warres, there is no fur-"ther affurance of the fouldier Mercenarie, then he findes furetie of his pay, and leffe confidence in " his faith and feruice, by how much he is fo straunge of his owne nation, that he feareth not the di-" scipline of his patron : So the difficulties of the French, made every day all things more easie to Ferdinand, for that the Launceknightes in the French campe, having received but two moneths pay fince they departed from their houses, and seeing by so many disappointments of dayes and termes past, all further expectatio was vaine, they drew into coucell, & went wholly to the campe of Ferdinand: In so much that having meane so much the more to grieve the enemie, &to enlarge his army with more scope, he suffered a more hard passage of victuals which came from Venousa & other places about to Attella, wherein was not refreshing to suffice to feede the French numbers a very few dayes: for befides, that come barea very feant proportion, yet the Aragens pluckt down a mill standing you the river which runneth neare to the wals, wherby they wated meane to turne their litle store of corne into meale: neither were their discommodities present, recomforted by hoping in any good to come, feeing that from no part appeared fo much as one figne offuccours:extremities fo much the more intollerable to the French, by how much their felicities in the conquest had sayled with so full gales, that they never looked backe to those revolutions which naturally do follow all humane actions: not that fortune doth so prouide(a reason which many vaine menoccupy) but that so it is set downe in the eternal councell of God, who by the " fame power doth dispose and gouerne all things on the earth, by the which he created them of The declination othing, But the cause of their full ruine, was the misaduetures that fellin Calabria; for by occasion of the ficknesse of M. a Aubieny, in which infirmitie many of his people went to the armie of Morpensier, Consaluo seruing his turne of his ficknesse, tooke many peeces in that province, incamping at last with his Spanish bands and strength of popular souldiers of the countrey, at Castronillare: where having advertisement that the Count Melete, & Albert de S. Senerm, with many other Barons were at Laine with bands of fouldiers almost equall to his, & that increasing their nubers

daily, they made their plot to affaile him, who their whole street was affembled the determined to

preuent them, hoping to surprise them unprouided, by the confidece they had in the situation of their place, the cattell of Lame stading upon the river Sabry, which divideth Calabria fro the principality: and the borough is on the other fide the river, wherin being intrenched, they were garded by the castell against all inuasions by the high way. Lastly, betweene Lame and Castrouillare, was Alurana, with certaine other peeces of the Prince of Bufignian which held for them: but Consaluo with a councell all contrary, departed a little before night from Castrouillare, accompanied with all his bands, and leauing the high way, he tooke the large way, not with flanding it was both more long and hard, for that he was to march by certaine mountayns: and being arrinedneare the riner, he commaunded the footemen to take the way to the bridge, which is betweene the callell of Laine and the borough, which bridge was but negligently garded for the opinion of the furety of the place: and him felfe with his horfemen passing the river at a foord two Confaluo firmiles higher, was at the borough before day, where finding the enemies without watch and gard, prifeth the he brake them in a moment fleeping in the fecurity of the place: he made prisoners xj Barons, and french, almost all the fouldiers, for that flying to the castell, they fell amongest the footemen, which now were possest of the passage of the bridge. By this honorable victory being the first which Consaluo had got in the kingdome of Naples, his strength was so increased, that having also with the like vertue and fortune, recoursed certains other places in Calabria, he determined with fixe thou-fand men to go and joyne with the campe of Ferdinand, which was before Attella: and in that campe was arrived a little before, an hundreth men at armes of the Duke of Candra, Captaine of the confederates, but him felfe with the refidue of his bands remained in the towne of Rome.

By the comming of Confaluo, (caused by the surprise of those which were for the french in Calabria) they that were befieged were brought into hard straights, their towne being enuironed onthree sides, the Arragons occupying one, the Venetians an other, and the Spaniards the third: In so much that there was almost left no entrey for victuals, specially the Venetian stradiots running ouer the whole countrey, and taking many french men which brought reliefe from Venousa: they also that were within, had no meane to go on forraging but at houres extraordinary, and that with a strong gard: and Paule Vitelli making a fally at midday, with a hundreth men at armes, was drawne by the Marquesse of Manina into an ambush, where he lost part of his company.

And being thus depriued of all commodities without, they were at last reduced to that extremiry, that they could not with gard and frength, ferue their vic of the river to water their horses: and within the towne their necessities were no lesse of fresh water, for the refreshing of their perfons: So that being ouerwearied with fo many aduerfities, and no leffe abandoned of all hopes, their perils more generall and prefent, then their fuccours likely or affured: after they had endured the fiege two and thirty dayes, and being now left to the last remedy in warre, they demaunded a fafe conduct, which was granted, under the protection whereof, they fent to capitulate with Ferdinand, Monsieur de Persie, Bartholomew d'Albiane, and one of the Swizzer Captaines: a- The french mongest whom were agreed these couenants following: That there should be no enterprise at - fend to capital tempted by either part one upon an other for xxx, daies: That during that time, not one of the be-late with Ferfieged, (to whom should be ministred day by day by the Arragons necessary victuals) should depart out of Attella: That it should be suffered to Montpensier, to aduertise his King of the accord: That if he were not rescued in the sayd tearme of thirty dayes, he should leaue Attella, and all that he had in his power in the kingdome of Naples, together with all the artilleries that were there: That the fouldiers should be in safety for their persons and iewels, and with them it should be lawfull to enery one to go into France, either by land or fea: and to the Vrims & other Italian Captains, to returne with their bands whither they would out of the kingdome: That to the Barons & others, which had followed the factio of the french (in cafe they would return to Ferdinand within xv.daies)all punishments should be remitted, & restitution of althe goods they possessed when the warre began. The tearme of this abstinence expired, M. Montpensier, with all the french, and many Swizzer, together with the Vrims, were conducted to the fea castel of Stabby, where they bega to dispute, if Montpensier as lieutenant general under his king, & by that means about all others, were bound(as Ferdinand faid) to make to be rendred all that was possessed in the kingdome of Naples in the name of the french king: for that M. Montpensier pretended, that he was bound to no more. then was in his owne power to render, & that his authority stretched not to command other captains & castel keepers which were in Calabria, Abruzze, Caietta, & many other towns & peeces

which the King had given them in charge, and not to him: The argument being traversed by many reasons on both sides for certaine dayes, they were at last conducted to Bau, Ferdinand making femblance that hee would let them go: and there (vnder colour that the vessels wherein they should be embarked, were not yet ready) they were so long retayned, that being dispersed betweene Baia and Pozzola, they fell into fuch difeases by the ill aire and many other incommodities, that both Mounsier Montpensier died, and of the residue of his company which were more then five thousand bodies, there scarce returned into Fraunce safe and sound, five hundreth. Virgmio and Paule Vrsin (at the request of the Pope, who was now determined to take from that fainuly their estates) were sent prisoners to the egge castell, and their companies conducted by John lordan sonne to Virginio, and Bartholomer d'Aluiano, were by the appointment of the Pope, Pripped in Abruzze by the Duke of Vrbin: 10hn lordan also and Aluiano, Icauing their people in the way, and returning to Naples by the commaundement of Ferdinand, were made prifoners: but Aluiano, either by his industry, or by the secret sufferaunce of Ferdinand (who loued him much) had meane to escape.

After Ferdinand had taken Attella, he made division of his army into many parts, for the more casie recourring of the residue of the kingdome: he sent before Caietta, Federike of Aragon, and Prosper Colonne: and to Abruzze, where the towne of Aguila was already revolted to his deuotion, he dispatched Fabrice Colonne: and him selfe taking by force the rocke of Sainet Seuerin, and cut off the heads of the castell keeper and his sonne, the more to terrific others, went to encampe before Salerna, where the Prince of Bifignian had parley with him, and compounded for The Prince of him felfe, for the Prince of Salerne, for the Count of Capaccie, and for certaine other Barons, Bisignian comwith condition that they should remaine possessed of their estates, but that Ferdinand for his surety should keepe in his handes the fortresses for a certainetime. After which accord they went to Naples: In Abruzze was not made any great refiftance, for that Graciano, who was there with eight hundreth horsenien, having no more meane of desence, and lesse expectation of succours in a fortune fo declining, retired to Caietta: Into Calabria, of which the greatest quantity held yet for the french, returned Confaluo, against whom, albeit Mounsier d'Aubieny made iome resistance, yet being in the end driven to take Groppoly, after he had lost Manfredonie and Cofensa, which had bene facked before by the french: and lastly, seeing all hopes became desperate, and no apparaunce of fuccours from France, he consented to deliuer vp all Calabria, vpon sufferance fents to depart to returne by land into France.

Monsieur d'-Aubigny conthe kingdome of Naples.

pounteth for him felfe and

oshers.

It is certaine that many of these reuolts and changes, happened by the negligence and indifcretion of the french: for albeit Manfredonia, for the fituation of the place was strong, for the fauors of the people there, free from suspition, and for the fertility of the countrey, full of plentifull means and provision of victuals : and that the King had left for the gard of it Gabriell Montfalcon, efleemed a Captaine valiant: yet after it had endured a very flott and cafic fiege, they were constrayned to render it for famine: Like as also (in misfortunes examples doe much) other peeces of good ability to defend them felues, became recreant, and yeelded, either for feare, (which is proper to cowards) or for impatience of the incommodities, which fuch mult fuffer as are befieged: some Castell keepers finding their rocks well prouided for, sold the victuals at their first entry, and fo as foone as the enemy appeared, made their willing neceffities and wants a flanderous detection of their infidelity and cowardife. By these disorders, joyned to the negligence of the King, the french lost in the kingdome of Naples that reputation, which the vertue of that man had wonne vnto them, who holding many yeares after the victory of Ferdinand, the castell of the Egge, which John of Anion had left in his charge, could neuer be brought to render it, but by compulsion of victuals altogether confumed.

Thus no more remayning for the recourry of the whole realme, then Tarenta and Caietta, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguyn: and Mont Saint Ange kept by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, who with great merite and praise, made his vertue knowne in all the places thereabouts: it happened that Ferdinand, rayled into great glory, and no leffe hopes to be equallin greatneffe with his predecessours, went to Somme, a towne scated at the soote of the hill Vesune to see the Queene his wife, where he became very ficke, either for his trauels past, or by new excessive disorders: and feeling by his disposition no hope of recourry, he caused himselfe to be caried to Naples, where he died not many dayes after, somewhat before the end of the yeare after the death of his father king Alphon 6: he left behind him, not onely in his kingdome but also thorough all Italy, a fingular opinion of his valour, not fo much for his victorie obteyned, which in times and conditions to deuided merited much, as by the life and readinesse of his spirit, wherein he was found refolute in both fortunes, with many other royall vertues, wherein he became a worthy example to many: he dyed without iffue and therefore his Vncle Dom Federike succeeded him, being the fift king feene to fucceede in that kingdome in three yeares time.

Alloone as Federike was aduertised of the death of his Nephew, he leavied his siege from before Caietta, and went to Naples, where was the old Queene his mother in law, who put into his hands New castle, albeit many were of opinion that she would retain it for her brother Ferdinand king of the Spanish. In this accident were most fingular towards Federike, not onely the wils of Federike made the peoples, but also the inclinations of the Princes of Salerne, and of Besignan, together with the hing of Naples faith of the Count Capaccie, all which were the first that pronounced his name within Naples, & going to meete him faluted him as king at his difcending from the ship: They were farre better content with him, then with the last king, no lesse for the mildnesse and moderation of his mind (which they honored with great reuerence and humilitie) then for the furetie of their owne estates, having no small suspition that Ferdinand assoone as he had addressed his affaires, had intentions to call to answere all those that in any fort had bene fauourers of the french.

But these alterations and disorders happing with so great dishonor and domage to the french faction, had no power to give a new life to the king, and much leffe haften his provisions, who standing intangled with the delights & pleasures of the court, made it foure monethes afore he re- Negligence in turned to Lyons. And albeit in this amorous negligence, he oftentimes recommended to fuch as the french ling. he had left there, the folicitation and dispatch of all prouisions as well for sea as land, and the Duke of Orleans was prepared to depart: yet by the auncient cunnings of the Cardinall of S. Mallo, the men at armes which were flenderly payed, marched as flowly towards Italy, and the nauie by fea which was to be affembled at Marfeilles, aduaunced fo flackly, that the confederates had leafure enough, to fend first to Ville Franche a large haven neare to Nice, and afterwards even to the roades of Marfeilles, an armie by fea leavied at their common charges at Genes, to give impediments to the vessels of France that were to go to the realme of Naples: and to these great & generall delayes proceeding principally from the Cardinall of S. Mallo, wife men doubted, that there was joyned fome other cause more secret, intertayned in the kings mind with a singular art & diligence of fuch as with many reasons laboured to tume him from the enterprises of Italy, for that they thought, that for his proper regard and interest, he ought to be jealous ouer the greatnes of the Duke of Orleans, on whom (if the victorie succeeded) the Duchy of Myllan shold fall. Befides, they occupied with him this discourse of perswasions, that it was farre from pollicie and his proper suretie to go out of France, afore he had made some contract with the king of Spaine, who expressing a defire to be reconciled, had sent Embassadors to his Maiestie to induce a truce, & infinuate an agreement. Many counfelled him to tarie till the Queene was brought to bed, for that it agreed not with his wisedome, & was contrary to the loue he ought to beare to his peoples, to object his person to so many perils, afore he had a sonne & heire to receive so great a succession: A reason which made the deliverie of the Queene more painefull, and her fruit more wretched & vnfortunate, seeing that not many dayes after, the masculine issue which God had given him, died: So that partly by particular negligence in the king, but more by the errors and vices of his fimple councell, and partly by the difficulties which others fuggefted, the prouifions waved fo long in delayes, that the ruine of his people, & whole loffe of the kingdome, made lamentable vnto them the operations of their owne indifcression: yea the like had hapned to his friends and confederats

It hath beene fet downe before, how for feare of the french prouisions, and more for the contentment of Lodowyke Sforce, then any thing agreeable to the Veneroans, there was a plot laid to make passe into Italy Maximilian Casar, with whom whilest that seare indured, it was agreed that the Vinetians should give him for three whole moneths twenty thousands duckats for every moneth, to the end lie should bring with hima certaine proportion of horsemen & footmen, your the which passing of accord, Lodowyke accompanied with the Embassadors of the confederats, went to Manza (a place on the other fide the Mounts vpon the confyns of Almaine) to comunicate with his Maiestic: where after they had vsed great conference, Lodowyke came backe againe

in Italy, if of themselves they had not constantly defended their proper estates.

Lodowyke will turne of the king of Romaines for his ambition, as he french king in bis necessitie.

the fame day to Bormy, a towne of the Duchie of Myllan on this fide the Mounts, whither came Maximilian the day following vnder colour of going on hunting: and after in that enterview of two dayes, they had fet downe the time and maner of his marching into Italy, Maximulian returned into Germany to folicite the execution of things that were contracted. But the brute of the prouisions of France inferiour to all expectation, growing now so cold, that for that regard it seeas wel ferue bis med not necessarie that the king of Romaines should march: yet Lodowyke determining to serue his ambition of that which afore he had procured for his proper furetie, continued still to solicite him to descend into Italy, wherein to remoue all impediments that might hinder his defire, albeit the Venetians would not be concurrant in the promise of thirtie thousand duckats which he dehad done of the maunded ouer and about the lx. thousand that were accorded to him; yet he forbare not to bind himselfe alone to that demaund: Insomuch that in the end Maximilian marched and passed into Italy, a litle afore the death of Ferdinand: of the which when he was aduertised, being neare to Atillan, he entred into thoughts and deuifed fo to handle things, as by his meane the kingdome of Naples might come to John the onely forme of the king of Spaine, and his forme in law: But that being farre from the purpose of Lodowyke and his secret ambition, he told him that in that action he should discontent & trouble all Italy, and be the cause to dissolue the vnitie of the confederats, and consequently to make easie the enterprises of the king of France, occupying such other cunning perfivations, that his fubtleties fo vanguished all the intentions of Cafar, as he did not onely giue ouer and denounce his first cogitation, but also fauoured and ratified by letters the succession of Federike: he descended into Italy with a very small companie of men, but the brute ranne, that there marched after even to the proportion and quantitic which he had promifed. And being come to Vigenena, where he folourned, Lodomyke & the Cardinall of Santa Croce (fent vinto him as Legat by the Pope)together with the Embaffadours of the confederats, affembled with him in councell to resolute what were best to be done: therein this was thought the first and most necessiarie action, that he should march into Piemont to take the towne of Ass. & separat from the french king the Duke of Sauoy, & Marquis of Montferat, as mebers depending of the Empire: to them he addressed aduertisements to come to speake with him in a towne in Piemont: but his forces being inferiour to his title & dignitie, and by that occasion the effects not answering the authority of the name imperiall, they fhewed contempt, not one of them confenting to go to him: like as also for the enterprise of Ast, there was no apparance that it should happily succeed: he made like instance to come to speak with him, to the Duke of Ferrara, who ynder name of Feodary of th'empire, possessed the towne of Modene & Regge: And albeit he offered him for his surety, the faith of Lodowyke, his fon in law, yet he refused to go to him, alleaging that the action were not couenient for his honor, for that he held as yet in deputatio, the castle of Genes. Finally Lodowyk (led stil with humors of his ancient couetouines, and no leffe discontented that Py/a so ambitioutly defired of him, should fall with the danger of all *Ital*y into the power of the Venetians, sought wonderfully to hinder fuch a matter)& coulelled the Emperor to go to Py/a, perswading him with discourses full of deceits, that the Florentines being not mighty enough to refift him & the strength of the confederats, would depart by necessity from th'alliance of the french king, and could not refuse to refer the accord & arbitration of all their controuerfies to the person of Maximilian, to the end, that if not by reconcilemet, at least by way of instice, might be determined the differences between them & the Pyfans. In which regard as Pyfa should be put into the hands of Cafar, & all the appurtenanccs appertaining to it: So he hoped by his authoritie to makothe Py/ans confent, & that the Venetians (being concurrant in this action the wils of all the other confederats) would not oppose thefelues against a conclusion so conducible to the common benefit, and no lesse inst and honest of it felse: for Pysa being anciently a towne of the Empire, the reknowledging of the rights of such as aspired to it, appertey ned to no other then to Casar: & so being committed of trust into the hands of Cafar, Lodowyke hoped that he should easily come by it, either by money, (which makes way into great kingdomes) or for the grace and authoritie which he had with him, the fame feruing as an inftrument to aduance his ambition. This deuife was propounded in the councell vnder colour, that seeing for the present, the seare of the french warres ceased, the comming of Casar might be yied to induce the Florentins to knit with the other confederats against the french king, a deuile not displeasing to Maximilian, who was not a litle discontented that his descending into Italy bred no effect, hoping withall, that where hy reason of his infinite plots and inuentions and no leffe for his diforders and vnbridled prodigalities, he had alwaies want of money, Pyja would be an infrument conucnient, to gather fome great quantitie either of the Florenizes, or others. The deutife also was appround by all the confederate as a thing very profitable for the fureitie of Italy: The Embaffador of Vence not impugning it, for that that Senate, perceiving well enough to what endstended the thoughts of Lodowyke, doubted not to beguile him easily, and hoped that by meane of the presence of Gesar might be gotten the hauen of Lysarne, which being vnited once to Py/a, the Florent mes had no further hope to recourt that citic.

Lodowyke per-Swades Cafar to go to Pysa.

It hath bene declared how the confederars afore made many meanes and requests to the Florentines to enter vnitie and league with them, and at the times when most they feared the descending of the frenchmen, they gauerhem hopes fo to worke and trauell in things, that Pyla should eftloones returne vnder their iurifdiction: but the couctousnesse of the Venetians and Lodowyke being suspected to the Florentines, who would not lightly deuide themselves from the amitie of the french king, bare no readie deuotion to those suggestions: wherein as one thing that kept them backe, was a hope to recour by the comming of the french king, Pietra fantla, & Serezana, places which they could not exfect by any working of the confederats: fo that which turned the and drew them quite away, was an ouerweening no leffe unprofitable to the condition of their affaires, then contrary to the course of the time : they measuring rather their owne merits, and that which they endured for the king, then his nature, or his cultomes, promifed to themselues by the meane of his victory, not only the city of Py/a, but almost all the residue of Tuskane: In which perfwafion they were nourished by the opinion and words of Ieronimo Sauonarole, who in his fermons pronounced many felicities & augmentation of imperie appointed to that common weale after fo many trauels & afflictions, publishing in like stile most grieuous calamities & euils to happe to the court of Rome, and all the other Potentates of Italy: wherein albeit this fond Preacher was not without his aduerfaries fcorning at this particular doctrine, yet what for his own authoritie, & the fample inclinations of many, there was no litle faith given to his holy advertisements, no leffe by most part of the popular multitude, then by many of the principall citizens, wherof, some of innocent deuotion, some by ambition, and some for feare, reapposed such religion in his vaine forewarnings, that the whole effate of Florence caried fuch generall disposition to continue in the french amitie, that the confederats thought it not vnrcasonable to labor to reduce them by force, to that whereunto their wils were fo firange & contrary. They supposed the enterprise to inuade them could not containe many difficulties, for that they were hated of all their neighbours, & had no expectation or hope of fuccors from the french king, who abandoning the fafetic of his owne people in Naples, could not in any reason bethought carefull to minister to the wants of others. Besides, their great expenses for these three yeares, with so generall diminution of their reuenues, had fo drayned them, that it was not credible that they were able to fustaine long trauels: seeing withall they had for this yeare palt continually followed the warres against Pyfa, wherein the accidents have bene diverse and notable, more for the resolution of courage shewed in many valiant actes and factions of warre by either part, and by the desperate obstinacie wherewith such things were done, then for any huge proportion or greatnesse of armies, and much lesse for the qualitie of places for the which they fought, being but villages and boroughes not famous, and therefore of themselves of no great consequence : for (to vse more large discourse) a little after the citadell was given to the Py/ans, and afore the fuccors of Venice arrived there, the bands of Florence hauing taken the borough of Buty, & from thence encamped at Calcy, and before they tooke it, beginning (for their better furctie of victuals) to build a bastillion vpon the Mount of Dolorofa: the bands of footmen that were there for the gard of the place, were broken by their own negligence, by the enseignes of the Pylans: and a little after, as Francisco Secco was encamped with a great troupe of horsemen in the borough of Bury to see to the safe connoy of victuals to Hercules Bentinole, incamped with the footbands of the Florentines about the litle castle of the hill Verrucole: he was so charged at vnwares by the sootme that came out of Pyla, that by th'incoueniency of the place to apply the scruice of his horsemen, he lost a great part of the for which successes the affaires of Py/a feming to rile increasing in fortune, & that with hope of greater prosperity for that the succors of the Venetians began to arrive: Hercules Bentinole lodging in the borough of Bientina, hearing that John Paul Monfrin Captaine of the Venetians, was with the first part of their companies come to Ficopifan 2. miles fro Bientina, fayned to have feare, infomuch that prefently he raifed his

companies and went into the field, and immediatly affoone as the Venetian bandes were discouered, he effloones retyred into Bienina. But after he saw his enemie full of boldnesse and se curitie, he trayned him one day with great pollicie into an ambush, where he put him to the work, with the losse of the most part of his companies, giving him the chase even to the wals of Vicepilan. In which encounter the victorie was not in all points happie, for that Francisco Secco, come to the campe that morning to joyne with Hercules, in the retyre was flaine with a fhot of harquebuze: Afterthese followed the other bandes of the Venctions, amongest whom were eight hundreth stradiots led by Instruman Ottorofin: by whose comming the Pylans being now farte superior, Hercules Bentuole to whom the partes of the countrey were well knowne, neither willing to put himfelfe in daunger, not altogether disposed to abandon the field, encamped in a very firing place, betweene the borough of Pontadere, and the river of Ere: with the oportunitie of this place, he restrayned much the importunitie of the enemies, who in all that time tooke no other place or peece then the borough of Buty which yeelded to their difcression: And as they sent out their firadiots to make pillage of the countrey, there were three hundred of them running vp euen to Valdere, charged and broken by certaine bands which Hercules fent after them. The Florentmes were in the fame feafons vexed by the of Sienna, who by the occasion of the harmes they fuffered in the countrey of $\mathcal{P}_{Y/a}$, and at the incenting of the confederats, tent to incampe afore the bastillion of the bridge of Valiane, the Lord of Plombin & John Sauelle: but hearing that Rinuccio de Marciano arrived with fuccors, they retyred in great hast from before the bastillion, leaving behind them one part of their artillerie: by reason whereof the Florentines seeing themselues assured on that fide, caused Rinnecio to turne his force to the quarter of Pyla: In so much that their Arength being almost equall, the warre was now brought to the boroughs about the hils: But for that they were at the deuotion of the Pyfans, things fell out more to the difaduantage of the Floremines for that the Pylans entring by intelligece into the borough of Pont de lac, stripped a whole company of men at armes, and tooke prisoner Lodowike Marciuna, yet they abandoned forthwith the faid borough for feare of the Florentine bands which were not farre of. But the better to commaund and gouerne the hilles, which were of great importance to them, as well for the victuals brought from thence to Py/a, as for that they gave impediments to the Florentines in the traffike of the hauen of Lynornesthey fortified the most part of those boroughs, amongst the which Sorans was made noble by one accident by chance: for the campe of the Florent mes being marched thither with intention to take it the fame day, and for that cause, having spoyled all the passages of the timer of Cafeina, and put their men at armes in battell ypon the banke, to cut off the fuccors Peter Capponi, of the enemie: it hapned that Peter Capponi a chiefe commaunder amongst the Florentines, as he was about to plant the artilleries, was firiken in the head by a bullet out of the towne, whereof he dyed prefently: An end vnworthy of his vertue, aswell for the ignobilitie of the place, as for the litle importance of fuch an enterprife: By the chance of this accident, they rayfed the campe without attempting any furthey action: Befides, the Florentines euen in those times were compelled to fend bands of men into Luniquana to the fuccors of the castle of Ferroncole which the Marquis of Malespina heldbesteged, by the aide of the Genomages; from whence he easily gaue them the chase: So that the strength of the Pylans was mighty for certaine monethes, for that besides the townefmen and popular fouldiers leuied of the countrey became bodies warlike by long experience, the Venetians and Duke of Atvillan had there many bandes of horfemen & footmen, the Vemetian numbers being greatest: But for that afterwards the Dukes copanies began to diminish because they were not paied as appertained, the Venetians vsing that defect to their aduantage, sent thither a new supply of a 100. men at armes, and 6. gallies laden with prouision of victuals, wherin they spared no necessary expenses for the suertie of that citie, the same happing in good season The Pyfambe. to winne, and draw to them the affections of the Pyfams, who every day more and more estranged gin to difetum their mindes from the deuotion of the Duke of Alyllan, as neither contented with his nigardife in the expense and prouifion of things necessary, nor with his incertainties and variations, expressing rather a mind neuter, then affection refolute, for that fornetimes he would be forward in the fuecor of their affaires, and efifoories careleffe & cold, leaving all to adventure: in fo much as beginning almost to doubt of his will, they imposed upon him by imputation that lohn Bentiuole did his couetousnesse, or else, that the displeasures of the Florentines were acceptable to him, but not their whole ruine and oppression. By meane of which operations, he had laied of himselse (touching the flate of Py(a) foundations contrary to his chiefest ends and intentions, for the advancement whereof he onely induced the councell of the confederates to determine that Maximylian

Cafar should go to Pyla.

But now returning from whence we came: after it was resolved that Casar should march to Casar Pyla, he dispatched two Embassadors to Florence to aduertise them, that by reason of an enter- Embass prife which he intended with a mightie army against the Infidels, he judged it first an action chiefe to Flore and necessary to passe into Italy, the better to pacifie and assure the controversies there, for which cause he exhorted the Florentines that they would communicate together with the other consederates in the comon defence of Italy, or at least if they had an other inclination, that they would make manifest their will and intention: That for the same occasion, and for that it appertained to the authoritie imperial, he would know the controuerfies that were betweene them and the Psfans, requiring them, till he had taken knowledge of the reasons of both the one and other, that they would furcease the warre, which he affured would not be refused by the Pysans, to whom he had imparted the like fignifications: laftly, he gaue them great furertie with fweete and familiar words, that he would be ready to administer instice indifferently. To which message (receiving the offers of the Emperour with reuerence and recommendation, and expressing no lesse showes of fingular confidence in his iuffice and pietie) was answered by the Florentines, that they would give him particularly to vinderstand of their intention by special Embassadors to be addressed to his Maiestie with speede.

But in the meane while the Venetians, not to leave to Maxymylian or the Duke of Myllan, any meane to be Maisters ouer Pisa, fent thither with consent of the Pisans a new supply of a hundreth and fiftie men at armes, some stradiots, and a thousand sootmen under the leading of Anniball Bentinole, fignifying to the Duke that they had fent those succors thither, for that their common weale, which loued to chearifh free cities, was vniuerfally inclined to aide the Pifans to recouer their countrey, as indeed by the fuccour of those bandes, they went thorow with the recouerie of almost all the boroughes of the hils. In regard of which benefits, and for the franke readinesse of the Venetians to gratifie their demaunds which were in great number, somtimes wanting men, fometimes lacking money, and most commonly suffering necessities of victuals and munitions, the will of the Pisans was become so conformable to the desires of the Venetians, that all that office of deuotion & confidence which they were wont to owe to the Duke of Myllan, being now transported into them, they greatly defired that that Senat would continue their protectors, defenders, and patrons: And yet they folicited still the comming of Cafar, for hoping that what with the strength they had already within Pifa, and the bands which his Maiestie would lead with him, they should with more facilitie get Linorne. On the other side, the Florentines, who besides other encombrances, were at that time preffed with a great scarcitie of victuals, were occupied with no small feares, being left alone to resist the power of so many Princes: for that in Italy, there would not rife one in their aide & fauor, & from their Embassadors in France, they were certified by letters, that they could hope for no reskue in the king, to whom they had recommended their The Florentine dangers with many fittes & humilities, though not to have of him a full fuccour, yet to be releeved have small with some quantitie and proportion of money. But their petitions were in vaine, and all their recoursed by the quests embraced with the same coldnesse of care wherewith he comforted the perplexities of his french king. peculiar peoples in the kingdome of Naples. Peter de Medicis alone did not molest them, because it was an article in the councell of the confederates, not to vie in this action, either his name, or his fauor, knowing by experience, that the Florentines for that feare, did the more increase their vnity for the preservation of their libertie: and Lodowyke Sforce, under colour to be islous of their safetie, but more discontented with the greatnes of the Venetians, ceased not to apply all his discourse of wit and perswasion, to induce them to referre all things to the arbitration of Casar, wherein he alleaged many great and fenfible dangers, and infinuated with arguments & reasons, that this was the onely meane to drawe the Venetians from Pifa, and so consequently to accomplish their full reintegration: A thing verie necessary for the vniuerfall stabilitie of Italy, and no lesse (for that occasion) desired by the king of Spaine, and all the other confederats: But the Florentmes not suffering themselves to be carried with faire & deceitfull apparances, and much lesse amased with the

Cafar, neither to referre their rightes to his arbitrement, if first they were not restored to the pos-

selfion of Psfa, for that they were not affired either of his will or of his authoritie, being manifest that having not of himselfe any forces, or money, he proceeded as it best feemed to the Duke of Millan. Neither did they differne in the Venetians, any disposition or neede to leave Pila. Therfore they prepared with a franke and liberall resolution of courage, to fortific and refurnish Louisma as well as they could, and to draw all their Brength into the countrey of Pila: And yet, for that they would not appeare estrainged from the league, laboring withall to appeare Cafar, they fent Embassadors who found him at Genes, where he was then arrived: Their commission was (for answere of the things propounded by his Embassadors at Florence) to advertise him and per-Iwade him, that it was not necessary to proceede to any declaration, because, for the renerence they bare to his name he might promife to himselfe of the common weale of Florence, even as much as he would defire. And to befeech him to thinke, that for his mild holy resolution to reduce Italy to peace, there was nothing more convenient then immediatly to reftore Pi/a to the Florentines, for that it was the roote and river from whence forong all their deliberations fo difcontenting to his Maiestic and the confederates; and Pifa also being in that regard, the cause that made forme to aspire to the Empire of Italy, who to that endlaboured to keepe it in continual trauels of warre, by which words (notwithstanding it was not otherwayes expressed) was signified and ment the ambition of the Venetians: That also it was not agreeable to his inflice, that fuch as had bene dispoyled by force, should be constrayed contrarie to the disposition of the lawes imperiall, to referre their rights to compromise, if first they were not restored to their possessions. cluding that the common weale of Florence obteying this beginning of him, and by that meane, remaining no cause to defire any thing but peace with every one, they would make all fuch declarations as he should thinke convenient, and reapposing wholly in his justice, would with ready humilitie recommend vnto him the knowledge of their rights. ill Die

This answere satisfied not Casar, who defired about all things that they might enter into the league under faith and promife to be reflored to the possession of Psfa within a tearme connenient: notwithstanding after many discourses and debating of reasons, they could draw no other answere from him, then (vppon the platforme of Genes as he entred the sea) he told them they should understand further of his will by the Popes Legat which was at Genes, by whom, being fent backe againe to the Duke, who from Tortone (whither he had accompanied Cafar) was returned to Millan, they went into the fame cities where, as they were demaunding audience, they received Commissions from Florence, (alreadic ynderstanding the frute of their legation) commaunding them without feeking other answere, to return e home: So that being come to the houre appointed for their audience, they turned their demaund to have answere, into a fignification of their office, that returning to Florence, they were bold to lengthen their way, to come to do him reuerence afore they parted out of his countrey, as well appertained to the friendship which their common weale had mutually with him. The Duke thinking they would demaund aunswere according to their direction from the Legat, had affembled all the Embaffadors of the confederats, and the whole maieflie of his owne councell, to make show (according to his manner) of his eloquence, and his atte, and to take pleafure in the calamities of others: but being not a little confufed with the nature of their proposition altogether disappointing his exspectation and looking, he asked them fuddenly what answere they had of Colar: to which demaund they answered, that according to the lawes of their common weale, they might not communicate nor treat of their contmillion, with any other Prince, then with him to whom they were affigned Embaffadors: he replyed somewhat troubled: If we give you answere, for the which we know that Cofar hath referred you to vs, would you not heare it? It is not forbidden to heare (fay they) and much leffe can we let an other to speake: He answered, we are content to give you the answere, but that cannot well be done, if you pronounce not that which you have faid to him. The Embassadors effoones, answered, that besides they had no power for the selfe same reasons alleaged before, yet it would be superfluous, for that it was necessary that Calar had imparted their proposition with those to whom he had given the immediat charge to make the answere in his name. For these resolute dealings of the Embassadors, he could not neither in words, nor in gestures differable his indignation, and with moodes full of variation and discontentment he dismissed the Embassadors with all the residue

refidue which he had affembled; receiving in himselfe one part of the mockerie, which he ment to

. In the meane while, Cafar departed from the hauen of Genes with fixe gallies which the Venetrans had in the fea of Pifa, and with many other veffels of the Genomages very well furnished with -artiflerie, but not with fighting men, for that there was no other men of warre, then a thousand Immeekinghts: with whom he tayled to the hanen of Spetia, and from thence went by land to Pila: Cefaricome and there having joyned to his armie five hundreth horsenien, and a thousand other lanceknights to Pys. which had marched by land, he determined to incampe before Lyuorne, having for his backethe companies of the Duke of Asyllan, and one part of the Venetian bands: his intention was to charge inboth by fea and land, fending the other Venetian companies to Pont de fue, to the end the Florentine campe which was not frong, should not be able to moleft the Pilans, nor give fuccours to Livorne. But there was no enterprise which leffe aftonished the Florentines, then that of Lynorne, fufficiently furnished with men and artillerie, with daily exspectation of succours from Prouence: for that a litle before, to augment their forces with the reputation wherin were at that time in Itaby the armies of the french, they had with the confent of the french king, intertained to their pay, Monster a' Albrois one of his captaines with a hundreth launces, and a thousand footmen, as well Swizzers as Galcoins, which were to come by fea to Lyuorne vpon certaine ships, which by their directions were loden with graine, to relecue the generall want of victuals raigning in all the lands of their obedience. This deliberation, made with other thoughts, and for other ends, then for their defence against Cafar, albeit it was full of difficulties, for that both Monte d' Albigois with his copanie already conducted to the ships, refused to take the sea, only fixe hundreth sootemen being in barked: yet it found such plentifull fauours of fortune, that there could not be defired a prouition, neither more great nor more convenient: feeing that the fame day that a Commissioner of Py/a. (fent before by Cafar with a great strength of horsemen and sootmen to make bridges and plankes for the army which was to follow) arrived before Lynorne, the nauie of Prouence conteyning fine thips and certaine gallions, together with a great carracke of Normandie which the king appointed to revietuall Caietta, were discovered aboue Lyuorna with so favourable gales & rydes, that without any refiltance of the fleete of Cafar (for they were constrayined by the time to spred abroad aboue Melorie, a rocke very famous, for that in a fea battell made there in times past betweene the Genomayes and the Pylans, the Pylans were ouerthrowne) they entred the port withour other loffe, then of one gallion loden with corne, which was taken, as being strayed from the other nauie.

This fuctour gaue no leffe life and courage to those that were within Lynorne, then much affured the minds of the Florentines, who interpreted this fuddaine comming of the ships to a figne, that though earthly and worldly forces would faile them, yet God beholding their calamities, would not abandon them, according to the affurance which oftentimes Sanonarola had preached to the people, even when every one was most astonished. But not with standing these discouragements of victuals and fuccours, the King of R gmains ceased not to march with his campe to Ly- Casar marchworna, whither liauning fent by land five hundreth men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and ethto Lynorna. foure thousand footmen, he passed upon gallies euen to the mouth of the poole which is betwene Pyla and Lynorna: and having appointed the one part of the place to be inuaded by the Count Crietta whom the Duke of Myllan had fent with him, he presented himselfe afore the other: wherein albeit the first day he had no finall a do to fettle his campe there for the perillous impediments which the artilleries of Lyuorna gaue to him: yet after he had approched his armie before day on that fide to the fountaine, and having a chiefe defire to be first maister of the haven, he began to batter with the cannon, Magnane, which was well fortified by them within; who feeing the campe drawne on that fide, had on the other fide ruined Polazzotte and the tower flanding on that fide to the fea, as a thing not onely not gardable, but also convenient to make them loose the new tower. He caused at the same time to come neare the hauen, his armie by sea, to beat the parts on the fea fide: for the french ships, after they had landed their men, and vuladen one part of their corne as they were bound, returned into Provence, and the Normans let sayle to Caiette, notwithflanding many importunities and requests to have them tary, thinking to have made them to the service of this defence. The battery that thundred against Magnane, nourishing an intention to assault the towne afterwards by sea, profited very little: for that the defence was sufficient against all affaults, and had little regarde to the fury of the shot, the defendants also very often making fallies to entertaine skirmish with the encmie. But as the hopes of the Florentines began by the fauor of the winds, so it was a destinie that in the benefit of the windes should be wrought their whole perfection: for by a great storme rising vpon the sudden, the windes and all the ill disposed weathers agreeing, the nauie of Cefar was greatly crushed, and the great ship Grymawda Genoway which had caried his Maisties person, after she had long endured the conflict of the weather and waves, and wrought against the rage of the storme, she was drowned right against the newe tower of Lynorne with all the men and artillerie that the bare within board: the like hapned at the point towards S. lacques, to two gallies of the Venetians, and all the other vessels so dispersed and shaked by this calamitie, that they became unprofitable for the present enterprise, specially the defendants following the fauour of this accident, iffued out and recourred the gallion, which before hadfalne into the power of the enemies. The confideration of the losses and miseries hapned by this ship wracke, procured Cafar to returne to Psfa, where after many councels, every one distrusting the possibilitie of the enterprise of Lyuorne, it was agreed to leavy the campe from thence, and transferre the warre to an other part: And therefore Cafar went to Vicopifan, and caused to be built a bridge vpon Arne, betwene Cascine and Vice, and an other vpon Cilecchie: but whilest he occupied men with exfectation that he would passe ouer, he departed vppon the suddaine, and returned by land the right way to Myllan, having brought forth no other action in Tuskane, fauing that foure hundred of his horsemen fackt Bolgheri, a towne almost vnknown in the shores of Pyla: he excused his sudden departure vpon the difficulties that increased vpon him every day, as well for that they supplyed him not with money as often as he demaunded, as for that the Venetian Commissioners would not consent that the greatest part of their bandes should issue out of Py/a for the fuspition they had of him, besides that they had not fully satisfied him of their portion of the threescore thousand duckets, for which iniuries (extolling greatly the Duke of Myllan) he made many grieuous complaints against them: he passed by Paula, where was taken a newe councell: And albeit he had published that he would eftsoones returne into Almanie, yet he agreed to reappose in Italy all the winter with a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footemen, To that they would make pay to him for every moneth, of xxij. thousand florins of R hen: wherin whilest the action of this plot was solicited, with expectation of answere from Venice, he went from thence to Lomelline, at the time when there was looking to receiue him at Alyllan, being a thing fatall and ordained to him (as was well approued by the experiences following) not to enter into that citie: from Lomellina, with a mind chaunged, he turned his way to Cufagne fixe miles from Myllan, from whence contrary to all opinions, and vnweeting to the Duke and his Embaffadors which were there, he went to Coma: where vnderstanding as he sate at dinner, that the Popes Legat, to whom he had fent that he should not follow him, was arrived: he arose from the table, and embarked with so great hast, that there was scarce leasure to the Legat to deliuer to him a few words within the barke: to whom he answered in short, that he was constrayned to go into Almanie, but that he would returne with speed. And albeit, after he was brought by the lake of Coma to Vellasie, he was advertised that the Venetians would condiscend to all things that were agreed ypopn at Pania: yet he continued his voyage, and gaue them newe hopes to returne to Myllan: But a very few dayes after, according to the inconstancie and variation of his nature, he left one part of his horfemen and footbandes, and fayled directly into Almanie, having shewed (with a very litle honor to the name imperiall) his weaknesse in Italy, wherin long time hefore had not beene seene any Emperors armed. Lodowyke dispayring now by the going away of Cafar. (without new remedies for new accidents) to be able any more to draw Pyfa to himselfe, & much, leffe to keepe it out of the hands of the Venetians, withdrew from thence all his people, making it fome consolation to his displeasures, that the Venetians onely should remaine intangled with the warre against the Florentines: wherein also he nourished this perswasion, that the long trauels and perplexities of both the one and other part, might with time raife vp some occasions fauourable to his defires. By the departure of the bandes of Lodomyke, the Flerentines whose power was strongest in the countrey of Py/a, recouered againe all the boroughes about the hilles: by reason whereof the Venetians, constraying to leavy new provisions to hinder their further proceedings, adjoyned so many bandes more to the companies they entertayned alreadie within Psfa, that in all, their armie contained foure hundred men at armes, seuen hundred light horsemen, and more then

then two thousand footenen. In this meane while in the kingdome of Naples, there was almost an end put to all the refidue of the warre against the french: for that the towne of Tarente, presfed with famine, was rendred with her cattles to the Venetians, who had befreged it by sea, and rendred to Fewho, after they had kept it certaine dayes, growing into fulpition that they would appropriate it deryknew lang to themselues, rendred it at last to Federyke, by the the great instance of the Pope and the King of of Raples. Spaine: And as it was vinderstood at Caietta, that the great ship Norman, having fought aboue the port Hercules with certaine Genomay ships which she encountred, & fayling afterwards in her course, was our beaten with the rage of stormes, and drowned: So the french men that defended Catetta, whither the new king was eftsoones marched with his campe, albeit the brute went that there were victuals and municions enough to beare out the fiege certaine monethes : yet entring into the examples and actions of their king, in whom they judged would be as flowe disposition to minister to their succours, as he was earelesse of so great a part of his nobilitie, and to reskew fo many places holding for him: they accorded with Federyke, by the folicitation of Manfr d'Aubiany (who for forme difficulties happing in the affignement of the fortreffes in Calabrea, was not yet departed from Naples) to leave the towne and caffle, and returne by fea into France with safety and protection of their lives and goods. By reason of this agreement, the french king feeing himselfe deliuered of so many cares and thoughts to minister succors to the kingdom of Naples, and on the other fide, being indifferently grieued with the harmes & infamies of those warres, determined to let vpon Genes: wherein he hoped much in the faction of Baptistim Fre- The french gofa (aforetimes Duke of that citie) and in the traine and followers which the Cardinall of S. Pe-king determiter ad vinela had in the towne of Sauone, and in those rivers: he applyed also to the favor of his nethro fer you deuise, the occasion and content of the time, for that in those seasons John Lowys de fiesco, and G.nes. the familie of the Adornes, were in discord, and all the Genomayes generally ill contented with the Duke of Myllan, both for that in the sale of Pierra Sancta, he had preferred the Lucquers before them, and ailo, having promised to reduce it effloones to their hands, vsing in that action (the better to appeare the indignation conceived against him) the authoritie of the Venetians, he had nourished them many moneths with vaine hopes: But for feare of this determination of the king, Lodowyke (who for the occasion of Py'a was almost estranged from the I'enetians) was compelled to knit of new with them, and to fend to Genes the horsemen and footmen of the Almaines which Cefar had left in Italy, for whom (if this necessitie had not happened) there would have bene neither employment nor prouision made.

Whilest these things were thus in deuise and solicitation, the Pope (finding now a great oportunitie to occupy the estates of the Orsins, for that the principals of that family were restrayned in Naples) pronounced robels in the confiftory, I irginio and the refidue of that race, and confished their estates, for that contrary to his commaundement they hadtaken pay of the french. After which beginning he proceeded in further action to affayle their lands, having ordred that the Co- 1 4974 lonneys should do the like in all those places where they confyne with the Vrsins. This enterprise was much comforted by the Cardinall Askanus, no leffe for the auncient amitie he had with the Colonnoys, then for a fetled differtion and difagreement intertained of long against the Vrfins. The Duke of Myllan also gaue readily his consent, but it displeased not a little the Venerians, in whom were fecret defires to winne that familie, and draw them to their denotion: and yet not being able with any instifications to hinder the Pope from pursuing his rights, and withall holding it nothing profitable in that time to alienate him from them: they confented that the Duke of Vrbyn, Mercenary in common to the Pope and to them, should march to joyne with the bands of the Church, ouer whom was Captaine generall the Duke of Candra, and in the office of Legat, the The Duke of Cardinall La luna berne at Paura; a Cardinall wholly depending upon Askanus: to this army Candra genealfo, king Federyke of Naples fent Fabricius Colonne: This army now drawne into a campe, after rall of the ir had compelled many precess to be rendered, marched to incampe at Trinigman, which towne Popes aims. maintayning a valiant defence for certaine dayes, yeelded at last to discretion: But during the defence of that towne. Bartlemen d'Aluiano issuing out of Bracciane, put to flight within eight myles of Rome, foure hundreth horsemen that guided the artilleries to the campe Ecclesiasticke: And an other day running with the fame fortune even to the croffe of Montmarie, he lacked not much of taking the Cardinall of Valence, who comming out of Rome to the chase, found his best fasctic in the swiftnesse of his horse. After the rendring of Trungnan the campe drew to the lie where after they had battered one part of the rocke with the artillerie, they obtayned it by composition. At length all the warre was reduced to Braceiana, where the Vrsins had layed up all the hope of their defence: for that the place which had bene made strong before, was of new refortified with munitions and rampiers, and the fuburbes reenforced, having at the entry thereof erected a baltillion, and beltowed within it a fufficient strength of men under the government of Almano, whose youth gaue him a body disposed, and his wit no lesse quicke and resolute, then his diligence incredible, increased in him (with exercise in armes) those hopes and exspectations to the which in times fucceeding, his actions were nothing inferiour: The Pope ceased not to increase dayly his armie which he had of new refurnished with eight hundred launceknights of those that had bene employed in the warres of Naples. There were daily skyrmishes and tryall of armes on both partes, and that with great contention, the campe without planting their attillerie in many feuerall places, and they within, not forgetting to repaire and fortifie with prefent diligence and affurance: And yet within few dayes, the defendants were constrayned to abandon the suburbes, which being taken, the Ecclefiasticks gaue a furious assault to the towne, wherein albeit their fortune made them able to aduance their enfeignes you the walles, yet by the vertue of the defendants they were effoones forced to retyre, fuffering a great loffe, in which action was hurt Anthony Sauelle: The defendants expressed the like valour in an other assault, repulsing the enemie with a furie more resolute and a losse more generall, for that two hundred of them were eyther flaine or very fore wounded, wherein appeared with great merit the particular valour of Almano, to whom was justly given the principall glory of that defence: for that within, he was of a lively readinesse to all offices necessary, and without, with continuall eruptions and fallies, he kept the army of the enemie day and night in alarums. In this speciall action, he added much to his reputation, that by his disposing, certaine light horsemen issuing out of Ceruette (which the Vrsins held) should make incursions even to the campe, and he himselfe taking the occasion of this tumult, charged them out of the towne, and put to flight the footbands that garded the artilleries, of which, he carried into Braceiana certaine finall peeces: and albeit at length, rather ouerlayd with numbers, then ouercome in valour, he and his companies were ouerwearied with the continuall trauels and perplexities of that warre, having neither the day nor the night fauourable to their quietnesse: yet they beganne estloones to readdresse themselves with hope of succors, for that Charles Vrin, & Vitellozze, who was knit to the Vrins by a bond of the faction of Guelffes, and being now (passed into Italy vpon the vessels of Prouence) come to Lynorne, with money of the french king to recreet their bands difperfed in the kingdome of Naples: they prepared to fuccour them in so great a daunger: for which cause Charles went to Soriana, to reassemble the old fouldiers, friends and followers of the Vrfins: and Vitellozze in Citta de Castello made the like leauie of the fouldiers and footmen of the countrey, adioyning with great diligence his whole strength to Charles at Soriana, having in his regiment two hundred men at armes, and xviij.hundreth footmen of his owne, with proportion of great artillerie vp on wheeles after the manner of France. By reason whereof the Captaines ecclesiastick, foreseeing that if they marched forward, it could not but be daungerous to be inclosed in the middelt of a circle, betweene the new succours, and the old enemies within Bracciana; and withall, holding dishonorable to the renowme of merit and valour, to leaue them in pray all the countrey thereabouts, wherein he had fackt and made hauocke of diuerfe boroughes: they leanied their campe from before Bracciana, and retyring all their great artilleries within Anguillare, they marched directly to that quarter where the enemies were: and encountring them betweene Sociana and Bassan, they fought together with great furie for certaine houres: But in the end (the fuccesse of wars depending chiefly vpon the innocencie of the quarrell) albeit at the entry into the encounter, the ecclefiallicks tooke prifoner Franciot Vrfm, yet their whole campe was put to flight, with the loffe of their baggage and artilleries: They loft, what in the flaughter, and by taking prifoners, more then five hundred men, amongst which prisoners were the Duke of Vrbin, John Peter of Gonfague Count of Nugolare, with many other bodies of marke: the Duke of Candia, lightly hurt in the face, and with him the Popes Legat, and Fabrice Colome found fafetie by flying into R oncellon. About all the refidue, Vuellozze carried the honor and merit of this victorie, for that the bandes of footemen of Citta de Castello, who had bene afore trained and managed by him & his brethren, with the orders and disciplines of the french, were that day greatly ayded by his industry, and having armed them with

pykes longer by an arme length then those which were customably ysed, they had so much adnantage when they came to the shocke with the sootmen of the enemies, that wounding them with the oddes of length in their pykes, they put them eafily to the chase, so much the more to their greater honor, by how much in the contrary battell, there were eight hundred footemen of the Almaines, of which nation the infanterie of Italy, have had a continual feare ever fince the discending of king Charles. After this victorie, the victors beganne to runne without resistance ouer all the countrey on this fide Tyber; and afterward having passed part of their companies ouer the river beneath the hill Rotonde, they still inuaded those wayes where they supposed was any retrait for the enemie. In regard of which daungers, the Pope applying his wits to the necesfities of his affaires, fludying to make a new leavie of men of warre, called to his fuccours from the kingdome of Naples, Consaluo, and Prosper Colonne: And yet not many dayes after, what by the diligence of the Embassadors of Venice, to do pleasure to the Vrsins, & the solicitation of the long of Spaine, fearing least these beginnings would draw some ill consequence or innouation to the league, a peace was made, with a most readie inclination aswell of the Pope, who naturalby hated expences, as of the Vrsins, who being no lesse poore in money, then naked instriends, capitulations knew that their necessitie in the end would compell them to yeeld to the power of the Pope: The betweene the articles of the Pope were thefe; That it should be suffered to the Vrfins to continue in the pay of Pope and the the french till the end of the time for the which they were hyred by the king, with expresse men- Vrim. tion that they should not be bound to take armes against the Church: That all the places which they had loft in this warre should be restored, paying to the Pope fiftie thousand duckats, of the which thirtie thousand to be paid assoone as John Lordan and Paule Vrsin should be set at liberty, (for Virginio not many dayes before died within the calle of the egge, either of an ague, which was naturall, or by poylon which was violent, & therefore much suspected) and the other twenty thousand duckats within eight monethes: for assurance of which payment, Anguillare and Cernerre should be committed of trust into the keeping of the Cardinals Askanius and S. Senerin: That all the prisoners taken in the iorney at Soriana, should be redelivered, except the Duke of Trbin, for whole libertie, albeit the Embassadors of the confederats made great travell, yet the Pope-would folicite nothing: for that he knew the Vrsins had no meane to raise the money they were to pay to him but by the ransome of the Duke, for whom a litle after, was agreement made for xl. thousand duckats, but with this adiection, that he should not be deliuered afore Paul Vitelli (who remained pritoner to the Marquis of Mantua at the rendring of Atella) had obtayined his libertie without paying any tanfonie.

The Pope having thus to his litle honor dispatched his hands of the warre against the Vrsins, made diffribution of money to the companies which Confaluo brought with him, who mioyning. to him his owne bandes, he fent to take Oftra as yet holden in the name of the Cardinall of S. P. ad vinela: wherein his fuccesse communicating with his common fortune, was no lesse easie then speedy, for that assoone as he had braked his artilleries, the castle keeper rendred all to discression: After which victorie, Confaluo made his entry into Rome almost in manner triumphant, with a confalus enhundreth men at armes, two hundtethlighthorsemen, and fifteene hundred sootmen, all souldiers treth Rome, of the Spanish, leading before him as prisoner the castle keeper, whom a little after he set at libertie. There came to meete him many Prelats of the Popes houthold, with Cardinals, followed with much people, and almost all the Court running with great desire to see a Captaine whose name bare to great fame and merit in Italy: By those Prelats he was led to the presence of the Pope sitting in the confistorie, who receiving him with great honor, gaue him in testimonie of his valour, the role which Popes are wont to bellow energy yeare. After this, Consaluo returned to rejoyne eftsoones with king Federyke, who had inuaded the estate of the Prefect of Rome, and resumed all those places, which taken from the Marquis of Piscaire in the conquest of the kingdome, were bestowed upon him by the french king. And having taken Sore and Arci (but not the cassles) he lay incamped before the rocke Guillaume, for that he had had by accord the estate of the Count

a'Olymer, before he fold his Duchy of Sora to the Prefect of Rome.

But as there is no earthly bliffe so perfect, which hath not his aley with some bitternesse or bale, nor no prosperitie so well assured, which draweth not with it his proper aduersitie: So notwithflanding these selicities heaped upon Federike, yet he was not without his perplexities, not only by his friends, feeing Confaluo kept one part of Calabria in the name of the king of Spaine, but also of his enemies reconciled: for that the Prince of Bisignian, being one euening fore hurt by a certaine Greeke, as he went out of the new castle of Naples, the Prince of Salerne was in such feare that the blow was given by the kings commandement in reuenge of the offences passed, that immediatly (not distenbling the cause of his suspition) he went from Naples to Salerna. And albeit the king sent to vsea this will, the Greeke deteyned in prison, to institute (as the truth was) that he had given the blow for an injurie to him done by the Prince of Bisignian in the honor and person of his wise: yet (in auncient and great grudges it is hard to establish a faithfull reconciliation, for that it hath his proper impediments either by suspition, or desire of reuenge) the Prince of Salerne could never after dispose himselse trust him: which ical ousie, giving yet some hope to the french (keeping still the Mone S. Ange, and other strong places) of some new innovation or insurrection in the kingdome of Naples, procured them with more constance to stand to their desentes.

The french prepare new enterprises against Italy.

In these seasons, were tokens and demonstrations of farre greater daungers in Lombardie, by the emotions of the french, affured for the present by the threatnings of the Spanish: for that pasfing betweene them, rather light incursions and apparances of warte, then any thing of notable action, fauing that the french burned the towne of Sauffes: they had begun a parley of accord, and for the more easie negotiation of it, had made a surceasing of armes for two moneths: By meane whereof the french king, having a more facilitie to harken after the affaires of Genes and Sauona, dispatched to Ast an armie of a thousand launces, three thousand Smyzzers, and a like number of Gascoyns, aduertising Trinulso his Lieutenant in Italy, to apply aydes to Baptistin and the Cardinall of S. P. ad vincla: his intention was to fend after, the Duke of Orleans with a flrong armie, to execute in his proper name the enterprise of the Duchie of Ayllan. And to make more easie the action of Genes, he sent Octaman Fregose to require the Florentines to inuade at the fame time Lunigiana and the river of the East, ordering also that the southerne rivers should be troubled by Paule Baptista Fregose with scuen gallies. This enterprise was begun with such astonishment to the Duke of Atylian, not prepared sufficiently of himselfe, and lesse suretie of the aydes promifed by the Venetians: that if it had proceeded with the fame directions and counfels, it could not but have brought forth some effect of importance, and more easily in the Duchy of Myllan, then in Genes: for at Genes Iohn Lowys de fiefque, and the Adornes, who were entred into reconcilement by the meane of Lodomyke, had leavied many bandes of footmen, and rigged at the charges of the Venetians and Lodowyke an armie at fea, to the which were joyned fixe gallies fent by Federyke: But the Pope intertayning the name of a confederate, more in counfels and demonstrations, then in workes and meanings, would not in those daungers contribute to any expenfes, neither by fea nor land. The proceedings of this expedition were that Baptifin, and with him Triunice, marched to Nony, of which towne Baptistin had bene despoiled afore by the Duke of Myllan, but not of the castle, which he had alwayes kept, and held yet. But by reason of their comming in fuch strong order, the Count Casazze, which was there in garrison with threescore men at armes, two hundreth light horsemen, and fine hundred footmen, distrusting much to be able to defend it, retyred to Sarauall. The conquest of this towne augmented greatly the reputation of the banished: for besides that, the towne is capable of many people, it stops the passage from Myllanto Genes, and by reason of the oportunitie and seate of the place, it is very connenient to endomage the country affilling. After this, Baptistin made himselfe Lord of certaine other peeces neere to Nony, and at the same time the Cardinall with two hundred launces, and three thousand footmen, having taken Ventimille, coasted over to Sauona, where finding no insurrection by the inhabitants, and having espiall that Iohn Adorne approched with a strong band of footmen, he retyred to Altare, a place of the Marquis of Montferat distant eight miles from Sauone: But Trivalce in the beginning, did an action of greater importance, for that having a defire to giue occasion to kindle the warre in the Duchie of Myllan, notwithstanding the kings commission on was to execute first the affaires of Genos and Sanone, he tooke Bosco a borough of great importance in the countrey of Alexandria: wherein this was his pretext and couler, that for the furetie of the bandes which were gone to the East rivers, it was necessary to take from those of the Duke, the meane to go into Alexandria vpon the lands of the Genowayes. But tempring his defire, with regard to the kings commaundement, which he thought not reasonable to impugne manifestly, he forbateto passe further, loosing a most faire occasion, for that all the countrey there about drew into great sturre and tumult for the taking of that place, some for feare, as the multitude populars fome for defite of innovation, which commonly is familiar with the condition of wits least moderate: And of that fide, there was no greater strength for the Duke, then fine hundred men at armes, & fix thousand footmen: befides, Galeas de Saint Seuerin, who being within Alexandria, began to diffruff his defence without greater forces: and Lodowyke himfelfe, being vexed yet but with apparances and threatnings, shewing himselfe no more timorous in this aductitie, then by the propertie of his nature he expressed in all other accidents, solicited the Duke of Ferrara to worke some accord betweene the french king and him. But the soiourning of Trynulce betweene Bosco & Nony, gave sufficient time to Lodowyke to surnish himselfe, and good respit to the Venetians (who feeming most readie & prepared for his defence, had fent afore to Genes fifteene hundred footmen) to fend into Alexandria, bands of men at armes & light horsemen: yea the Venstuns appointed the Count Petillane general of their regiments, (for that the Marquis of Mantua was withdrawne from their pay) to march with the most part of their companies to the succors of that state. Thus things begun with so great hope, now growing cold, Baptist in having nothing profited at Genes (for the citie was quiet for the prouisions that were made) returned to ioyne with Tryundee, publishing that his exployes brought forth no successe of service, for that the river of the leuant was not affayled by the Florentmes, who judged it not a councell wife to enterinto warre, if first the things of France appeared not more prosperous and more puissant. In like fort came and joyned with Tryunlee, the Cardinall ad vinela, by whom was done no other execution, then that he had taken certaine places of the Marquis of Finale, for that he declared himselfe for the defence of Sauone. The french armie drawne now all into one strength, made certaine offers. to Cultellat, a place neare to Bosco which had bene afore time fortified by the Captaines of the Duke. But the army of the confederats which reassembled in Alexandria, increasing daily in qualitie of fouldiers & quantitie of prouisions: and of the contrary, both money and victuals beginning to faile amongst the french, & their Captaines not a litle impatient to obey Tryuntee, it was necessary for him to leave Nony and Bosco to garrison, and retyre neare the towne of Ast.

It was believed that the distribution of the bands into severall places, brought great harme to the enterprise, as often times hapneth in the like examples: and that if they all joyned into one strength, had bene at the beginning addressed to Genes, the expedition perhaps had drawne some better successe: seeing that besides the inclination of factions, and indignation conceived for Pietra santa, one part of the horsemen and sootmen of the Almaines, which the Duke sent thither, revolted from the service, and returned upon the sudden into their countrey, it might be also, that euen those who the yeare before had hindered the kings descending into Italy, and the succors of the kingdome of Naples, applying now the fame meanes, did give impediments to the preferr enterprise by the difficultie of prouisions. This likelihood of truth was justified with a brute that ranne, that the Duke of Millan (to the oppression of his subjects) unade great presents to the Duke of Burbon, and others that had grace and fauour with the king; in which infamy the Cardinall of S. Malls had not the least interest. But what societ was in it, it is most certaine that the Duke of Orleans appointed to passe to sisk, and called upon by the vehement solicitation of the king, made all his preparations necessary for the expedition. But he lingred, either for that he distrusted the continuation of the prouifions, or, (as some interpret) he had no forwardnesse to depart out of France, the king being continually ill disposed of his health, and (in case of sterrilitie) the succession of the crowne appertayning to him.

But the king reaping no frute of his hope for the mutation of Genes & Sauona, continued with more diligence his practifes begun with the King and Queene of Spaine, which hitherto had bene lingered for this only difficultie, that the french king defiring that he might be in libertie to profecute his enterprifes on this fide the Mountes, would not that in the truce then in negociation, thould be comprehended the things of Italy. And the kings of Spaine, shewing that they made no difficultie to confent to his will for other respect then in regard of their honor, solicited much that the Italian actions might be comprehended, alleaging that the common intention of them both being to make a truce, to the end a peace might more easily succeede, they might afterwardes with greater libertie of honor and honestie, depart from the confederation which they had with the Italians. In so much that after many meetings & discourses of the Embassadors of both sides, (the Spanish subtilities in th'end carying it) they made a truce for the this subject to the endance.

and also for such as either of them should name: which truce beginning betweene them the fife day of march, (but betweene fuch as should be nominated, fifty dayes after) should last vntill the end of the next October. Euery one of the named those estates & Potentates of Italy which were their confederates and adherents, but the kings of Spaine named moreover king Federyke & the Prians. After this they agreed to fend me to Montpellier to follicite a peace, where were to affernble the Embassadors of the confederats. In this practise the kings of Spaine gaue hope to vnite thefelues with the french king against the Italians under a certaine occasion instifiable, & from that time, they commoned of factions & meanes to deuide the kingdome of Naples. The truce, albeit it was made without the participation of the confederates of Italy, yet it was agreeable to them all, but specially acceptable to the Duke of Millan, to whom nothing was more welcome them the meane to make cease the warre in his quarter. But the power remayning free to offend one an other in Italy, untill the xxv. of Aprill, Tryuulce, Baptistin, and Serenon taking the aduantage of that article, returned with five thousand men to the river of the South, where they assaulted the towne of Allenge, which albeit they had almost caried at the first assault, yet they suffered repulse by a very small strength of the enemy, for that their entry was in disorder. Afterwards they fell vpon the Marquildome of Finale, to giue occasion to the Italian army to make to their fuccors, hoping by that meanes to draw them to battell: which not fucceeding according to their expectation, they did no further action of importance, the discord of the Captaines continuing in increafing, and their payments fayling daily more and more by teafon of the truce. In which times, the confederats had recourred all their places lost before (except Nony) which also they obteined at last by composition, notwithstanding the Count Caiazze which had befieged it, had benerepulsed. There remained in the power of the french no other thing of the places conquered, then certaine little townes in the Marquildome of Finale: during all which emotions and ftirres, the Duke of Sanoy, who had bene folicited on all parts with no small promises, and the Marquis of Montferat (whose gouernment had bene confirmed by the king of Romaines to Constantine of Mocedonia) stood newters, declaring neither for the king nor for the confederats.

In this yeare was nothing done of importance betweene the Florentines and the Pifans, notwithstanding the warre continued without intermission: saving that the Pisans led, under the derection of John Paul Alantfron foure hundred light horsemen, and fifteene hundred tootmen, to recouer their bastillion ypon the bridge of the poole, which they lost when the Emperor went to Lyuorne. The Count Rsunce having espiall of this enterprise, put himselfe vpon the way of Lymorne, to reskew the bastillion with a good troup of horsemen: the Pisans not looking to be classgod but by the way of Pontadere, were let vpon as they began to assault the bastillion, & being eafily put to the chase, many of them were made prisoners. But at last, armes and actions of warre ceased also between them, by reason of the truce, not withstanding it was with an ill will accepted of the Florentines, who judged it very inexpedient for their affaires to give leafure to the Pifans to take breath, feeing withall, that not withflanding the truce, necessitie compelled them to continue the same expenses, both for doubt of Peter de medicis, alwaies conspiring against them, and for feare of the Venetian bands within Ps/a, aspiring to the soueraigne imperie of the whole.

The Duke of Millan prathe Venetians conching Pifa.

Thus armes being laide afide on all parts, or at least at point to cease from all action, the Duke of Millan, albeit in his latest dangers, he had expressed with what great contentment he embraced Elifeth against the Senate of Venice, for the ready and full succoss he had received from them: no lesse exalting with publike and heroicall words the vertue & power of the Venetians, then greatly commending the prouidence of John Galeas first Duke of Millan, for that he had committed to the faith of the fame Senate the execution of his Testament: yet having no patience to endure that the pray of Pifa, followed by him with fo many paines and practifes, should be transferred to them, as was likely in manifest apparance of reason, And therefore assaying to obtaine with industry & councell, that which he could not win with armes & force: he so wrought, that the Pope, and the Spanish Embassadors (to both which such a greatnesse of the Venetians was displeasing) should set downe, that to leaue to the french no foundation in Italy, as also to reduce all into one concord, it were necessary to induce the Florentines to enter into the comon league, causing Pifa to be restored to them, seeing otherwayes they could not be brought to it: for that so long as they were separated from the refidue, they would not cease to stirre vp the french king to discend into Italy, to whom in fuch an action, they might (having their scituation in the middest of Italy) with their money, and with their forces, do things of great importance. But this prouision was impugned by the Embassadour of Venice, as very prejudicial to their common safetie, alleaging withall the inclination of the Florentines to be such to the french king, that not with this benefit, it was not reafonable to trust them, if they deliucted not fufficient securitie to observe the things they should promise: and that in a matter of so great estate, there was no other surctie, then to put Lyuorne into the hands of the confederats. This was very artificially alleaged by him, to the end to have alwaies a greater meane to gaine fay the proposition, knowing well they would neuer consent to commit to deputation a place of fuch respect for their estate: wherein, the matter drawing afterwards fuch fuccesse as he looked for, he fall opposed against it with such vehemencie, that the Pope and the Duke of Millans Embaffador, not daring to object against himforfeare to estrange the Venetsans from their friendship, the deuise rested there. And there began betweene the Pope and the Venetians a new plot, to turne away with violence the Florentines from the amitie of the french: (the ill conditions of that citie giuing courage to whom so cuer would offend it.)

For from the beginning that the authoritie popular was founded, there was not introduced those temperatures, which assuring the libertic with due & : casenable meanes, might have bene the let, that the common weale should not have bene disordered by the ignorance and licence of Disorders in the multitude. In fo much that the Citizens of greatest qualitie and condition, being leste effect plorence for med then feemed connenient, and on the other fide, their ambition being suspected to the people, the generaand many oftentimes intruding into deliberations waighty who were but little capable, and the fo- ment. ueraigne Magistrate to whom was referred the summe of the most waightie assaires, being changed from two moneths to two moneths, the common weale was gouerned with a great confunon: To this was added the great authoritie of Sanonarole, whose auditories were almost entred into fecret intelligence. And albeit there were amongst them many honorable Citizens, & they furpassing in number such as were of the opinion contrary, yet it seemed Magistracies and publike honors were distributed rather to those that followed him, then to others of better merit: and therefore the citie being manifestly deuided, in th'assemblies & councels publike, one saction charged another, no man making confcience (which hapneth in Pates falne into divition) to hinder the benefit publike, to imbase the reputation of his aduersaries. These disorders were so much the more daungerous, by how much, for the long trauels & great expenses suffered by the faid citie, there was that yeare a generall dearth and want of victuals of all natures; by reason whereof it might be prefumed that the people vexed with hunger, would be defitous of new things.

This ill disposition of the civill affaires of Florence, gave hope to Peter de Medicis, (who besides P. de Medicis those occasions was pushed on by certaine particular Citizens) to be able with ease to be Maister determinesh of his long and inft defire; and therefore applying industry and diligence to the oportunity of the once against time, he communicated his intention with the Cardinall Saint Severn his auncient friend, and with 10 returne 12 Alsuano in whom he much reapposed for the merits of his valour and long familiarity. And herein Florence. being also secretly incouraged by the Venetians, to whom it seemed that by the trauels of the Florentines, the affaires of Pt/a would be affured: he determined to furprife the towne of Florence, the rather being aduertifed that they had created their supreme Magistrate (which they call Gonfalomere of iustice) Bernardin de Nero, a man of auncient grauitie and authoritie, and had bene of a continued friendship with his father and him: having in the fame election joyned to him in affiliance of that Magistracie certaine others, in whom (for auncient merit and benefits) he suppoled was no small inclination to his greatnesse. The Pope sauored this plot with his full liking & confent, defiting to decide the Florentines from the french king with iniuries, feeing he could not separate them with benefits. Neither was the Duke of Millan against it, to whom it seemed that albeit he could not make a foundation or intelligence stable with that citie, because of the disorders of the present governmet: yet, on th'otherfide, he tooke no delight in the returne of Peter, aswell for the wrongs he had done him, as for doubt leaft he should depend too much of the authority of the Venetians. But affoone as Peter had leavied, what by his own meanes, & with the aide of his friends & fauorers, as much treasure as he could possible, having received (as was beleeved) fome final quantity in prest of the Venetians, he went to Sienna, & after him Aluiano with the horfmen & footmen, natching alwaies by night, & by wayes particular, to the end his coming might P. de Medico be concealed from the Florentines. At Stenna, by the fauour of John Laeques, and Pandolphe Pe- addeby them trucci principals in that gouernmet, & affured friends to his house, he was secretly refurnished with of Sienna, on the way to Florence, hoping that ariuing there by the breake of the day, and at vinwares, he fhould find his entry eafie, either for the generall diforder or speciall tumult, which he exspected would rife in his fauour: a plot which happily had drawne fome good iffue for him, if fortune had not supplyed the negligence of his aduersaries: for, as in the beginning of the night, he was lodged in the tabernacles (certaine small houses upon the high way) with intention to march the residue of the night, so he was so hindred by wonderfull raynes & stormes continuing long, that he could not present himselfe before Florence, till long space after the sunne rising: a chaunce which gaue leafure to fuch as made profession to be his particular enemies (for the communaltie & all the rest of the Citizens stirred not, exspecting quietly what would be the iffue of things) to take armses with their friends and followers, and to prouide that the citizens suspected should be called and restrayned in the publike pallace by the Magistrates, And lastly to make themselves strong at the gate which leades to Siema, was at their request P. sul Vitelli, ariting there the night before, in his returne from Mantua: In so much as no commotion appearing in the citic, and Peter not strong enough to force the gate (which he had approched within a bow shoot:) and after he had remayned there foure houres, fearing with his danger the fuddaine comming of their men at armes, whom he thought (and his conceit was true) the Florentins had fent for from the service of Pyla: he returned to Stenna where Alusano parting from him. & let into Tody by the Guelffer, he facked almost all the houses of the Gebeirns, and put to the slaughter 53. of the principall bodies of that faction. According to which example, Anthonie Sauelle entred into Terny, & Gattefquies, by the fauor of the Colomoys, and let into Viterby, did the like executions against the Guelffes in both the one & th'other place, and all the peeces thereabouts: without that the Pope prouided for so great diforders in the state ecclefiasticke, because he abhorred all exspenses in like cases, and bearing by the propertie of his nature, no copassion to the calamities of others, he was nothing troubled with those things that offended his honor, so that his profits or pleasures were nothing hindered: yet he could not avoide the fecret inflice of God, expressed in domesticall miseries, troubling his house with examples tragicall, and a whoredome and crueltic horrible aboue all the barbarous regions: for where he had determined from the beginning of his electio pontificall, to appropriate all temporall greatnesse to the Duke of Candia his eldest sonne, the Cardinall of Valence (who altogether estranged from priesthood, aspired to the exercise of armes) having no patience to suffer that The Cardinall place to be viurped by his brother, and enuying withall that he had better part then he in the loue of Valence kil- of Madonne Lucrecia their comon fifter: inflamed with luft, and with ambition (mightie ministers leth bis brother to all mischieses) caused him to be killed one night as he rode alone in the streetes of Rome, calling his bodie fectetly in the river of Tyber. The brute was (if fuch an enormitic be worthy to be belected) that in the lone of Mad. Lucrecia were concurrant, not only the two brethren, but also the father, who when he was chosen Pope, taking her from her husband being inferiour to her degree, he maried her to Iohn Sforce, Lord of Pefere: and afterwards, not able to fuffer her husband to be his corriuall, he made dissolution of the mariage alreadic cosummated, having made proofe, before Iudges & delegats of his owne creation, by witnesses subborned, & afterwards confirmed by apostolical sentence, that her husband was imperfect in the operation of nature, and vuable to cohabitation. The death of the Duke of Candia, afflicted not a litle the Pope burning aboue all other Popes in a velicmet loue to his children. And as it is the greatest tryall of wisedome & courage of men, to be teperatin mortall chances: fo, fuch as are not accustomed to adversities, have least rule ouer their passions, & they that neuer felt but prosperitie, can litle judge of the worthines of pati> ence. This Pope was so vnacquainted with the accidets of fortune, & much lesse enured with earthly losses & prinations, that from his infancy to that age all things had happily succeeded to him: the fame making this affliction fo grieuous and intollerable to him, that in the confiftorie, after he had with a great compassion of mind, and publike teares, grieuously bewayled his miserie, accusing many of his proper actions, and maner of liuing which he had vied till that day: he affured with wordes full of efficacie, that hereafter he would gouerne his life with other thoughts, and with a forme of living more moderate and ruled: and for a beginning he affigned prefently certaine of the number of Cardinals, to joyne with him in the reformation of manners and orders of the Court: wherein after he had employed certaine dayes, at what time beganne to be manifest the author of the death of his fonne, (for the which at the first, he had the Cardinall Askaniu and the Vrsins in strong suspition) he left there his former holy intention, his teares, and all his complaints, and returned more diforderly their cuer, to those thoughts and operations, wherein he had confumed his age till that day.

There hapned in those seasons new tranels within Florence, by reason of the enterprise of Peter The sallians de medicis: for the intelligence and faction which he had with certaine particulars in the citie, was intelligence disclessed: by reason whereof many noble Citizens were imprisoned, and some fled. And after the which Peter Magithrates had vsed meanes indiciall to verifie the order of the conspiracie, not only many were de medica bad condemned to death which had solicited him to come and given him reliefe of money: but also inflorence to Bernardine de Nero, to whom was imputed no other thing, then that knowing the practise, he had not reuealed it, which fault (of it felfe punishable by the head by the statutes of the Florenines, and by the interpretation which most part of lawyers give to the comon lawes) was found so much the more haynous in him, by how much he was chiefe Magistrate when Peter came to Florence, as if he had bene more greatly bound to do the office rather of a person publike, then private: but the parents and kindred appealing from the fentence, to the great councell of the people, & that by vertue of a law made when the popular government was established, those that had bene authors of the condemnation, fearing least the compassion of the age, of the nobility, & of the multitude of parents, would moderate in the minds of the people, the straitnesse of the judgement, wrought so much that they obtained, that to the lesser number of the Citizens, should be referred the refolution, whether the appeale should be suffered to be prosecuted or restrained: wherin, being more flrong the authoritie and number of them which held it a thing dangerous, and no leffe drawing to fedicion, feeing that the lawes themselues suffered, that to avoide tumults, the statutes in like cases might be dispensed withall: some of those that held the chiese offices, were with great importunities, and almost by force, and with threatnings, constrayned to consent, that not withflanding the appeale interposed, execution was done the same night. To which extreame inflice, appeared more affectioned then the others, the followers of Sauonarole, not without his proper infamy, forbearing to diffwade (euen his auditors) the violation of a law published a few yeres before by himselfe, as a statute convenient and necessary for the preservation of the common libertie.

In this yeare, Federske king of Naples, having obteined of the Pope the investiture of the king-The To'e indom, & making his coronation perfect with all folemnities, recoursed by accord, Mont Saint An- well-all Fedege, which had ben valiantly defended by Dom Iulian de Lorraine, whom the french king left there: rike in the he reconquered also Civita, with other peeces holden by Charles de Sanguyn. And assoone as the kinsdome of truce was ended, he chased out of the realme the Prefect of Rome, converting his forces to execute Naples. the like action upon the Prince of Salerne, who being at last befreged, in the rocke of Diana, and abandoned of all fuccors, had permiffion to go his way in fafetie with his goods, leaving that part of his efface which he had not yet loft, in the hands of the Prince of Bifignian, with condition to passe it over to Federske, assoone as he vnderstood that he was conducted in safetie to Singale.

About the end of this yeare (the diet which had bene transferred fro Montpellier to Nurbenne, New practifes being afore interrupted by the immoderat demands of the king and Queene of Spaine) the french betweene the king and the faid king of Spaine, returned effloones to new practifes, wherin were found the fame kings of Frame difficulties that before: for that as the french king had determined not to confent to any accord and Spane. wherein Italy should be comprehended: so it was against the pollicie of the Spaniard to leave him a libertic free, & a way open to subdue the jurisdiction of it. And yet it was farre from the defires of the Spanish to intertaine wars with him on the other fide the Mounts, because it was a warre full of troubles & expenses, and no hope of honor or profit. At last the truce was concluded betweene them, to indure (without limitation) till it were reuoked and two monethes after. There was no Potentate of Italy comprehended in it, to whom the king of Spaine gaue fignification of the truce and the articles and capitulations of the fame, alleaging that in him was no leffe power to resolute the contract without the knowledge of the other consederats, then the Duke of Aulian made it lawfull (without their confent or prinitie) to conclude the peace of Verceill. And abeit (according to the forme and couenants of the league) he had begun the warre in France, and continued it many moneths, without receiuing one portion of the money promised by the confederats. wherein he had just occasion not to make care of them that had consented to his disappointing: yet he had by many meanes and times aduertifed them, that if they would make payment of the hundreth and fiftie thousand duckats, which they ought to him for the expenses of the warre he had inade, he was contented to accept that payment, in reckoning of all other actions and enterprifes hereafter (having determined to enter France with a strong armie:) whereunto as the confederats would shew no will or inclination, and much lesse keepe faith, or be carefull ouer the common safetie: So he in that regard, and seeing withall that the league made for the libertie of Italy, was turned into an viurpation and oppression of the regions of the same, for that the Venetions not contented with formany ports falne to their share in the kingdome of Naples, had made themselues Lords ouer Pysa without any right, be could not but hold it indifferent, reasonable, and iuft, feeing by others, the affaires common were difordered, to prouide for his owne particular With a truce, bearing notwithstanding such a forme and manner, that it may rather be called an admonition, then a will to separate fró the league: for that it was alwaies in his power to dissolue or reuoke it, which he would do, when he should discerne an other intention, with other prouifrons, in the Potentates of Italy, for the stay of the common benefite. About this time dyed Iohn Prince of Spaine, onely fonne to the King and Queene, to whom the accident brought no small forowes and heavineffe, for that, befides disappointing of the succession, his death gave no litle impediments to the fweet delights and pleasures which they reckoned to reape in their new tranquillitie and reft.

Philip Duke of Sanoy dyeth.

To this was also loyned the death of Philip Duke of Sanoy, leaving for a posteritie, one some of litle age, and therefore of no judgement touching his exspectation or towardnesse. This late Duke, after he had wavered long time in fufpence and newtralitie, beholding all their actions without motion or inclination particular, feemed at last to fauour the faction of the confederats, who had promifed to pay him energy yeare, twentie thousand duckats: and yet energy one of them had fo great doubt of his faith, that they could affure nothing of his promifes and truth, if the french king should descend to make any strong enterprise.

The castle of Millan.

With this yeare, ended the two yeares touching the deputation of the callle of Genes, which Genes rendred the Duke of Ferrara (receiving it in trult) did eftfoones render to Lodowyke his sonne in law: he so the Duke of first demaunded of the french king, that according to the capitulations of Verceill, he would fee him fatisfied of the halfe of the expences employed in the gard and keeping of it, whereof the king conferted to make payment, to that the Duke would put into his hands the caftle, as he faid he was bound for the inobservation of the Duke of Millan. To this the Duke of Ferrara answered, that that was not verified, and that to put the Duke of Myllan in contumacic, it were neceffarie to haue interpellation: the king offered to commit the money into a third mans hand, to the end that afore payment were made, there might be construction in justice, reason, and law, whether he ought not to render to him the castle. But the instance made to the contrary by the Veneteans and his sonne in law, caried farre more force in the fancic of the Duke of Ferrara: wherein he was not onely moued by the prayers and folicitations of Lodowyke, who not many dayes before, had indued the Cardinall Hippolite his fonne, with the archbishoprike of Myllan: but also he had regard to the daungers that threatned him, if he should prouoke the malice of so mightie ennemies, specially at a time wherein was continuall diminucion of the hope that the french men would discend: So that, applying his actions to the inclination of the time, he first called home from the Court of France, his sonne Ferrand, and then surrendred the castle to Lodowyke, who fatisfied all charges for keeping it, to gether with the portion which appertained to the king to pay. By reason whereof, the Venetians, to expresse how much they congratulated his doings, tooke his faid fonne into their pay, with a hundred men at armes. This restitution made with no instice, albeit it was of great importace against the kings reputation in Italy, yet he diffembled the wrong, and made no fuch apparance of difliking as was convenient to the gravitie of the difhonour. And that which more is, the Duke of Ferrara, excusing the action by an Embassador sent to his Maicflie, that by reason of the neigbourhood of the Venetians and Duke of Millan (both prepared to pronounce warre against him) he was constrayned to obey necessitie: yet the king gaue as negligent care, as if the nature of the matter had bene light and trifling: wherein this might be one reason of the kings negligence, that, besides he proceeded almost at auenture in all his actions, yet he was ouerwearied with a continuall care and trauell of mind, ioyned to his auncient deuotion to repasse into Italy, having now greater occasions then ever, for that he had made truce with the king of Spaine, renued the alliance with the Smy zers, and many late causes of disagreement happed amongst the confederats. But as for the most part, matters of enterprise do nourish « their proper impediments, & to Princes their defires do feldome fucceede, when their negligence a is more common then their refolutions certaine: to, the kings disposition was ouerfuled with new meanes fubborned by fuch as were in most principall grace about him: Whereof some set afore him his pleatures, others encouraged him to embrace the enterprise, but with so mighty preparations both by fea and land, and with fo great prouisions of money, as could not be refurnished but with a long space and interposition of time, others made the action slow and impossible by many difficulties and objections, and the Cardinall of S. Mallo forgat not his accustomed delaies in the expedition of money. In so much, that not onely the time to march into Italy, was more incertaine then euer: but also many things were suffered to suspend and miscarie, which were almost brought to their perfection : for the Florentines (continually incenfing the king to march) had contracted with him, to take armes on their fides, affoone as the warre should beginne by him, and for that effect, they did agree that Monfr d' Aubigny with an hundred and fiftie french launces (the hundred to be payed by the king, and the fiftie to be mercenarie by them) should passe by sea into Tuskane, to be generall of their armie. And the Marquis of Mantua, who when he returned victorious from the kingdome of Naples, had bene dishonorably disappointed of the pay of the Tenetians, for suspition that he solicited to be mercenarie to the french king: did now with great diligence and in good earnest, negociate with him to that end. The new Duke of Sanoy was confirmed in his good amitie and alliance: Bentinole promifed to follow his authoritie, affoone as he were come into Italy. And the Pope, doubting whether he should joyne with him, (as he was continually laboured) determined at the least not to be against him.

But all exfectations began now to diffolue, and mens motions and mindes to grow cold for the detraction and negligence which the king vsed: for that, neither his men of warre (as was promifed) passed into Itay to reassemble at Alt: neither was Monfr a' Aubigny dispatched, and much leffe money fent to pay the Vrsins and the Vitellis his fouldiers, (a thing of no litle importance for the warre he ment to make.) By reason whereof the Vitellis inclining to enter pay with the Venetians, the Florentines who feared they should not have sufficient respit to give advertisement to the king, kept them intertayned for one yeare in common, for the seruice of the king and themselves. The king commended much these actions in them, but he made no ratification nor prouision of payment for his part: onely he sent Gemell to them, to intreat them to lend him for the furniture of his enterprise, an hundred and fiftie thousand duckats. Lastly, the king (as he did at other times) measuring the wils of others by his owne, left all things to consusion, and departed almost vpon the sudden from Lyon, to go to Towrs, and then to Amboyle, with his accustomed promifes to returne immediatly to Lion.

For which respects, hope fayling in all those that followed his faction in Italy. Baptiftin Fre- The Dake of go/e was the first that reconciled himselfe with the Duke of Mullan, who taking courage by these Millangrole. good euents and fuccesses, discouered euery day more and more, the ill disposition he bare to- cutes his prawards the Venetians for the regard of Py/a, foliciting (with continuall importunities) the Pope, stife against and the king of Spaine, estsoones to call into question (but with more esticate) a parliament for the Venetians, the refloring of the fame citie. And the better to aduance the practife, the Florentines, receiving counsell and direction from him, dispatched an Embassadour to Rome, but with a commission qualified to proceede fo aduifedly, that the Pope and the refidue might perceive, that if Pyss were rendred to them, they would joyne in vnitie with the others for the defence of Italy, against the french: but in case the restitution of the city succeeded not, to keepe all things from the knowledge of the french, to whom they were carefull to give any occasion to hold them doubtfull or suspecled. This conference continued many daies at Rome, wherein was omitted nothing by the Pope, the Embassadors Spanish, the Duke of Millan, and the king of Naples, that might reasonably induce the Venetrun Embassadour to hold it necessarie for the common suretie of Italy, that by the redeliuery of that cirie, the Florentines might participate in the generall league against the french. They told him that the Senate of Venice ought to confent thereunto together with others, to the end, that the rootes of all emotions and troubles being supplanted, there should remaine to no estate or degree in Italy, any occasion to call estsoones forreine armes ouer the Mounts. They told him also that if in that regard the vnitie of Italy suffered impediment, there would perhaps be giuen, matter and occasion to others to take new counfels, by the which (to the comion prejudice)

might happen fornealteration of importance. But to this, was quite contrary the deliberation of the Senate of Venice, who covering their covetousnesse with many colours, and no lesse perceiuing from whom proceeded principally to great an instance, made answere by the same Embassadour, complaying not a litle that fuch a motion proceeded not of a respective care to the vniverfall benefit, but of an ill tempered affection which fome of the confederats bare to them: for that (fayth he) the Florentines, having with the french men a fecret affinitie and conjunction of mind, and being perfwaded that by their returning into Italy, the most part of Tuskane would divolve to their rule and jurisdiction: it was without doubt, that to reestablish them in Pysa, would not fuffile to draw them from fo ambitious inclination. But of the contrary, the restitution was a thing daungerous, for that by how much they should be mighty and strong, by so much would they be hurtfull to the furetie and quiet of Italy: he faid that in this restitution, it went of the honour and faith of enery one, but principally of their common weale, seeing the confederats having promiled the Pylans with one confent to protect their libertie, and afterwards (cuery one in particular putting an vnwilling hand to furnish the expenses of the comon businesse) imposed the whole burden vpon them alone, who (for that cause) had refused no charges, cares, nor trauels, it could not but turne to their speciall dishonor, to leave them abandoned when they were in most necesfitie of flay and comfort, and to withdraw their faith and promife, which though others effected litle, yet with them it had alwayes carried this reputation, not to fuffer flaine or violation in any fort: he alleaged it was a thing most grienous to the Senate of Venice, that (without respect reasonable)others fought to lay upon them by imputation, that which had bene begun with one common and generall confent, and continued for the benefit of enery one, and that with fo great an ingratitude, they were punished for their good workes: That the intollerable expenses which they had defrayed in this enterprite and many others, joyned to fo many perils and rrauels fuffayned fince the creation of the league, deferued not fuch recompence and retribution, their actions bearing that nature and qualitie both for expenses, pollicie, and care, that they may say with reason and justice, that Italy hath bene preferred by their meane: for that neither the battell of Taro was fought with other armes then theirs, nor the kingdome of Naples recoursed with other forces then of their common weale: That no other armie constrayned Nouaro to render, and chased the french king to returne beyond the Mounts: That no other strength then theirs, was opposed against him in Pyemone, as often as he affayed to returne: And that it could not be denyed, that those actions proceeded principally of the defire they had to protect the fafety of Italy, seeing as their estates were alwayes furthest removed from perils, so, for their occasion, there were no diforders hapned which they ought to readdreffe or amend: for they called not the french king into Italy, nor accompanied him when he was come ouer the Mounts, and much leffe for sparing their proper treasures, have they suffered to fall into perill, the affaires common and vniuerfall. No, rather necessitie and occasion have so required, that the Senate of Venice did give remedie to the diforders hapned by the faults of others, to the common harmes of the whole. All which operations, albeit they were not knowne, or though they were so soone committed to forgetfulnes, yet they would not for all that (forbearing the ill excusable example of others) defile neitheir the faith nor dignitie of their common weale, the rather, for that to the prefernation of the libertie of the Pylans, was joyned the furetie and well doing of all Italy.

The death of king Charles she eight. Whileft things passed in these practices amongst the consederats, with a manifest and generall disagreement, there hapned a new accident, which engendred effects diverse and much different from the thoughts of men. The night before the eight day of April, king Charles dyed at Amboyse, of a catterne which the Philitians call apoplexie, the same rising in him with such abundance as he beheld a match plaied at tennyse, that in sew houres he ended at the same place his sife, during the which, he had with greater importunitie then vertue, troubled the whole world, with great apparance of daunger to kindle efficones new fires of innovation and troubles: for that it was beleeted of many, that being pushed forwardes with a vehement desire to returne into Italy, he had in the end, either of his proper knowledge, or by the emulation of such as bare enuy to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, removed all the difficulties that had withholden the action. In so much, that albeit in Italy (according to his variations) sometimes he increased, and sometimes he diminished the opinion that men had that he would march: yethe kept them in continuall susption, & made his intentions to trouble their coniectures and councels. And for that cause, the Pope puffed with ambition ambition to rayle his fonnes, had begun alreadie to folicite with him touching fome fecret innouation, the Duke of Mullan having done the like (as was bruted) to the end he would not live in continuall feare.

King Charles dying without issue, the realme of France descended to Lowys Duke of Orleans, Lown Duke as nearer in bloud then any other of the masculine line; to whom (remayning then at Bloys) came of Orleans fueto do reuerence, the kings gard, and all the generall traine of the Court, together with the nobi- ceedeth to the litic of the kingdome, by whom he was faluted as king with titles and inuocations royall, not withflanding some did secretly murmure, that (according to the auncient statutes of the land) he was vnworthie to aspire to the crowne, against the which he had taken armes in the warres of Brittaine.

The day after the death of king Charles (a day observed in many places by a celebration and The death of folemnitie of palmes) tooke end the authoritie, life, and doctrine of Sanonarola: who having bin Sanonarola. long time before accused by the Pope, that he preached saunderously against the manners of the Clergie and Court of Rome, that he nourished sects and discords in Florence, & that his doctrine was not fully catholike, and for those reasons called to Rome by many writs, refused to appeare there, alleaging many excuses: and therefore after much a do he was at last (the yeare before) separated by the Pope with censures from the fellowship of the Church: of which sentence (hauing abfleyned from preaching for certaine moneths) he had eafily obteined abfolution, if he had longer continued, for that the Pope, who held stender reekoning of Sauonarola, had proceeded against him more by the incensing and persivasion of his aduertaries, then any other occasion. But he judging that it was for his filence, that his reputation came fo to be diminished, or at least, that it brake the purpose for the which he stirred (for he was principally aduaunced for his vehemencie in preaching) he felleftloones to despise the Popes commaundements, and returned publikely to his old office, wherein affirming that the centures published against him were vniust and of no force, he opened his mouth eftfoones to blaspheme the Pope and the whole court of Rome with great vehemencie: of this arose no small emotion, for that his aduersaries (whose authoritie increafed daily in greatnesse with the people) detested such inobedience, rebuking the action, for that by his innouation and rashnesse, the Popes mind was drawne in uncertainties and alteration, in a time specially, wherein the restitution of Pysa being negotiated by him and the other confederats, it was necessarie to do all things to confirme him in that inclination. On the other fide, his disciples and partakers desended and justified him, alleaging that men ought not for the regard of humane things, to trouble the operations diuine, nor confent that under fuch colours, the Popes of Rome should begin to intrude into the affaires of their common weale. But after there were certaine daies spent in this contention, and the Pope wonderfully inflamed sending out new thunderbolts with threats of cenfures against the whole citie: he was at last commaunded by the Magistrates of the citie to forbeare to preach, to whom though he obeyed, yet diverse of his brethren supplyed his office in fundry Churches. And the diuftion being no lefte amongst the spiritualtie then the layetie, the Fryers and brethren of other orders ceased not to preach feruently against him: arising at last into such high and malitious inflammation, that one of the disciples of Sauonarole, and one of the Fryer Minors, agreed to enter into the fire in the prefence of the whole people, to the end that the disciple of Sanonarole either being burned or preserved, the people might be left fatisfied and certaine whether Sauonarole were a Prophet or an abufer : feeing that at times afore, he had affirmed in his fermons, that for the instification of the truth of his prophecies, he could in all necessities obteine of God the grace, to passe without hurt, thorough the middeft of a flaming fire. And yet not with flanding greeuing not a litle with the resolution made without his privitie touching a prefent experience, he laboured to breake it with all his deuises and diligence: But the matter being fo farre proceeded of it felfe, and earneftly folicited by certainecitizens defiring to haue the towne deliucred of fo great troubles, it was necessary at last to passe further: In fo much as the two religious brethren, accompanied with all their brotherhoods and couet, came at the day appointed to the place afore the publike pallace, where was not only a generall concourse of the people of Florence, but vniuerfall assemblies of the cities adioyning. There the Fryer Minors were aduertifed that Sauonarole had or deyned, that his difeiple and brother entring the fire, should beare in his hand the Sacrament: which deutle they impugned greatly, alleaging that there was fought by that meane to put in danger the authoritie of Christian faith, which in the minds of the ignorant would not a litle decline if that holy oast should be burned; by which contention, Sauonarole being there prefent, and perfeuering in his refolution, there are se such factions and difagreements, that the action of experience proceeded no further, the fame diminishing so much of his credite, that the day following in a turnult then hapning, his aducrsaries tooke armes, whereunto being joyned the authoritie of the fourraigne Magiltrate, they entred the Monasterie of S. Marke where he was, and drawing him out of the place, they led him with two other of his brethren to the common prisons. In this tumult, the parents of those that had bene executed the yeare before, killed Francifque V ators a Citizen of great authoritie, and the most apparant fauorer and follower of Sanonarole: the chiefe motion inducing this quarrell, was, that about all others, his authoritie had deprived them of the facultie to have recourse to the iudgement of the counfell popular. Sauonarole was afterwards examined with torments, but not very grieuous, and ypon the examination, a processe published, which (taking away all imputations that were laide on him for couctousnesses, corruptions of manners, or to have had secret intelligence or practile with Princes) conteyned, that the matters by him prophelied, were not pronounced by reuclation diuine, but by his proper opinion grounded upon the doctrine and obfernation of holy Scripture. Wherein he had not bene moved by any wicked intention or purpole, and much leffe by that meane, to aspire to any office or greatnesse in the Church onely he had a holy defire, that by his meanes might be called a generall councell, wherein might be reformed the corrupt cultomes of the Clergie, and the cleate of the Church of God, (so farre wandred & gone aftray) to be reduced, as necre as might be, to the resemblance of the times drawing nearest the Apoliles; A glory, which, to give perfection to fo great and holy an operation, he effected farre about the obteying of the popedome: for that the one could not succeede but by meane of an excellent doctrine and vertue, and a fingular reuerence of all men: where the Popedome most often was obteyned, either by finister meanes, or else by the benefit of fortune: vpon which proceffe confirmed by him in the hearing and presence of many religious persons even of his owne order, but (if that be true which his ownefaction bruted afterwards) with words darke, and fuch as might receive diverse interpretations: there were taken from him and his two other companions with ceremonies inflituted by the Church of Rome, the holy orders, and that by fentence of the generall of the Iacobins and of the Bishop Romolin, Commissioners delegate by the Pope: and fo being passed ouer to the power of the secular Court, they were (by their judgements) hanged and burned, being at the spectacle of the degradation and execution, no lesse multitudes of people, then at the day of the experience of entring the fire, when was an infinite concourse to behold the iffue of the miracle promifed by Sauonarole. This death constantly endured (but without expressing word whereby might be discerned, either their innocencie or fault) quenched not the diuerfitie of judgements and paffions of men: for that many supposed he was but an abuser: and others (of the contrary) believed, that the confession that was published was fallely forged, or perhaps, in his aged and weake complexion, the torments had more force then the truth: wherein they excuted that maner of frailtie with the example of S. Peter, who neither imprisoned, nor constraymed with torments, or by any other extraordinary force, but at the simple words of the handmaides and feruants, denied that he was the disciple of his maister, in whom he had seene so many holy miracles.

THE ARGUMENT.

OWY S Duke of Orleans succeedeth to the crowne of France: he determineth to recover his Duchie of Millan: Pisa and Florence make warre: Lodowyke Sforce flieth from Millan: the Florentines give batterie to Pisa, and agree with the french king: Pope Alexander aspiresh for his sonne to the surs diction of Romagna: Lodowyke Sforce recourreth Millan, but being betraved by the Swizzers, he is taken, and led into France.

T was almost an universall coniecture amongst the Italians, that by the death of king Charles, all the regions of Italy were now delivered of those feares, afflictions, and dangers which the power and nation of the french did threaten. Their opinions were induced by this reason, that the new King Lowys presently ascended to the crowne, would not intangle Lowys 12, the beginning of his raigne with forreine warres, having first to looke with great study into the state of his owne gouernment at home, which a commonly to kings newly inuefted, brings many causes of new councels and alterations; but the spirits of such as discoursed with judgement vpon the traine and euent of things, nouriflied alwayes a fecret sufpition, that the afflictions that then were but deferred, would with time redouble, and rife growing to greater daungers and more generall harmes, specially so great an Empire being falne upon a king ripe in age, full of experience, ruled in his councels, refolute in action, moderate in expenses, and in all things (without comparison) holding more of himselse, then did his predecessor: and to whom withall, did appertaine (as in the right of the crowne of France) not onely the inheritance of the realine of Nantes, but also he maintained that the Duchie of Millan was his frehold by the succession of The title of the the Lady Valentina his grandmother, who was married by Iohn Galeas Viscounte his father (afore frenth hing to that, of viccaire of the Empire, he had obteyned the title of the Duke of Alellan) to Lowys Duke the Duche of of Orleans, brother to king Charles the fixt. At which marriage, there was added to the state of Millan. the dowry (which was the citie and countrey of Aft with great fummes of money) an expresse condition, that as often and when so euer as the line masculine of the said Galeas should fayle, the Lady Valentina should succeede to the Duchie of Millan, or she being dead, her next heires and diffendents: which couenant albeit ftrong enough of it felfe, was confirmed (if the french traditions be true) by the authoritie of the Pope (the imperiall feat being voide at that time, for the Popes of R gase pretend that the administration of the Empire vacant belongeth to them:) by which meanes, the bloud male of lohn Galeas, determining afterwards by the death of Philip Alaria Viscounte, Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to the Lady Valentina, began to pretend to the fuccession of the said dukedome: But as the ambition of Princes is ready to help on their titles with enery apparant colour, so there aspired at the same time to the said dukedome, not onely the Emperour Federike, alleaging that it was reuerted to the Empire, for that the line nominated in the inuestiture made to Iohn Galeas by Vincislaus king of Romaines, was extinct and dissoluted, but also Aiphonso king of Aragon and Naples, who was instituted heire by the Testament of Duke Philip; and amongst the residue, Francis Sforce with a fortune, force, and selicitie, more favourable then the others, quarrelled the fame title, who to give a better shadow to the armies which he leaused in that cause, alleaged that his wife Blanche, the onely daughter (but a bastard) of Philip, had peculiar interest in that succession: So that Charles Duke of Orleans, who (being taken prifoner at the battell of Agincourt in the warres betweene the English and french, and remaining reffrayned in England xxv. yeares) was able to do nothing, by reason of his pouertie and hard fortunes to justifie his title, and much lesse could be obteine aide of king Lowys the xi. norwithflanding he was his nearest kinfman: the reason was, that the same king, in the beginning of his raigne, was much molested and manifestly inuaded in divers partes of his kingdome, by the great Lords and Barons of the fame, shadowing their conspiracies with a shew of publike profit. But because the king saw that their intentions drew with them private regardes and particular interests, he kept them alwaies in bridle, and esteemed his estate and sucrtie to consist in the embasing of the great ones of his realine, but chiefly his nearest competitors: And for that reason, Lowys Duke of Orleans sonne to Charles, albeit he was his sonne in law, could draw no fauours or fuccors from him: the fame driving him, after the death of his faid father in law, together with his impacience that the Lady Anne Duchesse of Burbon the kings sister, was preferred afore him to the government of Charles the eight then in minoritie, to trouble France with a very flender fuccesse, and after retyred into Britaine with a worse fortune: for joyning with those that were against the intention of Charles, to obtaine Britaine by marying with Anne heire of the state by the death of Francis her father leaving no iffue male, (yea aspiring secretly to the same mariage) he was taken in an encounter between the french and the Brittons neare S. Aulbin in that countrey, and from thence led prisoner into France, where he remained two yeares. In so much as fayling then of meanes, and finding no fuccors in king Charles after he was out of prison, he joyned no further action to that enterprise, but when the king left him within Ast, he made himselfe Lord of Nouaro with a very litle profit: but being now become king of France, he held nothing of greater affection, then to reconquer the Duchie of Mellan as a fuccessió iustly appertayning to him. This defire planted in him from his youth, was effloones wonderfully increased and aduanced, by the successe he had at Nouaro, and withall, for that he greatly hated Lodowyke Sforce by reason of the insolent demonstrations and behaviours which he vsed to him, when he had the kings deputation in Af: Therefore, not long after the death of King Charles, by resolution set downe in his elect councell, he intitled himfelfe not onely king of France, and (for the regard of the realme of Naples)king of Ierusalem & both the Cicillies, but also soucraigne Duke of Millan. And because he would make knowne to the world what was his inclination to the things of Ita-In the wrote letters full of amitic and congratulation touching his ascending to the crowne, to the Pope, the Venetians and the Florentines, and withall dispatched men of special credence, to give hopes of new enterprises, but chiefly of his determination to conquer the Duchie of Millan: wherein the time running, nourished for him many fauours and oportunities, for that the death of his predeceffor had innouated in the minds of the Italians many new humors and inclinations, much differing from the cogitations and purpoles they had afore: for the Pope (whole ambitious thoughts could not be fatisfied if Italy flood in tranquilitie) withed that things might growe to hurly burly, feeking his peculiar advancement in the common division of principalities and » flates; A defire not vnlikely to deriue from fuch a mind, to whom all things were hatefull that held » of equitie, confcience, or religion, and nothing vnfauerie that finelled of troubles, innouation, and 27 change. And the Venetians, being now delivered of the feare they had of king Charles for the wrongs and injuries they had done him, expressed manifestly that they had no distrust in the new king: which disposition increased daily more and more, for that Lodowyke Sforce (notwithstanding he knew that he had to do with an enemie more mightie and leffe plyable) feeding himfelfe with this hope (the fame also beguiling Federyke of Aragon) that the french king could not with fuch expedition execute any action on that fide the Mounts, forbare not to oppose himselse against the Venetians in the quarrell of Pifa, wherin his spite present would not let him see the dan-,, ger that was to come: an error familiar with Princes ambicious, who measuring the event of things , more by their proper fancie and imagination, then by any rule or comparison of times & reasons, ,, are often in that fecuritie, caried to their vindoing, as menthat wander and believue an eccho », which beguiles them to their extreame ruine. The Florentines only began to estrange themselves in mind from the amitie of the french: for albeit this new king had bene their protector afore, yet now that he is made great with the estate and dignitie of the crowne, he had with them no league of amitie, neither in regard of faith giuen, nor for benefits received, as his predeceffors had by meane of those capitulations which were made at Florence and Aft: for regard of which they

Lowys 12. king of France intitleth him felfc Duke of Millan. would alwayes lay them felues open to many perils and perplexities, rather then to abandon his alliance. Befides, the discord which continually increased betweene the Venetians and the Duke of Myllan, was the cause that the feare being ceased which they had of the forces of the confederates, and withall hoping more in the fauours certaine and present of Lombardy, then in the succors absent and doubtfull of Fraunce, they tooke occasion to hold lesse reckening of his friendship or confederation. In this different disposition of mindes, were also no lesse diucrse, the Embassages that were fent: for the Senate of Venice dispatched with great speed to the king, one of their Secretaries remaining at that time in negociation with the Duke Sanoy: And to elfablish with these beginnings, the foundations of a well assured alliance, as the dayly affaires & occurrants of times reouired, they made an election of three other Enibaffadours to go to his Maiestie, not onely to The Venetians congratulate his right worthy ascending to the crowne, but also to protest in forme of excuse, that find Embassas what they had done contrary to the liking of the late king Charles, proceeded of no other motion, then of a timerous suspition (confirmed by many apparant signes and demonstrations) that not contented with the kingdome of Naples , he would lift up his minde to those meanes which . might make him Lord ouer the whole Monarchy of Italie. The Pope also, whose deuotion had this determination, to appropriate to his sonne Casar at that time Cardinall, all temporall greatneffe, raifed his thoughts to high things, and fending Embaffadours to the French king, was at a The Pope app point to fell to his Maiestie spiritual graces, receiuing in recompence, possessions temporal : for to dispense he was not ignorant that the French king had great defire to refuse lane his wife, bothbarrein and with all things deformed, who was given him almost by force by Lewes the eleventh: And that he had no lesse nesses of his liking to marry Anne now widow by the death of the late king, not fo much for the ancient affection that was between ethem afore the encounter of S. Aulbin, as that by the prerogative of that mariage, he should infinuate into the Duchy of Britaine, an estate great and very consenient for the crowne of France: this chaunge could not be done without the authoritie of the Pope. The Florentins in like fort fayled not to fend Embassadours to the king, as well to testifie the auncient custome and deuotion of that Citieto the crowne of Fraunce, as to put his Maiestic in remembrance of their merites, and the bonds and promifes of the late king: wherein they were much folicited by the Duke of Myllan, having two intentions, the one that by their meanes the practifes of the Venetians might be hindered, (both the one and other common weale intreating of the affaires of Py/a) and also that if they obtained any credit, amitie, or authoritie, they might under fome occasion, employ all to worke an accord betweene him and the French king, a thing not a litle defired and fought by him. All these Embassadours were well received of the king, who began even at the first to found every one of them severally, not with standing he had no meaning to put any thing to action in Italie, afore he had first affured the realme of Fraunce, by new leagues and confederations with the Princeshis neighbours and borderers.

But it was a thing fatall, that the fire of Pyfa, to the which the Duke of Myllan gaue the first kindling, and nourished by an inflamed defire to affubiect it to him felfe, should in the end breake his brand vpon the head of the author, and confume him with his proper flame: for that as well by his naturall lealousie, which was infinite in him, as for daunger of the greatnesse of the Venetians, which he saw to aspire not only ouer him, but also about all other Poterates of Italy, he could not endure with reasonable patience, that the fruite of his deuises and trauels, should be gathered by them, or transferred to the reputation of their imperie: wherein, taking occasion ypon the dispositió of the Florentins, refolute to pursue in all accidents the quarell of Py/a, and seeming to him that by the death of Sanonarola and Francis Valorie which were strong patties against him, he might now reappose more in that City then he could do in times past: he determined to ayde the Florentins in the recourry of Py/a with armes, seeing neither with practises, authoritie, nor the power and meanes of others, he could hithcrunto worke no good effect of that plot: he perswaded him selfe vainely, that either afore the French king could execute any action, Pyla would be reduced by composition or force to the iurisdiction of Florence, or else the Senate of Venice, (guided by that wisedome which he would neuer suffer to gouerne him selfe) would neuer defire either for enuie, or other leffe occasion, that (to the common daunger of the whole) the French armies should estfoones returne into Italie, feeing it was an universall travell to chase them out so lately.

This indifcreete resolution was furthered by a disorder which hapned against the Florentins in the courrey of Pyla: for their people which were at Pontadere, having advertisement by their espials that a troupe of feuen hundred horfemen, and a thousand footemen of the Pysans, were returning home with a great pray of cattell which they had taken in the fields of Voltere, iffued out almost all vnder the conduct of the Count of Rimucce and Guillanme of Pazza, Conistioner for the Florentines, to cut between them and home for the recoursy of the booty: & encountring with them in the valley of S.Reale, and as they had almost put them to disorder and recoursed the nost pats of the pray, there ioyned to the Pysans, an hundred and fittie men at armes sent out of Pysa to the succours of their fellowes, who finding the Florentine armie both wearie and disordered with the trouble of the pillage, and the authoritie of the Count not able to range the horsenne to the fight, they were put all to the chase, notwithstanding the footmen made some head and resistance, among whom many passed by the sword, and most of their horsenne taken prisoners with the chiefest of their leaders: in so much as the Count and Commissioner for Florence, saued them selves with great difficultie within S.R. eale, where they imposed one vpon another (as is the cultome in chaunces of adults fitted) the fault of the disorder happened.

Panle Vitelli Capsaine generall of the Florentine ar-

This journey brought no litle affliction to the Florentins, who to readdreffe with speed so great a danger, and not able to refurnish their companies with expedition, and Count Risucce Generall of their whole armie, having lost his reputation, for that his regiment was broken, determined to turne to the affaires of Pifa, the Vitelhes who were then in the countrey of Aretze: But afore that contract was perfected, they were constrained to accord to Paule Vitells the title, dignitie, & reputation of Captaine general of their armic. This ouerthrow conffrained them effoons to demand fuccours of the Duke of Millan, and that with fo much the more instance, by how much fince the chase, they had befought the French king, that to put them out of danger with his forces and with his authoritie, he would fend them three hundred lances into Tuskane, and ratifie the retaining of the Vitellies according to the contract made in the time of the late king (barles, prouiding his portion of their payment, & also that he wold cause the Venetians to abliaine from further vexing the: of all which requests, they reaped but gracious words without any effect, for that the king would not bring himself suspected with the Venetians, nor make any stirre in Italy afore he put beginning to the warres of Millan. But in these necessities & estate of things, the Duke of Millan was neither cold nor negligent, who doubting left the Venetians (by the occasion of this victorie) would enter further into the iurifdictió of Pifa, then they could be afterwards repulfed but with great difficulty, made known to the Florentins that he had a firme intention to succour them, but first he would establish with them, what sorts & proportios of prouisios were necessary not only for his defence, but also to atchieue the enterprise of Pifa, to the which (for there was no feare of any action in the French king for that yeare) were turned vniuerfally the eyes of all Italy, being then free from all other troubles: for albeit in the territories of Rome the families of Colonne and Vr sin had take atines, yet their wisedom's prevailed more in the quarell, then either their hatreds or their injuries.

Quarell besweene the families of Colonne and Vrfin.

This was the substance of the quarell: The Colonnois and Sauelles, stirred vp belike for the occupation which lacques Count made of latour Mathras, had invaded the places and territories of the Counts: and of the other part, the Vrlins (for the affinitic and conjunction of factions) took armes in their fauour: So that many boroughs and villages, being viurped both by the one & other partie, they fought together at last with all their forces at the foote of Motteelle in the courtey of Tynoly, where, after a long and braue battell, the inflamed passion of the parties pushing them on no leffe then either regard of glory, or confideration of daunger of their eltates, the Or fins (whole armie conteined two thouland footemen and eight hundred horsemen) were broken and put to the chase, their enseignes lost, & Charles Orsin taken prisoner, and of the side of the Collomors was hurt Anthony Sauelle a Captaine of no small reputation, who dyed of his wound not many dayes after. After this successe of the battell, the Pope, seeming that commotions in the courtey so neare to Rome, were displeasing to him, made as though he would solicite an accord, which, whilest he intertained in action (not with good meaning and faith, for he was difguifed in all his doings) the Orfins readdressed their armie with new supplies, and planted a campe afore Palombare, a principall town belonging to the Sauelleis, which the Colonnoys (who after the victory had occupied many places of the Cours) prepared to rescue: But both the parties finding at legth the dissembled behaulours of the Pope, sometimes gluing courage to the Colomoys, and eft soones comforting the Ursins, and that he did but nourish the warre & give them medicines to weaken them both, to the end he might with more facilitie oppresse them when their strengths were consumed, they came altogether to a parley (without the interpoling of a third) at Tynoly, where, of the selues, they established blished an accord, by the which Charles Vrsin was set at libertie, the places taken in the controuerfie restored to their proper owners, & the quarell for the Earledons of Albe and Taillecousse reserred to the arbitration of king Federak, to whom the Colomoys were mercenarie foldiers.

These stormes thus resoluted into calmes, and the quarels that earst caried apparant shewes of bloud and murther, being now qualified by wifedome and temperance, there was not differned in any part of Italie any tokens of warre, but about the countrey of Pyfa: wherein, albeit the Duke of Myllan had derermined in the beginning not to succour the Florentins openly, but to minister to their wants with secret aides of money; yet suffering his minde to be continually ouer ruled with passions of disdaine and enuy, and not abstaining from words insolent and full of threats against the Venetians, he determined now to declare him selfe publikely, and to cut offall regards and confiderations of things, denying even then, passage to their bands and soldiers which marched to Pyla by the way of Parma and Pontrema, and put them in necessitie to passe by the Duke of Ferraraes countrey, a way of far more trauell and greater trouble: he wrought so that the Emperour comaunded all those Embassadours which were resident in his Court (except the Spanish) to returne home, renoking them all within few dayes after except the Embaffador for the Senat of Venuce. He fent also to the succour of the Florentins three hundred shot with crossebow, & contributed to the leuying of three hundred men at armes partly under the Lord of Plombyn, and some vnder Iohn Paule Baillon: he lent them at fundry times more then three hundreth thousand duckats, and lastly made continual offers of greater aides, if their necessities so required. Besides all these, he made great instance to the Pope (the importunities of the Florentins greatly inducing him) to ayde them in some fort. The Pope knowing how hurtfull and intollerable it would be to the estate of the Church, that the Venerians should prevaile to make a foundation of Pyla, promifed to refurnish them with a hundred men at armes, & the three gallies which were in his pay vnder Captaine Ville Marine, & they to giue impediments to the prouisions of victuals that should enter Py/a by fea. But afterwards (being familiar to him to protract and delay) he deferred with diuerse excuses to send to them any proportion, and in the end refused them with open deniall, for that drawing dayly more and more into other deuises and thoughts, he made his resolution to restraine him self only to the French king, by whose meanes he hoped to obtaine no small nor commonrecompences: yea(it is oftentimes the property of men to make easie with will and hope, that which in reason and wisedome they know to be hard) he ascended in weening to the crowne and kingdome of Naples, It was almost a thing fatall, that the refusing of the alliance which the king of Aragon made to the Pope, should breede in him the beginning of new things and chaunges : for The Pope fee long before he had wholly determined to joyne him felle with the French king, he had made great keth to match instance to king Federike to give to the Cardinall of Valence (who was resolved to for sake the ha- the daughter bit and profession of the Church upon the first occasion) his daughter in mariage, with the princi- of Federik. palitie of Tarent in dowry, wherein he perswaded him selfe, that if his sonne (whose wit was suttle and hart hawry, and rayled) were once become Lord of fo large & generall a member of the kingdome of Naples, that then there would be litle difficultie (having the colour of a daughter delcending of the king) to take occasions, what by force and strength, and what by the authoritie and rights of the Church, to dispoyle his father in law of the kingdome, both weake in men of warre, and poore in money, and from whom also were estraunged the affections of the Barons. This matter was hoatly furthered and fauoured by the Duke of Atyllan, who debated with king Federike (by his Embassadour the Marquis Stampe sent specially to Rome and Naples) how daungerous it would be for him, if the Pope (made frustrat of this desire) went suddenly to joyne with the French king: And withall he preferred to the kings remembrance how much it, would fauour of pufillanimitie and indifcression (specially the matter concerning wholly his safetie) to put in consiration indignitie onely, and not to have so much rule over him selfe, as to preferre the protection of his estate, afore his proper will: But Federske fearing that in this sutteltie of Lodowike was layd the foundation of his ruine, refused the plot with continual obstinacie, confessing that the alienation or estraunging of the Pope was a degree to put his kingdome in daunger, but he stood assured that to give his daughter with the principalitie of Tarent to the Cardinall of Valence, were to put his life in daunger, & therefore in two perils he had rather to abide the hazard of that which he might runne into with most honour and honestie, and which proceeded not of any fault or errour of him felfe. By this meane, the Pope turning wholly his minde to joyne with the French, and

defiring that the Venetians would do the like, (whom he was loth to offend) abstained altogether to minister any fauours or succours to the Florentins: who receiving courage by the ready succours of the Duke of Myllan, and for the recommendation of the valour of Paule Vitelly their new Captaine, forgot nothing that might aduaunce the enterprise, notwithstanding they esteemed it of very hard action: for that befides the numbers, experience, and resolute courage of the Citizens and countreymen of Pyla, there was within Pyla, a strength of the Venetians of foure hundred men at armes, eight hundred estradiots, and more then two thousand footemen: They were also (as occasion required) ready to refurnish them with stronger succours, for that even such as at the beginning had no will to consent to accept the protection of the Pyfans, were now no leffe ready then the rest to support their quarrell for the regard of common honour: The contract made in common by Lodowike and the Florentins, gaue such an increase to the armie, that it seemed now to cary proportion sufficient not onely to recouer all the places within the countrey of Pyla, but also to make a wonderfull industrie that the neighbours should forbeare to give aide and favour to the Pylans; or at least eschewing the example of the Venetians, not molest any more the Florentins in other places: Lodowike having afore he determined to protest him selfe openly, entertained in common with the Venetians, John Bentynole with two hundred men at artnes, laboured him so much, that he bound him with the state of Bolognia, to him selfe onely swherein the better to confirme Bentynole, the Florentinis tooke into their pay, Alexander his sonne: And to make a more generall resistance against the Venetians making inuation on the fide of Romagnia, (who for fuch a purpose had taken into their prote-Ction the Lord of Faenza) the Florenting won alloto their appointments and denotion, togegether with fiftie men at armes, Octavian de Riare, Lord of I mola and Furly, who was gouerned according to the direction and will of Katherine Sforce his mother: She followed without any regard, the faction of Lodowyk and the Florentins, many occasions mouning her, but principally for that the was maried to lohn de Medicis, whom the Duke of Myllan (nothing liking of the gouernment popular) laboured to make great at Florence, & also his brother. Lodowyke had no finall credit with the people of Lucques, whom he folicited with all his authoritie and meanes, not to comfort any more the Pylan's with those properties of succours & fauours which they had accustomed to minister to them: which request albeit they did not observe so fully as he required, yet they withdrew and abstained from many helpes for his regard. There remained onely they of Genes & Stenna ancient enemies to the Florentins, having equall occasions of controverse against that state: the one for the interest of Montpulcian, & the other by reason of the countrey of Lunigrana. Touching the Siemoys, it was a thing much to be feared, least being made blind with hate and enuie they fell not into their ancient errour, in giving to every one commoditie to trouble and molest the Florentins by the oportunitie of their lands and estates, such sufferance sometimes not being without their proper domage. And for the Genoways, albeit by reason of ancient iniuries, it greened them not a litle, that the Venetrans should be mailters over Pyla, yet (in that Citie there is litle care of the common weale) they gave fufferance to the Pylans and vellels of the Venetians to exercise a traffike in their rivers & Hreames, in regard of private gaine which some particulars got by it, by the which the Py ans received many great comodities: For these respects, and also by the counsell of Lodowyk still soliciting, the Florentins sent Embassadours to Genes and Stenna, to folicit (the rather by his meanes) an accord and finall resolution of all their quarels: But as touching the Genovays, the practile and negociation was frustrate, and brought forth no effect, for that they demanded to be acquited frankly of Serezana without giving other recompence the a simple promise to bereaue the Pijans of all oportunities and commodities of their countreys: wherein the Florenins making conference of the qualitie of the demaund, found the loffe fo prefent and certaine, in regard of the profit fo incertaine and litle, that they refused to buy fo dearetorio: ly their friendships.

But whilest these deutes occupied the reasons and mindes of men in diuerse places, the Florentine armie, more mighty in horsemen then strong in societies, additioned into the field under their new generall: By meanes whereof, as the Pyjanr, whose efficience ince the victory of S. Reall had made incursions at pleasure ouer the whole country, settled from Pont de sac where they last incamped So Panle Vitelli having taken Calemaia; and lething his armie there in exspectation of new strength of societies, bellowed one day one part of his soldiers in ambush neare to Cascina, whither the regiment of the Venetians were retired, who gouerned by Marke Martinenguo were not onely without obedience, but without order: in so much as when Paule Virells gaue the charge to the, he flue many of the stradiots, with lohn Gradania Captaine ouer men at armes, & tooke prisoner Franque Coronell of the stradiots, with the pray of an hundred horses. The successe of this encounter much amazed the companies of the Venetians, and therefore suppoling Casema not lufficient for their fastete, they retired to the borough of S. Marke, exspecting new fuccours to come from Venuce: But Panle Vitelli, after he was refurnished with his strength of footenen, and making as though he would affaile Cafeina (which the Pyfans beleeved by many apparances) turned his march, and beguiling the coniectures of the enemies, passed ouer the river of Arne, and pitched his campe before the borough of Buti, having fent afore, three hundred footemen to keepe occupied the hils and frontier places: And having drawne thither with the litrength and working of a number of Pioners, the artillerie by the way of the mountaine (not without great difficultie for the troublesome wayes) he tooke the towne by force the second day after he had braked his artillerie . Paule made choise of this enterprise, for that he judged that Pyfor, (in the which was an incredible obstinacie as well of the inhabitants as others retired out of the countrey, in whom by long vie was great sufficiencie touching actions of warre) could not be taken by force, the Citie of thelfe being proud in thrength of wals and rampiers, and having within it many bands of the men at armes of Venice: he held it an action of better pollicie, to deuterather to languish and confume them, then to execute and enforce them, and setling the warre in that part of the countrey which is on the right hand of the river of Arne, he effected it a good counfell in warre to lay plots to take the pecces in that quarter, and to commaund all those places by whose helpe & oportunitie, he might give impediment to the succours that might come to them by land from any forreine countrey: And therfore after the taking of the borough of Buty, having railed a mount or fort vpon the mountaines which be aboue S. lohn de L. Vene, he drew his campe right afore the fort which the Pyfans had made neare to Vicopifan, drawing thither his artillerie with the fame difficulties he did before: and taking almost in one season Valdecalcio, and building aboue Vico in a place called Pietro Doroloso, another bastillion, to keepe that no succours enter there, he held be freged the castel of Verrucola. In these pollicies of this new generall, to the end the Pylans (doubting that he would affaile Labrafatta and Valdeferels,) might be leffeready to be fatte from Pyfa, the Count Riunceio was incamped with other copanies at Valdinienolo. All which notwithstanding, four hundred footme issuing out of Py/a, brake all the regiment of footemen which were negligently bestowed in the Church of S. Michaell to keepe Verruco'a besieged: But Paule Vitelli, efter he had got the bastillion, which yeelded upon condition to cary their artillerie to Vicopifan, encamped afore V wopifan, not on that fide where the Florentin campe was when he was within to defend it, but he lay towards S. John de la Vene, to give impediments to the succours that were to come from Pyfa: After the furie of his artillerie had brought downe to the earth a great quantitie of the wals: the defendants, dispairing belike of rescue, rendred the place, their Vicopisan life and goods faued. They were perhaps discouraged to hold out to the vttermost, for that rendred, Paule when he tooke Buty (to give terrour to others) cut off the hands of three Cannoniers Germains which were within the towne, and vsed his victorie with many cruelties. Immediatly after the fuccesse of Viropisan, therefollowed another occasion of happy exploite, for that the bands which were within Pifa supposing it would be very easie to surprise the bulwarke of Putro Dolorofo, they fent thither afore day, two hundred light horsemen, with many troupes of sootemen, who finding a stronger resistance then they looked for, lost more time then the action of their enterprise required: in so much that whilest they were giving the assault, the generall of the Florenturs, discouering him selfe upon the mountaines there abouts, and with part of the armie descending to succour the fort, sent Vitellettze with the residue of the bands to give impediment to their returne: against whom as they entertained skirmish in the plaine towards Calcy, the generall fell upon them on the backes, and put them to flight, not without the loffe of many horsemen, and the most part of their footebands.

But in this discourse and event of things, the Florentins having some likely advertisments Embassadours from the Duke of Ferrara and others, that the Venetians were not without a willing inclination of the Florento peace, whereunto they would be more eafily induced, if in the action (as belonged to the dignitic and respect of so great a common weale) they proceeded with tokens and demonstrations gnitic and respect of so great a common weale) they proceeded with tokens and demonstrations

The Floretimes, as though they negociated not with equals, but with a state of more greatnesse: They sent as Emdours to Veof Pifa.

The Duke of Venice answereth the Floresin Embaffa= dours.

Sent Embassa- bassadours to Venice to sound their intentions Guid' Antonio Vespuccio & Bernard Rucellas, two of the most honorable Citizens of their common weale: A matter from the which they had absteiof the affaires ned till that time, partly for that they would not offend the minde of king Charles, but more for that as they knew themselves not to be strong enough to oppresse the Pisans, so they judged that their petitions would be unprofitable, being not accompanied neither with reputation nor forces: but now that they were the stronger in the field, and that the Duke had publikely declared him self against the Venetrans, their hopes were greater then their doubts, to find some convenient meanes of honorable composition. The Embassadours were received with great office and reverence, and immediatly brought into counfell, the Duke fitting and the whole refort of Senatours, in whose presence after they had formed many excuses for not sending Embassadours to them afore, the fame being refrained for many regardes proceeding of the qualitie of times, and fundry accidents of their Citie: they required franckly that they would ablteine from the defence and protection of Pifa, a request whose moderation put them in hope not to be denied, seeing that both in the common weale of Florence, had bene found no occasions of offence or displeature to them, and also according to the rumour & recommendation that went of the equitie of the Senate of Venice, they hoped they would not in this case abandon iustice, which being the piller and soundation of all other vertues, it was but reasonable to preferre it afore all other respects. To these the Duke made answere; that as they could not charge the Florentins with any trespasse or injuries in these times, so also the Senate was not entred into the protection of Pisa for any defire to offend them, but for that the Florentines onely, having supported in Italie the factions of the French, meere and simple regardes to the common profit and fafetic, had induced all the Potentates of the League to give faith to the Pisans, to helpe them to defend their libertie: wherein, though some others of the refidue did fall into the errour of forgetfulnesse after they had given their faith: yet the custome of others should breede no law in them, and much lesse contrary to the vie of their common weale, would follow them in a matter fo vinworthy: Onely if the state of Florence would propound some meane, by the which the libertie of the Pijans might be preferued, they would make knowen to all the world, that neither for their generall ambition, nor for their particular or proper profite, they haue thus long continued the defence of Pifa. Vpo this answere, they drew certaine dayes to disputation vpon fome meane which might leaue satisfied both the one and other parties, wherein Some contention rising, for that neither the Venetians nor the Florentin Embassadours would propound the meane, they agreed that the Embassador of Spaine, who incouraged them to the agreement, should interpose betweene them: this was the meane he opened, that the Pisans should returne to the deuotion of the Florenins, not as subjectes, but as people recommended, and vnder the same capitulations which had bene agreed vpon at Pistoia, as a thing indifferent betweene seruitude and libertie. But the Venetians answered, that they could not acknowledge any part of libertie in a Citie wherein the fortreffes and administration of the lawes were in the power of others: by reason whereof the Embassadours of Florence interpreting this answere to a deniall of their demaundes, departed from Venice, with this coniecture, that the Senate, vnlesse they were compelled by necessitie, would not abandon the defence of Pifa, whither they sent supplies of soldiers continually: befides, they had in the beginning no great feare of the enterprise of the Florentins, for that deferring the action till the most part of the spring was past, they could not log keepe the field, the countrey of Pifa, by reason of his basenes & lownesse, being much subject to waters. And lastly having of new taken to their pay under the Duke of Vrbin (to whom they gave the title of gouernour) and vnder certaine other Captaines, fine lundred men at arms, being holpen withall with diverse good intelligences: they had determined, (the more easily to turne the Florentins from offending the Pilans) to begin the warre in another place, joyning to their plots the oportunitie of Peter de Medicis, at whose perswasions they entertained into their pay Charles Vrsu and Bart. Aluiane with two hundred men at armes. They were also without hope, to be able to induce John Bentinole to confent that they might make warre vpon the Floretins on the fide of Bolognia, for that the Duke of Myllan (stirred belike for that in the retaining which was made by Anmyball his fonne, the Venetians were preferred before him, and joyning to that new offence a recordation of old iniuries done against him, as he fayd, when the Duke of Calabria passed into Romagnia) had occupied certaine Castels which belonged to the Duchy of Myllan, & possessed by right of dowrie, by Alexander his sonne. For these causes albeit he forbare not to vexe him vpon every occasion, yet the Castels being at last restored to him againe at the request of the Florenims, the deuise to make warre on that side, was broken: Therefore the Venetians laboured to dispose them of Sienna to graunt that they might begin the warre in their quarters, wherein they grew into hope to preuaile (befides their ordinarie disposition against the Florentins) by a division that was in Sienna amongst the Citizens: for Pandolphe Petruccio with his wit and suttletie, having drawen to him selfe almost a speciall authoritie ouer the counsels & businesse of the Citie, Nicholas Borghese his father in law and the familie of the Belantis, to whom his greatnesse was displeasing, laboured that passage might be graunted to the Duke of Vrbin & the Vrsins, who, with source hundred men at armes, two thousand footemen, and soure hundred estradiots, were stayed by commission of the Venetians at Fratte in the countrey of Peromfe: They alledged also that to make truce with the Florentins according to the folicitation of the Duke of Myllan and continuall instance of Pandolphe, was no other thing, then to give them oportunitie & meanes to dispatch the affaires of Pi-(a, which being resolved, they would be so much more mighty to bring injuries and subjection yponthen and theirs: And therefore they ought (making their profite of occasions, as appertained to wife men) to be refolute in this, not to make other accord with them then a peace, which might make them give over the right they preteded to Montpulcian, a graunt whereunto they knew the Florentins would neuer agree: And then it would follow by necessitie, that the demandes of the Venetians must be cosented vnto, with whom having obteined the first place of grace, they hoped eafily to embrace the authoritie of Pandolphe, who, having made him selfe authour of the contrarie opinion at the perswasson of the Duke of Myllan, found enough to do to maintaine it, for that the hatred which the people bare naturally to the Florentins could do much, &cit was not vnlikely that by this feare, it might be brought to passe, that they would disclaime the right of Atompulcian. This couetousnesse accompanied with hatred, had more force then the considerations alledged by Pandolphe, either touching the trauels that would follow the warre, if it were drawen vpon their countrey, or in regard of daungers, which with time would afflich Turkane by the greatnesse of the Venetians: for iultification whereof (faith he) we neede not have recourse to the examples of others, seeing euen of late memorie, for fauouring the faction of Ferdinand king of Naples against the Florentins, they were in perill to fall into setuitude, if Ferdinand, for the occupation which Mahomes Ottoman made of the towne of Ottrante in the kingdome of Naples, had not bene compelled to call home from Sienna the person of Alphonio his sonne, and his regiment: And that their histories and traditions tell them (without these examples) that the same defire to offend the Florentins by the meane of the Earle of Vertus, together with the dildaine coceined for the respect of Monipulesan, was the cause that of them selues, they had assubiected to him their proper countrey. Thele reasons, albeit they were true, yet not sufficient to represse the furie & affectios of the others, fo that he was not without apparant daunger of some tumult to be raised by his adversaries. Notwithstanding to preuent them, he caused suddenly to enter into Sienna, many of his friends there abouts, by whom he wrought with fo great courage and wit, that at the fame inflant, the Florentins fent to Poggi Imperial three hundred men at armes and a thousand sootemen, with whose reputation and force, confounding the audacitie of his aduerfaries, he brought to passe a truce for fine yeares with the Florentins: who, preferring a seruile feare of perils present, afore regard to dignitie Truce between and honour, bound them selues to pull downe one part of the bridge of Valiane, and to dismantle the Siennoys euen to the earth, the bastillion which had so much molested the Siennoys: they condifcended further, that the Siennoys within a certaine time, might build fuch fortes and fortreffes as they would betweene the shoare and channell of Chianes, and the town of Atontpulcian, By this accord Pandolphe, rifing into a stomacke and greatnesse more then before, found meanes soone after to kill his father in law, who, with too liberall a disposition of minde, objected him self against his purposes: & so by the dispatch of him, increasing terrour to the residue, he confirmed him selfe dayly more and more in tyrannie. By this accord, the Venetians, being deprined of the hope they had to divert or turne by the way of Sienna, the Florentins from the enterprise of Py/a, and being not able to obtainelicence of the Perulins, to manage the warte by their countreys, they determined to vexe them on that fide to Romagna, hoping with the auncient fauours and factions which Peter de Meducis had there, to aspire easily to the occupation of those places which they held in the Appenine. In so much, that having obtained passage of the litle Lord of Faenze, by the vale of Lamone, with one part of their Regiment which they had in Romagna, with whom Peter and Inlian de Medicis were joyned: they occupied the borough of Maradi lituate vpon the Appenine, on that lide which lookes towardes Romagna, where was made against them no tenstance, for that Dennys of Nalde a man of the same vale, entertained by the Florentins with three hundred sootemen to defend it, together with the strength of that countrey, led thither so small a force of footemen, that he durst not abide there: by meanes whereof they incamped afore the rocke of Chassilion, built in a place about the fayd borough, which they hoped to cary, though by no other meane, yet by want of many things which they knew to be within it, but specially the lacke of water, & so by the oportunitie of that to have free way to passe into Mugelle, which is a countrey neare to Florence: "But it is hard to affure any thing that depeds vpo the will of another, & much lesse can the wisdom of man warrant all those things which imagination & coniecture do suggest. So, they found them felues deceived in the judgement of those wants which they supposed the Rocke did tuffer, for that the constancie and diligence of the Castell keeper, supplied the slender provisions of victuals that were within it, and the liberalitie of heaven auoyded the penurie of water, rayning so much in one night, as all the vessels and cesternes being full, they were deliuered from that paine: And in the meane while, the Count R innece with the Lord of Plombyn & other Captaines, being Rolne vpon the enemie by the way of Mugelle, enforced them to the chase, having undertaken this enterprise with a greater confidence in their diligence, then with sufficient strength. Besides, the Count Caiazze sent to Cotionole by the Duke of Myllan, with three hundred men at armes and a thousand footme, together with Fracasse entertained by the same Duke, who was within Furly with a hundred men at armes, prepared to charge them vpo the backe. The confideration of these daungers, and to apply the harmes that threatned, they went and loyned with the Duke of Vrbyn then departed from the countrey of Perouse, and with other Regiments of the Venetians, who altogether were bestowed betweene Rauenna and Furly, but with a very small hope of happy enterprise, for that , besides the bandes of Florentins , there was in Romagna a strength of fine hundred men at armes, five hundred croffebow shot, and a thousand sootemen of the Duchy of Wyllan, the impe-dimentalfo which Imola and Furly gaue to them, being of great importance.

But in this meane while Paule Vitelli, who after the taking of Vicopifan had remained there certaine dayes exspecting prouisions necessarie that were to come, & continuing in one intention to cut from the Pylans the commoditie and meanes of succours, was gone to the enterprise of Librafatta: And the casier to approch that part of the towne which was most weake, & to preuent the dispositio of the enemie to inuade his armie much troubled with artillerie & cariage, he left the way which descends by the mountaines to the plaine of Pyla, and cutting by force of Pioners a new way through the mountaines, he tooke in his marching the fame day, the baltillió of the Mont Major, which the Pysans had built upon the top of the mountaine, and so descended with great furetie into the plaine of Librafatta: where, having eafily the day after, brought into necessitie to yeeld the bands of footemen that had the charge of Pointo & the old Castell, (two towers answering one another very neare Librafatta) he bellowed in the fecond tower and in other places, certaine peeces of artilleries to gouerne the towne, which was well manned and guarded, conteining two hundred footemen of the Venetians: from these places he battered the wall both on high and below, and from the first day had hope to carie it: But after the wall was shaken with the artilletie, there fell by chaunce so great a part of it in the night, that the ruinous matter raised the rampier which was begun there about four cubits: In fo much as Pawle, affaying in vaine three dayes together to mount up by ladders, began to doubt much of the fuccesse, the rather for that the armie received great harmes by a peece of artillerie which came from the towne by a low lowpe hole: But his industrie and vertue was aided by the benefite of fortune (without whose fauour great Captaines are oftentimes deceived in their enterprises) for that with great shot out of the campe, the peece which beat them was broken, & one of the best Cannoniers within the place killed, the bullet paffing rhrough the towne: which accident fo amazed those within the towne, being fo commaunded by the artillerie of the fecond tower, that they durst not affemble to make head; but ! yeelded the fourth day, & not long after, the castell abiding some shot of the cannon, did the like. 1 After the conquest of Librafatta, he deuised to make certaine bastillions ypo the hils thereabouts. but chiefly he erected one of capacitie to receive great nubers of men, above Santa Maria in Cafello, called by the name of the mount, where was built the bastillion of la ventura commaunding.

the countrey thereabouts. This and Librafatta being garded, trobled all commodities that might come to Ps/a by the way of Lucque and Petra fancta, and brought befides, generall distresses to the state of the common cause of Pifa.

In this variacion and fortune of things, the Venetians ceased not to study meanes by the which The Venetians they might minister comfort to Pifa, sometimes with immediate succours, and sometimes by di- carefulito succession uerting and drawing away the forces of the enemie: wherein they hoped to preuaile the rather for corthe Pifant. the differences which happened between the Duke of Millan and the Marquis of Mantua, entred of new into the appointments and directions of the Duke: who because he would not take away the title of Captaine general ouer all his companies from Galeas de S. Seuerin more great with him by fauor then by vertue: had promifed to the Marquis to honour him within three moneths with the place of Captaine generall in common, either with the Emperour, or with the Pope, or with king Federike, or with the Florentins: which being not performed by Lodowike at the terme promifed, Galess giving many impediments against it, and adding to the wrong, many other difficultics upon the paiments of his entertainments: the Marquis determined to reenter into the pay of the Venerians, who practifed to fend him to the succors of Ps/a, with three hundred men at armes: whereof Lodowike having a lively doubt, and dreading by the propertie of his wit (founding the bottome of things) the daungers that might grow by the loffe of a man of that importance, declared him immediatly by the consent of Galeas, captaine to the Emperour and to him. But such is the mutabilitie of men mercenarie, that as their profession is to liue by occasions and divisions of times and Princes: fo, oftentimes they interpret small falts to great causes of their reuolt & change, ,, holding it no iniuffice to disappoint those that breake the first promise with the, according to the example of this Marquis, who having alreadie beneat Venice, and communicated with the Senate the great confidence he had to enter Ps/a in despite of the Florentine bands, was reentred into their pay: and receiving part of his pay in prest, he returned to Mantua, preparing himselfe to the expedition; which he had further advanced, and put his companies to march, if the Venetians had vfed the same diligence to dispatch him, which they did to entertaine him: but because they began to proceed flowly upon the occasion of a new hope they had, that by certaine ancient fauorers of the Medicis, they should be able to obtaine Bibsene, a borough in the countrey of Casenin, they were of opinion that in regard of the difficulties to passe to Pisa, it would be more profitable to diuent then to fuccour. The Marquis taking his aduantage of thefe delayes, and infly displeased with the forme of their dealings, returned eftfoones to the pay of Lodomke with three hundred men at armes and an hundred light horsemen, under the honour and title of Captaine to the Emperout and to him, reteining the money he had received of the Venetians upon an account or reckening of payes due of old. The practife which was debated with the Venerians, was not without fuspicion to the Florentins, who, besides their generall meanes of aduertisement, had certain dayes before, a particular intelligence from Bolognia. But it often hapneth, that diligent and wife counsels be unprofitable when they are executed with negligence and indiscression: for the commissary or commissioner whom they sent thicker to assure them from such a danger, after he had apprehended fuch as he doubted most, and bare apparant guiltinesse of the practise, turning his dissembled faith into true meaning, and their offence into innocencie, he fet them effloones at libertie, and in other things was so negligent, that he made the action easie to Aluiano appointed for the execution of this practife: for he having fent before certaine horfmen attired like victuallers, and they Aluiano 14marching all night, were at the gate by the point of day, which they wonne and occupied without keth Bibienna. difficultie, for that the negligence of the Commissarie had not onely left it without gard, but also not let order that the gate should be opened later then was wont in times nothing dangerous. After the first troupes, followed with a readie speed and diligence, other bands of horsemen, who named themselves by the warres to be of the regiments of Vitellis. Assoone as the gate was possest by the fouldiers forceine, the parties of the conspiracie, drawing to commotion in their fauour, they embraced immediatly the whole towne, & were absolute maisters of the enterprise: at what time they were also encouraged with the presence of Aluiano, who arriving the same day, and albeit had but a small proportion of soldiers (his nature being alwayes to follow the ay de and benefit of occasions, year o preuent them with his incredible diligence) yethe went suddenly to affaile Popps, the principall borough of that valley, but finding a refistance about his strength, he deuised to occupie the places nearest to Bybiene; albeit but litle and of no great importance. The countrey of

Calentin, amid the which runneth the river of Arne, is a countrey narrow, barren, and full of hils. seated at the soote of the Alpes of Appenne, at that time laden with snowes, for that the spring was but then begun: neuerthelesse it had bene a passage verie commodious to go to Florence, if the enterprise of Poppy had succeeded well to Aluiano, and no lesse convenient to make entrie into the countreys of Aretze and Valdarno, countreys which for the plentie of great townes & boroughs, were of great importance to the estate of the Florentines: who taking occasion of the present perill, not to be negligent, refurnished with a readic speed, all places needfull, breaking by that means the execution of a conspiracie pretended in Aretze: And studying about all other things to cut from the Venetians all meanes of new fuccours and supplies to the countrey of Casentin, they called from Pyla the Count Rinucce, & dispatched him speedily to occupy the wayes of the Appenin betweene Valdibagna and the strait of S. Stephen: who, albeit he disposed his regiment into troupes and companies as the nature of the place and prefent service required, yet was both their strength and industrie unprofitable to let the Duke of Vrbin, Charles Ursin and other Captaines from paffing, whose strength in the fayd valley being seuen hundred men at armes, and fix thoufand footemen, with some bands of Lanceknights, commaunded all the countrey of Casenin, except a very few places, and eftloones gaue a new life to the old enterprise to take Poppy: but their diligence was unprofitable, and the whole action in vaine: By meanes whereof the Florentins were compelled (according to the proper intention of the Venetians) to call backe from the affaires of Pylu, Paule Vitells with his bands, leaving fufficient guard in the places of importance, and also in the bastillion of Lauentura. His comming into the countrey Casentin. caused to retire the Venetias, who were removed to incampe the fame day about Pratto Vecchio, and Fracasse being joyned with him (fent by the Duke of Myllan with five hundred men at armes & five hundred footemen in fauour of the Florentins) he brought presently into hard termes and difficulties the state of the enemies, who were dispersed into diverse places, both for the incomoditie of the countrey, which was strait and narrow, and also for that (to the end they might have free entry and going out of the countrey Casentin) they were compelled to keepe the wayes of Vernia, Chiusa, and Montalona, places very high vpon the Alpes: By which meant, being inclosed in that valley in a season very tharpe, they were without all exspectation of aduauncement either there, or in any other place, the Count Rinnece being within Aretze with two hundred me at armes: And in the countrey Cafentin, the enterprise of Poppy not succeeding in the beginning, and the name of the Medicis bearing no further power or authoritie, for that the spirites and affections of the men of the countrey were against them, they had received many harmes of the paisants afore the comming of Virelli, In which regard, together with an affured intelligence of his comming, and the marching of Fracaffe, they fent backe beyond the Alpes, one part of their cariage and artillerie, & drew them felices all together into one strength as the nature of the place would suffer. Against whom Panle Vitelli determined to vie his custome, which was (to earle the victory with more ease and surety) to bear no regard neither to the longnesse of time, nor to great paines & trauell, & much lesse to expences, esteeming it a better office in a generall, to proceede with all necessarie prouisions; then, for a defire of glory to make the victoric speedy, to put in perill the issue of things, and the whole armie in hazard. In so much as (touching the countrey Casentin) his counsell was, not to attempt suddenly any action upon the places most strong, but in the beginning to make the enemie abandon the peeces most weake, and close the wayes of the Alpes and the straits of the country with bastillions, guards, & intrenched wayes, with fortifications, both to cut off all fuccours and supplies, and to take from them all meanes of mutuall aides and rescue from one place to another; hoping that this forme and manner of proceeding would in the end breede occasions to oppresse them further. besides that the great nubers that were within Bybienna could not but consume, both by the incomoditie of horsemen and want of victuals. With this counsell, having recovered certaine places neare to Bybienna, for their qualitie but of small importance, but for their commodities very proper for his intention (with the which he looked in the end to preuaile) and winning energy day more & more, he stripped enery day many men at armes bestowed in dinerse peeces neare to Bybienna: And to cut off all wayes from the bands of the Venetians affembling beyond the mountes to minister rescue to their peoples, he deuised to command all the places about the mount la Vers ma, & to intrench all the wayes thereabouts. In fo much as many difficulties increasing to the ene mies, together with necessities and want of victuals, many of them resuled the campe, who stealing away by fundry wayes, fell euery day into chaunge of differeffe and fortune, sometimes vexed with troublesome passages: and sometime stripped by the paisants, and oftentimes slaine by the soldiers. These were the actions of armes betweene the Venetians and Florentins.

Now in these times, albeit the Embassadours of Florence, were departed from Venice without Meanes of any hope of accord, yet was there holde at Ferrara, a new practife of composition, moued by the accord. Duke of Ferrara at the instance of the Venetians: Amongst whom many of those which held the greatest authoritie in that Senat, no lesse weary of the warre drawing with it increase of expences and difficulties, then now to be voyde of all hopes to prevaile further in the countrey of Ca-Centur, defired to shake off the Itudies and travels they suffered for the defence of Pifa, the cares and charges of that warre being greater without comparison, then the commodities or fruits of the service, in which regard they were ready to omit no occasion which might minister any honest colour to be discharged of it.

But whilest the regions of Italie were in these afflictions for the quarels of Pila, the new French The doings of king forgat not to make preparations to execute the conquelt of Atyllan the yeare following: the Fred king during the Wherein he hoped to haue in his fauour and on his fide the friendship of the Venetiane, who, ca-warreof Pifa. ried with an incredible hate against the Duke of Mullan, held strait negociation with his maiestic. No lesse did sollicite with the king in no litle secrecie & earnessnesse the Pope, who, excluded from the alliance of Federike, and embrasing still the desire to the kingdome of Naples, was wholly converted into the hopes of the French, by whose meanes he sought to obtaine for his sonne the Cardinall of Valence, Charslotta, daughter to Federske, who was not yet maried, but trained vp in the Court of France: Wherein the king nourifhing him with some tokens of hope, for that he supposed the power outer her mariage rested in his maiestie, the Cardinall (ioyning with the intention The Cardinal of his father) entred one morning into the confiftorie, and with an action in speech and gesture fatte of Valence the from the office and modestie of his profession, befought his father and the whole colledge of Cat-Popes sonne dinals, that feeing he entred not into Priesthood of his proper will and disposition, that they would renouncesh his make it lawfull to him, to leaue the dignitie and the habite, to follow the exercise whereunto his profision. destinie and inclination drew him. This request being made case in the Cardinals by purchase and corruptios, was not denied of his father, whose authoritie going with the infected partializes of the Cardinals, made his demaund lawfull, and ratified it: And fo refuming the habite of a person secular, he prepared speedily to go into Fraunce, by whom the Pope sent this comfort and promise to the king, to make it lawfull by the authoritie Apostolike to refuse his wife: And the king, for his part, became bound to ayde him (affoone as he had coquered the Duchy of Millan) to reduce into the obedience of the holy fea, all the townes possessed by the Vickars of Romagna, and withall, to giue him presently thirty thousand duckats, under this colour, that he was constrained to intertaine a greater force for the guard of his person: as though to knit him felf with the French king were to stirre vp many of the Potentates in Italie to seeke to hurt & oppresse him. For the executio of these couenants, both the king began to make payment of the money, and the Pope committed the action of the diuotec to the Bishop of Setto his Nuncio, and the Archbishops of Paris and Roan, And albeit in the trauerse of the cause, the kings wife impugned the judgement: yet in the end, holding for no leffe suspected the consciences of the Judges, then the might and greatnesse of the aduersarie, the tooke comfort in her innocencie & disclaimed her sute, receiving for the entertainement of her person, the Duchy of Berry, with thirtie thousand frankes of reuenue: and so the diuorce confirmed by fentence of the Judges, there rested nothing else exspected, for the dispensing and accoplishing of the new mariage, but the comming of Cafar Borgia, lately of a Cardinall and Archbi-Thop of Valence, become a foldier & Duke of Valentinoys: the king having give him a companic of The Cardinall an hundred Launces and twenty thousand frankes pension; and for his title of Dukedome he in- of Valence dued him with Valence a Citie of Dauphine, with twentie thousand frankes of reuenue: he embar-lentinoys, qued at Ostia vpon the galleys which the king sent him, and arrived about the ende of the same yeare at the French Court, where he entred with a poinpe and pride incredible, and brought with him the Cardinals hat for George Amboife Archbishop of Rean: who, having alwayes afore, participated in the daungers and fortunes of the king, held with him great authoritie, grace, and reputation. This new Duke albeit he was received of the king with great honour and all other offices of Court, yet his maner of dealing was not well liked in the beginning, for that, according to the dire-Ation & counfell of his father he denied that he had brought with him the Bull of dispensation, ho-

hoping that the defire to obtaine it would make the king more easie to affift his plots & purposes, then would do the remembrance that he had received it, ving this reason, that there is nothing enee dureth fo finall a time as the memoric of benefits received, and the more great they be, the more commonly are they recompensed with ingratitude. But the bishop of Setto renealing the truth secretly to the king, who making it sufficient to Godward, that the Bull was dispatched and ratified, confummated the mariage openly with his new wife, without making more demailds for the Bull: the same being the cause that the Duke could no longer keepe from him the Bull autentike and iustified : and finding out after by futtle inquirie, that the Bishop of Setto had reuealed the matter, he caused him soone after by secret meanes to die of poison, the vnfortunate bishop nor remebring that in matters of great effate betweene princes, he that discloseth his secret to another, worketh to himselfe the occasion of his death. The king being now in some stabilitie of minde by his new mariage, began to be carefull to renue leagues and amities with his neighbours, making prefently a firme peace with the king of Spaine, who, bearing now no more regard to the things of Italy, called home all his Embassadors remaining there, except him that lay resident with the Pope, and readjourned Consalmo into Spaine with all his regiment, leaving to Federike all those peeces in Calabria which he had holden till that day: he had a great deale more trouble to accord with the king of Romains, who was newly descended in Burgundy by occasion of some commotions stirring there, being for that expedition, ayded with a round fumme of money by the Duke of Millan, in whom preuailed much this kinde of perswasion, that either the watre which he should make vpon the French king, would turne him from the enterprise of Italy, or at least, if any agreement

fucceeded betweene them, he should be comprehended in it as the king of Romains had affuredly promifed him. But at last, after much discourse of reasonings and meetings, the king made a newe peace with the Archduke, by the which were to be rendred unto him the places of the countrey of Artois, a thing which to the end it might bring effect and profit to his sonne, the king of R omains confented to make truce with him for many moneths, without making mention of the Duke of Millan, against whom he seemed at that time much discontented, for that he had not alwayes satisfied his infinite demaunds of money. Lastly, the French king, ratifying the peace made with the king of England by his predecessor, rejected all solicitations and sutes made to him to receive the Duke of Millanto any composition, who for his part albeit he protested large offers and offices, & vied no leffe corruptions to induce him, yet all his industries and practifes were vaine in the kings fight, who to lay a more fure foundation of the war pretended, fought how he might at one time, tye to him in suertic of anistie the Venetians and Florentines, and therefore he required with great fing requires importunities that ceasing to vex the Pifans, the Venetians would put Pifa into his hands: whereunto the rather to draw the Florenines to confent, he offered fecretly to reftore it to them within a short time. This practife being foundfull of many difficulties, & concurring in it diverse ends and interests, was for many moneths debated with delayes: for that the Florentines (holding it necessary, that in that case they should make alliance with the French king, and searing by the remebrance of the infidelity of Charle, the present businesse should suffer no lesse breach of promise in the king raigning) could not agree amongst themselves, nor consent in vnitie of opinion & counsell; wherin one reason of their disagreement was, that their City was unquietly to sed betweene the ambition of the greatest Rulers, and the vibridled liberty of the government popular, and being reapposed (by reason of the warre of Psfa) vpon the Duke of Millan, the whole Citie was fallen into such generall division, that it was hard to deliberate in peace and quiet vpon matters of importance, some of the principall citizens defiring the victory to the French king, and others of the contrary, bearing their whole affections to the Duke of Millan. The Venetians also, not withstanding all other difficulties had bene ouercome which might hinder the accord, had yet determined not to confent to put Psfa into a third hand, hoping that for the regard of the repayment of their charges, & to leave Pefa with leffe diffionor, they should obtaine better conditions in the negociation that was holden at Ferrara, which was vehemently folicited by Lodowike, both for feare least the deputation of Pi/a falling to the French, both those common-weales would knit with the king; and also hoping that the controuersie being accorded for the profit of Italy, the Venetians would shake off & leave there the malice they had to hurt him: which respects and consideration together with the practise that continued at Ferrara, displeased not a litle the French king: like as also the Pope, to make his profit of the trauels of others, fought indirectly to hinder it : for that standing in great place of credit and fauour with the king so farre as concerned the affaires of Italy, he hoped that making Pyla to divolve by deputation to the king, he shold in some fort participate with a plentifull share.

But as in matters of enterprife, wife-men will debate all things at large, and by how much the cause is waightie and may nourish occasion of many accidents and fortunes, by so much it concerneth the reputation of magistrates and counfellers, not onely to looke into the generall estate and nature of the businesse, but to examine every particular circumstance with a full discourse of reafon, wifdome, & forefight: euen fo in these actions of practile and intelligences, they consulted at Venuce, whether, if the king miffed of his demaund for the deputation whereupon they had deter- The Venetians mined neuer to confent, they might enter confederation with him touching the warre against the take counsell Duke of Myllan, as the king with great importunitie had folicited, and offred them for the reward flood digne of the victory the city of Cremona and all Guiaradadda: an offer, which albeit was greatly deli- with the french red of the all with no small ambition, yet the deliberation seemed to some of them to cary so many king. respects & considerations of importance, & that the power of a french king in Italy but could not bring daunger to their estate, that the matter was brought into the counsell of the Pregati (the chiefest assemblicamongst them) & there was disputed with no small diversitie of opinions and reasons: Amongst whom, one day wherein the last resolution should be set downe, Anthony Grymany, a man for his authority much reucrenced, and for his wildome no lefferespected, perfwaded the relidue of the Senate in this fort.

It is (my Lords) in the disposition of men, a custome vile and odious, to forget what they have The oration of received of their friends, even when they were at point to fall into their full ruine and defolation: many, but it is an vin hankfulnesse roo intollerable, and even saunderous to nature and all natural office, to requite benefits with injuries, and make recompence to the merits & good wils of men, with conspiracies and harmes stretching to the spoyles of those by whose helps and ministrations they were earst preserved. And as in cases of harmes and domages, there is no man that can tell how "fweete is the passion of reuenge, better then he that hath received the hurt: so, the despite of the in-" iurie drawing with it a defire of reuenge, I cannot thinke that it is any iniuffice to be reuenged of him that hath done the first wrong. If therefore (my Lords) you well consider the greatnesse of the good turnes which the Duke of Millan hath received of our common weale, by the which in these later yeares, his whole estate hath received his whole protection and preservation: and of the contrary, looke throughly into the parts of his ingratitude trayning many groffe injuries done to vs, to compel vs to abandon the defence of Pifa, whereunto he gaue vs the first suggestion & encouragement: I doubt not, but making a right collection of his dealings & behaulours past, you will judge against his corrupt properties and conditions, & so not thinke it vnnecessary to be reuenged of him, that hath not thought it dishonest to requite our friendships and well meaning, with iniuries and actions of conspiracie. There can not happen a greater infamy to this common weale, then by the tolleration of so many apparant wrongs, to expresse to all the world that we are come to degenerat from the magnanimity of our elders, with whom this was an aunciet and fetled custome, that as often as they were discontented with offences, they neuer refused to embrace any perill or daunger, to preserve the dignity, reputation, & honour of the name of the Venetians: and not without realon: for that the deliberations of common weales require not regards and ends ab-,, iect and private, and much leffe that all their counsels and actions stand only vpon respects to pro-,, fite. But it is also convenient that they aspire to ends more excellent and honourable, by the which may be increased their glory, & their reputation preserved: A matter which nothing makes so soone, to be loft and defaced, as when there is occasion given to the world to thinke that there is neither valour, vertue, nor abilitie, to be touched with the rememberance of iniuries received, nor no readinesse shewed to be revenged: an action not a litle necessary, not so much for the sweetnesse & ,, pleasure in the reuenge, as for that the iustice and punishment of the offendor, breeds such example to others, that they will have leffe courage to attempt the like: of fuch consequence is that glory, which is found to be joyned with vtilitie, high and honourable deliberations alwayes declaring themselues full of commodities & profits. Thus one displeasure takes away from men many others, ,, and often times, by one onely and short punishment, they are found to be deliuered from many and very long paynes. And yet if we confider the estate of the affaires of Italie, and the disposi-,, tion of many great Princes against vs , together with the ambushes which Lodomyk Sforce dreffeth continually against vs, we may knowe, that we are ledde to this deliberation, no

" leffe by the necessitie present, then in consideration of other things: for, Lodowyk pushed on byhis naturall ambition equal with the hate he beares to this most excellent Senate, hath nothing in more great care or study, then to dispose the minds of all the Potentates in Italie against vs, to set the king co of Ramains in discontentment with vs. to make vs hateful to the whole nation of the Germains. & " laftly, he begins for the same effect to entertaine intelligence and practise with the Turke: you see already with what difficulties (by his meanes & working) yea almost without hope we sustaine the ce defence of Pila, and manage the warre in Calentyn: which if it be continued, it can not be without " heaping greater effects of daungers & disorders : and if it be abandoned without laying other foudations to our affaires, it cannot be but with fo great a diminution of reputation, that it ministreth "a wonderfull courage to who foeuer hereafter shall have disposition to oppresse vs: and it cannot " be vnknowne to all your wildomes, that it is more easie to oppresse him that begins to decline, " then him that flands able to inflife himfelfe in the full of his reputation: of which things the effects " wold clearely appeare to vs, & we shold also see our estate full of tumult & brutes of war, if Lodowik were not kept in suspence by the feare he hath, least we joyne with the frech: A feare which log "time is not able to containe him: for who knoweth not that the king, made frustrate of the hope Which he hath that we will loyne with him, will either attempt fome other enterprife beyond the "mounts, or at least, ouercome with the perfivations & offers of Lodowik, by the meanes of his cor-" ruptions and fauours he hash in the french Court, will fall to fome accord with him. So that in the confideration & comparison of things, necessity to maintaine our auncient dignity and glory con-" straines vs to knit with the frech king, but much more are we compelled by the aspect of the great " and imminent daungers, which can not be auoyded by other meanes: wherein it feemes that for-" tune followeth vs with a special fauour, seeing she brings to passe that we are sought to by so great " a King, whom it is a suft office in vs to feeke and befeech with humilitie, befides that he officeth " ys so great and honourable recompenses of the victorie, as by those helpes and meanes this Senate may fashion great hopes, and employ their conceipts in the plot and compassing of great "things, specially the victorie being to be gained with so great facilitie, and Lodonik so farre too " weake to refilt two powers so mightie and well vnited. It is a vaine seare in my opinion to doubt that the neighbour-hood of the French king when he shall have conquered the Duchie of " Myllan, will be either suspicious or daungerous to vs: forthat in judgemement and forecast it " may be seene, that many things which seeme now contrary, will then be chaunged into fauours " and good disposition towards vs, seeing that such an increase and amplitude of greatnesse to the "french Crowne will breede suspition in the minds of all the principalities of straly, and stir vp the " king of Romains with the regions of Germany, to be discontented that a french King should oc-" cupie so noble a member of the Empire : In so much as even those whom we feare to joyne "in vnitie with Lodowyk to vexe vs , would then defire (for their proper interests) to pre-" ferue vs and be conjoyned with vs. And (my Lords) being great throughout the world the " reputation of our dominions and iurifdictions, and no lesse great the renownee of our riches, and " most great the opinion confirmed with so many honourable examples of our vnion and constan-" cie to preserue our estate : what meane, what courage, what oportunitie hath the French King "to execute any inuation upon vs, vnlesse he have conjunction with more, or at the least, with "the king of Romains: the vnitie and agreement of whom, seemes for many reasons so hard, that " it is too vaine, to occupie our minds either with the hope or feare of it. Befids, the peace which " now he hopes to establish with the Princes his neighbours beyond the mounts, will not be per-" petuall, feeing icalousie, injuries, and feare of his greatnesse will alwayes keepe waking 'all those "that hold him in hatred, or beare enuy to his glory. Lastly, looking into the properties of the " french natures, we neede not doubt but that they are more ready to get and conquere, then "discreete to preserue and keepe: yea, it is annexed to their desteny, to fall easily into the hatred of "their subjects by their pride and infolencies: vpon which reasons I make this conclusion, that "after they have got Myllan, they will have more neede to study how to preserve it, then anie o-" portunitie at all to occupie their thoughts with new enterprises, for that a jurisdiction newly gotten, fayling in order and wife gouernement, doth rather weaken then make more mightie "him that hath got it: wherein we can not have an example more fresh and notable, then the "victorie of the late King Charles, against whom were converted into extreame hatred, "the incredible defires and gladnesse with the which hee was received into the kingdome of

Naples: So that the perils which may fall vpon vs at any time after the victoric of the French king, are neither so certaine, nor of such nature, as for the auoyding of them, we neede to remayne in ,, a daunger present and of great consequence. And to reject (for feare of daungers to come and vncertaine) to large and convenient a part of the Duchie of Myllan, could not but merit imputation of pufillanimity & faintnesse of courage: A thing reprochfull euen in men privat, but much more ,, infamous to a common weale more mighty in glory, riches, and reputation, then euer was any, (except the Romaine, estate) in any part of the world. There happen seldome so fauourable and fit ,, occasions, which being transitorie & fleeting, it is an office in wildome & magnanimity to embrace,, them when they be offred. A wit curious & standing too long in confidering of things to come, is ,, often hurtfull and reproueable: for that the things of the world are subject to so many and fundry accidentes, that rarely doth that come to passe which the wisedome of man seemes to have forefeene, & imagined would happen: and he that leaueth the benefit present, for feare of the daunger, to come (if the perill be not certaine and neare at hand) findes himfelfe to haue lost oftentimes (to ,, his slaunder and displeasures) occasions full of profit and glory, and all for standing in scare of ,, daungers which afterwardes turne to nothing. It is no great matter to fuffer a mischiefe when we are sure of the remedie, and in this case, if there be any mischiefe other then such as we may dif-,, cerne before, which is neuer fo greeuous as when it channeeth vpon the fodayne : yet I haue borne ,, alwayes this judgement, that that aduerfity is honourable which brings with it prosperity, glory, ,, and reputation. For these reasons (my Lordes) I wish vs to accept the confederation against the Duke of Ayllan, for that it puts vs in fuertie for the present, protectes vs against all daungers ,, to come, breedes our credite with all other Potentates, and offreth vs the possession of those ,, great things, which another time we would be glad to get with intollerable expences and trauels, ,, as well for their proper importance, as for that they be lynes to leade vs to high & honourable actions, drawing with them a meruellous augmention of the glory and Empire of this florishing com-, mon weale.

This counfell and forme of reasoning made no small impression in the minds of the others, who heard his reasons with judgement, and fauoured his opinion, recommending much the lively valour of his spirit, accompanied with a resolute loue to his countrey. Against him stood up and reafoned Melchior Trensfan, fingular for his wildom, & excellent in all graces and gifts of the mind.

This hath bene alwayes (touching offences and wronges) a wife observation in countreys and The countrels common weales well gouerned, to make true conference betweene the nature and estate of the Melchier Treiniuries, and oportunities to reuenge: not that those wise-men heheld altogether the propertie wisan. and manners of the wrongs, (for that belongs to passion) but withall they vied to forefee whe- >> ther the hurt in reuenging would not exceed the harmes already happened by the trespasse committed, a forme of dealing which caried not their affections afore their wildomes, but bridling the " readinesse of nature, they oftentimes found more security to dissemble an injury then to reuenge " it. And albeit it can not be denied that the injuryes done by Ledowik Sforce to our common weale, " are many and great, and offend much our dignity : yer, by how much they are great, and by their " property offend our reputation, by so much more belongs it to our wisedome to moderate our " iust anger with maturity of judgement & consideration of the publike interest & benefit: for that, " for men to commaund ouer themselves and vanquish their proper passions, is so much the more " commendable, by how much lesse often it happeneth in vie, and by how much more just are the " occasions that kindle that anger or any other humaine affection: And therefore (my Lords) it " appertaineth to this Senate to the which is ascribed of all other nations the true parts of wisdom & " difcression, & who not long since made prosession to have delivered italie from the french: it is " our office I say to consider well not onely of the infamy that will rife, if nowthrough our occasi-" on they prepare their returne, but also to looke carefully into the daungers that may threaten vs " if the Duchy of Mellan fall into the power of the French King : perils, which if we can not confider of our felues, let vs call to memory what feares were brought vpon vs by the conquest which " the late King Charles made of Naples, of whom we held not our felues affured, but when we con- >2 spired against him almost with all Princes Christians. But intrue coparison, there is great difference >> between the one daunger and the other: for, the late king, naked almost of all the vertues of a king, " was a Prince more in fliadow & thew the in body & Substance: & as the kingdom of Naples, so far " removed from France, held his forces fo devided, that they weakened more then strengtheed his "

copower, so that conquest, (for the feare of their estates, so neare neighbours to the realme of Nace ples) procured him two great enemies, the Pope & the king of Spaine, in whom touching the one cc are occupied for the present many diuerse intencions, and the other made weary with the things of ce Italy, will make himselfe no partie without very great necessitie. But the new king, both for his or proper vertue is to be feared, and for his wife proceeding in this action to be doubted: as also the ce estate of Myllan bordreth so neare Fraunce, that in respect of commoditie to succour or reskew it ce there is no hope to drive him backe, but by fetting all the world in a ffir. In fo much, that we being se neighbours to fo great a power, shalbe fure to be exercised in trauels and perplexities both in peace and warre: Intimes of peace, subject to expenses and suspicions, and during the warres, so entanegled with daungers, that we shall find many difficulties to make our owne defence . And fure I can not but maruell much at him that hath reasoned affore me, who on the one side makes no feare co of a king of Fraunce being Lord over the Duchie of Myllan, and on the other fide holds for terri-66 ble Lodowyk Sforce, a Prince for power much inferior to vs, and with whom this hath bin alwayes a custome, either with fearefulnes or conetons nes, to put in dannger all his enterprises: he alledged « feare of fuccours which others might make to him, as thought were easie, in so great diversitie of spirits & wills, & in so generall varietie of conditions, to make such an unitie: or rather, as if the « absolute concord and vnion of a great and strong power, were not more to be feared, then the " power of many, which as it hath divers ends & motions, so doth it bring foorth actions diverse & discordant : he seemes to have a confidence, that in those, who for hate and many other reasons, « defire our embasement, wold be found that wisdome to vanquish distaines & couetousnes, which we find not in our felues to retain his ambicious thoughts. Befides, I know not why we may make copromife, that the lealoufies and new and auncient disdaines against the french king (aspiring to the « conquest of Myllun) may do more on the behalfe of the king of Romains and the Almain nation, athen the rooted and setled hatred which both they beare to vs, by reason of so many townes which we hold appertaining to the Empire & house of Austriche: Neither can I see you what ground or discourse of reason the king of Romains will more willingly joyne with vs against the french, then ce take part with the french quarrell against vs. No, rather the vnion of the barbarous & perpetuall e-« nemies to the name of the Italians, carietha more likelihood of truth & feems more proper to make ca pray: for that being united with him, he may rather hope to be victorious ouer, vs, then ouer him « if he were knit with him. Besides these, such were his actions during the league past, and when he « came into Italy, that he left no reason why we should so much defite to have him efrsoones reunice ted with vs. I deny not, but Lodowik hath done vs many injuries, but euen foit is farre from counce fell and wisdome, for a passionate defire of reuenge, to put in perill the whole estate of things: And « feeing times keepe their certaine measure and course, and euery time is enabled to his proper « function, it is neither shame nor ill pollicie to respect those accidents and occasions to reuenge, " which a common weale may very well attend and tarie for. No, rather it is infamous and meriteth « imputation, to be caryed with affection, and prefer the suggestion of disdaine afore the oportu-« nitie of the time; and in matters of state, it is no small slaunder, when rashnes and indiscression are « accompanied with domage and generall harmes . No man will fay, that for fuch reasons, we were " mooned to make an enterprise forash, but all the world will judge, that the delire to have Cremoor na hath pushed vs forward, the same giving cause of question to every one, what is become of ce the auncient wiledome and grauitie of this Senate: And justly may all the world maruell, that we are falne into the same rashnesse to be guides to the french king into Italie, into the which our « felues wondred so much that Lodowik Sforce ranne so farre. Great is the profit of Cremona, and or the place very convenient for many respects: but we ought to consider whether it be not a greater ce losse to have a king of Fraunce Lord of the state of Myllan: yea, we ought to consider whether cour greatnesse and reputation be stronger in Italy, when of our selues we are chiefest and most « absolute there, or when there is in the heart of the same region a Prince so mighty and so neareour ce neighbour. We have occupied at other times with Lodowyk, both disagreements and friendships, cc as eftsoones may happen dayly betweene him and vs , neither is the difficultie of Pifa such but « there may be applied fome remedy, and much lefte doth it defectue, that for it we make vs subject « to so great daungers: But having the french to our neighbour, we shalbe alwayes travelled in « discordes, for that occasions will dayly arise in the discretitiy of our minds, in the haughtie pride of e, the french nation, in the hatred wherein Princes do alwayes purfue common weales, & in the ambition bition which the most mightic haue to oppresse the most feeble and weake: for which regard not " onely the respect of Gremona can not allute me, but it dotheuen altonish me, for that in it is ag-. 32 granated the occasion of the french king to vexe vs, which will be so much the more set forward >> by those of Myllan, by how much lesse they can suffer Cremona to be dismembred from the. Duchie . And the same occasion will also stirre vp the Germain nation and the king of Romaines, 32 for that Cremons and Guiaradadda be also members of the jurisdiction of the Empire. At the least 32 our ambition would not be so much blamed, and we should not search with new conquests to " get vs euery day new enemies, and to make vs suspected to euery one .. By reason whereof it ?" must needes come to passe in the ende, that either we must be souereigne and maisters ouerall, or scourged and beaten of all, and which of these two is soonest to happen, it is easie to consider " by fuch a stake not pleasure to beguile themselves: The wisedome and gravitie of this Senate by " how much it is knowne and published through Italie and all the world, by so much more would " the action be infamous and flaunderous, to defile our coings with a deliberation for rafh and daungerous: feeing, to be carried with passion against our proper profit, is nothing else but lightnesse, and to esteeme more daungers that be litle then such as be great, cannot but hold of folly, and " indifereffion: which two thinges being directly contrary to the wifedome and grauity of this Se- 🤒 nate, I hope you will fet downe a resolution so moderate and well aduised, as both your reputation 33 fhall be preserved; and your coustome not broken.

This counsell, albeit was susteined with so many mighty reasons, and sauored of many of the principall and most wife of the Senate, was not for all that of such force, but that the contrary aduife caried the refolution, as well for respect of hatred, as for defire to bear erule, two things which leade men eafily to daungerous deliberations: for, in the hatred which every one had conceived against Lodowik, was neither measure nor limit, and no lesse was the desire to adioyne to the iurisdiction of Venice the citic of Cremona with all the countrey about it, and all Guiaradadda: an enlargement of no small value, for that it yeelded yearely a reuenue of an hundred thousand Duckats: but more to be esteemed for this oportunitie, for that embrasing by this increasement almost all the river of Oglia, they firetched out their limits even to Paw: they amplified also their iurisdiction along the river of Adda, and approaching within fifteene myles of the city of Myllan, and somewhat nearer the cities of Plassance and Parma, it seemed in their coniectures that they had the way opened to occupie all the Duchie of Myllan, as often as the French King was either caried with new thoughts, or troubled with great impediments on the other fide the Mountes: which they hoped would happen within short time, both for the nature of the Frenchmen, who are more apt to get then able to keepe: & also for that their common weale is perpetuall, where, in the kingdome of Fraunce, it often happeneth by the death of kings, that things devolue to alteration, and gouernements and counsels chaunge. They brought also into consideration the difficulties of the french to continue the amities and good wils of their subjects, no lesse for the generall diversitie of, bloud, then for the difference of the french manners from the cultomes of the Italians: So that that fentence eftfoones confirmed by the voyces of the greatest number, they fent to their Embassadors refident with the king to conclude the confederation vpon the offers they made, not speaking in any respect of the affaires of Pysa.

This exception of Py/a did not a litle trouble the king, for he hoped by the oportunitie of that deputation, to write the Venetians and Florentins with him: and knowing that the Venetians were inclined to withdraw themselues by composition from the defence of Py/a, he held it but reasonable, that in that action they should rather have regard to him to make easie the enterptise of Myllan, as a thing nourishing common benefit to them both, then that having better conditions in the composition, to be the causers that the Florentins should remaine loyned with Lodowik Sforce, by whose meane the king knowing that the Negociacion continued at Ferrara, was in no litle doubt, that he should not have on his side either the Florentines or the Venetians, if Lodowyk had power to bring the conference of Ferrara to a good conclusion. And the king wavering in many varieties and sancies of mind, and judging that to be a resolution both vaine & ill adulted, which should leave in neutralitie and doubt both the one and other common weale, and lastly being moved not a litle with the district which they expressed to have against him: he began to incline rather to conclude the peace which continually was solicited with the king of Romans, bearing this condition, that it should be lawfull to the one to make warre vpon Lodovyk Sforce, and to the other to vexe the Venetians. In which disposition of minde, he made answere by the deputies which debated in his name with the Embassadors of Vence, that he refused to accord with the, if for their parts, they gaue not perfection to the deputation of Py/a, wherein he had solicited them before: And in his owne person he assured the Florentin Embassadours that he would never make other agreement with the Venetians, But the Duke Valentinoys and the Agents of the Pope with the Cardinall of S.P.ad vinela, Triunlee, and the other Italians, to whom apperteined many particular respectes and interests touching this warre, would not suffer him to remaine constant in that deuise: They perswaded him with many & great reasons, that waighing with the power of the Venetians, the oportunities they had to annoy the Duke of Myllan, his maiestic could not follow a counfell more hurtfull, then to fuffer him felfe to be deprived of their aydes and fuccors, for feare to loose the favour of the Florentins, from whom, by reason of their own troubles, and that they were farre removed from the Duchy of Myllan, could be drawne no great profite or commoditie to his purposes, Besides, in that action, the occasion would made easie to Lodowyke, not onely to forsake the fauours of the Florentins, but also in reconciling himselfe to the Venetians (a matter which had bene the very fpring and originall of all the difagreements betweene him and that state) to be estsoones reunited with the: by which alteration if there were no other meane to discerne what difficulties and impediments might enfue to the affaires of his maiestie, at the least, the experience of things past gines sufficient warning of it: for that albeit in the league that was made against king Charles, the names of so many kings were concurrant, yet the onely forces of the Venetians & Lodomike, tooke from him Nouare, and alwayes defended the Duchy of Millan against him: They told him that it was a counsell dangerous & deceitfull, to make a foundation vpon the vnitie with Maximilian, in whom the world had feene even till that day far greater attemptes & dispositions to enterprises, then were his meanes and wisdome to colour them. But if his actions brought forth more happy successe then in times past, it ought to be well considered, how enil would agree with the intentions of the king, the augmentation of fo great and perpetuallan enemie to the crowne of France. With these reasons they so altered the inclination of the king, & changed his former counfels, that, without speaking further of Pyfa, he consented and concluded the confederation with the Venetians, wherein was agreed, that at the felfe fame time that his maiestie with a mightie armie she league be- should assaile the Duchy of Millan, they for their parts, should do the like vpo their frontiers: That the king having conquered the refidue of the Duchy, Cremona with all Guiardadda should be for the Venetians except foure furlongs along the river of Adda. Lastly, that after the king had conquered the Duchy of Millan, the Venetians were bound to defend it for a certaine time and with a certaine proportion of horsemen and footemen, the king promising to do the like office for Cremona, and all the rest that they possess in Lumbardie even vnto the marshes of Venice. This confederation was so secretly contracted, that Lodowike for many moneths could not understand, whether they had made betweene them a league onely for their common defence as from the beginning had bene published both in the French Court and at Venice, or whether there was any article that touched him, or made mention to manage warre against him: Such were therespects to keepe the couenants of this league fecret, that the Pope him felfe notwithstanding his strait familiaritie with the king, could have no certaine advertisement of them, but very late.

Conclusion of tweene the French king and the state of Venice.

> The league thus concluded with the Venerians, the king (without speaking further of Pisa) propounded to the Florentines conditions much differing from the former: by which occasion, accopanied with the displeasures which the Venetians did to them, they were estsoones and further constrained to make their stay upon the Duke of Millan, by whose aids as their affaires continually prospered in the countrey of Casentyn, so the enemies receiving many hurts by the soldiers & paifants, and suffering want of victuals and forrage for their horses of service, were retired within Bybienna and other small places, forgetting a necessary diligence to commaund the straits of the Appenine, to the end the way of their fuccours might be kept open, and the meane more affured (vpon the first necessitie) to abandon the countrey of Casentyn with lesse domage. By reason whereof Charles Vr sin was bestowed with his men at armes, and an hundred footmen, for the gard of the straite of Alontalona, and a litle more below, Almano defended the passage of La Vernia. But on the other fide, Paule Ustelli proceeding discreetly and substancially according to his custome, after he had fo restrained them into straits and hard termes, laboured to compell them to abandon the countrey of Montalona, with intention afterwards to drive such as kept the passage of La Ver-

via to do the like, to the end that the regiment of the Fenetsans being wholly penned in Bybienna, and environed on all fides with enemies and hils, they might either be the earlier vanquished, or at least, be driven to consume them selves: seeing their numbers were already much diminished, for that besides those that were stripped here and there, there were departed from the army at sundry times, both for want of victuals, and ill fuertie of their lodgings, more then fifteene hundred horsemen with many troupes of sootemen, who, being set you in the passage of the Alpes by the pailants, received great harmes. In the end the confideration of these difficulties costrained Charles Vr sin with his regiment to abandon the strait of Montalona, not without daunger to be put to the chase, for that many of the Florentin bands (to whom his distresses were known) and companies of paifants embrasing the present occasion, set vpo them on the way: yet the Vrims, having already taken the advantage of the strait, albeit, they lost a great part of their baggage, performed notwithstanding such desence, that the copanies that followed the chase in disorder, tasted of their valour. The example of Charles Urlin (in regard of the same difficulties) was followed by those of La Verma and Chinfa, who forfaking that paffage, were retired to Bybienna, wherein were inclosed the Duke of Urbin, Aluiano, Aftor Baillon, P. Marcell Superintendent to the Venetian companies, and Iulian de Medicis, who were referred for the guard of that place (their only fortreffe in the countrey Casenum) with a strength of three score horses & scuen hundred sootemen. In which distresse they were nourished with no other cofort then a hope in the succors which the Venetians prepared, judging that for the regard of honor, but much more to have better conditions by agreement, it imported them much not to abandon wholly the enterprise of the countrey of Casentin: And as for that cause, the Count Petillane mustred at Rauenna with great diligence the bands appointed for that rescue, whereunto he was sollicited by the perpetuall complaints of the Count of Vrbin and the rest, who signifying that their miserie and want of victuals had brought them to fuch estate of necessitie, that without speedy succour they should be constrained to offer composition with the enemy: euen so, of the contrary, the Duke of Mullan and the Captaines that were in the country of Casentin, nourished a speciall desire to preuent that succour by the expugnation of Bybienna, demaunding, for that ende to be fent foure thousand footemen to iovne with the strength of the campe. But their defire found many impediments, both for that in that countrey cold and full of hils, the nature of the time hindred much all actions and exercise of warre, & also there was no franke readinesse in the Florentins to furnish such provision, partly being ouerwearied with the long and intollerable expences growing dayly to increase, and renouation: And partly for that in the Citie (not in great stabilitie & quiet) was diclosed a new differtion, fome of the Citizens fauouring Paule V wells for his late merites in the warre, and others defiring to raise the Count Riunece for that he had bene an ancient & faithfull Captaine to their common weale, and had patentage of great authoritie within Florence : he loft the hope to manage the first place or dignitic in their feruice, by his misfortune at S. Reall, & very vinwillingly did he endure to haue that degree of reputation transferred to Paule Vitellu & therefore leading his regiment in the countrey Calentin, he expressed no disposition nor readinesse toaduaunce the enterprises, by the which might grow increase of reputation to him whom he had defire to embase. These difficulties also became the greater by the naturall propertie of Paule, who seeking to have his payes beforethe time, could not agree with the Florentin Commissioners, and who oftentimes in the deliberation and expeditió of affaires, possessed him selse of more authoritie then seemed reasonable, & had even at that time without the privitie of the superintendents, given to the Count Vrbin being ficke safeconduite to repasse in suretie out of the countrey Casemin :vnder the warrant of which fafeconduit, Iulian de Orledicis was also gone with him, to the speciall displeasure of the Florentins, who occupied this reason, that if they had made difficultie to suffer the Count Vrbin to passe, his defire to go to recouer his health in his owne dominions, would have constrained him to agree to the deliverse of the bands that were within Bybsenna: but much more did they complaine that Inhan de Medicus should communicate in such a liberall fauour, expressing aforerime manifest a-Etion of rebellion, & euen then was in armes against his countrey. Those differences hindred much that at Florence they neither beleeved counsels, nor agreed to the demanndes of Paule Vitelli, but much more did they proue impediments to the proceedings of the warre, which was not continued with his reputation towards the people, for that not onely many executions of importance were performed more by the pailants then by the foldiers, but also, considering the great opinion

the enemies: wherein perhaps (according to the nature and judgement of peoples) they attributed to the want of will, that which with more equitie they might have referred to want of power, having regard to the sharpnesse of the time, and want of things necessarie. By these occasions (hurtfull to their affaires) and the firength of the foure thousand footenen being too flow in comming, the Count Pettillano had leafure enough to come to the borough of Elcie apparteining to the Duke of Vrbin, & very neare the limites of the Florentins: A place where were before Charles Or sin and Peter de Medicis, and where were assembled all the bands to passe the Appenin, whose fireigth and order (as best agreeable to that countrey desert and rude) stood more your footemen then horsemen, and the most of them arined after the light horsemen. This was the last strength which the Venetians made in the countrey Casentin: and to breake it, Paule Vitelli leauing about Bybienna a certaine forme of a fiege & fufficient guard in the straits and paffages most necessary, marched with the residue of his armie to the strait of S. Stephen, (a towne of the Florentins feated at the foote of the Alpes) to withfland the enemies descending from the hils : But as in matters of daunger, discression and counsell are remedies no lesse assured then courage and execution: fo, the Count Pettillano, having before him, the Alpes loaden with snowes, and at the foote of the Alpes fo great an impediment; together with the strait passages very troublesome to passe, euch when the season is faire: was content to sorbeate to descend or passe, not withflanding with great complaints he was perswaded to it by the Senate of Venice, perhaps more vehement to push him forward, then able to forsee the perils. But albeit they propounded to him dinerse plots and meanes to retire Paule from whence he was, and that already in Valdubagna was done some enterprise of vexation upon the precess of the Florentins, yet he stood resolute in his determination, and would not stirre in any fort, " " in air

The Duke of Millan made aftoni (hed with the le gue, soliciteth an accord betweene the Venetians and the Florentins.

But by how much more coldly the warre proceeded; by formuch more hoatly were recontinued the folicitations and practifes of accord, equally defired of both the one and other partie for diverse regardes, and no lesse followed and solicited by the Duke of Millan: the reason and reapport of the league made betweene the French king and the Venetians, made him formewhat as mazed, and withall drew him to dispositions of hope; that the accord being made, the Venetians would have leffe defire to the paffage of the French, perfwading him felfalfo, that at the leaft (contenting them selues in that tegard with his good will and with his workes) they would be somewhat appaifed, and cut off the rigont of their indignation conceived against him . Therefore interpoling amongst them a meane by Hercules D'este his father in law, he constrained the Florentins to condifeend formwhat to the defire of the Venetians, not formuch with authoritie (for they seeing into his intentions, began to hold him for suspected) as with letting them know, that if the agreement went not forward, his necessities would compell him, for the seare he had of the french king, to turne to their disfauour, and to take from them either all his men of warre, or at least the best part of his trained bandes: The matter was debated many moneths at Ferrara where, after many difficulties disputed, Hercules was required by the Venerums, to come in person to Venice for the more facilitie of the expedition, whereunto he made fome refiftance; but much more the Florentins for that they knew that the Venetran's defired that a copronne might be made in the person of the Duke of Ferrara, against the which they stood: & were very far of. But such were the importunities of Lodowike Sforce, that at last he consented to go thither, & the Florenines to lend with him John Baptista Rodolpho, and Paule Antony Sodoryn, two of the chiefelt and wifelt Citizes of their common weale. The first thing that was disputed ypo at Venice, was to know if Hercules as Arbitrator would put an end to the controuerfie, or as a friend indifferent, would labour to bring them to accord, interpoling betweene the parties according to their order of proceeding at Ferrara, where they were not farre of from resoluing the articles most principall and importing. The Florentines defired that the custome begun should be observed, knowing that Hercules, in as much as might depend vpon his arbitrement, would hold more account of the greatnesse of the Venetians then of them, and pronouncing the sentence at Venice, he should be so much the more compelled to beare respect to the Venetians: And yet though he would do nothing of him selfe. they were affured the Duke of Atillan would induce him, for that he defired greatly to make knowneto the Venetians, that he had ferued their turne in that action. And albeit many difficulties wete almost resoluted at Ferrara: yet both in their last perfection, and in many particularities, the power of the arbitrator was not litle, who, notwith stading the copromise would yet have a liberty to depart from that which was first debated. On the other tide, the Venetians were at a point, if the copromile went not forward, to passe no further, not so much for that they were promised more in the arbitator then the Florentines, as for that there were tifen among fithem many contraricties & objections touching the present matter: for, albeit the greatest part of them were weary with the intollerable expences that increased dayly with a very small hope of profit, which not a litle adununced their disposititions to agreement : yet were there many even in the Senate, who for their experience not so wel stayed as the rest, and for their motions of youth, more forward then would counsell or reason, would not consent to agreement, vnlesse the libertie of the Pysans were wholly preserved, or at least valesse that part of the countrey remained still to them which they possessed when they tooke them into their protection: To which opinion they joyned many reasons, but chiefly they viged a promife ratified by decree publike to the Pifans to protect their liberty, which they could not breake without apparant blemith to their common honours, and perpetuall staine to the reputation of their common weale. Some others, made easie touching all other articles, were immoderate in the quantity of the expences, which they required to be repayed by the Florentins in abandoning of Pyfa: A request which they commended to be very reasonable, for that it was no lesse iust for the Florenins to make recompence of the charges, then for the Pisans to make restitution of that they held in possession. But the chiefe wisedome and authoritic of the Senate, had a counfell contrary: who, founding more deepely the estate of things, preferred still with many importunities the confideration of the great charges, wherein as good flewardes of the treasures of their common weale, it was a just office in them all, to be carefull and circumspect: They saw nothing but dispaire in the defence of Bybienna, and lesse possibilitie to sustaine any longer the generall quarell of Pyla, without increase of new troubles and charges, for the many difficulties that still appeared, as well in succouring them, as to divert and draw away the forces of the enemies, the Flor rent ms having objected impediments farre about their expectation in the beginning. Befides, they confidered that albeit the enterprise against the Duke of Myllan might be supposed easie, yet the French king, being not pacified with the king of Romains, and standing subject to diverse impediments ordinarily hapning at home, might by many aduentures be hindred and made flow to profecute the warre: And though he should put it to action, yet in the businesse of warre, many daungers vnlooked for & difficulties no leffe intricate, may chaunce dayly, either to the ytter difappointing of his purposes, or at least to alter his disposition. But about all trembling at the great preparations which the fayd Baiazet Ottoman made both by fea & land to inuade those parts towardes Greece, their resolution was, (seeing their necessitie was more mighty then their inclination) that it was both just, reasonable, and necessary, rather to consent that honestie in some part should give place to vtilitie, then, in standing obstinatly vpon their promise and faith given, to personer & nourish as it were a perpetual interest in troubles, charges, and perplexities. And because they were well affired that thefe conclusions would be hardly conferred to in their counsels, (albeit they knew from the beginning that of necessitie they must be allowed) they had (whilest the negociation was at Ferrara) wifely procured, that by the counfell of the Pregate should be given sulnesse of authoritie touching the affaires of Py/a, and the resolution of the accord, to the counsell of the Dieci, which is a counfell compounded of a leffer number, none being called vito it but such as be of greatest gravity and authoritie, which contained the most part of those that most defired the accord. But now the folicitation continuing at Venice, and being in no trust to be able to' dispose the counfell of the Pregatito confent to the articles which had bene debated at Ferrara, and knowing withall, that if onely the countell of the Diece condificended to them, there might rife occasions to charge those that affished it: they solicited that the compromise might be made, hoping that touching the judgement that might come of it, men would rather transferre the imputation to the arbitror then to them, and that more eafily would that be ratified which had bene already published in fentence, the that which should be consented vnto with the party entreating by way of accord: So that after those things had bene debated for certaine dayes, (the Duke of Millan threatning the Florentins refusing to compromit, to withdraw immediatly all his copanies out of Tuskan) there was a free and absolute compromise for eight dayes in the person of Hercules Duke of Ferrara, who, after he had well confidered of all things, pronounced the fixt day of Aprill, that within eight dayes next folloing the Venetians and Florentins should ceasile to offend one another, and that by the next S.Markes tyde all the bands, fuccours, & aydes of either parties, should retire and returne into their countreys: that the Venetians at the same time should make issue out of Pisa and all the places thereabouts, all their regiments of foldiers, which they intertained there: That they should abandon Bybienna with all other peeces taken vponthe Florentins, and they to pardon to those of Bybicana all their faults & trespasses: That for the recompence of all charges (which the Venetians affured to amount to eight hundred thousand duckats) the Florentins should be bound to repay them in twelue yeares, fifteene thousand duckats by the yeare: That all the offences should be pardoned to the Prians, to whom should be suffred to exercise by seaand land all forts ofsciences and marchandife, and to remaine in their guard all the fortresses of Pifa and those other places which were holden by them the day of the sentence: but vnder this charge', that if they bestowed garrifons of the countreymen or others, that they should not be persons suspected to the Florentins, & that they should be payed of the reuenues which the Florentins should collect of Pifa, increasing neither the nubers of men nor the payes accustomed afore the rebellio: That if the Pilans thought good, they might deface and difinantle all those citadels and fortresses of the proper countrey of Pifa, which had bene recoursed by the Florentins for the time the Venetians held them in prote-Ction: That within Psfa the first instances of causes civile should be judged by a Podestat straunger cholen by the Pifans of a place not suspected of the Florerms, that the Captaine cholen by the Florentins should not medle but with causes of appellation, & have no power to proceede in any case criminall cocerning bloud, banishment, or confiscatio, without the counsell of a superintendent to be chosen by Hercules or his successors, and of fine Doctors of law which the Pisans should name to him: That the goods moneable & viimoucable occupied by the one and other partie, should be restored to whom they appertained, not making restitution of the fruites, of the which every one was absolued: That in all other things, they should suffer the Florentins to enjoy fully their rights in Pifa and the territorie, forbidding the Pifans, that neither for the regard of the citadels and fortreffes, nor for other cause whatsoeuer, they should practise or conspire any thing against the common weale of Florence. This fentence was no sooner published at Venice, but there were heard through the Citie great complaints even of the nobilitie, against the Duke of Ferrara, and those special Senators which had managed the whole action: The most of them, construing great blame to that faith should be broken to the Pifans, with so many infamies to the maiestic of the common weale, complained vehemently, that the article touching the expences of the warre was past ouer with so light confideration. The discourse of this agreement inflamed not a litle the Embassadours of the Pylans, who being before the fentence cunningly entertained by the Venetians in many promifes and hopes, that vindoubtedly they should remaine in full libertie, and that not onely the residue of the countrey should be adjudged to them but haply also the port of Lyworne, made the resolution so much the more gricuous to them, by how much the effectes sell out contrary to the perswasios wherein they had bene nourished. In so much as they began with publike cryes to appeale to the equitie of the Senate, to whom they complained, that the promifes to protect their libertie fo oftentimes reiterated by the Senate, under the affurance of whose faith they had not onely rejected the amities of all other Potentates, but also refused farre better conditions offred by the Florentins, were vnworthily defiled and broken, their fecuritie being not prouided for but with vaine apparaces: for, what degree of fafety was that, or how could they be affired that the Floretins reeffabli-Thing their magistrats within Pifa, and their marchants and subjectes returning to trafficke there, & on the other fide their paifants, who had ferued as a principall member in the defence of the Citie, retiring to their houses and farmes would not bring under their jurisdiction by some propertie of fraude, the whole gouernment of their towne? having withall so many oportunities, but chiefly the guard and commandement of the gates. And how could there but lurcke intention of infidelitie vinder that fuerty, where we holding the fortreffes, & fuch as were appointed to the guard of them, were to be payed by the Florentins, & not to be lawfull in a time to doubtfull, to bestow a stronger guard then had bin accustomed in seasons peaceable and assured. The pardon for the trespasses committed, was likewise a thing vaine, seeing the Florentins had good meane to destroy them by wayes judiciall and by judgements: for that the matchandifes and other goods as had hene made pillage in the time of rebellion, amounted to fuch a value, that in recompense they would not onely dispose and confiske our substances, but also in such a reuengefull authoritie our persons should not be affured from imprisonment. But to cut off the importunitie of these complaints, the principals of the Senate brought to passe the day following (although the terme of the compromise was expired) that Hercules, (to whom the generall indignation of the citie brought not a litle seare) added to the senate published, a declaration without the knowledge and printite of the Florentins: that wider the name of fortresses, was comprehended & meant the gates of the towne of Pisa, with other peeces that had sortresses, or whose guard, & intertainemers of the Podessa & superintedet, should be assigned to the Pisans a certaine part of the reuenues of Pisa. And that the places not sufficiently where senate in the state of the Church, of Mantua, of Ferrara, & of Bologna, not comprehending therein soldiers of other places. That touching restitution of goods, there should neuer be speech of it: That it should be in the power of the Pisans, to name the superintendet, brone in any place not suspected: That the captaine should not proceed in any cause criminall, show litle source it were) without the superintendent: That the Pisans should be well intreated of the Florentins according to the custome of other noble Cities of Italie, & that there should not be imposed up of the any new charges.

This declaration was not folicited for any defire the Venetians had that it should be observed, but somewhat to qualifie the just importunities of the Prsan Embassadours, and so to justifie them felues to the counsell of the Pregate, that if the libertie of the Prfans were not altogether obtained, at the least they had so well prouided for their sucrtie and comoditie, that they could not be charged to haue palled them ouer as a pray or left them abandoned: So that in this counfell of the Pregari, after much discourse of disputation and reasoning, at last what with consideration of the conditions of times, and the difficulties to maintaine Pifa, but specially for feare of the Turkes armies, it was resolved, that the sentence should not be ratified with an expresse consent, but that things which were of greatest importance should be put in execution, making to cease within eight dayes all offences, and drawing all their bands out of Tuskan at the time determined, with intention to medle no more with the quarell: yea many of the Senators began to defire, that the Florentins should rather recourt Pifa, the that it should fall into the power of the Duke of Millan. At Florece, after the renour of the sentence was comunicated to the citie, most of the multitude began to murmure in their mindes, and not onely held them selues oppressed in this, that they must make repayment of the expences of the warre to those who had vniustly vexed them: but much more for that it feemed to them they liad obtained no other thing but the naked and fimple name of Lords, feeing, both the fortreffes were in the guard of the Pifans, and the administration of criminal instice (one of the principal mebers to preferue estates) could not have his course without their magistrats: Neuerthelesse, the same protestatios of the Duke of Millan which had induced them to copromit, constrained the to ratifie it, & hoping with all that within a litletime, by industry and good behauiour to the Pifans, they might redreffe things in a better forme: they ratified by name the sentence published, but not the additions and declarations which were not yet come to their knowledge.

But farre greater were the indignations & doubts of the Pifans, who moued not a little against the name of the Venetians, and lealous of some greater deceit, assoone as they understood the reapport of the sentence, discharged their soldiers from the guard of the fortresses and the gates: and not fuffring them any more to lodge in the Citie, they flood many dayes in great variation and doubt, whether they should accept the conditions of the sentence or not. On the one side, seare, being the instrument of compulsion, ouerruled their wils, standing now abandoned of all consfort and counsell: and on the other fide, the generall hate they bare to the Florentins, made their paffions to redouble, and kept them refolute. But much more did retaine their inclination to constancie, their desperate exspectatio to obtaine pardon for their heavie & infinite transgressions, whose qualitie they held so much the more great and intollerable, by how much they had put the state of Florence to infinite expences and harmes, and many times had brought into termes daungerous, euen their proper libertie. In these doubts and diversities of mindes, the Duke of Millan counselledthem to give place, offring that he would worke so much with the Florentines that the conditions of the sentence should be more in their fauours and to their aduantages: yet, they, to make triallif he remained still possessed with his ancient couetousnesse, determining in this case to give the felues wholly to him, they fent to him Embassadors. But at last (such are the deltinies of minds drawne and deuided) after many thoughts and variations, they determined rather to make triall of all extremities, then to returne under the yoke of the Florentins, whereunto as the Psfans had fecret incitation by the Genomays, Lucquoys, and Pandolph Petrucci: So also it was not doubted of the Florentins but that the Duke of Millan (the truth being other wayes) had encouraged them to that obstinate resolution, so litle exspectation is there of finceritie and saithfull actions in that man, whom the world hath taken into opinion to be double and futtle.

The Pifaninos

Thus the Florentins, being out of hope to recocile Pifa by accord, thought they had a great occord are bester casson to vanquish & force the Citie: and therefore, causing Paule Vitelli to returne estsoones inged by the Flor to that countrey, they leuied with ready diligence the prouisions demaunded by him: But whilest that strength was assembled and in preparing to action, the daungers of Lodowike Sforce increased wonderfully, for that his interpolition into the accord had in no fort appailed the mindes of the Venetians, who, for hate to the man, and hope of their profite, were wholly in defire to conspire his ruine. To these distresses of Lodomike, was joyned this further adversitie, that Maximilian was nothing foready to make warre on the French king, as he was importunate in continual demands of money of Lodowike: yea, contrary to his many promifes, he prolonged the truce for the whole moneth of August next, taking from him at one time the hope that he had that his succors would stad him in more stead, the had done his cousell to divert the warre. Maximilian also, being vnited with the league of Sweaden, began warre upon the Swiffers declared rebels of the Empire for many controuerfies betweenethem: which warre continuing on both fides in great furie, with fundry accidents and fortunes on both parts, Lodowike began to affure himselfe, that in no necessitie, he could hope for fuccours from Alaximilian, vntill that warre against the Smiffers tooke end, cither by victorie, or composition: And yet Maximilian, promising him that he would neuer accord with the French king or with the Smiffers, without comprchending him init, Lodowike was still conftrained to refurnish the expences of that warre, and to entertaine the Emperours prodigalities with new supplies of money. This occasion was not vnknowen to the new king of Fraunce, who confidering how much it imported him, to have the Pope and the Venetians for him, effecmed litle the pertivations of many of his counfel!, that in regard he was newly afcended to the crowne, and his treasures very ill furnished, he might put off the warre till the yeare following: But the king framing his hopes according to the importunities of his defire, imagined a possibilitie to obtaine the victorie in few moneths; and therefore casting in his conjecture that in such a shortnesse of time, the service could not suffer great necessities of money, entred into open preparation for the warre, alwayes furnishing the Sweffers afore had with some proportio of money, to the end to keepe Maximilian in bufineffe: for which cause the Duke of Wallan, discerning such manifelt tokens of the warre, laboured with a wonderfull diligence & care not to be alone in fo great daungers: wherein bauing an absolute distrust in all possibilities and meanes of accord or reconciliation with the Venerians, and finding in the king of Spaine an inclination suspitious, & (notwithstanding his many folicitations) a careleffe remembrance of his perils, he turned his eyes to the contemplation of other helpes, and founding in one instant the wils almost of all other Potentats, he sent Galear is counte to Maximilian and the Smiffers to negociate an agreement betweene them. And as aductifitie is mighty to make men fearch the operation of all counfels: fo, Lodowike knowing, that according to the Popes defire, the mariage of Charlotta with his sonne Cafar Borgia, could not well fucceede, for that the young Lady either moued with the loue and authoritie of her house and parents, or elfe gouerned by the perswasions of the French king (in whom notwithslanding were expressed many faire apparances to the contrary) refused with great constancie and resolution of minde, to make him her husband, if withall he put not an end to the affaires of Federike her father. who offred to the French king yearely tribute with very large conditions. Lodowike labouring vponthese occasions, had hope, to alien and estrange him from the fauours he bare to the enterprises of Fraunce, foliciting him with many importunities to draw him into confederation with him, wherein he promifed the affociation of king Federike and the Florentins, with many faire offers, that aswell he as the confederates, would contribute with him in a common succour against the Vickaires of the Church, and indue him befides with a great quantitie of money to purchase some honorable estate for his sonne. These offers, as the Pope at the first motion seemed to heare them with a diffembled eare: fo, in the end he was contet to give them leave to vanish & become meerely vaine: for, hoping to receive by the societie & favours of the French king, benefits and farre greaterliberalities, then those which he looked to obtain if Italie were not filled full of the forreine armies of France: he cosented that his sonne excluded already from the mariage of Charlotta, should take one of the daughters of the Lord Albrer, who, for his affinitie with the bloud royall, and for the greatnesse of the estates and livings, was one of the greatest in all the kingdome of Fraunces But Lodowy's to whom appeared daily more tokens and testimonies of the enill inclination of the Venetians, ceasifed not by expresse soliciters (but in secret maner, king Federyk concurring in the fame action) to flir vp against them the Prince of the Turkes, hoping that being affailed and vexed by him, they would have no oportunitie to moleft the state of Myllan. And being withall well aduertifed of the preparations which the Floreneyns made to have Pifa, he laboured, under offers of all forts of fuccors to them, to bind them to his defence with three hundred men at armes and two thousand footing after they had recovered Psa. On the other side, the french king required importunatly their promife to refurnish him for one yeare with five hundred men at armes; and for recopence he offred to bind himfelfe, affone as he had accomplished the conquest of Millan, to minister to them for one whole yeare the succors of a thousand Launces, for the advancement of their enterprises, with promise that he would make no accord with Lodonyk, if not at the same time they were not repossed of Pila, & their other places withholden: besides, he wold bring to passe that the Pope & the Venetians should joyne to their protection, if (afore the conquest of Mellan) they fell into any necessitie of defence. For which demands so contrary & full of variety, the Florentyns flood wavering in their resolution, no lesse for the difficulty of the matter then for their devision of minds: for, Lodowsk requiring their aid but in case that they recovered Ps/a) the succors that he promiled were far more present & certaine, then the helps promised by the french king, in whom they judged litle oportunitie of action to the aide of Pifa, for that, being abandoned of every one, they determined to haue it that former Befides, many were moved with the memory that the Venerias were confederat with the french king against Lodowyk, for that he had ministred to them in their perils: but much more inoued them the searc of despite, least in refusing to gratifie his demands, he would hinder them to get Psfa, a thing which he might eafily do. And of the contrary, looking into their owne infirmities, and feeing no possibilitie of power to result the french king and the Venetians, it feemed a counfell daungerous to make themselves enemies with a king whose armies they exspected within few moneths to runne over all Italy. And the memoric of the favours received of Lodowyk in the warre against the Venetians (to the which they referred the original of all their dangers) was cafily defaced by this confideration, that the rebellion of Pifa was first kindled by his meanes: and that nourishing alwayes ambitious desires to aspire to the jurisdiction of it, he had sustained them, and for many moneths joyned the supportation of others, conspiring in those times many other wrongs and injuries against the Florentines: so that they referred more imputation to his offences, then benefite by his fauours, which yet he did not communicate in liberalitic and franknesse, but by the impatiencie and intolleration he had, that the Venetians should not take from him that which with hope and ambition he had long fince judged to be duly appertaining to him: they fell at last into this last doubt, that if they declared them selves for Lodomike. the French king aduancing the meanes and oportunities he had by the Pope and Venetians, might many wayes hinder them in the recourring of Pifa. In so much, as conferring the nature of the perils on both fides, with their condition prefent, they determined in the end, not to stirre either in the fauour of the French, or the Duke of Millan, but to apply the time to the aduauncing of the enterprise of Pifa, wherein they reapposed nothing in fortune nor forceine aides, but judged their proper strengthable and sufficient, not forgetting for all that, to entertaine Lodowike with shewes and shadowes and nearetokens of hope, least he should take occasion to object impediments, dalying with him in those deceiptes, which to their hurtes they had oftentimes experienced in him. Therefore after they had for many dayes made delayes in answering, they dispatched at last a Secretarie publike to giue him vnderstanding, that the intention of the common weale was conformable to his defires as touching the effect, but concerning the maner there was fome difference: for that as they had made a full refolution, that affoone as P_{ifa} was recovered, he should not faile of the fuccours he had demanded: so they defired him to confider how perillous it was to contract their promise under expresse couenant, for that in free cities, such things being not to be dispatched without the consent of many, there was no possibilitie to hold them secret, & being disclosed, they wold give occasion to the french king to draw the Pope & the Venetians to readminister succours to Pia: by which it would come to passe that their promise would bring harme to them selues, and proue vnprofitable to him, for that Prabeing not taken, neither should they be bound to him, neither were they able to helpe him: for these reasons they sayd and esteemed that faith and promise might suffise given in words with the consent of the chiefe citizens, vpon whose authoritie all their publike deliberations depended: That for other occasion they refused not to couenant with him by writing, but offred him for end for better declaration of their will and intention. that if he knew any other meane whereby his defire inight by fatisfied, and so great domages auoided, they would be as ready to execute it in deede as they required him to hold them assured in good will and affection towards him. By which answer subtill and full of art, and for that also they did not accept the offers of his fuccours, Lodonyk faw there was no hope left to have bandes of fouldiers from them, and leffe expectation of succors from other parts, for that the comforts promiled so continually by the king of Romains proued very vicertaine, no lesse by his naturall inconstancy, then for the impediment of his warres with the Smyffers. And for Federyk, where he promised to send him a strength of source hundred men at armes, and five thousand sootmen under the leading of Profee Collonne, he doubted not so much of his will (for the defence of the Duchie of Millan turned to his profit) as of his disabilitie and delayes: And Hercules, his father in law (reproaching almost the auncient injuries done by him in the composition of Polesma answered him with excuses, & that it brought no small griefe to him to be restrained to succour his distresse, for that the lands of the Venetians iovning so neare to the gates of Ferrara, he was constrained to be carefull ouer the suertie of his ownne estate.

Lodowyk himself against the king.

Lodowyk thus made naked of all forreine hopes, & driven altogether to reappole in his strength frengthineth and comforts at home: began carefully to fortific Auon, Nouare, and Alexandria de la Paulle, townes standing in the mouth of the first perils and inuations of the french; his resolution was to fend out against the fury of the french army Galeas de S. Seueryn with the greatest part of his strength, and to oppose the residue against the Venetians, under the government of the Marquis of Mantua, notwithstanding a litle after, either by indiscression or by conetousnesse, or for that there is no power to relift the counsels of God, he became estraunged from the Marquis: for that falling into this vaine perswafion, that the Venetsans (against whom the Turke had opened the warre aswellby land as by sea with a wonderfull preparation) would have no oportunitie to molest him, being constrained to defend their owne estates against so strong an enemie : and desiring withall to fatisfie a particular humour in Galeas S. Senerin, whose ambition could not brooke that the Marquis should enjoy a title more honorable then he, he began to make difficulties, as refusing to pay him a certaine remainder of old payes, & required of him othes & cautions not accustomed for the affurance of his faith: And also notwithstanding that afterwards being advertised that the Venetians dispatched many bands of men into Breffe, to be ready to enter into the war at the same time that the french should begin it, he sought by the means of the Duke of Ferrara his father in law, to reconcile him to him, yet the difficulties could not so soone be resolued, as the daungers appeared, growing daily both more great and terrible: for the Duke of Sauor, being eft soones coniouned with the king, fet at liberty all oportunities and passages for his bands to march continually through Psemont, and to be beflowed about the confines of Aft. And to the hopes of Lodomyk appeared daily tokens of declination, for that king Federak, either by disabilitie or by negligence, was flow to minister to his perils: and that small remainder of hope which he entertained as his chiefest comfort, that the Florentyns having once gotten Ps/a, wold fend to his succours Paule Vitelly (whose valour held great reputation in all the parts of Italy) was cut from him by the diligence of the french king, who, debating with their Embassadors with words sharpe and full of threatnings, wrought fo much with their common weale, that they made him fecret promife by writing to minister no aide at all to the Duke of Myllan, a promile, for the which they received in recompence no couenant or graunt of him . Lodowyk leauing the Count Caiazze on that fide to the Venetians with a very small companie not sufficient to any great resistance, sent Galeas de S. Seneryn beyond the river of Pam, with an army of a thousand fixe hundred men at armes, a thoufand fine hundred light horsemen, ten thousand footmen It alians, & fine hundred footmen Allemains, but more with intention to defend his places, then to refift in the plaine field: for that he efleemed it most to his profit to entertaine and hold things in delay, chiefly for that he had dayly espectation of the conclusion of an accord solicited in his name by the Viscount, betweene Maximilian, and the Sveyffers: which if it were accomplished, he was fedde with many promifes of mightie fuccours, which other wayes he could not onely not hope for, but it was verie hard for him to draw any proportions of footme from those quarters, for that by the troubles that Were

ploit of war, other then certaine light incursios, vntill the regiments of the Lord de Ligny, Eberard, Aubigny, & Tryvulce, were passed the mounts: for that, albeit the king was come to Lyonand the bruite ran that he would passe into Italy in season convenient, yet he referred things to directi- king discendesh on, appointing the march of the army to be gouerned by his Captaines. The strength of the french meetialy, army was a thousand fixe hundred Launces, fine thousand Smyffers, foure thousand Gascoins, and four ethousand of other natures of fouldiers in Fraunce: with whom, assoone as they were drawne into an army accomplished and bestowed under their seuerall Guidons and leaders, the Captaines erected a Camp, and the thirteenth of August, planted it afore the Rocke Arazze: scituate vponthe shore of the river Tanare: And albeit, it was garded with a strength, of five hundred footmen, yet was it taken within a very short time, the fury of the Artillerie being the cause, and no lesse the cowardise of the Garrison that were within: from thence they drew their Campe The frenchmen to Anon, a litle village along the high way to Ast and Alexandria, vpon the bankes of Tanare take increpeeand right ouer a gainth Arazze. And being strong by the propertie of his situation, the Duke of ces in the Du-Myllan had eftsoones fortified it certaine moneths before: And albeit Galeas. S. Scueryn who chy of Myllan, with his armic had taken the field neate Alexandria, was well aduertised of the losse of Arazze, and had determined to fend to the succours of the other, bandes of footmen better resolued, for that the feuen hundred bestowed there first, were of the new leuies and not trayned to the warre: yet he could not put his deuise in execution, for that the French men, to cut offall recourse of fuccours thinker, had manned Sillizana which is betweene Alexandria and Anon, and that by the sufferance and confent of the Marquis of Mont Ferat Lord of the place: In so much, that they that were within Auon expressing in action and experience no better proofe of their valours. then aunswered the expectation and opinion of most men, fell into the daunger of the French, who, after they had first battered the Suburbes, and afterwards shaked the walles of the towne in foure feuerall quarters, they enforced it in two dayes and likewife the Castell, making slaughter of all the footmen that were thither withdrawne. The successe of which enterprises (whose furie vanquished all resistance, and the suddennesse ouercame all opinion and expectation) brought fuch aftonishment to Galeas S. Seneryn, that he retyred with all his army into Alexandria, colouring his feare with an excuse, that both in his souldiers wanted valour, and in the people was litle faith towards Lodowyk: which timerous resolution stayning not a litle the reputation of a Generall, gaue occasion of greater courage to the french, who drew their Campe within foure miles of Alexandria, and at the fame feafon tooke Valence plentifully stored with Artillerie and souldiers, and that by the treason of Donat Raffagum of Myllan, at that time Captaine of the Castle, corrupted by the promises of Tryvulce: This Captaine let them into the towne by the Castle, beheld with his eyes all the fouldiers that were within either flaine or taken, & Ottanian baffard brother to S. Seneryn made prifoner: fo buffe is the humor of treason, that in whom it aboundeth, "> it rageth without respect to time, person, or the selfe partie in whom it worketh: for, this Captaine 20 twenty yeares before falfifying his faith to Madame Bonne and the yong Duke tohn Galeas, delivered vp to Lodowyk Sforce one of the Portes of Tortona, the felfe same day that he put the frenchmen into Valence. Thus fortune following the victors, & the victors applying to the fauour & oportunity of the time, the frenchme as a violent thunder running ouer the whole countrey Bafigmana, Voguera, Newcastle, & Pont Corona, yelded to them without refistance, as also the cattle and towne of Tortona, from whence, Anthonso Maria Paluoi sin gouerning the Garrison there, retired beyond the River of Paw without tarying for any affault. The advertisement of these accidents being come to Millan, Lodowik Sforce, feeing afore his eyes nothing but a lamentable face of all extremities, and that his estate hastned with a violent swiftnesse to his ruine, became confufed(as hapneth in fuddaine extremities) both in counfell and courage, and had recourfe to those remedies, wherein (men being accultomed to runne to them when thinges be so farre afflicted, Lodowil mustes that they be almost brought to the last despaire) they declare to every one rather the greatnesse rethall the inof the daunger wherein they are, then that they receive profit or comfort by them: he caused to habitants of mullerand enroll all themen of the towne of Myllan that were able to beare armes, and caufing househ to reconyfing perfwafions accompanied with words and ieftures pitifull that if they thought he had at any time roo heavily burdened them, that they would not ascribe it to his disposition and nature, not to any defire to heape to himfelfe a particular treasure, but rather to the estate of the times, & dangerous conditions of lealy, no leffe for the greatnesse of the Venetians, then for the descending of the late king Charles of Fraunce, matters for their importance very lealous, & for which, his particular interest constrained him to those actions, to the end to be the betterable to protect the peace & furety of that state against all oppressions & inuasios, judging that he could not shew a greater affection to his country & his people, then to forefee they shold not be trauelled with wars: That the fruits which they had reaped made good testimony of the inestimable profits they had gathered by fuch a pollicy & countell, feeing they had lived many yeares under him in great tranquility. & by that benefit their city raised into a wonderful estate & maiesty of riches, reputation, & glory, as was well expressed in the aspect of so many pompes, glories, & honors, with the multiplication almost of infinit sciences and inhabitants: benefits, wherein the towne & Duchy of Millan, doth not only not give place, but doth exceede all other Climats & regions of Italy: That they should reméber, that he had gouerned them without bloud & cruelty, & with what affability & readinesse he hadheard every one, & that he onely (aboue all the Princes of his time) without bearing respect to the paines & trauels of his perfon, obferued the dayes appointed for publik audiences, & alwayes had given to every one a ready expedition & vpright iustice: That they should beare respect & remembrance to the merits & gracious behauiors of his father, who had gouerned them rather in an affection of children, then in the property and condition of subjects; and withall to set before their eyes, how hard & greeuous it wold be for them to beare the proud & infolent yoke of the french, who, for the neighbourhood and neareneffe of the realme of Fraunce (if they once came to commaund ouer the state of Myllan) would plant there their perpetuals dwelling, & chase out the auncient inhabitants, an impiety which heretofore they had exercised upon all Lombardy. To these reafons he added the confideration of the barbarous maners of the french nation, & to joyne all together with minds resolute for the defence of their countrey & proper safety, not doubting but if their refistance vanquished the first brunt of daungers (which like a storme wold be violent & but short) but the residue of the actio wold be easie, for that this was a property infallible in the french nature, to be more furious to affaile, then constant to continue, & for that also he had in expectation a speedy and mighty succour from the king of Romains, who, being alreadie compounded with the Smyffers, prepared to reskue him in person, like as also the regiments which the king of Naples fent to him vinder the leading of Prosper Colome, were on the way, and did march: Lastly he made them beleeue that the Marquis of Mantua (all the controuerfies betweene them being now refolued) was already armed, & with three hundred men at armes entred the countrey of Cremona: to which succours and forces, if he might adioune the readinesse and faith of his people, he made himselfe assured against his enemies, yea if their army contained all the power of Fraunce. These perswasions were heard with more diligence then profit, & served him to as litle purpose, as rhe forces which he opposed against the french: for feare of whom, waighing lightly the present daungers of the Venetians, who had begun the warre in Guiaradadan, & taken the towne of Carange with other precess neare the river of Adda, he called backethe Count Casazze with the most patt of those bands which he had sent for the defence of that quarter, & caused him to march to Pauya to joyne with Galeas for the defence of Alexandria. But, as fuch as have their destruction "determined, are feene to decline by degrees, so his ruine was aduaunced on all sides: for the Count Caiazze, was a litle before at a fecret accord with the french king, being more caried with distaine The Count Ca- that Galeas his brother, younger in yeares, & of leffe exercise & experience in armes, was preferred before him in the gouernement of the army, and in all other honors and fauours, then with the memorie of the innumerable benefits which he and his brethren had received of Lodowyk. Some are of opinion, that Lodonik was advertised of his revolting certaine monethes before, and after many deepe cogitations of the disposition of the man, he answered at last with many sighs to him that gaue him the aduertifment, that as he could not be perswaded of so great an ingratitude, so, if it were a thing true, it was an euill whose nature resisted all remedies, and for his part, he knew not in whom to reappose confidence, fince in his fauorits, and familiars, and such as had most commucated with his liberalities and benefits, were found dispositions of treason: Affirming (with compassion bringing teares) that he esteemed it not a calamitic lesse huttfull to deprive himselfe by a

vaine suspition of the service of personages faithfull, then by too hasty & light credulitie, to reappose his furety in the faith of those whole behauiors gave occasion to doubt them. But in the meane while, the Count Catazze makes a bridge ouer Po to joyne with his brother, & entertaining with cunning delayes the execution, whileft the bridge is in worke & labour he deferreth to passe, The different notwithstanding the french army was two dayes afore, entred into Alexandria which they did rable flight of batter: and Galear whose strength was a thousand and two hundred men at armes, a thousand & Galeas from two hundred light horsement, with three thousand footmen, in the night of the third day without Alexandria. the privitic of any of the Captaines except Luke Maluezze, fleeth secretly out of Alexandria with a part of the light horsemen, giving the whole world to know to his great dishonour, and no lesse reproch to the wisdome of Lodowyk, how great difference was betweene the sport to manage a Courfer, & run at tilt and torney with huge Launces (exercises wherein he exceeded most Italians) and the office to be a Captaine of an army: And how much those Princes beguile them selues to their harmes, who, in the election of men to manage and comaund ouer affaires of daungerous importance, beare more regard to the fauour of fuch whom they choose, then to their vertue & ability. Affoone as it was knowne in Alexandria that Galeas was fled, fuch as remained in the army (example doing much in cases of aduerstie) began in general tumult, to show disorder, disobedience, and all the other euils that inflict an armie abandoned: some fled, some hid themselues, and some wandred at aduenture without all hope of fortune: by occasion whereof, the french army (running with the oportunitie) entred the towne at the breake of day, and not only stripped all the souldiers that were there, but with an vubridled libertie of warre, put the whole city to facke. There ran a bruite, that Galeas was commanded by fecret letters subsigned with the name of Lodowyk Sforce, that for a certaine mutinic then rifen at Myllan, he should retire thither immediatly with all his bands: But fome were of opinion that the letters were falfly made and forged by the Count Casazze, as by that meane to make more easie the victorie of the french: The letters Galeas was wont to show afterwards for his justification, as though he had bin charged by the same, to abandon rashly his armie, and not to leade it safe into places where he knew he could leave it in security. But to what inuention fo euer the letters were referred, or to what intentions fo euer they were interpreted, his excuses are not so credible, as it is holden most certaine with all men, that if in Galeas had bin found any reputation of a Generall, any counsell of a Captaine, or any courage of a man resolute, he might have made easie the desence of Alexandria, and all the residue beyond Po, with the strength he had: wherein happily fortune would have honored his valour with good succeffe, for that one part of the french army, being passed the river of Bornia a few daies before, and by reason of the sodaine raines falling, albeit they were inclosed betweene the rivers of Bornia and Tanaro, yet Galeas had not the heart to fet voon them, not withflanding he was told that certaine of his light horsemen, issued out of Alexandria by the bridge vpon Tanaro which joyneth the subuerbs to the city, had charged them, and almost put to the chase the first battell.

The losse of Alexandria brought no litle astonishment to all the residue of the Duchy of Myllan, not only afflicted more and more with fresh calamities, but also so much the more neare his peril & ruine, by how much the frenchme having passed their army over the river of Po, were gone to befrege Mortaro, which made them of Panya put themselves in accord with them: And the Venetians, having taken the rocke of Caranage and passed the river of Adda vpona bridge made for prefent feruice, commanded almost all the countrey even to Loddy, the whole residue of the places being for the most part drawne into rebellion. And as, when aduer sties come, they thunder all at once, to even at Myllan there was no leffe confusion and feare, then in the other places, for that the multitude, being now weary of their long expectation of chaunge, and the particular factions of Citizens drawing to Monologies and private counsels, the whole city conspited and tooke atmes, and that with to flender reverence to their Lord, that his treasurer general The treasurer comming from the Castle from soliciting affaires with him, was slaine at noone dayes in the of Myllan ftreetes (particular hatreds working no leffe in the confpiracie, then the counfels of fuch as defi-flains. red innouation and new things : by reason of which accident, no leffe insolent in the maner, then bloudie in the matter, Lodoveyk entring into great feare of his person, and standing naked of all hopes and pollibilitie, determined to auoyde the present daunger, not by his vertue to refift, but by his policie: & deuifing to leave the Castle of Myllan in good gard, he found no better Lodowik aban-

person the true aspect of his calamities, he sayd he would solicit Maximilian to come to his ayde and fuccours, having already concluded, or at least held for resolved, the peace with the Swiffer: following this refolution, he fent away his children accompanied with the Cardinall Ascannes (come from Rome not many dayes before to fuccour as well as he could the affaires of his brother) & with Cardinall. S. Seneryn, with whom also he sent his treasure, very much diminished from his auncient proportion : for it is credibly knowne to many, that not eight yeares passed, Lodowik, to make a glorious bragge of his power, thewed to many Embaffadours and others of respect, the estate and substance of his treasure, which at that time, as well in money, as in plate of gold and silver, (befides Iewels & wealth of other natures in no small number) amounced to a Million and an halfe of Duckats: but at his departure, according to the opinion of men, it contained not a reckening of two hundred thousand. Assoone as his children were departed, he appointed (not with stan-Barnardine de ding many of his friends laboured to turne him) for the gard of the Caltell Barnardinde Corto borne at Paura, whom he had nourished & brought vp of long and being at that time Captaine of trust by Lodothe castle, he preferred the faith of him, afore all opinio & trust in his brother Ascanius offring to take vpon him that charge: he lest for that defence three thousand footmen under the authority of Captaines in whom he reapposed most, with proportions of victuals, munitions, and money, sufficient for many moneths. Touching Genes and the affaires there, he determined to recommend them to the honour and confidence of Augustin Adorne (gouernour present) and to his brother John, to whom (the better to affure his faith) he had joyned in marriage one of the fifters of the .S. Senerins, and sent them foorthwith the assignation of the Castle. he departed the second of September with his eyes full of teares, accompanied with the Cardinall of Este, and Geleas S. Seneryn, and for his fafety by the way, he had Luke Maluezze with a good troupe of men at armes & footme. And as he was issuing out of the castle (decay of fortune traynes with it all forts of discomfort) the Count Caiazze, feeking to shadow his disloyaltie with some colour, met him and fayd, that feeing he abandoned his estate, he held himselfe acquited of the oth of warre which he had made to him, and from thence forward to be in full power to professe

what feruice he would : and at the instant the Count disclosed to him the titles, names & enseignes Count Caia XX: of the army of the french king, into whose pay he entred immediatly with the selfe same regiment which he had leavied with the treasure of Lodomyk: who from Coma where he left the Castle in the power of the people, went along the river, to Belleasia, & from thence (being set on land) he passed by Bormy & all those places, where at other times when he was in glory & selicitie he had received Maximilian passing then into Italy, rather as a Captaine to him & the Venetians, then with a maiestie & estate of a king of Romans . Betweene Coma and Bormy, he was pursued with bands of the french & the companies of the Count Caiazze: from which places, leaving garrifon within the Castle of Tyran occupied not many dayes after by the Grisons, he tooke his way towards Spruch, where he understood was the person of the Emperour. After the seedes of aduersity be fown, there is no long expectation for the fruits, which draw to their effects with a swift course, e, euen as when the cloud is gathered to his thicknesse, there is an apparance of raine, with a disposition ready to disperse the storme that long hath bin in breeding : for Lodomyk was no sooner departed, the the inhabitants of Millan, despatching Embassadors to the french Captaius (approching with the whole army within fixe miles of the city) consented with ready and franke wils to replaces of the Duchie of Atyllan made their example a sufficient occasion to reuolt: The Citie of Cremona which was beset with bands of the Venetians (whose yoke the inhabitants abhotred) would also have done the like, if the french king, that yet would not breake the contract made with the Venetias, had not compelled the towne to be redred to them. And as in calamities, generall examples induce wonderfully, so the Citie of Genes, followed this vniuerfall revolt, (the Genes, people, and familie of the Adorneys with John Lewes de Frefque, friuing who should give vo the Citie vnto the king.) And to the end that with fo great and sodeine ruines against Lodowik (losing in eight dayes so mighty an estate) the world might also discerne the examples of ingratitude, the captaine of the Caltle of Millan, choien aboue all others for the reputation of his faith and vertue, not abiding so much as one bullet or any forme of assault, deliuered to the French king within twelve dayes after the departure of Lodowike, the Castle, which was supposed to be impregnable: and received in recompence of so great disloyaltie a great proportion of money, a company of an hundred Launces, a perpetuall pention, with many other priviledges and graces : but with fuch infamy and hate even amongst the French, that being eschued and rejected of every one, and persecuted with scornes & reproches, he dyed of thought within few dayes after, tormented belike with shame & the spirit of his conscience which are two mighty and most assured scourges to vexe traitors and faithbreakers. The Captaines assigned to him for the service of the Castle, did communicate in that infany, but chiefly Philippin de Feisque, who, trained vp and advaunced by the Duke, and left there for the credite and opinion of his faith, joyned him felfe to the confent of the Caltle keeper to betray their charge (being both made blind with one powder of corrupt promises.) The king receiving at Lyon the newes of so great a victory, succeeded with a speed swifter then his exspectation, made way with great diligence to Millan, where, being received with a loy of the peo- The French ple, equall to the fortune of his victorie, he agreed to the depoling of diverse tributes and impoli- king commeth tions, which as it is an action first requisite in Princes newly possessed of conquest, & a fauour most to Millan. plaulible to people altered: fo they of Millan, rayling their delires about reason or order, were not fully fatisfied for the opinion they had that the kings liberalitie would make them free from all exemptions: he distributed honorable gifts of revenues to many Gentlemen of Millan, and amongst other things gaue Vigeneua to John Jacques Triunlee in recompence of his merites.

In the leife same seasons that the French king ranne this fortune against the Duke of Millan, The taking of Paule Vitelly, having now reassembled the bands and provisions of the Florentins to cary with Casina. more ease, the victory of Pyla, planted his campe afore the towne of Casina, which, not with standing it was fufficiently manned and victualled, with a wonderfull strength of trenches and rampiers, was taken, after the summons of the artilletie, within lesse then sixe and twentie houres: for that, the defendants, beginning now to feare the great ruine which the artillerie had made of their wals being of no strength, joyning with the forceine soldiers that were within, rendred the place, & compounded onely for their lives and goods, leaving the Commissioners & soldiers of the Pisans wholly to the arbitration of the victors. Immediatly after this, (one euill following another,) the towre builded to guard the mouth of the river of Arne, and the bastillion of the poole, being abandoned of the Pisans, yeelded at the summons of one onely trumpet: the malice of fortune confounding the valour & vertues of men.) So that the Py (ans held no other peeces within the whole countrey then the Calle of Verrucole and the litle towre Askanius, which suffred no vexation of the enemies, both for the incommoditie of the river of Arne, which hindred all actions of invalios or affault, and also being so neare Pyla, it stood possible to speedy and ready succours, the importance also of the enterprise required not the losse of so much time: In so much as there remained now no more to get but Pyfa, which was an enterprise very hard (according to the discourse of Pifa. fuch as founded things with discressional well for the fortresse of the town, as for the nubers, vertue, & resolution of the me that were within it. For, albeit there were within Pifa no forreine soldiers other then Gurlin de Rauenna with some very smaltroupes, who comming at first in the pay of the Venetians, remained still possessed of that service after their regiment was withdrawne: yet there were no small numbers of Citizens and paisants well worthy of account, both for that by a continuall experience of fine yeares, they were made seruiceable & fit for the warre, and also they nourished such an immoueable resolution of the minde not to returne estsoones under the power of the Florentins, that they held for nothing all other adversities how grievous soever they were: And albeit there were no ditches nor trenches before the wals of the City, yet were they very thicke, & Pifa hath neiof auncient building, with stones so well couched by the facultie of the lyme and fand proper to thertrench nor that countrey, that their refillaunce was more mighty against the artillerie then is the common fort of wals, and by that benefite, afore they were beaten flat with the earth, the defendants had time and leafure to teenforce their rampiers. But thefe defences, confidered with all the other ftrengths of the Citie, could not stay the disposition of the Florentins, who, being determined to assault it, were stirred to it the rather by Paule Vitelli, and Riunce de Marciano, who gave no small hopes to take it within fifteene dayes. And having mustred together a strength of ten thousand footner, with many Guidons of horsemen, and drawne together according to direction, many other great prouifions, Panle planted his campe there the last of July, not (as many adulfed him, & the Florentins defired) on that fide to Arne to intercept succours that might come from Lucqua: but on the other fide the river right oner against the bastillion and towre of Stampace: where he occupied this reason, that either in taking that fortresse he might the easilier cary the towne, or in respect of the great commoditie of victuals brought from the boroughes about the hils, or at least by some speciall forefight or coniecture that he had, that the Pifant not suspecting the siege to be planted on that fide, had not begun any rampier there as they had done on the other fide. The batterie containing twentie peeces of great artillerie, beat upon the bastillion of Stampace and a great part of the wall as well on the right as left hand, namely from S. Anthonie vntill Stampace, and from thence vntill the watergate, or gate towards the sea built upon the banke of Arne. And of the contrary, the Pifans (ioyning their labours to their daungers) rauelled day and night, and with them their wives & other fortes of women no leffe resolute and well disposed then themen: in so much that their valour and labours were some refistance to the furie of the enemies, for that in very few dayes, they had made right against the wall that was battred, a rampier of a great height and largenesse, and a ditch of more then commo depth, being nothing amazed to fee many of their companies slaine directly with the bullet, & many wounded with the reuerberation of the same. The shot also so thudred vpon the foldiers in the campe, together with the artilleric from the towne, fpecially from a platforme that was upon the towre of S. Marke, that the whole campe was constrained either to remoue their tents to have better coverture, or elfe to pitch their Cabinets within the ditches. Many dayes past in this forme of action, wherein albeit they had throwne to the ground a great quantitie of the wall from S. Anthonse untill Stampace, and had reduced that fortreffe into fuch termes, as the Generall hoped to obtaine it without great difficultie, yet, to make the victorie more easie, he continued the battery fro Stampace till the gate to the sea, entertaining in the meane while many skirmiflies betweene the wall which they battered, and the rampier, fo farre separate from the wals that Stampace remained wholly without the rampier. In one of these skirmishes the Count Rinnece was hurt with a shot of an harguebuze. The Generall determined, assoone as he had won Stampace, to plant there his artillerie, & also vpon the wall which he had battred, by which meanes, gining (in the flacke) upon all that fide which the Pifans defended, he made his hope of the victory almost certaine. He made at the same time fal towards the rampier (to the end the ditch being filled, the foldiers might enter with more ease) one part of the ruine of the wall which was betweene Stampace and the rampier, which being already shaked, was not now supported but with proppes and matter of wood. On the other fide, the Pilans, who, in defending were altogether dirested by the counfell of Gurlyn, had made towards S. Anthone certaine murthering houses within the ditch, to the end that if the enemy descended, it should not be filled up by them: they had also bestowed upon the rampiers towardes S. Anthonie, much artillerie, and placed their footemen at the foote of the rampier, to the end that things drawing to straits and extremities, they might be opposed with their proper persons against their enemies. At last, Paule Vitelli not willing to deferre any longer the taking of Stampace, the tenth day after he had planted his campe there, gaue the affault at the breake of day: and not with flanding his foldiers were grieuoufly vexed with the artillerie of the old citadell, yet, their proper vertue preuailing aboue their present daunger, & the presence of their Generall assuring much the victory, they tooke it, both with a fortune more speedy, and an action more easie then was looked for, & with such a terrible amaze to the Pisans, that abandoning their rampiers, they fled in all quartets of the citie, yea many, amongst whom was Peter Fambecourte a noble citizen with forty croffebow shot on horsebacke which he had in charge, fled out of Pifu:many did the like, without that the Magistrates made refishance at the gates, in so much as if others of the cape had followed the fortune of that morning, they had caried the towne to the great glory of the Captaine, to whom had bene most happy the successe of that day, which indeede was the beginning of his calamities: for that, not knowing (to he excused him selfe) of the occasion that hapned without thinking of any such, and being not determined to give the assault with

with all the campe, nor to other place then to that towre, he fent not his men-onely to affault the rampier where they shold have found no resistance, but also he made retire most part of his sootebands and they understanding that the fortresse of Stampace was won, desiring to make a pillage and pray of the towne, ran thither by heapes to enter. And in the meane while the Pifans (a bruite running through the Citie that the enemies followed not the victory) pulhed forward by the lamentable cryes of their wives and women, who encouraged them rather to chuse death, then to line under the yoke of the Florentuis, began to returne with a new valour to the guard of the rampiers: amogst who, Gurlin remembring that from a part or Jawine of Stampace bending towards the towne, there was a way that led to the gate of the fea which they had before filled vp with earth and wood, and fortified on that fide to the campe, but not on that part that looked to Stampace, he caused it to be rampiered and filled up on that side, and casting a platforme of carth, he cut off the entrey on that part with the artilleries that were bestowed in slanke. Assoone as Stampace was won, Paule caused to be mounted there certaine Falcounets and port peeces, which shot thorough the towne of Pefa, but offended not the rampiers, which albeit were much afflicted with the artillery that was planted below, yet the Pifans redoubling in courage by the importunitie of their daungers, abandoned them not. At the fame infrant they battred the murthering house towards S. Anthonie, and the water gate, and the defences (Paule Vitelle not ceaffing to labour to fill up the trench with earth baskets, the more easilie to take the rampier: Against which oppressions the Prfans, rifing in courage, in that they had tecciued the night following from them of Lucqua a fuccour of three hundred footemen, hurled into the trench many fortes of wildfiers: and labouring with a wonderfull resolution of mind and diligence to constraine the campe to abandon the towre of Stampace, they turned directly thither a very great port peece called Bufole, by whose furiethe campe was compelled to difinount the artilleric which they had moured aboue; And albeit Paule caused to be braked against it certaine port peeces of his, by the which the mouth of Bufole was choked and broken, yet, sparing not for all that to shoote, they brought in certaine dayes the towre to that reason, that Paule was constrained, not onely to remove his artillerie, but also to abandon the place. Notwithstanding all this, the Generall would not make himselfe frustrate of the hope he had to cary in the end the victorie, which, (according to his custome) desiring to have with the most fuertie, and the least hurt to the armie that could be, albeit in many places there was more the fine hundred yeards of the wall vpon the earth, he laboured continually to increase the batterie, to fill up the ditches with earth, and to fortifie the towre of Seampace, to replant new artilleries, & to beate in flankerhe great rampiers which the Pifans had made, labouring with all pollicie and industric to winne alwayes some commodifie to give with more sucreie, the affault general & determined: which last exploit (not with stading he had brought things into that estate that as often as he would have followed the affault he might have had great hope of the victorie) he prolonged willingly, to the end the harmes of the army might not deface the honour and reputation of the victorie. And albeit the affiftants of the Florentins (to whom every litle respit was troublesome) and the cotinual letters and messages from Florence, ceased not to hasten him to the assault, the better to prevent those impediments that might happen: yet Paule flood firme in his owne counsell, which, albeit might happely be discreete and according to the experience and discipline of warre, yet, it had a contrary fortune: for that the countrey of Pifa, which is full of lakes and marishes betweene the next fea and the Citie, being in that feafon of the yeare subject to ayres pestilent, and specially on that fide towardes the campe, there came voon the armie in two dayes many diseases, which so wasted & weakened the body of the campe, that when Paule gaue order to prepare to the assault the foure & twentieth of August, he found so many of his regiments made ynprofitable & ynable for service, that those that remained whole & disposed, sufficed not to maintaine the affault: which vnhappy accident, albeit the Florentins and he (who was also ficke) laboured to helpe by leanying new bands offootemen, yet, the influence of the ayre contending against their industrie, made the infection so vehemet, that every day the diminution wasfound greater then the supply. In so much that their long hope of victorie being now turned into another habit both doubtfull and desperat, and fearing harmes both more speciall and importing, he determined to leavie and breake up the campe: A refolition much refifted by the Florentins, who aduised him that leaving garrison suffi- Paule leaving cient within the fortreffe of Stampace, he would reapose with the armie about the confines of Pi- the sieges (2. thot of the Pifans: And drawing the whole armie to the way of the feathe fourth of September, and not able to trayle his artilleries by land to Cascina, for that the wayes were drowned with waters, he embarked them in the mouth of the river of Arne to convey them to Lynorne. But fortune friging against him in this last action, many of the artilleries were funk in the waters, & a litle after drawne vp againe by the Pisans, who at the same time recoursed effloores the Towre that gardes the mouth of the river. By these occasions (the services yea and faith of men, are interpreted by opinion) the ill disposition conceived alreadie by the people of Florence, was so redoubled with the Magistrates, that within few dayes being called to Cassina by the commissioners, vnder colour to consult into what places they should distribute the companies, he was made prisoner by commandement of the sourraigne Magistrate of the towne, and from thence sent to Forence: where the fame night he arrived, being painefully examined by torments, he was executed by the head the day following by sentence of the Magistrate, his brother being almost taken in the same daunger and fortune: for that as the Commissioners sent to apprehend him in the fame instant: fo, being ficke of the disease he had taken in the Campe, he made semblaunce to obey them: and rifing out of his bed, he converted the time that they gave him to arraic him, into deuties and directions to feale away: In formuch as beguiling with diligence, the fecuritie of the Florentyns, he was in one instant with the helpe of his servantes, well mounted upon a horse of speede and flying to Prsa, he was received with generall gladnesse of the whole inhabitants. The principall pointes wherein they quarelled with the life of Pawle Vitelly, and condemned him, were thefe: That it proceeded of his will onely that Psfa was not taken, having good meane and oportunitie thereunto the fame day that the rocke of Stampace was forced: That he onely did deferre to give the affault: That he had many times given audience to men comming to him from Pria, and neuer communicated with the Florentyns: That he had leuyed the Campe against the publike commandement, and with the like contempt had abandoned Stampace: That he had drawne diuerse others of the Captaines to occupie with him Cascina Vicopisan, and the artilleties, to the end that in payments and other conditions they might manage the Florentyns as they thought best: That in the countrey Casensyn, he had had secret intelligences with the Medicis, and at the same time treated and almost concluded with the Venetians, to serue them when the time of his pay with the Florentyns should be determined, which now was almost expired: That, in that respect he had given safe conduct to the Duke of Vrbynand to Iulian de Medicis . He was strattely examined upon all these pointes, and albeit he confessed nothing particularly, yet they cut off all further examinations, and fearing leaft the french king (now come to Myllan) would vrge his deliuerie, they proceeded to execute him speedily. Not one of his seruantes which after his death were examined at leafure, would confesse any thing, saving that he was much discontented with the Florentyns, for that they had made the Count Riuncee concurrant with him in authoritie, and for the difficulties they vied in the expedition of prouisions which he demanded, and sometimes in his affaires particular, not forbearing at Florence to speake ordinarily to his dishonour: by which testimonies and confessions of his servantes, albeit some remained posfeffed of this opinion, that he behaued himselfe not loyally in his charge, having a pretence to be Lord of Pisa, and to occupie some other part of the demaine of Florence, where he entertayned many intelligences and amities: yet the most part beleeued well of his innocencie, and were perswaded that he nourished a great defire to take Pisa, for the reputation and glory that would

The french king, being now arrived at Ayllan, all the Potentates of lealy except king Federik. came to him, some in person, and some by Embassadors, some to congratulate his victorie, and some to justifie themselves of the imputation to be more inclined to Lodowik Sforce then to him, and fome to feeke fuertie of him hereafter of their proper estates. The king received them all gracioufly, and compounded with them all, but diverfly according to the diversitie of conditions, & according to the greatnesse of the profit which he might draw; he tooke the Marquis of Mantua into his protection, and endued him with a companie of an hundred Launces, with an honorable pension and the order of S. Befides, the authoritie of Trinulce was no small impediment to the purposes of the Florentyns, for that aspiring a mbitiously to the Lordship of Pysa, he favoured wholly their cause, who defired to receive for their Lord either him or any other in whom was abilitie to defend them against the Florentyns: who were generally blamed by the mouthes of the whole Court for the death of Paule Vitelly, as to execute without occasion, a Captaine of so great merit, and to whom the Crowne of Fraunce owed much in honour and friendship, for that his brother was killed and he made prisoner in the french service during the warres of Naples under the late king Charles. But in the end, the king inclining more to his proper profit then to things vame, entred into compolition, by the which his Maiettie receiving them into his protection, bound himfelfe to defend thein against all men with fixe hundred Launces and foure thousand footmen, as a fo the Florentyps to defend his estates in Italy with foure hundred men at armes and three thousand footment That the king at their requelts, should apply that ayde of Launces, and (if neede were) a thrength of artillerie, for the recovering of Psfa & the places occupied by them of Sienna and Lucqua, but not of those pecces which the Genomays held: And that, if these companies were not demaunded of him before, he should be bound, when he sent an armie to the enterprise of Naples, to convert either the whole or part of it to this expedition : That the Florentyns, if they recovered Pifa, and not other wayes, thould be bound to minister to him for the conquest of Naples five hundred men at armes, and fiftie thousand Duckats to defraie the payes of the Swylfers for three moneths: that they should restore to him thirtie thousand duckats which Lodowyk Sforce had lent them, rebating (according to the account which lohn lacques Tryvalce should make) so much as they had payd or dispended for him: Lastly, that they should take for Captaine generall of their men of warre, the Prefect of Rome, brother to the Cardinall S.P.ad Vincla, at whole instance it was demaunded. In so goodly an occasion, the ambition of the Pope slept not, who, soliciting earnestly to have promise kept with him, the king gave to the Duke Valentinois (comming with him out of Fraunce) three hundred Launces defraied vpon the treasures of the king, & guided by Tues D' Alegre, & foure thousand Swy fers under the charge of the Bailiffe of Dyon, but paid of the Popes purse, which companies were for his ayde in the warre which he meant to make vpon the Vickaires of Romagna.

The townes of Romagna, vexed with others that are subject to the Church with sundry accidents have bene for many yeares governed with a jurisdiction almost separate from the demaine of the Church: for that some of the Vickaires paid not their tributes as they ought in homage of The Rate of Superioritie, others payd them, but with difficultie and hardnesse, and for the most part out of sea- Romagna in fon But they all indifferently without licence of the Popes , purthern schues in pay with other the time of the Princes: wherein much leffe that they made exceptions not to ferue themagainst the Church, Duke Valenties but of the contrary, they bound themselves to protect them even against the authoritie and armes "". of the Popes, being so much the more plausible to those Princes, by how much they were conucnient for their feruice, both for the oportunity of their estates and forces, and with all to hinder that the power and pride of the Popes should not swell and rife aboug order. Into much that the Duke Valentynois, as foone as he had obtained of the king the bands promifed, and joyned them to the regiments of the Church, he entred into Romagna, where he tooke with a speede & fortune aboue his exspectation, the city of Ymola by accord, & that about the later end of the yeare athousand foure hundred ninetic and nine, a yeare wherein Italy being afflicted with so many emotions, felt also a scourge by the Turkes armies; for, Baiazet Ottoman having affailed with a mightie armie by fea, the pee-The descending ces which the Venetians held in Greece, sent by land an armie of fixe thousand horsemen to pray the countrey of Fryull, and finding it without gard, they ouerranne it, making pillage and burnings euen vntill Lyuence : and having taken an innumerable proportion of prisoners, when they came neare the river of Tagliamente (to returne with the more ease) they referred such as they thought they might leade with them in fafety, and made cruell murders of the others. And as it is a cuflome infallible with fortune, not to let happen one mischief vnaccompanied, so in Greece, the affaires of the Venetians trained no better fucteffe, for that Anthony Gryman Captaine Generall of the army which the Venetians opposed against the enterprise of the Turkes, was accused to have let flip the occasion to vanquish the enemies that issued out of the port of Sapience, and another time at the mouth of the Gulphe of Lepante: And after he was deposed and another preferred to his place, they cyted him to Venice, recommending the information of the cause to the counsell of the Pregate, where that cause was debated many moneths with no small exspectation of the issue (his authoritie and greatnesse defending him on the one side, and on the other part, his accusers pursuing him with many arguments & testimonies. It was afterwards ordained to be celebrated from fifty yeares to fifty, and in the end reduced to fine and twenty. But for the more solemne memory of his primitive institution, the hundredth yeare was celebrated with a greater affluence of people then the others.

Dule Valenti. mis taketh Furly.

In the beginning of this yeare the Duke Valentinois, obtained without refishance the City of Furly, the Lady of the place having fent her children and riches most precious to Florence, and abandoned that which the could not defend, did determine to hold onely the Citadell and Rocke of Furly refurnished with sufficient strength of men and artilleries. She had a valour about the property of that fex, and a refolution more refembling a man then a woman, wherewith entring the place the studied to her great glory how to defend it. But the Duke Valentinois, after he had affaied in vaine to dispose her to yeld, began to batter the wall of the Citadell with a great furie of attilletie, the same bringing downe to the ground a great quantitie of the wall, with the which the earth of the Rampier which was behind being choked, filled almost the depth of the ditch or trench, and made the entrie more cafie to his fouldiers. By meane whereof, the defendants falling into feares and doubts, gaue place to their perils and abandoned the place, feeking to retire into the Rocke, whither the Ladic made also her retraite after she had performed all that could be required in the office of a defendant. But, as when things are in aduerfitie, many occasions concurre to advaunce the end: fo as the entred the Rocke, feare raifed a tumult and confusion. and the Dukes fouldiers comming fast youn them, almost all her companies were cut in peeces, and the Victors entring with the same furie into the Rock, tooke it, & made slaughter of all such as were there for defence, except certaine of the chiefest, which were retired with the Ladje into a Towre, who were made prisoners, & she also communicating in their fortune, whom the Duke (hauing more regard to her valour, the to her kind) fent prisoner to Rome, where she was kept in the Caltle of S. Ange, being not with stading delivered a litle after at the request of Yue D'alegre.

After the Duke had obtained Ymola and Furly, he marched to the execution of other townes, but new accidents happing villooked for, hindred his expedition: for, after the French king had The Frech king established the things he had gotten, with orders convenient, and having prolonged the truce returneth into with the king of Romaines, (comprehending therein the Duchie of Millan and all that he held France, having in (taly) vntill the moneth of May next enfuing, he returned into France, leading with him fiff fet order the litle sonne of John Galeas given to him indiscreetly by the mother; he dedicated him to a mo- of Millan. nasticall life, & left lohn lacques Trinulce gouernor generall of the Duchie of Millan, in whom he reposed much, as well for his valour & merits, as for the great enuie he bare to Lodowyk Sforce. But (the faith of men changing with the alteration of kingdomes) the peoples of that state kept not fidelity with the king: partly for that the cultomes and behaviours of the French were intollerable to many, and partly for that they had not found in the king that liberalitie in depofing all their tributes, which vnwifely they perswaded theselues to obtaine. And lastly it imported much, and was very grieuous to all the Gebelyn faction, which was mightie in the towne of Millan and confines, that Triunice chiefe of the Guelffes should be preferred to the government. This evill disposition was wonderfully augmented by him selfe, who, bearing a nature factious, and a spirit haurie and busic, fauored (vnder the authoritie of Magistrate) much more then was convenient, Diferders in those that were of his partie. Besides (he that is falling shalf ind many stumbling blocks) he estran- the French goged much fro him the minds of the communaltie, for that in the open market place, he flue with uernment in his owne hand certaine Butchers, who, following the rashnesse of the other populars resulting to Millan. pay tributes, fio the which they were not exempted, refifted with force, the ministers deputed to gather the reuenues: for which tyrannous and bloudie reasons, most part of the nobilitie & communaltie, naturally defirous ofnew things, wished the returne of Lodowike, & even began to call vpon his name with words and voices plaine and to be vnderflood. But after many thoughts and cares trauelling commonly minds afflicted, and redoubled with a lamentable remembrance of his happinesse past, Lodowike with his brother Askanius presented himselfe to Maximilian, of whom they were received with an humanitie expressing both compassion and comfort, for that he did not onely perfwade them to be refolute in their fortune, but also shewed many tokens to be much discontented with their calamities: he nourished them with continual promises to descend in their aide in person, and with a strong armie to joyne with them for the recourse of their estates, having thereunto good oportunitie, for that he was then at accord with the Swiffers. But those hopes, both for the variation of his nature, and for that his intentions ill grounded, were as eafily confounded, appeared enery day to be more vaine; and that so much the rather, by how much being continually pressed with his accustomed necessities, he made them wearie with his importunate demaunds for money: in formuch as Lodowik & Askanius making no foundation of his fuccours, and leffe certaintie in his hopes and promifes, determined to make the enterprise of themselues, being continually solicited by many gentlemen of Millan, & did leavy for their better ftrength, eight thousand Swiffers, & fine hundred Burgonion men at armes: of which strong preparation Triunice gathered many seares and doubts, & therfore, the better to encountet so great a danger, he sent immediatly to the Senat of Venice to cause their copanies to march along the river of Adda, fignifying withall to Tues D'alegre, that it were necessary to leave for a time the service of the Duke Valetmois, & return with speed to Milli with the Frech me at armes & the Swillers. And as dangers hastie and sudden can suffer no delayes of remedie, & where the fire beginneth first to kindle, there let water be speedily applied to preuent his further violence. So fuch was the pollicie of Triunice, that to relift the first furie of the enemies, he fent one part of his fouldiers to Coma, (the icalouse he had of the people of Millan not suffering him to turne thither all his forces:) but the care and quicknesse of Sforce and his brother, prevailed aboue all diligence in orhers, for that not tarying for the whole armie they had leavied, but leauing order to march after them with speed according to the necessitie of their perill, they passed the mountaines, & with a diligence aboue all expectation being embarked in those vessels which were in the lake of Coma, they approched neare that towne, which they tooke without refiftance (the French being retired for the knowledge they had of the ill disposition of the inhabitants. The brute of the losse of Coma (fame flieth with swifter wings in cases of renolt & change, then in any other matter) being come to Millan, so altered the minds of the people, and almost all the chiefelt of the faction Gebelyn, that they began to draw into manifest rumult, and rife into fuch infolent disposition, that Triunlee seeing no other remedie to the kings affaires, retired sodeinly into the Castle, and the night following sled to Nouaro, together with the men at armes which were retired into the Parke joyning to the Caltle (the people in their retraite following bandon Millan them by heapes vntill the river of Thefin): and leaving within Novaro four hundred Launces, he with the residue of his strength went to Mortaro, thinking (& the other Captaines also) that they should more easily recouer the Duchie of Millan with the new succors that were to come ,, out of Fraunce, then be able to defend it being thus decided : Such is the incertaintie of fortune, that she transferreth to one that which she takes from another, not regarding the equitie ,, of causes, nor the merits of persons, but making her fancie the measure of her actions, the takes ,, delight to shew variation of power vpon the Princes of the earth: for, as soone as the Frenchmen were gone from Millan, the Cardinall Askanius made his entrie first, and then Lodowike, who recouering it in as short time and litle difficultie as he lost it (except the Castle) was also made glad at his return with a more franke & general shew of affection and ioy of the people of Millan, then they expressed when he departed. The like disposition was found in other Cities & conjunalties, as in Pania & Parma, declaring immediatly for Lodonike, whose example Lody & Plaisance had followed, if the bands of the Venetians (marched afore towards the river of Adda) had not bene entred. Alexandria, and almost all the places beyond Po, being furthest from Millan and nearest to Ast which was french, stirred not, determining to take aduise what they should do vpon the issue and traine of things. Lodowike being thus repossessed of Millan, made speedy leavies of as many Italian footmen & men at armes as he could, labouring, by petition, by offers, and all maner of hopes, all rhose in whom he had anie reason to expect succours in so great necessitie. Therefore he aduertised the Emperour by Galeas S. Scuerin of his happie beginning, befeeching him to fupply him with men & artilleries. And because it stood not with his fortune, & also was farre from his desire, to have the Senate of Venice his enemy, he gave direction that the Cardinall Askanius should speedily send the Bishop of Cremona to Venice, to offer them the ready will and inclination of Lodowike, to accept fuch conditions as it pleafed the to demaund: but the constancy of the Senat of Venice made vaine all that labour, for that they determined not to exchange their confederation with the French king, for the vncertain & newly reconciled friendships of Lodowske. The Genoways, notwithstanding the importunate solicitatios of Lodowske, refused to returne under his obedience: and the Florentines wold not heare his request touching the repaiment of the mony which he had lent the: only the Marquis of Mantua fent to him his brother with a certaine proportion of men at armes : there came to him also the Lords of Mirandola, of Carpy, and Corege, and the Siennois relieued him with small summes of money: fuccours almost contemnible in so great dangers, as also did litle import the aids of Phi-In Rolle and of the Vemine ques, whose fathers albeir had bin dispoiled by him of their ancient liuings:yet Philip, leaving without leave the pay of the Venetians, wet thither to recover his lands, & having obtained them, joyned himself to the army of Lodowike: the famuly of Verma did the like, and they both to reenter into grace by that occasion. Lodowike ioyning diligence to his fortune, & not vfing the fauor of the time in vaine, after he had affembled a thousand fine hundred men at armes belieds the Burgonian bands of horfemen, and layed to the regiments of Swiffers many Italian footmen, he left the Cardinall before the Cassle, and passed ouer Thesin: & obtaining by accord the towne & Castle of Vigenena, he laid siege to Nouaro, chusing that enterprise afore the expugnation of Mortaro, either for that the french had made strong fortifications at Morearo, or elle for that he estcemed Nouaro (2 towne renowmed and plentifull with all things) to import more for the reputation and substance of the warre, or perhaps he imagined, that the recouerie of that towne would breed want of victuals, and fo conffraine the French that were within Mortaro to abandon it: or at least he cast, that it would hinder Yue D'alegre from entring Nouaro, who was now marching from Romagna: for, as soone as he had received advertisements from Trivalce (leaving the Duke Valentinois in the enterprise of Pefero) he departed speedily with all the horsemen and the Swiffers: and understanding neare to Parma, the rebellion of Millan, he accorded with those of Parma and Plaisance not to offend them, so that they would not hinder his paffage: & heing come neare Tortona, he entred the towne, where, at the infligation of the Guelfes of that Citie, burning in defire to be reuenged of the Gebelyns, who (returned to the deuotion of Lodowike) had expulsed them, he put all to sacke and spoile, (the Guelffes crying out in vaine of his faith, for that their loyaltie was no better respected, but being the kings faithfull scruants, they were no otherwise vsed, then belonged to the deseruings of his most traiterous enemies: from Tortona he marched into Alexandria, where he stayed, for that the Smiffers of his armie, either because they were not payed, or for some other secret reason, lest him, and went to the Duke of Millans Campe, whole strength being now greater then his enemies, he prepared speedily to the battery of Novaro, to the end to carrie it afore the french (expecting succours from the king) were frong enough to encounter him in the field; a matter which succeeded happily to him: for that the french bands that were within Novaro, having no reason of hope, or possibilitie to defend it, agreed to deliner up the towne, receiving the promife of his faith to depart in fuertie with all their goods, which he kept infly with them, protecting them with fafeconduite to Verceil. And albeit he was perswaded by many, that the ouerthrowing of those bands was of great importance for his victorie, wherein they occupied these reasons, that if it were lawfull, according to the authoritie and examples of great men, to breake faith to conquer a Lordship of another, that it was more lawfull to fraine both oth, faith, and all promifes, to keepe that which was his owne: yet he abstained from all violation, having regard to the estate of his perils, and fraile condition of his fortune. After he had got Nouaro, he denised how he might have the Castle: but it was beleeved, that if he had aduaunced to the enterprise of Mortaro, all the french bands had fled afore him over Po. (Triunice and the Lord of Ligny not agreeing welltogether.)

Whilest Lodowske was in these expeditions, following the fortune that best led him to the reconquering of his estates, no lesse care and diligence occupied the french King, who, understanding the rebellion of Millan, difgested it with no no litle griefe and discontentment : and therefore (fodeine mischiefs requiring speedie remedies) he dispatched with a wonderfull speed into Italy, M. Tranouylle with fixe hundred Launces, and sent to leavie a great regiment of Swiffers, (following an ancient and assured experience of warre, to represse with a strong force a rebellion in an estate newly conquered.) And lastly, to the end there might be an exact diligence in all provisions, he created the Cardinall of Amboys his Licutenant for Italy, and dispatched him immediatly to Ast: In so much as all things prepared with a quicke readinesse, there was mustred in Italy for the king in the beginning of Aprill, a strength of fifteene hundred Launces, ten thousand Swiffers footmen, and fixe thousand of the kings subjects, under the leading of Trimonylle, Trivulce, & Ligny: which companies being drawne into one Campe at Mortaro, marched to Nonaro, hauing no leffe confidence in treason , then in their forces : for that the Swiffer Captaines which were with Lodowike, had secret intelligence and practise of conspiracie with them by the meanes of their countreymen which served in the Frencharmie (notwithstanding in the action of Nouaro they shewed faith, vallour, and good stabilitie of affection,) whereof Lodowike being lealous by many apparant coniectures, laboured much (his neceffities being violent) to joyne to him the foure hundred horfemen and eight thousand footmen which were leuied at Millan. But as a ruine determined runs to his end by a proportion of degrees and parts measured and limited : fo at Novaro the Swiffers, stirred vp by their Captains, began to mutine, taking their occasion for that their payes were not performed at the iust dayes that were promised. And albeit the Duke ran to the stir in person, & besides his pitiful requelts & prayers, training with them great occasion of compassion, gaue amongst the all his filuer plate & veffel, defiring to rest contented but till the mony came from Millan. Yet the Smiffer Captaines fearing that if the bands which were leavied at Millan should be joyned to the

Campe, their treason would suffer either impersection or preuention, wrought so that the french Campe being all put into armes and readinesse, approched the walles of Nouaro, and enuironing a great part of the towne, they dispatched certaine horsemen to occupie the wayes betweene the Citie and the river of Thelin, to cut offfrom the Duke and all others, all meanes to fly to Millan. But as necessitie is mighty to make men resolute, so the Duke seeing more and more into his perile, and that almost the whole disposition of his Campe agreed with the state of his dangers, sought to iffue out of Nonaro with his whole armie to fight with the enemy, having already fent out in order the light horsemen and the Burgoniens to begin the skirmish: but he was apparantly resifled by the Smyffer Captaines, who told him they would not come to blowes with their parents, brethren, and countreymen, without the leave of their Lords, but made as though they would depart sodainly into their countrey. The Duke not able either by praiers, with teares, or infinit promiles to practife any whit their barbarous disposition , made election of the best part of his aduerfitie, and recommended himfelfe wholly vnto them, at least that they would leade him to a place of fuertie: a mifery so much the more lamentable, by how much the condition of his affaires & perils, constrained him to seeke for his safety, where he saw nothing but apparant arguments of conspiracie against his life: wherin in this was hee most miserable and unhappie, that being so neare the last action of recourse of his estates, he was not only depriued of the glory of his victorie, but also (fortune is infinit in malice) passed ouer to a desolation irreparable, and a ruine whereunto remaineth no other consolation, hope, or mercy, then such as may be exspected of an enemy ambitious, iniurious and reuengeful. But the Swyffers having contracted with the french Captaines to go their wayes, and not to leade him with them, albeit their crueltie would not suffer them to graunt to his full demaund, yet in compassion they confented that he should march away amongst them,taking the attire and furniture of one of their footemen; and so, if he were not knowne, to faue himselfe by the helpe of his fortune: which condition he was driven to accept for a last necessitie, but yet it was not sufficient for his safetie: for that, they matching by direction through the midst of the french armie, he was vnhappilie knowne by the diligent espiall of such as were assigned to that charge: or (more likely) disclosed by some secret instruction of the Swyffers, as he marched in a Squadron on foote, attired and armed and disguised in all points as a Swyffer; and hasting to his laft calamitie, he was by that meane made prisoner: A spectacle so lamétable, that it brought teares into the eyes of many, yea euen of the very enemies, Galeas, S. Seuerin, Freca [[a, and Anthony Maria his brethren, communicated with his fortune, being betraied by the same disloialtie of the Smyffers. After the Duke was taken, the army went dispersing, & no more resistance apearing, all things were feene full of feare and confusion; which made the Cardinal Askanius, who had already fent towards the Camp those bands that were leauied at Millan, to leave the Castle, and seeke his fuertie in fome place of better truft. Many of the nobility of the Gebelyns followed him, who being too apparantly declared for Lodowyk, dispaired to find pardon with the french: But as it was set downe in destiny, that in the calamitie of the two brethren, treason should be mingled with cuill fortune: so he had determined to reappose himselfe somwhat the night after at Renotes in the coutrey of Plaifance, which is a borough appertaining at that time to Conrard de Lande, a Gentleman of the Citie of Plasfance and his kinfman and auncient friend. The fance Conrard, chaunging will with fortune, sent presently to Plassance for Charles Vrimand Sonzin Benzon then in the paye of the Venetians, to whom he delivered the faid Askanius & Hermes Sforce brother to the late Duke kaniss betraied John Galeas, with one part of the Gentlemen that came with him; the residue, being more happie or more wife, forbare their rest that night, and passing further, preuented their perill. Askanum was immediatly led prisoner to Venice; but the French King, judging it necessarie for the suretie of the Duchie of Millan to be possessed of him, sent for him to Venice, where finding some difficultie to deliuer him, he required him with protestations and threats, alleaging, that he appertained to him in due property and interest, forthat he was taken in a countrey of his obedience: A request which albeit seemed very sharpe and vnworthie of the name of the Venetsan state, yet, to a-Cardinal Af- uoyde the fury of his artnies, it was graunted, more by cumpulfion then confcience; and not onely the person of the Cardinal deliuered, but also all those of Millan that were taken with him: and withal, Baptifte Viscounte with other Nobles of Millan, which were withdrawne for the same occasion into the townes of Guiar adadda undersafe conduit to remaine there in fuerty with expresse mention of the Frenche, were put into the Kinges handes for seare of the Frenche armies:

fo much did prevaile with the Senat of Venice the terror of the french forces, more then the regard to the dignitic of their common weale. The citie of Millan abandoned of allhope, yeelded to the generall calamitie, and fent speedie Embassadors to the Cardinallos Amboise to solicit for pardon: he received them into grace, and pardoned the rebellion in the name of the King, but vider this bond, to pay three hundred thousand duckats, of the which the King acquited them afterwardes of a great part. He pardoned also other townes that had rebelled, which he taxed according to their qualitie, making the victorie profitable, and the transgressions of the offenders an increase of the Kings treasure.

The enterprise thus happily succeeding, and the regiments of men of war dissoluted & licensed, the footmen of the foure Cantons of Swiffers which be more neare then the others to the Towne of Bellizona fituated within the mountaines, tooke the Towneas they returned to their countrey: a place which the french King might have drawne from them in the beginning, for a verie small portion of mony. But as he lolt oftenrimes by the propertie of his nature, occasions of great things, by sparing small proportions of expences: so times & accidents came so about afterwards, that many times, and by many folicitations, he would have purchased it of them with a verie great price, for that it is a straite very convenient to hinder the descending of the Swiffers into the Duchie of Millan. Lodomike Sforce was catied to Lyon where the King was, and entring the towne at noone dayes, many multitudes of people flocked to fee a Prince, who, from fuch a greatnesse & maiestie, and for his felicitic enuied of many, was fallen into so great a miserie; and not able to obtaine leaue to be brought to the Kings presence, which he much defired, he was conucyed within two dayes after to the Towre of Loches, wherein he remained prisoner ten yeares, eucn to the end of his life, being now inclosed in one ftrait prison the thoughts & ambition of him, which earst could skarce. ly be contained within the limits and termes of all Italy: A Prince, certainly most excellent for his eloquence and industrie, and for many gifts of nature and spirit, a creature of veric rare perfection: and lastly not voworthy of the name of myld and merciful, if the death of his Nephew had not defiled him with bloudie infamie. But on the other fide, he caried a mind vaine and full of thoughts busie and ambitious, and nourishing alwayes intentions dissembled, he kept no reckening of his promifes and faith. He alwayes prefumed so much of him selfe, that seening to be discontented, when praises were given to the wisedome and counsels of others, he perswaded himself to be able by his Art and indultrie to alter and turne the conceptions of euery one to what purpose he listed. The Cardinal Askanius followed him a litle after, but he was both received with more honor and humanitie, and graciously visited by the Cardinall of Amboyse, by whose intercession he was sent to the great Towre of Bourges, a prison more honorable, wherein the King that fent him, had bin restrained two yeares in captiuitie: So variable and miscrable is the destinie of man, and so incertaine to every one what will be his condition in time to come.

THE FIFT BOOKE OF

Historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

He warre of Pisa continueth: The Duke Valentinois pursueth his enterprise of Romagna: The Kings of Spaine and France inuade soyntly the kingdome of Naples, they occupie it and deusde it betweene them, and afterwardes make warre one upon another: The Duke Valentinois putteth to death the Vrsius: The Swissers descendinto the Duchie of Millan: The Spaniards remaine victors oner the French at Corignolo, and take Naples.

Vch is the disposition of minds occupied with ambition, that who are desirous of glo-rie, are easily stirred to do things contrarie to reason, counsell and experience: Ambition is an humour that carieth men into weenings farre aboue the possibilitie of their proper power, & ouerruleth their thoughts without regard to the oportunitie of times, places, or occasions: as is expressed in the inclination of the French king, in whom the absolute and happy conquest of the Duchie of Atylian, had nourished such spirits of will and courage, that the selfe same sommer he would have proceeded to the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, had not the feare which he had of the descending of the Almains, restrayned his rashnesse, and made him wife against the propertie and working of his will: For, not withstanding he had (the yeare before) obteyned a contract of truce of Maximilian Cafar, wherein the Duchie of Myllan was comprehended : yet, Maximilian debating with better confideration, how much the maiestie of the Empire would be diminished by the alienation of so principall a Chiefe, and what dishoriour would follow him for suffring to be deuested from it Lodonike Sforce, who not onely had put himselfe under his protection, and reapposed wholly in the hopes which he gaue him: But also, had bound himselfe to his succours by receiving his money at fundry times, and in great quantities: He would no more heare the Embassadours of the French, and refused also all audience to the Agents of the Venetians, as viurpers of certaine places appertaining to the Empire. And lastly, ioyning to the memorie of auncient ielousies & iniuries done to him and his predecessors in divers seasons by the house of France, the inflamed copassion which he had of the miferable calamities of the two brethren: he held many generall diots and affemblies, to stirre up the electors and other Princes of Germany to joyne in the quarrell and renenge of so high wrongs comitted no leffe against him then the whole nation of Germany, to whom the imperiall dignity was proper. And to give better operation to his purpose in the minds of the Germaine Princes, he laid before them confiderations of dangers, that might happen, if the French king, prefuming more and more by fo great a patience of the Princes of the Empire, and rifing into pride by fo many fauors of victory and fortune, would so farre aspire, as to set the crowne Imperiall vppon the heads of french kings, and incorporate the foueraigne estate in that forceine familie as had beene done afore times: whereunto the Pope would confent eafily, partly by necessitie (not able to refish his power) and partly for the respect of his sonne, whom he studied to make to excell in greatnesse & dignity. not remembring that those authorities are vniust, whose meanes be vnlawfull, and that the vertuous man should not obtrude into rule, but receiue it as if he were thereto compelled.

This was the cause why the king (not knowing to what end the race and course of his plottes might runne, tooke truce with his enterprises, and deferred till an other time the execution of his thoughts touching the warre of Naples. By reason & meane whereof, his men of warre being not intangled with other enterprise, he was contented to give to the Florentines those bands & regiments which they did demand for the recouring of Pifa & Pietra (ant a: And yet not without many doubts & difficulties, for that both the Pifans, the Genowayes, the Siennoys, and they of Lucqua, made great instace to the cotrary offring to give the king presently an hundred thousand crowns vpon condition that Pifa, Pietra fanta, and Mont Pulcian might be protected from the harmes and ambition of the Florentines, and to make to him a perpetuall paiment of fiftie thousand duckats yearely, if the Pilans by his meanes obtained the fortrelles of the port of Lowerne, with all the region of Pifa. To these offers it seemed that the mind of the king was much inclined, by a couetous defire of money: notwithstanding (as was his familiar custome in things of importance) he referred the counsell and deliberation of all things, to the Cardinall of Amboyse, who was then at Millan: afore whom, notwithstanding the importunities & labours of the states afore named, did negociat with great diligence I. lacques Tryunice, and I. Longes de Freique they both nourishing an equall defire to manage the iurildiction of Pifa, & in that respect offred to pay to the king for the graunt, a great proportion of money, alleaging withall that (the oportunitie & occasion concurring) it was an action meete for his furetie to hold under the Florentines, & keepe in weakneffe the other Potentates of Italy. But the Cardinall preferring integrity afore particular favor, joyned to the faith & promife given by the king, the confideration of the late merites of the Florentines, who, expressing a liberall and ready ayde to his enterprise & conquest of Millan, converted at his request into bands and strength of men, the payments of money which they were bound to pay in that case: and therfore it was resolved to resurnish the Florentines for the recovery of Ps/a besides the restitution of Pietra (anta and Mutron) with a regiment of sixe hundred Launces paied by the king, and five thousand Swyllers under the Bailiese of Dyon with a proportion of Gascours at their owne charges, together with all fuch forts of Artilleries and Munitions as should bee necessarie for that enterprise. They had also against the kings will, and their meanings a strength Beaumont had the charge, for that the Florentines, retayning a memorie of his auncient readine fle mont a chiefe to render to them Lyworne, reapposed more in him then in any other, and in that humor deman-leader of the ded him for their Generall, not confidering, that in matters of enterprise, authoritie & knowledge frank armin. in things of warre, is no leffe necessarie in a leader of an army, then faith: for that in warre, neither the multitude of fouldiers, nor the puissance vnskilfull, can so much availe to the victory, asknowledge and exercise. The king with a more sound and better counsell, had determined to give them M. D'alegre, a Captaine farre more experienced in watre, and to whom, for his noblenesse of bloud, and reputation of vertue the army would have given a more readie and willing obedience: but the troubles and difficulties which accompanied the fuccours of the French, beganne euen now to appeare: for that the payment of the footmen beginning from the first day of May, they had spent allthat moneth in Lombardie, in the service of the king, who desired by meane of that marching to draw money from the Marquelle of Atantna, and the Lords of Carpy, of Correge, and Alyrandola, to punish them for that they had ministred ay de to Lodomke Sforce . In to much that albeit the Florentines holding for suspewed their flow proceeding, & that the intermilfion & discontinuance gane oportunity to the Pyfans to prepare & prouide, were at a resolutio to abandon the enterprile: yet, looking better into the necessity of their affaires, they held it selle hurtfull to refurnish a second pay, & so make them march on, then to let money suppresse so faire an occasion. At length the L. of Carpy, of Mirandola, & of Correge (for whom the Duke of Ferrara made intercession (copounded for 20000, duckats, & the labour being vaine to stay to force the Marquisse of Manina, who, on the one side fortified himselfe, & on the other side alleaged his pouertie & want of money, and fending withall his Embassadors to the king to sollicite his pardon: the armie marched & encamped at Montchiarucola, a village in the countrey of Parma appertaining to the family of the Torellis, who had succoured Lodowike Sforce: not so much for any defire the armie had to punish them, as to threaten lohn Bentinole by drawing vponthe limits of Bologmia, having (amongst the residue) borne favours to the cause of Lodowike. The perill of his condition, confidered with the ill inclination of the time, made him to compound, paying the king forty thousand duckats, for the which his maiesty tooke him of new into his protection, together with the citie of Bolognia, but with this expresse limitation, not to prejudice the prerogatives or rights which the church had there. After the contract of Bolognia, and Montchiarucola taken by force, the armie returned backe to passe ouer the Appenin by the way of Pontremo: and as they entred the countrie of Lungiana, following more their profits & appetites, then honour or equity, they ranne into many infolencies, and at the instance of the Fregoses, tooke the borough of Massa and other lands, fro Aubry Malespina being under the protection of the Florentines. Passing further in this course of behauiour, they of Lucqua (notwithstading they were in great strife for the matter, the communaltie much impugning it) deliucred ouer Pietra Santa to Monfr Beaumont in the kings name, who leaving garrison in the Castle, tooke not away their officers of the towne, for that the Cardinall of Amboys, in whom remained small reckoning of the promises made to the Florentines, for that he had received a certaine proportion of money of the Lucqueys, had receiued them into the protection of the king, with couention that his maielty, shold hold Pietra Santa in deputation vitill he had declared to whom the right did appertaine. But in these seasons, the Prians feeing many intentions disclosed to their harmes & ruing, became the more resolute & ob-Hinate in their defence, & had by the helpe of Vitellozze (with whom they were ented into great conjunction, being also enimies to the Florentines) certaine enginists to dreffe their fortifications, wherein might be differred a wonderfull trauell both of men and women in great concourse and emulation who should labour most to set forward the workes. And yet (it is ordinary with men in faction & enterprise to diffemble) they forgot not to entertaine the french, submitting generall cosent, their whole towne to the king, and in that regard sent instruments Autentike not onely to Monfr Beaumont, but also to Philip Rabestin governor for the king at Genes, who, with a fingular rashnes accepted it in the kings name. And M. Beanmont, sending a Herald to Pefa to demad the M. Beanmont towne, they made answere with many humilities, that they desired nothing with greater affection sewleth to dethe to liue vnder the kings obediece, & in that estate of loue & well meaning they were ready to maund Pisa give themselves yp to his devotion, so that his maiesty would assure them vnder his honour and name, they followed with the teares and weepings of the Ladies, with all other forts of meanes wherein they thought was vertue to perswade the Herald, that their harts, wils and affections were wholly dedicated to the Crowne of France which had first put them in libertie. These petitios were vaine to M. Beaumont, who looking further into their weaknesse and necessities, then bearing any compassion to their calamities, denied to accept the offers of their Embassadors sent to him, and encamped before the towne the last day fauing one of June, betweene the gate of Plages, and the gate Calce fana right over against the quarter called Barbagianui: he battered all that night with great furie, & continued the action the most part of the day following, in which time, the artillery, both good of it selfe, and planted to all conveniencie, had made even with the earth threescore cubites of the wall: and affoone as the batterie ceaffed to shoote, the horsemen and sootmen entermedled together, ran without order or discipline to give the assault, not considering in what fort they might passe a deepe trench which the Pisans had made betweene the wall that was battered, and the rampier that was within: In so much as when they had discouered the greatnesse ofit, & wondred much at his depth, they confumed the refidue of the day rather as beholders of the difficultie then disposed to make good the assault. The fortune of this day, joyned to the consideration of the impediments disclosed, made diminish more and more the hopes of the frenchmen to carrie Pila: partly for that they fainted in courage, as well for the qualitie of the rampiers, as resolution of those in the towne: and partly, for that the Pifans renuing the practises and meanes which they were wont to yfe, the ancient inclination of the french began to take new life and nourish new fauours towards them: in so much as the frenchmen, beginning to entertaine meetings and familiarities with those that were within the towne, communicating together with a friendship & libertic not suspected: and they for their parts recontinuing the same offers to resigne them selues wholly to the kings deuotion, vpon condition not to be eftsoones passed ouer to the oppression of the Florentines. The cause of the Pisans was fauored through the whole Campe, and oftentimes defended with such declarations of good meaning euenafore the Captaines, that the greatest part of the Campe gaue them courage to maintaine their defence, wherein (befides the incitation of the frenchmen) they were specially encouraged by Francis Trumlee Lieutenant of the regiment of Iohn Lacques, and by Galeas Paluoyin, which led a band in the french Campe. By the oportunitie of these disorders and sufferance of the Campe, Tarlatyn (of the towne of Castello) entred into Pifa on that fide towards the fea, with certaine old foldiers which Vitellozze fent to the fuccours of Pifa: a man at that time but darke and viknowne, but afpiring afterwardes to the place of Captaine, he continued and followed the defence of that Citie to the end, to his great honour. To this common inclination, many bands of horfemen and footmen, added many other infolencies, for that, defiring that the fiege might be leuied, they began to facke and spoile the victuals that were brought to the Campe: and so farre multiplied they in all disorders (the authoritie of the Generall being not sufficient to restraine them) that the footbands of the Gascoines abandoned the army in maner of tumult, (their example breeding the like mutinie in all the refidue:) and at patting, certaine footbandes of the Smiffers which were come from Rome, according to the kings direction, stayed as prisoner Luke a' Albisse Commissarie for Florence. The occasion (as they alledged) was, for that their payes were detained which were due for a feruice they had bene at afore time within Linorne. The Campe dispersed by degrees, for that the regiment of Swiffers and other footbands went away forthwith: onely the nien at armes stayed somewhat neare about Pisa, where they had not spent many dayes in reposing theinfelues, but they returned into Lombardy without tarying till they knew the kings will and direction; leaving the affaires of the Florentines in great diforder, for that they had dismissed all their footebands, to be more able to furnish the payes of the Smillers. The Pisans turned these confusions into an occasion of exploit and enterprise, and with an expedition agreeable to the confent and oportunitie of the time, they went & planted a Camp afore Librafatta, which they tooke eafily, no lesse by the indiscretion of the enemie, then by their proper strength. The maner of that successe was this: Whilest the affault was in charging, all the footmen that were within running to the breach, some of those of the Cape by scaling ladders entred by the highest Iawme of the Cassle which was not guarded. Which sutptise both sudden and terrible fo aftonished the footmen, that they yeelded then selues: And linking still their fortune with their victorie, they drew their Campe with a present speede afore the Bastillion Ventura, and whilest the assault was in action, the footmen yeelded, either by faintnesse of courage, or by treason of the

The Pifans take Librafatta. Captaine S. Brandano, Constable of the Florentines, of nation a Lucquoys, and there remaining in garrison. But as the conquest of these places was veric profitable to the Pisans, for that it had opened to them a larger scope on that side towards the Lucqueys, and given elsewhere almost a generall libertie: fo yet, such successe of the things of Pifatroubled not a litle the mind of the french King, who faw how much it would diminish the reputation of his armie; besides that he bare very impatiently that one particular Citie, supported onely by her inhabitants, & wherein was not only one Captaine of name, should refift the armies of Fraunce, which had run through all Italy to the generall terrour and feare even of the chiefest Potentates: wherein as men in things that be grieyous to them, do oftentimes beguile themselves, he occupied in himselfe this perswasion, that the advertities of Pola happened by this default, that the Florentine's had not made due provisions of victuals, Pioners, and Munitious as his people affured him for their discharge, beleeuing that all other things had rather fayled in the Armie then valour, he complained also that fauoring too much the importunities of the Florentines, he yeelded to comic fo great an Armie rather to M. Beaumont then to M.D' Alegre, by which indifferetion those disorders were happened. And of the other part, defiring to recouer the reputation loft, he fent to Florence M.de Corocn his Chamberlaine, not fo much to be informed if the reports of his Captaines were true, as to practife with the Florentines, that not looking hope to have hereafter a better fuecesse, they would consent that his men at armes might returne to folourne in the countrey of Pifa, the better to keepe that Citie for the winter following, in continual feare and bridle, with intention, in the spring time to recontinue the siege with an Armie more reasonable, compounded of Captaines better experienced. & souldiers more obedient. This offer was refuted of the Florenines, as despairing of anie better issue by the aide of the French armies; a matter which made worfe their conditions, for that, a brute running in all places that the King had left them, the Genoways, the Lucquoys, and the Stennois began to minister openly to the Pifans both men and money. And at Florence, the divisions so increased amongst the Citizens, that they were not onely in disabilitie to recour the things lost, but also they provided not in anie fort for the diforders that were in their jurisdiction: for, some particular factions, falling into open armes and private force, there were done betweene them as well in the towne as fields. many hostilities and burnings, proceeding sometimes with forreine aide, euen as if it were a warre ordained and set. To these insolent disorders, they applied no order, to the great reproch of their common weale.

In this time Cefar Borgia omitted no oportunitie to advaunce his affaires: and albeit the King was much disconteted with the Pope, for not aiding him to recouer his Duchie of Millan, the same being the cause why his Maiestie had deferred to send him bands of men to prosecute the enterprise begun against the Vicars of Romagnia: yet the desire he hadto keepe amitie with him, made him change opinion, for the feare he had of the descending of the Almaines, having no meane to establish an accord with the Emperour. But much more was concurrant in that defire the authoritie of the Cardinall of Amboife, for the ambition he had to obtaine the Legation for the Realme of Fraunce. The Cardinall in this aspiring defire, had litle remembrance to the counsell of S. Gregory, Sainf Gro. that he that seeketh authoritie, let him consider how he commeth to it, and comming well to it, gory against how he ought to live well in it, and living well in it, how he must governe, and governing wifely, ambition. he must of call to memory his owne infirmitie. Ambition is an humour verie vnmeet for Churchmen, for that it hindreth to their humilitie and charitie, and generally altereth the whole vertue of " their profession. It is hurtfull to raise a mind ambitious into high authoritie, for that he that is desi-" rous of gloric, is soone stirred to do things against equitie: and to him that seeketh to be aboue " all men, it is hard to keepe alwayes equitie, which is the chiefe part of inflice. The Pope eftfoones " promised the King to aide him with men and with the person of his sonne, when socuer he would " aduaunce the enterprise of Naples, and to endue the Cardinall of Amboile with the Legation of the realme of Fraunce for eighteene moneths, which was esteemed a great matter, aswell for that it was new and rare, as for that it diminished much the doings and profites of the Court of Rome. The King for his part, fent to him under the leading of Monfr d'Alegre, three hundred Launces & The french two thousand sootmen, making knowne to euerie one, that what soule soeuer would oppose a- King senderb gainst the enterprise of the Pope, he would take it to heart, as if the injurie were done to his proper aide to the person. With which reputation, joyned to his proper forces, cotaining fixe hundred men at armes Pope. and fixe thousand footmen, the Duke Valentinois entred alreadie into Romagnia, tooke without relistance, the Cities of Pefera and Rimini whose Lordes and owners fled. Afterwards he turned his force to Faenza, which had no other defence then of the people of the place: for, not onely Iohn Bentinole, yncle by the mother fide to Astor a litle child, was made contented, as welfor feare roflirre vp the armes of the Pope and his sonne, as to obey a commaundement he had received from the King: (the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara doing the like for the same occasions:) but also the Venetians, who were bound to defend him, fignified to him (observing the request the King made to them) that they had renounced the protection of him; a thing which they had likewife done afore for the same occasió to Pandolfe Malaseste Lord of Rimins. And which more is to expresse with greater apparace that they fauored the Pope, they created at the same time the Duke Valentinois Gentleman of their Towne, an action not accustomed to that common weale, but for recompence of benefites received, or in token of deare and fraite amitie. The Duke Valentinois entertained in his pay Dennis de Naldanatiue of Brifiquellea man of great opinion in the Vale of Lamona: by his meanes he tooke the towne of Brifiguolle without danger, and with the same fortune brought under his commandement almost the whole valley; he tooke the old Citadell by force, and carried the new Caffle by accord made with the keeper. He had also hope to enter into the Calle of Faceze, by meane of a practife entertained by the faid Dennis with the Calle keeper, who was of the fame Valley, and had long time governed the effaces of Affor: but the intelligence being discouered, he was made prisoner by the Faventines, who making their fortune no seare to them, shewed no signes of faint courage for that they were abandoned of euery one, and much lesse stood discomforced for the losse of the Valley which was of great importance: but as people resolued to vanguish their advertities with their proper vertues, they determined to passe under all perils to continue their subjection to the familie of the Manfredia, vnder whose obedience as they had lined in eafie gouernment a long time, fo doubting the worft that might come by change of Lords, they flood resolute in their faith and loyaltie, and carefully strengthened their Cirie against Duke Valenti- the present dangers. From which disposition, the Duke Valentinois being not able to turne them, neither by promifes nor threatnings, he encamped neare the wals of their City between the rivers of Lamona and Marsana, and planted his artillerie on that fide that is towardes Furly, which albeit is incompassed with wals, yet commonly it is called the Suburbs, where the Fanentins had ereeted a firong Bastillion: he battred it with great furie, together with that I wme or corner that is betweene the Suburbes and the towne, and the fift day he gaue the affault. But finding the refistance of the towne aboue his expectation, he founded the retraite, (his fouldiers bringing away many wounds and maimes, & Honorius Sanella a principall man flaine in the action.) The Campe fuffered litle rest all the residue of the dayes it remained there, as well by a continual atfliction of the artillerie from the towne, as also by the vallour of the inhabitants, who, notwithstanding they had a verie flender strength by forreine fouldiers, yet, they made many issues and fallies, and skirmished with no lesse fortune then courage. But about all other perplexities, (albeit the moneth of Nouember was not yet finished) the time, which was more extreme then agreed with the cufrome and nature of that feafon, troubled him much, both for the fnowes that fell, and the frolls that were intollerable (gricuous impediments to the trauels of warre) and also for that his lodging was naked and open to the avre, (the Fauentyns afore the Campe came neare their wals, having burned all their houses, and cut downe all such wood and trees as might give succours to their ene-Dule Valentia mics. Thefe difficulties preffed fo much the Duke Valentinois, that he leavied his Camp the tenth mis lewieth bis day, and dispersing his regiments to winter in places thereabouts, he bare his fortune with manifest impatience, specially for that besides his french forces, he had an armie florishing with Captaines and fouldiers Italians, wherin were lohn Paule, and Iulio Vrfins, Vitellozze & John Paule Baillon with many men of choife: and having promifed to himselfe in his ambitious conceits, that neither the feas nor the mountaines had power to refift him, he could not endure without perturbation of mind, that the reputation of his first exploits should be darkened, by a people that had long lived in peace, and at that time, had no other commaunder then a litle child; wherein he gaue such libertie to his passion, that he swore, and that with many sighes and vehement protestations, that as foone as the season of the years would give leave to his defire, he would return to the siege, & recontinue the enterprise with a resolution of a man determined either to carrie the victorie, or to diein the action.

Duke Valentinois disdaineth so be repulsed.

In which time his father the Pope, to the end there might be focietie in their doings, having regard to one end, created the same yeare to his great infamie twelue Cardinals,not of such as The Pobe! descrued best, but of those that offered most. And to omit no meanes to heape treasures and createth xij. money, he fent out and fowed thorough all Italy, and strange provinces, the Inbile; which be-Cardinals as ing celebrated at Rome with great concourse of people, was sent with no lesse deuotion beyond one time. the mountes, giving power that who could not come to Rome to obtaine it, should communicate in the grace and benediction for certaine fummes of money; the which, together with all other treasures he could draw in what fort socuer, as well of the spiritual frutes, as treasures temporall of the Church, he fent to the Duke of Valentinoss, who staying at Furly, made strong preparation to recontinue the fiege of Faenza; against whose intentions the Fauentins prouided by fortifications and other remedies conuenient to refift an enemy so apparantly professed. These things were done in the yeare 1500. But matters offarre greater importance were ordained by the french king for the yeare following: and to have the more liberty to execute them, he had fought by continual folicitation, to have unitie with the king of Romaines, wherby obtaining the inuestiture of the Duchie of Mullan, he might have sufferance to assaile the realme of Naples: to which ends he yied the meane & inclination of the Archduke his fonne, who declared a readie disposition to peace, for that his peoples, fearing the entercourse of marchandise would cease, brooked vinwillingly all perswasions to leauie warre against the French: but the thing that most supported this inclination, was, that the French king having no issue male, offered to give in mariage his daughter Madanie Claude, to Charles sonne of the Archduke, and to endue her with the Duchie of Millan for a dowrie when they had abilitie to confummate the mariage, for neither of them had not yet three yeares of age. By these offers, and his intercession, (for that many difficulties happing in the practife and negociation of the peace ab- Truce between folute, could not to foone be refolued) the french king obtained in the yeare following of Maxt- the French king milian, a truce for many moneths, but not without the price of certaine proportions of money. and king of Romaines. This truce was voy d of all mention of the King of Naples, not with Handing that Maximilian, in confideration of fortie thousand Duckats, with bond, to minister to him monethly fifteene thoufand Duckats (his necessities so requiring,) he had promised to make no accord without coprehending him in it, and to vexe the Duchie of Millan with inuafions and warre when neede were to turne away the powers of the French king. Thus the king dwelling affured that the Almaines would not firre, and hoping in fhort time to make the peace perfect and absolute, and to obtain the inuestitute of the Duchie of Millan, by meane of the same Archduke, turned all his thoughts to the enterprise of Naples; against the which, searing least the king of Spaine would make some objection, and that both the Pope and Venetians (jealous over his greatnesse) would joyne with him, he renued eftfoones the practifes that had bene begun in the time of king Charles for deviding of the fame realme, whereunto indeed Ferdinand king of Spaine pretended to haue right: for albeit Alphonso king of Aragon had conquered it with rights & titles separate from the Crowne of Aragon, and therfore had disposed it to the person of Ferdinand his bastard sonne as his owne: yet, John his brother which succeeded him in the kingdom of Aragon, and Ferdmand the sonne of lohn, had alwayes fecretly quarelled that title as lawfully appertaining to the Crown of Aragon, for that Alphon fo had conquered it with the armes and treasures of the same realme. Which quarell Ferdinand had couered with a futtletie & patience of a Spaniard, forgetting nothing, not onely of the dutie of a parent towardes Ferdinand king of Naples, and the others, but also more affuring and augmenting them with bondes of newe affinitie, for that he gaue to Ferdinand for wife, Tane his lifter, and confented afterwardes that Iane the daughter of her, should be maried to young Ferdinand, wherein yet he could not worke in fuch clouds, but the vaile of his couetouInesse was long time before made open to the kings of Naples. In so much as the stench king and Ferdinand concurring in one inclination, the one to remove all impediments & difficulties, the other to obtaine part of that he had long defired, feeing there was no oportunitie to obtaine the whole, they made an agreement to inuade at one time the kingdome of Naples, and to de-The kings of uideit betweene them, in this fort; That the French king should have the Citie of Naples, with France deside all the land of Lauoro, and the province of Abruzzo: and to Ferdinands part should fall the pro- betweene them uinces of Powylla and Calabria: That either one should conquer his owne part by himselfe, the the realms of other not being bound to helpe him, but onely not to empeach or hinder him: but specially it Naples. was agreed, that this contract should be holden verie secret until the armie which the French king should fend to execute that enterprise, were arrived at Rome: at what time the Embassadors of them both, alledging this contract to be made for the benefit of Christendome, & to inuade the Infidels, should require the Pope with a joynt voyce, to graut the inuestiture according to the division that had bin made betweene them, receiving Ferdinand into faith & homage, vnder the title of Duke of Powylla & Calabria, and the French king no more king of Cicsha, but king of lerufalem & Naples: which title of king of lerufale, being once come to the Emperour Federal the second, who was king of Naples, by his wife which was daughter of John king of Ierusalem (but in name not in effect) was alwayes kept by the kings following, notwithstanding that at one time, the kings of Cipres, being of the house of Lusignan, who likewise pretended to it, would appropriate it to them with a couetoufnesse as apparant & great as the rest. So violent care the defires of Princes to embrace colours by the which they may with any honest couer-" ture(albeit molt often against all law and reason) torment and inuade the estates that are in the copolicifion of another, not confidering what a world of calamities, vniuft warre and oppression .. do draw with them, & much leffe remembring that right may be troden downe, but not troden cout, but hath her fecret meanes to support her, and her seasons appointed to reuiue and reuert. This capitulation was no fooner established betweene the two kings, then the French king began immediatly and openly to prepare his armic.

But whilest these practises were in working to their execution, the Duke of Valentinois, returning by night in the first dayes of the new yeare to the Suburbes of Faenza, and working by confpiracie and intelligence, made an vie of a number of skaling ladders: but that labour and triall refoluing into fmoke and vanitic, & repofing no more hope in treafon, he tooke in few dayes after Ruffi, with the other places of that countrey, and lastly returned estsoones with his Camp to Faenza in the beginning of the Spring: and incamping before the Castle, he battred the wall on that side, and followed the assault Pellemelle with the French & Spanish that were in his pay; who going to the fertice in diforder, retired without honor or profit. But three dayes after (obstinacie norisheth peril)he recharged it with another assault with the streeth of the whole Camp: The first charge fell to Vitellozze and the Vrsins, who, culling out the flower and choise men of their bands, marched to the breach with a wonderfull boldnesse, were well assured order, their valours giving great hope at that time to carie the victorie: but those that were within fighting for their lives and libertie, were no leffe resolute to desend, then the others were valiant to asfaile: They had so intrenched and sortified the place, that their industrie made amazed their enemies, who finding afore them a great ditch for depth & largenesse, & being beaten in the slanke with the furie of the artillerie, were constrained to retire, Ferdinand of Farnesa tempining dead with many other men of marke, without reckening the great numbers whose bodies imarted in "the wounds they received: The chaunces in warre are divers, and have in them many hidden for-"tunes, which neither the wifedome of the leaders can foresee, nor the vertue of the souldiers reof fift, nor any counfell of man affure, but running gouerned by certaine fwift definies, feeme to se communicate in the qualitie of the wind which no humane wit can make fetled, but is caried by " incomprehenfible motions from one quarter to another in a moment. For notwithstanding the resolution of the Fauentines to fight it out to the last man, committing their lives and liberties to one perill, yet having received great harmes by this affault, they began to take fuch counfell of their present condition, that seeing on all sides generall apparance of daunger, and no expe-Etation of succours in a state so abandoned, their confidence began to turne into feare: and as there was no possibilitie, that their proper valours only without fresh succours, could make long refistance against so great an army alwayes renued: so they saw that with increase of more harmes & worse conditions, they shold in the end either be taken by force, or constrained as a last necesfitie, to put them selues ynder the power of the victors: And therefore their fortune making these feares reasonable in them, they yeelded to the Duke vpon couenant to have their goods & lives faued, & that After their Lord should remaine in his libertie, and to enjoy wholly the reuenue of his proper possessions. These couenants the Duke kept faithfully on the behalfe of the people of Faenza: But Astor, a young man of xviij . yeares and of an excellent beautie, his age and innocencie yeelding to the difloyaltie and crueltie of the victors, was retained by the Duke with very honorable demonstrations, under colour that he should remaine in his Court but within few dayes after being fent to Rome, after (fo went the bruite) fome had fatisfied their vile vnna-

FaenZa yeelded to the Duke, turall lust on him, he was secretly put to death, together with his bastard brother.

After the victorie of Faenza, the Duke marched towards Bolognia, laying his plot not only to occupie that Citie, but also to molest the Florentines which were now become much undersoot, having added to the first discontentment of the French king, new occasions of disliking: for, being wearie of the huge expences which they had made, continuing still for the furnishing of the warre with Pifa, & having suspition of the forces of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, they payed not to the king (notwithstanding his great instance) the residue of the moneys which had bin lent them by the Duke of Millan, nor yet those sums which he pretended to be due to him for the Smillers who he had fent against Pifa. The Floretines (contrary to their contract established with the Cardinal of Amboyle) refuled to furnish one pay for them to returne into their country, for that they departed, long afore the terme of the seruice, for the which they had received pay, was expired. But the king, to entertaine alwayes that nation in good friendship, made good their pay of his proper treasure, which he redemanded of the Florentines with sharpe words, not admitting the excuse of their inabilitie, which was made greater by the ciuill difcords that tooke their beginning of the disorders which were in the gouernment popular: wherein no man having a found care of the affaires, and many of the principall Citizens being suspected either for friends to the Medices, or as men desiring another forme of gouernment, things were ouerfuled more with confusion then with counsel. By occasion of these troubles civill, they made no provision to satisfic the demaunds of the king, but letting passe without effect, the respits and delayes which he had given them, they had made him much discontented: & increasing his anger by the occasion of their weaknesse, he required them to prepare to contribute to him the moneys and other aides, which they promifed for the expedition of Naples. He said, that albeit they owed him none according to the couenants that were made between them (vnleffethey had recoursed Pifa) yet, as touching him, they ought to hold it for recoucred, seeing it was through their owne fault, that their victorie agreed not with their expectation. Of this was the cause, either the desire of money, which of his owne nature he loued much, or the discontentment that they had not observed the respites he had graunted them, or rather the opinion he had, that for the disorders in their government, and the great number of friends the Medices had in Florence, he was able to make no foundation in the occurrence of affaires: and to bring them by sharpnesse to that, which his authoritie could not leade them vnto, he delinered publikely very angrie termes to their Embassador resident about his person, whom he asfured, that he was no more bound to their protection, for that, they failing to accomplish the capitulation made at Millan, in not making him fatisfied at the time appointed of the moneys promifed in the fame, he was at libertie from all right or lawes of observation. By meanes wherof, Julian de Medicus, being goue to his court with the prinitie and recommendation of the Pope, to befeech his maiestie in his name, and in compassion of his brethren, to be restored to their countrey, promifing him great quantities of moneys; he heard him willingly, and deuiled continually with him of the meanes for their returne. And on the other fide the Duke Valentinois vling the oportunitie of theleoccasions, & pushed forward withall by Vitellozze and the Vrsins, then in his service & pay, and who were just enemies to the Florentyns, the one for the death of his brother, & the other for the conjunction he had with the Medices, had, for that cause sent afore to the succors of Pssa, Lynerot de Ferme with an hundred light horimen, & fince the conquest of Faenza stood determined to molest them, notwithstanding that neither his father nor he, had received of the no harmes, but rather pleasures and commodities, seeing at their requests, they had renounced the protection of them of Riara, whereunto they were bound, and consented to libertie and passage of victuals thorough their lands to his Campe: being then departed out of Romania in this deliberation, & fince the coquest of Faenza, being declared by the Pope, with the instification of the consistory, Duke of Romania, & enioying also the inuestiture of the same, he entred with his armie into the territories of Bolognia, with great hope to occupie it: but the same day that he lodged in the borough of S. Peter, standing almost vponthe confines between Ymola & Bolognia, he received comandement from the French king to proceed no further in the subduing of Bolognia, nor to chase out of it John Bentinolle, for that he had taken as well him as the Citie into his protection. His maiestie alleaged, that the expresse exception which he had made, not to prejudice the rights of the Church, ought to be understood of those rights and preheminences which the Church did then enjoy, for that being construed without distinction, and not according as the words sounded, as the Pope preteded, it had bin a thing vaine & of no moment, for the Bolonnois & for the Bentinoleis, to receive them into his protection. Therfore the Duke leaving for that time, with no smal complaints of the Pope and theking, the ambitious hopes he had conceived, made a covenant with Bentinolle by the meane of Pawle vrfin, which bare these articles: That they of Bolognia should give him liberty of passage and victuals: That he should pay to him yearly nine thousand dukats: That he should serue him with a certaine proportion of men at armes & footmen for his expedition into Tuskane: And to leave him Castelbologma, a place betweene Ymola & Faenza, and of the iurisdiction of Bologma, which he gaue to Pawle Vrfin. When this accord was made, Bentinolle, either for a fearfull suspition he had of himfelfe, or for that Duke Valentynois (as the faying was) to make him more hatefull in that City, had told him that the famuly of the Marifeotties (a faction puissant and of great fauours, and for that reason, and for his insolency much suspected of him) had defired him to make the enterprise of Bolognia: he caused present slaughter to be made of almost all that famuly that were within Bolognia, vling for ministers in that cruelty, together with his fonne Hermer, many Noble young Gentlemen, to the end that for the memory to have defiled their hands in the bloud of that faction, and by that meanes become enemies to that famuly; they should be the more assuredly " bound to the preferuation of his estate: weake surety, whose foundation is builded vpon the bloud " of innocents, and a lamentable example, to purge furmifed suspition, by vnlawfull slaughter.

The French bands followed no further the Duke Valentynois, having affignment to joyne with the army of the king, which contained a thousand Launces & ten thousand sootmen marching vnder M.2 Aaubigny to the enterprise of Naples: but the Duke Valentinois tooke his way through the countrey of Rolognia, to the lands of the Florentyns, with an army of seuen hundred men at armes & fine thousand footme of choise, & with fine hudred me at armes & two thousand footme, which Bentyuolle gaue him under the leading of his sonne the Pronotory. He sent to demaund of the Florentyns passage and victuals through all their lands, & marching on without tarying their aunswere, he entertained with gracious words the Embassadors which they had sent to him, vntill he was palt the Appenyn: but alloone as he was arrived at Barbarina (his fweet words turned into fowre meanings) he required that they would make confederation with him: And that they wold take him into their pay with fuch regiments of men at armes & other coditions as agreed with the greatnesse he held: And that chaunging the present gouernment, they wold establish another, such one as he might repose more in. The thing that gave him this boldnesse, to demaund these things, was not so much his power or stregth (for he had no great army or artilleries to batter wals) as the illestate of the Florentyns, who had very few men at armes, or other footme then they of the coutrey whom they comaunded dayly: he was also much furthered in this actio, by the feare, suspitio: & great disagreements that were in Florence, for that he had in his army Vitellozze & the Vrfins, & for that by his directio, Peter de Medicis was abiding at Losana in the courtey of Bolognia: And lassly, for that the people were ful of lealosses by an opinio they had coceiued, that the greatest citizens had procured his coming, to the end to erect a gouernmet according to their fancies. Notwithflanding the Duke Valentenois had no great defire to reestablish or set vp againe Peter de Medicis, for that he esteemed not the greatnesse of the Vrsins & V stellozze convenient for his enterprise, with whom he knew that Peter had great affinity, & being repossessed of his countrey, wold minister no small trength to them. Jointly to this, I have vnderstood by nich worthy of faith & credit, that he kept fixed in his mind, the remembrance of an auncient grudge against him, who being Archbishop of Pampelnua, & his father not yet Pope, he studied the comon lawes in the schooles of Psfa, for that he went to Florece to coplaine to him of a certaine crime comitted against him by one of his familiars; & waiting in vaine many houres to have accesse to him (being occupied either in his affaires or pleasures) he returned to Pi/a not so much as speaking with him, esteeming himself much difgraced & injured: and yet he made other femblance to the Vitelly & Vr sins, rather to entertaine them in deuotion, the that his thoughts were simple, or his intentions not dissembled: but much more to augmet the mutinies & disagreemets of the Floretins, by the which he hoped either to range the to better coditios, or to be able to occupy some place of importace in their iurisdictio: but finding by many tokes apparant, that the French king brooked not his entry in that fort into their countrey, when he came to Campy fix miles from Florence, he accorded with them in this fort: That betweene the common weale of Florence & him there should be a confederation indifferent for the defence of their estates, with prohibition to ayde rebelles either of the one or other part, and chiefly that the Duke should not succor the Pifans: That the Florentyns shold pardon to wholoeuer, all faults committed by his comming, and should not oppose themselves against him for the defence of the Lord of Plombyn, who was vnder their protection: That they should entertaine him for three yeares with three hundred men at armes, and pay of fixe & thirty thousand duckats for every yeare, & he to send that ayd to them as often as they shold have need, either for their owne defence, or to offend another. After this accord was ratified, he went to Signa, marching by easie iournies, and remaining certaine dayes in euery reposing place, did great harmes in the countrie by fire and robberies, no otherwise then if he had bin an enemy professed. He demanded befides (according to the custome in the paies of nienat arms) the fourth part of the money due for one yeare, and that they should prepare for himartilleries for the enterprise of Plombyn. The one of which demaundes the Florentyns denied him flatly, as being not bound vnto it the other they deferred for that they had not taken counfell to observe that, which he went about to make them promise by force. By the aduertisements of their Embassador with the Frech king they hoped to be deliuered from those oppressions by his authority, a hope which they foud not altogether vaine, for that it nothing displeased the king that the Duke should threaten them, but not affaile them: as well for that the change of the present government would have bin to his discontentment, as also, albeit he could have wished another form of governmet, yet, it wold have greatly displeased him, if it had bene introduced with other forces, or other authority then his . In which regard, affoone as he understood that the Duke was entred upon the dominions of the Floreigns, he ministred to him a sharpe direction to depart with speed, & commounded M. d'Aubiomy who was in Lombardy with the army, that in case of the Dukes disobedience, he fliold oppose against himby copulsion & force of the whole army. This direction of the king brought the Duke into alteratio of intention & purpose, and not tarying so much as for a quarters pay, nor any furniture of artillery, he tooke his way towards Plombyn, & gaue order that the Pilans, who by meane of Vitello 220, whom he had fent thither for artillery, were incamped before a borough of the Florentyns, should withdraw and leavy their siege.

Being entred into the territories of Plombyn, he tooke Sugeretta, Scarling, and the Iles of Elba and Pranofa, and furnishing enery peece with fufficient garrison as wel for the defence of the places already occupied, as to entertaine continually exatió vpon them of Plombyn, he returned to Rome with the refidue of his regiments, to follow the kings army that marched to the enterprise of Naples: whereof one partied by M. a Aubigny was entred into Tuskane by the way of Califocaro, The computaand the other folowed by the countrey Lumgiana, The whole army affembled in one strength, co-tion of the tained a thousand Launces, source thousand Swiffers, and sixe thousand sootners, of nation French and Gascoynes, to whom was ioyned (according to their maner) a great quantity of artilleries. About the fame time alfo, the army by fea departed out of Prouence for the fame expedition under the leading of the Lord of Ranaltyn gouernour of Genes, wherein were three Caracks of Genes, & fixteene other thips, together with many other finall veffels fraught with bands of footmen. Against these movings & preparations of warre, king Federyk (ignorant that the Spanish armies under shadow of friendship were prepared against him) solicited Consaluo (abiding in Sicelia with the regiments of Spaniards, & making semblance to succour him) to come to Calett, after he had put into his hands certaine places of Calabria which he demaunded, to the end to make more easie the conquest he intended, but under colour that it was for the suretie of his people. King Federik made his reckening, that Confaluo being joyned to the army, his strength in particular wold containe feuen hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horsemen, & fixe thousand footmen, copounded vpon bodies, partly entertained already by him, and partly of fuch as the Colomois leauied at Marina: a force which he supposed sufficient to resist the French men, without being conthrained to inclose himselfe intownes, notwithstanding he noutished no great hope in the ayde from the Prince of the Turkes, of whom he had required fuccours with no final inflance, shewing him that he had more reaso to seare peril by the victory of the present king, the of the late king his predecessor. And to make cleare way to an actio of so great importace (it is a chiefe surety to Princes to cut offtreasos in the beginning) he appreheded & put in prison, the Prince of Bisigna & the Cont of Melotte, accused afore him to have had secret intelligece with the Cont Catazze who was in the French army. With these hopes (having also sent Ferdinad his eldest son being very yong to Tareta more for his furety if things succeeded ill, the to defend the city) he encaped with his army at S. Germein: where attending the succours of Confaluo and the bandes which the Colonnois leuied, he hoped to accomplish a more happie action in the desence of the entrie into the king-used, he hoped to accomplish a more happie action in the defence of the entrie into the kingdome, then Ferdinand his nephew had done against the enterprise of king Charles.

In this clate & disposition of affaires, all the regions of Italy were replenished with incredible

doubts & perplexities, every one judging that this enterprise would be a beginning of most great calamities: for that as the preparations of the French king seemed not so mightie, as to be able to furmount the loynt forces of king Federike and Confalmo, so wife men occupied this opinion, that the spirits of so mightie kings beginning once to waxe angrie, both the one & other partie would continue the war with far greater forces, which would fir vp eafily through all Italy both great & dangerous motions, for the diverse inclinations of the other Potentates. But assoone as the French army was ariued at Rome, the world faw cafily into the vanitie of those discourses: for that the Embassadouts of Fraunce & Spaine, entring together into the Consistorie, made publication afore the Pope & Cardinals, of the league made betweene their kings, intending chiefly (as they faid) to an expedition to be made against the enemies to Christian religion: and demanding the inucstiture of the kingdome according to the tenor of the convention made, it was agreed into by the Pope with the fame speed it was required, thinking it but reasonable to performe that which he made no difficultie to graunt. In fo much as no man doubting now what wold be the end of this war, the feares of men were conuerted into admiration, euery one wondring at the doings of the French king, who, by fuffring the moytie of the realine to fall rather into the hands of the king of Spaine, did as it were leade by the hand into Italy (where before he only was the Arbitrator of all things) another king to whom such as might be discontented with him, might have recourse, & was also straightly allied to the king of Romains by many bonds of affinitie, then to endure that king Federike might remaine Lord of the whole, acknowledging to hold it of him, and yeeld him tribute for it, as by fundrie meanes he had fought to obtaine it. But the vniuerfal conceptions of men were no leffe deuided touching the integritie and faith of Ferdinand, who, by an ambitious lust to occupie one part of the kingdome, had conspired against a king of his bloud; & to draw him the more cassly to his ruine, he had alwayes entertained him with false promises to succour him; wherein he had not only defaced the reputation of the title of king Catholike, which he & Queene Elizabeth his wife had obtained certaine yeares before of the Pope: but also had slained that renowme and glorie which held their names raifed up to the heavens, for driving the Moares out of the realine of Gramado, no lesse for the zeale they bare to religio, then for regard of their proper interest. To these imputations, or rather reproches imposed ypon both the one and other king there was answered no other thing for the French king, but that his power was sufficient to remedie all those disorders in convenient leason, not remembring that where things are devided, the suretie is intricate, & where « there be competitors to one thing,& they no leffe equall in ftreeth, then all one in ambition, there "distrustes are nourished, and no part free from suspition, but all things intangled with confusions For Ferdinand, it was fayd, that albeit king Federike had giuen him iust occasion to be moued against him, as knowing that he had long time before practifed secretly with the French king to his prejudice: yet that had not flirred him, but the confideration of the kings pretence, determining in what fort soener it were, to performe an enterprise vpon the realme of A aples, brought him to this necessitie either to defend it, or abandon it. In taking upon him the defence, he should kindle so great a fire, that it could not but send daungerous sparkes over all the common weale of Chri-Hendome, chiefly the Turkes armies being to ftrong and mightic against the Venetians both by fea and land, and if he should abandon it, he knew his realme of Sicilia stood in manifest perill; and befides, it was a thing that wrought too much to his detriment, that the French king should occupie the realme of Naples, which of right beloged to him, & might eftfoones reuert to him by new rights, if the lyne of Federike should faile: & therfore amyd so many difficulties he had chosen the way of deuiding, with hope that by the ill gouernment of the French, their moytic might also descend to him in time: and that in this case, as the regard of publike vtilitie counselled him, which he had alwayes more highly esteemed then his proper profite: so he might either keepe it in himselfe, or restore it to Federike, or rather leave it to his issue and children, holding his name almost in horrour, for that he knew, that afore the French king did any action upon the Duchy of Mallan, he had practifed with the Turkes. These were the reasons generall alledged on the behalfe of both the kings, supporting their actions more by strained colour, then equitic of title, & applying

The Pope giueth the innefliture of the kingdome of Naples to the Ivench and Spanyard indifferently. applying to the aduct fitie of the king of Naples, their vniust ambitio, they made litle care to keep their particular moities, that had no conscience to euich the just owner out of the whole.

The league of the two kings brought fuch aftonishment to Federike, that notwithstanding Consalno, seeming to reject that which was published at Rome, promised him with one constancie to come to his succours: yet, he chaunged his first counsels, and retired from S. Germain towardes Capua, where he expected the effect of his direction for the bands leavied by the Collonnois: who, leaving garrison within Amilian, abadoned all the refidue which they held in the territoric of Rome, for that the Pope by the colent of the Frech king, had take armes to occupy their estates. In which difficulties, Consaluo, being well aduertised that the French armie was passed Rome, discouered at last his commissions, & sending to Naples six gallies to bring away the two old Queenes, the one fifter, & the other necce to his king, Profeer Colonne adusted king Federike profeer Coto retaine the gallies, & drawing all his power into one stregth, to make resistance to the enemics lonno aduleth in the field: for that in making a triall of fortune, there would be some hope of victorie, the issues king Federike ofbattels being farre more incertaine, then all other humaine actions: Otherwise he saw nothing to adventure the battell. but manifelt perill, two fo mightie kings joyning against him, and he nothing strengthned from the forreine, and leffe affured amid the treafons of his owne people: he told him, that in a daunger so present, celeritie was more necessarie then counsell; and against enemies so neare approching, his greatest furctic stood in the expedition of the battell, having no other meane to make head against two so mightic kings inuading him in diverse parts of his kingdome. But Federike, whose minde was wholly ouerruled with feares and doubts, found litle hope in this counsell, & therfore determined to looke to the garde of his townes, remembring that leffe in any other humane action, then in the successe of battell, the innocencie of the cause getteth the vpper hand. Therefore, S. Germain with other peeces neare about it, being already drawne into rebellion, yea eyen before M. d' Aubieny marched from Rome: he determined to make the first defence in the towne of Capua, wherein he bestowed Fabricio Colonne with three hundred men at armes, certaine light horsemen, and three thousand footmen, and joyned with him Riuncee de Alarciano, whom he had newly taken into his pay. He left Profper Colonne for the garde of Naples, and him felfe, with the refidue of his companies, entred Auer fo. But as open warre ministreth many occafions to reuenge particular wrongs: fo Monsieur a' Aubigny in his marching from Rome, burned Marina, & Caua, with certaine other peeces of the Colonnois, being angry that Fabricso had put to execution in Rome, the messengers of certaine Barons of the realme holding with the French, which were gone thither to cotract with him. Afterwards he tooken is way to Motfortin, where he thought Iulio Colonne would make refistance: but having left it abandoned with verie litle honour, M.a Aubigny passing further, commaunded all the places which be along the way to Capuse, vntill the riner of Vulturno neate Capus, which being too deepe for the armie to passe ouer without perill, the vertue of their Generall found out a way to passe, by marching vp more hightowards the mountaine: wherof Federike being aduertifed, retired to Naples, & abadoned Auer lo, which with Nola & many other places gaue the selues to the Frech, whose whole stregth was now brought into the cofines of Capua, where they caped, some on this side, & some beyod the riuer, on the upper fide where the riuer beginneth to run neare the towne: and putting force to their fortune, they battred it on all parts, & charged it afterwards with a furious assault, which albeit was not pleasant to them, but were constrained to retire from the wals with their many harmes: yet imparting no leffe terrour and daunger to the defendants, the mindes of the Captaines and fouldiers began to incline to accord, the people of the Citie beginning to draw into mutinic, together with the regiments of Pealants withdrawne thither in great numbers. But as in warres there be some infolencies which the Captaines cannot bridle, and many negligences which befatall instruments and occasions of perill: so Fabricio Colonne, the eight day after the Camp was planted, having begun to parley with the Count Caiazze vpon a Bastillio, the negligent garde of those that were within (as often hapneth when men be nearest accord) gaue occafion to the enemies to enter: and they, vling the law of victors, tooke libertie to turne all things to the reward of their aduenture: in fo much as what for the greedinesse of pillage, and defire to revenge the harmes received at the first assault, they put the whole towne to sacke, and made a Great cruelwonderfull flaughter, retaining onely for prifoners, such as remained free from their crueltie. The licentious field of the victors was such that their crueltier aged vp6 all ages fever & qualities. The licentiousnelle of the victors was such, that their crueltie raged vpo all ages, sexes, & qualities

the fouldiers: and as many of them were fold afterwards at Rome for a verie small price, so some of them esteeming it agreeable to their vertue, to seare death lesse then the losse of honor, threw the felues into wels, & offered up in rivers an oblation of their undefiled bodies. It is faid, that befides other abhominations worthie of perpetuall infamie, many of the wonie which had escaped the first furie, being withdrawne into a Tower under none other confidence then fuch as follow creatures in miferie, the Duke of Valetinois, who followed the army as the kings Lieutenat, went to take a view of them, accompanied onely with the Gentlemen of his house and his guard; and after he had confidered, not of their estates, but of their beauties, the copassion he shewed, was, that he retained for his owne vie fortic of the most fairest of them. Fabricio Colomo, Dom Hugo of Cardona, and all the other Captaines and men of condition were made prisoners, amongst whom Rinnece Mariano, who at the affault had received a wound with a crosbow shot, being in the keeping of the fouldiers of the Duke, died within two dayes, not without suspition of poifon. The losse of Capua cut off all hopes to king Federske to be able hence forward to defend any thing. Caletta yeelded with a speed according to the felicitie of the victors . And M. a' Aubieny being come with his armie to Averse, and the Citie of Naples left abandoned, which made composition for threescore thousand Duckats, Federike retired into the new Castle, and immediatly after (having onely regard to his life in fuch extremitie of fortune) made couenant with Monfr d'Anbieny to deliuer vp within fixe dayes all the townes and forts, which he held appertaining to that moytic of the division, which should descend to the French king: referving onely for fixe moneths the Ile of Y /chia, during which time it should be lawful for him to go whither he wold, except in the realme of Naples: and to fend an hundred men at armes to Tarenta: that he might take out of the new Castle and the egge Castle what he would, except the artilleries of king Charles which remained there: that free pardon should be given to all faults committed since the late king Charles conquered the realme of Naples: and that the Cardinals Colonne and Ara-

the rocke of Yichia might be seene drawne into one shew, a true resemblance and figure of all the infelicities of the line of the old Ferdinand (which was a spectacle verie pitifull:) for that be-The foremes of fides the afpect of Federike nevely diuested of so noble a realme, the consideration of his litle

the calamitie of his lifter, this increase of miserie happened; that after the death of her late husband Matthias that renowmed king of Hungary, the receining promife of mariage of Launcelot king of Bohema, inducing her to ayde him in the conquest of the same realme: she was refused by him with great ingratitude, after he had filled his delights with the sweete fruites of her bodie, and afterwards maried another by the dispensation of Pope Alexander. To this infelicitie was also joyned, Isabell aforetime honored with the titles and dignities of Duchesse of Atellan, but now no leffe wretched then the others, for that almost at one time, she suffered privation of her husband, of lier estate, and ofher onely some. Amongst these tragical accidents, I may not forget this notable example of the affection of a fonne to his father, a matter fo much the more strange, by how much in those times the love of children was rare towards their fathers. One of the sonnes of the L.G. Montpensier being gone to Pozzuolo to visite the sepulcher of his father, fuffred him felfe to be so much ouerruled with passion, that after he had washed all parts of the monument with his lamentable teares, he fainted, and fell downe dead upon the fepulcher of his father, who had as litle sence of those his latest sorowes, as he had feeling of so great a fault, the perils be pall that nourished their feares, they returne to a comfort, not to consider what they have suffered, but to remember that no worse can happen. Even so king Federike making the extremest reckening of his advertities, was resolved (bearing a settled hate to the king of Spane,) Federike in to recommit him felfe wholly to the honour and elemency of the French king, to whom he fent mut himfelfe to to demand fafe conduct; and having obtained it, he left all the refidue in the rocke of Yichea, the honour and where remained also Prosper and Fabricio Colonne: and the Ile remaining as it did before under slamency of the the government of the Marquis of Guast and the Counteste of Francquentle, after he had sent part of his people to the defence of Tarenta, he went into Fraunce with five Galleys: a counself euill taken (fauing that men in aduerfitie haue no libertie of election) for that if he had bene in a place of libertic, feeing to what termes the warres grew afterwards betweene those two kings, he might happily have bene holpen with many occasions afterwardes to returne into his kingdome:but chusing rather to fit downe with the sweete fruites of a quiet life, then to follow the bitter trauels of a kingdom broken, his fortune brought him to this humilitie, to accept fuch conditions as were offered him by the king; who gave him, to the end he might remaine in Fraunce, the Duchy of Anion, with so liberall a pension, that it amounted every yeare to thirtie thousand Duckats. At his departure he fent order to those in whose confidence he had left the governement of Y/chia, that they should deliuer it up to the French king, & shewing no leffe readinesse to render it then they were vnable to keepe it, he told them that the way to defie their fortune, was, not to give her leave to exercise her malice to their vttermost ruine.

Consalue was marched at the same time into Calabria, where albeit was a generall inclination and defire to liue rather under the rule and Lordship of the French, yet rheir aduersities ouerruling their dispositions, he found almost no resistance, but with affections compelled, was received into every towne, except Manfredonia and Tarenta. But the destinie of the countrey running with his fortune, after he hadforced Manfredoma and the Castle, he incamped with his armie in the confines of Tarenta, where albeit he found greatest difficulties, yet in the end he had it by accord, for that the Count Potenso, to whose guarde the young Duke of Calabria had bene recommended by his father) & Frier Leonard of Naples, Knight of Rades, and governour of Tarenta, seeing no hope or possibilitie of further defence, compounded to give vp the Citie and Castle, if within foure moneths they were not succoured. In which composition they receiued of him a folemne oath vpon the Sacrament, that he would leave in libertie the Duke of Calabria, who had secret commandement from his father to come to him into Fraunce when he could no more refull his fortune: but neither the feare of God, nor regard to his honor, had more force, then the interest of the estate: for Consaluo, judging what a matter of importance it would be in time to come, if the person of the Duke were not in the power of the king of Spaine: thin- The eldest son king it lesse sinne to dispense with his oath, the to loose that oportunitie, would not suffer him to of king Fededepart, but affoone as he could, fent him well accompanied into Spaine, where the king received rike fent into him, and reteined him neare about him in high familiaritie and honours due to his greatnesse.

In these seasons the affaires of the Pope proceeded with a prosperitie accustomed, for that he had eafily got all the cleates which' the Colonnois and Sauelles held in the confines of Rome, of the which he disposed one part to the Ursins . And the Duke Valentinois continuing his enterprise against Plombyn, sent thither Untellozze and John Paule Baillon with new regiments: for whose comming, and the ill disposition of his businesse, lacques Appyan the natural Lord, leauing the towne and Castle manned with garrisons according to his fortune, went with speede into Fraunce, to see if he might obteine of the king (who long afore had received him into his protection) that for the regard of his owne honour he would not fuffer him to periff. The king, without couering his infamie by art, answered him roundly, that having promised the Pope not to oppose against him, he could not minister to his distresse without doing wrong to the league fworne. But as nothing is more swift then aduersitie, which keepes his course by the violent motion that drives him: fo, whileft the miscrable Lord of Plambyn was in vaine soliciting for succours, Pandolfe Perrucci rendered the towne to the Duke of Valentinois, and within few dayes after, the Castle, (his industrie no lesse the his fortune, turning all things to his discomfort). In this course of the Popes selicities, he maried his daughter Lucrecia (wife afore to three husbands, and now widow by the death of Ginnon Prince of Vifelle, baffard sonne to Alphonfo king of Naples, whom the Duke Valentinois had flaine) to Alphonfo eldeft sonne to Hercules D'este, with a portion of an hundred thousand Duckats in ready money, and many other giftes of great value. To this mariage so vinworthy for the house of Este which was wont to seeke societie wirh the famulies most noble, Hercules and Alphonso consented, partly for that the French king desiring to fatisfie the Pope in all things, was an importunate procuter of it; but chiefly they thought by this meane (if against fo great a disloyaltie there be any suretie sufficiet) to assure theselues of the armes and ambition of the Duke Valentinois; who bearing a great power by the treasure & authoritie of the Sea Apostolike joyned to the fauours which the Frech king bare him, was the only manthat was feared throughout the greatest part of Italie, euery one knowing that his ambition was infinite, & his couctoufnesse without limite. The French king continued with great diligece the negociation of peace with Maximilian Cafar, not only for the hopes he had to shake off by that meane, expences and fuspitions, & to obtaine of him the inuestiture of the Duchie of Millan which he defired much: but also to have oportunitie to offend the Venetians, as being perswaded that his prosperities were grieuous to them, and with all nourishing this opinion, that they laboured fecretly to breake the peace betweene Cafar and him. But that which most stirred him to this inclination, was a couetous defire (as well for himselfe as at the perswafions of the Millanois)to recouer Cremona and Guiaradadda, townes which himfelfe had accorded to them a litle before: and also to get againe Bresse Bergame, and Creme, auncient apertenaunces of the Duchie of Millan, and lately possessed by the Venetians in the warres which they had with Fhiin Maria Visconte. To debate these things to better effect, & to ordaine the provisions necessary for the expedition of Naples, he had log time before fent to Millan, the Cardinall of Amboile; the tongue and authoritic of whom, were the proper tongue and authoritic of the king, and who had remained there many moneths, being not able, for the ordinarie variatios of the king of \mathcal{R} omains, to establish any thing with him. About this time, the Florentins solicited by means of the Cardinall, to be received of new into the kings protection: but they made a vaine labour of it; for that the king propounded hard conditions, and declared a great alienation and estrainging of minde from them. Wherein pretending to be no further bound to the couenants made at Mullan, he caused to be assigned ouer to the Lucquois (received of new into his protectio) Pietrasanta and Alutron, as being auncient members of that Citie: but not without the summe of four and twentie thousand Duckats, which hereceived of them as Lord of Genes, for that the Lucquois anciet owners of Pietrafanta, had by reason of some necessities, engaged it for the like fumme to the Genoways, from whom it was discended afterwardes to the Florentins by force of armes. Befides, the Cardinall treated with them of Sienna, Lucqua, & Pila, to knit them altogether for the reestablishing of Peter de Medicis in Florence: wherein as the Cardinall cast his plot that the king should obtaine by this action a round summe of money of enery of them, so his intention tooke such proceeding, that they were almost at accord, and yet the denise dissoluted without effect, for that there was no agreement amongst them to satisfic the proportion of money that was demaunded.

At length the Cardinall, winning by litle & litle vpon the inclination of the king of Romains, had a more certaine hope then before to contract forme accord: and in that regard he went to Trent, to communicate with him, where they treated of many things concerning the effablishment of Madame Claude the kings daughter, with Charles the eldelt fonne to the Archduke, with concession of the inucliture of the Duchie of Millan to both the one and other of them: they treated also to leavie war against the Venetias, to recover those places which either of them pretended to be vsurped upon them: and lastly, they consulted to call a general! Councell to reforme the Church, not onely (as they protefted) in her members, but also in her head. Which motion the king of Romains scenned to entertaine with a semblance of consent, to nourish the hopes of the Cardinall of Amboife to obtaine the Popedome, whereunto he afpired with manifest ambition, the king his maister being a special furtherer of the action for the interest of his proper greatnesse: Such a raging humour is ambition, that it tempteth those men to solicite high honors, who for their proper vertues, are vnworthy of them: It makes them blind in their defires, and impudent to hope to compasse even things that are without their reach. On the behalfe of the French king, it was accorded in that contract, that what confederation or aliance he had made, it should be eviders flood with this clause, saving the rites of the Empire, by nicane whereof it should be lawfull to the Emperour to chalenge it aswel for those that should be now named by the king, as for fuch as he had afore taken into his protection. There rested onely the principall difficulty touching the inuestiture, for that Cafar refused to graunt it to the iffine males if the king should have any. They stood also vpon termes for restitution of the exiles of the Duchie of Mil-Lin, which being instantly demanded by Cafar, the king refused flatly to graunt; for that besides they were many in number, there were also personages of importance and authoritie. At last by compulsió of the kings importunities, he was content to give libertie to Cardinall Askanius, & hope of the like grace to Lodowik Sforce, with affignation of pension of twentie thousand Duckats by yeare to furnish his countenance in the Realme of France. By reason of these difficulties, they fell not otherwise to accord, then with hopes to be able to introduce some convenient forme, & therfore the truce being eftloones prolonged, the Cardinall returned into France, holding almost for certaine, that the matters which they had debated, would with speede divolve to their perfectió: which opinion was augméted by this occasion, that a litle after, the Archduke, before he went into Spaine to receive in his person, & the person of lane his wife eldest daughter of the king there, the oath of fidelitie of the peoples, as ordained to that succession made his way by ad accompanied with his wife, & met at Blow with the French king, who receiving him with many honors, they telled agreed touching the mariage of their children. In this yeare dyed Augustin Barbarin Duke of Venuce, who managed his principality with fuch happinelle & authority, that in many actios it feemed that he ouercame the degree of his predeceffors therfore the power of his fucceffors being limited by new lawes, Leonard Loredan was elected in his place, the common weale feeling no chaunge in publike things, neither by the death of the Prince, nor for the election of a new:to excellent was the forme of his gouemement.

In this yeare, the Florentins and the Pisans (contrary to the customes of the yeares before) brought forth no great actions one against the other: for that the Florentins, being no more vider the protection of the French, and standing in continual suspition of the Pope and the Duke Valentinois, studied more to keepe that was their owne, then to offend others: and the Pisans not haing of themselues any power to vexe them, had lesse possibilitie to do it by the ayde of others, for hat there were none that stirred otherwise in their fauours, but onely to sustaine them when they were in perill of ruine. But in the yeare 1502, might be seene a recontinuation of their actions acsuftomed, for that the Florentins, almost in the beginning of the yeare, contracted of new with the rech king, after they had ouercome all difficulties, more by the benefit of fortune, then by the difofition of the king or other occasions: seeing the king of Romains (since the Cardinall of Ambosse eparted)being possessed of new thoughts & purposes, & refusing to accopiss to the Frech king he investiture of the Duchie, yea even to his daughters maried, sent as his Embassadours into 114e; Hermes Sforce, whom the king had acquited of his imprilonment, and the Prouoft of Beffina, deale with the Pope and the other Potentates touching his descending into Italie, to take the crowne of the Empire. These Embassadours, omitting no oportunitie wherein occasion was gien, as they soiourned certaine dayes in Florence, obtained promise of the same Citie to contriute to his ayde with a hundred men at armes and thirtie thou and Duckats, affoone as he was ened into Italie. In which respect, the French king (Princes are icalous one ouer another touching nities & forreine confidences) who feared least the Florentins dispairing of his friendship, would une their fauours to Maximilian, was contet to qualifie the immoderate demands he had made them, & contracted an accord under conditions more tollerable: the generall parts where were second besele: That the king receiving them into his protectio, should be bound for three yeare following, tweene the defend them with armes at his proper expeces, against who so ever would directly or indirectly French ling oleft the touching the state and dominions which at that time they possessed That the Floretins and the Floretins iold pay to him within the faid three yeares, fix score thousand Duckats, every yeare a third part: hat all other capitulations made betweene them with all bondes and promifes depending on the me, should be made dissoluted and voy de: That it should be lawfull to the Florentins to proceede ith armes against the Pssans, and all others that occupie their lands.

In regard of which confederation, the Florentins recomforted and taking a new hart, determid to give the spoyle to the cornes and graines of the countrey of Pisa, to the end that by time d famine, they might reduce the towne of Ps/a to their obedience, seeing they had so voluckitrauelled to force them by fiege. This counfell was propounded in the first yeare of their rebelin by a certaine well experienced Citizen, alledging that by those meanes, more certaine, but furer off, they should afflict and consume the Pifans, with litle expences and lesse daunger: he told é that in regard of the present códitions of Italy, much troubled & molested, if they would make ore of their treasures, they might make them serue their turnes in many occasions: but if, with the aft of their money, they would range them by force & copuliion, they should find the enterprise oth doubtful & daungerous, for that the furetie of that Citie was great by the fituation & street the walles, and full of inhabitants well refolued to defend it: befides also, as often as there should perill to lose it, it would be rescued by all those that to the enuie of our well doing, have joyned ettled disposition to see it preserved; in so much as the expences being greater then the hopes,

we should alwayes nourish our proper daungers, and cut out occasions to stirre vp new trauels: "All violent attempts being fet forth without counsell, at the beginning seeme mightie, but in con-"tinuance they are found insufficient, since in the field, armor and weapons are to small purpose, if "at home a found counsell fet not downe a good direction. The counsel of this grave Citizen being rejected in the beginning for hurtful, after the course of many yeres, was found profitable, but in a time wherein they had wasted huge expences & treasures, & attempted the victory with many intollerable dangers. After they had ouerrun their corne, hoping that the authority of the kings protection wold defend all me from rifing in the succours of the Pifans, they planted their fiege before Vicopisan, for that not many dayes before, the Pisans had taken it from them by treason of certaine fouldiers that were within : and the Captaine of the Castell not abiding for the succours which should have arrived within few houres, did render it to them with great cowardise. They made no doubt to cary it, by the penury of prouision and victuals, which they knew could not fuffice for fifteene dayes, and they had good confidence to let that none should erter, for that by the benefite of their Bastillions, which they had builded separate vpon the mountaines, they commaunded all the passages: and in the same season being advertised, that Fracisse but poore and without pay, was going with a few horsemen to enter Pifa, in the name and with letters of Maximilian, they gave direction that he should be charged on the way, where his fortune being no lesse enuious then his condition was poore, he was made prisoner, secking his safetie in a Church within the iurisdiction of the Duke of Ferrara. These accidents fell in Tuskan, no man as yet perceiving what would happen by them contrary to the expectation of cuery one. But farre more great and daungerous motions, and of the which were to descend in time to Thaples.

The French come, effects of right great importance, beganne to be disclosed in the kingdome of Naples, by the Spaniards the discords which hapned the yeare passed betweene the French and Spanish Captaines. They do dilagree vpo tooke their beginning, for that in the division made betweene both the kings, the countrie of Lathe deviding of noro and Abruzzo being adjudged to the one; and to the other, Powilla and Calabria, the confines and limites of the prouinces were not well expressed in the division: in so much as either one began to pretend, that that part which is called Capitinato did distinctly and particularly appertaine to him. To this controuer sie gaue a great occasion the alteration and chaunge made by Alphonso of Aragon King of Naples, first of that name, touching the auncient denomination and diuision of the provinces: He, looking to make easie the exactions of the revenues, deuided all the kingdome into these fixe principall provinces, Lauoro, Principato, Basilicato, Calabria, Powylla, and Abruzzo: Of these Pomylla was distinguished into these three members, Ottranto, Bary, and Capitinato', which Capitinato adioyning to Abruzzo, and divided from the refidue of Pomylla by the Riuer Lofanto, aunciently called Awfido, the Frenchmen, taking rather the advantage of the auncient division, then ruled by the late denomination. pretended, that either Capitinato was not comprehended under any one of the foure provinces devided, or elfe that it was rather part of Abruzzo then of Powylla. In this contention the importance of the countrey ledde them not fo much, as the confideration of these two infirmities; the one, for that not possessing Capitinato, they had no part in the reuenue which was drawne of the tribute of cattell, a reuenue of greatest profit in all the Realme of Naples: the other, for that Abruzzo and Lauoro being naked of graines and corne which came to Capitinato, whose provinces in times of sterilitie might be easilie reduced into great extremities, as often as the Spanish would make restraint that none should be fetched out of Ponylla and Sicilia . But it was alleaged on the contrary , that Capitinato could not appertaine to the French, for that Abruzzo which is ended in the high places, firetcheth not fo farre as the plaines: and for that also in cases of difference of the names and limits of provinces, the viage present is alwayes confidered. Notwithstanding these controversies suspending, they were content for the yeare present to deuide equally the revenue of the cattell : but in the yeare folowing, falling from that observation, either partie tooke as much as he could get, whereunto were added afterwards new quarrels, nourished til that time (as the bruite went) more by the will of the Captaines, then of the consent of their Lords and Kings. For the Spaniards pretended that Principato and Bafilicato were included in Calabria, which is deuided into two parts, Calabri Cytra and Calabria Ultra, that is, the one higher and the other lower: and also that the valley of the Benevent which the French held, was part of Powilla, and therefore fent officers to keep Court

Courtes of inflice at Tripaldo within two miles of Anelmo, where were refident the French magistrates. These beginnings of open dissention being troublesome to the principall Barons of the realme, they interposed betweene Consaluo and Lewys d'Arminack, Duke of Nemours, Vicerey for the French king, and by their intercession, Lewys being come to Melfe, and Confalue to Atele a towne of the Prince of Melfe, after the trauell of certaine moneths (in which time the two Captaines spake together) finding in them no conformitie to any forme of accord, they brought them to agree to expect fuch resolution as their kings should set downe of the controuerfie, and that in the meane time they should for beare to innouate any thing. But the Viceroy for the French, prefuming much that he was the mightier in power and force, within few dayes after, published another declaration, protesting to make warre your Consaluo, if he would not The beginning vpon the fight leave Capitinato : and with a speede as swift as his counsell was rash, he made his of warres in fouldiers runne vp euento Tripaldo, of which inuation the warre tooke his beginning, wherein Replet under the French perfeuering with actions of holfility, they followed their nursely without roads. the French perseuering with actions of hostility, they followed their purpose without regard, to swelfth, occupy by force in Capitmato and other quarters, the townes which the Spanish held. Which outrages were not onely not redreffed by the Frenchking, but being aductifed that the Spanish meant not to reeld him Capitinato, he converted himselfe wholly to the warre, and fending by fea for the strength of his people, two thousand Sprezzers, he kept still entertained in his pay the Princes of Salerno and Bisignian, and other of the principall Barons : besides, the kings person came to Lyon, to the end in his owne presence to furnish more commented the prouisions necessary for the conquest of the whole kingdome, whereunto (the places in question were lesse then to satisfie his ambition) he aspired manifestly, with intention to passe into Italy if neede require: a voyage which he was constrained to performe with a speede aboue his expectation, to suppresse the new tumults hapned in Tuskane, to the which Vittellozze gaue beginning with the privity and consent of I.P. Basllon, and the Vrfins, but epecially by the counsell & authority of Pandolfe Petrucci, who all joyned in one defite, that Peter de Medicis might be reestablished in the estate of Florence.

Of this begunnethe mutiny: William Pazzi Agent for the Florentyns in Aretze, being ad- the Florentyns uertifed that certaine of the Citizens had conspired with Vitellozze to stirre the City to rebellion in favour of against the Florentyns, beleeved that in such a communalty of wise Citizens, the mind of every Peterde Meone was not corrupted, nor remembring that to fauour the suspicion, makes the treason more distin daungerous. And occupying with himfelfe this perswasion, that the authority of the name publike, would supply the want of forces, he omitted to areare a sufficient strength to oppresse the conspirators and such as had power to resist him, and onely apprehended for prisoners, two of the accessaries and competitors to the treason: a dealing too milde in so great perill, for that he gaue oportunity to the residue of the conspirators, to raise the people, by whom (according to the ill affection they bare the Florentyns) the prisoners were easily reskued, and the Agent apprehended, together with the refidue of the officers, suffring this danger more by their owne credulity and negligence, then any prowesse or vertue of their aduersaries. The whole City foorthwith published the name of liberty, and made manifest declaration of rebellion, the Citadellonely remaining in the deuotion of the Florentyns, to the which, in the beginning of the tumult, was retired Cosma Bishop of the same place, and sonne to the Agent, seeking his fafety where either his feare or fortune would leade him. After this beginning, the men of Areize fent speedily to Vitellozze, who was not well content that the matter was burst out afore the time he had agreed with the conspirators, for that it was to intercept him in his pollicy, as having not yet let downe sufficient direction for the provisions he meant to make to resist the bands of the Florentyns, if (as was very likely) they made any attempt to enter Aretze by the Citadell: For feare whereof, and to fatisfie with his presence the minds of the Citizens, he went from Citta de Castello to Aretze, accompanied with his men at armes and a choyse strength of footmen, and leaving order that they should looke diligently to hold those in the Citadell straitly inclofed, to the end that through it there might be no action against the Citie, he returned effloones to Citta de Castello, promifing to come againe with the fame spede, but with a greater strength: In all, humaine actions, there is nothing which with leffe perill may not temporife and expect, then re-,, bellion, in the oppression whereof there is no greater vertue then expedition of action: For that,, by how much it is suffered, by so much it riseth into degrees of worse nature, even as a soare that ,, is lingted, breedeth a cure doubtfull. They of Florence to whom appetrained to provide for this mischiefe, considered not well in the beginning, of what importance it was: for, the principall Citizens, by whose counsell the waighty affaires of the City had wont to passe, giving this direction, that the regiments which were incamped before Vicopifan (a number fo sufficient, that marching with diligence they might have vanquished all resistance (should be converted to Aretze. Many others which occupied the greatest romthes and offices (their knowledge being lesse then their authority, and their ignorance flaunderous to the places they occupied) maintained that it was a matter but of small moment, and that they might redresse it with the forces of their other Subjects, neighbors to the same city. Their ignorance made the suspect the soundnesse of the other counsell, and according to their wilfull credulity, they beleeved that those good Citizens, bearing minds estraunged from the present gouernment, made the daunger farre greater then it was, for a defire they had to hinder the action of Vicopifan, and by that meane to take away the oportunity to recouer Psfa. By which variation & wandring in counsel, they deferred so long to fend thrength thither, that Vitellozze taking courage of their delayes, returned to Aretze with an increase of forces, drawing thither after him with other bands I.P. Baillon, and Fabio the sonne of P. Vrsin, Peter de Medicis and the Cardinall: who having received munitions from Sienna, they began to batter the Citadell, wherein (according to the custome of many which are more craefull to erect new fortifications, the diligent to preserve the forts already builded) was no lesse want of victuals, then of all other provisions necessary to defence. And to adde the last discomfort to men in extremity, they enuironed it so straightly with trenches and mounts on the out side to give impediment to the fuccours that might enter, that they made them naked of all comfort, other then fuch as men in mifery may hope for: and therefore, waighing with their wants within the Castell, the weakenesse of the Florentyns to minister sufficient succours, and in due scason (being come but to Quarate, and durst not passe further) they rendred by necessity, that which they could not hold by their vertue, making only this agreemet, that the residue remaining in liberty, the Bishop with eight others which they of Aretze would chuse, should abide prisoners, to exchaunge them for some of their Citizens which were prisoners at Florence. The comons of Aretze dismantled the Citadell, & the army of the Florentins, fearing least Vitellozze & John Pawle, who were farre stronger then they, would charge them, retired to Monteuarcho, leaving to the discretion of the enemies, all the places there about. It was believed, that this enterprise was made without the prinity or knowledge of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, in whom was no contentment that Peter de Medicis should returne to Florence, for that he was fraightly allied with Vitellozze and the Vrfins, whom they had secretly determined to oppresse: and yet having alwayes given them hope of the contrary, they consented that Vitellozze, lohn Pawlo and Fabio, mercinary in their pay, should prosecute the enterprise: Yea they did not dissemble that they were very glad of the rebellion of Aretze, hoping, that by those displeasures done to the Florentyns, it might happen, that either they might get some part of their dominion, or at least constraine them, for their profit, to some hard condition. But the Florentyns not beleeuing but that they were the authours of the whole mischiefe, were so much the more terrified, and therefore reposing litle in the remedies which of themselves they were able to apply, for that, by the ill disposition of the City, they had in their pay but a very small proportion of men at armes, & not able to refurnish their power io soone as the necessity of their danger required: they had speedy recourse to the French King, laying afore him not only that which The Florentins they could challenge by his honour, binding himselfe so lately to their desence, but also the apparant daunger to the Duchy of Millan, if the Pope and Duke Valentinois (against whom was no little suspition to be the kindlers of this commotion) became Lords ouer Tuskane . They debated with him by lively reasons, that the Pope and the Duke were mighty in armes, having an army compounded vpon excellent Captaines and fouldiers of choise, and that by the declarations they made, neither Romania nor Tuskane would fuffice their infinite ambition, aspiring into matters more ample and immoderate. And lastly, seeing they had offended the honour of the King, by inuading fuch as were in his protection, necessity now constrained them, to thinke no lesse vpon their owne suretie, then to take from him the meane to be reuenged of so great an

have recourse to the French king.

> These reasons moued not a litle the King, who had already begunne to mislike with the insolency and ambition of the Pope and his sonne: and considering that the warre was begun in the kingdome

kingdome of Naples betweenehim and the Spanish, and the negotiation of accord with Maximulian broken, and lastly that he was not (for many reasons) to trust the Venetians, he beganto doubt least the inuation of Tuskane (supported by some secret counsell of others) turned not to his great disaduantage. In which opinion he was confirmed greatly by certaine advertisements from Charles d' Amboyse the Cardinals Nephew, and Lieutenant to the King in all the Duchie of Millan, who suspecting such innouations, perswaded the King to provide carefully for his proper daunger: and therefore with a counfell refolued, and direction equal to the importunity of the businesse, determining to make march into Italy with all speede his army, and to succour readily the Florentius, he gaue charge in the meane whileto the layd Lord Charles, to fend foorthwithto their rescues, foure hundred Launces, and dispatched an Herald in post to commaund not onely Vitellozze, John Pawle, Pandolfe, and the Vrfins, but also the Dake Valentinois, to forbeare to offend any more the Florenius, wherein himselfe made great instance to the Popes Embassador, and threatned with very sharpe words !ulian de Mediou, and the agents of Pandolfe and Vitellezze which were in his Court.

But in this time, the Duke Valentinous, who fince the accident of Aretze, was come out of non takes the Rome with his army, miking semblance to take Camerin, whither he had fent before the Duke Duily of Pr. of Grauino and Lineros de Ferme with part of his bands, to make spoyle and hold it besieged, but by me n true meaning to surprise under that semblace the Duchy of Vrbin. After he had reassembled his trmic vpon the confines of Perousa, he demaunded of Guidobaldo Duke of Irbyn, money and artillery: which was eafily agreed to him, for that it was neither for his furety to refuse a Prince who had his (trength so neare, and also having a little before compounded with the Pope touching the controverse of a tribute, he had no occation to feare. The Duke Valentinois, having by his meane made the other leffe sufficient for his owne defence, departing sodainely from Nacero, und marching with a diligence so well disposed as he would give his men no leasure to repose or payte, he arrived the same day at Cuely a towne of the Duchy. The suddennesse of whole comming, and against a people vnprouided, brought such a generall amaze, that the Duke and Francis Miria Romero Prefett of Rome his nephew, had scarce leasure to find safety in flyng; fuch a pallion is fudden feare, that it makes men runne, not whither counfell directs them, " out whither their fortune will leade them, not suffering them to consider of their perill, but makes 28 hem oftentimes to throw away their weapons, and refuse the thing that should be their safegard, " out the Dake Valentinous, putting diligence to the disposition of his fortune, obtained in very few joures, a victory of all that thate, except the Rocke of Saint Leon, and Manuola, to the great lispleasure and seare of Pandolfe, Vitellozze, and the Vrsim, who now began to discerne their proper perils, by the harmes of another.

After the conquest of the Duchie of Vrbin, the Duke Valentinois, who judged all adventures nferior to his fortune, was raifed into diverse thoughts: somtimes he determined to make an end of the enterprise of Camerin, and somtimes he resolved to inuade openly the Florentins. In which counsell he had stood setled, if the commmaundement he received from the French king, had not oridled his ambition, having affured knowledge, that notwithstanding the Popes travell to alter sim, his maiestie had sent men at atmes in fauour of the Floreniyns, & was resolutely determined to defend them, and in that inclination he prepared to passe in person into Italy. These doubts drawing diverse reasons, with no lesse variation touching the ende of things, so incombered his thoughts, that he staied within Frbyn to consider what he had to do, and what would be the suceffe of things, during which time the Pope & he folicited many matters with the Florentins, hooing to bring them fornwhat to condificend to their defires: & on the other fide, he fuffered many of his fouldiers to go continually to the Campe of Vitellozze: who having affembled an atmy of eight thousand hotimen and three thousand footmen, and for the better reputation of his doings, calling his army the Camp Ecclefiasticall, had, fince the rendring of the Citadell of Areize, occupied Mount S. Sourn, Chaffellon d'Aretze, and the city of Cortono with all the other townes and poroughs of Valduchano: of the which not one of them taried an assault, both for that they saw the fuccours of the Floreturs not in readinesse, & also, the time serving them to gather the stuits, it stood not with their abilities to lofe the profit of their reuenues, aledging that in that respect they were not rebels to the Florentins feeing Peter de Medicis was in the army, for whose restoring it was of Cortono, had fuddenly entred the countrey Casentin, but it had bene in his power to have marched euen to the walles of Florence, both for that the French bandes were not yet come, and also the most part of the Florentine footmen were dispersed, for that almost (the townes being loft) the occasion of service ceased, and they were returned to their houses. But as it hapneth oftentimes that verie small impedimentes hinder the execution of many high enterprises, so the defire hee had to winne for him selfe the borough of S. Sepulcher (a place neare to Citta de Ca-Stello) hindred the better counfell, not with flanding (to couer his couetousnesse) he alledged that it was not fure to leave behinde his backe any place that was enemie: therefore hee turned towardes Anguiaro, which place, albeit it onely had this constancie to abide till the artilleries were planted, being too weake to refift so strong an enemie, yeelded to discretion without excepting any thing. From thence he marched to the borough S. Sepulcher which he tooke by accord, hauing no better abilitie of refistance then the rest, and so drawing towardes Casentin, and arriving at the village of Raffina, he fent to funmon the towne of Poppie, of strong situation, but wherein were verie few fouldiers: but the reputation of the French armes supplied their weaknesse & want of forces, for that two hundred Launces arrived alreadie neare Florence vnder Captaine Imbault, and not daring for lacke of footemen, to affront the enemie, were marched to S. lohn & Arno., with intention to reassemble in that place all the bands. Which being knowne to Vitellozze, and fearing least his absence would be inconvenient for them of $Aret \approx e$, hee retired with diligence from Lauernia within two miles of Quaratta, and from thence drawing on to declare that he feared not the enemie, & to affure Rhondina with other places there abouts, he encaped in a strong place on that fide to Rhondina having left certaine bands of footmen for the gard of Civitella and Gargonfe, which were the ports or gates by the which the Florentin bands might enter into the countrey. These companies (being also arrived two hundred Launces more under Captaine La Hire) assembled betweene Montenarche & Laterina, with intention, that assoone as they had gathered a strength of three hundred footmen, to go incampe neare Vitellozze vpon some high hill: A resolution against his furetie, and therefore neither able to keepe that place, nor leavie his Camp without great daunger, he retired neare to the walles of Aretze: but the French taking the field with their whole armie, and incamping right over against Quaratta, he was driven to retire within Aretze: Where albeit he had fay d to many, that hee would performe a notable defence in the fame Citie, yet new accidents hapning he was confirmed to turne to new thoughts. For John Paule Baillon was come to Peronfe with his regiment, fearing (by that that was done to the Duke of Vrbin) leafthe should fall into daunger of the like oppression. By reason of which examples, and no leffe for that which hapned in Camerin, Vitellozze, Pandolfe Petrucci, & the Orlins, fell into great confusion of minde: For, in the veric time that the Duke Valentinois communed of accord with 14les de Varana Lord of Camerin, hee surprised the Citie by suttle meanes, and having Inles in his power with two of his formes, he caused them to be straggled with the same inhumanitie which he vied against others. But that which most amazed Vitellozze, was, that the French king, alreadic his two somes come to Ast, sent Longs Trimouille into Tuskan with two hundred Launces, & great Hrength of artilleries: who marching to Parma, expected there three thousand Smyllers: which the king sent for the recoucrie of Aretze, at the charges of the Floretins. The king being greatly kindled against the Pope, had an intentio to despoile the Duke Valetinois of Romania with other estates occupied by him, and for that effect, had fent for all those that either seared his power, or had bene offended by him, whom he affured that he would execute that intention in person, and protested publikely with great affection, that it was an enterprife no leffe full of pietie and deuotion, then if the action were dreffed against the Turkes. He layd also his plot, at that time to chase out of Sienna Pandolfe Petrucci for that he had fent mony to Lodowike Sforce when he returned to Millan, and alwayes had made open profession to be Imperiall. But the Pope and Duke Valentinos knowing that they were not able to refilt fo great a storme and rage of anger of the French king, had recourfe to their furtleties and well experienced craftes, with the which they forged excuses, that the actions against Arerze were done by Vitellozze without their knowledge, & that their authority sufficed not to restraine him, & much lesse to keepe fro aiding him, the Vrsins, and 1.P. Baillon, who albeit were in his pay, yet they were overruled with the regard to their proper interests: & the better to bring the mind of the king to moderatio, Duke Valent, fent to tell Vitellozze, that if he restored not Areize

and the other places of the Florentins, he would come with his whole army, and compell him to render that, which he had vniutly gotten. Which fummons joyned to the confideration of the present estate of the affaires, bred no litle assonishment in the mind of Vitellozze, fearing least (as hapneth for the most part) that the strongest being reconciled, the indignation of the king wold turne against him, which was the weaker in thrength, and farre inferior in all other meanes: and therfore to awoyd his peril fo apparant, he called into Aretze the Captaine Imbault (contrary notwithflanding to the wils of the Florentins, who defired that the townes loft might be redeliuered freely in the field) who compounded that Vitellozze departing immediatly with all his companies, fhold configne Arcize with all the other places to the French Captaines to hold them in the kings name, untill the Cardinall Vr fin, who went to the king, had spoken with his maiesty: and that in the meane while, there should not enter into Areize other companies then of the French Captains with forty horfmen: for whose furety, & no lesse for observation of the articles promised, he shold giue two of his Nephewes in oftage to Captaine Imbault. Afloone as the accord was passed, he went with all his companies and artillery from Aretze, leaving to the French men, the whole possession of all the other places, which foorthwith were deliuered ouer to the Florenins by the kings commission. Whilest the Parley of the accord continued, Captaine Imbault aunswered in fcorne to the complaints, which the Florentins made, that he could not difcerne wherein confifted that great celebration of spirit and wisdom in the Florentins, seeing they knew not, that the sooner to affure the victory without difficulty and expences, and to avoide peril of other diforders, how to defire that Aretze might fall into the hands of the king, who was not bound to beare regard (but in fortas he thought good) to the promifes made by his Captaines to Vitellozze. But the Florentins more by their fortune then their vertue, being deliuered with great facility, but not without huge expences, of fo terrible & vnlooked for affault, began to looke to the reordaining and redreffing of the policy of their common weale, by the confusion and disorders of which, experience had made them find out, yea cuen to the estate of the communalty, that they were falne into so great and fundry daungers for that by the often chaunge of magistrates, and for the name of a few that were fuspected to the people, there was not one whether he were publike or a prinat person, in whom rested a perpetual care of the affaires. But for that tyrannic was abhorred almost of the whole city, & the authority of personages most honest was suspected of the multitude, and for Diferder in that by the prefident of times palt, they held it not possible to ordaine with common delibera- thing the gotion, a perfect forme of gouernment, the ignorant fort and incapable being not able to be conuin-government, ced with reasons only: it was determined to introduce for the time, this only new thing, that the Gonf. donner of inflice chiefe of the dominion. & whose creatio (together with it) was for the time of two moneths, should be chosen hereafter for his whole life: so might be keepe a continual! shudy ouer the affaires publike, that through negligence they might not fall elifoones into fo great daungers. It was hoped, that with the authority which the quality of his person would give him, and for that he was to remaine perpetually in fo great dignity, he should winne such opinion of faith & credit with the people, that with time he might eafily reestablish the other parts of the gouernment, & withall, placing Citizens of greatest condition in some degrees honourable, he might constitute a meane betweene himselfe & the communalty, by the which the ignorance and liberty popular being tempered, and all fuch bridled as should succeede him in the same dignity, if they would aspire or rise too high, he might leave established a wise and honourable gouernment, with many good circumstances to containe the City in peace. After this deliberation was well debated and resolved, there was chosen for Gonfalonmer, by the great Councell with a concourse and content of almost all the Citizens, Peter Soderm, a man for his age very ripe in counsell and experience, chosen chiefe for his countenance, of very great wealth and furnishments for his house, noble about most of the magustrate durelidue of Citizens; for his credit, mightie in opinion & affection with the people; and bearing a re- ring his life. putation of integrity, continencie, and to have alwayes nourished great cares of the publike busineffe. Lastly, he was without children, a point not of the least confideration, for that they might breede occasions to lift up his thoughts to ambitious purposes.

But now to returne to the affaires common and generall: Affoone as the French king was come to Aft, all the Princes and free Cities of Italy (according to their custome) ranne to him: fome in The French person, & some by Embassadors: amongst whom was Baptistim Vrsin Cardinall, who went thither king in aft.

against the Popes will, to instifie his brethren and Vitellezze touching the action of Aretze, and withall to stirre vp the king against the Pope and Duke Valentinois, against whom, by the confideration of the vehemencie shewed afore by the king, all Italy expected with great defire, that the French forces might be opposed. But experience declareth this to be true, that that which many defire, succeedeth rarely, for that the effects of humaine actions depending ordinarily of few, and the intentions and ends of them differing from the meanings and ends of many, hardly can things fucceede otherwayes then according to the intention of those that give their first motion: even so it hapned in this case, for that interests and ends particular induced the king to make deliberations contrary to the defire vinuerfall. Wherein the thing that moved the king, was not fo much the diligence of the Pope, who ceased not by the negociation of men speciall, to labour to appeale him, as the futtle counsell of the Cardinall Amboyse, norithing a perpetuall defire to enter amity betweene the Pope and the king, induced perhaps thereunto (befides the weale & vtility of his king) for his owne profit and purpose particular: both for the Pope recontinued his legation over the realme of Fraunce for eighteene moneths, and also Rudying carefully to lay foundations to raise him to the Popedome, he fought to be able to obtaine of him, the promotion of his parents and dependences whilest he was in the Cardinal ship, and with all he judged that to have the name and reputation, to be a louer and protector of the estate Ecclesiastike, was a thing that might do much to serue to his intention. Touching these deuises, the conditions of the time present were very convenient to draw the king to favour his counsels, for that as he was in suspition with the Emperour, who could not be appealed; so having of new sent to Trent many bands of horimen. with a certaine proportion of footmen, he made also great offers to the Pope to ay de him to paffe

Amid these doubts, every enterprise of the Emperour fell into more great consideration, for that the king knew that it stood not with the liking of the Venetians, that the Duchy of Millan and realme of Naples, should be ornaments of his Crowne. To these was added the controuerse which he had with the foure Cantons Swiffers, who required him to give vp to them the rights he had to Bellinzone, and withall to redeliuer to their possession the Vale Voltolino, Schafonse, with other things immoderate, threatning him that his deniall to these demaunds would drive them to enter confederation with Maximilian: difficulties which seemed to the king so much the more great and desperate, by how much he was out of all hope at that time to accord with the king of Spaine: For, albeit the French king had made motions to have Federyk restored to the kingdome. of Naples, for which occasion he offered to bring him with him into Italy, and that the negotiation still continued to establish a truce for a time, enery one reteining that he possessed: yet both in the one and other practife, there concurred so many objections and impediments, that the French king with melancholy incodes and 'miscontentments tooke occasion to dismisse from his Court the Spanish Embassadors. The Pope ioyning himselfe to these occasions, and no lesse he then the Duke Valentmoss, watching the advantages of times and accidents, had fent eftloones to his maiestie, one Troccio, Chamberleyne to the Pope, and of his secret credence, promising to avde him with all their power in the warre of Naples. In which respects, he determined to recontinue in the amitie of the Pope: and therefore vpon the returne of Troccio to Rome, the Duke Valentinois following the aunswere he brought, went secretly in post to find the king arrived then at Millan, of whom, contrary to the common expectation, & no leffe to the displeasure of every one in particular, he was welcomed with honours and demonstrations farregreater then was the kingscustome. The king vpon reconcilement with the Duke, holding it now no more necessary to keepe his army in Tuskane, fent a countermaund to have them come into Lombardy, having afore received into his protection the Siennois, and Pandolfe Petruces, with condition to pay him forty thousand Duckats at dayes limited. After these chaunges and contracts of amities, the stirres of Maximilian began to grow cold and diffolue, infomuch as the kings thoughts had now no other exercise, then to deuise vpon the things of Naples, which, if till then teemed to have succeeded happily to him, he nourished for time to come hopes of greater prosperity: For he was no fooner come into Italy, then he dispatched thither by sea two thousand Swiffers, and more then two thousand Gascoms, who joyning to the strength of the Viceroy (occupying alreadicall Capitinat except Manfredonia and S. Ange) encamped before Canofa which Peter of Nanarre kept with fixe hundred Spaniards: who, after he had made a valiant refiltance for many dayes,

Duke Valentinou with the French king. and receiving direction from Confaluo not to abide the extremity of daungers, for feare to lose so many well trained & resolute bodies, rendred the towne to the French, their goods & lives saved. By reason of this accident, and the Spaniards holding now no more place neither in Pomylla, Calabria, nor Capitmato, except, befides the peeces afore named, Barletta, Andria, Galipoli, Tarente, Cofenze, Quierace, Seminare, and a few others by the sea, and being farre inserior in Arength and numbers: Consaluo retired with the army to Barletto, without money, with scarcity of victuals, & with no leffe want of munitions (adverticies intollerable to an army.) Buttouching the last want, he was somwhat recomforted by a secret consent of the Venetians, who did not restraine him to buy at Venuce a great quantity of faltpeter. The Frenchking making this fuffrance an occasion of complaint against the Senat, was answered, that it was an action without their knowledge done only by certaine marchants particular, & that at Wenice, which is a City free, it was never defended to any to exercise their negotiation and traffike for marchandise. When Canofa was taken, the French Captaines (debating the prefent difficulties, but chiefly that for want of water the whole army could not continue incamped about Barletta, an opinion maintained against the counsels and protestations of M. & Aubigny) determined that one part of their people, which they fayd were in number a thousand and two hundred Launces, and ten thousand sootmen of all natures, should remaine still to continue a forme of a siegeabout the confines of Barlette, and the other part shold be employed to recouer the residue of the realme. A deliberation (in the coniectures of wife men) which to the ordinary negligence of the French nation, brought great hurt to their enterprise. The Viceroy immediatly vponthis resolution, made himselfe Lord of all Powilla, except T arenta, Otranie, and Galipoly. After which fucceffe he returned to the fiege of Barlette. M. a Aubigny at the fame time (communicating in the fortune of the others) entring into Cala-Bria with the other part of the army, facked the City of Cofenze, the Rocke remaining still in the power of the Spanish, who, being all drawne into one strength that were in that prouince, and joyning the other bands that were come from Cicilia, were afterwards broken by M. d' Aubique, in one encounter. These prosperities being all happened, or uppon the point to fucceed whilest the French King was in Italy, made him not only negligent in the continuation of necessary provisions (by the benefit whereof he might easily have chased the enemies out of the whole kingdome) but also brought him into this opinion of security, that he had no doubt to returne into France, & that formuch the more, by how much he hoped to obtaine (which hope was not in vaine) a long prorogation of truce with the king of Romains.

But at his departure out of Italy, men began to different to their great maruell, what had bene Duker alentitreated upon with the Duke Valentinois, whom (accepting his instification touching the action of nois in grace Aretz:)he had not only received againe into grace, but also in recompence of the oath and pro- with the Fresh mile made by the Pope and him, to ayde his maiefly in the warre of Naples when neede should King againe. be, he had for his part, given them promife to support the Duke with three hundred Launces to conquer Bolognia in the name of the Church, and to oppresse John Panile Baillon and Vitellozze. He was drawne to beare fuch immoderate fauours to the greatnesse of the Pope, either for the ill aduised opinion he had to make him his whole and true friend by so great benefits, which would be a meane that not one durft offer to attempt any thing against him in Italy: or else for that he did not fo much affure himselfe of his friendship, as he seared his ill will. To these respects were adioyned, the particular distaine which he bare against lohn Pawle, Vitellozze, and the Vrsins, for that they made no reckening of the authority of his commandements to forbeare to offend the Florentyns: and Vitellozze in particular, had refused to restore the artilleries he tooke at Aretze, and also to come to the kings presence, having obtained safe conduct for his safety. Besides all these, the king held it a thing not vuprofitable to the course of his affaires, to hold the Italian Captaines oppressed, beginning to feare least they and the Vrsins (in mercenary souldiers constancie is the least vertue) might in the end embrace the faction of the Spanish king, and enter into his pay. The Duke Valentinois, having leave of the king, returned with no little contentment into Romama, notwithstanding the king aforehad given hopes to such as feared his ambition, that for the common suretic, he would take him with him into Fraunce. His returning touched not only the minds of those against whom were kindled his former indignations, but also it disordered the cogitations of many others, for that the same seare occupied Pandolfe Perruces & the Vrsins, who were conjoyned almost in one selfe cause with Vitellozze and John Paule Baillon: The Duke of Ferrara, by how much more he held for suspected his infidelitie and the ambition of his father, by fo much leffe made he reckening of any affurance in regard of parentage or other caufe conducible. And touching the Florentins, notwithstanding they had recoucied their places by the kings fauour, yet they had no leffe feare then the others (being ill prouided of men at armes) for that the king, reposing not wholly in the Marquis of Mantua, for the intelligences he had with the Emperour, at such time as he had feate of his armes, and albeit at Aullan he received him to reconcilement and grace, yet wold he neuer confent that they should entertaine him as their Captaine ge nerall: knowing withall by many fignes, that the Pope and Duke Valentmois continued in the fame will and inclination which they had against them, and specially, for that (to keepe them in perpetual suspition) they reassembled and gathered together all the exiles of Aretze and the other townes. And as feare brings into the cogitation of the minde all things that may either be doubted or suspected, so it increased so much the more in these several estates and men, by how much they confidered how mightie were fuch enemies, in armes, in money, and in authoritie, how much in all actions they had bene supported by the fauous of fortune, and lastly, that not with standing the glory, riches, and greatneffe they had gotten by their victories, yet their ambition was never the more fatisfied, but their defires the leffe moderate, according to the propertie of a fire, whose rage becomes more infinite by the increase of matter wherewith it is nourished and fed. Befides, it was feared least they abusing the respect the king bare them, would rise into boldnesse to attempt all things even against his will, wherein both the father and the fonne, forgot not to publish with open mouth, that it repented them too much of the great regard and doubt they had yied touching the action of Arere, being affured that the king, according to the French nature, and by the many fauours and meanes they had in his Court, would yeeld tolleration to the things they should doe, notwish(landing they were to his dilliking. And to those that were occupied with these feares, this was one increase of calamitie, that they were not affured under the warrantie of the kings protection, for that of very late and fresh memorie, not with standing his word and promise of a Prince! he had fuffered the Lord Plombynto be dispoyled, and much leffe tooke to revenge the outrage that was done to the Duke of Vrbin, whom he had taken into his defence, with fiftie nien at armes which he deliuered to his armie for his feruice in the warres against A aples. But the exaple of Iohia Bentinolle, being much more present, was so much more agreeable to their terrours and seares: for, notwith landing his majestic in the yeares before, had commaunded Valentinois not to molest those of Bologma, alledging that the bonds and couenants which he had with the Pope, were not to be understood but touching the preheminence and authoritie which the Church had there at that time that the confederation was made betweenethem: yet in that very season, Bentwolle hauing recourse to his maiestic for succours, searing the great preparations that were made against him, the king chaunged the interpretation of the wordes according to the diverfitie of his endes &c intentions, and making gloses ypon the capitulations past, rather like a Lawyer, then as a king, he answered, that the protection by the which he was bound to defend him, hindred not the Popes enterprife, but touching his person and goodes particular: for that notwithstanding the wordes were generall, yet they were expressed with this relation, not to prejudice the rightes of the Church, to the which it could not be denied that the Citie of Bolognia did not appertame: and for that also, in the confederation he had made with the Pope, which was the first which be contracted in Italie, he was bound that what couenants so euer hee should make with others, they should be without construction of prejudice to the rightes of the Church. He was so impudent in this deliberarion, feduced onely by the Cardinall Amboife, contrary to all the refidue of his counfell, that hee fent an expresse messenger to fignishe at Bolognia, that that Citie apperteining to the Church, he could not, nor would not defift from fauouring the enterprise of the Pope; and that in vertue of his protection, it should be suffred to the Benesuolles to remaine at Bologma as persons private, enioying their particular goods in libertie and peace.

Such licence is taken by Princes oftentimes to dispense with their promises, expressing surety in their wordes, and keeping their intentions dissembled: an order much derogating the reputation and maiesty of a Prince, whose honour and conscience are so much the more guiltie and burdened, by how much their protections are but baites to bring private meninto perill, and vinder a disguissed affurance of their faith to be tray the innocency of their friends & subjects, even to the extreme daunger of their life. But this full prosperity of Valentinoir, was not only suspected to those men, but even the Venetians began to enter into lealousic over his ambition, loyning to their indignity this occasion, that not many moneths afore, he had rauished the wife of John Baptista Caraciolle the Generall of their footmen, as the passed through Romania to seeke her husband. Therefore, to induce occasion to the King to proceede more moderately in his fauour, shewing that the respect that led them, was the amity they bare him, and the icalouse of his honour, they put him in remembrance by their Embaffadors with words worthy of the grauity of fuch a common weale: That he ought to confider how deepely he was charged to favour so greatly Valentinous, & how ill it became the Noblenesse of the house of France and the glorious ticle of Christian King, to Support such a tirant, seeking the ruine of peoples and provinces, & thirsting so strongly after mans bloud that he flood to all the world an example of most horrible cruelty audinfidelity, under whose faith as by a publike theefe, had bene slaughtered so many Lords and Gentlemen. And not abitaining from the bloud of his brethren and nearest kindred, sometimes by the fword, and somtimes with poilon, he had stretched forth his cruelty even over such ages and qualities of persons, as would have moved the most barbarous harts of the Turkes to conscience and compassion. To which words (the interceffion of the Venetians making him perhaps more firme in his opinion) the king auniwered, that he neither wold, nor could reftraine the Pope to dispose according to his will, of the places that appertained to the Church. In fo much as where others abstained in his regard, to oppose against the armes of the Duke Valentinois, such as were nearest the daunger determined to provide for themselves: therefore the Vrsins, Vuellozze, John Pawle Baillon, & Lyueret de Ferme, who albeit as fouldiers of the Duke, had newly received money of him, yet they retired feuerally their copanies into places of fuerty, with intention to knit together for a comon defence: to which deuice gaue a speedy furtherance, the losse of the Castle S. Leo, which reverted into the power of the Duke of Vrbyn, by the meane of a pealant having the gard of a certaine wall. After The Duke of which beginning, their natural Duke being called home by all the voyces and peoples of that e- Propressure flate, he reconcred with a swift fortune all the Duchy except the fortresses. And to confederate reth bisestate, more strongly against Valentinois, the Cardinall Orfin, Pawle Vrfin, Vitellozze, John Pawle Baillon , Liveror de Ferme , Hermes the sonne of lohn Bentiuolle , and in the name of the Siennois, Anthonie de Venafre, in whom Pand, Petrucci reposed much, drew together, and made an affembly in the countrey Perouja, where, after they had discoursed of their general daungers, and considered what oportunity they had by the rebellion of the state of Vrbyn; and lastly, the weakenesse of Valentinois (whom they had now abandoned) by his want of men; they made a confe- confederation deration for their common defence against Valentinois, and for the succours of the Duke of Vrbyn, against Valentinois, binding themselves one to another, to put into the field seven hundred men at armes, & nine thoufand footmen, with couenant that Bentinolle should make warre in the tetritories of Ymola, 2nd the others with a greater strength shold draw towards Ryminy and towards Pefero. In this league the contederates having great care, not to incenfe the mind of the French King, & yet hoping that it would not much displease him, that Valentinois were vexed by the armes of others, they declared under an axpresse article, that they both meant, & would be bound to rise readily in their proper persons and with their iount forces, to obey any commaundement or request of his against all men. And for that occasion, they did not admit into that vnion, the famuly of the Colonnoys, notwithstanding they were great enemics of the Pope, who had alwayes tormented them. Befides all thele, they fought to have the favour of the Venetians and Florentyns, offering to Florence to procure restitution of Pifa, which they sayd was in the ability and deuotion of Pand. Petrucci, for the authority he had with the inhabitants. But the Venetians remained in suspence, as awaiting what would be first the inclination of the French King : which also the Florettyns did , both for the fame occasion, and allo holding both the one and other party as enemy, they feared the victory of either of them. This accident valooked for, hapned to the Duke of Valentinois, in a time wherein he being upon the point to viurpe the estates of others, he thought nothing lesse then that others would make inualions upon him. But yeelding nothing to the greatnesse of his perill, he lost neither courage nor counfell, and repoting much for himfelfe in his good fortune, he looked with great industry and wisedome into the remedies that were convenient, as the good Phisition Duke Valencia that once finding out the humour that offends, doth eafily apply the medecy ne that may cure. pois demaun-And for that he faw himselfe almost altogether disarmed, he fent to solicit succours of the French the Franch King, declating to him how much it imported him in all aduentures, to serue his turne rather of the King,

Pope and him, then of his enemies, & how frayle was the confidece of Vitellazze & Padolfe, who. belides they were the chiefest counsellours & inducers of the residue, had in times past, given many demonstrations of an ill minde to his maiestie, as in ministring aide to the Duke of Millan; and entertaining intelligeces with the king of Romans. And as he negociated in this fort with the king, To he forgat not also to make leavies of new companies, & to joyne with his father in the practife of their old futleties and ambushments: for the Pope for his part, sometimes excusing things that were too apparant, and fomerimes denying fuch as might be doubted, laboured with great study, to appeale the minde of Cardinall Vrim by the trauell of his brother lulius and the Duke Valentinois with disguised apparances and faire promises, sought to entertaine and joyntly and scuerally affure them, as well to hold them negligent in making their provisions, as in hope that those counsels and practises separate, would in the end breed between them some suspicion and disagreement, keeping alwayes this refolution, that much loffe that he would depart from I mola, afore he were furnished with a mightie armie, seeing (of the contrary) hee was resoluted to keepe it and the other places of Romagnia, without giving fuccours to the Duchie of Vrbinin which determination he gave direction to Dom Hugues de Cardona, and Dom Michel, (who were for hispitathose quarters with a hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsemen, and five hundred footemen) to retire to Riminy, a commaundement which they refused to obey, following another occasion presented to them to recouer and sacke Pergola and Fossambrona, whereunto they were induced " by the Castle keepers of those places: but, as in matters of warre it is a daungerous errour to transer greffe direction, and hunting after fortune, to preferre a light occasion, afore a counsell well debated: so it was easily discerned by effect, how much better it had bene to them to have followed the deliberation of the Duke, for that as they marched towardes Caply, they encountred neare Faf-(ambrona, Paule and the Duke of Grauina (both of the famulie of the Vrsins) and reposing much in the valour of their companies, which were fix hundred footenen of Vitellazze well trayned & refolute, they gave the charge, and finding fortune to favour their vertue, they brake and difordered the troupes of the Duke Valentinois, of whom many remained flaine, as Barth. Capranique Captaine of three fcore and ten men at armes, and many were led away prisoners, as Dom Hugues de Cardona, both men of chiefe place about Valentinois: Dom Michell fled to Fano, but by the commaundement of V alentinois he retired eftloones to Pefero, leaving Fane as a place most faithfull in the power of the people, for that his strength was not sufficient to minister defence to both the places. In the felfe fame feafons, the regiments of the Bolonnois which were incamped in the borough of S. Peter, made incursions to Doccio neare to Y mola; and truely the affaires of Valentinois had bene brought into hard straites and perils, if the vertue and expedition of the confederates had bene equal to the oportunities that were offred: but whilest they stood in expectation one of another, either for that the regiments of men agreed vpon at the dyot, were not yet ready, or elfe that the practifes of accord held them in fuspence: the occasion, which at the beginning shone with a fauourable light towardes them, was vanished and turned into a cloud: for that the French king had given direction to Monfieur Chaumont, to fend foure hundred Launces to the Duke Valentinois, and to aduaunce befides, all his other meanes to redreffe and reduce his affaires to reputation: which being knowne to the confederates, and they not a litle confused and amazed with it, energy one bega to looke to his proper bufinesse. In which respect the Cardinal Vrsin continued the pra-Etifes he had begun with the Pope, and Anthone de Venafra, (lent by Pandolfe Petruccs) went to I mola to folicit with Valentinois: with whom likewife treated John Bentinolle, having at the fame time sent an Embassadour to the Pope, and made to be restored the things that were robbed at Doccio. These practises were nourished with a wonderfull art by the Duke Valentinois, who, judging that Paule Vrfin would be a good meane to dispose the residue, he made as though he repoted great confidence in him, in which affection, he fent for him to come to Tmola, and for his furetie, the Cardinall Borgia went to the lands of the Vr (ins: The Duke Valentinois vied very gracious wordes of Court Paule, wherein, to giue a better shadow to the treason he intended, he complained not so much of him & the residue, (who having served him long with so great fidelitie, were of late eltranged from him for some vaine suspitions) as of his owne indiscretion, being himselfe the very occasion of their iust icalousies, and the onely instrument of that distrust that hath bene nourished betweene them: but he hoped that this contention and alienation of affection, growing by no other occasion, would turne it selfe into another habite, and in place of grudge and ill will,

would breede betweene them and him, a perpetuall and diffoluble friendship, fince amongst vertuous men reconcilement hath this property, to knir with greater furety of faith and constancy, the " harts that haue hued in separation. For himselse, as he referred them to consider how farre it was " from their power to oppresse him, seeing the French king was so well determined to support his greatnesse: so, on the other side being made wifer by the experience of harmes past, he confessed frankly that all his felicities and reputation proceeded of their counsels and vertue: and therefore defiring much to returne to that auncient communion of faith which had beene so familiar betweene them, he was ready for his part, not only to assure them in what fort they would, but alfor to make them judges (so that there were regard had to his dignity) of the quarels that were betweene him & the Bolomois. To these words appertaining generally to them all, headded particular demonstrations of the great confidence he had in Pawle, whom he filled fo full of hopes and peculiar promifes, that his art and futtlery carying shewes of innocency and true meaning, he betrayed the simplicity of Pawle, who beleeued that words so vehemently pronounced, could not draw with them intentions diffembled. A thing easie to the Duke by the property of his nature, and no leffe familiar, by the quickneffe and cultome of his wit, but most ready by the forwardneffe of his passion, which nourished nothing with more sweete delight, then the deuice that might betray the liues of them to whom he offered his faith. But whilest these things were in solicitation, the people of Cameryn called home againe Iohn Maria de Varana sonne of the late Lord of Cameryn who was in Quilea: And Vitellozze, with the great complaint of Valentinois and Pawle Vrsin, tooke the Rocke of Fossambrona: in so much as the Castell of Vrbin being likewise lost with the fortreffes of Cagly and Agobia, there remained no more to him in that state, but Saint Agatha, having also lost all the countrey of Fano: and yet not with standing, Pamle continuing the practife begun, after he had gone many times from Y mola to Bolognia, to establish some forme to the affaires of the Bentinolies who were his parents (for his daughter was maried to Hermes the some of lohn) he contracted with Valentinois in this sort: but with this relation: That the contract should be approved by the Cardinall Vrsm, by whose adulte all the residue were governed: That Capitalation all old hates and grudges should be defaced, together with the memory of all injuries past: That betweenethe the auncient payes should be confirmed to the confederates, with further obligation to go as foul- Vifins and D. diers to Duke Valentinois to the recourring of the Duchic of Vrbyn, and other estates which were Valentinois. rebelled:but, for their furety they should not be bound to setue in person, otherwise then one at a time, nor the Cardinall Vr sin to remaine in the Court of Rome: That touching the matters of Bolognia, there should be made a compromise in the persons of the Duke, Cardinal Vrsin, and Pandolfo Petrucci. With this conclusion, Pamle Vrfin (affuring himselfe every day more and more of the good intention of Valentinois) went to find the refidue, to induce them to ratifie the articles. But Bentinole, holding it neither honourable, affured, nor reasonable, that the arbitration of his affaires shold be passed ouer to another, sent the Pronotary his sonne to Ymola, and receining offages from Valentinois, he made an accord with him and the Pope, whereinto they condifcended fo much the nore eafily, by how much they confidered that the French king, comming better to confider either what an infamie it would be to him, or how much it would import him that the City of Bolognia were in their deuotion, wold alter his first deliberation, & not suffer them to obtaine it. These were the conditions of the accord: That there should be a perpetual confederation betweene the Duke Valentinois on the one part, & the Bentinoles with the comunalty of Bolognia on the other part: That the Duke should have of the Bolonnois, appointment of an hundred men at armes for eight yeares, which should be converted into the pay of twelve thousand duckats by yeare: That the Bolonnois should be bound to serue him with a hundred men at armes, and a hundred Crosbowshot on horsebacke, only for the yeare to come: That the French king and the Florentyns shold promise observation for both the one & other parties: That for the better assurance of the peace, the Bishops sister of Luna (who was Nephew to the Pope) should be maried to the sonne of Anniball Bentiuole.

But for all these, Valentinois ceased not to solicite the comming of the French bands, and the three thousand Swiffers which he had taken into his pay, under shadow that he would employ them, not for the confederates, but for the recourry of the Duchy of Vrbyn and Cumeryn, for that the confederates were already at a point to ratifie the accord past. The Cardinall Frimbeing then in Stema, was ouerruled by the perlwasions of Pawle, much helping the reasons and authority of

P. Petrucci: and after long contradiction confented also Vitellozze, and lohn P. Baillon, who (notwithstanding) held the faith of Valentinois much suspected. After the ratification of these men, the Pope having likewise ratified: the Duke of Urbin, not with standing the importunities of his people (promiting to dye at hisfeete) not to go from thence, yet having more feare of his enemies, then confidence in their popular voyces, he returned to Venice, and gaue place to the furie of the enemies, having first dismantled all the fortresses of the stare, except Leox Mainola: the people (Anthonie Sansouin who was afterwardes Cardinall, going thither with commission and power from Valentinois to pardon them) agreed to returne under his obedience: the Citic of Camerin did the like, for that their Lord was fled to Naples, his feares being no lesse then his astonishments, for that Viellozze and the others, having fent for their bandes which were in the countrey of Fano, prepared to go against him as souldiers to Valentinois. In which times as the Pope made the Campe march to Palombaro, which the Sanelles had recourred together with Senzana and other places apperteining to them, and that by the occasion of the armies leavied by the confederates: to, Duke Valentinois, who had no greater defires then to execute his most fecret thoughtes, went from Ymola to Cefena, where he was no fooner arrived, then the French men at armes who were come thither a litle before, & efcsoones reappealed by Monsieur Chaumont, departed from thence with the same speed they came:not by commission from the king, but (as was supposed) for a particular indegnation hapned betweene him and Valentinois, or perhaps at his request, to the end he might be leffe fearefull to those, whom he defired greatly to assure. At Cefena, he looked to redresse his bandes, which were stronger then the report that went of them, for that expreshy he had made very few great leauies of men, but well payd, and entertained continually many Launceknightes and particular Gentlemen: a strength though not mighty in numbers, yet well affured by the vertue of the persons, who are so much the more worthy then men mercenarie, for that the one go armed with honour and reputation, and the other have no regard but to their pay: the one forward for his credit fake, the other subject alwayes to compulsion: the one following seruice with a voluble libertie of minde, where the other having a courage no leffe vile and abiect, then his intentions are corrupt, followeth warres for rauine and spoyle, the basest respect that can be in the mind of a fouldier. At the same time Vitellozze and the Vrins, being sent by his direction to encamp afore Sim Galle, tooke the town and Castle, from whence the widow of the Prefect being fifter to the Duke of Vrbin, fled when the was left abandoned and defolate, notwithstanding her litle fonne was vinder the protection of the French king, who excused himselfe, for that she was a competitor to the league made at Maisons. After the taking of Sini Galle, Valentinois went to Fano, where after hee had stayed certaine dayes, to reassemble all his companies together, he aduertised Vitellozze and the Vrins, that the day following, he would come to lodge at Sin Galle, and that in that regard they should bestow the souldiers that were with them within the towne, abroad in the plaines: which was executed according to his direction, the footenen being lodged in the fuburbs of the towne, and the men at armes dispersed seuerally in the countrey. The same day that the Duke appointed to be at Sim Galle, there went to meete him, Paule Vrfin, the Duke of Grauina, Vitellozze, and Lyuerot de Ferme, who being received by him with great honour and many graces of Court, accompanied him to the gate of the towne, afore the which all the bandes of Ve-Tentinois were bestowed in order: a maner of dealing, which albeit they could not but suspect, specially to behold a strength greater then they looked for: yet, offering to take their leaue to withdraw to their lodgings which were without the towne, they were defired to enter with him into Vitelle XX and the towne, seeming to have neede to communicate with them in some private matter. They were driven to yeeld to that willingly, which they were not able to refuse by any resistance: and as in made priseners matters of perill, the minde hath a certaine sence & conjecture of the ill that is to happen; so the tokens that appeared made them deuine rightly of the mischiefe that was prepared; and yet as men without remedie in their fortunes, they followed him by whom they faw their ruine intended. When he was come to his lodging, he withdrew the with him alone into a chamber a part, where, after he had left them under colour, to go shift his apparell, he sent men armed into the chamber to apprehend them all prisoners, & arthe same instant appointed other companies to strip rheir souldiers. The day following being the last of December, to the ende that that yeare might determine with this tragedie, hee retained the other prisoners, and made to be strangled in a chamber, Vitel-

dye by violent death, as did all his other bretheren after they had won great experience and reputation in armes, the mischiese hapning to one after another according to the succession and meafure of their ages. But touching Lyseret no man could denie, that he had not an end worthy of his wickednesse, being but instand reasonable, that he should die by treason, who a little before had killed by treafon (to make himfelfe great in the Citie of Ferma) his owne Vnele, together with many of the principall Citizens, whom he had inuited to come banquet with him.

That yeare brought foorth no other thing worthy of memorie, fauing that Lodowyk and Federyk Counts of Mirandola, who were of the famulie of the Piques, being chased afore by John Francisquo their brother, and pretending (notwithstanding his prerogative of yeares and age) that they had the same rights that he had, expulsed him by force by the helps of the Duke of Ferrara, and John Jacques Tryunice father in law to Lodowyk: a matter not so much worthy of memory for it felfe in perticular, as for that in times after the quarrels of his brethten ingendred effects of some consequence.

The yeare following was farre more full of things hotable and accidents daungerous, then any of the former yeares: to the which the difloyalty and impiety of the supposed Prince of Christian religion, gaue an vnhappje beginning, not knowing what was to happen that yeare afwell to his person as to his affaires. For the Duke Valentinois having advertised his father (according to a private resolution betweene them) how well his ambushes had succeeded with him at Sini Galle: the Pope for his part, holding fecret as well the conspiracy, as the advertisment, called to the Pallace of Vatican vnder colour of special! occasions, the Cardinall Vrfin, who, trusting in the surety of the accord, and no leffe in the faith of him, who all the world knew neuer to keepe faith with any man, but much more driven by his destinie, then by reason, was a litle afore gone to Rome: he Cardinal Viwas no fooner entred the Pallace, then he was made prisoner, feeling in his owne person, the ye- sin made prisory calamity which his brother and friends suffred. At the same time were also taken in their houses, Re, Vrsin Archbishop of Florence, the Pronotory Vrsin, the Abbot Aluiano, and lacques de S. Groix a Romaine Gentleman, one of the principallest of that faction: and after they were led to the Castell S. Ange, the Pope sent his sonne the Prince of Squillace to take possession of the lands of Panle and the others, and with him went the Pronotory, and laegues de S. Croix to make delivery of them, who afterwards were returned under the same guard that kept them before. The Pope vaunting with a Spanish suttlety at the traine which his some had made, scoffed and sayd; that Paule Vrim & the others being the first that had fallified their faith to him (for that they were bound to go to him but one at once, and came not with flanding altogether) it was no leffe law full to him to breake his promife with them: a maner of dealing very flaunderous to the reuerence of his profession, but not vnaccustomed to those that have sit in his place, with whom nothing,, hath bene more familiar then conspiracies, nor any thing lesse esteemed then to protect innocency, having their harts as full of crueltie, as their mouthes were full of biasphemy: It had bene a ,, crime sufficient against his habit & conscience, to prostitute his faith against the ruine of men, and ,, not with a mind prejudiciall, to vaunt of the offence, seeing by the scripture, the sinne is so much ,, the more accurfed, by how much it is aggrauated with glory and vaunting. The Cardinall remained prisoner about twenty dayes, the Pope alledging that he had imprisoned a Cardinall so auncient in place, in age, and in authoriey, for many reasons: but he did not expresse them, condemning himselse by his proper silence, or at least fearing his infamy would be the greater, if his reasons were disclosed: but at length the bruite bearing that the Cardinall, was ficke, he died in the Pallace, of poylon as is affuredly beleeved : And the Pope, to take away the opinion (but not the im- Card. V rsin. putation of the act)albeit it was his custome notto care for infamies, caused the dead body to be caried to his graue in the broade "day and all bare, accompanied with the kindred of his house, and all the other Cardinals. The other prisoners were deliuered a litle after, ypon surety to be eftsoons represented when they were called.

The Duke Valentinois, seeking to ioyne recompence to his wickednesse, departed immediatly from Sim Galle, and addressed himselfe to the towne of Castello, where finding that such as yet remained of the famuly of Vitelly, had abandoned the City, he continued his way to Perousa, from whence lohn Pawle fled, who was competitor in the miferable destinies of the others, his punishment being greater, though the time and manner were flower, being by fuspition made wifer then the refidue touching his going to Sini Galle. The Duke left both the one and other 1503

Cities under the name of the Church, having reestablished within Peronsa, Charles Baillon, the Oddies, and all the other enemies of Iohn Paule. And as it is one chiefe vertue in men of enterprise to imbrace occasions, so, he forgat not to applie to his fortune, the oportunitie and fauour of the time, by the benefite whereof, his ambition made him affay to make himfelfe Lordouer Sienna, being followed with certaine exiles of the same Citie: and drawing with the whole armie (wherein were newlie arrived the aydes promifed by Bentyuolle) towards the Borough of Piena, where knowing that the Cardinall Vrim was prisoner, he made strangle the Duke of Granina and Pawle Vrfin, and sent Embassadors to Sienna to warne them of the towne to chase out Pandolfe Petrucci, as his enemie in particular, and the comon troubler of the tranquillitie of Tuskan: he joyned to the message this condition and promise, that as soone as they had expulsed him, hee would estsoones returne to Rome with his armie, forbearing to do anie other oppression to their frontiers. And on the other side, the Pope & he burning in one bloudie delire, that as Pandolfe had bene a companion to the others in life and actions, so also hee might communicate with their last extreame fortune and death: they studied to lull him asleepe with the fame charme wherewith they had enchannted the others to their defiruction, writing to him billets and letters full of office and humanitie, and foliciting him by messengers expresse, promiting no leffe affurance of faith, good meaning and affection. But the suspition that occupied the people of Siemia, that the Dukes intention was to vsurpe that citie, made his enterprise against Pandolfe more hard, for that albeit many of the Citizens were oftentimes ill convented with the gouernment of Pandolfe, yet, they held it better to temporize under the tyranny of one Citizen, then to fall into the seruitude of a straunger. In so much that as at the beginning, he could obtain no answere by the which might be hoped the expulsion of Pandolfe: so for al that, continuing under the fame semblance that he defired no other thing, he wonne dayly or, them, having passed Piensa, Chiusa, with other places neare to Sienna, which yeelded to him by composition. By which aduantages, wonne vpon them, as it were by stealth and suttletie, the fearesincreased so in Sienna, that not only the people, but also some even of the chiefest, began to murmure, that it was not reasonable, that to support one Citizen, the whole Citie shoule fuffer logreat a danger: which made Pandolfe determine to do that which the good liking & fauour of cuerie one, which he feared to be constrained to do in the end with the vniuerfall hatred of the Citie, and his owne danger; and therefore by his content it was fignified to Valen. tynois, in the publike name of the Citie, that they were content to gratifie his demaunds, so that he would retire with his armie from their frontiers. This resolution was accepted (notwithstanding the Pope and he were fixed upon an enterprise of greater importance) for that they knew how hard a matter it would be totake Sienna, both for the greatnesse & strong seat of the town and also for the vertue of John Pamle Baillon commaunding within it, who with the souldiers & naturall people of the place, would ioyne in one strength to resist him, if they were once assured that his intentions were contrarie to the publication of his promifes. To this were added the feares of the Pope, who held it necessarie, that for his proper sucrety, his sonne should retire his armie to Rome, where he was italous of some conspiracie, for that Iulio and others of the Vrfins with manie horfinen were withdrawne into Petillano and Fabio, and Organiyn Vrfin into Ceruetro: Mutso Collonno also newlie come from the realme of Naples, was entred Palembara to succour the Sauelless, who were newly entred into alliance with the Vrsins, and had intelligence with them. But that which tooke from the one and the other, the hope to occupie Sienna, was, that it was now manifeltly perceived, that the enterprise was directly displeasing to the French king : for a beit he could have wished (and it was for his good pollicy) that V nellozze and the other confederates should be kept under, yet hee sawe that their whole ruine joyned to the conquest of so great estates, made the Pope and Valentinois too mighty. And withall the citie of Sienna, together with the life and whole efface of Pandolfe, being under his protection, & no member of the Church, but an appertenance of the Empire, he thought he might with good equitie and reason, oppose himselse against the conquest: a consideration necessarie to the vertue of the French king, having by the mouth and word of a Prince, affured the protection of the Citie: but far more agreeable to the policie of his affaires, which could not without perill, suffer fuch an aspiring ambition in the Pope and his sonne: he began to see that the mind which he meant should climbe no higher then his shoulders, had intentions to aspire about the crowne of

is head, & therfore he held it a leffe transgression of honour & promise to restraine his supportaon from one whom his authoritie & countenance only had aduanced, then to leaue to perill fuch s reposed altogether in his faith, honour, & reputation of his promises. The Pope and his son had ope that the remouing of Pandolfe wold caule some confusion in the governmet of that City, & hat by that meane, time wold breed occasio to give some colour to their enterprise: but Pandolfe eeing more into their futtleties, then able to turne away his owne calamities, departed fo out of itema, as he left the fame guard & the fame authoritie to his friends & dependants, in fo much as efeerned that nothing was changed of the gouernment, & leffe expectation of their enterprise by is expulfion. Valentinois (according to the direction of the Pope) tooke his way to Rome, to make estruction of the Vrfins, who, with the Sauellyes, had won the bridge Lamentano, & run ouer the whole country: but they staied fro further action, by the arrivall of the Duke Valentinois, who exreffed his first power & malice upon the estates of John Jordan, without any regard that he was or declared against him: that he had the order of S. Michael: that he was in the protection of the rench king, & at that time in the kingdome of Naples in his seruice. Which oppression virus & nreasonable, the Pope seeking to abuse the king with his justifications, alleadged that he was not noued by any defire to despoile him of his estates, but only for that he could not account him his flured neighbour so neare, the great quarels and offences continuing betweene him & the samie of the Vrsins, & that therfore in recompence & consideration of his harmes, he was content ogiue him the principalitie of Squillace, with other lands of the same value and renenue. But the rench king not taking these reasons for paiment, retained a speciall memorie of that inuasion, not or that the regard to his protection preuailed more with him then of custome, but because his staires in the kingdome of Naples not drawing the same fortune and successe they had wont to o, he began to hold for suspected the pride and insolency of the Pope and his sonne, joyning to is coniecture the remembrance of their oppressions in the yeare past, both how they had assaynd Tuskane, and afterwards affayed to inuade Sienna, not withfranding he had promifed to pro-:ctit. Wherein confidering that by how much they had already obtained of him, and for time come should obtaine: by so much more was their ambition growne great, and hereafter their ride would be redoubled, he sent to commaund Valentinois with a sharpe message to forbeare o molest the state of lohn lorda'n, who was come to Bracciano by wayes vnknowne, and not vithout his perill. Befides this, he confidering how necessarie it were to be affured that there hould rife no commotion in Tuskane, speciallic for that he understood that in Sunna there was ome beginning of civill discords: he joyned himselfe to the counsell of the Florentins, to sollicite nat Pandolfe Petrucci (who was retired to Pija) might returne efcloons to Sienna: that betweene ne Florentyns, Siennois, and Bolonnois, might be contracted an unitie for their common defence, endring Mont Pulcian to the Florentyns, to take away all occasion of diffention. And lastly, that ueric one of them, according to his power, should make prouision of men at armes for their ommon defence, the better to cut off from the Pope and his sonne, all meanes to stretch furher their iurisdiction into Tuskane.

In this meane while the Duke Valentinois, with one part of his armie, tooke Viconaro wherewere fixe hundred men for John Jordan: but having received commandement fro the French sing, he left, to the great displeasing of the Pope and him) the enterprise of Bracciano, and went o incampe afore Cery, where, with John Vrfin Lord of the place, were Rafe his sonne, with Inio and Frauncis of the same familie. And to joine to the actions of the sonne, the authoritie of he father, the Pope proceeded at the same time by way judiciall against all the house of Ursins, xcept John Jordan, & the Count Petillano, against who the Venetians would not endure any such miuft violence. Cery is a rowne veric auncient, & no leffe notable for the strong fituation, for that t is feated upon a litle rocke hewed out of one stone only, whither the ancient Romaines in their perils against the French men, sent all their virgins vestals, and the most secret and celebrate images of their goddes, with many other things facred and religious, as into a place of speciall fureie: and for the fame reason in the times following, it was free from violation in the rage of the Barbarians, at such time as by the declinatio of the Romaine Empire, they hauockt all Italie with wonderfull furies. By meane whereof, as well by his naturall strength, as forthat it was manned with companies refolute, the enterprise seemed hard to Valentinoss, who, to aduaunce his vertue boue their stregth & power, forgat no diligece nor industry to win it, vsing, besides the ordinary engines of warre, certaine instruments of wood to surmount the height of the walles : but whileft he was busie in that action, Frauncis Nardy (fent to Sienna by the French king,) published his Maiesties intention, that Pandolfe should effloones returne, having received his promise before to cotinue in his deuotion, & for his suretie, to send his eldest son into Fraunce, to pay to him that which was due of the refidue of the fortie thousand Duckats which had bene accorded, and to reffore Mont Pulcian to the Florentyns: a resolution plausible to them of Sienna, who, because there should be no impediment to the comming of Pandolfe, joyned to the reputation of the kings name, the open fauours of the Florentins, & the disposition of those in the towne that were his friends, who drawing into armes and strength the night before he should come, held suppressed, or at least kept in a compelled quietnesse all such as supported the contrarie opininion. This hapned to the great displeasure of the Pope, whose affaires in other places ranne in a happie course, for that Palombaro with other peeces of the Sauelleis, were rendred to him: as also those that were within Cery, suffering many and continual afflictions of warre, after the furied fundrie assaults, offered restitution, with couenant that the Pope should pay a certaine proportion of money to lohn, who was Lord of the place, and to leave in libertie, suretie, and safetie of life all the relidue within Petillane, which was fincerely observed, contrarie to the custome of the

Fortune hath a free will to come and go when she list, not regarding times, persons or causes " but making her prerogative absolute, she takes authority to make her will a law over the Prin-" ces of the earth: & as in no humainething, the is either certaine or resolute, so chieflie in the action of warre the theweth most mutability and variation, not giving successe to such as deferm best, but to those that she fauoureth most, her instice not regarding the vertues & merits of men " but guiding things to their successe according to the inclination of her fauour and liking. For,the affaires of the Frenchmen, which followed the seruice of Naples, proceeded not in such full felicity, being incobred with many difficulties even from the beginning of the verre: For, the Count d Millete being encamped at Villeneufue with the regiments of the Princes of Falerno & Biligman Don Hugues de Cardona, passing from Messina into Calabria with eight hundred footmen Spa nish, an hundred horsmen, with eight hundred other sootmen aswel Calabrians as Sicilians, mar ched towards Villeneufue to rescue it: which assoone as the Count Millete vnderstood, he lea nied his siege from before Villeneusue, and went to meete him. The Spaniards drew all along plaine strait and natrow between ethe mountaine and a river, where was not much water, but i ioyned to the way with a litle rifing; and the French men who were the greater number, marche right to them beneath the river, defiring to draw them into a large place: but seeing how the marched close and in firme order, & fearing that if they cut not off their way, they would get i safetie into Villeneufue, they passed ouer to the other side of the river to charge them: in which encounter they were broken, the valor of the Spanish footmen no lesse then the aduantage of th place, helping indifferently to the victorie. Soone after arrived by fea out of Spaine at Meffina, two hundred men at armes, two hundred horfmen mounted vpon Iennets, & two thousand footme allied by Manuell de Benauide, with who came into Italy at that time Anthony de Leua, who, e a meane fouldier, rifing by all degrees of war, to the estate of a Captaine General, made his vertu notable in Italy by the reputation of many goodly victories. These companies passed from Mel fina to Regge in Calabria, which the Spanish had taken before (M. d'Anbigny being then in the other part of Calabria) and from thence encaped at Lofarna, within fine miles of Calimere: inte which place Abricours was entred two daies before with thirtie Launces, & the Count de Millet with a thousand footmen, & presenting themselues the morning following before the walles o the towne, wherein were no gates but barres onely, they forced it at the second assault, the ver tue and resolution of the defendants being lesse then the fortune & selicity of the assaylants, Cap taine Esprit remained dead, & Abricourt made prisoner: but the Count de Millete in flying to the rocke, found fafety of life and honour, (the victors retiring forthwith to Villeneufue for feare o M. d' Aubigny, who came on marching with three hundred Launces, three thousand footmer Araungers, and two thousand of the countrey. After which accident, M. a Aubigny encamping at Pollifring within two miles of them, & their perill encreasing by necessity of victuals, they dil caped feeretly to go to Quiercy: & alboit they made the oportunity of the night proper for their faftie, yet their fortune vaquishing all clokes of shadow & darknes, they were chased by bands o

Monsteur & Aubigny untill the rifing of a crabbed mountaine, where they lost threescore men at armes and manie footmen: and of the French (opinion and rashnesse carying them beyond discretion and experience) was flaine Captaine Gruyny, whom they esteemed much, leading the regimer that was to Count Carazze who died by naturall death a little afore the taking of Capua. Ar the same time came out of Spaine into Civilie these new bands, two hundred men at armes, two hundred light horsmen, and two thousand footmen, gouerned by Captaine Porco Carrera, who dying at Regge as he passed with his regiment, the charge remained to Ferrand d'Andriado his Lieutenant: for the arrival of these supplies, the Spaniards (lately retyred to Quiercy) took new courage and comfort, and returned to Villenenfue, where they fortified in that part of the towne which they held joyning to the Castle, which was the entrie of a valley, wherunto is conioyned the relidue of the towne: a fortification not in vaine for the feare they had of M. a' Anbigny, who being come from Polestrina with a diligence far about their expectation, was eneaped in that part which was not holden by the Spanish, euery one planting barres and fortifications requisit for their proper safetie. But as in M. a' Aubigny no vertue was more samiliar the circumspection, which he yied alwaies to resist suddaine perils, so assoone as he understood that the Spanish regiments that were descended to Regge, drew neare to make one strength with the other bands, he altered purpose with the necessitie of the occasion, & retiring to Losarno, the enemies following the commoditie of victuals, put themselves altogether within Seminaro, Whilest things went in this course in Calabria, the Viceroy for the French returning towards Barletto, encamped at Atatero, and dispersing his bands in seuerall places thereabouts, he lay to give impediments that no victuall nor fuccours should enter, hoping that what by the plague, whose furie began to breed feare, & scarsitie of victuals, which was vniuerfall in Barletto, the Spanish could not by any reason or possibilitie remaine there long, and much lesse rescue theselues within Trany, where raged the same difficulties: neuerthelesse amid so manie incommodities and daungers their resolution and constancie was wonderfull, confirmed also by the vertue and diligence of Consaluo, who sometimes giving them hopes of a readie arrivall of two thousand Almaine footmen, which he had fent O Etanian Colonno to leavie, and fometimes promifing prefent fuccours by other meanes, and lastly causing a bruite to bee published that he would go to Tarento by sea? he entertained them in their courage and vertue, but much more with his own expaple, suffring in his person all their perplexities & trauels, ioyned to the want of victuals and misferable scarsitie of all things necessary: Occasion doth much to induce the minds of souldiers, » but example is it that confirmeth their vertue, making them oftentimes resolute about their na- >> turall inclination.

The warre suffring this alteration, & being falne as you see into this estate of fortune & chage, those that till that day had bene inferiours, & as it were kept suppressed, began now by the negligent & insolent dealing of the French, to make their light shine & become superiours, For, the men of Castellanetto (a place neare to Barletto) dispairing, for the oppressions & wrongs which fiftie men at armes of the French, & garrisoned there, did them, drew into armes by common asfent, and stripped them. And not many dayes after, Confaluo being aduertised by espyall that M. de la Palissa remaining with a hundred Launces & three hundred footmein the town of Rubos. twelue miles fro Earletto, flood negligetly vpon his guard, marched one night to Rubos, & drawing with him a wonderfull diligence & facilitie of the way, being plaine & hard, certaine peeces of great artillerie: he affaulted the towne with fuch a furie, that the French (to who all other M. de Palife dagers had bene more tollerable) being so much more consused in their perill, by how much the made profoner, atfault was fuddain, made a certaine weake refistance, & in the end redred the place, Palissa with the refidue remaining priloners. The fame day Confaluo returned to Barletto, without danger to receive in retyring any domage of M.de Nemours, who a litle before was come to Canofa: his fafety haply was by this occasion, that the French copanies being disposed into seuerall places to keep Barletto befreged on many fides, could not be reaffembled in fufficiet time; befides that fifty French Launces, sent to make praie of certaine money caried from Trany to Barletto, were ouerthrowne by such as Confaluo had fent for the surety of the treasure. To these also might bee adioyned another accidet which diminished greatly the valour of the French me, & which was the proper work & effect of valor, & not to be attributed to the iniquity of fortune: for a Trupet going to Barketo to folicit the ransome of certaine souldiers taken at Rubos, certaine speeches were

yttered against the French, by some of the Italian men at Armes, which being caried by the Trumpet to the French Campe, and answere eftsoones returned to the Italians, bred such enuie and inflammation of courage in both parts, that to inflifie the honour of their feuerall nations they agreed, that thirteenemen at armes of the French, and thirteene Italians should fight in combat to the vtterance within liftes vntill the one were masters ouer the other: the place of the combat to bee affigned in a Champaine betweene Barletto, Andria, and Quadrato, where they should be accompanied with an equall number of affiltants, to be Judges of their valour. Neuertheleffe (to affure al ambuscados or suttle traines of cospiracy) the Captains with the greatest part of both the armies, accompanied their Champions to the mid way, comforting the, that for that they were chosen out of the whole armie, they would with manifest action and courage make good the expectation that was on them, the same being such, that in their hands and valour was reposed by common consent, the honour of so noble nations. The Viceroy of the French declared to his, that their aduerfaries were the felfe fame Italians, who having no courage to abide the Frenchmen, had alwayes made them way, without expressing any tryall or experience of their vertue, even fince they had run fro the Alpes to the extreame bounds and limits of Italie: That they were not now pushed forward either with a new nature or new resolution of mind: but being mercenarie to the Spaniards and subject to their commaundements, they had no libertic to refult the will of thole men, whose custome being to fight not with vertue but with ambushes, made themselues beholders and idle lookers on the dangers of others: and that therefore affoone as the Italians were entred into the liftes, and should see before them the armes and furie of fuch as had alwayes ouercome them, they would either returne to their accultomed feares, or at least, if any seruile respect to the Spanish would push them to the fight, that compulsion, no leffe then their naturall feares, would make them an casie praie, the foundation layd vpon the vaine brags and braueries of the Spanish, being a Target too slender to beare the blowes of the puissant Frenchmen . On the other side , Consaluo prepared the mindes of his Champions with perfuafions agreeable to the nature of the action they had in hand: he reduced to their remembrance the ancient honours of that nation, and the reputation and glorie of their armes, with the which they had earst tamed the whole world: That it was now in the power of a fewe, to declare that they were not inferiour to the vertue of their elders: And though Italy whose valour had vanquished the most regions of the world, had bene of late yeares ouer-runne by forraine armies, that it was by no other occasion, then the indifcretion of Princes, whose ambition accompanied with civill discords, had called in strange armies to roote out and ruinate one another: That the French had neuer obtained victorie in Italie by their owne ftrength or vertue, but by the aide & ministration of the armes of the Italians, who had suffered the to passe so far into the bowels of their country, not by the terrour or agilitie of their armes, but by the furie of their artilleries, which were fearefull follong as they were new and vnaccustomed: That they were now to fight with the force and vertue of their proper persons, and that not onely in the presence of so great a Nobility of their owne side, but also in the spectacle and eye of the principall nations of Christendome; who, aswell of the one part as of the other, had an honourable defire of their victorie: That they had to remember that they were raifed by the most famous Captaines of Italie, and as by them they had had continuall nourishment and trayning in armes, so for their seuerall parts, they had in many perillous actions given an honourable experience of their vertue: And that therefore either the honour to readdresse the name of 1taly with that glorie wherein it had bene not onely in the yeares of their elders, but also in the ages and times of themselues, was by destinie appointed to them; or else (so great an honour not being wonne by their hands) there can be no other expectation of the flourishing region of Italy, then to remaine dishonoured and in perpetual servitude and slaunder, by the pusillanimitie of her proper children. With these perswasions ioyned to the comforts of other Captaines and fouldiers particular of both the armies, the parties appointed for the combat, were led into the field: where both partes desirous by their proper vertue to bring glorie to their nation; affoone as the Affiftants were placed according to the order of the field, and that the figne was given, they ranne furiouslie with their Launces : at which encounter, no advantage inclining to either part, they shewed the same emulation of mindein the action of their other weapons: wherein as eueric one of the Champions shewed by his resolution and agility

agilitie with what defire of glorie he fought to conquer his aduerfarie: fo it was fecretlie confefsed by all those that were lookers on, that out of all the armies on both factions, could not bee chosen bodies more worthy to performe a proofe so honourable and glorious. But as in this heat of fighting, they had spent a good space of time, wherein the ground was couered with tronchions and peeces of their armours, and fomewhat dyed with the bloud that dropped from all parts, without that the aduantage or better of the fight could be indged. And as they were beholden with a wonderfull filence by fuch as were prefent, and almost in no leffe trauell and passion of mind, then if they had bene the immediate parties to the perill, it hapned that one of the Italians was firiken from his horse by a Frenchman, who as hee furiously pursued his fortune to dispatch him, another Italian carefull of the danger of his companion, killed with a wonderfull blow the Frenchman. The Italias had boatespeares, with the which they made slaughter of many of the French horses, by meane whereof the Chapions of Fraunce, beginning to decline, could no. longer cloke their weaknes, but their vertue yeelding to the fortune of their adverfaries, they became prisoners to the Italians: who returning with victorie to Consalno and their other companies, were received with those honors that appertained to their merits: and being congratulated as men whose valours had restored Italy to her former glorie and honour, they entred Barletto in triumph, their prisoners led afore them, the aire founding with Drummes and Trumpets, the artillerie shooting off, the people crying with praises of their vertue, and all other shewes and a-Gions ysed, that might fet forth the reputation of their victorie. It is incredible how much the fortune of this combat diminished the courage of the French armie, and lifted up the Spaniards into fame and prefuming, euerie one construing this experience of a few, to a prophecie of the absolute iffue of the whole warre.

About this time the French king was molefled in Lombardie by the Swiffers, the matter being begun not by the whole natio, but by those three Catons which had occupied Belinzone: who see his swiffers into the Differential to induce him to consent that that place might remaine to them in proper, assayed Luzar into the Duchy no and Murato, which being a wall of greatlength vpo the lake Maior neare to Luzarno, gives of Millan. impediment to descend from the mountaines to the plaine, by no other way then through a gate which onlie is in that wall: and albeit they could not carie it in the beginning for the defence which the French Garrison made, (Monsieur de Chaumont lying at Vareso and Galero with eight hundred Launces, hoping well also of the abiltie and defence of the place:) yet the number of the Smiffers increasing afterwards, and succoured also by the Grifons, after they had given many affaults in vaine, diucts regiments of them climbing a great mountaine which commaunded the wall, they compelled fuch as kept the gate to abandon it: and taking afterwards the borough of Luzarno, but not the Castle, their stregth increased dayly, for that the other nine Cantons, notwithstanding in the beginning they offered men to the king for the alliance they had with him, began afterwards to give succours to the three other Cantons, alleadging that for the respect of fidelitie and focietie, they ought not to faile to minister to the necessitie of their companions, being thereunto bound by their ancient leagues, which were to be preferred afore all the obligationsthey had with others. Whilest they had an armie of fifteene thousand about the Castle, the French not able to rescue it for the straightnesse of the passages, and good gard that was made, they made pillage of the countrey thereabout: and making all things lawfull to their furie, because the Castle keeper of Mujoequo (a place appertaining to John Lacques Tryuulce) refused to lend them artillerigto batter the calle of Luzarno, they facked the towns of Musocquo, forbearing to vexe the Castle for that it was inexpugnable.

On the other fide the Frenchmen, whom this emotion did not a little import, affembling all their strength which they had in Lombardy, and having obtained succours of Bologna, of Ferrara, and of Mamua, require the Venerians to furnish that proportion of men, which they were bould vnto for the defence of the flate of Myllan. The copanies were promifed according to the kings defire, but there was vied fo litle expedition in the leavying of them, and fo great intermission to send them, as they served to litle purpose. Monsier de Chaumont, who had beflowed good strength and garifon in the Castles that were in the mountaines, kept his regiments in the plaine, hoping that the Swiffers, having neither horse nor artilleries, durst nor descend into places discouered, but in the ende woulde bee made vyearie for the difficultie of the victuals, and for that they were without money, and leffe hope to do any thing that was of importance. In which effate the Smiffers having remayned many daies, and the want of victuals increasing (for the French with their Nauie had sunke manie Barkes, which brought victualles to the Swiffers Campe, and restrained the course of manie other by the lake) the souldiers began to nourish saction amongst themselves, for that the enterprise appertained not but to the Cantons which possess Belinzon, and the Captaines being corrupted by the French moneys, they were content in the end to retire themselves, restoring (except Musocque as not appertaining to the king) all the places which they had taken in that expedition, obtaining promile of the king not to molest them of Belinzon untill a certaine time. The French were lofar estranged from any enill will to the Swiffers, that they were not ashamed not onely in that time, when they had warre with the king of Spaine, and that they feared the king of Romains, and had the Venetians for suspected, but also in all other seasons, to buy the friendship of that nation, enduing them with yearely penfions both publike and private, and to make contracts with them under vinworthy conditions. In this action perhaps the French were moued, both by the small affurance they had in the footmen of their owne nation, and also for that as men of warre, they knew that that Prince makes warre to his great disaduantage, that vexeth a people that hathnothing to loofe.

The king deliuered thus from the emotions and warres of the Swiffers, had no leffe hope in the same season to see some issue of his warres in the kingdome of Naples: for that after manie means and practises of peace without any profit, Philip Archduke of Austrich and Prince of Flaunders, determined to make his voyage from Spaine to Flaunders by land, notwithstanding the contrarie defires of his father and mother in law, of whom he obtained free power and commission to contract a peace with the French king, which he had long solicited whilest hee was in Spaine: Butthey lent him accompanied with two Embassadours with whom hee was to communicate in all actions, and without whose counsell he would not treat or conclude anie thing. It is incredible with what magnificence and honor he was received by the kings affignment through all the realme of Fraunce, not onely that the king defired to make him fauourable in the practife of the peace, but also to deserue to make a perpetual friend of that young Prince who was to become mighty and great, being the next successour to the Empire Romaine, and immediate inheritour to the kingdoms of Spaine with all their dependaces: All fuchas had grace or authoritie about him were honoured with the same liberties, and received presents of great price and riches. To these demonstrations was answerable the magnanimitie and royall behauiour of Philip: for that as the French king, besides his word and faith given for his sure passing through Fraunce, had sent into Flaunders many of the Nobles of his realme for the safetie of Philip: fo Philip, affoone as hee was entred Fraunce, to declare that he reposed wholly in the kings faith, gaue order that the Ostages should be redeliuered. These so great tokens and apparances of amitie, were not vnaccompanied (as much as was in them) with leffe effectes: for affembling at Bloys, after they had spent certaine dayes in discourse and disputation of things, they concluded Peace between a peace in this fort: That the kingdome of Naples should be possessed according to the first the K. of Spaine division: But that there should be left in deputation to Philip, the Provinces for the which they and Fraunce. first fell to difference and armes: That from the present, Charles his sonne and Madame Clauda the Kings daughter (betweene whom should be a confirmation of that mariage, which had bene afore sollicited) should be intituled Kings of Naples , and Dukes of Powilla and Calabria: That that part which appertained to the king of Spaine should bee from thenceforward gouerned by the Archduke, and the partition discending to the French king, to be ordered by the proper deputies of his Maiestie: But that the one and the other part should bee holden under the name of the two children, to whom, at the time of confummation of mariage, the king should give his part for the dowrie of his daughter. This peace was solemnlie published in the great Church of Bloys, and ratified by othes of the king, and of Philip, as procurer of the king and Queene of Spane his parents in lawe : a peace truelie of right great confequence, if it had brought an effect equall to the intention: for, not onelie armes surceased betweene so mightie kings, but also peace would have followed betweene the king of Romaines and the French king: vvhich would not onely have bred newe enterprifes against the Venetsans, but also the Pope being suspected to them both, and in euill opinion with the vniuerfall fortes of men, would not have bene without his feares of counfelles and other actions.

King and the Archduke sending with expedition to publish the peace in the realme of Naples, with direction to the Captaines and commaunders of men, to forbeare to molest one another, attending the ratification of the Spanish king, and in the meane while their possession of things to continue, the ruler for the French offered to obey to his king : but the Spaniard (either for the hopehe had of the victory, or for that he would not be contented with the only authority of Philip)answered, that he could not discontinue the warre ynlesse he had received expresse commaundement from his king: for the continuation whereof, he was so much the more encouraged, by how much the French king, gouerned by his hopes both in the practile and conclusion of peace, esteeming for certaine that which was yet vncertaine, had not only dallied in all other prouifions of warre, but also had for ellowed the leauying of those regiments (that is three thousand footmen and three hundred Launces) which should have bene embarked at Genes to beled to that enterprise under Monsieur de Perjy. And of the contrary were arised at Burletto the two thousand Almain footmen, which being leuied with the fauour of the king of Romains, and embarked at Triefte, were passed in surery by the gulfe of Vence, not without the great complaint of the French king. In which respect, the Duke of Nemours, not able to assure a surceasing of armes, and leffelikely to refurnish his power, being made weake by the oppressions he had receiued before : yet, because he would occupy his whole strength, if either occasion or necessity compelled him to fight with his enemies, he sent for all the French bands that had bene dispersed into diverse places, together with all the aides of the Barons of the realme, except those Lords and regiments which made warre under Alonsteur d'Aubigny in Calabria . But in assembling them he found a fortune contrary to his expectation: for, the Duke of Atry, and Lewys d'Ars, one of those French Captaines which had their companies bestowed vpon the lands of Ottranto, determining to march together to joyne with the Viceroy, for that they were advertised that Peter of Nauarre with many Spanish footmen, was in place apt to distresse them if they went separate and deuided: it hapned that Lewys d'Arr taking his oportunity to passe surely, departed, without being careful of the danger of the Duke of Arry, who left alone, marched also with his companies, having espiall that Peter de Nauarre was gone to Matero to joyne with Consaluo. But the counsels of men were not sufficient to result fortune, for that the men of Rusyliano (a towne in the countrey of Bary) who in the same dayes were revolted against the Frenchmen, calling youn the succours of Peter de Nanarre, who in their regard altered his way fro Matero towards Rutyliano, and encountred the Duke of Arry, to whom the suddennesse of his peril brought him into many countfull cogitations what to do. But, as necessitie of daunger makes men resolute, so, in the end, feeing no furery in his retraite, he gaue his whole disposition to the battell: And as when men are driven to fight, their constructions and judgements do often varie, sometimes beguiling themfelues with arrouerweening in their owne strength, and sometimes beleeving lesse of their enemy then his estate and power requires: so the Duke reposing much in the service of his horsemen (though his footmen were inseriour in numbers to the Spanish) whom he vainely supposed to be ouer wearied by the trauell they had made that night, vindertooke the battell, wherein every one expressing his valour on both sides, his people at last were broken, his Vncle The oversthrow being flayne; and himfelfe taken prisoner. And as it feldome hapneth that one fortune goeth with - of the Duke of out another, nor no aduer fity vncaccompanied with another calamity, so foure French Gallies vnder the gouerning of Preian kuight of the Rhodes, appeared in the hauen of Otrato under licece of the Venetian Magistrate, promising to defend them from the inuasions of the Spanish Nauy, which under the Captaine Fillemaring wasted in creekestherabouts. But after Presan was entred a little further in the hauen, his forces little, and his fortune farre inferior to his enemies, he beganne to feare to be environed; and therefore to prevent that his domage and harmes should not turne to the profite of his enemies, after he had deliuered the Galliots and sunke his Gallies, he fought his lafetic by land with his people, leaving his honour in suspition by the greatnesse of his daunger.

The French King gave commandement to his Captaines to stand onely ypon their gards, and not to feeke their enemies, affuring them that with fpeede they shold either receive the confirmation of the peace, or a competent proportion of fuccours: but the armies being fo mighty and fo neare one another, it was very hard to bridle the furie of the Frenchmen, or to bring them to this

patience to draw the warre longer . It feemed rather that desteny began to aduance, and would no more defer the whole and absolute deciding of those affaires whose beginning hapned in Calabria: for after the Spaniards were joyned in one strength at Semynaro, Monsieur d'Aubien, hauing affembled all his companies, and the power of the Barons that held the French faction, bestowed his footmen within the towne of Gioia three miles from Semmaro, and fent his horsemen to Losarno three miles from Gioia: and fortifying himselfe with foure peeces of artillery vpon the shoare of the river, being the situation of Giora, he stood ready prepared to oppose against his enemies if they made enterprise to passe the river. But the intentions of the Spanish were other then he supposed, for the day they determined to passe, they caused their Vauntquard to march directly to the River, where Manuell de Benauide (who had the leading of them) being ypon the shoare, began to parley with Monsieur d'Aubigny, who had led all his army to the banke contrary or opposite. At the same instant, the rearegard of the Spanish being sollowed with the battell, tooke another way to passe the River a mile and an halfe aboue Giora: which being difcerned of Monsieur d'Aubieny, he went in great hast without artillery to affront them afore they had all passed: but they were more happie in celeririe then Monsieur a' Anbieny, for that afore his comming they were all passed ouer, and raunged (albeit without artillery)in fitme and set battell; and with that aduantage marched foorth against the Frenchmen, who, by reason of their hast, eirher keeping no order at all, or at least by their smal numbers, not able to resilt so great aftrength. were there broken before the Vauntgard of the Spanish could passe the River. In which conflict Ambricourt was made prisoner with certaine other French Captaines, & the Duke of Somne with many Barons of the kingdome. And albeit Monsieur a Aubigny tooke the Rocke of Angetole for his fafety, yet having no meane to iffue out, his perill compelled him to yeeld himselfe prisoner, being ouerthrowne and taken euen in the selfe same places, where not many yeares before, he had with great glory triumphed ouer King Ferdinand and Confuluo, fo inconstant are the prosperities of fortune, and the doings of men so subject to alteration and chaunge. In this conflict perhaps nothing was more huttfull to Monsieur d'Aubigny (of a franke and noble spirit, and one of the most resolute Captaines that the French king led into Isaly) then that his owne too forward and violent inclination caried him too farre into the hope of the victory ra matter which likewise was hurtfull to the Viceroy in Powilla, joyning the report of the accident hapned in Calabria. For Confaluo not hearing of the victory of his people, and not able by the importunity of hunger and plague to remaine longer in Barletto, marched out of it, and leaving a very weake Garrison, he tooke his way to Ciriquole, a towne ten miles from thence, and almost in a triangle betweene Canofa (where the Viceroy was) & Barletto. The Viceroy (when dangers appeare, wife men fall into countell) debated with his Captaines, whether were better to follow or five the occasion of the battell: wherein many of his Captaines reasoned, that, in regard the Spaniards were increased in numbers, and his bands falue into great weakenesse and disorders, it was against pollicy to commit any thing to hazard, but to retire into Melfe or some other strong towne wel prouided of things necessary, and there to expect either a new succour out of Fraunce, or else the confirmation of the peace: a maner to temporife (which he was also bound to vie by commaundement) which he had newly received from the King. A contrary opinion was holden by other Captaines, to whom it seemed a thing daungerous to tarie till the army already victorious ouer Calabria, shold ione with Confalno, or at least should execute any enterprise of importance finding no man to relift him . They brought in the example of Monfieur Montpenfier, chuling rather to retire into townes then to fight: That the memories of times past admonished them how farre they might hope for the long and vncertaine fuccours of Fraunce: That their Camp was nothing inferior either in force or vertue to the army of the enemy: & that the diforders that had hapned by negligence, ought not to be compared to the experience, which wold be shewed in plaine field with weapons and valours of men, and not with fleights or futtleties: That it was a more fure and honourable way, to make at the least with hope, an equallex perionce and triall of fortune, then eschuing the battell, and consuming themselves by degrees of temporising, to give their enemie the victory without bloud and without daunger: That touching the late message of the king, it was to be construed rather as an advertisement, then in nature of a commaundement, in which degree, if Monsieur d'Aubigny had taken it, he had done well: But now the state of the wat being chaunged by such a disorder, it was necessary likewise that their deliberations should alter. This last opinion prevailed, & therfore having advertisement by their espials, that the Spanish bands either all or part were issued out of Barletto, Monsieur de Nemours in like fort tooke his way towards Ciriquole, a way very inconvenient both for the one and other army, for that the countrey was barreine or fresh waters, the summer and hote season being of greater rage of drought then was wont to be in the beginning of May: the disposition of the time brought many afflictions both to the one and other army, for that the very day of remouing, many fouldiers died of drought by the wayes. And the discommodities of the wayes by the which they passed, gaue no lesse impediment to their marching, the French not knowing whether the whole or part of the Spanish army were in the field, for that both Fabricius Colonne with his light horsemen, tooke away the certaine knowledge, and also the Launces of the men at armes holden vpright, and the stalkes of fennels growing high in that countrey, dimmed their fight that they could not well difcerne. The Spaniards were the first that arrived at Sirignole which the Frenchmen kept, and incamping betweene two vines, they enlarged (by the aduife of Prosper Colonne) a ditch or trench which was at the entrey of their Campe. Whilest they were dressing their lodgings or Campe, the diligence of the French in marching had brought them to the place, but by the condition of the time drawing neare night, they stood doubtfull whether they should so suddenly accept the battellor defer it till day following: Tues a Alegre and the Prince of Melfe, perswaded that the fight might De put ouer till the next day, a respit convenient for the refreshing of their ownermen, and to no effe purpole to distresse the Spaniards, who, they hoped, would be constrained by necessity of rictuals, to remoue their Campe. To this reason was joyned also a consideration of warre, how nuch it would be ro their difaduantage, to fet vpon them in their lodgings, specially being ignoant of the disposition of the place. But as every calamity is led to his effect by his proper meane, ind mortall men in many things, are made the instruments of their owne harmes: so Monsieur de Nemours earied more by his rash inclination, then by the safe counsell of others, the Spaniards were charged with greatfury aswell by the French as Smiffers: and the fire having taken the powler of the Spaniards either by chaunce or by other meane, Confaluo ving the occasion of that acident, cryed with a courage well refolued, the victory is ours, God declares it by manifest tokens, pecially when we see we have now no more necessity of the service of artillery. There be fundry opinions of the state of this battell: the French publish that in the first encounter they brake the Spanish footmen, & offring to the artillery, they had won it, & fet the powder on fire, only by the darkenesse of the night, their men at armes, by negligence and misknowledge, had charged their own footmen, by which diforder, the Spaniards reaffembled. But others reafon, that for the diffiulty to passe the ditch, the Frenchmen beginning to intricate and intangle themselves, fell to fly-The overthrow ng, no lesse by their proper disorder, then by the vertue of their enemies, being most of all amaMonsieur de Monsieur de Nemours, who entring with the fust into the fury of the fight, Nemours. ind as he was in the action of a noble Captaine to encourage his men to win the trench, was strisen dead with a bullet. There be others, who discoursing more particularly, say that Monsier de Nemours, dispairing to be able to passe the ditch, and labouring to turne his strength towards the flanke of the Campe to adventure to enter on that fide, cried that they should give backe; which voyce, to those that knew not the occasion, gaue a figneto flye, which joyned to the chaunce of his death in the first squadron hapning also at the same time, caused all the army to turne their backes and enter into a manifest flying. Some acquite the Viceroy for taking the battell against the counsell of others, and do lay the blame upon Tues d'Alegre, who, contrary to the intention and defire of the Viceroy to fight that day, reprehending his fearefulnesse, induced him to do that whereunto he bare no disposition: the battell was very small continuance, and albeit the Spanish passing ouer the ditch followed the chase of their enemies, yet euen as in calamities fortune is not without her fauours, so by the oportunity of the night conering all things with darkenesse, there were few that fell into the perils that they feared most, I meane that were either taken or flaine, specially of the horsmen, of whom Monsier Chandion was one. The refine with losse of their cariage, and artillery, faued themselves by flying: the Captaines as well as the souldiers being disperfed into many separate places, not as their vertue wold, but whither their seare and fortune led them. This victory hapned the eight day after the ouerthrow of Monsieur d'Aubient, being both on Friday, a day which the Spaniards have observed to be happy vnto them. The French, after the fear of the chase was passed, reassembled againe as well as the violence of the time & their fortune would suffer, and as men whose greater perils were yet to come, debated many deuises: Somtimes they thought best to ioyne with theresidue of the army in some place convenient, to take from the victors all meanes to go to Naples, and estsoones they judged it most convenient for their safety, to sticke to the desence of Naples: and yet, as it happent that to men in adversity their searce grow dayly greater, and to such as be vanquished is less nothing but consideration of difficulties so neither one of these deuises was suffered to be put in execution: for that neither had they any election of places for their safe abiding, neither was their possibility to defend Naples for the searcity of victuals: for the provision and surnishing whereof, the French had sent after to buy a great quantity of come, which they could not transport, either for the impediments that they of Rome gaue, seeking to have their towne standing good provision, or rather by the secret persuasion of the Pope, which was not the least credible.

The confideration of these difficulties made Alegre the Prince of Salerne, and many other Baronsto retire betweene Caietto and Tracetto, where they reassembled under their names, the most part of the residue of the armie. But Confaluo to whose vertue this one thing was peculial and proper, to know how to follow his fortune asswell as he was skilfull to get the victory, after this good successe, tooke his way with the atmy towards the towne of Naples, and as he passed by Melse, he made offer to the Prince to leaue him possessed of his whole estate, to that he would remaine at the deuotion of the Spaniards: but he rather chusing to go his way with his wife and children, went to joyne with Lewys d'Ars lying at Venousa: by whose departure Consuluo taking Melse, followed his way directly to Naples, at whose comming those Garissons of the French which were in the towne, retired into the new Castell, and the Neapolutans deprined of all hope but such as is less to men abandoned, received Consuluo the xiiij, day of May, Capua and Anersa doing the like in the same time.

THE ARGUMENT

HE French King makes his preparation to passe into Italy: Pope Alexander the sixt is em possoned: His succession Pope Pius the third dieth within xxvs, dayes: Iulius the seconds created Pope: The Duke Valentinois is apprehended prisoner: The Frechine are overthrown at Garillon: The Florentins faile to take the city of Pisa: Peace is established between the Frenci King and the King of Spaniards.

HAT man erreth leffe who promifeth to himselfe a chaunge of the af faires of this world, then he that perswadeth that they are alwaies firme 8 stable. And albeit the mā wise & resolute, is seldom displeased with thing which ought to be borne, for that whatsoener might happe to another, he neuer complainest hist chaunce to him: yet (so is the state of man entangled with infirmities) ther hapneth no mutatio which in some fort shaked not the resolution and constancy of the mind: an example verified in the person of the French king: who, associate he heard the newes of so great a losse, and in a time wherein he had more expectation of peace, then of war, entred into no little alteration, concurring in that adversity, not only the deprivation of a kingdome so mighty & floridation.

ishing, with the desolation and ruine of his armies, compounded of his chiefest nobilities and men ofrace and vertue: but also he considered the perill wherein stood all the residue of that which ne held in Italy, which as he had already made the rewards of his glory and victories; so he referued o adjoyne them (as perpetuall monuments) to the reputation of his Empire and greatneffe. But, he humor which most fed this passion, proceeded chiefly of impatience against his fortune, esteeuing his dishonor so much the greater, by how much he was vanquished by the king of Spaniirds, whose power he judged to be farre interiour to his; an error familiar with Princes, to esteeme effe of their enemie then he is, and more of their owne forces then they are indeede, And as in, hefe cases the despite of the injury doth much to enforce a desire of reuenge, so the king debaing deepely the estate and nature of the wrong, which was, to be beguiled under hope & promise of peace, determined to run vnto the remedy which commonly those men vsethat hold themclues iniured: that is, with all his forces and meanes to affay to recouer the honour and kingdom ne hath loft, and with armes to reffore the reputation that had bin ftolne from him by deceipt, holling it no injuffice to be reuenged of him that did the first wrong. But afore he entred into the action of any enterprise, he complained greeuously to the Archduke not yet departed from Blogs, ecommeding to him the infamy of infidelity, & how much it imported him to redreffe the abuse, fhe had any vertue to preserve his faith and his honour. By which instigation, the Archduke whose innocency held him sufficiently acquited) solicited greatly his father in law, to redresse the abuse, complaining in vehement termes that things were so handled to his great slaunder, & hat in the fight and knowledge of all the world . It hath bene a custome with the Princes of the ., world to entertaine one another with vaine hopes and artificiall practifes, efteening more the oc-, rations which the time offereth, then the faith and promifes which themselues do make: for, the,, kings of Spaine, with many excuses, deferred to fend the ratification of peace afore the victory, aledging formtimes, that having a custome to make their dispatches joyntly, they could never be both together in one place as was necessary; and sometimes that they were so peffred with the nultitude of affaires, that all oportunities to that expedition, were prejudicicall. In which excuses nay be manifeltly discerned the ill disposition they had to embrace the peace, either for that their on in law had exceeded their comissions, or else for that after he was departed out of Spaine, they vere entred into a better hope of the issue and successe of the warre; or at least for that it seemed traunge to them, that he had appropriated to himfelfe their part of the realme, having no assuance(by the minority of the children) that the mariage of his fonne fhould take effect: and yet as hey alwaies expressed inclinations to peace, & gaue continual hopes to ratifie it; so, by deferring, they won as much time as they could, to the end to take aduice according to the euent of things. And obseruing stil the same sleight to temporize and entertaine, after they understood by true adpertifement that their army remained victorious, albeit they were resolved to hold no reckening of the peace that was made, yet did they deferre to declare their intention to the Archduke, to the end, that keeping by that meanes the French king in suspence, he might have the lesse oportunity to prepare for the rescuing of Caietta and the other places which yet remained. At length, constrained by the importunities of their fonne in law (who was determined that otherwise he would not depart from Bloys) they fent thither new Embassadors, by whom was declared, after disputation of certaine dayes, that it was not the intention of their kings to ratify that peace which had bene made in that fort, which neither in matter, meaning, nor circumstance, it caried either honour or furety for them: and entring into controversie with the Archduke, they told him, that it brought no maruell and discontentment to his father in law, that in the conditions of the peace, he had transgressed their will, and that albeit in regard of his honour his commission was free and large, yet he ought to communicate with the instructions that were given him, which were limited and subject to rule. The Archduke answered, that his instructions were no lesse free and vniuerfall then his commission', and that at his departure, his parents in law assured him that they defired the peace chiefly by his meanes, and did sweare upon the holy Gospell and image of Iesus Christ to observe whatsoever he should determine: and yet for his owne part, he was contented to trauell in it as in the person of a man regulated; and forbearing to vse the amplitude and authority of his commission, he alwaies communicated with the two personages which they had sent with him. These new Embassadors working all by art, propounded new meanes of accord, disclofing as it were that their kings had defire to render the realine to King Federyke. But those deuises being discerned not only to be vaine, but also full of scorne and deceipt, for that they tended to estraunge from the French king the spirit of the Archduke, who looked to have that kingdome for his sonne. The king in publike audience aunswered them, that he would in no fort treat or negotiate with them, if first they ratified not the peace that was made, and declared that the diforders hapned by it did much discontent them: He told them, that it seemed to him a matter not only maruellous, but also detestable and abhominable, that those kings who gloried so much to have gotten the title of Catholiques, would hold so base reckening of their proper honour, their faith giuen, their oath fworne, and of the religion they professe, bearing no respect to the Archduke, a Prince so great, so noble, so vertuous, and their sonne and heire. With this answere commaunding them the same day to depart his Court, he turned immediatly all his wits to the preparations of the war, wherein taking occasion upon the greatnesse of the wrongs that had bin done, he determined to advance far greater provisions both by land and sea, then had bin done in any times afore by any of the kings of Fraunce: So importunate is the passion of reuenge in the minds of mortall men, who not with standing find oftentimes more fecurity to dissemble injuries then to " reuenge them.

In so much as he determined to send two mightie armies to the realme of Naples, the one by fea and the other by land. And least in the meane while Caietta and the Castels of Naples were lost, he prepared to succour them with diligence by sea, as well with new supplies of men of war, as with all other necessary things: and to give impediment that there went no succours out of Spaine (which had bin the cause of all the disorders) he resolved to invade the kingdome of Spaine with two armies by land, addressing one to the countrey of Rossillion which adioyneth to the sea Mediterrane, and the other to Fontaraby with the other places affilting upon the Occean fea: and also at the same time, to affaile with an army by sea, the coasts of Catelogma and Valencia.

But whiles the French were diligent in preparing for these expeditions, Consaluo deuising how hill Saint Martin: from thence on a place formwhat raised, he beat the wall of the Citadell, whose fituation being towards the fayd mountaine, was made strong with auncient wals, their foundations being almost vnder the earth. At the same time also Peter of Nanarro call a mine to ouerthrow the wals of the Citadell, battring also the new Castell wals, and the Towre of Saint Vincent which Consalue had won a few dayes before. New Castell had a forme & building after another fashion then it is at this day, for that now the Citadell being taken away, there beginneth a new circuit of wals, where were the wals of the fame, and that stretcheth along the place of the Castell vntill the sea: this circuit begun by Federyk & by him raised even to the walt, being made of very strong matter of walling, & well founded, is very hard to be undermined, for that it is subject to countermines on all fides, & also the water runneth almost vpon the vppermost part of the ground. Consaluo had a determination, that assoone as he had taken the Citadell, and comming neare the vault of the Castell wall, he would destroy it with new mines: but either by the natural rashnesse, or by the ill fortune of the Frenchmen, a greater occasion was offered to him, the advertities of the French making all things happy to their enemies. For, after Peter of Nauarro had put fire The new Caffel to the mine which he had perfected, the fury of the powder blew open the wall of the Citadell,& at the same instant the Spanish bands of sootmen standing ready raunged in battell expecting the operation of the fire-worke, made entries on many fides, partly by those places of the wall that were broken, and partly vling the seruice of escaling ladders, they commanded the wall in fundry other places not hurt by the mine, their fortune making those things easie, which by experience & reason seemed not without manifest perill. On the other side, the French, issuing out of the Castell of intention not to fuffer them to remaine within the Citadell, charged them, but with a fuccesse farre inferior to their vertue, for that being immediatly ouerlayed with multitudes of the Spanish, as they retired towards the Rampier, the Spaniards entred pelmell with them, & running with the fame fortune euë vp to the way that goeth to the gate, they so redoubled the feares of the Frechme already appalled by the dispaire of their own estate, that standing in condition vecerly abandoned, in leffe then halfe an houre they rendred the Castell with their goods and liues to discression, the Count of Montoire remaining prisoner with many other Lords. This conquest was so much the more agreeable to the Spaniards, & leffe for the purpose of the French, by how much there arrived from Genes the day following, for their fuccouts, an army by fea of fixe great ships, with many maller vessels fraighted with victuals, weapon & munitions, & a regimer of 2000. footmen. At he discouerie of this Nauie, the Spanish armie at sea riding then in the port of Naples ? retired nto Y chia, whither the French Nauie pursued them understading the new Castle was lost; but he Spanish Nauie having sunke before them certaine Barks, to the end they were not compeled to fight, after they had bestowed certaine bolnes of shot one against another, more for pleafure then prejudice, they brake off, the one going to Caletta, and the other being reaffured by the departure of the enemy, retired to the mole of Naples: fortune doing more for their lafetic then their owne vertue.

The Caftell of Naples taken he might have the Castels of Naples , planted his artillery against new Castell at the soote of the by the Spanish.

After the taking of new Castle, Confuluo fell to deuise by what meanes he might have the residue of the realme, & therefore without tarying for the armie that was in Calabria (which laid there to conquer the vale of Ariana to take away all impedimets to passe further the sept Prosper Colonne into Abruzza: and leaving Perer of Nauarro aforethe Egge Caffle, he marched with the residue of the armie towards (metra, in the taking whereof he supposed did consist the summe of the warre, for that both the hopes & the dispaires of the French me depeded whollie vpon the defence or losse of that Citie, strong by the oportunitie of the sea, & by the conuciniencie & greatnes of his port, verie fit to receive the armies that should be sent fro Genes to Pronence. Touching the French men, they did not only hold Casetta, but also, besides the places thereabouts which were in their power, they comaunded in Abruzza, Aquilea, the rocke of Enandra, with many other places: besides, the Lord Lemys d'Ars, having reassembled manie troops of horsmen & footmen, & being fortified with the Prince of Melfa within Vendusa, did great harmes to the countrie thereabout. Lastly, Ronsano, Matalona, with many other strong peeces appertaining to the Barons of the faction of Anion, held out constantly at the deuotion of the French king, their valour not withstanding being insufficient to resist their advertities.

In this meane while Peter of Nauarro made certaine close or couered Barks, with the which approching in more furetiethe walles of the Egge Caltle, he calt a mine on that fide which prospects Przifalcona, without the knowledge or privitie of them within, & assoone as he had intangled it with the fire, he blew into the aire in great furie one part of the wall, together with the bodies of men that stood vpon it: with the which, both for the action terrible & the newnes of the deuise, strange, the Castle was immediatly takento the special reputation of Peter of Nawarro, & general wonder of al men, for that as new inventions to reverse a strong place are most fearfull, having as yet no deuise to encounter them, so it was sucredible to what estate of opinion this new experience brought Peter of Nauarro, against whole mines they thought that neither walles, fortresses, nor other working could make resistance, so readily is the nature of man raised ,, into wonder when his mind comprehends not the reason of the things which the eye beholdeth >> performed in action. And fure in those daies it was a thing of great horror, that with the force of Cannon powder put into a Caue, or rather powred in the mine, men shold throw downero the earth, places & walles of greatest strength & most subtile foundation. The first that vsed this experience of undermining of walles in Italy, were the Genomaies, amongst whom, acording to the tellimonie of some, Peter of Nauarro exercised the art of warre in the person of a meane foul dier on foote, it was in the yeare 1487, when they laie incamped afore the rock of Serezanella holden then by the Florentines, where, with a myne cast in this maner, they opened a part of the wall milling notwithstanding the taking of the rock, for that the myne (by some error or imperfection) had not pierced fo deepe under the rocke as was needefull, the same being the occasion that at that time the example of fuch an experience was not followed.

Confaluo, drawing neare to Caierta, M.a. Algore, who had distributed 400. Launces & 4000 footmen of those which remained of the fortune of the battaile, between Catetta, Fondi, Itrio, Tracetto, & the rock Guillaumo, retired them all eftiones within Caretta, wherein entred with him the Princes of Salerne & Bilignan, the Duke of Tracetto with many other Barons of the realmeioyned afore with him. After the retrait of these companies, Consaluo entred vpon those places which they had left abandoned, & also vpon the rock of S. Germain, encamping afterwards in the Suburbs of Caierta. And after he had planted his artillerie, he battered with an incredible furie that fide towards the hauen, & the mountain commonly called Mount Roland; a hil conioyned & hath comandement ouer the Citie, & the which, the French men had then fortified with rampiers & Baltillions of earth, being afterwards by him inclosed with wal, he assaid in vaine to enter with two affaults (but not ordered) and forbearing at last to give the affault god latti yener under X neral, & disposed that day which he had determined to give it, he saw it would be hard to have it, aswel for the numbers & valours of those within, as also when he considered that though his army should enter by strength into the mountain, yet he should be but brought into greater perill. flanding open to the thot of the artillerie planted in the monaflery & other high places upon the mountain, He forbare not for all this to plaie with his artillerie & to molest the town, which likewife was enuironed & befieged on that fide to the sca, lying afore the haue the xviij. Spanish Gallies which Dom Raymon de Cardona gouerned. But whilest Confaluo was buse in these actions, there arrived for the French a Nauie of fix groffe Carracks Genewaies, fix other ships, & seu gallies with good succors of victuals & footmen. Their commaunder was the Marquis of Saluzzo, who by the death of M.de Nemours, the king had fent thither for their new Diceror, the fortune of the warres notwithstanding, nothing altring though the person of the General was changed. The king defiring greatly to keepe Caletta, refurnished them eftfoones within few daies, what vpon those vessels & what vpo others, with 1000 footmen of Corjegna & 3000 Gascouns: in so much as by the comming of this new Nauie, the Spanish Flecte was coffrained to retire to Naples, & Confalue dispairing to do any more good there, retyred his regimets within the moale of Caietra, & within Castellona, whereby he kept Caietra besieged with a siege (as it were) more large, after he had lost many of his people, partly by skirmishing, & some in retyring, amongst whom Dom Hugues de Cardona was flaine by a shot frothe towne. But at the same time, all his other affaires of the kingdom trained a successe more happie, for that Prosper Colonne had newly taken the rock of Enandro & Aquilea, & reduced al the other pieces of Abruzza to the Spa. nish deuotion, almost all Calabria, yeelding the like obedience by the contract which the Count Capaccio had lastly made with them. And there remained no other place free from their jurisdi-Ction, but Rossano & S. Seuerin where the Prince of Rossano was befreged, nothing relifting the felicitie of those men, whom fortune went about to make victors.

Whilest these alterations trauched the kingdom of Naples, the other regions of Italy were not altogether void of suspitions and troubles : for the Florentines, afore the fortune of the French began to headlong to decline in the kingdome of Naples, fearing indifferently the ambufcadoes of the Pope, & the ambition of the Duke Valentmois, forgate not to leavie provisions of warre equal to the greatnes of the perill that threatned, holding it easie to suffer a mischief, whethey are fure of the remedie: they entertained into their paie for the leading of their armie (& yet without title of Generall) the Bailife of Caen, with fifty French Launces: a Captaine for his own particular well recommended for the service of warre, & for the respect of the Florentines verie convenient, for that being the kings subject, & had brought his charge of fiftie Launces by the kings confent, they had opinion that those of whom they earst doubted, would now be better aduised what they would do, the king expressing under that degree of fauour a disposition to be readie to their aide in al necessities. As soone as he was come to their armie, they reassembled ail their troups,& for the second time, cut off the corne of the Pifans, but not through the whole countrey, for that to enter the vale of Sercle was not without danger, having his fituation betweene the mountaines and the waters, & in the midway betweene Lucqua & Pila. Immediatly after they had given this spoile to their corne, the Camp marched to Vicopisan, which was taken without difficultie, for that 100. French footmen being within it, the Bailife of Caen threatning to punish them as enemies to the king, & somtimes promising them of liberalitie a moneths pay, they exchanged their faith with feare & hope of profit, & issued out of the towne, the same being the occasion that Vicopisan was rendred to discretion. Verucola also wherein was but a slender gard, was forthwith enuironed, to the end no succors should enter into it: and the artillerie being afterwards trailed thither not without great difficulties, for that the mountains therabouts, offred many troublesome impediments, those that were within, fearing more the thunder of the Cannon, then truffing to their proper vertue offortune, yeelded, their goods & liues faued. The fituation of Verucola being a little fortreffe raifed upon a high mountain during the warres in the countrey of Pifa, is of great importance: for that being within fine miles of Pifa, it hath not only a naturall aptnes to distresse the countrey thereabout, yea euen to the gates of the citie, but also by his prospect he discouereth all the bands & troops that come out of Pila, whether they be on soote or hotimen. P. Vitelli & many other experienced Captaines made many tryals in vaine to carrie it fince the warre began. And now the confidece that the Psfans had, that Vicopifan would be defended, without taking the which, the Florentines could not encap before Verncola, was the cause that they had not made sufficient provision, wherin they helped forward the fortune of their enemies more by their proper negligence then by the others vertue, opinion beguiling them against reation or experience. Greatly did amaze the Pijans the loffe of Verucola, in whom not withflanding neither the regard of the harmes they had received, nor the confideration of their other calamities, being miferable by want of money & victuals, could worke no inclination to returne to the obedience of the Florentines, languishing (by one common infirmitie) in dispaire to obtaine pardon for the conscience of the great transgressions they had don: which dispositio it was needfull, that fuch as in the gouernment bare geatest authoritie, should entertaine with a speciall diligence, for that those of the plaine countrey (without whom they were not able to continue defence) bare no small suspection to run with the streame, & to varie in mind as their common sortune declined. And therfore nourifhing them with diuers hopes, together with those estates of the common people that lined more by the benefits of peace, then troubles of warre, they publifhed amongst them fundrie rumors under the authorizie of fained letters, amusing them with diuers inuentions, and confounding things falle with those that were true; if any accident hapned in Italy, they tooke the oportunitie & made it ferue for their purpose, communicating with the people that fometimes one Prince, formtimes an other, were readie to come to fuccor them: they made perswasions according to the propertie of the time, vsing their tongues in stead of force, to flaie those men ypon whom depended their own safetie. But in althese extremities they were not without some aide & succors of the Genowases & Lucquois, ancient enemies of the Florentines, & likewise of Pandolfe Perrucci, bearing litteremembrance of the benefits received : and (which was of greatest importance) they were also norished in secret with certaine succors, but with far greater hopes, by the Duke Valentinois: Ambition hath infinit operations, & in this abufeth the » imaginatios of men, that it makes them seeme able to hold those things which they cannot gripe, " & raifeth their mindes to conceiue matters aboue their power or polifibilitie: For the Duke, in » whom had long raged a defire to make him felfe lord of that citie, & in other times had abiliained for feare of the kings difpleasure, tooke now the advantage of the time, and prefirming much by the infelicitie of the French in the realme of Naples, he loyned to him the confent of his father, &c treated with the Pifan Embassadours, whom they had sent to Rome for that purpose, to accept the jurisdiction, aspiring by that meane to occupie all Tuskane: a deuise; which albeit brought the Florenines & Siennois into no small suspicion of him, yet the value stall benefit being hindered by their particularities, there was no proceeding to that vnitie which the French king propounded betweene the Florentines, the Bolonnois, & the Siennois, for that they of Florence refuled to accept it if they were not repossessed of Mont Pulcian, as had beene solicited & promifed from the beginning: and Pandolfe who bare a mind effranged from it (albeit he made other thew) alleaged that to reftore it, would fo flirre vp the hate of the people of Sienna against him. that he should be constrained yet once againe to for sake the towne, and therefore he said it was better (for the common benefit) to defetre it as yet, til time brought about a better occasion, then in restoring it presently to further the Duke Valentindis with meanes to occupie Sienna. By these meanes, denying nothing, he kept things in longnesse & delaies, seeking to leaue the Florentines contented with hopes in stead of effects, which excuses by them rejected were accepted & beleued in the Court of Fraunce, by the meane of Frauncis de Naruy resident at Sienna by the kings . 10/mer il commaundement.

But it was not the intentio of the Pope & Valentinois to put these enterprises to executio, otherwise then the proceeding of the army which the king prepared, gaue them courage, and induced them by occasios to stick more to the one king then to the other: whereupon in that time they should insuffer the variatio of thoughts, deterring as much as they could the declaratio of their intentio, which bare, no favour or inclinatio to the French king further then there was seare to constrain them, for that the experience of things passed in Bologna & Truskan tooke away all hope to attempt greater matters with his savour. & for that reason, as they had begun afore the victorie of the Spaniards to become more & more seperat sto him in wils of after the victorie, tising in impudee & weening, they respected no more (as they were, wont to do) neither his wil nor his authoritie, his adventities disclosing their comptios, which in his prosperities he rather sufpected then discremed. And albeit, immediatly after the overthrows of the French, they gave assured to embrace the kings quarrels, making demonstration contents in mento fend to the realme of Napler; yet, what by the ambition of new conquests, & greedy eyes they cast you the riches of Truskans.

the king requiring that they would declare them selues openly for him, the Pope aunswered in fuch miserie and doubt, that by how much leffe they were innocent in wordes or meaning, by so much more it was reasonable in the king to suspect them. Their simulation and dissimulation being so notable, that it was a prouerbe ordinarie in Rome, that the Pope neuer did that which rpon the Popes he faide, and the Duke feldome spake that which he meant. Besides, the contention wherin they were with lohn lordan was not yet determined: for, albeit Valentinois fearing the kings displeafure, ablieined to molest him upon his Maiesties commaundement: yet the Pope declaring how much that greeued him, ceased not to solicit the king to suffer him either by armes to reconquer the estates of John Jordan, or els by some other degree of compulsion to see that he had recompence for them: giving to ynderstand that that which moved him was not ambition, but a just feare of his neighbourhood, proceeding upon this suspition, that finding amongst the papers of Cardinall Vrsin a blanke signed with the proper hand of John Jordan, it was an argument, that in those things which were negociated at Marsons, he had one selse will and intelligence against him with the Vrsins. In which thing the king more regarding profit then honestie, had proceeded dinerfly, according to the diversitie of times, sometimes expressing favour to lohn lordan as before, and fortimes inclining to fatisfie the Pope in fome degree. And for that cause John Jordan refusing to depose Bracciano into the hands of the French Embassador resident at Rome, the king required that they should repose vpon him the resolution of the difference, under condition that John Jordan should be conveyed into Fraunce within two moneths, and that things should remaine in that estate, until he had determined: whereunto as Iohn Iordan consented by necessitie hoping through his own merits and the expectation he had of his father and him, to be fully deliuered from such vexations : so also in the Pope appeared no resistance, more for feare then otherwife, for that the French king required fuch a matter in a time when the Archduke contracted the peace in the name of the kings of Spaine. But the condition of things being changed by the victorie of the Spaniards; and feeing withall that the French king had neede of him, he demaunded all the states of lohn lordan, offring the recompence that should be declared by the king, who for the same occasion induced John Jordan to consent thereunto, and to promise to deliuer in his sonne for the assurance of that which should be determined: a matter which the king did greatly against his wil, for that he had no intention to deliver vp those estates to the Pope, if at the same instant, he joined not with him openly in the warre of Naples, holding it as reasonable for him as for the Pope, to take the advantage of things, & to ferue his turne of controversies. But they of Petillano where the sonne of John Jordan was, refusing to deliuer him to the kings Embassadour, who was gone to Port Hercules to receive him, John Iordan him selfe, being thenreturned, went to the Embassadour, and to sulfill the promise of his faith, offred him his proper perfon, which the Embassadour accepted with litle reputation, and with lesse discretion bestowed him in a ship : but as soone as the king knew it, he caused him to be set at libertie, esteeming it an iniurie dishonorable, to do instice vpon him for the disobedience of others.

The Frking prepares mightily against the K. of Spaine.

In this meane while, there was vied a generall diligence to leauie the preparation which the French king meant to emploie both on this fide & beyond the mounts. For the Lord d' Albert & the Marshall of Gie, were gone into Guien with foure hundred Launces, & fine thousand footmen, as well Swiffers as Gascoins, to make warre on the part of Fontarabie: and to stirre up the Countie of Rossilion, the Marshal of Rieux was sentinto Languedock with eight hundred launces & eight thousand footmen, part Swiffers & part French . And at the same time the Nauie by fea hoyled faile to endammage the coaftes of Catelogna and the realme of Valence . Befides, the king had dispatched for Italy with title of Captaine generall ouer his armie; the Lord Trymowille (to whom was transferred by vniuerfall opinion the whole merite and reputation for matters of warre, within the realme of Fraunce) & fent with the fame expedition, the Bailife of Dyon to dispatch eight thousand Smylfers, the men at armes also & the footmen making hast to march. notwithstanding the armie was not so strong as was determined in the beginning. Perhaps the king would have it so, not for disabilitie, or for that he would spare, but for that he defired that they might make the more expedition into the kingdome of Naples, & partly because Monsieur d' Alegre aduertifing the king of the state of the affaires there, assured him that the remainder of the armie was stronger then it was in deed, both for that the townes & Barons remained firme in his deuotion, & also he had demanded succors of all those in Italy which sauored his faction. By which meane and industrie, the Florentyns had graunted him the Baily of Caen with the fiftie Launces paied of their own money, and an hundred and fiftie other men at armes. The Duke of Ferrara also and the Bolonnoys, with the Marquis of Mantua (who for that the king sent to him, went to him in person) did refurnish him euery one in particular with an hundred men at armes, and they of Sienna with an other hundred: which bands loyned to the eight hundred Launces and flue thousand Gascoins which Trymouille brought into Italy, & to the eight thoufand Swiffers which were expected, reckening also those that remained within Caietta, made vp the number of a thousand eight hundred Launces French and Italian,& more then eighteene thousand footemen. Besides these preparations for the warre by land, the armic by sea was departed, a Nauie strong & glorious, in so much as all men confessed, that there was no memorie that any French king had ever made to huge and mightie preparations (making diffinction of the forces both by ica & by land, gathered aswell on this side as beyond the mounts:) but it was not thought good for the kings furetic, to suffer his armie to passe by Rome, if first his maiestie were not well assured of the Pope and Duke Valentinois, for that he had iust occasion to doubt of them for many reasons & many demonstrations, but specially by the testimonie of ceraineletters from Valentinois to Confaluo newly furcepted, wherein was debated between them that if Confuluo tooke Caretto (in which case he should stand we lassured of all the matters of the kingdome) he should passe further with his armie, and Valentinois should take upon him the jurildiction of Pila, and to they both to joyn in one strength to affaile Tuskan. In which respect, the king (his armie being already passed into Lumbardy) was verie importunate that they should at last, declare their vttermost intention, holding it better to know them as they were, then to doubt them to be more or lesse then he should find them. And for their parts, albeit they listned to both parts, and treated with euerie one, yet, judging that the time was convenient to make traffike of the trauels of another, their defires caried them most to joyn with the Spanish: but they were restrained again with the consideration of this manifest danger, lest the french armie would begin to inuade their estates, in which case they should feele domage & displeasure, where they hoped to reape rewards & greatnes. In this estate of doubt and incertaintie of inclination, they fuffred both parts to leavie apparantly bands of footmen within Rome, deferring as much as they could to declare them selves: but being at last in termes resolute viged by the king, they offred that the Duke should be joyned to his armie with fine hundred men at arms & two thousand footmen, the king consenting not only to the occupying of the lands of Iohn Iordan, but also to the conquering of Suenna. And yet when they were vpon the point of conclusion, they varied, introducing new difficulties, as men, who (according to their custome) to be at libertie to take counsel of the euent of things, had no delire to declare them selues according to good meaning, and therfore there was propounded another nature of practife, by the which the Pope feeming not to declare for any of the parties, but to remaine in the person of a comon father, confented to give passage to the french armie through the dominions of the Church, with promise not to moleft neither the Florentyns, the Siennois, nor the Bolonnois during the wats in the realme of Naples. Which conditions had at length ben accepted by the king, to the end to give expedition of passage to his armie to Naples, albeit he knew they were neither honorable for him self, nor fure for fuch as depended on him in Italy, seeing he had no affurance that the Pope and Valentinois would not declare against him, if any misfortune hapned to him in the realine: befides there was this danger, least as soone as his armie was out of the territories of Rome, they would not rife contrarie to their fairh, to asfaile Tuskan, which for the disagreement of the people, & the numbers of men which he had drained out of it, was become weake & almost disarmed, being a thing not vnlikely, that he would either fet you that enterprise or some other, feeing they had so long time expected occasions, thinking to draw out of them a wonderfull profit.

But as the cogitations of men are vaine, and their thoughts full of deceit: fo, when they flood in the highest estate of their hopes, behold the Pope, who went to supper in a vineyard neare the Untream, to reloyce in the delight and pleasure of the fresh aire, is tuddenly carried for dead to the Pope Alex. Bishops Pallace: his sonne also communicating in the same accident, but with better fortune: the, 6. dead. for the day following, which was the eighteenth day of August, the dead corps of the Pope (according to cultome) was borne into the Church of S. Peter, blacke, swolne, and most deformed, most manifest figures of poison: but Valentinois what by the vigour & thrength of his youth, and readie helpe of strong medicines and contrepoisons, had his life faued, remaining not withstanding oppressed with a long and grieuous sicknes: It was assuredly beleeued that the accident proceeded of poilon, the discourse whereof according to common report was in this sort: The Duke Valentynois, who was to bee present at that supper, had determined to poison Adrean Cardinall of Cornette, referring that time and place to execute his bloudic refolution : for it is most certeine that in his father and him were naturall customes to vse poison, not only to be reuenged of their enemies, or to be assured of suspitions, but also vppon a wicked couetousnes to dispoile rich men of their goods, whether they were Cardinalles or Courtiers, although they had neuer done them wrong, as hapned to the Cardinal Saint Ange who was verie rich. This manner of rage they would vie also against their greatest friends and familiars, and such as had bene their most faithfull servants, such as were the Cardinalles of Capus and Modeno: a recompense vnworthie the merits of good men, & not disagreeable to the disposition of such a father & sonne, whereof the one made all things lawfull by vile dispensation, and with the other nothing was dishonest wherein was oportunitie to his purposes. The Duke Valentynois sent before certaine flagons with wine infected with poifon, which he gaue to a feruant that knew nothing of the matter, commaunding that no person should touch them: a commaundement prejudiciall to his mailter, as the ignorance of the feruant was the instrument in the euil that hapned both to the " father and sonne: Such is the suffrance of God, who in the execution of his judgements, raiseth " one murderer to kill another, and breaketh the brands of the fyre vpon the head of him that first 66 kindled it. For, the Pope comming by aduenture fomewhat before supper, and ouercome with the drought and immoderate hear of the time, called for drinke: and because his owne prouision was not yet brought from the Pallace, he that had the infected wine in charge, thinking it to be recommended to his keeping for a wine most excellent, gaue the Pope to drinke of the fame wine which Valentynois had fent: who arriving whilest his father was drinking, dranke also of the same wine, being but iust that they both should taste of the same cup which they had brued for the delltruction of others. All the towne of Rome ranne with great gladnes to Saint Peters about the dead bodie of the Pope, their eyes not being fatisfied to see dead and destroyed a Serpent, who with his immoderate ambition and poisoned infidelitie, together with all the horrible examples of crueltie, luxurie, and monifrous couetouines, felling without diffinction both holic things and prophane things, had infected the whole world: and yet was accompanied with a most rare and almost perpetual prosperitie, even from his young age to the end of his life, defiring alwaies great things, and obtaining most often that he defired: an example of much importance, to confound the arrogancie of those men, who presuming to know and see perfectly with humane eyes the depth of Gods judgements, do affure, that what hapneth either good or ill to mortall men, proceedeth either of their merites or faultes: as though we fawe not daily many good men vniultly tormented, and many wicked persons about their deseruings line in ease and honour: wherein who makes an other interpretation, derogates the justice & power of God, the greatnes of which being not to be contained within any scripts or termes present, knoweth how well and largely to differne in another time and place, the inft from the vinust, and that with rewardes and eternall punishments.

The Duke Valentynoss no leffe forowfull for the death of his father, then languishing in his owne infirmitie, retyred all his bandes of men of warre about him, lying ficke in the Pailace: and having alwayes thought, partly by the feare of his armes, and partly through the fauour of the Spanish Cardinalles which were eleuen, to create a Pope at his pleasure after the death of his father, he found now impediments about his expectation, specially in the matter of the election, and all his other plots and devises to suffer imperfection and errour by reason of his disease which was verie daungerous. In which respect he complained greeuously, for that having oftentimes forescene all the accidents that might happen to him by the death of his father, and withall east all the remedies that the wit of man might comprehend, yet he could never imagine that at the same time he should be estrained with a sickness so daungerous: and therefore finding it necessaries frame his counsels, not to the plots he had layde before, but to the necessitie present: he sawe he was not able in one time to sufficient the hatted of the Colonness: and Vrsins, & fearing least they should in one time to sufficient the hatted of the Colonness and Vrsins, & fearing least they should in their goods, then to trust to the behaviour of such as he had

greeued both in their goods and persons: and in that minde he procured readie reconcilement with the Colonnois and such of the Vale as followed that faction, he invited them to returne efffoones to their estates, and made restitution of the Castles which Alexander with great expenses had fortified and enlarged, the alteration and feare of the time compelling him to do more then any regard to honour, equitie, confcience, or religion . All which not with standing, sufficed not neither for his fuertie, nor to keepe the towne of Rome in peace, wherein all things were full of fulpitions and tumults, for that both Profer Colonno was entred and all that faction had taken armes: and also Fabio Vrfin comming evento the houses of the famulie of Mont Iordan, had . with a great inultitude of his partakers let on fire certeine merchants shops and the houses of many Spanish Courtiers, a natio generally enuyed by the memorie of the infolencies which they had done during the Popedome of Alexander . Belides, Fabio thirling after the bloud of Valentynous, made great leuies offorreine fouldiers, and folicited Bartlemen Alusano being then in the paie of the Venetians, to joyne with him and his house in the teuenge of so many wrongs as he had don them, thinking it but inft to raife violence against him, whose surie had not spared to perfecute them and their friends with all forces of oppression and ruines. The suburbes and meadowes fo swarmed with the men of warre of Valentynois, that the Cardinal's seeing no reason of suertie to assemble at the Bishops Pallace, drew together at the couent of the Church of Almerua, at which place (contrary to the auncient cultome) they began, but farre later then they were wont, to doe the funerall of Alexander. The trouble and mutinic of the time present not only deferring the celebration of the obsequies, but also somewhat derogating the ceremonic, detecting in those last actions the abhominable and infamous life of him in whose regard they were done: it was much feared least Confaluo would come to Rome, specially for that Profer Colonno had left at Marina, a certaine number of Spanish fouldiers, and for the reconciliation of Valentynois with the Colonnois, it was believed that he had an intention to follow the Spanish faction. But greater were the feares of the comming of the french armie, which had marched flowly till that day, for that in the publike councelles of the Smy/fers (being not a litle amazed for the ill fortune of the French in the realme of Naples) it was doubted afore the contract, that the king could not make leave of their men, and all the Capteines and footmen chosen together had refused for the same occasion, the same beeing the cause that they were not so readie, and that they made long aboad by the wayes: But in respect of the Popes death, the armie which was gouerned by the Marquis of Manua with title of the kings Lieutenant, & by the Baily of Caen, & Monsieur de Sandricourt, in whom except the name, remained as much power as in the Generall, for that Trimouslle remained ficke at Parma, was come without tarying for the Smyffers, to the territories of Sienna, with intention to goe to Rome according to the direction of the king, who also had commaunded the Nauie which was at Cauetta to make faile to Oftia, to give impediment to Consaluo for going to Rome with his armie to compell the Cardinals to choose a Pope at his denotion. Not withstanding the french armie remained certaine dayes betweene Bancouent and Viterbe, for that the merchants making difficultie for the troubled time that was at R one to accept the billes of exchange that were fent out of Fraunce, the Smyffer's now comen into the countrey of Sienna, refused to march further if they were not paied. In this time the tumultes were no lessein the territorie of Rome, with many other places through the estate of the Church and the lands of Valentynous, for that the Vries and all the Romilh Barons restored them selves to their estates: The familie of Vitells were returned to Citta de Castello, & John Pawle Basllon under hope of a certaine intelligence, had affailed Peroula. In which action albeit he was put to the chase by his enemies, and constrained to go his way, yet being refurnished with news bands and open fuccours of the Florentynes, he entred the town ein a braue and resolute assault, not without the flaughter of his enemies and some losse of his owne companie. The towne of Planbyn also tooke armes, which albeit they of Sienna laboured to vsurpe & occupie, yet the nuncient Lord returned thither by the fauour of the Florentynes. The Duke of Vrbyn, the Lordes of Pefere, of Camerin, and Sini Gale, did the like in their effaces: onely Romagnia (notwithstanding they were not without suspition of the Venetians who leaved great bands of men at Ranenna) remained quiet and inclined to the devotion of Valenynois, knowing by experience how much it was more tollerable and better for the weale of the countrey to serue one weakneffe coulde defend them, nor for their pouertie, were able to doe them good, but rather when they found their reuenues infufficient to entertain them, they would be constrained to op-

presse them: They considered also, that for the authoritie & greatnes of the Duke Valentinois, & for the good inflice he ministred amongst them, their countrey was not vexed with so many mutinies and tumults of factions as it was wont to be, bringing ordinarie slaughters to their friends and cohabitants. Besides, they drew into consideration the benefites that he had done for many, together with the great friendshippes he had gotten, by entertaining and giving paie to such as had bene trained in armes, by distributing offices to men able and sufficient, and also by soliciting his father on the behalf of Prelates and Churchmen, touching the collation of benefices and spirituall dignities. Out of these respects they took occasion of firmnes, that neither the examples of others that revolted, nor the memorie of their auncient Lords, could not estrange them from Valentynous: who albeit he stood oppressed with many difficulties, and lesse expectation of abilitie in a state so pluckt and broken, yet was he laboured vnto both by the French and Spanish, and with many offers and promises importunately solicited to be on their side: for that besides the oportunitie of his forces and men of warre, they hoped by this meane to winne the voices of the Spanish Cardinals in the election to be made. But the Duke looking wisely into the stare of his affaires, tooke counsel of the inclination of the time, & refused to follow the fancies of men: and albeit for the reconcilement that was made with the Colonnois, it was beleued that he would be declared for the Spanish, yet being induced to that reconcilement only by scare, least they would joyne with the Orlins, he declared now that he would do nothing contrarie to his fidelitie to the French, whom he determined to follow, for that, both within the towne of Rome which the kings armie did now approch, and also in his other estates, they might do him more good and harme then the Spanish: in so much as the first day of September he made a convention with the Cardinall S. Seuerin and Monsieur de Trans the kings Embassador, by the which he promised to aid him with his souldiers in the enterprise of Naples, and in all other expeditions against all persons except the Church. And on the other part, the kings Agents bound the king to the protection as well of his person, as of all the estates he possessed, and to concurre also in the recouerie of those which he had lost. Besides these, the Duke gaue hopes to draw the most part of the Spanish Cardinals to give their voice to the Cardinal of Amboyse, who puffed vp with a proud hope to obtaine the Popedome with authoritie, with money, and with the armies of his king, went immediatly out of Fraunce after the Popes death to Rome, carying with him the Cardinal of Aragon and the Cardinal Ascanins: him he had delivered two yeares before out of the Towre of Bourges, and given him honorable countenance in the Court, hoping that if the Pope should dye, his ancient reputation might do much to further his ambitio, together with the many friends and fauorers which he had in the Court of Rome: foundations verie weake to beare so high and waightie a purpose, for that neither Valentynois could wholy dispose the Spanish Cardinals more inclined (according to the custome of men) to their proper profite, then to reacknowledge the good turnes that his father and he had done to them, and withall, many amongst them, having regard not to offend the mind of their king, would not have bene so farre ouerseene, as to choose for Pope a French Cardinal . Neither yet Ascanius, if he had had any power or place in the election, would have confented to lift to the supreme seat the Cardinal of Amboyle, for that it was to the perpetual embasing and cutting off of all the hopes that yet re> mained, as well to him, as to those of his house. They deferred yet the election of the new Pope, not only for that it was later then was wont ere they began to celebrate the obsequies of the dead; till the ending of which (enduring for the most part nine daies) the Cardinals have no custome to enterinto the Conclave or house of election: but also, the better to cut offoccasions and dangers of a schisme; in so great a consusion of affaires, & important division of Princes, the Cardinals that were present had agreed to give aduertisement to those that were absent to make their repaire: and when they were come, the Colledge neuerthelesse washolden in suspence, suspecting that the election would not be free, afwell for the bands of Valentinois, as for that the French armie which at last was drawn between Nepi and the Isle with intention to come to Rome, refused to passe the river of Tyber, if aforehand there were not chosen a new Pope. They feared, that either the contrarie part would rule the Colledge in the election, or els such was the deuise of Cardinall Amboyse, no lesse for the suertie of his person, then hoping to be the better fauoured. These things, after many contentions (the Colledge refusing otherwaies to enter into the Conclaue) were at last resolued and tooke forme, for that the Cardinall of Amboyse gave his faith to the whole Court of Cardinals, that the French armie should not passe Nepi and the Isle, the Valentinois consenting to go to Neps and afterwards to Civita Castellano, having fent to the French Camp two hundred men at armes and three hundred light horsemen under the leading of Lodowike de la Mir andola and Alexander de Tryuulce: but the Colledge erected many bands of footemen for the gard of Rome, and gaue power to three Prelates whom they had appointed for the garde of the Conclave, to open it if they discerned sedition or tumult, to the end that all the Cardinals being in libertic to go whither they will, every one might be out of hope to force them . At last the Cardinals entred the Conclave, being xxxviij in number, where the disagreemet which in other times was wont to kepe things in delay, was the cause nowe that they entred roundly into the action, and created in fewe daies a new Pope. And albeit in the election they had much to do to agree uppon the person, as well for their generall conetousnesse, as for the contention betweene the Cardinals depending of the French king, and the Spanish Cardinals embracing the faction of the king of Spaine. And albeit they were no leffe amased with the present daunger wherein they stood, all things in Rome beeing full of suspition and tumult, then with the confideration of the accidents which in a time fo troubled might happen bythe vacation of the Sea: yet at last, euen by the consent of the Cardinal of Amboy/e, in who failed enery day al hope to be elected, they created for Pope Frauncis Piccolomini Cardinall of Sienna, in whom was no colomini made expectation of long life, both for his extreme age & present sicknesse: a Cardinall sure of vnfronted report, and for his other conditions, not vinworthy that degree, who to renewe the memorie of Pius secundus his vncle, tooke vpon him the name of Pius the third.

Assoone as the Pope was created, the French armie had no further occasion to abide there, and falling speedily into the way that had beene agreed upon before, they passed suddenly the river of Tyber: but neither for the creation of the Pope, nor for the discamping of the armie, the tumults at Rome did not appeale, for that because there was expectation for the coming of Almano and John Paule Baillon, who conspiring together, made levies of men in Perusa . Valentinois continuing as yet ficke, and fearing their comming, was returned to Rome with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, the like numbers of ligt horfmen, & eight hundred footmen, having obtained safeconduct of the Pope, who hoped that he night the easilyer put end to those things hy some composition. But the Valentinois being within one towns and walles with the Vriins, who lusted in a just thirst after his bloud, the Vriins, by the oportunitie of new The Vriins bands arriving, notwithstanding they demaunded of the Pope & Colledge of Cardinals a short sainst Valen and readie justice, determined to be reuenged upon him with armes, assoone as John Paule Basllon and Alusano were arrived. By reason of these conspiring intentions, there was also some controuersie betweene the towne and them of the suburbes where Valentinois was lodged: a contention which troubled not only the people of Rome, and the court, but also was supposed to bring great prejudice to the affaires of the French, for that the Vrins, as soone as they were once dilpatched of the quarell against Valentinois, preparing to go to the pay either of the Frech or Spanish king, and judging that their strength was of no little importance to the victorie, they were fought to by both parts with ample conditions: but bearing a naturall disposition to the part of the French, the Cardinall of Amboyse entertained in the kings name Iulio Vrsin, who contracted for all those of his familie, except Aluiano, for whom was reserved place, with honorable conditions; but his comming reverfed all: for, albeit in the beginning he was almost agreed with the Cardinall of Amboyfe, yet, couetousnesse ouercomming his inclination, and being in one moment restrained with the Spanish Embassadour, he entred paie with the king of Spaine with fine hundred men at armes, and provision of lx. thousand duckets yearely, assuring him felfe of all those of his famulie, except lobn lordan: to which deliberation he was chiefly induced (as he frankly confessed) by despite that the Cardinall of Amboyse, burning more and more in ambition to be Pope, fauoured Valentinois, hoping by his meane to obtaine the most part of the voices of the Spanish Cardinals: notwithstanding that the Cardinals clearing him selfe of the fault by transferring it to another, gave out that he was perswaded that the Venetians realme of Naples, had not only confented that he should leave their pay, promising to reserve for him the same place; but also to the end the first paiments should be more readie, they had lent to the Spanish Embassadors fisteene thousand duckats; a matter, which though it be not in euc' ry part certaine, yet it cannot be denied that the Venetian Embassador did not manifestly intrude himselfe into that practise. Some were of opinion, that the conditions & large offers of the Spaniards, were the cause, for that they bound them selues to distribute estates in the kingdom, as wel to him as to all those of his familie, and to indue his brother with revenues ecclesiaticall : and laftly (which he effeemed much) to aide him when the warre was finished with two thousand Spanish footmen, in the enterprise which he determined against the Florentines in the fauour of Peter de Medicis . It was beleuced that Iohn Paule Baillon comen now to Rome with Almano, and who following his example, treated at one time with the French and with the Spanish. would also accompanie him in the same deliberation : but the Cardinall d'Amboyse, not a litle amazed that the Vrims had left the king, (a dealing which made doubtful the hopes of the Frech being afore almost certaine,) intertained him immediatly into the kings service with an hundred and fiftie men at armes : he almost accorded whatsoeuer the other demaunded, but all vnder the name of the Florentines, for that Iohn Paule would it so, to the end to be more affured of his paies, which were to be rebated of the fummes they ought to the king by vertue of their conuentions, he being more curious to prouide for the suretie of his paie, then careful to keepe his fidelitie with the king for the service that was required: for, being returned to Peronfa to put his people in order, and receiving xiiij. thou fand duckats, he was contented to governe himself more according to the successe of the time and common cuent of things, and by his passions and particular interests, then according to the reputation and faith of fouldiers. In which respects deferring with many excuses, to go to the Frencharmic, he would not depart from Perousa: a matter which the Cardinall Amboy/e supposed to proceede vponthis, that Iohn Paule imitating the inconstancie of the Captaines of Italie of that time, had from the houre he was intertained, made promise to Bartholmen Alusano and the Spaniards to do so, as holding that most reasonable & indifferent for him to do, wherein was most furetie for his paie & fafetie; a maner of dealing familiar with men that be mercenarie, but farre from those that hold deare either honor or reputation. As soone as the Vrsins were entred into the paie of the Spanish, peace proceded between them and the Colonnois, resolued and set down at the same instant in the lodging of the Spanish Embassador: to whom, and to the Venetian agent, they referred the resolution of all their differences. The agreement of those houses brought no little feare to Valentinois, for that being determined to leave Rome, & preparing to go to Bracciana, John Lordan having given his faith to the Cardinall of Amboyfe to lead him thither in furetie: John Paule and the Vrfins were determined to assaile him, who having no meane to enter into the suburbs by the gate of the castle S. Ange, they issued out of Rome, and fetching along circuit to come to the gate Torrono, they found it thut, and burnt it, finding nothing to refift the furie of their reuenge prouoked by fo iuft occafions. As soone as they were entred the gate, they began to skirmish with certaine horsemen of Valentmois, to whose succors albeit manie of the French souldiers didrun, who were not yet departed out of Rome: yet what by the increasing of the numbers of his enemies, and their rage redoubling, & his own people (whose strength was much diminished afore) making signes to abandon him, the necessitie of his peril constrained him together with the Prince of Squillace and certaine Spanish Cardinals, to seeke his safetie within the pallace of Vaiican, from whence he retired with a fearefull speede into the castle S. Ange, having by the Popes consent, received faith of the Captaine of the Castell (who was the same that had that charge in the daies of the dead Pope) to fuffet him to go out when he would: all his people fled whither their feare or fortune would lead them. In this garboile the Baylife of Caen was lightly hurr, and the Cardinall of Amboyle had no litle feare: But the matter of quarrell being taken away by this accident, the tumults also were immediatly appealed within the towne of Rome: in so much as they began all in peace to prepare for the election of a new Pope, for that Pini, not beguiling the hopes which the Cardinals conceived of him at the time of his creation, the xxvj, daie after his election; paffed into a better life. no Soundistander on the

Petri advincta mightie in friends, reputation, and Cardinall S. riches, had drawen to him the voices of so manie Cardinals, that entring the Conclaue, he was Petri ad rinwith an example all new, and without shutting the Conclaue elected Percent Server is both. G. that made Percent with an example all new, and without shutting the Conclauc, elected Pope the same night (those that were of the contraticopinion not daring to oppose against him). He, either having regard to his first name of lulto, or (as coniectures were made) to signific the greatnes of his conceptions, or lastly, because he would not give place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, tooke vpon him the name of Iulio, the second of that name. Amongst all the Popes that had passed, it was wondred that by so great consent, they had created for Pope, a Cardinall, who was knowen to be of a disposition rigorous and terrible, and in whom was no expectation of rest and tranquilitie, having confumed his youth in continual travels, offended many by necessitie, & exercifed hatreds against manie great personages, a man to whose wit nothing was more samiliar, then the inuention of trouble, faction, and conspiracie. But on the other side, the causes of his election to that degree, appeared clearly, and furmounted all other difficulties: for, he had bene of long time a Cardinall of great power and might, and with his magnificence, wherein he had Ilwaies exceeded the residue, and with the greatnes of his spirit, by the which he did great things, ne had not only made him felfe mightie in opinion and friends, but by times and degrees had rested high his authoritie in the Court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the prinipall detender of the ecclefiastike libertie. But that which served most in his advancement, vas the promises immoderate and infinite which he made to the Cardinais, Psinces and Barons, nd to all others whom he might make profitable to him in that action. Besides, he had the neane to distribute money, benefices and spirituall dignities, aswell such as were his owne, as hose that were the rights of others, for that such was the bruite and renowme of his liberalitie, nat manie made willing offers to him to dispose as he best liked of their treasures, their names, heir offices, and benefices. They confidered not that his promifes were farre too great then that eing Pope, he was either able or ought to obserue, for that he had of so long continuance enyed the name of just and vpright, that Pope Alexander him selfe his greatest enemie, speaking To fhim in all other things, could not but confesse him to be true of his word: a praise which e made no care to defile and staine, to the end to become Pope, knowing that no man more ea- >> lie beguileth another, than he that hath the cultome and name neuer to deceive any . The >> Cardinall of Amboyse consented to this election, for that dispairing to obtaine the Popedome or himselfe, he hoped, that in the new Pope would be recontinued in time to come those derees and properties of amitie which he had alwayes borne to the king his mailter: vling this rifedome, to feeme to beare that with liking & contentment, which he could not hinder by any euise or power. The Cardinal Askanius gaue also his franke consent, being reconciled to him efore, and treading under feete the memorie of all ancient contentions that had been between nem, at fuch time as afore the Popedonic of Alexander, they followed the court of Rome in the erions of Cardinals: for, having better experience of his disposition then the Cardinal of Amoyle, thought, that being afcended to the Popedome, he should have the same vinquietnes, or ither greater, than he had had in a meaner fortune, together with fuch conceptions as might be ble to open to hima way to recouer the duchie of Alillan. In like fort the Spanish Cardinals celded their consent, not with standing in the beginning they shewed no inclination. But seeing nere was such a concurrence of others, & fearing not to be sufficient enough to let his election, sey judged it more conuenict for their furctie, to hold him appealed in confenting, then to litre im to anger in refuling, form what affying themselues in the great promises he made to them, & or the rest, induced by the perswasions & requests of Valentmois, whose condition stood so enironed with calamitics, that he was constrained to follow euery daungerous counsel. He was alno leffe abused then the others with the hopes that he gaue him; for that he promised him to take a mariage betweene his daughter & his nephew Frauncis Maria de la Rouere Presect of Come, to contrme him captain of the atmies of the Church: and which was of greatest importace, o joyn to his aid in the recouery of the towns of Romania. All which, except the Castles, were alnost withdrawn from his obedience. The affaires of which province, full of innovations & chanes, troubled with divers thoughts the spirite of the Pope, both for that he knew he was not able at that time to bring it to his deuotion, and also he endured with murmure & grudge, that in it should be raised the greatnes of the Venetians, enuie bearing this nature, not to make mer for much to complaine of their proper wants, as to greeue in the wealth & well doing of others.

When it was understood in Romania, that Valentinois was fled into the Cassle S. Ange, & the regiments of men that were about him dispersed and passed into their seueral calamities, the Citics which had expected him before in great constancie, having now their hopes turned into feares, applied to the time, and began to take new parties: fuch for the most part is the wavering condition of communalties and multitudes, not measuring things by inslice and equitie of reafon, but either by opinion, which commonly is partiall, or by common report, which for the most part is full of incertainties and errors. Cefena returned to the auncient deuotion of the Church Tmola(the Captaine of the Castle being killed by meane of certaine the principal Citizens) stood in doubt, one part defiring to reuert to the Church, and another part to be reconciled to the Reareis their first Lords: The Citie of Furly possessed by the Ordelassy long time before it came to the Riares by the permission of Pope Sixtus, had repealed Anthonie a remainder of the same famulie: who first prouing to enter with the fauour of the Venetians, but afterwards scaring tha under his name, they would retaine the jurisdiction to them selues, had recourse to the Floren times, and by their meanes was reinuested in his patrimonie: lohn Sforce returned to Pefero: and to Rimini Pandolfe Malateste, the one and other being called by the people. But Denys c Nalda, an auncient fouldier to Valentinois, at the request of the Castle keper of Rimni, went to their succours: by whose help in good time, Pandolfe being put to the chase, the Citie retur ned eftsoones to the obedience of Valentinois. Faenza only perseuered longest in his deuotic but in the end, falling into a deprivation of hope for his returne, casting their eyes vpon certain remainders of the famulie of Manfreda their auncient Lords, they called home Apor, a youn gentleman of the same house, but a bastard, none remaining of the race legitimate. But the Ve netians aspiring to the inrisdiction of all Romania, immediately after the death of Pope Alex ander, had fent to Rauenna manie bands of fouldiers, with whom, as they made a charge or night vpon the sodaine, and with great surie, vpon the Citie of Cesena, so the people of th place flanding valiantly to their defence, by their vertue vanquished the conspiracies of the enemies, the Venetians which went thither without artillerie, hoping more to surprise it then t force it, retyring to the countrey of Rauenna: where they confidered diligently all things th might geue them any occasion to make them selves great in that Province, which immediat was presented to them by the discords that were betweene Denys of Nalde and the Fauentyn for, it being somewhat intollerable to Denys, that the Fauentyns should est some returne vnd the gouernment of the house of Manfreda, against whom he was drawne into rebellion at fue time as Valentinois affailed that Citie, he called in the Venetians, and put into their hands th Castles of the vale of Lamona which he had in keeping. And the better to further their pract fes, the Venetians a litle after put a band of three hundred footmen within the Castle of I wenz being brought in by the Castle-keeper, whom they had seduced by their corruptions. They or cupied in like fort, and in the fame time, the borough of For limpople, with manie other borough of Romania, and sent one part of their men of warre to take the citie of Fana, but the poor held out constantly for the Church, holding it more honorable to abide perall, then corrupt the alleageance. They were also brought into Rimin by the consent of the people, couenanting: forehand with Pandolfe Walateste to give him in recompence the towne of (itadella inth territories of Padua, and a yearely pension, with a perpetual estate of a company of men: armes. They returned afterwards in great diligence to beliege Faenza, for that the towner men nothing amazed with the loffe of the Castle for the incommoditie of his seate and separate ration from the Citie by a deepe trench, made valiant resistance, both for the affection the bare to the famulie of Manfredi, and also for a grudge they had that the inhabitants of the vale of Lamona, had promifed to straungers the imperie of Faenza: they esteemed lit their proper aductities, fo that they might observe the full office of fidelitie to the famulie Manfreds their true & auncient Lord . But of themselves being vnable to make defence suffic ent, for that Christopher Moare commander of the Venetians had approched his artillerie rothi town, & occupied al the places of importance in the courty, they praied fuccors of the new Pol Inlies to whom such a maner of audacitie was not a little disagreable. But being newly ascend kings of Fraunce or Spayne, for that both they were travelled with thoughts of far greater importance, & also that he denied to be confederat with either of them: he was without meane of comfort in this calamitie, but through the authority of the name Pontificall. And to proue what reuerence the Venetians bare to it, together with what regard they remembred the amities which long time before he had borne to that common weale: he fent to Venice the Bishop of Tinoli, to The Popecomcomplaine that Faenza being a Citie immediatly appertaining to the Church, they would not plainetheo the forbeare to do so great a dishonour to a Pope, who afore he was raised to that Soucraigne crea-Ventiam. tion, as he honoured their common weale with a special affection, so now standing in a greater fortune, they might hope for right ample fruits of his friendship so aunciently borne. It may be there wanted not in the Senat those forts of men which aforetime had diffivaded not to entangle their estate with the matters of Pi/a, and that they should not receive in pawne the ports of the Realme of Naples, nor make partition with the French king of the Duchy of Millan: it may be that in the wifedomes of these men appeared the consideration of euils that might happen, and how, by making themselves dayly more and more suspected and hated, they might in this action adde to other harreds the ill will of the Pope. But ambitious counfels having bin favoured with fo happie successe, and therefore all their sailes being hoysed in a wind so happie of fortune, the opinions of those that perswaded the contrarie were not heard. And therefore (almost with a generall consent) it was aunswered to the Popes Embassador: that the state of Venice had alwayes The Veneticus greatly defired that the Cardinall S. Peiri de vincla should come to be Pope, and as he had now answers to the obtained it, not by corruption, but by his proper vertue and merits, so they hoped that the same new Pope. inclination which in his meaner fortune induced him to embrace and loue them, would still go on working with confirmation of offices and amities, as for their parts, he should not doubt, but they would follow him with better respects being Pope, then they had done whilest he wasfin the estate and person of a Cardinall: But as touching the point of imputation, they knew not wherein they had offended his dignity, embracing the occasio which was offered to them to have Faenza: for that that City was not onely not possessed by the Church, but also the Church made a willing deprivation of all her rights, in transferring so amply & in plaine Consistory the jurisdiction to the Duke Valentinois: That he would remember that afore that graunt, the Popes (within no memorie of man) had ever possessed Faenza, but from time to time had given it to new Vicars, without acknowledging other superioritie then the tribute, which they offered to pay readily when it should be required: That the Fauentins had no defire to be the subjects of the Church, but abhorring fuch nomination, they had reuerenced the name of the Duke Valentinois, with all those offices and observances that were in them: And that now having no more hope in him, they were runne headlong to call in the bastards of the house of Manfreda: Lastly, they befought him, that being in the authority of Pope, he would hold them in the fame effate of friend-Thip, which he thought them worthie of, when he had but the person of a Cardinall, not suffering light occasions to remoue that grave and setled liking which he had so long time had of them, more by his proper inclination, then by any their deseruings. After the Pope was certified of the will of the Venetians, he had fent into Romania the Duke Valentinois, whom he had embraced with many demonstrations of honour assoone as he was Pope, and in token of amitie lodged him in the pallace Pontificall: fauing that he feared, leaft his going, in the beginning agreeable enough to the people, should not be then very hatefull, seeing they were already all drawne into rebellion against him. Touching the condition of the Fauentins, there was no more remaining to them, but to have recourse to the Florenting, who discontented that a City of so neare neighborhood shold fall into the power of the Venetians, had sent to their succors in the beginning 200 footme, entertaining them with hopes still to refurnish, them, to the end to hold them in courage till the Pope were at oportunitie to succour them: But seeing by many apparances that the Pope had no disposition to take armes, & that the authoritie of the French king (warning the Veneteans in the beginning not to molest the estates of the Duke Valentinois) was not sufficient to withdraw them: And laftly, efteeming it no pollicy to enter alone into a warre with fo mightie enemies, they forbare to releeue them with any further supply. By which alteration the Fauentins being cut offfrom all hopes, and the Venetian army (incamping at the Church of the Observants) having begunne to plaie with their artillerie against the walles of their Citie, being vnhappie alfoin this, that their intelligences were discouered, and certaine of them taken who had conspired to put the Venetians into the towner they yeelded up their City into their lands, the Venetians agreeing to give to After a certaine pensio (albeit but litle) for the releefe of his life. After the taking of Faenza, the Venetians might with the same facilitie and fortune have commanded I mola and Furly: but not to aggrauate the indignation of the Pope, who murmured not a litle, they feut their me into garrison, determining for that time to passe no further, having occupied in Romania, besides Faenza and Romini with their countries, Montesiora, Saint Archangeo Verrucque, Gaterre, Sauignano, and Meldole the hauen of the countrey of Cesena, and in the territorie of Y mola, Tosugnana, Solaruola, and Montbataile. Valentinois held only in Romansa the Castels of Furty. of Cefena, of Forlimpople,, and of Bertinoire. All which (albeit he had great defire to go into Romania, to the end they were not vsurped by the Venetians) he had easily consented to put into the Popes keeping, with bond to receive them of him againe at fuch time as they should be affured, had it not bin that the Pope (his auncient integrity being not yet ouercome with defire to beare rule)refused the offer; saying, he wold not willingly accept occasios that might any way allure him to corrupt his faith. At last to oppose in some fort against the proceedings of the Venetians, with whom he was not a litle discontented for the danger of the estate Ecclesiasticke, having also a de-" fire that Valentmoss should depart from Rome, he accorded with Valentmois that he should go to Spetsa by sea, and from thence by land to Ferrara, and so to Tmola, where should be restored to him an hundred men at armes, and fifty light horsemen, which yet followed his Ensignes (interposing in this connention of only the name of the Pope, but also the name of the colledge of Cardinals.) With this resolution Valentinois, being gone to Offia to be embarked, the Pope was suddenly repented that he had not accepted the Castels; & having now a speciall desire to have them (not respecting the meanes) and to keepe them to himselfe, he sent after the Cardinals of Volterre and Surreme to perswade him, that to preuent that those places shold not sal into the hads of the Venetians, he would be content to deliver the vp into the Popes keeping, under the same promise that had bin treated upon at Rome: fo foone do mens minds alter, when ambition hath once polfest the spirits, and made way to greedy defire, which in matters of profit holds nothing respected, Valentinois taking advantage of the Popes incertainty, denied now to do that which earsthe was well contented, and the Pope rifing with the occasion into indignity, caused him to be arested in the Gallies wherein he was embarked, and in decent fort to be led to Magliana, from Duke Valentiwhence (all the Court and communalty of Rome reiovcing for the apprehension of his person) mis arested by he was led to the Vasscan, and honoured, but not without especiall and good gards: the reasor was, that the Pope fearing leaft the Castel keepers dispairing of his safety, wold not sell the Castel to the Venetians, Sought to make him tractable by easie meanes, and so to have them by his confent and will. Thus the power of Duke Valentinois, rifing (as it were fuddenly to his Soueraigntie and height, tooke end with a ruine more fudden: and as the meanes by the which he afpited to his greatnesse had more resemblance with cruelty and deceipts, then that the armes and power of the Church did aduaunce him: so, by a due sentence of justice he experienced in himselfe part of the artes and trumperies wherewith his father and he had vexed many feuerall personages. He was " like to the tree that groweth, till he come to his height, and then is plucked up from the roote in a comment. The heavie stone commonly ouerwhelmeth bimselfe with his owne waight. Who doth es couet the fruite, and not considereth the height of the tree whereon it groweth, let him take " heede, that whileft be laboureth to climbe to the top, he fall not with the bowes which he doth cembrace. It is hard for men ambitious to hold fast their fortune, for she is slippery and cannot be « kept against her will: and therefore to men that study to follow the streame, it is good to put a " bridle to their felicity, fo shall they the better gouerneit. It is an office in wife men to consider alwayes their owne estate, where the vaine ambitious man liueth, for the most part in the reer membrance of those things which make him to forget himselfe. The souldiers and followers of the Duke had almost no better fortune, who being drawne into the countrey of Perousa, with hope to obtaine fale conduct of the Florentins and others (being chased by the regiments of Ustells) they were constrained for their safety to retire voon the lands of the Florentins: where, being dispersed betweene Castilion and Cortona, and reduced to source hundred horsemen, with a very flender strength of footmen, they were stripped by the appointment of the Floreneins, and Dom Michaell their leader taken prisoner: him they delivered afterwards to the Pope, who

who demaunded him with an importunity well expressing the hates he bare to all the old servants of the late Pope Alexander. And albeit this man had bene a faithfull minister and executer of all the wickednesse of Valentinois, yet after the Pope had spent some conscrence with him, he turned his cruelty into compassion, following his naturall inclination, which was to be easie to pardon those vpo whom he had power to execute his anger. About this time the Cardinall d' Amboy/e departed from Rome to returne into Fraunce, having obtained of the Pope, more for feare then for good will, a confirmation of the legation of that Realine: but the Cardinall Askanius followed him not, notwithstanding at his comming out of Fraunce he promised the king by outh that he would returne: of which oath he had procured secret absolution of the Pope afore, not remembring that amongst men there can be no greater bond then an oath, and who loseth his faith hath no more to lofe, feeing we acknowledge religion to confift in faith it felfe. But the example of the Cardial Askanius icorning at the credulity of the Cardinall Amboyse, could not make the French Cardinall better aduised in the actio with Pandolfe Petrucci, who receiving the Cardinall at Sienna with many honours, and making infinuation into his good fauours with deepe futtletics and counfels full of art, promiting to cause Mont Pulcian to be sendred to the Florentins, ouercame him formuch, that at his returne into Fraunce he affured the king that he had not found in Italy a man of better spirit, and wrought that his Maiesty gaue sufferance to his sonne to returne to Stenna, remaining at that time in the Court of Fraunce for the affurance of his fathers promiles. These were the mutations that hapned in Italy by the death of the Pope.

But in these times, the enterprises begun with greater hopes on the other side the Mounts by the French king, were brought into many difficulties: for the army fent upon the frontier of Gal- Exploses of toigne, no lefte for want of money then lacke of good gournment in those that had the charge, the Frencharwas broken with a speede quicker then they could march thither. The Gallies also which had mies beyond she runne all along the Spanish leas, were retired to the port of Marfeilles: and the army leavied for Mounts. Parpignian, of the which the king promifed much being well furnished of all things necessary, was ncamped before Saulfes, which is a strong place neare to Narbona, standing at the foote of the nils Perennei in the countrey of Roffilian. But being well defended, it made a wonderfull refifance: and albeit it was furioufly assaulted by the Frenchmen, using both the seruice of artilleries, ind the art of underminings, yet the vertue of the defendants kept it from spoyle and ruine. There issembled an army of all the Spanish Realmes at Parpignian, which the king did honour with he presence of his person to the end to succour it: and being joyned to this army (by reason the French were discamped) the regiments that had bin sent to defend the frontiers of Fontarabie, & Il thele forces being drawne into one strength, and marching to give battell to the Frencharmy, he Captaines feeing no reason to contend against fortune, retired with the Campe towards Narona, after they had lyen afore Saulses about forty dayes. The Spaniards losing no benefite of he time and occasion, made incursions upon the territories of the Frenchking, where having aken certaine places of meane importance (the French making no refishance, for that they were vithdrawne into Narbona) they effloones returned upon their owne frontiers by the commanlement of their king, who, having obtained the true end of him that is affayled, entertained out with ill will the warre on the other fide the Mounts, feeing albeit his Realmes and Prouines were fufficient might ie to defend him from the French king, yet he held them farre too weake o offend him: A confideration of great importance to him that entreth into a warre, to forefee vith a better counfell how he may defend himfelfe then offend his enemie. A litle after (by the "betpofing of king Federyke) they made a truce for fine moneths, comprehending onely those "armee behings that concerned the affaires on the other fide the Mounts: for that the Spanish king affu-tweene the ing Federske that he would confent that the Realme of Naples should be restored to him, and kings of Spaine Federike expecting no leffe of the French king, the rather at the contemplation of the Queene inlined to compassion, had introduced betweene them the practises of peace. In which negotiaionthe Spanish Embassadours (the warte continuing stillin Italy) went into Fraunce, where hey gouerned their doings with fuch art, that Federike vainely perswaded himselfe that the difficulty of his reflicution, which the Barons of the faction of Anion impugned vehemently, vould be principally on the French Kings side. Thus all the warres betweene both the kings being reduced onely into the kingdome of Naples, the eyes and thoughts of all men were turned thither: for that the Frenchmen having passed from Rome by the lands of Valmontano and the Colonnois (where they found an easie conlent to refresh them with victuals) marched by the fields of the Church towards S. German, a place where Consaluo (leauing Garrison in the Castell of Secqua and Monteassin) was encamped, not with intention to hazard fortune, but to be an impediment that they passed no further, which by the strength and oportunity of the place, he hoped to do easily. The Frenchmen being ariued at Pontcorne, and at Ceperana, the Marquis of Saluffe, with fuch as were within Casetta, 10yned to them, having afore by the occasion of discamping of Confaluo, recovered the Duchie of Tracetta, & the Countrey of Fourt, eucn to the floud of Garston. The first thing that the French army did, was to affay to get the Cattel of Seequa, from the which after they had in vaine giue one assault) they brake off & leavied their siege. But for that actio they brought vpo theselues so much cotempt & imputatio, that it was publikely affirmed in the Spanish army, that that day the Realme of Naples was affured against the Frenchme, who ioyning feare to their fortune, & distrusting for that respect to chase their enemy towards S. Germain, determined to returne by the coast fide, holding that way suspected in their retiring wherein they found confidence and fauour in marching on. After they had reposed two dayes within Agum, which they had taken, and left seuen hundred footemen within the Castell Guillanme, they returned by Pontcorne, and marched by the way of Fondy, to lodge at a towne fet ypon the way of the River of Garillon, where (antiquitie holds) hat the auncient City of Minturno was builded: a place not only convenient to cast a bridge, and passe the Riner, as was their intention, but also a great importunitie to encampe there if they should have bene constrained : for they had Caretta and their Nauy at sea at their backes, and Tracetta, Itrie, Fondy, with all the circuite of the country to the River of Garillon flood firme in their deuotion. It was thought that the French army paffing the Riuer, was a thing of great consequence for the victory: for that Consaluo being so farre inferiour in forces that he durst not appeare in playne field, the French might march without impediment euen to the walles of A aples, whither also their Nauieat sea might have approched, having nothing to le them, if their vertue had but answered the oportunity. And for that cause Consaluo isluing ou of Saint Germain, was come on the other part of Garillon, to let with all his ftrength the paffin. of the French, affying much in the disaduantage and difficulties which armies find to passe River that have no fords, specially when theenemy is opposed against them. But it often hapnet that thigs in execution fall out otherwise then they appeared in the first imagination, and as ofte it chaunceth (practife being farre aboue the opinion of things) that that which at first was estee med hard, brought foorth an action most easie, as of the contrary, most hardnesse was ofte found in those things wherein coniecture and supposition made most facility. For, the French not withflanding the furious relistance and impediments of the Spanish, after they had cast the bridge won the way of the River by force of artillery, planted partly vpon the banke where they encam ped, which was somwhat higher then the banke on the one side, and partly upon bankes which they had caused to be brought from the Nauicatsea, and drawne vp against the streame of th River. But the day after as they began to make an enterprise to passe, the Spaniards opposed a gainst them, and charging with an incredible resolution vpon such as were already passed, the repulfed them euen to the middelt of the bridge, and had followed them further, if the furie of th artillerie had not compelled them to retire. In this encounter died on the French fide the Lieu tenant of the Baylife of Dion, and of the Spaniards was flayne Fabro sonne to Pawle Ursin, young man amongst the Italians of great expectation. It is fayd, that if when the French me began to passe, they had advanced forward with the same courage they entred into the enterprise they had that day remained mailters of the field & the victory: but whilest they proceeded flow ly, and with demonstration of timerousnesse, they did not onely lose the occasion of the victor of the day, but they diminished greatly all hope in time to come, the fortune of the warre decl ning with the oportunity which they had loft. From that day all things tooke with them very fuccesse, for that amongst the rules of the army was rather confusion then concord, and (ac cording to the custome of the French souldiers with the Italian Captaines) very litle obedience t the Marquis of Mantua the kings Lieutenant. In so much as, either for that occasion, or in respec of his disease (being sicke in deede) or for that by other experiences in that service, he had lost a hope of the victory, he went from the army, leaving an opinion to the French king, that his loyalt was greater the his courage, & that his vertue was of other faculty the to gouerne an army. After he Marquis had thus given up his charge, the Marquis of Saluffe, the Baylife of Caen & Monsieur Sandricourt chiefe commaunders in the French army; having first raised at the head of the bridge beyond the Rinera Rampier with cariages, erected a bastion capable of many men, by whose protection they were defended from their enemics in passing the bridge. But they were let to passe further by other difficulties, hapning partly through their proper negligence, but more by he vertue and patience of their enemies, but most of all by the malice of their fortune, with whom nothing is more familiar then to deceive the confidence and expectation of men: for, Consaluo, who studied to hinder them more with the occasion of the winter, and situation of the countrey, then with his army and forces, was encamped at Cintura, a place feated on high, and removed from the River somewhat more then a mile, about the which the bands of soctemen and horfemen were lodged with a great incommodity, for that the place of his owne condition being folitary, and not much releeued with cottages or cabinets of heardfine, they had almost no other couert then the skie, the ground also as well for the lownes of the plaine, as for that the feafonand weather was rainie, beingfull of water and mire: a necessity which drive those fouldiers that had no meane to encampe in places more firme and high, to planke and couer the place of the ground where they lave with matter and other things materiall to defend the moilinesse of the earth. In regard of these difficulties, & for that the army was ill paied, the French withal having wholly won the passage of the river, certaine Captains were of opinion to retire the army to Capua, both to the end to releeue the invollerable sufferance of the fouldiers, and to take themselues out of that continual expectation of daunger, their numbers being farre inferiour to their enemies: It often hapneth that when extremities and perill be at hand, confidence " is turned into feare, and when the counsels of men are not constant, they cannot but wauer?" in refolution, their vertue having taken another habite by the confideration of the daunger they " fee afore them . But that pufillanimitie of the Captaines was resolutely rejected of Consaluo" with this aunswere worthie the greatnesse of his heart: In many cases (sayth he) vaine " feares are farre more hurtfull then haltie confidence or credulity, a common disposition in " the nature of man, making him to esteeme more then needeth those daungers that be nearest at " hand, and hold leffe reckening then he ought of perils further off and to come: but concerning " the present case, as glory springs not of dignity nor of honour (for that they are the goods of for- " tune)but of vertue, which is the riches of the mind & gift of the goodnesse of God: fo for my part " Idefire rather to be presently buried ten soote deepe in the ground whereon we stand, then by " giuing back one foot to prolong my life an hundred yeares: fortune oftentimes makes many men " more apt to win glory, then able to keepeit, but occasion & oportunity seeme to offer vs that e- " state of perpetuall honor and reputation, which our owne vertue denieth vs to be worthy of. And fo refilting all difficulties with an incredible constancie, and fortifying himselfe with a deepe trench, and with bastions which he caused to make in the front of the Campe, he prepared to defend him against the French, standing against him; who, notwithstanding the protection of their bastilion which they had builded, remoued nothing at all, for that the countrey being all ouerflowne with the raines and waters of the River) this place is called by Lyuie for the neighbourhood of Sella, aque smuessina, and perhaps they are the lakes of Minturna (wherein C. Marius hid himfelfe flying before Sylla) they could not passe further, but through a straite which was all waterish and full of a deepe quagmyre. And perhaps there was daunger to be charged in the flanke of the footebands of the Spanish lightly armed, which lay encamped very neare the strait: the winter also by aduenture inclining to cold and sharpnesse, brought soorth more continuall multitudes of snowes and raynes, then had vied to fall in those regions. Wherein it seemed that fortune and the elements about had conspired against the French, who staying there, did not only waste the time unprofitably, but also they received by that abode (by reason of their naturall disposition) almost the like harmes which mens bodies receive by a poyson that worketh flowly: for, albeit they were lodged with leffe discommodities then the Spanish, and that by the meane of the reliques of an auncient Theater, whereunto they had joyned many other shrowds & couers, befides the fauour of certaine old houses neare to them: & forthat the circumference or skirts of the tower formwhat higher then the plaine of Seffa, were leffe offended with waters: and lastly, that most part of their horsemen were lodged within Tracetta, and other places affronting: yet the bodies of the Frenchmen and Swiffers, not bearing to naturall refultance against long trauels and perplexities, as do the bodies of the Spaniards, they gaue manifest tokens of the diminution of their late valour and fury. Befides, the couetoufnesse of the officers and treasurers, to whose office belong the paying of the souldiers, encreased much those difficulties: for that they preferring their particular profit afore the common prouision of the whole, and forgetting no degrees of delay or illusion, they fustered to diminish the numbers of the souldiers, and were negligent to furnish the Campe with victuals as appertained: by reason whereof diseases sell upon the army, and many of the Italian companies went away discontented. These disorders were made greater by the discord of the Captaines, through whose fault there was neither order nor obedience, and in an army there can be no expectation of the exercise of discipline, where is no certaintie of pay made. Thus the Frenchmen being restrained by the sharpenesse of the winter, remained idle vpon the shoares of Garillan, no other thing being done either by the enemy or by them, but certain light skirmishings which were of no importace, & yet the Spanish seemed alwaies to cary the better fortune. About the same time also the footbands which the French left in garrison with in the Castell Guillaume, not able to endure the continual braueries of the garrisons of the Castel of Sacqua, and other peeces thereabouts commaunded by the Spanish, abandoned the places of their charge, and pretending to come to the army, were charged by the way and broken, whereir feeking to auoyde the danger they feared most, they light upon the perill they distrusted least, being only abused in the opinion and intention of their safety. But things having had continuance in commeth to the this estate many dayes, Bart. Aluiano, with certaine of the Vrsine and their regiments, arrived in fuccors of Con- the Spanish army, by whose comming Confaluo thought himselfe so strongly refurnished, having in his army nine hundred men at armes, a thoufand light horfemen, and nine thoufand Spanish footmen, that he began to thinke that now he was no more to fludy to defend himfelfe, but to offend his enemy, whereunto he was fo much the more encouraged, by how much he was well aduertised that the French (stronger in horsemen then in sootmen) were dispersed in such separation and distance, that their lodgings held little lesse then ten miles of the countrey, in so much as neare the Towre of Garillan, there were onely the Marquis of Saluffe Viceroy, and other principall Captaines, with the leffer part of the army, which diminished continually by the aggrauation of difeases, of the which many died, and amongst others the Baylife of (nen . For this cause, having determined to affay to paffe fecretly the River (in the good fucceeding of which he doubted nothing of the victory) he recommended to Aluiano (the author as some thinke of that counsell) the charge to make secretly a bridge. By his direction there was made a bridge of barkes and veffels within a Creeke neare to Seffa, which he caused to be brought by night to Garillan, and to be cast at the passage of Suya, soure miles aboue the bridge of the Frenchmen, where they made no guard. Assoone as this bridge was cast (being the xxvij. day of December in the night) all the army passed together with the person of Consaluo, who lodged the same night in the towne of Suya neare the River, which was occupied by those that passed the first. The morning following which was on a Fryday (a day happy for the Spaniards) Consaluo hauing ordered that the rearegard lodged betweene the Castell of Montdragon and Carinola, foure miles below the bridge of the French, should go and charge their bridge, he prepated himselfe with the vauntguard led by Almano, and with the battell which passed with himselfe, to follow the Frechmen: who receiuing aduertifment the fame night that the Spaniards had cast a bridge & began to passe, entred into a generall feare, which so much the more drew them into assonishment, by how much this accident and boldnesse of the enemy had exceeded their expectation, and having themfelues determined to attempt nothing till the time were more gracious and fauourable, they nourished also a coniccture that the enemy stood retained with the same negligence and southfulneffe, construing things by opinion only, without respecting the oportunity, which being ouerflipt of them, proued fauorable to the enemy. Therefore albeit the Viceroy (to who were reforted many bands both from Tracetto and the places about) pushed forward more with seare then with settled counsels (as often hapneth in sudden aduentures) had sent towards Suya to stop their pafsage, Monsieur d'Alegre, with certaine regiments of footmen and horsemen: yet finding that their deuise was too long protracted, & that feare overruled all discourses & considerations, they leujed their Campe fuddenly, & about midnight with a haft contrary to the valour of men refolute, they brake vp from the Towre of Garillan, leaving abandoned the most part of their munitions and nine great peeces of artillery, together with great numbers of their fouldiers with bodies wounded and full of fickneffe. Such a thing is feare, that it makes men forgetfull about shame & 12 all other observances, and when the calamitie is generall, it leaves everie one to his fortune, impression for the most part amazing more then the perill it selfe: They tooke the way towards >> Casetta, whither they thought to retire: but Consalao, who would omit no oportunity wherein occasion was offered, assoone as he knew they were discamped, followed them with his armie, fending afore Profeer Colonno with his light horfmen to undertake the skirmish, to the end their march might be more flowe. And not with Handing the fight was entertained by the horfmen, yet the French forbare not still to keepe on their way, being not with standing compelled to stay often times for feare to fall into diforder at the bridges and hard passages, from whence, after they had supported the skirmish a certaine space, they retired still, receiving alwayes some hurt. The order they ysed was this, the artilleric marched afore, the footbands followed after, and then the horsemen, of whom, such as were most behind continued the fight with the enemie. The Frenchmen being in this fort aduaunced, after certaine paufes and light skirmifhes, as far as the bridge which is before Caucia, necessitie copelled the Viceroy to cause to stay there one part of his men at armes, to give leafure to the artilleries to passe before: but they being not able to march with that speed which was necessary to their safety, the copanies of the enemies beginning already to meddle with them, there was begun in that place a great and hot skirmish, for that the reregard of the Spaniards came immediately after, who having passed the river without resistance, even with those barkes of the bridge which had bene broken by the Frenchmen, went towards Caietta by the right way, Confaluo marching alwayes on the wing with the refidue of the armie. The fight was violent at the bridge of Mola for a certaine time, the French maintaining themselues principally by the aduantage of the place, but with feares farre greater then their valours: and the Spanish joyning furie to their fortune, fought with the same felicitie which follow those men that suppose themselues to be already in the possession of the victorie. At last the Frenchmen to whose disability began to succeed a feare, least part of the regiments which Consaluo had sent by the coast for that effect, would cut off their way, began to retire in diforder, & being continually followed by their enemics, when they came to the head of two wayes, the one leading to Ytry, and the other to Casetta, they fell into generall and manifest flying, manie remaining staine, as Barnardo Adorno Lieutenant of fiftie Launces: many were taken ptisoners, and the artilleries abandoned, with all the horses appointed for the seruice of the same: and touching the residue which sled towards Cautta, they were victoriously chased even to the gates of the Citie. At the same time Fabricio Colonno, scut by Confaluo (after he had passed the river with fine hundred horse and a thouand footmen, neare to Pontcorno) and being favored of most part of the villages and countreymen, stripped the regiments of Lodowyk de la Mirandola, and Alexander de Triunleo : besides, there were manie of the armie, who being lodged at Fondy, Tery, and other places thereabouts, and hearing that the Spanish had east the bridge, went not to the armie at the towre of Garellan, out for their fafetie dispersed into diverse places, were taken and stripped by the countrie. But Peer de Medicis who alio followed the French campe, with certaine other Gentlemen, had a grea- Peterde Meter misfortune: for when the armie brake vp from before Garillan, being mounted vpon a barke dieis, drowned, with foure peeces of artillerie, to go to Caletta, their barke funke, as well forthat they had ouercharged her, as that the winds were contrarie to the mouth of the river: they were al drowned:a destinie lamētable, considering the qualitie of the persons, with the maner of their dying. Wherin " though many vainly dispute that fortune led them to so miserable an accident, yet if we will lift, vp our confiderations to God, we shall find that hee hath reserved such a prerogative over all ,, things which he hath created, that to him onely belongs the authoritie to dilpose all things by the ,, ame power wherewith he hath created them of nothing. The night following, Consaluo with the ,, armie lodged at Castellona and Mola, and appearing the next day before Catetta, whither were retired the French Captaines, together with the Princes of Salerno and Bifignan, he occupied immediately the suburbs and the mount, which the French had abandoned. And albeit Catetta was sufficiently manned with multitudes of fouldiers, and no leffe prouision of victuals, besides the conveniencie of the place to be fuccoured by the armie at fea: yet yeelding to the confideration of their perils, which were more in impression then in deed, they lost courage, and inclined with manifest consent to parley, being not disposed to endure the perplexitie of expectation of succours that were incertaine. They sent out the Baylife of Dyon and S. Colombo with Theodore vp to (onfaluo, Caietta with the ealtle, under condition of free power to go out of the realme of · Naples with their goods, either by land or sea, and that M. d Aubigny and the other prisoners fhould be redeliuered both of the one and other party. But this capitulation was not so clearly fet downe, that Confaluo tooke not occasion to dispute, that by the vertue of the couenants, the Barons of the kingdome could chalenge no libertie or deliuerie from imprisonment. This was the chase that was given to the French armie neare to the river of Garellan, being encamped vpon the shores or banks thereof about fiftie dayes: an ouerthrow hapning to the no lesse through their owne disorders, then by the vertue of their enemies, & so much the more worthy of commemoration and memorie, by how much followed (as it were by fuccession of calamitie) the absolute losse of so noble and mighty a kingdome, together with the confirmation of the empire of the Spanish: it nourisheth also matter more worthy of monument, for that the French entring with a far greater strength then the enemie, and no lesse plenty of all prouisions both by land and fea necessarie to the warre, they were vanquished with a facilitie farre contrarie to the course of victories, and without bloud or danger of the conquerers. But the thing that was no lesse lamentable in this accident then all the refidue, was, that albeit there died very few of the French by the fword of the enemie, yet the number was fmall that was referued of fo great an armie: for that of the regiments of footmen which escaped by flying, and of those also that came from Casetta after the accord, there died many troupes by the wayes, as well the sharp violence of the cold, as the rigour of ficknesse, serving to the execution of those miserable bodies, whom fortune spared from the slaughters of the warres: and of such whose strength with great paine was able to carie them to Rome, part came started with the hardnesse of the weather, and some through feeblenesse languished, lingring yet to abide with greater paines their latter times: of this fort many died in hospitals both of hunger and colde, the streets and high wayes being lamentable tellimonies of their calamities, and the ditches and other places vile and vnworthy, feruing as fepulchers to those bodies, whose mindes not long since supposed them inuincible against all aduersitie of warre. And whether in comparison of causes and reasons, we may referre the motions of these calamities either to desline enuying the French, and no lesse contrarie to the nobilitie then to bodies of inferiour condition: or to the diseases which fell vpon them, by the discommodities they fuffred about Garillan, many even of those who departing from Casetta (where they left the most part of their horses) imbarked themselves to passe by sea, and either perished by the wayes, or at least being reserved till they came into Fraunce, died in the sight of their friends, of whom they thought to receive confolation. Amongst these were the Marquisse of Saluffe, Sandricourt, and the Baylife of the Mountaines, with many other Gentlemen of marke, in whom the maner of their death was no lesse lamentable then their fortune: ouer and besides, that which by imputation may be imposed vpon the French Captaines for their disagreement & negligent gouernment, as also that that may be objected to the injurie of the time, that neither the French nor Swiffers are not coparative with the Spaniards, either with refolution of mind to temporife or expect, or with their bodies to fultaine the travels and incommodities that a warre draweth with it. There are principally confidered two things which hindered the French king, Two causes of that he remained not victorious: the one was, the long abode that the armie made upon the terthe overthrowe ritories of Rome for the Popes death, the same being the cause that winter came you them, and men out of the that the Vrsins were practifed withall by Consalno afore they could enter into the kingdome: realme of Na. where, if they could have made their entrie whilest the time was tollerable, Consaluo far inferiour to them in forces, and not fauoured with the oportunitie & rigour of the time, had bene constrained to abandon the greatest part of the kingdome, and to seeke out the strong places for his succour, or elfe suffer the authoritie of an enemie farre more mightie then himselfe. The other confideration was, the couetoufnesse of the officers and treasurers, who, beguiling the king in the payes of the fouldiers, and leffe trullie in the proustion of victuals and furniments for the seruice, made their thefts and negligences the principall cause of the diminution of that armie, since the king had expressed such a provision and care for all things necessarie, that it is certaine by good credible tellimonie, that at the vnhappie time when the Frenchmen were ouerthrowne, there were within Rome by the kings direction, great quantities of filuer and other reliefes for warre. But so violent was the destinie that ran to the desolation and ruine of that armie, that albeit at the

last, after many complaints of the Captaines and the whole multitude of fouldiers, there was leauied an abundant prouision of victuals, yet they suffered such a penurie and scarsitie in the beginning, that that disorder loyned to the other discommodities, was the breeder of infinite diseafes, of the absenting of many, of the murmuring of many, and that many seeing their fidelity could find no refugein the armie, fought their fafety in places thereabout; matters which in the end brought forth the absolute ruine of so braue an armie: for, as for the nourishing of the bodie, it is ,, not enough that the head be well disposed, but it is also necessarie that the other mêbers do their ,, office: euen so it sufficeth not that the Prince do his dutie, if withall, the diligence & vertue which, ought to be in his ministers have not equal action, the one being necessarie to the other, as the ,, direction of the head and braine of a man auayleth litle without the execution of the other inferiour members, to whom fuch ministration is appointed.

The felfe fame yeare, wherein so great mutations hapned in Italy, was made a peace between the Turke Basazet Ottoman, and the Venetians, which both parties imbraced with great affecti- Teacebetween on: for the Turke, in whom was expressed a spirit of meeknesse and disposed to learning and study the Turke and the Venetiums. of the Scriptures of his religion, had, by the working of his owne inclination, a nature farte effranged from armes: by reason whereof, notwithstanding he had begun the warre with great preparations both by sea and land, and occupied in Morea the two former yeares Naupanio now called Lepanto, Modono, Corono and lunquo, yet he followed not, nor continued the warres with fo great affection, being withdrawne either by the defire he had to tranquility and rest, or at least by a fuspition of his proper danger, least for religion fake the Princes of Christendome should drawe into conspiracie against him: for, both Pope Alexander had sent certaine Galliots to the succours of the Venerans, and with money had also stirred vp Launcelot king of Bohemia and Hungaria to make warre vpon the Turks frontiers, the French and Spanish kings sending (but not at one time) their feuerall atmies to joyne with the power of the Venetians. But this peace was embraced by the state of Venice with a greater defire, for that by the iniquitie of the waires, and that to the common detriment of the Citie, and particular losse to cuerie one in private, the traffique of marchandise which they made in diverse regions of the Lenant was discontinued: the City also of Venice, which energy yeare was wont to have from certaine provinces of the Turks, certaine quantities of corne, did iuffer manie necessities for the deprivation of that reliefe. And lastly, where they had wont to amplifie their iurifdiction by the warres which they have managed with other Princes, they feared nothing so much as the power of the Turkes, of whom they had bene alwayes beaten as often as they had had warres together: for, Amurathes, grandfather to Baiazet, had occupied the towne of Theffalonica (now called Salonica) parcell of the dominions of Vence: & after him Mahomet his father, maintaining continuall war against them for fixteene yeares tooke from the the Ile of Negropoto, a great part of Peloponneso, now named Morea Scutaro, with manie other townes in Macedonia and Albania: In so much as both for that they supported the warre against the Turkes with right great difficulties and expences, having no hope to breed any profite by them; and also, by how much they doubted at the same time to be distressed by inuafion of other Christian Princes, (the time being full of conspiracies) by so much was it reasonable that they defired to be at tranquility with the Turkish regions. It was suffered to Batazet by the coditions of the peace, to retaine still all that he had occupied, and the Venetians referring onely the Ile of Cefalonia, anciently called Leucado, were compelled to yeeld to him the propriety of Nerita, now named S. Mawra. But the warre of the Turkes brought not so many displeasures to the Venetsans, as they received harmes by the king of Portugall, who had taken from them, & appropriated to himselfe the traffike of spices, which the Marchants and ships bringing out of Alexandria(a noble Citie in Egypt) to Venice, they fent dispersed with a wonderful profit through all the prouinces in Christendome. The which alteration being a thing of the most merit and memory of ail others that have hapned in the world fince many ages; and, for the harmes which the Citie of Venice received by it, having some affinitie with the matters of Italy, it cannot much alter the estate of our historie to speake somewhat of it at large.

Such men of spirit and science as by deep speculation and contemplation have considered the Discourse Phon wonderfull motions and dispositions of the heaven, and have left the knowledge thereof recommended to succession and posteritie, have figured a line running through the round circle of the portuheaven, from the West to the East, and bearing an equall distance in all parts from the Pole Sep-galo

tentrionall and Pole Meridionall, they call it the line Equino Etial!: for that when the funne is vuder it, the day and night have one equalitie. They have devided with imagination the longnesse of this line into three hundred and three fcore parts, which they call degrees, as the other circuit of the heaven, by the Polesis likewise of three hundred and threescore degrees. After these men had given this rule, the Cosmographers measuring and deviding the earth, have figured in the carth a line EquinoEtiall, which falles perpedicularly under the Celestial line figured by the Astrologians, deuiding likewife the fame and the circuit of the earth with a line falling perpendicularly vnder the Poles in largeneffe of three hundred and three score degrees: so as from our Pole to the Pole Meridionall, they put a distance of an hundred and fourescore degrees, and from cucrie one of the Poles to the line Equino Etiall, four escore and ten degrees. These have bene the generallopinions of the Cosmographers: but touching the particular description of the earth habitable, after they had made knowne that part of the earth which is under our Hemisphere, they had a perswasion that that part of the earth lying under the Zona torrida, figured in the heaven of the Astrologians, and wherein is contained the line Equinoctiall, was, (as being nearest the funne) vnhabitable by reason of his heat: and that from our Hemisphere there was no passage to the lands which are under the Zonatorrida, nor to those regions, which beyond it are towards the Pole Meridionall, called by the confession of Proleme, lands and seas vinknowne. By reason whereof both he and the others presupposed, that who sever would passe from our Hemisphere to the Sino Arabico and Sino Persico, or to the other parts of India, which first came to the knowledge of men by the victories of the great Alexander, should be constrained to go thither by land, or else coming as neare to it as he could by the sea Mediterrane, should performe the refidue of the way by land. But the nauigarions of the Portugals have made known in our time, that those opinions & suppositions were false, for that the marchants pushed on with a defire to gaine, having begun many yeares fince to coalt Africa, and being guided by litle and litle euen to the Iles of Cape Verde (which the Ancients named the Iles of Esperides) which are distant fourcteene degrees from the Equinox, drawing towards the Pole Artike: and being come fithece, in making a long circuit towards the South, to the cape de bonne Esperance, which is a promontorie of Afryke, further distant then any other from the line Equino Etall, for that his distance containeth xxxviii. degrees. And drawing from thence towards the East, they have sailed by the Ocean, even to the Sino Arabico and Sino Persico: in which places the Marchants of Alexandria are wont to buy the spices which grew there in part, but for the most part were brought thither from the Iles Molucque and other parts of India, and are afterward conveyed by land by a way long, and full of incommodities, and with no leffe charges into Alexandria. where they were fold to the Marchants Venetians, and they bringing them from Vence, furnished all Christendome to their great games and wealth: for that they only possessing the traffike of the spices, layd on them what rate or price they would, and caried into Alexandria many sorts of marchandife in the ships wherein they brought imbarked the spices, the same vessels likewise wherein they conveyed that trade of spicerie into Fraunce, Flaunders, England, and other places, returning fraughted with other marchandise. But the Portugals going by sea from Lisbone the capitall Citie of the realme, into regions far removed, and having confederation in the the Indian sea with the kings of Calicut and other regions neare, they pierced by degrees further, and builded with time fortresses in places convenient, by whose oportunitie making themselves friendship with certaine cities of the Countries, and reducing others to obedience by their armes and oppression, they have appropriate to themselves the traffike of the spices, which the marchants of Alexandria were wont to have afore: & bringing them by fea into Portugall, they distributed them also by sea into the selfe same realmes and countries, where the Venetians at the first had custome and vent for them. Sure this nauigation is right wonderfull, for that it containes a course of eight thousand French leagues, through seas altogether vnknowne, vnder other stars, under other firmament, & with other instrumets: for, the line Equinoctial being paffed, they are no more guided by the North Itar, & Itand altogether deprived of the feruice & vie of the Adamant stone, & for that they cannot take harbour in so long a way, but in regions vnknowne, differing in language, in religion, in cultomes, and altogether barbarous and enemies to strangers. And yet notwithstanding so many difficulties, they have in time made this navigatio fo familiar, that where afore they had wont to cofume ten moneths in the voiage, they run it now commonly in leffe then fixe, their daungers being leffe, and all things in more fecurity. But farre more maruelous, in the nauigation of the Spaniards, which was begun by Christopher Co- Manigation of lombo a Genoway, in the yeare 1490: after he had many times fayled by the Ocean fea, wherein Spaniards. making conjectures by the observation of certaine windes of that which afterwards succeeded to him in deed, he obtained certaine vessels of the king and Queene of Spaine, with the which setting his course towards the West, he discourred at thirtie dayes end in the vitermost extremities of our Hemisphere, certaine Ilands altogether vnknowne to men before : regions happie for the fituation of the heaven, and for the fertilitie of the land, and withall no leffe bleffed (lauing that certaine people liued vpon mans flesh) by the disposition of the inhabitants, whose maners were fimple, and contented with that which the liberalitie of nature brought forth for them: they were not disquieted with passions of couetousnesse and ambition: but most vnhappie, in that the people hauing no certaine religion, no knowledge in learning, no science in negotiations or handie crafts, but wholly without experience of armes, without rule or art of warre, and without science, vse or custome in any thing, be as it were no other then tractable & taine creatures, and a praie most easie to whosoeuer will affaile them. By meane whereof, the Spaniards being drawne with the facilitie of commanding those Ilands, and with the possibilitie of revenue and profite, being plentifull of veines for gold, many of the began to inhabite there, as in their proper country. (hriflopber Colombo passing further, and after him Americo Vespuccio Florentin, and successively many others, haue disclosed other Hands and great countries of firme land, finding in certaine of the (albeit in the most part the contrarie) as well in their buildings both publike and private, as in the forme of their habits and connerfation, a conformity of maners and civill comelinefle, but so farre ignorant in the knowledge of armes, that they were a ready praie to the first inuader: and yet the limits of these new countries are so far stretched out, that they farre surmount the inhabitable circuit of the earth come first to the knowledge of man. In these regions the Spanish inlarging thesclucs with new supplies of people, and with new natigations, & sometimes labouring the mines of gold and filuer that are in many places, and also in the sands of the riners, sometimes buying it at easie prices of the inhabitants, or at least taking it from them by robberie and violence, they haue brought infinite quantities into Spaine, many fayling thither at their proper charges and venture, but vinder licence of the king, to whom they retribute the fift part of all that they bring from thence: yea, the Spaniards haue taken fuch courage in these courses of nauigation, that certaine fayles aduauncing three and fiftie degrees towards the Pole Antartike, alwaies along the coasts of the firme land, and afterwards falling into a straight sea from thence sayling towards the East by a verie large sea, and returning afterwards by the natigation which the Portugals make, they have (as appeareth clearely) sayled round about the earth. Which makes me say, that the Portugals and the Spaniards, but specially Colombo, the first finder out of this wonderfull & perilous nauigation, are worthy, whose knowledge, industrie, resolutenesse, study, and trauels, be celebrated with cternall memorie, for that by their vertues, our age and all posterities are made capable of the knowledge of great things, which afore lay hid from the sence and understanding of men: but far greater had bene their merits, if in those paines, in those perils, and in those aduentures, they had not bene induced by the immoderate thirft after gold and riches, but caried by defire to disclose them for the benefite and inlarging of Christian faith: a matter neuertheleffe hapned confequently, for that the inhabitants in many places have fuffered conversion to the religion catholike. By these nauigations it is knowne that the ancients were beguiled in many things touching the knowledge of the earth: that there was passage beyond the line Equinolitalli that there was habitation under the Zona torrida; as also (contrarie to their opinion) it is knowne by the nauigation of others, that the Zones next to the Poles were inhabited, under the which they assured (having regard to the situation of the heaven, so farre removed from the course of the Sun) that there was no abilitie of dwelling for the ouermuch cold. Besides, it is knowne (which some of the ancients beleeued, and some rebuked) that under our feet be other inhabitants, whom they named Antipodes.

But returning now to the matter of our narratio of those things which hapned the year 1504, Complains of after Caietta Was'rendred to the Spanish: the newes of the chase of the French neare Garillan, the Frenchmen. ioynedto so many disorders and aduersities that followed, inade sorowfull almost the whole realme of Fraunce, no lesse for the general multitude of bodies that were slaine, then for the losse

of so great a nobilitie. The Court accompanying their teares and weepings with habits of sorrow and mourning, filled all ful of heavineffe & affliction, & throughout the realmenothing was heard with more compassion, then the lamentable complainings of men and women, accurring the day wherein the milerable humour of couctoulnesse to conquer estates in Italy entred the heart of their kings, to whom, if anything might fatisfie the defires of men, the proprieties and poffessions of so many oftheir owne countries might have satisfied. In these perplexities the king was not without his proper calamity, and to him so much the more intollerable, by how much in so great a diminution of his authority and reputation, he faw also a deprivation of hope never to be able to recouer so noble a realme, his losses farre exceeding the remedies that remained. He called to remembrance the braue words which he had so often objected against the king of Spaine, & how vainly he had promifed to himself a successe of those huge preparations which he made to inuade him on all fides. But that which made him rife most of all into furie and complaint, was the confideration of his plots laid with to great wildome and expences, that not with flanding his importunities and diligence in the prouision of his warres so plentifully and liberally furnished, & matching withall with enemies most poore and needy of all things, yet the conetousnesse and robberies of his owne people, had turned his glorie into infamie, and made his loffes the more lamentable, by how much he was betrayed by their corruptions. In so much as crying out against heaven Princes enterand earth, he protested with many othes, that since he was serned with so great a negligence and infidelitie of his owne servants, he would from henceforth neuer leave recommeded to his Capnearly to their taines any expedition of warre, and much leffe repose himselfe vpon their assurance, but that in his owne person he would be the fashioner and follower of all enterprises. To these vexations of mind was joyned this last and chiefe perplexitie, that he saw, how much his forces were weakned for the losse of such an armie, for the death of so many braue captaines, and diminution of so flourishing a Nobilitie. All which concurring in one fortune, heaped against him such an aduerfitie, that if Maximilian had made any sturre in the duchie of Millan, or the Spanish armie had past further then their victorie of Naples, he doubted much to be able to defend that estate, speciallie Askanius Sforce ioyning to the one of them, whom the people defired with no litle affece ction. So dangerous are the illesthat are feared by a revolution of estate, which for the most " part drawes with it all those miseries which may be figured in an otter rune or desolation. Touching the King of Romaines, no man marueled that he was not wakened in so great oportunitie, for that it was his custome to delay, and to let passe, for the most part, times and occasions. But euery one held a contrarie perswasion of Consaluo, for that all the French faction in Italie had a wonderfull feare, least he, hoping that neither money, nor occasions would faile his victorious armie, would not joyne himselfe to his fortune to follow the subuersion of the state of Millan, and in his way, to change the affaires of Tuskan: which if he had done, it was believed affuredly that the French king, drained of money and appalled in courage, had yeelded to the storme without any resistance, speciallie his people having no desire to passe into Italie, and such as remained of the calamitie of Caietta in passing the mounts, having despised the commandements of their king presented at Genes: besides, it was clearely discerned that the king, having no inclination to armes, was wholly prepared to make peace with Maximilian, and no leffe disposed to continue the negotiations and practifes with the king of Spane, for the folicitation whereof (not communed vpon in the extreame heat of the warre) the Spanish Embassadors had bene & were at that time at the Court : but Consaluo, whom hereafter we will call for the most part the great Geneththetide Captaine, having confirmed with fo manie glorious victories the furname, that before had bene giuen him by a Spanish brag, refused to imbrace the benefit of so great an occasion : either for that, being altogether without money, & indebted to his armie for manie payes, he faw it impoffible to make his people march either under hope of profit that was to be won with perill, or in promise of their payes which would be long in comming, his regiments crying either to be satisf-

fied, or to be bestowed in garrison: or else he was tied to proceed according to the will of his king, whose direction it was not lawfull for him to transgresse: or at the least it seemed not to agree with his securitie, to draw his armie out of the kingdome of Naples, till first he had purged it of all his enemies: for that Lewys & Ars, one of the French Captaines, who, since the journey of Cirignoula had put himselfe within Venousa with such remainders of Frenchmen as were not to be despised, and who, whilest the atmies were vpon the shoates of Garillan, had occupied Troja.

and S. Senero, kept allo in denotio all Pomylla: certaine Barons also of the faction of Anion, which were retired upon their estates, stood to their defence, embracing openly the part of the French king. There was lattly this impediment, that a litle after the victory the Great Captaine fell into a dangerous ficknesse, which staying his personall expedition, he sent Aluiano with part of his armie to make warre upon Lowys d' Ars: by which his necessitie, not able for the present to follow his victorie out of the kingdome of Naples, the refidue of Italy remained rather in Suspition, then in trauell, things hanging more in expectation then in action: for the Venetians, according to their custome, stood doubtfull, expecting what would bee the issue of things: the Florentins thought they had won much, if at a time when they wholly defpaired to be succoured by the French king, they were not inuaded by the Great Captaine: & the Pope, referring to another time his ambitious thoughts, fludied to bring to passe that the Duke Valentinous, who held no more in Romania but the Castles of Furly, of Cesena, and of Bertinoire, (having lost Forlimpople by corruption of the keeper)might accord to leauethern to him, taking the advantage of the time, and his impriforment. Valentinois condificended to gine to the Pope the affiguement of the Castle of Cefena, and Dom Petro d'Outedo a Spaniard, being gone thither to receiveit in the Popes name, was hanged by the Castle-keeper, objecting that it could be no lesse dishonour to him to obey his Lord whileft he was a prisoner, then he that presumed to impose that request you him deserved to be punished. By this occasion the Pope despairing to reioyce in his desire without the deliuery of Valentinois, he accorded with him (and of this convention there was a Bull dispatched in the Confisherie for greater surety) that he shod be set in the rocke of Offia, under the absolute power of Bernardin Caruagiall a Spaniard, Cardinall of S. Croce, and he to let him go whefoeuer he had tendred to the Pope the Castles of Cesena and Bertmoire, and transferred to the Pope the assignation of the rocke of Furly,& appointed in the towne of Rome, bankers to answer fifteen thousadduckats in recompence of the expences which the Castle-keeper alleaged he had sustained. But the Pope had another intention, for that albeit he would not apparantly defile and break the faith he had giuen, yet his meaning was to keepe his deliuery in delay, either for feare least he being at libertie, the Caltle-keeper of Furly would refuse to render the Rocke, or else for the memorie of the injuries he had received of his father and him, or at least for the hate which eyetie one reasonably bare him: So infallible is the lawe of instice to take reuenge of wrongs, not obser-,, ing the presence of times wherin they are done, but transferring occasions from one season to a-, nother, calleth then the iniuries into reckening, whe the offender hath least memorie of the .Vale-,, inois growing into some suspition, that the Pope would not hold faith with him, required secrety the Great Captaine to give him fafeconduct to come to Naples, and withall to fend two Galeyes to conuey him from Offia: which request being condifcended vnto by Confaluo, the Carlinall of S. Croce holding the same suspition with Valentinois, suffred him to depart without the Popes priuitie, being first aduertifed, that pledge was put in for the fifteen thousand duckats, with he redeliuerie up of the Castles of Cesena and Bertinosre. The seare and danger wherein Valentssois was, made him carelesse to attend the Galleyes which the Great Captaine should send him, indtherfore being still caried with those impressions, he went secretly by land to Nettuna, from hence he failed in a litle Batke to Montdragon, and so by land went to Naples, where Confalno eceived him with great tokens of gladnesse & shewes of honor. At Naples he comunicated maty times in fecret with Confaluo, who he folicited at last to give him power to passe to Pisa, assuing him, that if he might but once put foot into that City, it wold be much to the profit & furtheance of his king. Confaluo differibling his opinion, feemed to favour the deuile, and offring him zalleis to gardehim in passing he suffered him to leavie in the kingdome, such regiments of footmen as he thought to carie with him: he entertained him in this hope, till he had received answer rom his king conformable to that he had determined to doe, alwaies confulting with him of the offices of Tuskane, and Aluiano offering at the same time to inuade the Florentines, for the desire he had to see the famulie of Medicis restored. But asthere is no possibilitie to auoid, that which the euerlasting counsell of God hath determined, nor anie reason to pull on the desti-,, nie of things till times be accomplished: fo Valentinois raised into thoughts of securitie, stoode, readie to hisruine, when he judged his estate in most stabilitie, euen as a house whose foundation is not found, falles eftfoones to the ground being but newly builded: for, the gallies being now prepared, and his bands of footemen in readinesse to march the day following, Valentinois

after he had deuised long the same night with Consalue, and taking his leave with demonstration of great affection embracing one another at parting, was by his commandement, affoone as he was out of the chamber, retained in the Castle, sending forthwith into his lodging to rifle the safeconduct that had bene fent him before he departed from Oftia. Confaluo excused himselfe vpon the authoritie of his King, who lending warrant to apprehend him prisoner, his Maichtes commadement (he faid) was of more force then his fafe conduct, for that the affurance that was given by the proper authoritie of a feruant, was not anayleable if the wil of his Lord cofented not. Befides, he occupied with him these round tearmes, that it was necessarie to hold him restrained, for that, not fatisfied with fo manie finister dealings done in times past, he studied still to change the estates of others, he denifed to innouate things, he fowed vniust flaunders, & cast to kindle a fire through all Italy. Immediately after he fent him in a light Galley prisoner to Spayne, leaving him of all his traine but one Page to scrue him: there he was imprisoned within the Castle of Medino de Campo, having good oportunitie by the confideration of his just punishment to enter into conscience touching the harmes he hap inflicted vpon diuerfe regions and men.

the kings of Sp. and France.

About this time truce was made both by fea and land, aswell for Italy, as the nations beyond Truce between the Mounts, betweene the French king and the king of Spaine: which, as the French defired it by necessity, so the Spanish embraced it by just reason, for that he thought it was better to confirm by that meane with greater furety and rest, that which he had conquered, then to referre all to hazard by new warres, which being full of peril and expences, bring forth oftentimes other iffue then are hoped for. The conditions were, that every one should retaine that which he possessed That it should be suffered to the subjects of both parties to traffike through all their realmes and estates, except in the kingdom of Naples, with the which exception the Great Captaine obtained indirectly that which was forbidden to him directly: for, in the frontiers of those places which the French held (which were only Rossano in Calabria, Oiro in the land of Otranto, and in Powylla Venousa, Connersan, and the Mount Castle) Consaluo bestowed men to give impedimet, that no one of the fouldiers or men of those townes should vie connersation with any peece possessed b the Spanish a deuise which brought them into such necessitie, that Lowys a' Ars with the other Barons and fouldiers of those places, went their way, knowing that the inhabitants, not ablet endure so many discommodities, were determined to yeeld themselves to the Spaniards: So in finit is the malice of fortune, that whom she hath resolued to root vp, she will not spare to perse cute till his last desolation be come, But for all this, the kingdome of Naples, not with standing the enemies were al expulsed, enjoyed not the fruits of the peace: for that the Spanish soldiers, to wh were due their payes for more then one yeare, not contented that the Great Captaine (the betti to containe them til he had leuied prouifions for mony) had bestowed the in fundrie places when they lined upon the people (which men of war call to line by discretion) breaking al bonds of d scipline and obedience, had entred Capua and the sea Castle, from whence they would not depa till they were fatisfied of their payes. And because the money could not be leuied by conuenies means (the fumme being great) without laying an exceffine taxation on the realm, the condition of me were found fo much the more miferable, by how much the medicine was no leffe grieuo the the difease they went about to cure: matters so much the lesse easie or tolerable, by how muc they were practifes new, & out of the examples passed: for, not with standing that since the ancier times, wherin the discipline of warre was exercised with seueritic, the souldiers were alwaics fullibertie, and troublesome to the peoples: yet things being as yet not wholly disordered, they live for the most part of their payes, & their libertie was not alto gether intollerable. But the Spanian were the first that began in Italy to live wholly vpon the substace of peoples, the disability of the kings giving them that occasion or haply their necessities much enforcing, being ill payd of whice beginning, disorders rising alwayes in increasing (for the imitation of an ill is greater for the mo pare then the example) even the Spaniards themselves and the Italians also, whether they wer payd or not payd, have ever fince made fuch custome of that example, that to the great dishone of the discipline of warre at this day, the goods of good men and friends are no more assured fr the infolencie of fouldiers, then fuch as belong to wicked people and the vericenemie, all thing running in confusion without regard to obedience, conscience or honour, as the horse when h hath broken his bridle, for beareth not in his libertie to spoile the fields of his maister, as if he wei a straunger.

. Wha

What by the taking of Valentinois, and this truce betweene the two kings, with opinion that the peace would fucceed immediatlie. Romana was put wholly in rest: for Imola was divolved afore by the willes of the chiefcaines of the Citie into the power of the Pope, and not without the consent of Cardinall S. George, whom the Pope entertained with a vaine hope that he wold render it estioons to his nephewes. And about those seasons Lonys his bastard brother being entred into Furly by the death of Anthory a' Ordelassy, that citie had salne into the hands of the Venetians, to whom Lonys offered it (knowing hee was not able enough to holde it) saving that the conditions of the present time made themseare to accept it, least they should further incense the Pope, who without any resistance obtained the towne abandoned by Lonys, and had likewise, paying sisteene thousand duckats, the Citadell: a place which the keeper (a faithfull servannis), would never give vp, till he was affured of his imprisonment by men which he sent expresses to Naples, holding it a just office to retaine to the last those things which his maister had recommended to his fidelitie.

Thus, being a forceasing of armes in all other parts of Italy, the Florentines only would not cease in the beginning of sommer to recontinue the warres upon the Pifans according to their custome: for, having newly received into their pay lohn Paule Barllon, with other captains, and men at armes of the Colonnois and Sauelleis, and leavying withall farre greater forces then they were wont, they fent an armie to give the spoile to the corne of the Pifans, wherein they proceeded with greater courage, for that they doubted no impediment by the Spaniard, not so much for that the king of Spaine had not named the Pifans in the truce (wherein both the kings had libertie to comprehend their friends and adherents) as for that the Great Captaine, after his victories upon the Frenchmen, not with flanding from the beginning he had given great hopes to the Pifans, had exercised gracious and sweet speeches with the Florentins, hoping at the least by his cunning to separate them from the French king : wherinalbeit he found himselfe afterwards disappointed, yet wifely for bearing to incense them, as not to give them occasion to be more for the French king he was entred by the meane of Profer Colonno (but not otherwise then with words fimply) into this feeret intelligence with them, that if it happed the French king eftfoons to renew the warres of Naples, that they should not minister to him any ayde, as also for his part he would not give fuccours to the Pifans, but in case the Florentins should send an armie with artilleries to take the Citie, which he wished they should not recouer so long as they followed the amitie of the French king. The Florentine armie prepared to spoile not only those parts of the countrie of Pila which they had wasted in times past, but also to ouer-run S. Rossoro and Barbaricino, and so to the vales of Serclo & O/olo, places ioyning to Pi/a, wherunto they could not go without dager whe their armie was lesse: the they encaped before Librafratta, which being manned with a verie flender garrison, was within few dayes constrained to yeeld to discretion. And such were the calami ies of that yeare, that the Pifans had bene compelled by famine to receive the yoke of the Florentins, if they had not bene succoured by their neighbours, but principally by the Genowayes and Lucquen (for Pandolfe Petrucci no leffe ready to flire up others, then liberall in his owne promises to contribute to the expences, was verie long in effects) with whose moneves Reniero of Saffetto, a fouldier of the Great Captaine, with certain other leaders having fufferance, led to Pifa by featwo hundred horfmen, and the Genowayes fent thither a Prouost with a thousand footmen: ouer and befides which prouisions, Bardello de porto Venere, a famous rouer in the sea Tirreneum, & who being leaused & payd by the said helpers, was called the Captaine of the Pifans, reuichualled Pifa continually with a Gallion and other Brigandines: for these confiderations the Florentins holding it necessarie, that besides the trauels they gave them by land, they should also take from them the vse of the sea, entertained three light Gallies of king Federyk which were in Prouence, with the which as their Captaine Dom Rima Ricaienso approched Lyworno, Bardello retired, and yet fometimes taking the occasion of the winds, he brought some barkes laden with victuals to the mouth of Arno, from whence they fell easilie into the towne of Pila, which at the fame time fuffered manie perplexities by land : for, after the armie of Florence had taken Librafratta, deuiding themselues into many legions, they looked how to give impediment to the tilling of the lands for the yeare following, and to restraine the passage of victuals both by the way of Lucque and the sea: they gave also in the end of the sommer a spoile to all forts of graines, whereof that countrey brings forth a great quantitie : their furie left nothing

vnproued against the ruine of the Pifans: for neither wearied with the great expeces, nor holding impossible any thing that gaue them hope to accomplish their purpose, they denised to trouble the Pifans in a new fashion, that is, by a new channell to make fall the river of Arno, which runneth by the towne of Pifa, from the towre of Fagiana fine miles from Pifa, into the poole which is betweene Pifa & Liuorna: which if they had brought to passe, there could have bene no more portage of things to Pifa by feathrough the river of Arno, and the raine waters, for that the countrey is low, not able to be conveyed into the sea, the Citie had remained as it were in the middest of a marrish, as also for the difficulty to passe Arno, the Pifans could not have run from thence forward along the hilles to hinder the traffike from Lynorna to Florence: and lastly, they should have bene constrained to fortifie that part of Pifa, by the which the river entred and iffued, least it should be open to the incursions of the enemie. But this enterprise, as it was begun with a very great hope, and followed with farre greater expences, was in the end made vaine; and as it often hapneth that like enterprifes, not with Handing they be laid out by measure and line, are yet found fallible by experience, which is the certaine proofe of the difference that is between the deuifing and doing of things: so besides many difficulties, not considered before, and now caused by the course of the river, which when they thought to restraine, abated of himselfe fretting his channell: the bottome of the poole where they would have it enter, contrarie to the reasons and opinions of many enginists and water-workers, was found to be higher then the channell of Arno. Befides in fo great a defire to obtaine Pi/a, fortune enuied also the ambition of the Florentines, for that the Galleys which they had entertained, returning from Villefranche with a prize of the Pifans loaden with graine, were fo weatherbeaten neare to Rapallo, that they were constrained to give against the ground, the Captaine with the residue having great paine to faue themselues. But the Florentines, whose defire of the victorie was withour limit, sought to serue their turn of all the means which either the wit of man, or oportunitie of the time could deuile : and therefore after they had proued in vaine to raunge the Pifans by armes & threatnings, they fought to reclaime them by affabilitie and fweetnesse, making a new law, by the which it was graunted, that enery Citizen or other subject of the Countrey of Pifa that within a certaine time would eftsoones withdraw to his living or dwelling place, should obtaine pardon of all faults committed, with full restitution of goods. Notwithstanding the fauour of this lawe, there were very few of heart and faith resolute, which would depart out of Pisa, but they suffered all fuch as were inprofitable to the warre to take the benefite of the edict, and go their way: the same being the cause that both the dearth of victuals which raged afore, was not now so great, and also that they received afterwards certaine commoditie of revenues from others that secretly ayded them; whereby, albeit the necessities of the Pifans were somwhat by these means diminished, yet they found their estate grieuouslie vexed with their great pouertie and wants: and yet having all things in leffe horrour then the name of the Florentines, not with standing the minds of the Pcasants did often times wauer, they determined to endure al extremities of misery, rather then to returne to the deuotion of the Florentines. Therefore they offered to give themselves up to the Genowayes, with who they had so offerimes sought for the jurisdiction & for their safetie, and by whom their power had bene of long antiquity afflicted and embased. Of this motion they of Lucqua and Pandolfe Petrucci were the causes, desiring (to auoyd in themselves the continuall expences and troubles) to bind the Genowayes to the defence of Pifa. And for their more easie inducing to the matter, they offered to defray part of the expences for three yeares. Whereupon the Genowayes, having a deliberation to embrace the offer, notwithstanding John Lowys de Fiefquo with many others were against it, made an instance to the French king to suffer them, without whose consent they had no power to execute any deliberation: they debated with the king how dangerous it wold be that the Pifans, excluded from this their last and almost only hope, should come to offerthe selues to the king of Spaine, from whence would succeed to his great prejudice, that both Genes should be in continual travell and danger, and almost all Tuskane by compulsion follow the Spanish faction. These reasons, albeit at the beginning had so much wrought with the king , that he was almost at a point to gratifie their demands, yet his Counsell confidering, that if the Genowayes should begin to accept warres of themselves, and for a defire of imperie, to have confederation with other Potentates, it would be cause, that comming afterwards to raife their thoughts to greater things, they would put their flate

into absolute libertie: he forbad them expressely to accept the iurisdiction of Pifa, but not that they should forbeare to aide or succour them, notwithstanding the Florentines had made great complaints, particular respects bearing more force in these matters, then equitie, conscience, or

About this time the peace was earnestly laboured betweene the kings of Spaine and Fraunce, who offred diffemblingly to render the realme of Naples to the king Federske, or to the Duke of Calabria his sonne, to whom the French king should resigne and give vp all his claime, so farre forth as the mariage were accomplished between the Duke & the Queene widow, Nece to the same king, having afore bene wife to yong Ferdinand of Aragon king of Naples . And it was without doubt, that the French king had a minde so farre estranged from the affaires of the kingdom of Naples, that for his own regard, he had accepted all forts of peace, if it had not bene for these two disticulties that restrained him: the one (of lesse moment with him then the other) was the shame & reproches that would be thundred vpon him, to leave abandoned the Barons, who, for that they followed his faction, had fuffred privation of their estates, & to whom were offred conditions hard & intollerable: the other (working formwhat more strongly with him) was the doubt wherein he was, left the king of Spaine having other intentions offred, according to his accustomed subtilities, this restitution for some end, that though his maiesties consenting, yet the effect should not follow; and that in the meane while the Archduke were not estranged fro him, who desiring to have the kingdome of Naples for his sonne, made instance that there should be continuation of the peace which he had begun before. Therefore he answered generally that he defired the peace, but that he could not with honor give vp to an Arragon the rights which he had in the fame realme, And on the other part, he continued the auncient practifes with the king of Romaines, & the Archduke: wherin as he was almost certaine of the conclusion & effect, & to the end they should not be cut off nor hindred by the incertaine practifes of the king of Spaine, he let call before him the Spanish Embassadours, making his colour for his greater honor, that the respects & interests of the Barons did chiefely moue him. And being set in the chaire royal, in the aspect & presence of all the court, with solemne ceremonies far aboue the vsage of times before, he complained that their king expressed in words his defire & disposition to the peace, having his intentions diffembled, in which regard, & also for that it was not a thing worthie the vertue and honor of a king, to consume the time in vaine practises, he told them it were their best to depart out of the realme of France. After whole going away, the Embassadours of Maximilian and the Archduke came to giue perfectio to that which had bin negociated:in which action (because) there were plottes layed to greater purposes) was affiliant the Bishop of Sisteron the Popes ordinarie Nuncio in that Court, & the Marquis of Finalo whom the Pope fent expressely in those affaires. This peace having bene many times afore throughly debated for the profit which appeared verie great to all those Princes, was finally set down under these conditios: That the mariage confederation of Lady Clauda the French kings daughter, commoned vpo long time before, should now grow betweeneshe to effect with Charles the eldelt sonne to the Archduke: And for more firm cofirmation of the Pope, king of fame, there should be joyned to the oath and subscription of the French king, the ratification of the French Fraunces Count of Angule/me, who (iffue male failing in the king, was next heire to the Crowne) king against together with manie of the principals of the kingdome. That all the innestitures of the state of the Venetians Millan allowed till that day, being razed & cancelled for iust and honest occasions, Maximilian should transferre the inuestiture thereof to the French king, for himselfe and heires males, and for want of fuch iffue it should be (in fauour of the mariage) conveyed to Madame Clauda, and to Charles, & if Charles should dye before the consummation of the mariage, then it to discend to Ladie Clauda, & to the second son of the Archduke if the maried with him: That betweene the Pope, the king of Romanes, the French king, & the Archduke, shold be made a confederation for their common defence, & to offend the Venetians, from whom they all determined to withdraw those places which they occupied of theirs: That the king of Romanes should passe in person into Italie against the Venetians, & afterwards go to Rome to take the crowne imperials: That the French king, as soone as the Charters should be dispatched, should paie for the investiture threefcore thousand florins of Rhem, & three score thousand others within fix moneths, & euery yeare a paire of spurres of gold, ypon the daie of the Natiuitie of our Lord: That there should be place left for the king of Spaine to enter into this confederation within four emoneths: But it was not

expressed, that in case he did not enter, it should be suffred to the French king to inuade the kingdome of Naples: That the French king should give no more aide nor succors to the Count Pafantine, who stirred up by him, and entertained with hope of his succors, was in great warre with the king of Romans: That the Venetians should be excluded out of this league, not with standing that both the king had given willing eare to their Embassadours, and also the Cardinall of Amboyle (to cleare them from all suspicion) had nourished them with assured promises & othes, that the king would neuer go against that confederation which he had with them. These matters were contained in letters which were folernly passed: besides the which it was moued that the king and Maximilian should speake together at an other time in some place convenient. The king also promised at that time, that he would deliuer out of prison Lodowyke Sforce, and endue him with convenient meane to live in the realme of Fraunce. The fafetie of this man, the king of Romanes had shame not to procure, for that his conscience put him in remebrance, that the promifes he had made him, and the hopes he had vainly reposed in him, had bene causes to hasten his ruine. In which confiderations, having no power to do what he would, at least he expressed inclination to do what he could: in so much as when the Cardinall of Amboyse went to him at Trent, he wrought fo much as he should no more be so straitly kept as he had bene, making now importunate instance that he might remaine at libertie in the court of Fraunce, or in such quarter of the realme as it pleased the king. The king promised also at his request, that the exiles of the Duchie of Atyllan should returne, wherupo were manie difficulties in the negociation of Trent: it was beleeved that he would keep this capitulation being so greatly to the advantage of the Archduke and Maximilian, notwith standing his ordinarie variations, the Pope being comprehended, and no leffe agreable to the French king, not so much for the defire he had at that time to make new enterprises, as for an ambicious respect to obtaine the muessiture of the duchie of Millan, and to be affured not to be molefled neither by Cafar nor his fonne.

The death of king Federike.

In these seasons dyed king Federik, being wholly deprined of hope to recouer by accord the kingdome of Naples, not with Handing he was periwaded afore (cuery one naturally suffreth him selfe to be beguyled by defire) that the king of Spaine had a better deuotion to it then the French king: he confidered not that in that time it was athing vaine to hope for the restitution of fo noble arealme, the examples being verie rare in times farre more auncient & before, wherein men were more disposed to actes of vertue and nobilitie, then they were in the time running: he faw not also that it was a thing out of all likelihood, that he which had vsed so manie deceits to occupie the moitie of the kingdome, would now that he hath wonne all, deprine him felfe of the fruit and glorie of his victorie. Besides in the common reason and discourse of affaires, he tright have perceived that the one made no leffe difficultie then the other: only he had more reason to doubt, that he that was alreadie possessed, would not restore, then he which held nothing in the kingdome, would not confent.

The death of EliZabeth Queene of Spaine. .

In the end of this yeare, Elizabeth queene of Spaine exchanged this life for a better: The was a Lady of most honest and honorable conditions, and wonne in the opinion of her subjects a right worthie name of magnanimitie, modestie, and discretio: to her did properly appertaine the kingdome of Castillo, which is the greater part of Spaine, to the which shee succeeded after the death of Henry her brother, but not without bloud & warre. For albeit it was beleeued for a long time, that Henry by nature was vnable to procreation, and for that reason Beltramije could not be his daughter which was brought forth by his wife, & by him nourished many yeares as a frute of his own feed . And albeit for that occasion Elizabeth fifter of Henry was acknowledged for Princeffe of Castall, a title nearest to the succession: yet manie Barons of the realme rising after his death in favour of Beliramife, & the king of Portugall ministring succors by armes in the right of a friend, allie & confederat, the factions comming at last to battel, the cause of Elizabeth was approued most just by theisfue of the field, Ferdinand of Aragon her husband leading the armie, who like wife was discended of the house of the kings of Castill, & conjoyned to Elizabeth in the third degree of confanguiritie, & he afterwards succeeding by the death of John his father to the realme of Aragon, they both tooke vpon them by one joynt right the title of king & queene of Spaine : for that the kingdom of Valence being vnited to the crown of Aragon, together with the countrie of Catalogna, they were Lords ouer all the prouince of Spaine, which is contained betweene the Mounts Pirenes, the Ocean sea, & the Middle earth sea, And under this title, for that that region hath bin occupied by many kings of the Mores, the title of many kingdoms is com-prehended, every one of them making a title separate by him selfe: except notwithstanding the kingdome of Granado, which being at that time possessed by the Mores, was afterwards by the vertue of this King & Queene gloriously subdued to the Empire of Castile, together with the title & kingdoine of Portugall, & the Realme of Nauarre much inferior, all which had kings particular. But the kingdome of Aragon with Cicilia, Sardigma, & other Ilands appertaining by inheritance to Ferdinand, were gouerned by him only, without interpoling the name or authoritie of the queene, contrary to the pollicy & course of gouernmet in Castile: the reason was, for that that kingdom belonging by law of fuccession to Elizabeth, & standing in a state endowed to Ferdinand, things were administred under their common name as well in demonstrations as in effects, nothing being executed which was not debated, ordeined, & subscribed by them both. The title of the king of Spaine was common, their Embassadors dispatched in common, their armies leuied in common, their wars administred in common, and neither of them in particular appropriating more then the other in authoritie & gouernment of the kingdom, But by the death of Elizabeth without issue males the succession of Castile, by the lawes of that kingdome, which regarding more the proximitie then the fex, exclude not the woman, belonged to lane the daughter of Ferdinand & her, & wife to the Archduke, their eldelt daughter, which had bene maried to Emanuell king of Portugall, together with her litle sonne, being dead long time before: by reason whereof the administration of the realme dowager appetraining by the end of the mariage, no more to Ferdinand, he was effloones to returne into his litle kingdome of Aragon: litle in comparison of the realisse of Castile, for the Uraitnes of the countrey, & Imalnesse of the revenues, & for that also the kings of Aragon, not having absolute regall authoritie in all things, be in manie points subject to the constitutions & customes of the same provinces, which limit much the power of their kings. But Elizabeth drawing towards her latest time, ordained by her testament, that Ferdinand Testament of to long as he lined should be gouernor of Castile, aswel for that the defired it might be kept in Queene Elihis first greatnes, for the amitie that had benemutual betwene them, as also for that she knewe it Zabeth. concerned the profite of her subjects to be continued under the moderate government of Ferdirand, and imported no leffe the commoditie of her fonne in law & daughter, who, feeing in the end they should likewise succeede Ferdinand, had reason to esteem it much to their behoose, that until Philip, borne & nourished in Flaunders where things were gouerned diversly, had attained a riper age, & taken a greater knowledge of the lawes, cultomes, nature, & maners of Spaine, all their realmes might be preserved for them vnder one peaceable & well ordered government, the countreis of Castile & Aragon being maintained in the meane while as one selfe body. But as in mortall actions the wit of man is infufficient to fet down a firme stabilitie, for that althings under the highest circuit haue their proper revolutions : so little helped the wise provisions of this Queene, to stay the alteration of things, for that after her death new accidents happing in Spaine, the state tooke a new forme of gouernment. But touching the affaires of Italie, as we meane to expresse hereafter, they were better disposed to a new peace.

The yeare 1505, things continued in the same estate of tranquilitie wherin they had bene nouished the yere before, which was such, that had not the quarel between the Florentines & Pelans prought formealteration, the actions of armes for that yere had wholly furceased, one part of the Potentates being defirous of peace, & the other that were enclined to warre, holden retained for many reasons: for, it sufficed the king of Spaine (who continued that the same title, & as yet trauaied with the thoughts of his dead wife) to keepe the kingdome of Naples by meane of the truce that had bene made. The French king was entred into a great suspition, for that Casar following n this as in all other things, his wandring nature, had not ratified the peace. The Pope, albeit he was defirous of innovation & new things, yet he neither durst nor could stirre, vnlesse he were accompanied with the armes of some mightie Prince. And the Venetians esteemed it to no small grace, if in so great consult & countell of things against them, & in so ill a disposition of the Pope, hey flood quiet & were not molested by others: wherin the better to appeare the Pope, they had offred many moneths before to leave him Rimm, & all that they had possessed in Romana since the death of Pope Alexander, to the end he did consent that they might retaine Faenza with his territories, This offer they made also for feare they had of the French king, & for that Cafar at the Solicitatió of the Pope, had sent his Embassadors to Venice to sommon them to make restitution of the lands of the Church: but the Popes answere was so resolute, that they passed no further. He tolde them according to the constancie of his minde, and his free nature to expresse his conceits, that he would not confent to the retaining only of a little towre, but did hope to recouer before his death both R anenna and Ceruia, Cities which they possessed no lesse vniustly then they did Faenza: with which aunswerthey kept suspended their further sutestill the beginning of the Sommer, when their feares being become greater, they offred by the meane of the Duke of Vrbin (a friend indifferent) to restore all that they had occupied, which was not of the apertenances of Faenza and Rimini, so that the Pope, who would not afore admit their Embalsadours to tender their obedience, would now consent to receive them. This demaund albeit the Pope shewed him selfe somewhat hard to accept, supposing he should do wrong to his dignitie, as not conuenient to allow it, remembring the great quarrels and threatnings he had made to them : yet having regard to the perplexities that were endured by them of Furly, Tmola, and Cefena, who deprined of the greatest part of their countries, suffred manie incommodities. And seeing withall no other meanes to redresse things with speede, for that the affaires betweene Cefar and the French king, proceeded with so great a longnesse of time and delaie: at last he consented to that which in effects was a gaine without losse, fince neither by words nor writings he was bound to any thing: so that after the townes were restored, eight Embassadors of the principals of the Senate chosen fince he was created Pope, were fent to him. (The grearest companie and most honorable shewe of Embassadors which that common weale had euer fent to any Pope, if he were not a Venetian:) But after they had entred their obedience with the ceremonies accustomed, they brought not backe to Venice any figne, by the which they could gather that the Pope was become more easie or tractable : so deepe were the impressious of his milliking against them: or else so cunningly could he diffemble contrarie to his owne promises and their expectations. About this time the French king, defiring to put end to that which had bene debated, sent the Cardinall of Amboyse to Haguenau a towne of base Almame, where Cefar and the Archduke atteded him, having newly taken that town vpon the Count Palatine: there were published & swornsolemnly the conuctions that had bene made, the Cardinal paying the moity of the money promised for the intestiture, with promise that Cafar shold receiue the other moitie as soone as he should passe into Italie . Notwithstanding, both at the prefent he gaue to vnderstand, and a little after he declared, that he could not passe that yeare for the impediments which were in Garmanie, the fame making the suspition of warre so much the lesse, the French king being determined to enter into no new attempt without him: only, the warre almost continual betweene the Florentines and Pisans, remained kindled in Italie, the which proceeding by easie degrees, and not purfued but when occasions offered to the one or the other partie, who otherwise had no one settled enterprise: it hapned that Luke Sauelle isfued out of Cassina, in which land the Florentines made their retrait of warre, and with him certaine Captaines and Constables of the Florentines, with foure hundred horse and manie bands offootemen, their intention was to reuichuall Librafatta, and by the same meane to leute certaine heards of cattel of the Pisans feeding on the other fide the river of Sercle vpon the grounds of the Lucquoys, not so much for the benefit and pillage of the pray, as for the defire they had to draw the Pifans to the fight, having a confidence to overthrow them, for that they were the stronger in the field. And when they had conveyed victuals into Librafatta, and possessed the pray they pretended they returned with leifure by the fame way, to the end to entice the Pifans with that oportunitie to come and charge them . Tarlain chiefe commaunder ouer their men of warre, iffued out of Pifa as soone as he understood the enemie droue away their cattell: and because the chiefe point of the rescue rested in expedition, he tooke no moe with him then fifteene men at armes, fortic light horsemen, and threescore footemen, leaving order that a greater " ftrength should follow him: so necessarie is speed in enterprises, that often times they are wonne and loft with a leffe measure and distance of time, then is required to consult vpon them. But the Pifan Captain understanding that certaine of the Florentine horsmen were runne up euen to S. lacques neare Pifa, he made towards them, and they retiring to their streight which stayed at the bridge Capella vpon the liucr of Ofolo, and three miles fro Pifa where they taried for the droues of cattel that were taken, & the Mulets with the which they had reuictualled Librafatta coming behind, & as yet beyond the bridge, which the first bands of sootmen had occupied, & manned the loopeholes & trenches: Tarlatin followed them even to the bridge, not perceiving that all the armie of the Florentines were in that place till he was so neare that he could not returne without manifest daunger: and therefore, as necessity is mightie to make men resolute, so he determined to make way by his valour, and to charge the bridge, declaring to his company that that whereunto their perill constrained them, was not without great hope and possibility to ouercome, for that in a place fo straite where few men could fight, the great number of their enemies was more fearefull then hurtfull, the narrownesse of the place hindring the vsage of the weapon wherewith they should strike them: in so much that albeit they could not make their passage oues the bridge, at the least they should easily maintaine their owne defence till the regiments of Psfa, which he had fent for, were come to their fuccours: But if they could winne the bridge, the victory would be no leffe easie then the attempt was glorious, for that the way beyond the bridge which runneth betweene the bridge and the mountaine being straite and narrow, the multitude of their enemies encombred with the mulets and beaftes they had ftolne, would of themselues fall eafily into disorder, being drawne into a place so inconvenient either to fight or to flie. His words were justified with deedes: for he being the formost, giving with great valour the spurs to his horse, charged the bridge, but being compelled to retire, another did the like, and after him a third, whose horse being hurt, the Captaine returned with great fury to succour him, and in that veine of courage, what with the force of his weapon and fury of his horse, he passed on the other side the bridge, the sootmen that defended making him place : soure others of his company did the like by his example, all which whilest they entertained the skirmish on the other side the bridge with the footmen of the enemy in a straite meddow, certaine footmen of the Pifans passed ouer the River in water up to the chinne, the horsemen likewise passing without impediment over the bridge which was now abandoned, befides the fuccours expected from Pt/a, beginning to arrine without order: wherein the Florentine fouldiers feeing their fafety turned into perill, and their bodies and weapons reduced into a place straite and narrow, fell into confusion amongst hemselues, and as men whose confidence was turned into cowardnesse, and nothing but feare appearing in their faces which had wont to expresse courage and resolution, having no Captaine of authority to retaine them in order, they turned their backes and fell to flying: in fo much that they which were farre mightier inforces, and marched in order and observance of warre, left the rictory to those whose numbers were farre inferiour, and came altogether disbanded, with intention rather to make shew only, then to fight in deede. Many Captaines of the Florentin footmen ind other Gentlemen of marke were the miserable monuments of this ouerthrow, for that many of them were flaine, mo taken, and most of all dangerously hurt, and such as sought safety in flyng, fell into the discretion of the vnplandish people of Lucqua, who stripping them, fent them avay naked to be beholden with greater griefe of their friends: fo spitefull is fortune when she is lisposed to oppresse such as she holds for hated, that suffring them to escape out of the daunger hey feared most, she leadesthem into those adversities they doubted least, raking her pleasure in he afflictions of men. This calamitie of the Florentins brought a great disorder to their affaires a the countrey of Pifa, for that having weakened their legions of horsemen within Cassina, they vere not able to let the Pifans (whom their late victory had made insolent and proude) to ouerun & pill the whole countrey. And that which was of greater importance, Pandolfe Petrucci beng entred into a hope by reason of this accider, that they might easily give impedimer to the Floentins for spoyling that sommer the corne of the Pilans, who maintaining defence with their acustomed difficulties, were (but in cold maner) ayded by the Genomaies and Lucquois, for the Sinnois succoured them rather with counsell, then with money or victuals: he wrought so much hat John Pawle Baillon, in whom the Florentins repoted much, for that they had bene the prinipall cause of his returne into Perousa, refused during the time of his service, to continue in their ray, alleaging that Marke Anthonie and Mutto Colonno, with Luke and lacques Sauelles having ltogether a greater number of men then he, and being in the fame pay, he could not remaine here without daunger for the divertitie of factions. And to the end they should have lessetime o prouide themselves, he temporised and tatied as long as he could, to disclose wholly that which he had in his thought; and to induce them to give more faith and credite to his excuse, he promised the Florenzins not to take armes against them: wherein to keepethem the more affued, he left as a gage, his fon Maletesta a very young man, in their pay with fifteene men at armes: indbecause himselse would not remaine altogether without appointment, he tooke pay of the Siennois with threescore and ten men at armes. But because they of Sienna were notable to fupport so great expences, the Lucquois who did communicate in that counsell, tooke into their paie with threescore and ten men at armes, Troylus Sauellus, who afore was mercenary to the

What for the fudden and vnlooked for departing of John Pamle, & the harmes received at the bridge (apello, the Florenems looking into their owne weakenesse, would not that yeare give the spoyle to the lands of the Pifans, forbearing to attept enterprises till their fortune were better reconciled: yea they faw how farre they were constrained to deuise how they might remedie greater dangers: forthe auncient humor of affection being eftsoones revived in lohn l'awle, and in Pandolfe, they debated secretly with the Cardinall of Medicis to trouble the estate of the Florentins, making their principall foundation of Bartlemew Alusano, who being in some disagreement with the Great Captaine, was newly come to Rome, where he drew to him many fouldiers with diuerse hopes and promises: wherein it was feared least those counsels would pierce into Cardinal Askanius, with deliberatio (if things succeeded not happily in Tuskane) to assaile the Duchy of Millan, with the loynt forces of the Florentins, and others consented to this conspiracy. The reafon was, that they had a hope, that affayling it there would eafily rife fome mutation, feeing there was a flender strength of men at armes of Fraunce, many of the nobilitie were abroade, the peoples much enclined to the name of Sforce, and the French king (on whom was falne a great malady, languishing in so dangerous extremity, that for many houres there was a generall dispaire of his health, and though he should somewhat reniue, yet his disease had made him so ill disposed, that there was no hope of life, and leffe expectation of action. And fuch as looked into things with a deeper counsell, doubted least Askanina (with whom at that time the Venetian Ensbassador had familiar conversation at Rome) intertained a secret intelligence not only with the Great Captaine, but also with the Venetians, who had bin of late more ready and more bold to offend the French then in times pall, for that the French king, who newly was entred into suspition and distrust of the king of Romaines and his son, seeing after the death of the Queene of Spaine, what would be the greatnesse of the Archduke, for sooke apparantly their amitie, and aided against the Archduke the Duke of Gueldres his sharpe enemy, and inclined to practise particular intelligence, with the king of Spaine.

Death of Cardinall Afkanins.

But as the thoughts of men are deceiptfull, and their hopes full of infirmitie and frailtie, fo, whilest these things were in solicitatio, the Frech king, whose recourry was holde desperate, went dayly growing into health, and Cardinall Askanius died suddenly at Rome of the plague . By whose death albeit the dangers of the estate of Millan were cut off, yet the plots layed to moles the Florentins were not altogether removed : and therefore P. Petrucci, lohn Pawle Baillon, and Bartlemen Aluiano affembled together in the borough of Pregai, vpon the confines of the Perusins & Siennois, not with hope to be strong inough to restore the Medicis into Florence, but wit this intention, that Aluiano entring into Pifa with the wils of the Pifans, should invade (forth furctie of that City) the frontier of the Florentins, with deutle to passe further as occasion would present. These preparations smothered hitherunto, beginning now to burst our into light, the Flo rentins feared much of the dispositio of the Great Captaine, both for that they knew that the time for the which Alusano was entertained in the Spanish pay remained yet till the next Nouember and also for that, they could not believe that P. Petrucci would enter into new enterprises withou his consent: seeing the said Petrucci, neuer satisfying the French king of the sums of money which he promised, and having oftentimes abused him in other properties, depended altogether of th king of Spaine. Belides, the suspition of the Florentins was augmented in this, that (fearingth Lord of Plombin, which was vnder the protection of the Spanish king, to be affayled by the Geno waies) Consaluo had sent to Plombin for his surety a thousand sootmen, under the charge of Nu quo de Campo, & to the River of Plombin three ships, two gallies, with certaine other vessels: which forces brought into a place so nere the Florentins, gaue the great occasion to seare that they wer come to joyne with Almano, as he himselfe assured that they were promised: but the truth was that the king of Spaine, after the truce made with the French king, gave direction (for diminution of the expeces) that aswell the regiment of Aluiano, as the bands of others which had bin limited shold be reduced to a hundred Launces. Whereupo he taking occasio to be grieued, did not onl refuse to bind himselfe eftsoones with new oath, but also maintained that he was acquited of th first, both for that he was not satisfied of his paies passed, & also the Great Captains wold not hol ais promife to giue him after the conquest of Naples, two thousand sootmen to serue his turne against the Florentins in fauour of the Medicis: Lastly the mind of Aluiano was trauelling, naturally defirous of new things, and altogether impatient of tranquility and relt.

The Florentins, for their defence against so violent stormes, had recourse to the French king, who was bound by the capitulations of protection to defend them with four hundred Launces: they fent to him to refurnish them with two hundred, but he, being more caried with couctoufnelle of mony, then with regard to the prayers of his friends, or compassion of his auncient confederates, aunifwered, that he would give them no succours, if first they made him not satisfied of the thirtie thousand duckats which were due to him by the obligation of protection. And albeit he Florentins made many humble requelts and futes, that he would yet temporize and expect a itle, alledging how much they were aggreeued with intollerable expenses necessary for their deence : yet being more carried with conerousnesse, then with reason or indifferency, he perseueed obstinately in his deliberation, in so much as he whom they most suspected, and had most ofended, ministred more to their helpe and safety, then he of whom they seemed to be best assured, ind to whom they had done greatest pleasures, finding least safety where they reposed most con- cofaluo aidesh idence, and greatest perill where they justly expected their protection: for the Great Captaine the Florentine lestring that the tranquility of Italy should not be troubled, either because he would not should be broken the practifes of peace begun of new betweene the two kings, or for that he nourished ome deuise to appropriate to himselfe the kingdome of Naples, vsing the occasion of the death of the Queene, and the feedes of future discord betweene the father in law and the sonne: he ved all diligence to induce Almano to reenter into the pay, and commaunded him as a vaffall and oldier of his king to make no further proceeding (being now gone to Petellano to obey the Popes ommandement to dissolue his companies, or rather to go out of the Church dominions) vpon vaine of deprination of the estates which he had in the kingdome of Naples, bearing a value in rearely revenue of seven thousand duckats: he signified to the Pisans, whom a little before he adfecretly received into the protection of his king, and also to the Lord of Plombin, that they hould not receive him: and he caused to be told and offered to the Florentins, that he was conent they should have the service of his footmen that were within Plombin, whom he ordained to e commanded by M. Anthonio Colonno their Captaine : he fent also to P. Petrucci, that he shold no wife support Aluiano, forbidding to follow him Lewis sonne of the Count Petillano, Francis Orfin and lobnde Cery, who were in his pay. But not with standing all these inhibitions, Aluiano vith whom were lohn Lewis Vitelli, lohn Conrad Orfin, three hundred men at armes, and five undred footmen of good resolution, passed alwayes further though slowly (they of Sienna furnihing him with victuals) he came at last to the coasts of Sienna into the plaine of Scarlina, a towne ubicetto Plombyn, and a litle dayes journey from the frontiers of the Florentins : here came to im a ineffenger exprelly from the Great Captaine, to command him eftloones that he go not to Pila, nor offend the Florentins: to whom he answered, that he stood in his liberty, & had election to do what he list, for that the Great Captaine had not holden promise with him, From thence ie went to lodge neare to Campilla, a towne of the Florentins, where was occupied a light skirnish betweene him and the Florentine bands that were assembled at Bibona: he came asserwards pon the territorie of Corma betweene the confines of the Florentins and Sugeret, but with plots k hopes very vncertaine, finding euery day increase greater difficulties, both for that there came 10 victuals to him from Plombin, and also lohn Pawle Baillon and the Vitelli, who were gouerned according to the trayne and iffue of affaires, failed to refurnish him with fuch bands of footmen as they had promifed the faw in P. Petruccia disposition wandring, and his fauours more doubtfull then before : neither was he affured that the Pifans, for feare to disobey the Great Captaine, wold receive them. For which reasons, joyned to the continual folicitation that was ysed to recover aim, wherein the hope was so much the greater, by how much he refused no more to rest contented with an hundred Launces: he retired to Vigualo, a town eappertaining to the L. of Plombin, giuing out a bruite that he taried there to expect the last resolution from Naples. But the Pisans having in the meane while condifcended to receive him into their towns, he issued out of Vignalo where he had remained ten dayes: and early in the morning on the xvij. of August he appeared with his armic in battell aray a mile beneath Campilla, having an intention to bid battell to the

Florentine army, which was gone to incampe there the day before: but they having advertisment by well affured espials coming fugitive from the Campe of Aluiano, leavied their Camp the same night, & retired under the wals of Campilla, where Aluiano feeing an imboffibility to affaile the but to his great disaduantage, he turned to the way of Tifa, by the tract that draweth to the tower of S. Vincent flue miles from Campilla: and of the other part, the bands of the Florentins led by Hercules Bentinolo, who (by the experience he had of the countrey) defired nothing more then to fight in that place by reason of the opportunity of his seat, tooke the way that goeth from Campilla to the faid tower of S. Vincent, holding it better to adventure the battel in a place fo fauourable by many aduantages, then by temporifing, to make his enemy strong by his proper commodities. Here Hereules seuered the light horsemen into two bands, the one followed the army of Almano, charging alwaies upon histaile and arearegard, & the other went before to affront the enemy, holding the same way by the which the Florentine army came after they being come to the tower before the bands of Aluiano, and being taken up in skirmish with those that came first, by who they were eafily repulsed, retired towards their army or main strength, which was now come within halfe a mile, where bringing tidings that the most part of the enemies had already passed the tower, Hercules marching lightly, arrived iustly vpo their taile hard by the ruines of the tower of S.V meent, where their men at armes and footmen had made head: & when he was in full & abfolute paffage, he charged them tefolutly on the flanke with the moytie of his army, making them bend after he had enterrained the fight a good space of time. In this first assault their sootmen were fo broken and chased even to the sea, that afterwards they never made head: but the horsenier which were withdrawne a bowshot beyond the ditch of the tower of S. Vincent towards Bib. bona, being reaffembled, advanced efficients their Enfignes, and keeping themselves in a close and firong array, charged with great valour the regiments of the Florentins, and with the fami vertue repulsed them even to the ditch: by reason whereof Hercules caused to march on the resi due of his people, and drawing thither from all parts the whole body and strength of the army, the fight became furious there for a good space of time, the victory as yet inclining to no part. Alsuano did in that action both the office of a fouldier and a Captaine, bearing two effockados in hi face, and laboured painfully to drine his enemies from that place, which if he had wonne, he had stood in great possibility of the victory for that he had eitheir turned to him the aduantages that fauoured his enemies, or at least made the place indifferent without respect of partiality, leaving things to the triall of vertue and fortune. But Hercules who many dayes afore had given him selfe assurance, that if the battell were performed in that place, the victory would fall on him with industrie caused to be planted upon the brinke of the tower ditch fixe salconets which he brought with him, with the which he began to batter the Campe, who not able to sustaine the furie of the artillery, began now to shake and fall to disorder. In so much as practising the occa sion with the which he had alwayes promised himselfe the victorie, he set upon them furiously in many places with the whole forces of his army; his light horsemen scowred towards the see çoalts, with his men at armes he occupied the high waies, and his infantery or footmen executed along the playne by the wood, euery one joyning vertue to his fortune, and with a generall in dustrie made the successe of that day happie, for that their fury running through the Camp of the enemies, they put them eafily to the chase, Aluiano saving himselfe with much a do with a very few of his lightest running horses flying with him to Montrorondo in the countrey of Sienna: all the refidue of his people were; almost taken and stripped betweene the tower of S. Vincent and the river of Cecina, having loft all their Enfignes; only such as escaped from the generall calamity of this battell, were a few horsemen, who found more safety in the swiftnesse of their horses, then ir their proper vertue or fortune of the day. This was the end of the commotion or thire of Bartle. mew a' Aluiano, which expressed more apparances and greatnesse by the practises that were made of long time, & by his braue behaujour full of fury and threatnings, then by his forces or any other se stable foundation which his enterprise had : A successe common to such who commit their docoings wholly to fortune, and do reape for the most part the same issue that doth the mariner betace king his fayles to the wind, which drive this ship not whither he would, but whither the wind ce shough her. Hercules Bentiuolo and Anthonio laconino Campe-maister, rising into courage with the felicity of this victory, fignified to the Florentins both by vehement letters & messengers well instructed, that it were goood to joyne action to the oportunity, and approch the walles of Piss.

being carefull afore to furnish with diligence all those things that might be necessarie to take it. They confirmed their deuice with all those sortes of hopes which men in good fortune do vainly weene, not remembrin gthat in fortune there is nothing more certaine, then that in al things she is vincertaine. They hoped, that for that the efface of the Psfans was environed on all fides with creat difficulties, being now more desolate then before for the deprination of the succours of Alwidno, & joyning withall that all things ought to give place to the reputation of conquerers: they thought they should easily cary it: entertaining withall a certaine intelligence with certaine of the townshiren in Psfa. But the Magistrate of the ten, called il Magistrato de diecs, appointed di- The Florentins rector of the matters of warre, calling a counfell with his other Citizens, communicants by cu-debate whether stome in assaires of importance, that deliberation was without consentreproued by general they flould be voyce: for that they confidered that in the Pefans was still recontinued their auncient resolution feedge Pifa. and obstinacie, and that being men of so long time experienced and trained in warre, the name or reputation of the victory which they had had against others, would not be sufficient to vanquish them, their forces being no way diminished by it: rather it stood them upon according to the examples of times pass, to let upon them with a resolute force, which men of warre did onely care. Befides, their counseil was full of apparant difficulties, for that the Citic of Pisa enuironed nwell as any towne in Italy with most firme wals rampired and fortified, and withall defended with bodies active and resolute, could not be forced but with a great & puissant army compounled ypon fouldiers not inferiour to the Psfans in valour, which yet would not be fufficient to cary * t by affault or short siege: and therefore more necessary to encampe in the places about it for ma-1y daics, to the end to approch it with more furety. fearthing out aduantages, and rather tiring & wearying them, then to suppresse them by force or violence: That that the reason wherein they were was contrary to those things, not being able suddenly to erect an army of sootmen, of other podies then fuch as should be leauied in halt: and much lesse to approch it with any intention to nake long aboade there, both for the inclemency of the ayre corrupted with the winds of the fea, which being become pelliferous through the vapours of the pooles and marishes, were harmfull o armies, as was well experienced when Pawle Vitelli encamped there: And also forthat the ountrey of Pia beginneth from the moneth of September to be subcetto raines, which, by reaon of the basenesse or lownesse of the place, do so overdowne it, that it takes away all oportuniies for an army to remaine there: That in fuch an universall obstinacy there could be no assured oundation reposed in practises or private intelligences, for that such things being for the most part ither diffembled or suborned, or at least managed by persons vnable to execute that they pronife, bring with them fo many imperfections, that the fruite of the expectation will not answere he time that is taken to entertaine them. Befides, notwithstanding there had bene no publike aith giuen to the Great Captaine, yet Prosper Colonno (but of himselfe) almost under their secret onfent, had fignified and promifed, that for that yeare there shold be made no approch with arillerie to the walles of Pifa. In which regard they ought to hold for certaine, that aswell for that lifdaine, and for the promifes he had many times made to the Pifans, as also for that this uccesse of the Florentines was nothing profitable for his affaires, he would oppose himselfe gainst this enterprise: A matter verie easie for him to do, for that he might in few houres put nto Ps/athe Spanish bands of footemen which were at Plombin, as he had often times affured hem to do when soeuer there was preparation to besiege them: That it were better to vie the occasion of the victorie, there, where albeit the profit were lesse, yet things without all compaison should be found of farre more easie action, and yet not without a notable profite: That there was not one that had more opposed, nor did more continually resist their enterprises: not one that had more hindred the recouerie of Ps/a, nor more procured to chaunge the preent gouernement then Pandolfe Petrucci: That he had stirred vp Duke Valentinoss, to enter n armes upon their lands: That he had beene the principall author and guide of the enterprise of Unellozze, and of the rebellion of Aretze: That by his counfell and soliciation, the Genomates and Lucquois were loyned with the estate of Sienna to Support the Pisans: That it was he that had induced Confaluo to take the protection of Plombin, to intermeddle with the affaires of Pifa, and to make intrusion into the matters of Tuskane. To be short, that there was none other that had bene author or fauourer of this burfling out of Alutano: That it was against him that they ought to turne their army, and to pill and ouerrunne all the countrey of Sienna, where would be no resistance: That by the reputation of their armies, there might happen against him some commotion in the City, wherein he had already many enemies: at the least that they were not to want occasion to occupie any place of importance in that countrey, which they might hold in counterchaunge, or as a pawne to have againe Montpulcian: wherein they hoped by this reuenge to do that which hitherto could not be accomplished with benefits and pleasures, that Pandolfe hereaster should not be so ready to offend them: That afterwards in the same manner, they should make incursions into the countreys of Lucquois, being verie harmefull to leave them so long expected: Lastly, that by these meanes there was hopeto draw some honour and profite of the victorie gotten, where if they went to besiege Pisa, there was to be reaped no other thing then expences and dishonour. These reasons, albeit they were alleaged with common accord, yet did they nothing abate the defire of the people (which for the most part runneth more guided by will then by reason) crying to plant the Campe afore Pifa, and being blinded with a lealous opinion they had taken of long time, that the recovering of Ps/a was now hit pleasing to many of the principall Citizens for manie ambitious respects. In this sentence Peter Soderin Gonfalonier being no lesse cold then the residue, calling a great councell of the people, with whom they had not bene accustomed to communicate in matters of that nature, asked if they were of opinion that the Camp should go afore Pifa; whereunto enery one answering affirmatively, wildome was furmounted with rashnesse, the authority of the better for giuing place to the will of the greater part. And therefore there were present directions to make prouisions with a celerity incredible, every one having defire to prevent no lesse the expecter fuccours of the Great Captaine, then the daungers of the rainie feafons, in so much as the fix day of September the army approched the walles of Psfa with fixe hundred men at armes, feuer thousand footemen, and fixteene Canons, with many other Artilleries of execution, the Camp being pitched betweene Santa Croce and San Michele, in the felfe same place wherein th Frenchmen had encamped before. And as the artilleries were fuddenly planted in the night, f they battered the day following in great fury, all that was betweene the gate di Calci and th turret of S. Francis, where the walles make within, an angle: and having from the funne rifin (when the artillery beganne to play) till the xxj. hower, brought to the catth more then thirti fadomes of wall, there was entertained where the ruine was most, a hot skirmish, but to very lit profit, for that there was not throwne downe fo great a quantity & space of wall as had bene ne ceffary, in a towne where the men prefented themselues to the defence with their auncient valor and hardinesse: therefore the morning following, to the end to make a greater opening of the wall, they beganne another batterie in a place a little removed (that place of the wall which afore times had bene battered by the French, remaining betweene the one and other batterie) and after they had cast downe so much of the wall, as was thought sufficient, Hercules sought to aduance the footebands which were in battell to give a rough affault both to the one and other breach where the Pisans trauelling according to their customes, the woman no lesse venterous the the men resolute, had during the batterie drawne a rampier with a ditch afore. But there we not in the Italian footebands which had bene leavied in haft, neither that action nor that spirit that was to force such a resistance: for that Ensigne of footmen to whom by lot appertaine the first assault, beginning to refuse through cowardise to go to the walles, neither the av thority of the Captaine, nor presence of the Superintendent of Florence, neither the regar of their proper honour, nor the honour common of the men of service of Italie, were suffi cient to vanquish their feare, nor to shew valour in an action so much importing: The example of whom, finding imitation and place in the refidue that should have followed them, all the regiments retired to their lodgings, having done no other thingthen (by leaving the infan terie of Italie infamous through all Europe) defiling the felicity of the victory obtained again Alniano, and defaced the reputation of the Captaine and Campe-maifter, which was gree on the behalfe of the Florentines, if, content with the glorie they had gotten, they could have moderated their proper fortune. When the fouldiers were once retired to their lodgings, there was made no more doubt to leauie the Campe, chiefly for that the fame day fixe hundre Spanish footenen of those that were at Plombin were entred Pisa, by direction from the Great Captaine: So that the day following the Florentine armie retired to Calcina, drawin

vith them more dilhonour then either praise or profit, prouing in themselues that auncient tralition of the elders, that follie and rathnesse have no societie with wildom, nor fortune or aduenure any communitie with good counfell, fince all those things are referred to a doubtfull issue, hat are done by will and not by reason. Within few dayes after, there entred into Pisa fifteene jundred Spanish footmen, who, because the service had no necessitie of them, after they had in vaine given an affault to the towne of Bientina at the incitation of the Pifans, continued their rauigation in Spaine, whither they were fent by the Great Captaine, for that the peace was aleady established betweene the French king, and Ferdinand king of Spaine, to the which (all diffisulties that early hindred it, being now remoued, as both the regard of the honour of the French sing, and the feare to make the Archduke his enemy) the death of the Queene of Spaine had iven perfection: for that both the French king, enuying much such a greatnesse of the Archluke, desired to disappoint his purposes: and also the king of Spanne, being advertised that he Archduke disdaining the last will of his mother in law, had determined to take from him the gouernment of the kingdome of Castile, was constrained to make his stay vpon new alliances. or this cause the mariage was agreed vpon betweene him and Lady Germana de Foix, sisters laughter to the French king, with condition that the king should give her in dowry that part of he kingdome of Naples that appertained to him, the king of Spaine binding himselfe to pay him within ten yeares feuen hundred thousand duckats in recompence of expences, and to indue the new maried Lady with three hundred thousand duckats. This mariage being ratified and accompanied with the peace, it was agreed that the Barons of the faction of Amon, & all fuch as had folowed the French part, should be restored without any payment into their liberty, countrie, flates, dignities, and goods, and reeftablished in the same condition and degree that they were peace between n the day that the warres beganne betweene the French and Spanish, which they accompt to the French king be the day that the Frenchmen ranne to Tripaldo: That all confiscations made by the king of and king of Spaine, and by king Federike, should be holden for cancelled and voide: That the Prince of Spaine. Roffina, the Marquis of Bitonto and of Gefualdo , Alphonfo and Honorio of S. Seuerin, with all he other Barons which were prisoners to the Spanish in the kingdome of Naples, should be dejucred: That the French king shold no more intitle himselfe king of lerusalem and Naples: That he homages and fealties of the Barons should be made according to the conventions aforesayd, ind that in the fame manner the inuestiture should be damaunded of the Pope : That in case the Queene Germana should die in mariage without issue, her part of downie should be transferred o Ferdinand, but if he died fielt, it should revert to the Crowne of Fraunce: That king Ferdirand should be bound to aide Gaston Earle of Form and brother to his new wife, to conquere he kingdome of Nauarre, which he pretended to appertaine to him, and which was possessed with a title toyall by Katherne de Foix, and by lohn her husband, son to Monsieur d'Albert: That he French king should constraine the widdow of king Federike, with her two children that were with him, to go into Spaine, where should be assigned to her a competent portion to liue: And if he refused to depart, then the king should commaund her to issue out of his realme without macing any further allowance to her or to her children by way of pension, or other meane to releeue them: That neither one of the parties shold enterprise any thing, against those whom any of them hould name; and they named joyntly in Italy the Pope, and the French king apart named the Florentins: That for strengthning of this peace, there was meant to be made betweene the two kings perpetuall confederation for the defence of their estates, whereunto the king should be bound with a thousand Launces, and fixe thousand sootemen: and Ferdinand with three hundred Launces, two thousand lenmtairs, and fixe thousand footmen. After the peace was made and published, wherin the king of England promised observation for both the parties, the Barons of Anion who were in Fraunce, having taken their leave of the king, went almost all with the Queene lermana into Spaine, the king ving towards them at their departure a very small gratulation of their feruices past. Isabel! the widow of Federike having her leave, went to Ferrara resusing to put her children into the power of the Catholike king. In this towne of Ferrara (Alphonfo the sonne of Hercules being now succeeded in the Dukedome) there hapned vpon the end of the yeare, a strange and tragical accident: such one as had some similitude with the barbarous actions of the auncient Thebanes, but for far more light occasions, if the vnbridled fury of loue be lesse, then the burning ambition and defire to raigne. The Cardinall Hipolito a Efte, louing feruently

a yong maydhis kinswoman, who for her part was no lesse amarous of Don Inlio naturall brother to the Cardinall, and consessing her felse to the Cardinall, that that which aboue all other things made so vehement her affection to his brother, was, the sweete aspect and beauty of his eyes:

"Loue is a Lord of the world, and aboue all naturall impressions hath a tyranicall subjection ouer the creatures whom he possessing in the Cardinall enuying the community of his brother, turned his loue into icalous sury, and setting espiall ouer Don Inlio when he should go out of the towne on hunting, set ypon him in the field with a crew of tormentors prepared to mischiese, whose violent hands the Cardinall in his owne presence, suffered to thrust out the eyes of his brother, for that they were the companions of his loue: an action no lesse infamous to the Cardinall, then intollerable to all humanitie, and which afterwards trained with it many occasions of seditious and civil quartels between the brethren. Such was the end of the yeare a thousand fine hundred and fine.

HESE were the accidents of the yeare a thousand fiue hudred & fiue which albeit left apparant hopes that the tranquility of Italy woldre continue (the warres for the quarrell of Naples being now quenched yet (such is the mutability of worldly affaires) there began to appear in other places, seedes of new innovations and challenges tending to many civill calamities: for Philip, which now tooke ypon him the till of king of Castillo, and was no lesse discontented that such a king dome was governed by his father in law, inclined to the incitation of many Barons, and prepared himselfe to passe into Spaine against himselfe to passe into S

will, pretending, as the truth was, that the late Queene had no power either to dispose or to prescribe lawes, or to bequeath the government of the kingdome after he death. The king of Romains also taking stomack by the greatnesse of his son, solicited to passe interly. And lastly the Frech king, albeit the yere before he was much discotented with the Pope, so that he had disposed & inducted the benefices which were void by the death of Cardinal Askanim & others, in the Duchy of Millan, without his participatio: and for that also in the creatio of other Cardinals, he had refused to call the Bishop of Achx nephew to the Cardinal of Amboise, & the Bishop of Baieux nephew to Monsseur Trimouille, being earnestly solicited by the king, whe in those regards had caused to sequester the fruits of the benefices which the Cardinal S.P. ad vinela & others of the Popes amity, possessed in the estate of Millan; yet the king on the other side, holding both suspected and seared the greatnesse of Casar and his son, judged it necessary nourish nourish occasions of reuenge, but to reenter into reconcilement with the Pope, to whom after he had releafed all the fequestrations, he fent in the beginning of this yeare the Bishop of Sisteron the Apollolicall Nuncio, to negociate with him many plots and offers against the Venetians, to whom he knew the Pope could not but continue to beare an ill will, with a hatred redoubled, for the defire hee hadto recouer the townes of Romania: an humour which the Pope did so much the more diffemble, by how much untill that day he had proceeded in all things fo tractable and refrective, that every one tooke occasion to marvell greatly, that he, who in his estate of Cardinall had bene alway full of immoderate and aspiring thoughtes, and who in the time of Popes Siftus, Innocent, and Alexander, had bene many times the instrument to trouble Italie, expressed now that he wasbecome Pope (an estate for the most part administred with ambition and troublesome imaginations) to be more easie and abated in courage, then did well beare the ambicious profession which he had alwayes made to the contrarie, not making any shew or demonstration to remember old injuries, or to feeme to be like to himfelfe: So dangerous is diffimulation in the Diffimulation perfons of great men, whose authoritie and place shadowing their dispositions, defendes all verie dangethings from blame, though they have nothing vnworthy of reprehension. For the intentions of rous in the the Pope were farre other wayes, then agreed with the propertie of his actions, for that having a great mem, letermination to furniount the former opinion that was had of him, and to do more then was a pected, turned all his wits, deuises, and labours, (contrarie to the custome of his auncient magnanimitie) to heape up a wonderfull maffe of treafure, to the end that to the will he had to kindle the watre, might be joyned also the meane and power to sustaine it. And finding in that time, that he was furnished with sufficient treasures and money, he began euen then to discouer his thoughts, is in the state of teard with a gladneffe agreable to the nature of his defire, was difpatched and fent backe againe with diligence, to folicite betweene them a new reunion and amitic: wherein the better to difpose the minde of the king and the Cardinall d'Amboise, hee promised by writ which the sayd Vuncio caried with him, the dignitie of the Cardinallto the Billiops of Ache and Bayeux, forcetting nothing that he thought might further the effect of those ambitions which he had noutihed with fo great care and trauell of minde. And yet not with standing in so great a heate and veremencie of forwardnesse, he entred oftentimes into many doubts and difficulties, for that either or a certaine hate he had conceiued against the French king at such time as he sledinto Fraunce, schewing the ambushes of Pope Alexander, or for that it much discontented him to be drawen s it were by compulsion by the power and importunitie of the French king, to transferre to the Cardinall of Amboile, the legation of the kingdome of Fraunce: or lastly, for that he suspected cast the said Cardinall (whose behaujours tended directly to the Popedome) not having patience o tarie for his death, would not feeke to aspire to his place by wayes sinister & extraordinarie. In egard of which impressions (more troublesome for the suttletie of the man, then that there was eason he should feare so farre) made him oftetimes wander in disposition, determining not wholy to joyne with the French king, and yet without his conjunction, he knew it was impossible that t that time any thing of consequence should succeede with him. For which reasons he sent (on he other side) to Psfa, Baltasar Blasquo a Genoway, Captaine of his Galleis, with commission to tme two light Galleis which Pope Alexander had caused to build there: but it was thought hat it was to this end, to be more ready to deliuer Genes from the gouernement of the French, in afe the king who yet remained vexed with reliques of his difeafe, should happen to dye. Thus matters hanging in such an estate of suspence, the first action of this yeare 1506. be-

By reason of which accord, his father in law, not withstanding he was not affured of the obcruation, fent him into Flaunders many thips to furnish his voyage: with the which, having embarked his wife and Ferdinand his second some, hee tooke his course into Spayne with forward winds, which, within two dayes turning cleane contrarie, after his nauie had run a dangerous fortune, and made a wearie refiltance against the furie of the sea, his ships were cast vpon sundre coasts of England and Brittaine, his owne person with two or three ships being driven with manifelt perill ypon England into the hauen of Southhampton: whereof Henry the feuenth then king of that Nation being aduertised, sent to him with speed many Barons to do him honor, and defire him to come to his Court, then at London: a request which Philip could not deny, the king of Englands demanned being no lesie honorable, then his owne estate full of necessitie and nakednesse. He remained in the Court of England, vntill all his Nauie was reaffembled and eftioones rigged, making in the meane while betweene them new capitulations: wherein albeit Philip in all other things held him felfevied as a king, yet in this one thing he complained, that he was constrained as a priloner, to confent to redeliuer into king Henries handes the Duke of Suffolke, whom he held prisoner within the Castle of Namur, and whom the king of England desired much to have in his power, for that he quarelled the title of the Crowne, pretending the right of the kingdome to appertaine to him: onely the king of England affured Philip by the faith and word of a king, that he would not put him to death, which he did as inftly performe as he had honorably promifed, keeping him in prison so long as he lived, and afterwards was beheaded under the raigne and comandement of his fon. King Philip failed afterwards with a more happie nauigation into Spaine, where almost all the Barons flocked to him, bringing in their countenances apparant signes of gratulation and gladnesse of his comming, and in their minds assured resolution to aduaunce him. Insomuch as his father in law, who was not frong enough of himselfe to refist him, and lesse confidence that in the French promifes was any furetie of foundation, feeing himselfe almost abandoned of every one, and the articles of the first accord disallowed, and finding withall a verie hard and painfull accesse to his sonne in law, was constrained to agree to new conditions, such as were offered to him, nothing respecting the former: wherein not with standing they proceeded not rigorously for the good nature of Philip, but much more for the perswasions of those which had shewed themfelues great enemies to Ferdinand: for that being in continuall doubt, that by his wifedome and authoritie, together with the facilitie of Philips disposition, he would not get better fauor, and in the end winne gouernment with his sonne, they solicited as much as they could his departing out of Castillo. It was accorded, that Ferdinand should give over the government which his wife had left to him by tellament, together with all that he could pretend in that right : and that he should speedily depart out of Castello, with promise to returne no more: That Ferdinand should possesse the kingdome of Naples as his owne, not with standing there were that alleaged that it appertained to Philip, for that it was conquered with the armes and power of the kingdome of Castillo: which was the fame reason (and haply more inst) by the which Ferdinand was wont to pretend the saic realme to appertaine to him, as being wonne by the treasures and forces of the state of Aragon. The tributes of the Isles of India were referued to him during his life, together with the three great Maisterships of S. James, Alcantara, and Calatrana. It was also agreed, that he should take every weare xxv.thouland duckats of the reuenues of the realme of Castillo. As soone as this contract was resolued and passed to publication, Ferdinand, whom hereafter we will call either the king Catholike, or the king of Aragon, went forthwith into Aragon, with intention to passe by seato Naples with all the diligence he might, not so much for the defire he had to see that kingdome, and to reestablish it, as to remove the Great Captaine, against whom fince the death of the Queene, he had conceiued many suspitions, either that he aspired to transferre to himselfe the kingdome, or at least that he had inclinations to give it rather to Philip then to him: So icalous is the condition of imperie and dignitie, that against those for the most part is most possibilitie of suspition, whose vertue The condition hath best descrued in confidence and fidelitie. But by so much lesse had the king of Aragon occafion to repose in him, by how much more he had found him alwayes intractable to leave Naples, from whence as he had often fummoned him in vaine to returne into Spaine (which he excused & delayed, alleaging many impedimets,) so he seared that if he went not thither in person he should not easily remous him from the government, notwithstanding fince the last contract, king Philip had charged him to transferre wholly hereafter all his obedience to the king of Aragon. In this time the French king, beginning to rife somewhat into health, was trauelled with many, of imperie and dignitie icalows .

> diuerse and contrarie thoughts: for, both he was discontented with the Venetians, disdaining them fince the times of the warre of Naples, for the defire he had to recouer that which was of the an cient apertenances of the Duchie of Millan, & for an opinion that through diverse accidents, their Imaginations power and greatneffe might fometimes hurt him; the which, among other respects, had induced of the French him to make confederation with the king of Romains and Philip his forme: and on the other part, king. the descending of the king of Romains into Italy, was nothing agreable to him, knowing that he prepared to furnish his journey with very strong forces: a matter which he feared more then afore, for the power which he might put to king Philip (fucceffor to fuch a greatnesse) specially being in doubt that whilest he was in England, he did not contract with the king there certaine new and Itraite alliances: and for that also one of the principall occasions for the which he had entred confederation with them, was ceasied and cut off by the peace made with the king Catholike by rea-Son of the which he had diffolued and left there all his thoughts & impressions touching the kingdome of Naples. But whilest he stood wavering in this varietie and incertaintie of mind, the Embaffadours of the Emperour Maximilian came to fignifie to him their mailters deliberation to paffe into Italy, and to fummon him to give order for the five hundred launces which he had promifed to furnish in his fauour, and to performe the refidue of his word touching the restoring of the banished men from the estate of Millan, and to put him in remembrance lastly to advance payment of the money which should be due to him within few moneths. To these demaundes albeit the French king had no great will to condificend, yet he made semblant of the contrarie, neterthelesse onely for the regard of such as for that time required but words, expressing how much ne defired that the articles of accord should be executed, offering for his part in due season a ready accomplishment of all things he was bound unto: only he refused with many excuses to aduaunce he money. On the other part; the Emperour reposing also as litle in the will of the French king, is he did in his, and desiring vehemently to passe to Rome, chiefly to take the crowne Imperiall, & o chuse afterwards his sonne king of Romains, studied in the same time by what other meanes he night archieue the effect of his expectations. Therefore both he folicited the Swiffers to knit with im, who, after many counfels and disputes among themselves, determined to observe the alliance which yet remained two yeares, with the French king: & also he demanded passage of the Veneians through their lands, who being loath for their own particular to graunt him paffage with an rmie so mighty, (the offers also of the Frech king inciting them ioyne with him to let his passage) ooke courage to answere him in termes generall: and the French king, shewing himselfe openly stranged from the confederation made with him & with Philip, gaue in mariage the Lady Clauda is daughter, to Frauncis Lord of Angulesme, to whom belonged the succession of the Crowne feer his death without iffue male: he made as though he had bene drawen to that action, by the raportunities of his fubiects, hauing aforehand ordained for that effect, that all the Courts of Pariament and principall townes of his kingdome, thould fend Embassadours to beseech him as in a natter most profitable to the Realme, fince the hope to have iffue male diminished in him daily nore & more. This he fignified with speed to king Philip by expresse Embassadours, excusing him elfe that he had no power to refilt fo great a defire of his whole Realme & comunitie of his fubectes. Befides thefe, he had fent bands of men to the fuccours of the Duke of Gueldres, to turne Maximilian fro passing into Italy, who of himself had left & given over those cogitations: for that nderstanding that Launcelot king of Hungary was very sicke, he drew neare the confines of that ingdome according to an ancient defire of his father, to make himself king, for the right which he reteded to it: for Launcelot, otherwise called Ladislao, king of Hungaria and of Boheme, sonne of Albert, which was brother to the Emperour Federske, dying many yeares before without fonnes, he peoples of Hungaria, who pretended that their king dying without heire masculine, the sucreffion of the next in bloud could have no place, had chosen for their king (having regard to the nerites & vertues of his father) Matthias, he who afterwards to the great reputation & glorie of o litle a kingdome, vexed oftentimes the mightie Empire of the Turkes: he, to avoyde in the bezinning of his reigne, warre with Federike, agreed with him to take no wife, to the end that after is death the kingdome might divolve to Federike or to his children: which albeit he did not oberue, yet he dyed without issue, and for all that Federske had not the accomplishment of his defire, for that the Hungarians chose of new for their king, Launcelot king of Polonia, by occasion whereof, new warres being eftsoones raised against them by Federike and Maximilian, they agreed at last (the Barons of the kingdome taking a solemne oath) that whensoeuer Launcelot should dye without iffue, they should receive Maximilian for their king. In so much as he then aspiring to this succession, after he was advertised of the infirmitie of Launcelot, he drew neare to the borders of Hungaria, leaving behind him for that time all his thoughts for Italy.

The Pope dewifeth to win agayne Bolognia.

But whileft those things were debated betweene the Princes of beyond the Mounts with so great diverfitie, the Pope, knowing that without the aydes of the French king he could not molest the Venetians, and having lesse patiece that the yeares of his Pontificacie should so passe away & consume without profite or honour, prayed the French king to helpe lim to recouer to the obedience of the Church, the Cities of Bolognia and Perousa, which belonging of antiquitie to the Sea Apostolike, were now tyrannized, the one by lohn Paule Baillon, and the other by lohn Bentsuole, whose predecessours in the times of civill warres, rising from private Citizens to be chiefe of a faction, after they had chased or slaine all their aduersaries, were not onely become abfolute Lords of the Cities, but also stood not restrained by any other thing to take the title of lawfull Princes, then for the regard which they had to the Popes, who in the one and the other Citie retained somewhat more then the simple name of Lordship, for that they tooke a certaine part of the reuenues, albeit very litle, and ordained gouernours in the name of the Church, who ferued rather as shadowes and apparances, then to rule or commaund (the power and deliberation of all things of importance relting in the authoritie of others:) but the towne of Perousa, either for her more nearenesse to the Citie of Rome, or for other occasions, was longer time entertained in the obedience of the Church then Bolognia: for that Citie did oftentimes change in the aduerfities of Popes, sometimes being gouerned in libertie, sometimes oppressed by the Citizens, sometimes running to the obedience of strange Princes, somtimes reduced to the absolute subjection of Popes, & lastly returning in the time of Pope Nicholas the fift, under the rule of the Church, but with limitations certaine, and fuch communion of authoritie betweene the Pope and them, that with tract of time the name and demonstration of things remaining onely to the Popes, the effect and fubstance of the pollicy and government rested wholly in the power of the Bentinoless of whom, Iohn Bentinole who commanded for the present, having by litle and litle drawen all things to him, and embased those mightie families which had bene contrarie to his elders and him in the first stablishing of his tyrannie: and being also grieuous for the insolencies and intollerable expences which his foure fonnes made, (an occasion making him hatefull almost to every one) ruled now more by crueltie and armes, then with elemencic and affabilitie, leaving very litle place to equitie and innocencie. But the Pope was most of all pushed forward to this enterprise, by a burning humour and defire of glorie, wherein he had determined (albeit under the shadow of pietie and zeale to religion) to reconquer to the fea Apostolike, all those places, of what nature socuer, that had bene viurped vpon the Church. And in this inclination to vie the fword hee had a particular motion to recouer Bologma, for a hatred newly kindled against John Bentiuole, for that in the times of his adversities when he durst not remaine at Rome, and seeking safetie in Cento a towne of his Bilhoprike in Bolognia, he was driven to steale away by night, hearing a bruite published at randon, that there was a resolution to apprehend him prisoner at the instance of Pope Ale-Malice is in. " xander: So infinite is malice in her operations, that what heart she hath once embraced, she finite in her " neuer ceasieth to ouercarie by degrees, till a revenge be executed, and that for the most part in a qualitie farre aboue the nature and merite of the offence. And (as was well expressed in the humours of this Pope) malice in wife men hath no fuddeine apparance, but rifing with their greatnesse of place and calling, into more furie and rage, the blow comes so much the more redoubled, by how much the matter hath bene nourished with tract of time, not fayling to execute asfoone as oportunitie doth offer. This request of the Pope wasto the good liking of the king, who tooke it for an apt occasion to keepe him in his amitie: for knowing how much it did prejudice his affaires, that the Pope had alliance with the Venetians, hee began to grow into feares that he would fuddenly reuolt, holding him also in suspition to have communitie in a certaine practise which Octavian Fregoso had made to deprive him of the iurisdiction of Genes. Besides, hee esteemed Bentinole (albeit he was vnder his protection) more inclined to Cafar then to him . To thefe doubts hee adioyned also the disdaine which he had against John Paule Baillon, for that he had refused (not with standing he was possessed of the source thousand duckats) to go and joyne with his army being upon the river of Garillan, together with his defire to offend Pandolfe Peerucci, under an occasio to fend men into Tuskane, for that he had both failed to pay him the money he had promifed, and also had wholly followed the fortune of the Spaniards. So that he made ready offers to the Pope to aide him, and the Pope for his part, gaue him the writs of election to Cardinals for the Bishops of Achx and Bayenx, with power to dispose of the benefices in the Duchy of Millan in the same fulnesse that Lodowyke Sforce had vsed before. These practises being resolued and concluded by the solicitation of the Bishop of Sisteron newly endued with the Archbishoprike of Achx, the only and immediate interposer betweene them, yet the execution was not fo ready, for that as the Pope deferred for certaine moneths to put the enterprise to action, so it hapned in that meane while that Maximilian, who having begun the warre against the king of Hungary, had estraunged his thoughts from Italy, made now a new peace with him, renewing the accord touching the succession, and returned into Austria, making signes and preparations as though he would eftfoons passe into Italy: and desiring that the Venetians should nor oppose against his intention, he dispatched soure Embassadours to aduertise that state, that he was determined to go to Rome to take the imperial Crowne, desiring them to give him liberty of paffage together with his armiethe affured them to march through their regions without grieuing them or theirs in any fort: and defired, by protestation, to be vnited with that common weale, wherein the meane might eafily be found, not only with furety, but also with augmentation and exaltation of both the parties, couertly inducing under this perfwasion, that it wold make for their common profite to conspire together against the French king. The Venetians, after they had long debated in counfell, returned a very gracious answer, expressing how much their coinmo weale defired to be conformable to his will, & to fatisfie his requests in all things which they might without their proper prejudice, which in that case could not be neither greater nor more euident, for that the regions of Italy being made desperate by so many calamities which they haue suffered were drawne into an universall mutinie at the only brute of his descending with so mightie an armie, standing generally resolued to take armes to cut off occasions & oportunities of new troubles, and that the French king was to do the like for the furetic of the estate of Millan: that by that meane, his comming into Italy with an army displayed, was no other thing the to give occasion to the communalties of Italy to leavie armes to make mightie refishance against him: an action of no litle importance and danger against them, for that if they should conent to his patting, all the Potentates and powers of Italy, together with the French king, would udge of them none otherwise, then of fuch as had not esteemed of the common benefite in repect of their proper interests: That it wold be more affured for all, and in the end most honoriaole for him, comming to an act pacificable & agreeable to euerie one, to paffe disarmed into Italy, where the imperial Maiestie shewing himselfe no lesse gracious and assable, then mightie and errible, should find an universall fauour with all regions, peoples, and communalties: That hee hould(to his perpetuall glorie) beare the honorable reputation to be the protector of the tranquility of Italy, proceeding to his coronation in the same forme which his father and many his renowmed predeceffors observed afore him, in which course they were, and would vie to him, all hose oblations, observances, and offices which he could defire.

These apparances of armes and other things practifed by Casar, were the causes that the Pope esolved fully to execute the enterprise of Bolognia, and had sent to summon the French king to is promife, was friendly aduised by the king to have regard to the estate & disposition of things, ind confidering well of the nature of times, to deferre the action of the enterprise to another seaon, least the vitimely breaking out of fuch an accident did not onely bring all Italie into comnotion, but proue prejudicial even against his proper intentios: for that he feared least in this action he shold kindle against him the minds of the Venetians, who had already signified to him that hey were resolved to take armes for the defence of Bolognia, if the Pope wold not first indue the with the graunt of those patronages and rights of Faenza which appetrained to the Church. But the Pope, who of nature was impatient and fodaine, fought out still all the means he could, by the which (notwithstanding all difficulties and impediments) he might aspire to that he defired: wherein he proceeded with moods furious and violent, calling together into the Confiforic all the Cardinals, afore whom deducing in forme of a languishing complaint, how infly he was touched with desire to deliuer from the hands of tyrants the Cities of Bolognia and Perousa, The Pore will members so much importing the Sea Apostolike, he signified that he would assist the enterprise goingerson to in petson: he assured them, that besides his owne forces, he should be aided by the French king, the enterprise by the Florentines, and many other Potentates of Italie, and that God that was perpetuallic of Bolognia.

huft, would neuer leave abandoned fuch as with fo holy intentions fought to reestablish and restore the Church, Assoone as this deliberation was published in Fraunce, it seemed such a matter to be laughed at to the king, that the Pope should promise himselse a succour of his people without intelligence or community with him, that making it a iesting talke at his table, and imposing withall vpon the Pope his notorious drunkennesse, he said it could not be but the Pope was well bewitched with wine : not discerning as yet that that sodaine deliberation did constraine him, either to come to manifelt controuerfic with him, or elfero giue him of his men against his will. But the Pope not expecting anie other resolution, issued out of Rome with fine hundred men at armes, and fending afore Anthonie dal Monte to fignifie his comming to the Bolognois, with direction to commaund them to make prouision to receive him, and to bestow in the countrie five hundred French Launces. He matched flowlie, having determined not to passe Perousa, tillhe were well affured whether the French bands would come to his fuccours, forefeeing now those inconveniences which the immoderation of his mind would not afore suffer him to discerne in his heate and furie, Jehn Paule Baillon occupied with no small feares of his comming, by the counsell of the Duke of Vrbin & other his friends, & under their assurance went to meet the Pope at Ornietto, who received him into grace and favour, after he had wholly submitted himselfe to his discretion, with promise to follow him in person with an hundred and fiftie men at armes, and also to render vp into his hands the fortresses of Peronsa and Peronsin, and the guard of the City, giuing for observation his two sonnes in hostage to the Duke of Vrbin. Vnder this composition the Pope entred without any strength into Peroufa, being in the full power of John Paule Baillon to make him prisoner with all his court and traine, if he would have made sound throughout the world in a matter of fuch greatnesse & waight, that disloyalty, which had already made his name infamous in things more inferiour and of farre meaner qualitie. At Perousa the Pope gaue audience to the Cardinall of Narbona, fent to him from the French king, to perswade him to put ouer and deferre the enterprise till another time, and to protest the kings excuses, in that (contrary to his defire) he could not fend him men, for that, by the confiderations for Cafar, and the great suspitions he had of his doings, it was not convenient for him to leave disarmed the Duchie of Millin. This Embaffage albeit it stirred up in the Pope many shewes of perplexities and alterations, yet his wisdome held his affections suppressed, and making no apparance that he had any inclination or will to chaunge aduile, he began to leauie new bands of footmen, and reincrease all his prouisions. And yet many beleeued, that what by the difficulties that appeared, & the eafineffe of his nature to be appealed upon yeelding or submission, if Bentinole, who offered by his Embassadors to send in his foure sons, had disposed himselfe to come to him in person, according to the example of lohn Paule, he had found some tollerable forme for his affaires: but whilest he fpent time in tempotizing (the aspect & estate of his businesse making him irresolute) or, as some fay, whilefthe was holden in suspence by the cotradiction of his wife, he had aduertisement that M.de Chaumor had received directio fro the French king to go to the succors of the Pope in perfon with fine hudred Launces: an aide which albeit the king (in the absence of the Cardinall Amboy/e) had no inclination to fend him, yet the Cardinal returning to the Court, yied perswasios to hold the king firme in his promise, having not only made voluntarie offers in the beginning, but also by many degrees fince, had as it were viged the Pope to viethe feruice of his men. The Cardinal had power to make the king to change aduite, wherunto he was fo much the more cafily induced by how much the demôltrations of Maximilia began now to waxe cold according to his custom, & the Pope also (somwhat to leauethe king satisfied) was cotent to make promise, not by writing, but in the mouth of his holinesse & honor, that he would not molest the Venerias for the townes of Romania: & yet notwithstading the Pope, not able to abstain fro disclosing what a fetled defire he bare that way, going fro Perousa to Cesena, he took the way of the mountain: for that if he had marched along the plaine, he shold have bin costrained to passe vpo the lands of Rimini. which the Venetias held. Affoon as he was come to Cefena, he admonished Berinole to depart fro Bolognia vnder most grieuous cesures & paines spirituall & teporall, stretching the our against al fuch as shold hold any couerfation or cofederacy with him. And receiving intelligece in this place that M.de Chaumont marched with fixe hundred Launces & three thousand footmen, all paid of the Church treasures, he took courage, & recotinued his way without deferring. And turning fro the wayes & territories of Faenza for the same respects he refused Rimini, he took the way of the mountaine, not with standing it was trouble some & ful of incommodities: & so drawing along he townes which the Florentines possessed beyond the Appenin, he went to I mola, where his armie affembled: wherein, befides many bands of footmen which he had leauied, were foure hundred men at armes in his pay, an hundred and fiftie led by Iohn Paule Baillon, an hundred lent by he Florentines under the guide of M. An. Colonno, an hundred lent by the Duke of Ferrara, many bands of Elfradiots leavied in the kingdome of Naples, and two hundred light horsemen prought thither by the Marquisse of Mantua, deputie Lieutenant of the armie. At Bolognia on the other fide, Bentuole and his factio omitted no preparation that might respect their surety, nor orbare to armeall those bodies which they esteemed to carie ability to their defence, hoping that fthey were not defended, at the least they should not be offended by the French: for that the king peing called vpon to aide them, according to the contract of protection, had answered, that albethe could not with armes oppose against the enterprise of the Pope, yet he would forbeare to ninifter either men, or other nature of aide against them. An answere wherein they tooke great comfort and confidence to be able with ease to refish the armie Ecclesiasticke. But all their hope was turned into feare by the comming of Monsieur de Chaumont, who, albeit as he marched and made diverse answers to their people, yet the same day he arrived at Castelfranco vpon the erritories of Bologma, (being the same day wherein the Marquisse of Mantua with the Popes egiments made himselfe Lord ouer the Borough of S. Peter) he sent to signifie to Bentinole, that he king foreseeing not to faile of that he was bound vnto by the capitulations of protection, had n invention not only to make fafety and preservation of his goods, but also to procure him such urther grace and fauour, that refigning to the Church the gouernment and policie of the Citie, re should with suretie remaine in Bologma with his children, so that within three dayes he subnitted himselfe wholly to the obedience and commandements of the Pope. Necessitie is mighty " o bendthose hearts that are inuincible against all other means, and men compounded of humors " ransitoric and fraile, beare their ordinarie mutations of mind and counsell, according to the alteraion of occasions and accidents. For, Bentinole and his sonnes, who with great threatnings afore " ad published to all the world their ablenesse and disposition to defend themselves, became now haunged in resolution and courage: & not remembring with what vpbraidings they had exclained against Peter de Medicis, for that without effusion of bloud he had forsaken Florence:made nfwer, that they would referre themselues to his arbitration, beseeching him to be a meane that t the least they might obtaine conditions tollerable. Therefore, being now come to the bridge le Renethree miles from Bolognia, interposing with the Pope, he made an agreement, that it hould be lawfull to John Bentinole and his founces, with Geneure Sforce his wife, fafely to go out of Bolognia, and remaine in the Duchy of Atellan in any place at their best liking and election: That it shold be lawful for them either to sell or carie away from Bolognia, all their goods moueble, and not to be molested for their immoueables which they possessed with just title. By the penefite of which accord ratified and confirmed, they departed with speede and securitie out of Bolognia, having obtained of Monsteur de Chaumont, to whom they gave twelve thousand ductats, a verielarge safeconduct, with promise subscribed, not only to see observed all that is conained in the articles of protection, but also that he and his familie should continue in suretie in he Duchie of Millan. As soone as the kinred of the Bentinoleis were departed, the people of Bo-'ogma addressed with diligence their Embassadors to the Pope, to put into his hands the absolute urisdiction of their citie, to demaund pardon & absolution of the Censures, and to require order hat the French should not enter into Bolognia. But they being of nature infolent, could hardly peare to be regulated, specially in a time when their own strength & common fortune of the armie fauoured their intentions, they made their approches to the walles with an univerfall dispohtion to enter: but the strong refistance of the people, compounded of a resolute valour to deend their libertie, kept them from executing upon the walles, and compelled them to encampe neare the bulwarks betweene the gates of S. Felix and Saragoffe, vpon the channell which drawing from the river of Rene passeth through Bolognia, and from thence is navigable to Ferrara, Belike they were ignorant, that it was in the power of the inhabitants of Bolognia by plucking vp 2 fluce of the channell that entreth the Citie, to drowne all the countrie about: their ignorance in a matter so needfull of consideration, brought sodaine incommodities vpon them, for that the people of Bolognia raising the fluce, the channell that afore was swelled with water, brake forth and ouerflowed the low places where were encamped the French bands, who leaving their artillerie in the water, and much of their baggage, retired in great tumult and disorder to the bridge of Rene, where they remained till the Pope entred into Bolognia, which was on Saint Martins day, confirming his entrie with all pompe and ceremonies Pontificall. Thus fell into the power of the Church with a great felicity of the inhabitants, the City of Bolognia, which with good right beareth name & reputation amongst the most noble and flourishing cities of Italy, as well for the infinitie of the dwellers, as for the fertilitie of foyle and oportunitie of situation. And albeit the Pope did inflitute new Magistrates by the example of antiquitie, leaving in many things great fignes & apparances of liberty, yet, touching the effect, he brought it wholly to the obediece of the Church, expressing many honourable liberalities, in releasing diverse exemptions, wherein he made himselfe mighty in the opinion of the people, and (vsing the like in all other cities) he laboured to allure the multitude to an amity and liking of the Church gouernment. He gaue to Monficur (haumont, who returned immediatly to the Duchy of Millan, eight thousand duckats, with ten thousand to be distributed in liberalities amongst his regiment, and he confirmed vuder Bul subfigued, the promife he had made before to create Cardinall, his brother the Bishop of Alby, and yet(turning all his wits and studies how he might annoy the Venetians) to leave quicker motions in the French king and Cardinall Amboife to aide him, he would not at that time publish Cardinals the Bishops of Acha & Baieux, according to the folicitations that were made, and writs which were already fubscribed.

The great Captaine confirmed in the Ducky of S. Ange.

The death of king Philip.

About this time the king of Aragon passed by sea into Italy, and embarking at Barcelonia there came to him a Gentleman from the Great Captaine, who offered himselfe prepared to receive the king, and give him all obedience: To whom in recompence of his fidelitie and merits, the king ratified not only donation of the Duchy of Saint Ange, which king Federske had given him, but also all his other profits which he possessed in the kingdome of N aples, amounting to twenty thousand duckats in yearely reuenue, together with the office of great Constable of the kingdom, and promise to be great mailter of Saint James, both subsigned vuder the kings owne hand. The king embarking at Barcelonia with no leffe contentment of the prefent, then better hop chereafter, was honourably received with his wife, in all the ports of Provence, according to the French kings commandements, and with the same oblation and reuerence was welcomed into the hauen of Genes, where he was expected by the Great Captaine, who was gone thither to meete him, not without the admiration of many, for that not onely the popular fort, but even the Pope himselfe nourished an opinion, that as well for his disobedience past, as for the present suspicion which the king had in him, he would passe into Spame, searing to stand in the presence of the king. The king of Aragon departing from Genes, remained many dayes at Portofino, both for that the wind was contrary, and also he held it not convenient to be far from the shore with his light gallies. Whilest he soiorned at Portofino, he was advertised that king Philip his son in law, yong in yeares, and well disposed in body, had chaunged this life for a better within the towne of Burgos: his infirmitie was a feuer raging with violent motions, but of very few daies continuance, happing in the very ripenesse & full reputation of his age, & in a season wherein he was lifted to his greatest felicity, as oftentimes is wonderfully expressed in the variation of fortune: neuerthlesse the king, in whom it was believed that for the defire he had to recontinue in the government of Caffile, wold eftfoones turne faile to Barcelonia, kept on his first way, & entred the port of Calerta the fame day that the Pope marching to Bolognia, made his entrie into Y mola: from whence he was conucied to Naples, and received into that City (which was wont to reioyce in kings of Aragon) with no leffe magnificence, maiestie, and honour of the Nobles, then vniuerfall defire & expectation of the comunalty, for an opinion they had that under a king fo glorious for the many victories he had obtained aswell against the infidels as the Christians, and no lessereuerenced for his high wisedome and temperature offpirit, joyned to the generall report of his fingular justice, by the which he had guided his Realmes in tranquilitie: he would also restore and relieue the kingdome of Naples of fo many afflictions and oppressions, and reduce it into on estate peaceable & happy, with restitution of the ports which the Venetians held there, to the great displeasure of the whole kingdome. There came to him to Naples from all parts of Italy many Embassadors, not only to congratulate and honour so great a Prince, but also for many practises and occasions, every one being perswaded that with his authority and wisedome, he wold readdresse things, and giving a new

rme to affairs, he would be the euen ballance and counterpeife for many matters: for that both he Pope, who held himselfe ill contented with him, for that he had not honored him with legaon and embassadours according to the custome, studied to kindle him against the Venetsans, linking that for the defire to recouer the ports of Powella, he had reason to wish their declination nd embasing. And the Venerians of the contrarie solicited for many good respects to be reconnued in his amitie: and also the Florentines, with the other peoples of Tukane, negociated with m diverfly for the regard of Pifa, which this yeare was leffe molefled then others with the inrsions of the Florentines (not hindering their haruest) either for that they were wearie of the larges, or elfethat the experience of the yeare passed made them esteeme it athing vaine & withit fruite, knowing that the flates of Genes and Lucques had agreed to gether to support that citie r one yeare with a determinate and certaine charge, whereunto Pandolf: Petrucci had prepared em before, offering like portion of contribution on the behalfe of the Siennois: notwithstanding the other fide (being a man diffembled in all his intentions) he obtained of the Florentines, by closing the cltate of the negociation, and to the end to separate himselfe from the rest, that the ice which yet continued betweene the Florentines and Stennois, should have prolongation for ee yeares, with an expresse conenant, that it should not be lawfull to the Siennois, not to Pan-(6, to minister any aide to the Pisans: with which excuse forbearing to leavie any expences for m, he refused not to fauour them with all the counsels and actions he could in all other sorts.

About this yeare therehappened a new and strange accident of the tragedy which had bene be- Acentinuance n before Ferrara: for Ferdinand brother to Duke Alphonso and Iulio, whose eyes the Cardinal of the historie I violently caused to be pluckt out (but by the readie helpe of Phistions were restored without of Iulio d'Esse le of his fight:) conspired together with the said Iulio, the death of the Duke. Ferdinand, who s next in succession after the Duke, was moued to this conspiracy by an aspiring desire to occuthat state, the humour of dominion and rule carying him into dispositions of bloud contrarie ionor, nature, and humanitie: and Iulio embraced the treason with so much the more affection, how much he judged that Alphonso had not ministred sufficient justice to the wrong that was nehim, being withall out of hope to be able otherwise to wreake his reuenge vpon the Cardi-1. To these counsels they called as a partie, the Count Albertin Boschet, a gentleman of Modowith whom albeit they had wonne and corrupted certaine fellowes of base condition gouerg much the person of Alphonso, for that they were his fauorites in matters of sport and delight, Thad many times fundrie oportunities to kill him : yet, being withholden by a certaine fatall tirousnesse, they let passe alwayes the oportunitie. In so much as (so it happeneth for the most t when the execution of conspiracies is deserted) the treason being detected, Ferdinand with other conspirators were imprisoned, and Iulio, who was fled to his sister at Mantua, was by I direction of the Marquis, fent prisoner to Alphonso, being affuted by his promise and sidelitie, the should not be touched with death: but a litle after the Count Albertin being condemned icially, was quartered with the others that were found guiltie, & the two brethren passed ouer perpetuall prison in the new castell of Ferrara.

Vpon the end of this yeare, for that the yeare following should not begin without matter of The Civie of warres, the Genowayes rebelled against the French king, having no other incitation then of the Genes rebelled les, the matter taking his foundation not of anie defire to rebell, but rather of the civill discords, vich caried men further then their former counsels and deliberations, rebellion being of a condi-Rebellion inin to increase in occasions, as the fire is redoubled in heate by the fresh matter which it embra- creasethingsch. townes in Italy, subject to one particular division, but is devided into manie parties and faction both for the relikes of the ancient quarels betweene the Guelfes and Gibelius yet remaining ther and also for the seeds of diffention still growing betweene the gentlemen & populars, by the which the whole nation of Italy hath bene much afflicted, but specially many Cities in Tuskane have b brought to extreme rume: for, the communaltie not able to beare the pride of the Nobles, bride much their authoritie and power by many rigorous lawes: and amongst others, suffering them communicate with all other offices and honors, they excluded them particularly from the dignit of Dukedome: a supreme estate which was given for life to any other that was chosen, notwit standing by the inconstancie of that Citie, few or none were suffered to continue in that placet they died, the feate of dominion being alwayes icalous, but most casuall where it diuolueth by el ction, which by his proper ambition nourisheth for the most part a secret subjection to alteration and fall. No leffe great is the division betweene the famulies of the Adorni and Fregosi, who fro base condition and popular houses, being risen to the dignitie of Capellaci (so do the Genoway call fuch as are aspired to any great potentacie) contend together for the dignitic of Duke, while for many yeares hath continued for the most part in one of those two families: for the gentlem of the Guelfes and Gibelins, not able to ascend to the place for the impediment of the lawes, sough to make it fall to fuch of the populars as were of their faction. And as the Gibelins fauouring t Adornes, and the Guelfes the house of Fregola, time hath made those two families more noble a mightie, then those of whom afore they followed their name and authoritie. So neuerthelesse those divisions are so confounded, that oftentimes they that be of one part against the partie opp fite, are in them felues deuided into diuerfe parts, and of the contrarie conioyned in one with the that follow another faction. This yeare began to kindle betweene the gentlemen and commons debate, which breeding at the first ypon the insolencies of certaine of the Nobles, and working litle and litle the most part of the minds of both the one and other fide ill disposed, it chaung qualitie ere it were long, and of private contentions, converted it selfe into the nature and habit publike discords, easie enough to kindle in Cities so abounding in riches as did Genes at that tis These quarels rose increasing so farre, that the people possessed with surie, drew into tumult, a made violent flaughter of one of the families of Oria, with certaine other gentlemen; wherein of ring all things to spoile and ruine, they obtained in that mutinie more by force then free will of Citie, that the day after it might be ordained in the publike Councels (wherein were affiftant v few of the Nobles) that of those offices which afore were denided equally betweene the Not and commons, there might bee hereafter distribution made of two partes to the people, and onely referred to the Nobles: to which deliberation Roccaber guiding the Citie in the absence Philip Rauastin then gouernour for the king, consented for feare of greater perils: neuerthele the populars not being quieted for all this, but ouercaried with their mutinous humours, stirred within few dayes after a new tumult, and put the Noblemens houses to sacke: an outrage t compelled most part of the Gentlemen to abandon the Citie, finding no estate of suretie in the naturall regions. These mutations being eftsoones signified to the governour, caused him to turne with speed out of Fraunce to Genes with a strength of an hundred and sistie horse, & see hundred footmen. But neither with his authoritie, his perswasions, his presence, nor with his s ces, could be reduce things to a better effate: fo irregulate is a communaltie or multitude o drawne into mutinie, and their barbarous furie inuincible against all reason, order, or good pres ption. No, oftentimes he was compelled to apply himselfe to the will of the people, and mak his authoritie rather to be plaufible to the multitude, then to punish their mutinies, he passed o things with fufferance, and obeyed the necessitie of the time, commanding to retire and retu certaine other troupes that were appointed to come after him out of Fraunce. These beginning gaue courage to the Commons to become more infolent, and (as it hapneth often in Cities de ned to fedition) the gouernement, contrarie to the will of manie of the best fort of the Comme, fell almost absolutely into the power of the dregges of the people, who in their furie created to feliies a new magistracie or office of eight men of the populars with a great authority: and they, I rather to keepe the whole incenfed by the dignitie of their name, were called Tribunes of the pople. Thefe, under this forme of pollicie, or rather apparant mutinie, occupied with armes the tou: of Spetie, with certaine other townes of the river of Leuant, whereof John Lewis de Fiefquo 15 gouernour for the king. This gouernour complained to the king of those insolencies, both in

name of the whole Nobilitie, and for his particular interest, wherein he recommended to his Maefficithe manifest danger to loose the jurifdiction of Genes, seeing the insolent libertic of the comnonshad caried them to farre, that besides other oppressions & harmes, they aspired (proceeding lirectly against the authoritic of the king) to manage the townes of the river: That vsing expediion, there might be raifed remedies conuenient to represse so great a furic, seeing it was as yet but n the nature of a popular warre, without the protection of anie greater Prince: where if he joyned regligence to the oportunitie, and became flow in leauying the prouifions that were necessarie, the will would more and more refolue, and take with tract of time more firme roote, for that both the mportance of Genes was fuch by sea and land, that it would easily allure some forreine Prince to jourish such a division, so hurtfull for his estate: And also the commons comming to know that which at the beginning was perhaps but in the qualitic of fedition, would in the end change haoite, and turneinto rebellion, and fo become a pray to any that would give hope to defend it. But on the other part, the Embassadors sent to the king from the Commons of Genes, laboured to iulific the action, and to make their cause be found good: They declared, that no other thing had isaltered the people, but the pride of the gentlemen, who, not contented with the dignities and onors convenient to nobilitie, aspired to higher degrees, secking to be redoubted as Lords and rinces: That the people had long borne the yoke of their infolencies, but at laft feeling outrages otonely in their goods and generall callings, but also in their persons and estates most private, neir patience was now ouercome with the weight and violence of their pride: And yet albeit by refe compulsions, they were no longerable to containe themselues: they were not for all that roceeded to any other actions, then fuch as without the which their libertie could not be affured: or, seeing the gentlemen communicated by equall part in the offices and jurisdictions, there was o possibilitie by the meane of courts and judgements, to resist their tyrannie: And lohn Lowis ommaunding ouer the townes of the rivers, without the traffike whereof Genes stood as it were efieged, there was no fafetie for the Commons to entertaine traffike and conversation there: That ie people had bene alwayes most deuout and faithfull to the kings Maiestie, and that the mutaons of Genes had in all times more proceeded of the ambition of the gentlemen, then infidelitie f the people: That they befought the king to pardon those offences, which during the heate of ie contentions, certaine particulars had committed against the vniuerfall will and consent, & that e would confirme the law made for the distribution of offices, and suffer the townes of the rivers be managed under the name publike: Lastly, that by that meane, the gentlemen enjoying honoably their degrees and dignities, and the populars also possessing their libertie with suretie, and all sings being reduced by his Maiesties authoritie into such an estate of tranquillitie, they should be ound to honor perpetually the clemencie, goodnesse and institute of the king. The king was much oubled with these tumults, either for that the licentious behauiours of the commons were suspeted to him, or perhaps for the honorable inclination which the French do commonly beare to the ame of gentlemen: in so much that he could have bene disposed to have punished the authors of nese insolencies, and reduce all things to their first degree, sauing that he feated least if he should fe sharpe remedies, the Genoways would have recourie to Cafar, whose sonne was not yet dead. or which cause, making conference of things, more according to the necessitie and consideration fthe time, then agreeable to the estate and merite of their doings, he determined to proceed with lemencie and tolleration, and therefore called into pardon and forgivenesse all their offences they ad committed, and ratified their new law for disposing of offices, so far forth as they would put nto his hands the townes of the tiners which they occupied: wherein the better to encline and lispose the people, he sent to Genes doctor Michael Ruccio a banished man, to perswade the Comnous, that they were better to vieand embrace the occasion of the kings clemencie, then (adding o their faults, contumacie and hardened obstinacie) to drive him to proceed against them with se-Rassinesse hath reritie. But discretion having no societie with rashnesse, nor follieanie communitie with wisdome, no societie heir minds seemed to stand blinded with immoderate ambition and couetousnesse: for the people with discretize and Tribunes (notwithstanding the lawfull Magistrates were of the contrarie opinion) would not onely not render the places they occupied (not accepting the foftnes and tractabilitie of the king) out rifing into thoughts of worle nature, they determined to affaile the borough of Monaco, which Lucian Grimault possessed, either in regard of a common hatred borne against all Gentlemen of Genes, or elsefor that the borough is of great importance for the Citie, having his situation ypon

the seain a place of great conveniencie: or at least for certaine particular hatreds, since he to whom falleth the power and gouernement of that place, abstaineth verie hardly from piracies & robbing by the sea, the situation giving favour and oportunitie to such actions: or lastly, because (as they fuggested) that borough appertained rightfully to the common weale. In which regards, notwithstanding the importunities of the gouernour to the contrarie, they sent thither many bands both by sea and land to besiege it: the same driving Philip de Ranastin, who knew that hetatied there ynprofitably, and, by the accidents that might happen, not without suspition of daunger, to depart, & to leave in his place Roccabertin. The king for his part, despairing that temperance was vnable to raunge things to a better forme, and judging withall that if he should consent that they continued in that cleate, it might be prejudiciall to his dignitie and suretie, and lastly, fearing that if he gaue longer sufferance to things, the daunger would be so much the greater: he began openly to make preparations both by sea and land, to reduce the Genowayes to his obcdience, Which deliberation was the cause, that matters which were negociated betweene the Pope and him against the Venetians, were diffolued & broken: enterprises much defired by the king, who for the death of king Philip, found him selfe well delivered of the suspitions which he had taken against Maximilian: but much more wished for by the Pope, by reason of the townes which they occupied in Romania, and did dispose of the Bishopricks vacant in their iurisdiction, without any respect to the fea Apostolike, and lastly did intrude them selues into many things appertaining to the lawfull authoritie of the Church. By reason whereof bearing a setled inclination to entertaine amitie with the king, he folicited him to passe into Italy, and to have conference together; whereunto the king confented, the Pope having afore in gratification of the kings requelts, confectated Cardinals the Bishops of Bayeux and Achx. But (the affections of Princes suffer alterations according to time and occasions) the Pope understanding afterwardes how the king had determined to take arme against the Commons of Genes in fauour of the Gentlemen, tooke it to great discontentment, fo that having of long time frowned vpon the Gentlemen, he had alwayes borne favour to the difpo fitions of the people: wherein he made great instance to the king to be contented, without chaun ging the estate popular, to have that Citie in his obedience; and perswaded him as much as h could to abstaine from armes, alleaging many reasons, but chiefly the daunger, least by that mean fome great alteration kindling in Italy, the warres which they had determined against the Vene trans, were not cut off or hindred. The king bearing no inclination to these demaunds, the Pope either ouerfuled with anger or forow, or elfe for that the old fuspition of the aspiring mind of th Cardinall of Amboy's did effoones stirre in him, either by the naturall operation of him selfe, c by the fubtill fuggestion of others (which made him feare to be retained by the king when the should meete in one place) and perhaps as well for the one as the other occasion: he published o the fudden, in the beginning of the yeare 1507, against the expectation of every one, that he wol estsoones returne to Rome, not for other reason, then that aire of Bolognia was contrarie to hi health, and that his reuenues were much diminished by his absence from Rome. This alteration c counsell brought no litle maruell to every one, but specially to the king, for that without occasio he would leave unperfect the practifeshe had so much defired to advaunce, and breake of himself the enterview and conference which he had so much required; and therefore calling into confide ration the estate and intricate disposition of things, he laboured what he could to draw him from that new counfell, and make him change opinion: wherein his paines were more hurtfull to him then vaine, for that the Pope entring into a greater suspition for the request the king made made effloones an oblimate confirmation of his first counsell, and departing from Bolognia vpor the end of Februarie, he expressed how little he could dissemble the contempt he had conceiued a gainst the king. Afore he issued out of the Citic, he set with vnfortunate signes the first stone of the Calle which was made there by his commaundement, neare the gate which leades to Ferrara, is the selfe same place where Philip Maria Viscount Duke of Millan had aforetime erected anothe with no leffe ill fortune. And his new anger against the French king having in some fore qualified his auncient hatred against the Venetians, and not minding to turne out of his right way, he determined to passe by the Citie of Faenza, new controuersies happening from time to time between the French king and him, both for that he required that the familie of the Bentyuoless might be expulsed the Duchie of Millan, notwithstanding they were referred to that habitation by his confent:& allofor that he would not render to the Pronotorie the possession of those benefices which he had promifed by his proper accord and confent (so often prevailed more in him the contention of his mind and his wilfull election, then either teason or equitie.) Which disposition the king laboured not to appease with any art or diligence, but standing aggreed for so great a variation, and entring withall into suspicion, least (as the truth was) he gaue secret encouragement to the people of Genes, he forbare not to threaten him openly, and to object with injurious words, his infamous place and birth, the Pope being descended of a verie base place, and trained for manie yeares in verie vile estate. And resoluting more and more in his first deliberation touching the assaires of Genes, he prepared his armie with great diligence to go thither in person, having well experienced by his former successes in the kingdome of Naples, what difference there is to admini-fter a warre in proper person, and to recommend it ouer to the doing of Captaines.

These preparation amazed nothing the Genomages being busie to take Monaco, about the which they kept e uployed many veffels, and fixe thousand men leavied of the Communalties and generall multitudes of the countreys of Genes. These bands were led and commaunded by Tarlatin a Captaine of the Pijans, who, together with Peter Shortlegge and certaine vniuerfall fouldiers, had bene sent by them in fauor of the Genowayes. And at Genes, as they perseuered in their first offences, adding alwayes fomenew transgression, the Captaine of the Castell, who till then had expresfed no action, nor had not bene molefted by the conspirators, ypon the sudden made many of the Commons prisoners, and began to vexe the hauen and Citie with his artilleries. This was either by the kings commaundement, or vpon his owne authoritie loyned to a defire to make pillage: by reason of which, Roccabertin conferring with the common daunger of the towne, the private search ne had of his owne person, went his way, not whither he would (for extremitie leaues no libertie) out whither the necessicie of his fortune suffered him, the footbands of the French which were set o guard the publike Pallace, retyring into the Castell. Alitle after, the siege which had remained fore Monaco many moneths, tooke end and brake vp; the reason was, that such as were encamsed afore it, understanding that Yues d'Alegre and many gentlemen were at hand to succour it with a strength of three thousand footmen of their owne pay, and certaine other bands which the Duke of Saroy had fent, had leavied the fiege, having no courage to abide the armie that marched. Belides, the brute ran, that the maine armie appointed for the king, passed continually into Lumfardie: by reason whereof, those men rising into increase of furie, who ought to have bene the auhors of better counsels, the Commons that till that day had diffembled with words the rebellion which they had exercised in deeds, & neither forbearing to call ypon the name of the French king, nor once touching his Armes, nor remouing his enfignes nor banners out of the publike places, reated Dake of Genes one Paule de Noue a filke dyer, a man for his vertues, of no merite, and for is birth and defcending, of very base place and condition; declaring themselues in this, manifest ebels, for that to the creation of Duke was joyned a declaration, that the Citie of Genes should peare no subjection to any Prince: the same so sirring the king to greater anger, together with the elation of the Nobles, that they had deposed his Armories, and in their place had exalted the enfignes of Calar, that he redoubled the preparations which he had prouided afore: wherein he was alfo fo much the more kindled to reuenge and wrath , by how much Cafar , at the perfwalions of the Genowayes, and haply by the Popes secret setting on, had written to him that he ought not to molell Genes as a towne of the Empire, offering fo to labour, that the people should be raunged and reduced to all things just and reasonable. The Duke and Tribunes were somewhat nourished in their rash boldnes, by certaine prosperous successes they had had on the coast of Leuant: for, lerome the fonce of Lowis de Fiefquo, having reconquered R apallo with two thousand footmen & certaine horse, as he went by night to surprise Rocqua, encountred the bands that were sent from Genes to fuccour it: and whether it were by any difaduantage of the place, or for any other peculiar respect of seare or daunger, he forbare to entertaine the skirmish, and without comming to short weapons, he fell disorderly to flying. Whereupon Orlandin nephew to lohn Lowis, which was matched as farre as Recquo with another regiment, did the like, hearing the noise of the chase. By this fortune the Duke and the Tribunes became more infolent, and in those glorying humors proceeded to befiege Castellaccio, an ancient Castell which the ancient Lords of Willan builded in the mountaines aboue Genes, at fuch times as they were commanders our that Citie, to ferue as a helpe that those companies which they should fend out of Lumbardy, might have oportunitie to approch neare Genes, and succour the Castell, which containing a verie small gatrison, they forced it and tooke it eafily: for that the French bands that were there, yeelded under faith to have their goods and life preserved, which, according to the infidelitie of a commotion, was not obserued, those that were the executors of such outrages returning to Genes with bloudie hands and great reloycings, as tokens of their glorie and triumph. At the fame time also they began to batter with their artilleries, the Castell and the Church of Saint Frauncis joyning to it, their fortune making them blind against discretion and reason, as men more mightie in selicitie and chaunce, then in force or good experience. And albeit the king was already palled into Italy, and reenforced his armie continually to affaile Genes without delay: and the king Catholike, not withstanding he wished their conservation, would not shew himselfe devided from the French king, but furnished him with four elight galleys. And laftly, albeit the Pope durst not otherwise disclose his intentions the in giving them secret hopes, & that they were desperatly abandoned of all succours, & had but onely three hundred footmen forreiners, not one Captaine or commaunder experienced in warre. and great lacke of munitions: yet were they resolute, and continued in their obstinacie, reposing much for them felnes in the straights of their countrey, and that by the difficulties and sharpnesse of wayes and passages they might easily let the enemie for comming neare Genes: and as men esteeming certaintie in the winde, they despised, in regard of these vaine hopes, the admonitions of manie, and specially the counsels of the Cardinall of Finale, who accompanying the French armie, perswaded them by many messengers and letters, to offer vp them sclues to the kings will, giving them hope to obtaine pardon and conditions tollerable. But the armie marching by the way of the borough of Fornaro and Seravallo, the vanitie of the enterprises of the Genomayes began to appeare, being not measured nor layed out by men trayned in warre, but folowed with clamours and vaine braggings of a base and ignorant multitude. In so much as the courages of men nothing answering in a present perill, to that which they had promised when they were without feare, fixe hundred of their footemen fet to guard their first straights, being charged by the Frenchmen, fled cowardly; by whose example, the residue that kept the other passages, abandoned their places and retired to Genes, leaving all the straights open to the French, whole armie having passed over without impediment the toppe of the mountaines, was now descended into the vale of Pozzeuero within seuen miles of Genes: A matter that did not a litle amaze and maruell the Genowayes, for that contrary to their undiferete expectations, they faw their armie so hardie, as to encampe in that valley frontired with troublesome mountaines, and in the middest of the enemies countrey. At the same time also the kings nauie which contained eight light galleys, eight gallions, with many Fults and Brigantines, presented themselves before Genes, and from thence failed towards Portouenere and Specifia, purfuing the Genoway nauie being scuen galleys and fixe barkes, which not daring to keepe the hauen of Genes, were withdrawen into those places. From the valley of Pozzenero the armie drew to the borough of Rinarola two miles within Genes, and neare to the Church of S. Peter d'Arena, which is ioyning to the fea: and albeit as they marched, they met in many places with diverse footbands of the Genowayes, yet they all being of one resolution, and possessed with one pusillanimitie of minde, fled afore them, their feares being greater then their daungers. This day arrived in the armie the person of the king, and was lodged in the Abbey de Boshet, right ouer against the borough of Rivarola: he was accompanied with the most part of the Nobles of Fraunce, with many numbers of Gentlemen of the Duchie of Mullan, and with the Marquis of Mantua, whom not many dayes before the king had declared chiefe of the order of Saint Michaell, and given vnto him the flanderd, which had not bene given to any fince the death of king Lowis the eleventh. In the French armie were eight hundred Launces (the king confidering the difficulties of the countrey, had left the others in Lumbardse) a thousand and eight hundred light horsemen, sixe thousand Swiffers, and sixe thousand footenien of other nations. It is to be understood, that the Genowayes (because they would not leave free that way which leades by the mountaines to Castellaccio, and so to Genes, a shorter way then by Saint Peter d'Arene, and joyning to the sea) had builded a bastillion on the top of the mountaine called the Promontorie hill, betweene the borough of Rsuarola and Saint Peter d'Arene, from which bastillion the way lay from Castellaccio by the backfide of the rocke, The armie then that lay encamped at Rinarola, marched the same day to the said bastillion; and on the other part, there issued out of Genes eight thousand footmen, guided by lacques Corse Lieutenant to Tarlatin; for Tarlatin & the fouldiers of the Pisans which were enclosed in Ventimiglia when

The contents of the French armie. campe was leauled from before Monaco, albeit they were reuoked by the Genowayes, who for ir conduction fent then the ship of Demetrus Iustinian, could not returne to Genes by land the impediment of the French, nor by sea, for that the winds were contrarie. But the French ing now to iffue and ascend, discouered the foot-troopes of the Genowayes, who being ascended the mountaine by that fide of the valley that leades to the baffillion, and afterwardes the most t of them being descended, had made head aboue a rocke which is the halfe way of the mounne : against whom Monsieur de Chaumont sent many gentlemen with a good strength offooten. The Genowayes, aswell for their oddes in numbers, as the aduantage of the place, made a vaht defence, and that to the great domage of the French, who making a contempt of their enees, for that they were bands compounded vpon artificers and people vniuerfall, went gallantly charge them, without confidering the strength and situation of the place: and as Monsieur do liffa was hurt in the throate, but with no perill of life, Monsieur Chaumont feeking to drive the m thence, caused to be mounted on high two Cannons, which beating them in flanke, constrai-I them to retire to the mountaine, where the refidue of their strength remained. These successes brought an incredible feare rall the Citie, which depending wholly vpon the willes of the inferiour multitudes, neither di- The Gemmays ted by counfels of warre, nor ruled by civill wifedome, fent two Embaffadours to the Armie, fend to solicite olicite to render them selues vnder couenants convenient; they could not have audience nor ac-for pardon. But during the parley with the Cardinall (it is hard to moderate a multitude given over to tinie) one part of the Commons not enclined to reconcilement and peace, going out of Genes heapes, displayed their ensignes with many other footebands, ypon the rockes and side of the ey which leadeth from Castellacio: they approched within a quarter of a mile of the Bastillion, sing to recouer it, and entertaining the skirmish for three hours with certaine of the French idsthat came against them, they retired at last to Castellaccio, neither rejoycing in their fortune, leauing to their enemies any aduantage. All which meane while, the king more fearefull of a ater stirre, then well assured of the conquest, remained alwayes armed on horsebacke in a plaine weene the river of Pozzenero and the place where the armie was encamped, his minde wavez, and his expectation not satisfied. Neuerthelesse the night following the Genomayes, whose infels were now desperate, as the brute was common, that certaine principals of the people I fecretly conspired and compounded with the king euen from the time he entred Ast, and the 🕠 mmons joyning to their declining condition, many complaints that they had bene abused: the ke, with many of those that knew that no submission was worthy of place, nor their faults meet be dispensed withall, together withall the regiments of Pisans, departed to go to Pisa, leagthe Citie to discretion, as themselves were driven to follow their fortune. The morning fol- The yebels of lying by the appearing of the day, the same Embassadors returned estsoones to the campe, and Genes yield riented to give up the towne to the kings discretion, not having sustained the warre above eight to the French cyes: a notable example of the ignorance and confusion of multitudes and people, who groung their doings vpon fallible hopes & vaine expectations, are furious when the daunger is far off, " very irrefolute when peril approcheth, not temperat in their counsels, irregulate in their actions, " for their comon affections, most dissolute & immoderat. The accord being made, the king with " Larmy approched neare Genes, the footmen being bestowed in the suburbs, who became almost i ractable, specially the Smiffers, whom there was much to do to restraine fro entring the towne, to make pillage of the goods: fo fweet a pray is the spoile of a Citic, & so vnbridled is the mer-,, narie fouldier that ferueth but for his hire, bearing for the most part very negligent respects to e- ,, citie, order, or conscience. The French K. The next day being the xxix of Aprill, the person of the king made his entrie into Genes, with the companies of men at armes and archers of his guard. And as he was alighted under a flate arch, holding in his hand a naked fword, and himfelfe all attired in white garments, there appe red afore him the familie of the Antyans accompanied with many honorable Citizens, who falli at his feete with teares, forow and submission, and all other arguments of men offenders, the o of them in the name of the whole, after filence was graunted, belought the king in this fort:

In cases of offence and trespasse, by how much the fault is great & grieuor by so much more religious is the nature that pitieth, but farre more worthy the clemencie that se ॐ giueth, fince to fall and erre is familiar to frailty and humanity, but to pardon & dispence is a pr » pertie inspired of the liuing God. These speeches were followed with the lowd voyces of eue

ne, crying, Mercy, mercy. But the king passed on without giuing any answer, bidding them neuerreleffe to rife, and delivering his naked tword which he held in his hand, he shewed some tokens fa minde more inclined to compatition then to crueltie: hee alcended immediatly to the great hurch, where infinit flockes of women and children of both kinds, fell proftrate at his feete, cryg vpon his elemencie and mercie with weping and wringing of hands, and other demonstrations humilitie, expressed also in their universall attire of white. This was it that most moued the king, ptwithflanding the others were not without their particular impressions, in so much that albeit he as determined to deprine the Citic of all gouernement and authoritie, and to confiske the reneres which under the name of S. George belonged to many persons private, and lastly taking from em all forme and image of liberty, to reduce them into the fame state of subjection which he had one the townes of Millar, yet confidering afterwardes, that by this maner of proceeding, not onmany innocentes should be punished, but also the mindes of the whole nobilitie estranged, and at it would be more easie to him to gouerne with remission and sweetnesse, then with rigour & ueritie, he reconfirmed the auncient governement, & left it in the same forme wherein it was bere the feditions. And yet, to temper his mercy with fome inflice, and form hat to accompany his emencie with feueritie, hee condemned the communaltie in a hundred thousand duckats for e penaltie of the offence, with aggrauation of penaltie of two hundred thousand duckats more, yable within a certaine time, both to defray the charges he had fuffained, & allo to edifie a Cita-Il in the place where is the towre of Codifia not farre from Genes, & standing upon the sea about at suburbe which leadeth to the valley of Pezzenero and S. Peter in Arena: which Citadell, for at it may commaund the hauen and whole Citie, is rightfully called the bridle. He ordained alfo at they should furnish a greater garrison then they were wont, & keepe continually armed in the uen for his feruice, three gallies, and fortifie the Castell and Castellaccio: he brake all the capitulaons and couenants that had bene made afore betweene the Citie and him, graunting to them aine all the same things, but in forme of priviledge, and not in nature of covenant charter, to the d he might alwayes Itand in power to depriue them: he defaced out of their moneys and coynes sir auncient stampes, causing them for afterwards to beare his standers and stamp in signe of abute superioritie. To these actions was added the death of Demetrica Instinian, who was behead, disclosing in his examination all the practises which the Pope had made, together with the pes hee had given them. Within few moneths after was beheaded Paule de Nouo lately made ike, who fayling from Pija to Rome, was betrayed by a pirate that had bene his fouldier, & fold the French men: A death not much lamented of any, for that aspiring to his creation not by disnt or merite, but by rash election, there was left to him no power to exercise the humours of a ince: and to himfelfe fo much the leffe grieuous, by how much the short continuance of his inric cut from hi.n those delites which dominió do breed, loosing with litle sorow the thing which had got with litle paine, & of the which his fortune gaue him no oportunity to tast the very first d greene fruites, After the king had ordained these things, solemnly receiving of the Genowayes oath of fidelitie, and giving pardon to all, except to three score whom he committed to the dis-Sition of the law, he went to Atillan, dispersing immediatly after this conquest, his armie, with e which continuing the course of victorie, he might casily have oppressed in Italie whom he had led, all the Potentates there standing more in feare of his power, then any way provided to relist rils But having regard to the estate of things, and promise he had made, he dissolved his armie, ebetter to affure the Pope, the king of Romanes, & the Venetians, who were not without feare-Il suspicions, that his discending into Italie was for some other cause then to range the rebels of enes, and reduce the towne to a policie.

But nothing could appeale the fretting minde of the Pope, who taking all things in the work art, complained eftloones (not temperatly) of the king, as if it had bin by his meane, that Anniball Rentwale with fixe hundred footemen levied in the Duchie of Atllan, did affay in those times to net Bolognia, affuring that if he had prevailed in that action, the king would yet have declared infelf more against the estate Ecclesiastike. Wherewith the Pope being wroth, notwithstanding e had before with great difficultie published Cardinals the Bishops of Achx and Bayeux, he refued to raise to that dignitie the Bishop of Abbe, complaining chiefly that by Alonsieur de Chauson his brother, the Bentuncie's had sufference to dwell in the Duchie of Alisanyea (which was figreater consequence) the Pope overruled indifferently with hate & suspicion (two violent pas-fions in a minde placed in authoritie) when the king first published that he would reduce the Ge nowayes to obedience by armes, fignified by his Nuncioes and peculiar letters to the king of Ro. manes and Electours of the Empire, that the French king prepared to passe into Italie with a most mightie armie, vnder colour to reappeale the tumultes of Genes, which he might redreffe with hi incite the king authoritie, his intention being to oppresse the cleare of the Church, and vsurpe the dignitie of the of Romains to Empire. The Venetians also joyned with him in this certificat, having the same searces of the coming of the French into Italie with an armie fo well addressed: which aduertisements being communication cated with Maximilian, whose inclination embraced naturally new things, and being at the instant newly returned from Flanders, where he had practifed in vaine to take the gouernement of his lit. sonne: he affembled in the towne of Constance, the Princes of Germanie and the free townes (those are called the free Cities, which acknowledging by certaine tributes and determinate payment the authoritie of the Empire, do gouerne them selues not withstanding in all things by their own lawes, not feeking to amplifie their tertitories, but to preferte their libertie.) At this affemblie appeared all the Princes, Barons, and communalties of Germanie, perhaps with more readinesse and in greater numbers then had bene seene long time before in any dyot: for thither resorted in person all the Electors and Princes of Germany both Ecclefial like and Secular, except fuch as were reltrain ned by lawfull impediments, in whose places were sent either their sonnes, their brethren, or some very neare kinred to represent their personall presence. All the free townes in like fort sent thithe Embassadours: in which generall assemblie & aspect of the universall body of Germany, Casar cau, fed to be publikely read the Popes writ, with many other letters fignificatorie from diverse places some of them expressing that the French kings intention was to aduaunce the Cardinall of Am boise to the supreme sea of Rome, & to receive of him the Imperial crowne. These advertisement breeding no small murmure in the mindes of the audience, ranthrough the Princes & Barons wit great variety of judgement, some of them fearing indeed the ambition of the king, but the most for disdayning much so great an indignitic against the maiestie & crowne Imperiall, wherein as euer particular began to prepare himself to make knowne with words and speeches his opinion & affe ctio, Cafar cutting off that inclination by his authority, spake to them in this fort: You see now (m Lordes) what effectes, the long patience we have hitherunto yled, hath brought forth, what fruite " are gathered of the small reckening that hath bene made of my former complaints expressed in s many dyots. And now your owne eyes do behold that the French king, who heretofore durft ne offer himselfe against any thing that appertained to the sacred Empire, but you occasions vrged i colours very apparant, is now in preparation with an ope force, not to protectour rebels as he we " wont, not to viurpe any particular place which reasonably apperteineth to the Empire but, takin et he oportunitie of the time, turning our patience into mockery, and forming an aduantage and or casion vpon our long setled negligence, he draweth his sword to dispoile Germanie of the Imper « all dignitie, so honorably gotten, and so long time continued, by the vertue and valour of our ance se sters the is not entred into this boldnesse, by any coniecture or perswasion that either our forces as diminished, or his powers encreased, neither can he be ignorant by how much the region of Go maine is mighty about the nation of Fraunce, both in maiestie of imperie, in gravitie of counsell, i er agilitie of bodies, in multitude of Princes, in obedience of subjectes, & generally without all com « parison in valour of Captaines, and resolution of souldiers, in moneys, in munitions, in disciplines & directions of warre, with all other furnishments requisite to defend a violence and offend a prou enemie. But he is caried into this ambitious enterprise onely by a hope, that according to the expe rience of things palt, we will still dwell in securitie and negligence, and that our proper dissention and civill factions prevaile more with vs, then the provocations of glorie, yea then the confidere "tion of our particular fafetie: he thinketh that the same respectes for the which we have suffere " him to our common shame, to vsurpe the Duchie of Millan, that he hath nourished in our own " bosomes our civill quarrels, and that he hath borne a defence and protection of our rebels of the " Empire, feeding vs lastly with vanities & errours, as men gouerned by humours light & wandring " he hopeth that the same sufferance, securitie, and solemne negligence, will likewise keepe vs lulle 44 afleepe to endure that by him should be rauished from vs the dignitie of the Empire and the glor " and felicitie of this nation transported into Fraunce: it would be a thing lesse infamous to our co "mon name, and to me in particular leffe grieuous and intollerable, if it were knowne to the work et that the power of Germanie were inferiour to the forces of Fraunce, or that in the Almaines wer

ot continued the same vertue which in all ages, in all actions, & in all fortunes was found to beare,, eputation aboue the valour of the French: for the domage should afflict me lesse then the infamic, ,, nce at the least, things should not be imputed to our negligence & indiscretion, which might pro-,, eede either of the condition of times, or of the malice of fortune. What greater calamitie can hap-,, en? what miserie more, then to be reduced to these termes, either to wish to be lesse mightie, or to ,, nake a willing election of a great domage, onely to auoyde (fince otherwife it can not be)the per-,, etuall infamie and dishonour of our name? The magnanimitie of euery one of you so many times,, sperienced in matters particular, your resolute courage proper & naturall to this nation : and last-,, , the memorie of the ancient vertue and triumphes of our elders (the very terrour heretofore of ,, lother realmes and kingdomes) do giue me both hope and affurance, that in an action of fo great ,, aportance, your inuincible mindes will be awaked and receiue new life and spirite: for here is now, o question of the alienatio of the Duchie of Millan, nor of the revolting of the Swiffers, in which, Stions of so great consequence there was made no great account of my authoritie, both in regard, the affinitie I had with Lodowik Sforce, and for the particular interests of the house of Austrich. ,, ut now my Lords, what excuse may we pretend? what colour or couerture may be giuen to our ,, nominie? what merite can we chalenge in the world, or what maiestie can we hold at home, ,, hen it is even now in question whether the Almaines, who stand possessed of the Romaine Em-,, renot by the hand of fortune, but by their proper vertue, and whose name and armes heretofore,, th founded feare and terrour to most Princes in Christendome, should now cowardly depose the,, ues of so great a dignitie, & remaining the perpetuall exaple of infamie, of the most ancient, most, prious, and most inmincible Monarchie of men, to become the most reversed, most despised, & ,, oft dishonored region that stadeth under the view and face of the skie? If these reasons, if these in-,, ests, if these disdaines will not moue you, what can be further objected against your securitie & ,, gligence? if these respectes, if these contemplations of perill, infamie, and perpetual ruine, can, trevp no life in you, what can be fay din more importunitie? what can kindle in you the feedes,, the valour and resolution of your elders, if your mindes be not inclined to the consideration of,, ese aduersaries? In ages and posterities to come, with what sorow shall your children & descen-,, nts remember your names, if you leave not vnto them the name of Almaines in the fame degree,, greatnesse, authoritie, and reputation, wherein your fathers left it transferred to you? But let vs ,, I from those sortes of comfortes & perswasions, for that it is an office inconvenient in me, whom,, ou haue lifted to the height of this place, to vse such libertie of wordes, but rather to recommend,, you deedes and examples . I am determined to passe into Italie, vnder pretence to receiue the ,, periall crowne; a folemnitie as you know more full of ceremonie, then of fubstance, for that the ,, thoritie and dignitie Imperiall depend wholly vpon your electio. But my principall intention is, ,, breake the necke of the wicked purpoles and plots of the French, and to chase them out of the ,, uchie of Millan, seeing we have no other suretie against their insolencies. I hope there restethin, me of you all any difficultie, to accompanie me according to your custome with other Emperors,, sing to be crowned, neither doubt I, that carying with me your harts & affections, joyning with-,, your forces to mine, I shal not passe a journey victorious, marching with such selicitie, as the most,, the potentates and communalties in Italie will meete me as petitioners, some to confirme their,, iuiledges, some to implore our iustice against the oppressions they suffer, and some to appeale,, ith a deuout submission, the ire of the victor. I doubt not, but the French king will give place at ,, e first brute of our comming, that nation bearing yet in memorie, that being but yong and almost,, infant, I brake with true valour and magnanimitie, the armie of king Lowys the eleuenth neare,, usquegaste, fince which time that kingdome refusing to make experience of my armes, have ne-,, er fought with me but by ambushes and conspiracies. Consider with that reputation and magna-,, imitie, which fo long hath lived invested in the name of the Almaines, whether it agreeth with ,, our honour, with your renowne, and with our common perill, in a case so extraordinarie, to make,, xtraordinarie prouisions. The glorie and greatnesse of our name, to the which this hath bene al-,, vayes proper and peculiar to defend the dignitic of the Popes of Rome, and the authoritie Apo-,, tolike, & which now are wickedly defiled by the ambitio & impictic of the Frechking, callethys, ,, fay, with the common decree of all Germany, to draw out fwords & turne our scepters to so holy, ,, oiult, & lo reuerent a protection. It is an interest that is wholly yours, seeing I have sufficiently ac-,, juited the duetie Iowe, in making fo ready affembly of you, to lay afore you the common daun-,, "ger, vrging you with the exaple of my deliberation. The resolution of courage shall not want inn to communicate with you in all daungers, & lesse shall you lacke the disposition of my person, and to communicate with you in all daungers, & lesse shall you lacke the disposition of my person, and to customed of long time to endure paine and trauell, neither is my counsell in conducting a war of so insufficient, either by greatinesse of age, or doubtfulnesse of experience, as, in this enterptife ye my haue want of a leader worthy of so great an honor. And by how much you shall honor & so forth the greatnesse of your king with fulnesse of authoritie, by how much you shall enuiron him with an armie mightie and appointed, with so much the more facilitie and your perpetuall glory. Shall you be protections of the libertie of the Church of Rome out common mother, & leaue es alted to heaueu, together with the reputation of the Almanne name, the Imperial dignity, comon you all in greatnesse and amplitude, and particular onely to this nation in instruction of protection.

This speech wrought maruellously in the mindes of the affistants, being now ashamed that i the other dyots his complaints found no better passage and fauour: and as it is easie to set on fir those mindes that are already kindled: so enery one having a vehement disdaine, that by their ne gligence the maiestie of the Empire should be translated into other nations: they bega with a great vnitie, to treate vpon articles necessarie, holding it convenient to leavie a most mightie armie, an of fuch a fufficient appointmet as (though the whole regions of Italie would oppose against the with the French king) to be able to renew and recouer in Italie the auncient rights of the Empire which had bene vsurped either by the disabilitie, or other infirmitie of the Emperours past: for s. required the glorie of the name of the Almains: fuch a preparation worthy the affemblie of fo me ny Princes and free townes: And that at last it was necessarie to shew to all the world that thous in the willes of the Almains had remained a long division, & their mindes not reconciled for me ny yeares, that yet the nation was not leffe mightie, nor their spirites depriued of that magnanimit which in other worldes had made their aunceftors terrible to all estates and principallities of me by the meane of whose vertue, both there was divolued in generall to the nation of Germains, al berall glorie with the dignitie Imperiall, and in part particular, many noble personages had aspire to much greatnesse & dominion, many of the best houses in Italie having by long prescription ra gned in estates gotten by their valour. These things were begun to be debated with so great so wardnesse and inclination, that it is manifest no dyot to have assembled of long time, wherein w expectation of so great eucnts, the multitudes perswading themselves vniuetsally, that besides the strength of all the other reasons, the Electours with the residue of the Princes, expressed a mo quicke readinesse to the enterprise, for a hope they had, that (for the minoritie of the children king Philip) the Imperiall dignitie which had succeffinely continued in Albert, Federik, and Max milian, all three of the house of Austrich, would at last be passed into an other familie.

By these resolutions and agreements, the French king was induced to dissolue his armie imm diatly after the action of Genes, both to take away the occasion of so great a suspition, & to leave uery partie satisfied of the integritie of his intention: yea his owne person had eftsoones repass. ouer the Mounts, had it not bene for a defire he had to speake with the king of Aragon, who pre pared to returne into Spaine, altogether disposed to resume the government of Castile, for the Jane his daughter was vnable to so great an administration: not so much for the imbecillitie of he fex, as for that by a superabundance of melancholie, growen since the death of her husbad, she we become somwhat estranged from her understanding, & also for the minoritie of the children com mon betweene king Philip and her, whereof the eldest had not yet attained ten yeares. Besides, t was pushed forward by the defires of many, which called him to that gouernement by a remen braunce that they had bene justly gouerned, and that those kingdomes had florished under himb a long continuance of peace, the divisions already begun amongst the great Barons, together wit the manifest signes of troubles to come, much encreasing this desire: but his comming was no less defired of his daughter, who, wandring in minde in all other actions, was nevertheleffe conflant i this, that the defired the returne of her father, refusing obstinately against the perswasions and in portunities of many, to subscribe with her owne hand to any expedition, without which subscrip tion, according to the cultome of those realmes, the affaires occurrant had not their perfection. Fc these reasons, the king of Aragon departed from Naples, where he remained but seven moueths leauing unfatisfied the great expectation that was had on him: not so much for the shortnesses time which runnes in a voluble motion without respect, nor for that it is hard to answere the con ceptions of men, which for the most part are inconsiderate and not measured with due proportio:

for the many difficulties and impediments that opposed against him, byreason whereos he d nothing deferring memorie for the valuerfall benefite of italie, nor any thing worthy of moment for the particular profit of the kingdome of Naples: for such was his defire to returne estones to the gouernement of Castulo (the principall piller of his greatnesse) that he referued no portunitieto tlinke of the affaires of Italie: onely he turned all his Rudiesto deuise to keepe him He is anitie with the king of Romains and the French king, to the end the one under colour to grand-father to the litle children of the dead king, and the other with the oportunitie of his ower giving courage to who would oppose against him, should giveno impediments to his turne. And the obligation wherein he was bound by the treatie of peace made with the French ng to restore the estates that had bene taken from the Barons of Anion, and distributed either covenaunt or by recompense to fuch as had followed his faction, hindred him to redreffe id gratifiethe kingdome of Naples: for feeking not to estraunge from him, the mindes of his fod feruaunts , he was constrained to recompence those of Anion either with estates of enall reuenne (which he must buy of others) or with readie money (whereunto his Courts of salties and treasures would not suffice) in which respectes he was compelled not onely to raise iproucmentes upon his reuenues, and to refuse, according to the custome of new kings, distribute grace and exemptions, and exercise any fort of liberalitie: but also with the inedible complaint of euery one, to taxehis peoples, who expected to be discharged of their collerable burdens. The complaints made by the Barons of both the one and other part, were thing inferiour, for that to fuch as were possessed, besides that they resigned their estates ith ill will, necessitie made their recompences short and limited, and touching others there as restrained as much as was possible, the benefite of restitution in all things, wherein hapdany difference, forthat how much lesse was restored to those, by so much lesse was the compence of others. The great Captaine departed with him leaving behind him a good will inedible, and a renowne nothing inferiour, of whom befides his merites and prayles in other nes, his present liberalities then were most notorious, promising and disposing giftes of great lour, for the which hee fold a great part of his owne estates, caring lesse to make himselfe ore, then to fayle in such an action of houour. But the king of Naples departed verie ill ntented with the Pope, for that demaunding the inuelliture of the kingdome, the Pope refu-I to give it him, but with those taxations and tributes wherewithit had bene given afore times the former kings: he made instance that there might be made to him the same diminution which d bene made to Ferdinand his coufin, and to his formes and nephewes, demaunding the in-Hiture of the whole realine in his owne name as successour of the old Alfonso, in which forme silest he was at Naples, he had received oath and homage, notwithstanding in the capituions of peace made with the French king, it was disposed that touching the land of Lauora d Abruzza the name of the Queene should be joyntly acknowledged . It was thought that e refusall which the Pope made of the inuestiture, was the cause that Ferdinand would not cake with the Pope, who remaining at the same time in the rocke of Oftia, it was sayd he tad there to expect his passage . But how socuer the truth was , the king of Aragon, tooke his urse to Sanona, where it was agreed that he should have enterniew and speech with the French ag, who staying for that cause in Italy, was come thither from Millan assoone as he ynderstood had taken passage from Naples.

In this enterview and conference, the demonstrations on all sides were manifest, free, and full confidence, and such, for the libertie thereof, as in no memorie had bin seene in any meeting or mmunication of like Princes: for that other potentates, betweene whom were either prinate wies, or anciet quarrels, were wont to meete with fuch order, that the one was not in the power the other, where this suffered neither restraint of companies nor exception of place: for when The kings of chipsofthe king of Aragon were within the hauen of Sauona, the French king being in their dragon and eming descended upon the wall of the hauen, passed by a bridge of wood made for the nonce enterniem topon the poope in the galley of the king of Aragon, with a very small trayne of Gentlemen, and gether, ithout any gard at all:where, being received with a joy agreeable to the honorthat was in him, nd with a common gladnesse of the king and Queene his neece, spending some time there in deles of mirthand curtesie: they went out of the galley by the same bridge, & made their entry on ot into the citie, having much to do to passe through the presse of o many multitudes of men & women as were drawen thither from the townes there aboutes. The Queene went accompa nied with her husband on the right hand, and her vncle on the left, being preciously attire in stones of price, and other sumptuous array: the Cardinall of Amboyse and the great Cap taine marched after the two kings: after them followed the young Ladies and Gentlement the Queenes Court, all fet footh with glorious shewes: and before and behind were the Count of the two kings appointed in an incredible pompe of rich and gorgeous ornaments. With the companies the king and Queene of Aragon were conveyed by the French king to the Castel which was appointed for their lodging, having his prospect upon the sea: that part or halfe c the towne which appertaineth to it was appointed for their trayne: and the French king wa lodged in the Bishops houses right against the Castell; a spectacle truly worthic of memoric to see together two of the most mightiest kings in Christendome, not longafore cruell ene mies, and now not onely reconciled and conjoyned by parentage, but also setting apart a fignes of hatred, and memories of offences past, dideuery one commit to the arbitrement the other his proper life, with no leffe assurance and confidence then if they had bene lineall bre thren: a maner of behaviour which gave occasion to such as were present to dispute, whether of the two kings had shewed the greater confidence. Many referred much to the fidelitie of the French king, who was the first that put him selfe in the power of the other, having no other affuraunce then the bonde of faith: And to the other was transferred a greater occasion (shame, for that faith was kept to him first, and it was a suspition more likely that Ferdinan defired to be affured of him, the better to establish him selfe in the kingdome of Naples . Bi the most fort gaue greater reputation to the confidence of Ferdinand, who exceeding the exam ple of the French king, put him felfe in his power, not for a moment or few houres, but he many dayes and long time. And having dispoyled him of so great a kingdome, with so man harmes and domages to his peoples, and so late a slaunder of his name, he had to feate that the French kings hatred was no leffe mortall, then his defire of reuenge just . Befides, it was alfor be doubted in whom was greater the profit of the difloyaltie: for, to make the French king pr soner, Ferdinand could reape no great commoditie by it, since the estate of Fraunce is manage vnder fuch a policie of lawes and cultomes, that to keepe the king restrained, could not much c minish the forces and authoritie of the kingdome. But there hanged other perils ypon the person of Ferdinand, for that if he had bene made prisoner, it was not to be doubted, that both for the minoritie of his heyres that then were very young, and the realme of Naples being to him a ne kingdome, and also for that his other states, and singularly the realine of Callile were through many accidents difordred amongst them selves, the French king should not have received of loi time any impediment by the power and armes of Spagne. In this enterview and honorable spect ele of great Princes, the confideration of the great Captaine ministred not the least occasions debate and commune ypon: ypon him were occupied the thoughts and eyes of every one, no les for the renowne of his naturall valour, then for the memoric of his many victories: Confideratio which so entifed the mindes and affections of the French men, that not withstanding they had b fo often yanguished by him, and were wont to hold his name in common hatred, yet his very a pect and prefence confirming the opinion and image of his vertue, tooke another habite intl mindes of the French, for that they could not be fatisfied to behold and honour him, making di course to such as had not yet bene in the kingdome of Naples, sometimes with what incredibles leritie and shift of warre he inuaded in Calabria the Barons encamped at Laine, sometimes will what patience and refolution of mind he endured fo many difficulties and aductifities, when in the middest of pestilence and hunger he was belieged in Barletto: somtimes with what diligence ar efficacie he kept retained the mindes of men, and amid a penurie and want of money entertaine long time his fouldiers without pay; with what fingular valour he managed the battell at Sirion 10:80 with what greatnesse of courage, with what industry of a souldier, & with what vnexperies ced stratagemes amid so many difficulties, with an armie vnpayed, and farre inferiour in forces, 1 kept his ground, and obtained the victorie vpon the river of Garillon: and laftly, how vigilant ! had bene alwayes to embrace oportunities, and make his profite ypon the diforders of his en mies, But that which drew men into most wonder and admiration of him, was the excellent make ftie of his presence, the stately representation of his wordes & gestures, full of granisie, affabilitie, i mildnesse, equal to those effectes and actions which had alwayes flowed from his right worthy exceller

excellent vertues: about all the rest, the Frenchking, who desired that he might sup at the same able with Ferdinand, the Queene, and him, and by commaundement was placed neare to Ferdirand, was as it were rauilhed with contemplation and deuifing with him, finding in the action of his countenance and speech, a confirmation of those singularities and merites which he had afore expressed in so many worthing examples of his naturall valour and vertue. In so much that in the udgement of every one, that day was no leffe glorious to the great Captaine, then when he entred with his victorious armie into the Citie of Naples, honoured with all those ceremonies of triumph which are wont to be exercised upon conquerours. But as time nourisheth a law of dissolution and orgetfulnesse of things worldly and transitorie, so those were the latest triumphant dayes of the rreat Captaine, for that departing no more out of the kingdome of Spaine, he had afterwardes no neane to exercise his vettue, neither in warre, nor in things memorable for peace. The two kings and conversation together for the space of two dayes, wherein were holden betweene them many hiscourses both long and secret, and Cardinall de S. Prassida the Popes Legat not admitted to hat conference, nor honoured but generally : but by that that might bee comprehended by enerall coniecture, and also by the manifestation of things afterwardes, they passed a reciproall promise the one to the other, to entertaine together a joynt and perpetuall amitic and intellience, and that Ferdinand should labour to reconcile, Maximilian and the French king, to the end hat being all reunited, they might declare and protest quarrell against the Venetians: wherein, to xpresse that they were no lesse carefull for things common, then for such as concerned themselves proper and particular, they published an intention to reforme the estate of the Church, and to hat end to call a Councell. Neuertheleffe Ferdinand proceeded not with finceritie, but feeking nourish in that hope the Cardinall of Amboyse, who thirsted much to be Pope, he fulled him to nuch by that abusing meane, that (with no litle domage to the affaires of his king)he perceived oo late, and that by many fignes and demonstrations, what difference were betweene the wordes nd workes of that Prince, and what futtleties and enafions were in his counsels. They commued together touching the cause of the Pisans, wherein the Florentins had entertained negociaon both with the one and other of them during the whole yeare: for whe the French king prepaed his armie against the Genowayes, being discontented that the Pisans bare fauour to the rebelons of that people, and forefeeing how much it would be for the commoditie of his affaires to aue the Florentins to recouer that Citie, he gave them hope, that affoone as he had repreffed the nutinies of Genes, he would convert his armie to the devotion of their feruice, expressing in that romife, as also appeared in the generall inclination of the Court, that the auncient good will which had bene afore time borne to the Pifans, was for this occasion turned into hate. But even as 12 counsels of Princes have their variations and imperfections, so in their promises oftentimes is oundlitle certaintie, bearing more regard to the trayne and euent of times, then to accomplish the rordes they speake: for the French king having performed his enterprise vpon the Genowayes. haunged his determination with the Florentins, both for the fame reasons which made him difnisse his armie, and also for that he would not offend the minde of the king of Aragon, who assued him that he would fo dispose the Pisans, that they should willingly returne to the obedience of ne Florentins, from whom the French king hoped by that meane to draw no small quantitie of noney. To this the king of Aragon disposed himselfe, but for many fundry occasions, and albeit had bene more agreeable to him that the Florentins should not recouer Pifa, yet knowing that it ould not belong kept without great expences & difficulties, and fearing withall leaft they should braine it by the French kings working, he hoped when hee was at Naples, to have bene able o induce the Pifans by his authoritie, to returne under honest conditions, to the obedience of he Florentins, who promised (fofarre forth as the action were accomplished) to confederate with him, and to giue him within a certaine time, an hundred thoufand duckets: but not finding in he Pifins that conformitie and denotion which hee expected , to let that the gratification and ecompence should not remaine onely to the French king, hee then protested openly to the Florentine Embassadours, that if they should attempt in any fort to reconquer Pifa without his ayde, hee would manifestly object his power against them, and the French king (to turne him from those thoughtes which hee had to manage that enterprise by armes) hee entertained cunningly with deuises full of varieties, sometimes perswading that he hoped to draw them in the end to some composition, and sometimes he justified that the Pifans were under his protection: a matter no

leffe false and contrarie, then his deuises were vaine and fabulous : for albeit the Pisans had made many folicitations to him, with offers to indue him with the absolute jurisdiction of their towne, vet entertaining their requestes with hopes, and keeping his intentions dissembled, he alwayes forbare to accept them, knowing what it was to take vpon him the protection of a warre popular and confused. But this matter being more particularly debated in Sauona, they concluded that it were good and necessarie, the Pifans should returne under the jurisdiction of the Florentins, so farreforth as either of them might talt of the profit: the fame being the cause that the Florentins (fearing to stirre too much the mind of the king of Aragon) forbare to give the spoyle that yeare to the haruelt of the Pisans: an action wherein they had reposed a great hope, for that what by the want of victuals, and weaknesse of forces in the towne, the Florentine souldiours ouerranne to the whole countrey euen to their gates: and the peoples of the maine countrey, more mightie in numbers within the towne then the proper Citizens, grieuing much to loofe the fruite of their trauell for the whole yeare, began to abate much of their accultomed obstinacie. Besides, their generall cause was no more succoured by their neighbours as before, for that the Genowayes ouergrieued with so many calamities, had no more the same thoughts, Pandolffe Petrucci made wearie betweene importunitie and suspition, foundalso the charges intollerable: and they of Lucquois, albeit they ministred secretly to their wants, yet their abilitie was no more sufficient to beare out so great a burden, being for the present no lesse heavie and intollerable, then in expectation, jealousie and full of perill. The two kings departed from Sauona the fourth day, with the same demonstrations of concord and amitie: the one tooke his course by sea to Barcelonia, and the other returned by land into France, leaving the other affaires of Italie in the fame degree, but with a greater discontentment of the Pope, who taking of new his occasion vpo the stirre made by Anmball Bentiuole, had made instance by Cardinall de S. Prassida to the king at Sauona, to deliuer vp to him as prisoners low Bentiuole and Alexander his sonne, whom he kept retained in the Duchie of Millan: he alledger that fince they had broken the contract made in Bolognia by the interpoling of Monsieur de Chanmone, the king was at libertie & no further bound to keepe his faith, offering withall that if his maiestie would latisfie his defire, he would send the Cardinall cap to the Bishop of Alby. The king an fwered, that albeit he could difcerne in them no sufficient apparance of fault or crime, yet for tha he would fornewhat bridle and restraine their dispositions, he had kept retained many dayes in the Castell of Millan, Iohn Bentiuole, but not finding good matter wherein they had offended, he ought to have no leffe regard to the innocencie of the parties, then to his proper honour, vnde the which hee flood bound to keepe his faith: and yet to gratific the Pope and leave him fatisfier of his inclination, he faydhe was disposed to suffer him to proceede against them with curses and paines, as against the rebels of the Church, even as he had endured without complaint that in Bo benia in the heate of that stirre, their Pallace was destroyed even to the foundations.

The Dyot of Constance continued still with the same expectation of men wherewith it was begun, which Cafar forgat not to nourish with diverse sleightes and gallant wordes, publithing that hee would passe into Italie so accompanied, that farre greater forces then the armie of Fraunce and all Italie joyned together, should not be able to refift him. And to give great ter value and authoritie to his cause (alwayes protesting that he had onely fixed in his intentior the protection of the Church) headuertised the Pope and Colledge of Cardinals, that he had declared the French king rebell and enemie to the facred Empire, for that he had descender into Italie to transferre into the person of the Cardinall of Amboyse the supreme dignitic pontificall, and to fet you his owne head the crowne Imperiall, and laftly to driue the whole region of Italie into one seruile subjection: That he prepared to come to Rome onely to take the crowne, and to establish a common suretie and libertie: And lastly, that in regard of his Imperiall dignitie being protectour of the Church, and for his proper pietie verie deuout and desirous to aduaunce the Sea Apostolike, it was not conuenient he should tarie to be required or prayed, knowing well inough, that the Pope for feare of perill and harmes was flee from Bologma, and that the same seare kept restrained both him and the religious Colledge from communicating their daungers, or fending to demaund fuccours. Thus the matters which were treated in Germanie being by manie intelligences fignified into Italie, and the brute that was spread surpassing the truth of things, together with the generall preparations which the French king made, being causes enforcing more credit and testimonie of the

iblike rumours, for that it was beleeved that he feared not without occasion. These things (1 y)moved much the mindes of every one, some for defire of new things, some for hope, some g feare, some for respectes generall, and some for their private and particular interestes; In so wich as the Pope fent as Legate to Maximilian, the Cardinall of Saint Croffe, and the Veneans, the Plorentines, with all other Potentates in Italie, (except the Marquis of Mantua) at were absolute and depended upon themselues, addressed to him messengers speciall, eier in the name of Embassadours, or undersome other nature, every one foreseeing for his seconding to the leasonstee of the time. These things troubled much the minde of the ench king, being veric doubtfull of the will of the Venetians, and more vincertaine of the difofition of the Pope, as well for many reasons and experiences of things past, as especially that shad elected to this legation Cardinal Saint Croffe, in whom had remained an auncient and artiall inclination to further the greatnesse of Maximilan. But touching the will of the Pope, such lesse that it was manifest to others, seeing it was searsly knowen to himselfe: for, hang his minde full of discontentments and suspitions against the French king, fometimes (to e at libertie from those humours wandring and troublesome) hee defired the counting of afar: and eftfoones the memorie of auncient quarrels betweene the Popes and Emperours, diftered and amazed him, the same occasions remaining, and the same propertie of spirits working. which incertaintie and frailtie of minde, he deferted to refolue himfelfe, expecting first what ould be determined in the Dyot: and therfore proceeding in termes generall, he had instructed e Legate to perswade Casur in his name to passe into Italie without an armie, offering to him eater degrees and proportion of honours then euer had bin done by any Pope at the crowning Emperors, But a litle after (the countels of men obey occasions and times) the expectations that ere had of the resolutions in the Dyot, began to diminish for when it was credibly understood in ermanic, that the French king had dissolved his armie immediatly after the victorie of Genes, his erfon also returning with the same fidelitie & observation of promise over the mounts, the heate the Princes and peoples began to abate, and their fierie inclinations to resolue to smoke and me, the feare being ceasifed that he came not to viurpe the Popedome and the Empire . Besides s it often hapneth) publike respectes seil not so strongly in consideration, but they were outreaed with interests prinate; for that, besides alsother reasons, there was a generall and auncient dere in all Germanie, that the greatnesse of Emperours should not be so absolute, as the other estates rould be compelled to obey them. And the French king omitted no diligence that might give luauncement to his caufe, for that he fent to Conflance, men expresse, who for bearing all publike actife, but working fecretly, laboured by the hidden fauours of the Princes that were his friends, appeale the mindes of the relidue, purging the infamies that had bene imposed by tellification nd cuidence of the effects, fince affoone as he had ranged Genes, he did not onely disperse his arsie, but also returned in person into Fraunce, with that speede that was agreeable to a personage this greatnesse: they affirmed besides that he had not only abstained in example and action from ffending the Empire of Rome, but also in all confederations, contractes, or bondes, he did alwayes rotest and except that he would bee bound to nothing that was contrarie to the rights of the fared Empire: wherein neuerthelesse they reposed not so much in these justifications, but that they boured with great diligence and many liberalities to abate the fierce mindes of the Almains with se engine of goldand filuer, whereof that nation is not a litle couetous: A batterie of no litle force ,, make breaches into the mindes of most fortes & properties of men, that beare more inclination corruption then to vertue. The Dyot at last determined and brake up the twentith day of Au-,, uff, in the which was agreed, after many disputations, that there should be deliucred to Cafar to allow himinto Italie, eight thousand horse, & xxij.thousand sootmen, payed for six moneths, and o furnish the expenses of the artilleries, with other charges extraordinary, six thousand Florins of Them to be continued so long as the artillerie was in service : the bands and regiments to be in the ieldand affemble neare Constance about the middelt of October. It was published at that time, hat they would happly have furnished him with a greater proportion of men & money, if Maximinan had cofented that the enterprise (alwayes under his gouernment & counsell) had bin mana. ged wholly in the name of the Empire, & that the election of Captaines had passed by order from he Empire, and distribution of the places that should be conquered to be made according to the determination of the Dyot: but Maximilian retaining (lill a fingler ambition in this jorney, would Cc iij

admit no companion or communitie of name or authoritie (albeit all went under a generall title o the name of the Empire) and much leffe fuffer that the rewardes of the victorie should apperting to any other then to him and his:in fo much as flanding better contented with the aides they deliuered to him in this fort, the to go better accompanied, with an authoritie affiltant, there was made no other resolution. And yet albeit it answered not the expectation that men had conceived afore. yet ceasifed not for all that the feare that was in Italie of his discending: for it was confidered that the fouldiers which his subjectes would give him, with such as he would leavie of himselfe, being iouned to those bands that were erected in the Dyot, he would come appointed with a very mightie armie, compounded of bodies resolute and trayned, and furnished with fundry natures of artilleries: a matter so much the more to bee feared, by how much Maximilian, for the dispofition of his nature, and long exercise in armes, was very able and sufficient in martiall discipline, and could well beare, with the labour of his body and facultie of his minde, all aduer fities and difficulties whatfocuer: a fufficiencie for the which he merited more, and caried away greater reputation then had bene given to any Emperours many ages before. He laboured befides, to leavie and bring into his pay ten thousand Swiffers, whereunto albeit the Bailife of Dion and others sent by the French king, did oppose and object with great instance in the Dyots of that nation, reducing to memorie the alliance continued for so many yeares with the crowne of France, and eftsoones lately confirmed by the kingraigning, together with the many fortes of profites which their peoples received by the convertation of Fraunce: and on the other fide, they preferred their old and fetled quarrels with the house of Austria, their gricuous warres they have had with Maximilian, and laftly what indifferent perill and prejudice the greatnesse of the Empire brought to them. Yet all these not withstanding, in the Parliaments and Dyots of the Sweffers, appeared a manifest inclination and defire to fatisfie the demaundes of Calar, or at the least not to take armes against him, for that (as was fuppoied) they would not offend the generall name & state of Germanie, which it seemed was intangled and joyned to this action. For this reason many doubted that the French king. if he were abandoned of the Smiffers, or that the Venetians fayled to joyne with him, being not furnished with a sufficient strength of footemen to refist the footbands of the enemies, and hoping that the furie of the Almaines entring into Italie as a landflood, would vanish and dissolut for want of money, would retire his army into townes; the likelihood whereof was already manifel in this, that with a wonderfull diligence he fortified the Juburbes of Felulan, with many other places in the Duchie of greatest importance. In regard of which alterations and preparations, the Venetsans were travelled in no lefte perplexitie of minde then the other regions of Italie, and by how much their deliberations and counfels were of greatest consequence, by so much more butie, and greater were the paines and diligence that every one tooke to have them joyne with him: for / afar from the beginning, had addressed to them three Embassadours of great authoritie, not only to so licite that he might have free passage through their dominions, but also to induce them to contract with him a straiter alliance, wherein should be agreed that they should participate in the rewardes of the victoric protesting to them on the contrarie, that it was in his power to accord to their preindice with the French king, with the fame conditions that to often had bene offered to him at diucrs times. On the other fide, both by his Embaffadours, and the Oratour of Venice that was relident in his Court, laboured to perswade them to oppose with maine hand against the comming of Cafar as a matter of equall prejudice both to the one and other, offering for his part the service of all his forces, and to remaine their perpetuall confederate. But in those dayes the Senate was not contented that the tranquillitie of Italie should be troubled, neither were they caried into humors of new rumultes, by the hopes that were offered to enlarge their dominions: for they had proved by a finarting experience, that the benefite and fruite of the conquest of Cremona, did not counteruaile the suspitions and daungers wherein they had bene continually holden, fince they had the French king so neare a neighbour. They could willingly have bene contented to be newters, but being pressed with the importunities of the Emperour, they stood in a necessitie either to refuse or graunt him paffage: if they refused him, they feared to be the first that should be vexed: and in gratifying his demaundes, they offended directly the French king, being exprelly forbidden in their reciprocall confederation, to graunt passage to the enemies of the one or other: and they were not ignorant, that beginning once to offend him, it would be great judiferetion after Maximilian were past, to be idle beholders of the issue of the warre, and expect the actions of the Princes, whereof be one would be an enemy to the name of the Venetian, and the other having received no other leafurethen libertie of paffage, had no great occasion to be their friend: Respects which wrought nuch with the Senate, that it was necessarie to sticke openly to the one or other parties, but to vhether of them, their opinions, for the importance of the matter, were very different: and thereore, being no longer able to temporife in a cause so carnestly laboured by the Embassadours of oth Princes, they made it at last a councell matter in the Senate house of the Pregati, where Niholas Foskarm vied this forme of reasoning:

If it werein our power to fet downe a resolution, by the which might be continued the peace The Oration nd tranquillitic of our common weale amid to many conspiring deliberations of these great Prin- of Necholas es, I am fure there would be among it vs no varietic of opinion and counfell, & much leffe fhould Foskarin, ny hope or offers leade vs inclined to a warre of so great expences and perill, as is like to be this,, which standes now in preparation. But seeing in regard of the reasons and causes so often debated,, monest ys in our late affemblies, there is no expectation to entertaine that common tranquillitie: ,, re principall reason whereupon we are to establish our deliberation, is to consider whether we, nay believe that betweene the French king and king of Romains (dispairing once of our amitie), nay be contracted an vnion : or whether the hatreds betweene them be so mightie & resolute, as ,, let them from loyning together in one fociable vnitie: for if we were well affured of fuch a dan-,, er, it were to be proued that we ought not to depart fro the amity of the Frech king, both for that " ar forces being joyned in good faith and meaning with his for a commo defence, we should easiprotect our estate, and also it would be more honorable to continue the consederation we have ,, ith him, then by light enafions to fhift vs from it without enident occasion . Besides, we should ner with more recommendation and fauour of the world into a warre which should beare the tle and name of the protection of Italie, then to loyne with those atmies and powers which we, ,, namifeftly to be leavied to flirre commotions and troubles. But if we fet before our eyes the junger of this vnion, I thinke it will not be denied that there is not great necessitie to preuent it, ,, nce it would be more profitable about all comparisons to ioune with the Emperour against the ench king, then to tarie till both the one and other be vnited against vs . And albeit it is hard to , dge certainly which of the two will happen, for that it is a thing that not onely dependeth of the,, ill of others, but also is subject to many accidents and occasions, which scarcely will leave this re-,, lution in the power of those that ought to execute it: yet, for that the experience of times past is, true instructour of things to come, and that matters that are to succeede can not be comprehened but by coniccture, we may differne that in this is more perill then profite, lesse suretiethen co-,, dence, & an action whereof we ought to have great suspition and scare. For, as touching the king,, Romains, it is not like that he shall finde any great impediments, considering with what scruenc ,, fire he aspireth to passe into Italie, which he can not do with any conueniencie or reason, valese, ioyne with the French king or with vs. And albeit he foliciteth much our alliaunce, yet if we rele him who doubteth but necessitie will drive him to seeke confederatio with the French, having, oother meane to accomplish his purposes. Touching the French king, it seemeth there are farre,,, eater difficulties for this vnion: but yet I hold them not fuch, as vnder them we may promife to ,, ar felues any furetie: for that he may be caried to that deliberation by fuspition & ambition, two " ightie motions in the mindes of great Princes, either of them in his fingler nature, being able to,, iue on those thoughts that are already raised to dominion: he marketh well the instance that Ca-,, r maketh to enter vnitie with vs, and nicafuring (albeit with falle weightes) our intention and de-,, re, he may doubt that the fame suspition that we have, not to be prevented by him, induceth vs ,, prevent him, knowing also that we have good intelligence of those things which so long time, ney have confulted together against vs. Lastly, he may feare that we are allured by ambition, looing into the liberalities and offers that may be made to vs; & from this feare there cabe no meane, ifficient to affire him, seeing there is nothing that naturally breeds more suspition then matters of, flate. And besides suspition, he may be driven on by ambition, having a desire as we know to the litie of Cremona, wherunto he finall be the more kindled by perfivations of the Millanois, and no, esse for a thirst to occupie all the auncient estates of the Viscounts, which he pretendeth to be his, pheritaunce aswell as the Duchic of Millan: to these he can not hope to aspire, if he first seeke not ,, onfederacie with the king of Romains, for that our common weale being mightie of it felfe, if the ,, rench king affaile vs alone or of his proper forces, it will alwayes stand in our power to joyne with ,,

" Maximilian: which thoughtes as they have alwayes occupied his minde, fo in this it is also appre-" ned, that he neuer durst life up his hand to oppresse vs without that vnion, which being the direct " line to leade him to the marke he shoots at, why should we not feare that in the end he will be difoposed to ithwe are not assured fro this searce by the consideration that it would be a resolution vapro-"fitable to him, for the coquering of two or three Cities, to bring into Italy the king of Romains his " naturall enemy, of whom in the end he should be alwayes molested, and with whom he should neer uer haue friendship but vncestaine, and yet such as by this reason he should be alwayes driuen to " buy and entertaine with great fummes of money: for that if he feare that we will not joyne with "the king of Remains, he is to thinke that in preventing, vs , he shall not onely put himselfe out of "daunger, but also shall stand in securitie. And though he do not seare this vnion, yet he may happly " judge it necessarie to confederate with him, to deliver himselfe from the troubles & daungers which " he may fuffer by him, either by reason of the aides of German, or by other alliances and occasions. "And albeit greater daungers may happen to him if the king of Romains begin once to let foote in "Italie, yet it is the common nature of men to feare most the daungers that be nearest at hand, to " efteememore then is necessarie things prefent, and to hold lesse reckning then they ought of such es as are farre off and to come, seeing that to the same are referred many hopes of remedies, as well by * the fauour of times, as benefite of accidents: but be it that it were not profitable for the Frechking ec to make this vnion, we are not affured for all that, that he will not do it: the mindes of men are sub-" iect to many mutations, sometimes altered by feare, and sometimes blinded by couetousnesse: we " know that the nature of Frenchmen is light, and ready to embrace any new enterptifes, and whole hopes are neuer leffethen their defires: we are not ignorant, with what perswasions and offers (fuf-" ficient to kindle any minde) the French king is stirred against vs by the Millanois, the Pope, the " Florentins, the Duke of Ferrara, & by the Marquis of Mantra. It is not given to all men to be wile and forefeeing, no it is a gift that rarely discendes, and that but to a few; but who will prognofficate what will be the deliberations of another, let him (if he will not deceive himselfe) not so much con-"fider those things which by similitude and likelyhood would make a wise man, as what is the spi-" rite and nature of him that is to make the deliberation: And therefore if we will judge of that the " French king will doe, we are not to regard so much what belongeth to the office of discretion and Wisdome, as to confider the naturall humours of the French, light, wandring, and oftentimes accu-"formed to proceede more with furie and rathnesse, then with counsell or foresight: We must con-" fider that the natures and inclinations of great Princes are not like to ours, neither so moderate in " their affections, nor so easie to resilt their appetites as prinate, for that by how much more they " are accustomed to be honored in their kingdomes, and absolutely obeyed, by so much more are " they made not onely imperious and infolent, but raying their will about reason or law, they " can not endure not to obteine that which they hold for iuft: and that feemes just to them which "they defire, being perswaded that they have power to make plaine with a word both hilles and "mountaines, to remove all impediments, and to furmount the nature of things: yea they hold " it a shame to restraine their inclinations for any difficulties, and measuring commonly great things with the fame rules wherewith they are wont to proceede in actions more inferiour, their coun-& fels hane leffe communitie with diferetion and reason, then with will and arrogancie: vices which about all other Princes, have molt focietie and participation with the French nation: the fame being confirmed with the late example of the kingdome of Naples, where the French king induced by ambition and indifferetion, confented that the moytie of the kingdome should divolve to the Spaniard, not feeing how much he weakned his power (afore absolute and supreme among stall the " Italians) to bring into Italia another king equall to himselfe in authoritie, and nothing inferiour in " might. But why proceede we by coniectures in things whereof we have a certaintie : we are not gignoraum of that which the Cardinall of Amboyse treated at Trent with Maximilian himself tou-" clung the dinision of your estate: And we know well inough that to the same practise, they joyned " also a conclusion in the towne of Blogs, and the Cardinall going for the same cause into German, " brought backe the oath and ratification from Cafar . And albeit I confesse these practises brought "forth no effectes in regard of certaine difficulties that hapned, yet who can affure vs, that there will or not be found some meane to range or remoue those difficulties, which have bene impediments to " their common defire: fince their principall intention remaineth alwayes one. These be the reasons that make me conclude, what necessitie we have to consider with diligence, the imminent perils, ie infinite charges, and perpetuall infamies, which on all fides do offer to darken and deface the " incient reputation and wisedome of this Senate, if measuring vnaduisedly the condition of the, Faires present, we suffer that another pur vs in seare, and come to inuade vs with those armes, hich be offered to vs for our furetie and augmentation of estate. Let vs consider (for the benefite , our countrey) what is the difference betweene mouing warre to another, and to expect till an ,, ther inuade vs, to dispute how to divide the estate of another, and to temporise till the same pe-,, If fall upon vs; and to be accompanied against one onely, or to remaine alone against many: for, if ,, efe two kings knit and draw to conspiracie against vs, they are sure to be followed with the affiice of the Pope, by reason of the townes in Romagnia, to have many commodities fro the king , Aragon, by reason of the ports of Naples, & to finde many friendships through all Italie, some eking to recouer, and some to be assured . Lastly, being not ignorant how mightily the French ,, ng hath conspired against vs, & for so many yeares communicated with Cafar to our prejudice: >> hinke that if we arme our selues against him that hath sought to surprise and beguile vs , much , Te that we shall merite imputation, or be touched with the crime of faith breakers, but of the " ntrarie, the world will respect vs as fathers to our countrey, prouident, wise, and just, and vpon head thall be broken the brand of that perill and daunger, which euerie one knoweth hee kin- » ed to have confumed vs.

To the contrarie of this opinion, Andrea Gritti a personage of great valour and vertue, rose vp dreasoned in this sort :

If it were convenient that in one felfe matter, the counsels and opinions of men might be re- The Oration red to voyces doubtfull, I confesse my adule should have no other reference, the present matdrawing on all fides such varietie of reasons, that the nature and consideration of them leades into confusion: But for that there is necessitie of resolution, which can not be made upon sountions and suggestions incertaine, it behoueth vs , paysing well the reasons that impugne both one and other, to embrace those which drawnearest to a likenesse and similitude of truth, and ie most mightie coniectures: which when I distinguish and examine, I can not finde that the ench king, neither for suspition to be presented of vs, nor for defire of townes which earst apreained to the Duchie of Millan, will agree to bring the king of Romains into Italie against vs: the daungers and harmes which fuch an enterprise draweth with it, are farre more manifest & eat, then the perils that may happen by our vnitie with Cafar, or the profites that he may hope by that resolutionsseeing, besides the other natures of injuries & hatreds between them, there oncurrance of dignitie and estates, a matterable to set division betweene the best established ends among mortall men: In fo much as the French king, calling into Italy the king of Romans, who thought to do no other thing, then in place of a common weale peaceable, and remaining, vayes in good denotion and friendship with him, to desire rather the neighbourhood of a king abitious, iniurious, and nourifhing a thousand occasions to quarrell with him, as well by reason of authoritie and estate, as in regard of disdaine and reuenge. Let no man say, because the king of omains is poore, disordered, and unfortunate, that the French king feares not his neighbourhood, ang that for the memorie of the auncient factions and inclination of Italie, which remaine yet, adled in many places, and especially in the Duchie of Millan, an Emperour of Rome can not ue so litle a nest in Italie, which will not spread and multiplie to the great prejudice and daunr of others, but chiefly on the person of this man hangeth greatest feares and leasousies, being a ince of high stomacke, of great conduit and experience in warre, and to whom may be joyned e interest of the children of Lodowik Sforce, a ready meane to stirre vp the mindes of many: he ay also hope to draw to him in any action of warre against the French, the powers of the atholike, though for no other respect, yet at least for that both their estates are to discend to one eire. The French king is not ignorant, how mightie is Germanie, nor how easie it is to vnite either ne whole or part when the way shall be made open in Italie, and the hope of pray and spoile layd, fore them. And we have well seene what feare he hath alwayes had of the discending of the Alzains, and the king of Romains how poore and disordered soeuer he be, who if he were in Italie, it vere not reasonable to thinke that he should have with him any other thing then a warre full of perils and aductifities, and a peace ill affured, and yet dearely bought. It may be he thirsteth to reconer Cremona and happly all the other townes, but there is no conformitie or likely hood, that he will mbrace a great daunger, to get a thing whose value is lesse then the aduenture. No, it is more cre-

" dible that he will proceede in this case rather with discretion then rashnesse, seeing by the consi deration of the errors heretofore imposed vpon that king, we shall find that they proceeded of n other infirmity then of his great defire to make his enterprises with furety: wherein I referre vo " to his examples in the actions of Naples and Gremona, being induced to make partition of tha kingdome, and to deliuer to vs the city of Cremona, for no other reason, then to make more eas " the victory of those warres: so that it is more credible that even at this present he will rather follow his cultome and wife counfels, then be caried with aduites fudden and rash, seeing withall he re maineth not altogether deprined of hope to accomplish his expectations with the fauour of ano "therrime, in more furety, and with better occasion, which is a thing which mortall men are won to promife to themselves easily, the error being lesse to promise a change and revolution of world " ly affaires, then to perswade that they are alwayes firme and stable: neither doth that much a " maze me which I fayd, those two kings have treated so often amongst themselves, for that it is: " custome with the Princes of our time to entertaine one another artificially with vaine hopes, and "diffembled practifes: which, for that in fo many yeares they have brought foorth no effect, it can " not be that they were other then faire shewes, fictions, and shadowes of things, or else nourished in themselves such difficulties as they could not be resolved, the very nature of the affaires resisting " to take away the distrustes that are betweene the, without which foundation they have no mean " to come to that conjunction. So that I cannot feare that for the couctoufnesse of our townes, the "French king will throw himselfe headlong into so indiscrete a deliberation, and much lesse will h " attempt an action to casuall for any suspition he hath of vs, for that besides the great knowledge " and experience he hath of our intentions, having no want of perswasions, and occasions to leave " his alliance, the fame reasons by the which we are assured of him, wil interchangeably hold him as "fured of vs. for nothing can be more prejudiciall to vs then the king of Romains to have any estat in Italie, no lesse for the authority of the Empire, ouer whose amplification and greatnesse we ough alwajes to stand feareful & ielous, then for the ambition of the house of Austria, pretending intere to many of our towns, but most of al for the neighborhood of Germanie, whose inundations canc "but be too perilous for vs & our dominio, we bearing withal a brute to haue all our counsels ripe! "measured, & to erre more in being too hard & slow, then to proceede with too much rashnesse an es credulity. I denie not but things may fall out contrary to the opinió of men; for that worldly action oftentimes draw with them effects trange, and farre about the expectations and wildomes of mo ce tall men, & therfore who could fet down any warrant or furety, were not of the least merite or ce "mendation: but fince that cannot be done without entring into most huge dangers and difficu "ties, we must consider that oftentimes vaine searcs are no lesse hurtful then too great considence! " credulity: if we enter confederation with the king of R omains against the French king, the wan "must necessarily be begun and continued with our monies, which we must also advance to furnis " all his prodigalities and disorders, otherwise he will either accord with the enemy, or retire int "Germanie, leaving vpon our shoulders the whole burden and peril of the quarrell: we must suffer " a war against a most mighty king of France, Duke of Milla, Lord of Genes, a Prince enuironed will " many regiments of men at armes, and no leffe mightie in artilleries and provisions, & at the bruter whole payes and money will draw to him from all nations infinite bands of footmen. Besides, who "hope of good successe can be nourished in this enterptife, seeing we cannot but seare, that ina "those of Italy which either pretend against vs, or that we hold any thing of theirs, or at least stan ielous ouer our greatnesse, will not be a dispositio to draw into cospiracy against vs, but especiall "the Pope, to whom, befides his disdaines towards vs, the power of the Emperour in Italy will no "uer be acceptable, for a naturall hatred that hath alwayes bene betweene the Church and the Em "pire, the same making the Popes to have no lesse seare of the Emperors in things temporall, the "they have of the Turkes in matters spirituall. And this conjunction haply may be more dangerou to vs. then the vnion which we feare betweene the king of R omains and the French king: for that " where is fociety of many Princes, which pretend to be equall, there commonly do kindle suspitio " and debates, by which oftentimes it hapneth, that those enterprises which have bene begun with "no small reputation, slide easily into many difficulties, and lattly into dissolution and ruine: neither " ought we to make this a last confideration, that albeit the French king have entertained certain " practifes contrary to the alliance which we have with him, yet we have feene no effectes, by the which we may fay he hath dealt vniuftly with vs, and therefore to leavie warre against him, would

e no other thing then to merite imputation of infidelity & faith breaking, on the contrary wherfthis Senate ought to build his principall foundation, aswell for the honour as profite of the af- >> tires which we have every day to manage with other Princes. Neither can it be profitable to vs >> nourish & continually augment this opinion, to seeke to oppresse dayly all our neighbours, & " o aspire to the whole monarchy of Italy . I would in God, we had in times past proceeded more onfiderately, for almost all the suspicions that at this present are heaped against vs , have no other >> eginning then that heretofore we hanctoo much offended them, and it will not be belowed, that » are draweth vs to a new warre against the French king our auncient confederate, but rather that » re are caried with certaine ambitious and couctous inclinations (ioyning with vethe king of Ro- >> nains) to win vponhim one part of the duchie of Millan, as we won vpon Lodowike Sforce, being >> ovned with him. In which time if we had gouerned our felues more moderately, and not feared " oo much suspitions vaine and light, neither should the affaires of Italy stand presently in such so ouble and afteration, neither we, in whom should have bene preferued a renowne of greater moeffic and gravity, should not now be constrained to enter into war either with this Prince or that >> cince, more mighty then our selues. Into which nature of necessity, seeing we are falne, it cannot » ut be more to our wildom and profit, not to depart from the confederation we have with the rench king, then ouerruled with a vaine feare, or hope of benefits vncertaine and hurtfull, to em- >> race a warre, which alone and of our fingular power, we should not be mighty inough to sup- » ort, and in those consociates and affistants which we should haue, would be found more burden >> ad charge, then aduantage or profit.

The opinions of the Senate were diverse in so great a variety of reasons: but in the end prevaid the memory of the inclination which they knew the king of Romains had long entertained, to of the Vene-

court vpon occasion the townes holden by them, which he pretended to appertaine to the Em-tians. re, or to the house of Austria. Their resolution was to graunt him passage if he came without an my, but comming armed with a power, they determined to denie him liberty to march: and in eanswer they gaue to his Embassadors, they seemed to perswade, that that conclusion was made ore by necessity, having regard to the condition of the time present, and confederation which ley had with the French, then by any disposition of will to leave him discontented for any matr. They alleaged, that albeit they were constrained by the same confederation to ayde him in e defence of the duchy of Millan with a proportion of men expressed in the same: yet in this actia they would proceede with a greater modesty, without exceeding in any fort their limites and ounds; and, except they were compelled to any action for the defence of Millan, they would not ppose against any other his aduancement, according to the true meaning of their affection, who farre as their power would firetch, would neuer fayle him with those oblations and reuerences hich became the Senate of Venice to beare to fo great a Prince, with whom they neuer had any ing then a perpetuall amitie and alliance: in commemoration whereof, they fought not to enter to new confederations and bonds with the French king, but defired to communicate as little as ney could with the watres that should be betweene them, hoping that Maximilian (not to inrease his owne difficulties) would at least leave their frontiers in peace, and embracing their asctions according to the simplicity and innocency thereof, to turne his atmieseither against Burundy, or the Duchy of Millan. But as enterprises of high importance are full of imperfections, and raw with them their proper impediments, so Cefar being out of hope to loyne with him the Vetians, many other difficulties began to fall vpon him, which albeit he labored to furmount with ne greatnesse of his spirit and conceptions, apt to promise him dayly more hopes then impedients, yet they delayed much the effects of his resolutions and purposes: for that, both of himlie he had not sufficient money to leavie his proportion of Swiffers, and furnish the other expenesnecessary for so great an enterprise, and also the treasures that were promised to his aide in the yot, were not sufficient to furnish the least part of the substance and body of the warre. And nefoundation whereupon from the beginning he had layde his greatest hopes, that the commualties and jurifdictions of Italy would for terror of his name and comming, offer composition and ontribution of money, grew euery day leffe and leffe: for, albeit in the beginning many fliewed certaine denotion, yet the conclusions of the Dyot of Constance not answering the expectation hat was conceived, that the enterprise should rather be of the whole Empire, and almost of all Germanie, then his owne in peculiar, and feeing haply into the mighty preparations of tho

French king, and the new declaration of the Venetians, every one remained in doubt, not daring (in ministring to him things whereof he had most neede) to offend so greatly the French king Neither were the demandes of Maximilian such in the time when he was most feared, as with their facility they might induce men to administer to his helpe: for, according to his conditions, he demanded much of enery one, wherein his rates imposed upon the Duke of Ferrara (whom he pretended did owe to Blanche his wife the dowry of his fifter Anne dead many yeares before) were excelline, and his porportions to the Florentins no leffe intollerable, vpon whom the Cardinall of Brexe, managing his affaires at Rome, and having power to compound with them, demanded five hundred thousand duckets: which demaund, for the immoderation thereof, was the cause that they resolved to temporise with him, till they discerned better what trainchis affaires would take, and withall (foreseeing not to offend him) they protested excuses to the French king demaunding men, which they fay d they could not accomplish for the impediments of the waste and spoyle to be given this yeare to the Pifans in great preparation, and for that the Genowaies and other neighbours beginning eftloones to administer new fuccours, they were constrained to stand continually prepared against them. In these regardes, the Emperour fayling (contrary to his hope) to have his turne ferued with the money of the Italians (having only fixe thousand duckets of them of Sienna) he made request to the Pope, that at the least he would suffer him to take the hundred thoufand duckets which had bene afore leavied in Germanie vnder colour to make warre vpon the Turkes, and being for that effect preserved in that province, they could not be converted to any other vie, without licence of the fea Apostolike: he offred him also, that where he could not satisf fie his demaund not to passe into Italy with an army, that neuerthelesse, after he had restored to the Duchy of Millan the children of Lodowike Sforce (the protection of whom he protested, both to make the peoples of the state more fauourable, and his passage more easie and lesse hatefull) he would go on to Rome without armes, to receive the Crowne Imperiall, leaving all his bands in the duchy of Millan. But the Pope, in whom appeared no more affection to the one then to the other refused also to satisfie him in this demaund, alleaging that in such a condition and estate of affaires he could not without his great daunger prouoke the armes of the French king against him . And yet Maximilian, according to the property of his inclination being carefull, credulous, & quick to execute all things of himfelfe with paines incredible, amidde fo many difficulties forgat nothing that might entertaine the brute of his difcending, and caufing to march the artilleries towards ma ny places of frontiers of Italy, he recontinued the practife to have the twelve thousand Swiffers who demanding many things, and propounding strange exceptions, gaue him not any certain resolution: he solicited the bands that were promised him, and trauelling in person from one place to another for diverse expeditions, he brought mens mindes into many confusions, their judge ments varying more through all Italy then earsthad bene seene in any other action: for in som the opinion of the enterprise was greater then ever, and others supposed it to be already in anc state declining, which incerteinty of mind was increased by himselfe, who being of nature secret and particular, did feldome communicate his thoughts with others, and to the end his intention should be lesse private in Italy, he had ordeined that the Popes Legate nor other Orator of the Italians should not followe his person, but keepe a parte in places removed from the Court.

Now was come the day appointed for the assembly of the Almain companies, of whom not withstanding there mustred at Constance but a very small crew, neither was seene any other preparations on his part, then removing of artilleries, and studying by what meanes he might recove money. In somuch as being uncertaine with what forces, in what time, and on which side he would enter: such as doubted him made mighty provisions in many places: some supposed would make his entry by Frinl, and others thought he would march by Trent into the countre of Verrona, others judged that comming by Savey, or by Coma, he would assay the Duchy of Millan having many of the exiles of that state in his campe; others stood in some doubt least he would make some stirre on that side to Burgondy. In regard of these feares, the French king sen to the Duchy of Millan many bands of horsemen and stootemen, and besides other preparation leavied for the defence of that state, he dispatched two thousand sine hundred Spanish footemer under the saucour of the king Catholike, to whom Casar complained greevously of such a sufferance. astellbelonging to that familie standing upon the lake Major: into Burgundie the king had also nt flue hundred Launces, under Monsieur Trimonille gouernour of that Province. And to draw vay in many places the thoughts & forces of Cafar, he succoured continually the Duke of Gueles, who molested the countreys of Charles the litle some of the Emperour. Besides all this, he differe to Verona John Lacques de Trinulce with foure hundred French Launces, and foure thound footemen, to the succours of the Venetians, who had also sent to Rouera the Count Petilno with four hundred men at armes, and many bandes of footemen, to the end to remaine ere for the repressing of those stirres that might arise towardes Trent: and to Frint were sent ght hundred men at armes vinder Bartlemen Aluiano, who long time before was entred into eir payes. But the first daunger appeared on that side which was least doubted, for that Paule aptista Instinian and Fregosia exiles of Genes, ledto Casuola, a towne belonging to Lodomike on fagura feodar of the Empire, a thousand Almaine societien, who marching secretly and with eat diligence ouer the mountaines and impassible places of the Venerian territorie, had an intenon to go to Gener, after they had passed by the river of Po along the mountaine of Parma. This pedition being doubted of by Monsteur Chaumont, he dispatched suddenly to Parma many referren and footmen, to give impediment to the enemie, which fo cut off all hope from the Aluns, to be able to execute any thing against Genes, that they returned into Germanie by the same ry, but not with the fame diligence & daunger, for that the Venetians, respecting their comon befite, made a secret consent to their retiring. There were at the same instant, many of the exiles of nes in the towne of Bolognia, which draue the king into a suspicion, that this matter had bene ought by the confent of the Pope, of whose inclination and will, many other things put him in ubr, both for that the Emperour was folicited to match by the Cardinall S. Croffe, not with stanig more of his proper motió & disposition, then for any other oceasió: & also the exiles of Furly ing by chace iffired out of Faenza, & affaying one night to enter into Furly, the Pope coplained tit was a matter compact betweene the French king & the Venetrans. To these was added the piracie of a Monke, who being prisoner in Mantua, had cofessed that he had practised with the ille of Bentuole to empoyson the Pope, & that he was solicited from M. de Chaumont to perme all his promifes to the Bentinoles: by reason whereof the Pope proceeding by examinatio in me authentike, sent it to the king by Achilles de Grassi, Bishop of Pesera, and afterwards Carall, to make request that the truth might be knowen, proceeding to the punishment of such as all be found guilty in fo great a wickednes. In fo much as Alexader Bentinole, being suspected re then the refidue, was adjourned by the king to appeare & answer in Fraunce to such things ie was to be charged withall. With these actions and incertainties, ended the yeare 1507. But in the beginning of the yeare following, the trauelling mindes of them of Bolognia, no lon-disposed to nourish their tranquilitie, drew into conspiracie, and being led by Anniball and rmio Bentinole, who had intelligence with certaine young Gentlemen of the familie of the polies, with others of race and yeares equall, they approched upon the fudden Bolognia: an erprise not without perill, for that the conspiratours to the end to let in the residue, had occudthe gate of S. Mamola. But as it is easie to represse a violence in the beginning, so the people ing armes in fauour of the estate Ecclefiastike, the young men abandoned the gate with more ethen valour, and the Bentiuoleis retired, finding onely that fafetie in their adventure. s inuafion rather abated then inflamed the minde of the Pope against the French king, for that Maiestie shewing great tokens how much it did discontent him , commaunded Monsieur zumone to be ready to succour Bolognia, and all that depended upon it, in all necessities and assons: he gaue order besides, that from thencesoorth the Bentinoleis should not be recieued any part of the Duchie of Millan. By which restraint, John, one of the chiefest of them, dabout that time of displeasure, for that much lesse that he had bene accustomed afore he expulsed Bolognia to feele the aduartities or bitter blowes of fortune, seeing he had bene most happie of all the other tyrants of lealie, feruing a long time as an example of prospeas fortune: for , in the course of fortie yeares , during the which he commaunded as he would Bolognia, much leffe that he was touched with any heavie affliction, feeing in all that race of e he felt not so much as the death of any his friends: he had alwayes for himselfe and children, nions, appointments, and great honours of all the Princes in Italie, being followed withall with is felicity to escape easily out of all waightie and dangerous affaires: for all which graces and good 1508.

fucceedings, he feemed (besides the convenient situation of that Citie) to be principally beholdin to fortune, for that according to common judgement, he could not merite any thing by the prepertie of his wit, or by his willedome, and much lesse by any valour that was in his person.

Cafar now minding no more to deferre the mouing of armes, dispatched a Heralt to Veri na, to publish his resolution to passe into Italie to take the Imperial Crowne, and to requir lodging for fourethousand horse. Whereunto the gouernours of Verona, having first comm nicated with the counsell of Wenice, auswered him, that if he would passe for no other occasic then to receive the crowne, they would honour him with all the offices and oblernances the could, but they faw effects contrarie to his perswasions, having already brought & bestowed vpc their marches fo great proportions of men at armes and artilleries. In regard of which answer measuring by them the deuotion of others, Maximilian assoone as he was come to Trent, to git beginning to the warre, made a solemne procession the fourth of February, which he affisted person, having before him the Heralds of the Empire, and the Imperials sword naked, and in the end of the solemnitie, his Secretaric M. Lango afterwardes Bishop of Gurce, being mounted in to a high feat or theater, published in the name of Cofar his determination to passe in warlis array into Italie: he named him no more king of Romains, but Emperour elect, as are wo to be intituled the kings of Romans when they come to take the Crowne: And forbidding il fame day that none should iffue out of Trent, after he had caused to be baked a great quantitie Bisket, and made baskets of wood, and fent by the river of Adice fundry boates and lighters lo den with provisions , he went out of Trent the night after a little before day with a thousand fi hundred horse, and foure thousand footemen: not of those regimentes which were agreed to hi in the Dyot, but of the peoples of his Court and proper effates, taking the way that leades! those Mountaines to Vincensa. At the same time the Marquis of Brandebourgh marched towar Ronero with five hundred horsemen & two thousand footmen of the same countrey bodies, wi whom he returned the day after, with no memorie of other action then that he presented himse before Rovero, and demaunded in vaine to bee lodged in the towne. But the Emperour ck being come to the mountaine of Siagne, the foote whereof draweth within twelie myles of Vi censa, after he had taken the landes of the seuen communalties (a people so named dwelling the top of the Mountaine under many exemptions and priviledges of the Venetians) and at he had filled up many trenches which they had cast for their defence, and to stop the way, I caused to bee drawen thither many peeces of artillerie. Here it seemed that either his intenti had imperfection, or his fortune was contrarie to the disposition of the time, for, as me mindes entertained a wonderfull expectation of some good successe, hee retired from t place the fourth day after he departed from Trent, and returned to Bolfana, a towne furt removed from the confines of Italie, then Trent: wherein as it gave occasion to every one wonder at fo great an inconfideration, or rather inconstancie: fo, fo weake a beginning re ned eftfoones the mindes of the Venetians, in fo much that as they had already entertained in: bandes of footemen, fo they called to Rouero the French companies which were at Verona w Trivulce, and beginning to make great preparations; they stirred up the French king to do like, who marching towardes Italie, fent before an armie of fine thousand Swiffers of his pay and three thousand payed by the Venetians, that Nation (for that Maximilian was not a to minister pay to them) being runne without any regard to the intertainement of the Frence and yet after they were departed and payed, they would not go vpon the landes of the Vo tians, alledging for their reasons, that they would not serue the French king in any other action then for the defence of the estate of Millan, the second and the s

A greater flirre, but farre more wretched and vuhappie, as wherein was nourifled the liginning of greater things, was kindled in Frint, whither did paffe by the way of the Mountain and by Cafars appointment, four hundred horseand fine thousand footement, all bot commanded in his countrey of Tirols. Affoote as they were entredinto the valley of Cado they tooke the Borough and Castell, wherein was a verie hender garrison, together with Magistrate of the Venerians that was within, which being undersood at Venice, they commanded Almano and George Cornaro Superintendent remaining upon the landes of Vincentia, that he feedly to the succours of that countrey; and to keepe occupied the enemies on that of they sent towardes. Trent source light galleys with certain vessels for their nature. And at me time Maximilian, who was marched from Bolfano to Brunech, and turning to the way of rul for the oportunitie of the passages, & largenesse of the countrey, ran through certaine valleys orethen fortie myles within the territories of the Venetians, with a strength of fix thousand footen leavied in those quarters: and after he had taken the valley of Cadora which leadeth to Trevileauing behind him the borough of Bostauro lately apperteining to the Patriarkes of Aquilea, he oke the borough of S. Martin, the borough of Pieua, & the valley which was kept by the Counts Sauorgina, with other places adioyning, He performed these incursions rather in the propertie of i inferiour Captaine, then in the person and maiestie of a king, more contented with victories of eane persons & places, then seeking after actions of importance according to the expectation of s name and vertue. And after he had spent some dayes in these trisling services, he commaunded s companies to draw to Trensfan, and returned himselfe upon the end of Februarie to Ispruch to / Iewels in pawne, and make other prouisions for money, wherof being rather a prodigall waster, en a temperate distributer, no reasonable quantitie could suffice to surnish the necessitie of his aires: for that his wantes could not be fatisfied with the abundance of things, fince he measured or his fufficiencic according to the kinde of neede, but after the rage of his opinion and prodigalis. But ynderstanding on the way that the Swiffers had taken the pay of the French, he was not a e discontented with them, and so went to Vima a Cirie of Smania, to induce that ligne to ayde n as they had done in times past in the warre against the Swiffers: he made also vehement innce to the Electours, that the aydes promifed in the Dyot of Constance, might be yet rentinued for fixe moneths more, alledging that the action of great enterprises require a long and liberate time. And about this season the regimentes of the estates which were abyding at Trent the number of nine thousand bodies aswell footemen as horsemen, had battered the Castell of noquo, and ranged it to discretion within three dayes: it standes right ouer against Ronero on right hand, vpon the high way that leades from Trent into Italie, and betweeneit and Ronewhich is on the left hand, runneth the river of Adica.

Aluiano departed in great diligence to fuccour Friul, and paffing along the mountaines la- Aluiano being with snowes, he came in two dayes neare to Cadora, where expecting his trayne of foote- fent to successive n, who could not march with the same speede and swiftnesse, he occupied a passage not gar - the rout to the lby the Abnaines, by the which is made the entrie into the valley of Cadora: and as in a ge- Almaines, all perill a litle comfort profiteth much, fo at the comming of Aluiano, the men of the counraffected to the iurisdiction of Venice, taking new courage, commaunded the other pases of the valley by the which the Almaines were to retire : who feeing themselues, inclosed, Ino hope of fafetie but by the fword, and judging by the disposition of Aluiano that he would ly strengthen himselse, marched out against him in great furie: hee refused not the offer of fight, taking no lesse courage in the oportunitie of the enemie, then in the innocencie of the arrell, whereupon began betweene both parties a most cruell fight, wherein the Almaines, o fought with great rage, more for defire to dye glorioully, then that there was hope to e their liues, and casting themselues in a grosse squadron, their wives in the middest, made a ant defence for certaine houres: but as in actions of battell God oftentimes gives the victorie, to those that fight best, but to such as he foundereth most, so the Almaines, not able nakelong refiltance, both for the numbers and vertue of the enemies, were in the end vanthed, more then a thousand of them remaining dead on the place, and the residue falling De prisoners according to the aduenture and fortune of the fight. After this victorie Aluiano ning diligence and expedition to his felicitie, tooke the Castell of Cadora, which he assaulted on partes, Charles Malateste one of the auncient Lordes of Rimini being slaine with a quarrell our of a tower: and following still the streame of his fortune and good successe, he tooke Por-Vauona, and afterwardes Cremonfa fituate vpon the height of a hill, & fo difcended to encampe te Garnes, standing at the foote of the Alpes of Iulian, strong by situation, and no less mightie the munition it containes, and hath a Castell of very hard accesse: and taking first the bridge Goritia, and planting afterwardes his artilleries before the towne, he caried it the fourth day by emposition, being in great necessitie of weapons, water, and victuals. After the towne was com-Inded, the Caltlekeeper and companies within the Caltell, eschewing their proper calamities by examples of their fellowes, came to rendring after they had received four thousand duckets. he Fenetians crected there forthwith many fortifications to ferue as a bulwarke & bridle against the Turkes, and to hold them in feare for passing the river of Lisons, since with the oportunities that place there might be easie impedimentes given to their retraites. From Goritia Alviano may ched to encampe before Triessa, a Citie at the same time much molested by the sea, which tooke easily, not without the discontentment of the French king, who gave counsell not to previous for much the king of Romains: but for that it stood vpon the gulse of Venice, and by that refor very convenient for their traffikes, they, made proud by the prospective their fortune, count be discounselled to follow the course of their victorie: in some has after the action of Triessand the Castell, they tooke Portonon, and afterwards Fianne, which is a town of Eschamonia into prospect of Ancora, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would pass by the sea Adriations, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would pass by the sea Adriations, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would pass the sea Adriations, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would pass the sea Adriations, which they burned, for that it was the retraite of the ships which would pass the sea adriations.

Alpes, they tooke Possonia, which is upon the marches of Hungarie. These were the enterprises that were done in the countrey of Frial: But on that side toward Trent, the Almaine armie which was now come to Calliana, a towne famous for the harmes the Venetians, for that twentic yeares afore Ro.S. Severin a notable Captaine of their armiew ouerthrowen and flaine, charging vpon three thousand footmen of the Venetians, left for the gate of the mount Brestonia, who notwithstanding they were sufficiently fortified, fled suddenly in the next mountaine, fearing more then was necessarie the perill that was farre off and doubtfu which made the Almaines, scorning the cowardisc of the Italian footemen, rise into more viole actions, burning many houses, and after they had reversed many of their trenches & defences may in the mountaine, they returned to Calliana. By this successe, the Bishop of Trent taking stomad according to the fortune of the time, went with an armie of two thousand footemen, appoint with part of the people that were at Calliana, to befrege Rina Trent, which is a great boron standing upon the lake of Garde, whither Truulce had already sent a sufficient garrison: and ter he had for two dayes battered the Church of Samt Frauncis, and in the meane while ma certaine incursions upon the villages that are about Lodrona, two thousand Grisons serving the Almaine campe, fell into mutinie for a quarrell of small importance concerning their pa mentes, and made pillage of the victuals of the campe: by reason whereof, all things being disorder, and most of the bandes of the Grisons forsaken the campe, the remainder of the: mie containing seuen thousand men, was constrained to retire, the same ministring oport nitie and courage to the Venetian regimentes to make inuations vponthe next villages; of who as three thousand went in troupes to burne certaine townes of the Count d'Agreste, they we charged and broken by the Pailantes, and three hundred of them cut in peeces, not remen bring that in matters of enterprise it is an office as necessarie to foresee perils to come, as to en cute when occasion is given. For the retraite of the Almaines which were before Rine, alm all the bandes being separate, and the horsemen (containing a body of twelue hundred) being tired from their lodgings of Calliana to Trent, the regimentes of the Venetians, on Easterd morning affayled Pietra, a place within fixe myles of Trent: but affoone as the strength the was within Trent issued out to their succours, they retired, and afterwardes assayled the Roc of Crest, which is a peece of importance, and yeelded before the succours that came from Tre were arrived: the same being the cause that the Almaines, having effoones reassembled and ordained their footemen, returned with a thousand horse and sixe thousand footmen to Callia distant from Pietra the shot of a Crossebow: and two hundred horsemen of the Duke of W. temberg being gone from them, the Venetians with four thousand horsemen, and fixtee thousand footemen, came and encamped before Pietra, planting there a proportion of sixtee peeces of artilleric. Pietra is a Casteli seated at the soote of a mountaine, on whose right hand t way leades from Rouera to Trent, and out of the fame comes a very firong wall containing length the shot of a Crosbow, and stretcheth euen to the river of Adice, and in the middest of fame is a gate, of the which who is not maister, can hardly hurt Pietra. The two armies were wit in a myle one of another, and they both had before them the Castell and the wall, and on the o fide the river of Adice, and on the other the mountaines, and either armie having at their back places of sure retraite. And for that the Almaines had the Castell and the wall in their pow they might when they list drive the Venetsan armic to fight, which was impossible to the Venetsan armic to fight, tians, who for that they were inferiour in numbers, much leffe that they durst commit things aduenture, feeing they deuised onely to raise impedimentes that the enemies should not cariet

Castel which was continually battered by their artilleries. But the Almains, in whom was indiffeent the vertue of celeritie & courage, perceiving one day that their artillerie was flenderly garded, gaue a furious charge vpon it, & putting to flight the footemen that garded it, they won with great alour two peeces, & drew them to their lodgings. This accident abated the stomackes of the Venetians, who now judging it but lost time to entertaine the action of Pietra, which had devoured nany of their peoples, brake vp and retired to Rouero, and the Almaines returned to Trent. where within few dayes after most part of the armie disbanded and were dispersed: and the reginentes of the Dyot, which neuer contained aboue foure thousand (for all those in substance that stembled at Trent and Cadera, were of the countreys thereabout) returned to their houses, their erme of fixe moneths being ended, by whose example also most part of the sootemen that were eaujed, brake vp the seruice and departed. Maximilian himselfe who was much troubled in going om one place to another to leavie provisions and practifes, could never be present at rhose actins, but for that the Dyot of Ulma was referred to a time more convenient, being confused in him lfe with the multitude, of affaires, and shame of his successes, with drew himselfe to Cologne, not eing acknowen for many dayes where he was: and being not ftrog inough, neither in men, munion, nor money to refilt fo great a storme, having lost all that he held in the countrey of Friul, with ne other peeces affronting, he found himfelfe abandoned of all fuccours, and in greater perill be deprived of Trent, it in the French bandes had bene any disposition to joyne with the Veetian armie. But Triunice, who by the kings direction was resolved rather to pacific then to ronoke, would passe no further then was necessarie for the defence of the Denetians: holding it iust and honourable in the office he had, to forbeare to afflict further the Emperour, as to pro-Et the V.enetians.

Maximilian standing thus abandoned, and desiring by some meane to put himselfe out of Truce between junger, sent, since the ouerthrow at Cadora, one of his Gentlemento Venice, to demaund truce Maximilian r three moneths, of which the Senate made no account, having no disposition to make truce for sethen a yeare, nor yet to give any consent, if the French king were not comprehended in it. at his daungers rifing in encreasing for the losse of Triesta, and his calamities altering things inworle condition, the Bilhop of Trent, as of his peculiar motion, perswaded the Venetians to uce, alleaging by that meane and foundation, a ready possibilitie and expectation of peace: The 'enetsans answered, that their mindes were not offraunged from it, so farreforth as they were not one in the action, but that there were libertie for the French king to communicate. In so much after this beginning there drew to conference together the Bishop of Trent and Serentane Seetarie of Maximilian, and for the French king Triunice, and Charles Geffray Prefident of the uliament of Millan, and for the Venetians Zacharia Contarin Embassadout particularly appoind for that action. They agreed easily for other conditions, seeing, as touching the time, they were solued that it should last for three yeares, and every one to retaine that he possessed at that prent, with power to build and fortifie fuch places as they commaunded. This onely was the diffiiltie, that the French would have had a generall truce, wherein should be comprehended such infederates as euery one had out of Italie, and especially the Duke of Gueldres; but the Agents of e Emperour flood obstinately against it, for that he had determined the ruine of the said Duke: ney alledged befides, that the warre being managed wholly in Italy, it was neither iust nor necestie to communicate of any other things then such as touched Italie. Wherein albeit the Venetians d what they could to have fatisfied the defire of the French king, yet feeing litle hope to dispose e Almans, they were contented to embrace the truce in fort as they had confented, especially for defire they had to deliuer themselues of such a warre which was now brought wholly ypon their late, and no lesse to confirme in their obedience by the commoditie of the truce for three yeares, ne townes which they had conquered in those stirres. They excused theselines to the French with refereasons no lesse true then just, that neither the one nor the other of them being not further ound then for the defence of the matters of Italie, and their confederation being grounded therepon, they had not to do to thinke vp6 matters beyond the Mountes, which if they were not bound defend with armes they were not also bound to deuise to assure them with the truce. Vpo this ontroversie Triuulce wrote into Fraunce, and the Venetians to Venice, whose Senate returned anwere, that if there could not be admiffion of other conditions, that they should at least coclude the uce for Italy, onely referuing time & place for the French king to enter: whereunto albeit neither:

Trinulce not the Presidet would not consent, coplaining grieuously that they would not so much as tarie for the kings answer, & that notwithstanding the Presidet protested that a loynt & common consent, alledging withall how lite were respected the kings amitie & alliance, yet the Venetians forbare not to proceede & conclude with Maximilian, & the costact running simply in their proper names, they agreed that on the behalfe of Maximilian should be named & holden as compreheded & nominated, the Pope, the king Catholike, the king of Englad, the king of Hungarie, & all the Princes & subjects of the facred Empire in what place soener, together with all the consederates of Maximilian and the said kings and states of the Empire, which should be named within three moneths. And for the Venetians were named the French king, the king Catholike, with all the consederates and friends of the Venetians of the French king, and king Catholike in Italie onely, whom they should likewise name within three moneths. Thus was the truce accorded the xx.day of Aprill, and with no lesse expedition ratisfied by the Emperour and the Venetians, by which meanes ceased the warre, with great hope that the regions of Italie should now returne to a perpetual concord and peace.

After armes were layd afide by the refolution and couenants of this peace, it feemed to the French king that the Florentines would have declared themselves rather for Cesar then for him, il the Emperours affaires had had a more happie beginning: and knowing withall that that disposition proceeded of no other thing then of a defire they had to recouer Pifa in what fort they could and of a difcontentment that without respecting they had bene alwayes at his deuotion, and in the feruices they had done him, he had not onely not fauoured them, neither with authoritie, countenance, norarmes, but also had suffered that the Pifans were succoured by the Genowayes that were his subjectes: hee determined in these regardes to deuise how by some honest meane they might obtaine that they defired: wherein for that (for the benefite of his former purposes) he would do it to his proper profite, and that hee thought that feare would be a better meane then hope to draw from them a greater fumme, he dispatched M.R. iccio to make complaint, first that they have fent men expresse to accord with Casar his enemie, that vnder colour to give the spoyle to the Pifans, they had affembled a mightie armie, without having regarde to the conditions of the time and his suspitions and daungers: that in so great a stirre and commotion which was prepared, the were neuer willing to expresse simply their intentions, wherein they gave him infloccation to doubt to what end tended those preparations: and lastly, that having defired them to ayde him with their armies in fo great perils, they refused it against all confidence and expectation. All which notwithstanding, as well for the perpetual amitie which he had alwayes borne to their commo weale, as for the memoric of the good offices and observances they had done in times past fo his feruice, he was very ready to pardon them all these new injuries, so farreforth, as to cut off a occasions that might eftsoones trouble the tranquillitie of Italie, they would not hereafter molel the Psfans without his consent. To these complaints the Florentines answered, that necessitie ha induced them to fend men to Cafar, not with any intention to couenant with him against th king, but (if he passed into Italie) to assure their estate, which the king in the capitulation mad with them would not be bound to defend against Cafar, according to the testimonie of an ex presse clause, bearing these wordes, Sauing the rights of the Empire: That he could not reaso nably complaine of the armie leavied against the Pifans, for that it being no greater then of cu stome, it ministred no iust occasion of new suspicions, and being assembled for no other effectes then(as in other times) to give impediments to the harvest of the Pisans, there was no reasonabl cause of doubt, if mens judgements were as indifferent as the matter was innocent: That for such a matter, and for the fuccours which the Genowayes and other neighbours gaue then to the Pifans it was not possible for them to fend their souldiers to the king, whereunto albeit they were no bound, yet for the denotion they had alwayes borne to him, they would not have stucke to han done it, yea though they had not bin required that they maruelled greatly at the kings defire, tha the Pifans should not be molested, whom he had no reason to esteeme or value with the Floren tines, ifhe had any impression of their actions against him in the rebellion of Genes: And that h could not justly forbid them to molest the Pifans, for that the confederation which they had mad with him did so import and beare it. Vpon these beginnings they consulted afterwardes to reduc Pisa under the obedience of the Florentines: whereunto it seemed this did suffice, if order were gi uen that neither the Genowayes nor Lucquois should succour it in such a necessitie of victuals an prees, that the Pifans durst no more issue out of their towne: adioyning withall, for the losse of the aruell, the ill disposition of those of the plaine countrey, being in greater nuber then the Citizens: fo much as it was beleeued that they could not hold out, if they received not from Genes nd Lucqua certaine quantities of money, by meane of which fuch as gouerned kept within Pula ertaine forreine fouldiers, and diffributing the refidue to the young men as well of the towne as fthe playne countrey, they attonished with the armes of those, such as desired to accord with ne Florentins, keeping by that meane the towne in peace and free from mutiny. To this practife egun by the French king, was added the authority of the king Catholike, iealous belike that vithout him fuch a matter could worke no effect : and therefore affoone as he underflood that M.Riccio was gone to Florence, he dispatched also an Embassador, who going first to Pula.enoraged them in the name of his king to take comfort and hold out: not for other respect, then nat remayning wilfull and oblinate to yeeld to the Florentins, they might be fold for a greater rice. A little after these enterspeeches by consent of both kings, were caried into the Court f the French king, where, without any regard to the protection to oftentimes promifed, the king atholike folicited with great importunity the refolution of that businesse, both for that he knew nat Pifa being not defended, would necessarily fall into the power of the Florentins, & also he had that time no disposition to entangle himselfe with new affaires, and chiefly against the will of e French king: for, notwithstanding he had immediatly ypon his returning into Spaine, resumed e gouernment of Castille, yet he stood not well confirmed in it, both for the separate wils and ininations of the Barons, and also they had not justified his consent in the name of his nephew. But ter the cause of the Fisans had bene long debated in the Court of Fraunce, diversity of affections ndring the fucceffe: at last, for many difficulties which hapned, but principally for that both the ngs fought to appropriate to the felues the price of the fale of it, the practife was diffolued withit any forme of conclusion.

THE ARGUMENT.

Most of the Princes of Christendome draw into league at Cambray against the Venetians, who ing ouerthrowne by the French king, render the townes of the Church, and make submission to the ng of Romaines. Pisareturneth to the obedience of the Florentines. The Venetians recouer the wne of Padua, which is soone after besieged by Casar. Afterwards they make warre to the Duke Ferrara. The Pope gines them absolution of the Church censures.

He divisions of Italie were not so tractable, as that they could be reconciled with litle labour, nor the infirmities of the countrey so easie and priuate, as that they flood subject to be redressed or recured with light medicines: but as it often hapneth, that in bodies replenished with humours corrupt, the remedie that is applied to repurge the maladie of one part, ingendreth more daungerous infections: euen so the truce made betweene the king of Romaines and the Venetians, in place of the vniuetfall expectaarion of tranquilitie, brought forth to the Potentates and Communalties of taly, infinite calamities and cruelties of warre, farre exceeding the examples passed: for, not with-flanding the regions of Italy for fourcteene yeares, had borne a perpetual crosse of warres and mutations: yet, quarels being oftentimes ended without effusion of bloud, and battels and skirmifhes falling for the most part ypon the strangers onely, the peoples had lesse suffered then the Princes, and the naturall regions much spared from the bloudie miseries and actions of warre. But the gap being opened to new discords in time to come, there followed rhroughout all Italy, and against the Italians themselves, a miserable traine of many calamities and cruell accidents, infinite murders, fackings, destructions, and spoiles of Cities, a libertie of warre no lesse offensive to their friends, then hurtfull to their enemies, and a lamentable violation of religion and all holy things, with leffe reuerence and respect, then if they were prophane and popular, the law and equitie of things being measured by the wils of the souldiers, and nothing judged vnreasonable against him, that was able to alleage authoritie, might or will: fruites ordinarie following ciuill difcord, and by fo much the more perillous and working, by how much they happen in a fecond mutation, as all euils are more daungerous in a second degree then in the first. The cause of so many afflictions in a generall consideration was, the ambition and couctousnesse of Princes, of whom many of them could not brooke any limitation of power, imperie or kingdome: but if they be weighed in a particular confideration, they may be seene to take their beginning of the too rash and insolent maner of proceeding of the Venetians, by occasion whereof were ceassed those difficulties which till that time had holden in suspence and impediments the French king and Casar from agreeing together against them: of whom, the one being greatly kindled, they put him in dispaire, and at the fame time moued the other to no small indignation, or at the least gaue him meane to disclose vnder an apparant colour, that which he had long defired : for Cefar, being netled by fo many infamies and harmes received, loofing part of his proper inheritance, in place to conquer the effates of others, was not to omit any oportunitie wherin occasion might be given him to recover or repaire fo great flaunders and loffes: a disposition which the Venetians undiscretly increased anew, fince the making of the truce: for that not sparing to aggravate his indignation no lesse with vaine demonstrations then worse effects, they received into Venice Alisiano with publike pompe, almos resembling a ceremonial triumph. And the French king, albeit at the beginning he gaue a certains hope to ratifie the truce that was made, yet expressing afterwardes the disconterment he tooke, he coplained of the presumptio of the Venetians to name him & conclude him as adherent, & prouiding for the ir proper tranquility, to give him over & leave him in the cares and travels of the war

These dispositions of mind both of the one and the other, began to burst out into speedy and manifelt experience: for Cafar having no further confidence in his proper forces, and leffe expecta tion that the Princes or peoples of Germanie would take to heart the iniuries that had bene done to him, made as though he had a defire to confederate with the French king against the Venetians, a the onely remedy to recoucr eftloones the honour and estates he had lost: and the French king following the course and oportunity of the time, nourished the same inclination, the new disdain renewing in him the memory of auncient offences received in the warres of Naples, entertaining also a working defire to draw our of their hands Cremona, and other townes of the auncient polfelfions of the dukes of Millan. Therefore to the ende that in remouing the impediments o things inferiour, they might withall proceede to those of higher degree, they began to debate how to reiolue the quarels betweene the Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, whole fafety the French king held much for recommended, for the auncient alliance and commodities he had received by him. The Pope did also communicate in this motion, stirring vp at the same time the French king against the Venetians, being, befides the auncient indignations newly kindled and made hate full against them for an opinion he had that by their meanes the exiles of Furly, who were retired to Faenza, had made a tryall to enter that city, having withall received into their dominions the family of Bentinoleis chased by the king out of the Duchy of Millan. To these was added this imputation, that in many things they had borne slender regard to the authority of the court of Rome and of late experience had flenderly respected it in this, which troubled not a little the Pope mind: the Pope had translated the Bishoprike of Vincense, vacant by the death of the Cardinal S.P. ad Vincla his nephew, to Sixtus his nephew also suborned by him into the dignity of Cardi nall, and to those benefices. But the Senate of Venice, making small reckening of this collation chosea gentleman of Venice, who, the Pope refusing to confirme him, tooke boldnesse to name himselfe Bishop of Vincense of the election of the most excellent counsell of the Pregati: Butthe

Pope

Pope being not a litle kindled for these obstinacies, dispatched first to the king, Adaximus secreary to the Cardinall of Narbona, and afterwards the Cardinall himselfe, who newly succeeding he late Cardinall of Achx in his Bishoprike, was cailed the Cardinall of Achx. They were willingy received and heard of the king, and brought backe with them the deuise of many meanes and plots to put in execution that which he defired both without the Emperor, and without any conederacy with him. But the Pope shewed a more inclination to complaine, then to determine any hing for that on the one fide, the virquiet defire he had to make armesto be leavied against the Penerians troubled his mind, and on the other, he feemed fearefull to be constrained to depend too nuch of the greatnesse of another: but much more was he moued by an auncient icalousse he had aken against the Cardinall of Amboyse, in whose respect it seemed greenous to him that the armies of the French king should passe into Italy. Besides, the affaires of greatest importance were somewhat troubled by the late prefumption of the Pope, disposing a little before without the kings nowledge, the Bishoprikes of Ast and Plaisance, and withail, for that the king refisted the new Cardinall of S. P. ad Vincla, to whom by the death of the other, the rich Abbey of Cleruault cate to Millan was transferred, to take possession of it : so itresolute was the Pope, wandring beweene feare & ambition, and so inconstant the Frenchking, obseruing to make his profit on the raine & event of things: for albeit the Pope could not be refolved amid fo many difficulties, yet The affembly 1 the end the Frenchking & Cafar, both applying with the courfe & oportunities of times, deter- of Cambray. inedto comunicate fecretly together against the Venetians, wherin for the better countenance & plour to the actio, & withal to give perfection to those things that shold be debated, there affemled in the town of Cabray for Casar, the Lady Margaret his daughter Regent of Flunnders, & of 10se other estate swhich were disceded to king Philip by the mothers right, assisted for the regard f this actio by Mathem Logo a Secretary of great credit with Cafar: & for the Frech king, was fent ie Cardinall of Amboy/e, followed with certaine other particulars, rather to furnish his traine, then conjunicate in the action. They caused to publish a brute that these estates assembled to solicit a :ace betweene the Archduke & duke of Gueldres, betweene who they had fet downe a truce for rty yeares: And keeping alwayes vnknowne fro the Venetians the true occasion, the Cardinall lured by great oathes to their Embassador, that his king would continue in the confederation he id with them, wherein also the Embassador of the king of Aragon followed him, rather not dering then graunting, for that albeit that king was the first mouer of these conserences betweene e Emperour and the French king, yet having continuation afterwards without him, both the ie and other of them, were perfwaded that the prosperity of the French king would be intoleble to him, and as touching the government of Castille, would hold for suspected the greateffe of Cafar, and therefore his thoughts in that action were not conformable to his words. At Cambray things were resoluted in very few dayes, without communicating with the Emistador of the king Catholike, tillafter the conclusion, which the tenth day of December was lemnly confirmed in the great Church, with the oathes of Lady Margaret, the Cardinall Amboyfe, and the Spanish Embassador. In this publication they expressed nothing, but that ere was established betweene the Pope and either of those Princes a perpetuall peace and conderation : but in Articles more private and fecret, were contained clauses of right great impornce, which being full of ambition, and wholly contrary to the couenants which Cafar and the ench king had with the Venetians, were couered with a preamble full of great piety, and af-Stion to religion, as though the diversity of words were sufficient to alter and change the effects things. It was expressed in that preamble, that, for a common defire to begin a warre against the emies of the name of Christ, and the impediments which the Venetians had given, occupying abitiously the landes of the Church, which now they meant to remoue, to proceede with better infent and agreement to so holy and necessary an expedition. And by the perswasions and unsels of the Pope, the Cardinall of Amboyse as his Procurer, and with his authority, and as dested and authorifed by the French king, and by the personal solicitation of Lady Margaret, asaned and authorifed by the king of Romains, & as governesse to the Archduke and the estates of launders; and lastly by the cosent of the Embassador of the king of Aragon as fully appointed by sking: they were resoluted to make war upon the Venetians, cucry one in his owneright to recoer the things they had viurped vpon them, which for the Pope were Faenza, Rimini, Rauenna, &

eruia for the king of Romains, Padua, Vincensa, & Verona, appertaining to him in the name of the Empire, and the places of Frial and Trenifan, being parcell of the inheritance of the house of Austria: for the French king were Cremona, Gutaradadda, Bresse, Bergama, and Crema: and for the regard of the king of Aragon, were the townes and hauens which had bene morgaged by Ferdinand king of Naples. The articles were these: That the French king was bound to the warre in person, and to give the sirst reall beginning the first day of the next Aprill, at what time also the Pope and the king Catholike should enter into the action: That to the end the king of Romans shold have just cause not to observe the truce that was made, the Pope shold demaund succours of him as of the protector of the Church, and that after that the king of Romains should fend to him at the least a Captaine, & shold be bound forty dayes after the French king had begun the war, to inuade the estates of the Venetians in person: That which soeuer of them should recouer that which appertained to him, should be bound to minister aide to the others, till they had made a ful and sufficient recourry: That they were all bound to defend one another, in case the Venetians offred to oppresse them for any places that were recoursed, and not one of them in particular should compound or agree with the Venetians without a comon consent: That the Duke of Ferrara, and Marquis of Mantua, and who else would pretend the Venetians to vsurpe any place o theirs, had liberty to be named in the league within the monethes: and being once named, to in ioy all the benefits and fauours of the confederation in as full power and nature as the principal of the fame, communicating the fulneffe of authority for the reconquering of those things tha they had loft: That the Pope should summon the Venetians under great paines and curses, to make restitution of such things as they occupied of the Church: That he should be judge be tweene Blanch Maria the king of Romains wife, and the Duke of Ferrara, touching the conten tion for an inheritance and succession of Anna her fister, and sometimes wife to the sayd Duke That Cafar should innest the French king in the duchy of Millan, for himselfe, Francis de Angon lefme, & to their issue males, for which inuestiture the French king should pay to him an hundre thousand duckets: That Casar and the Archduke should not during the warre and sixe monethe after, make any innovation against the king Catholike for any respect of the government and t tles of the realms of Castille: That the Pope shold exhort the king of Hugarie to enter into the cor federation: That euery one should name within foure monethes his confederates and adherent excepting expresly to comprehend the Venetians and the subjects freeholders of the confederate and that every principall party in the contract, should ratifie all these articles within threescor dayes next following: To this vniuerfall league was adiouned the particular accord betweened Archduke and the Duke of Gueldres, wherein was agreed that restitution shold be made of the townes that were taken upon the Archduke in this warre, but not in like fort of fuch as were t ken vpon the Duke.

Affoone as this new confederation was concluded in this fort (all things that concerned the Venetians being kept as secret as might be) the Catdinall of Amboyse departed the day following from Cambray: the Bishop of Paris and Albert Pio Count of Carpi being first sent to the king Romains to receive his ratification in the name of the French king: he made no delay to confim all the articles with the fame oath and forme of folemnities with the which it was published in the Church of Cambray, holding it but suft to ratific the thing that so much tended to the confirm tion of his effate and fecurity, as he held it equall and reasonable to instiffe that by publike appre bation, which he had fo long folicited by private defire and intention: it is most certaine, that a belt the words of the publication bare, that the authority of the Pope and king of Aragond communicate in it, yet the confederation was made meerely without their affiftance and confen And action which Cefar and the French king tooke wholly vpon themselues, not doubting oftl Popes and king of Aragons confent, partly in regard of their proper profit, and partly for that a cording to the estate & coditio of things present, neither of them both durst gainfay their authorit & particularly the king of Aragon, to who albeit the articles in their due construction seemed bo icalous & intollerable for that fearing least the greatnes of the Frech king wold encrease too muc he preferred the furety of the whole kingdome of Naples afore the recouring of one part while was holden by the Venetians: yet, expressing cunningly a readinesse dissembled, and an inclinat contrary to the intentions of his mind, he made present ratification with the same ceremonies whi the others yied. But touching the Pope, he made farre more doubt of things, wandring according to his custome betweene a defire to recour the townes of Romania, joyned to a distaine again ne Venetians, and a trouble some feare of the greatnesse of the French king the saw not how dauncrous it was to him for the power of Cafar to begin to fretch farre in Italie, and therefore fee-

ing that it was more for his profite to obtaine by accord part of that he defired, then to recour ne whole by warre and fword, he laboured to induce the Venetians to render to him Rimini and aenza: whereinhe forgat not to lay afore them that those daungers which threatned them by the nion offo many Princes, would be of greater terrour & importance, if he were concurrant with iem in the confederation: as to whose authoritie and place it belonged to pursue them with armes irituall and temporall: where, if they rendred the townes which they had taken you the Church nce he was Pope, by which meanes he should make a joynt recourse of honour and estates, he ould have just occasion not to ratifie that whereumo he had no interest either in affiltance, connt, or authoritie: he debated with them that as the confederation communicating nothing with eholy and supreme authoricie would eafily dissolue and vanish, having in it selfe many difficul-25: To he fay dit was not reasonable they should doubt that he would not vrge to the yttermost his authoritie & industrie to keepe repressed in Italy the power of straungers, which brought no To perill to the sea Apostolike, then to their state. In this perswasion he omitted nothing that ight make aduaunced his cause, which he followed no lesse with his authoritie and eloquence, en with liberalities and offers: Matters that moue not the leaft in a case of perswasion, carying as ey lift the mindes of men affecting ambition or worldly defires. The Senate drew to counfell von this demanud, some judging it a thing of great importance, to separate the Pope from Cafar dthe Frenchking, and others thought it an action voworthy, and not sufficient to turne away e warre. At last, as in matters of debate and controuersie, opinion oftentimes commaundes rea- Deliberation , so the faction of fuch as gaue the best counsell had caried it, had not bene the reasons and per- of the Venes assons of D. Trenisan a Senatour of great authoritie, and one of the Procurers of the rich temple tians. S. Marke, an honour next to the dignitic of the Duke, of highest respect and reputation in the common weale of Venice: he discoursed with reasons full of efficacie and authoritie, that it was an tion contrarie to the dignitic and profite of that renowmed common weale, to restore those wines which the Pope required; & that, he estate of their dangers would neither much increase diminish for the conjunction or separation of him from the other confederates: for, albeit in the gociation of the accord they had yied the Popes name, 'perhaps to make their cause seeme lesse honest, yet in effect they had agreed without him, having no necessitie of his consent and privi-, and therfore would become neither the more cold nor the more hot in the execution of things by had concluded: Of the contrarie, the armes of the Pope were not of that valour and importice, as to drive them to buy at fo great a price the disposing of the same: feeing that albeit they ould be assayled at one selfe time by the others, yet they might easily with a very slender garrifi defend those Cities which the regiments of the Church (the very dishonour of fouldiers and in of feruice) were not fufficient to take of themselves, and much lesse import much as touching : Substance of the warre: he fayd, that in the stirres and hears of temporall armes, men did little pecteither the reuerence or threatnings of armes spirituall, which they ought not to seare to be reable to hurt them in that war, then they had done in many others, namely in the expedition ainft Ferrara: in which the armes of the Church could not let that they obtained not a peace horable for the, & infamous for the relidue of Italy, which with one vinuerfall accord, & in a time rerein it florified most with riches, power, & valour, was banded wholly against the And in rea-1 & concordace of causes he alleaged, that it was not likely that the almighty & omnipoter God and fuffer that the effects of his feueritie & his mercy of his anger & his peace, should rest in the hibution & power of a man ambitious & proud,& by his fubication to wine, with many other honest and immoderate affections, would administer them not according to the conderation of Rice, & benefite of Christendome, but as he was pushed on with his vile, corrupt, & intemperate mours. Behides, he faw not by what reason they might hope for a greater constancie of faith in s Pope then in others his elders & predecessours, making for the most part their authoritie sub-Ito their ambition, & their counsels alway es running with the concurrance & course of times? either could be discerne how they might be affured that the Pope having obtained Faenza and imizi, would not knit with the relidue to recover thanking and Ceruta, having a minde specialwatchfull ouer oportunities and occasions given: That the experience of his actions and exames pall, proued in him no greater flay or stabilitie of faith, then agreed with the custome of other

Popes, who, to give a colour of inflice and equitie to those things they did, left ordeined among their other lawes, that the Church, not with landing all contract, promife, and benefites received might retract and directly impugne any bondes or obligations which the selfe Prelates had made He alleaged that albeit the confederation betweene Alaximilian and the French king was mad with a great vehemencie of disposition, yet the wils & intentions of the other confederates did va rie and differ, the king Catholike being brought in by meanes compulfiue and extraordinarie, an the Pope well expressing signes of his accustomed doubts and suspitions: and therefore the league of Cumbray was not more to be feared, then the confederacie which the same Maximilian all king Lown had with the same importunitie treated aforetimes at Trent, and afterwards at Blois for that many difficulties, which for their affinitie and nature, it was almost impossible to remoin or alter, did mightily refult the execution of things determined: That for those reasons it toucher the Senate in principall studie, & diligence to deuise meanes to separate Casar from such coniun Ction: a matter of easie hope and expectation, no lesse for the respect of his nature and necessities then for his auncient hatred against the French: and being once deuided from it, the whole feare of the warre were taken away, for that the French king standing abandoned of his societie & suc cours, would beare no more stomacke to inuade them then he had done in times past: That in a publike actions the beginning ought deepely to be considered, since afterwardes it was not in th power of mento temporise or leaue off without dishonor & danger to their deliberations, whetei they had long consulted: That as their elders, so they by succession, had bin alwayes carefull in a occasions to augment their dominion, & with a disclosed & ope profession to aspire to great things a matter which made them hatefull to many, partly for feare, & partly for displeasure & disdained that they had taken from them: wherein albeit it hath bene perceived long time before, that that he tred might engender some great alteration, yet, as they have not for all that forborne to embrac the occasions that had bin offered them, so it was not now a remedie to the dangers present, to be gin to leave a part of that they did possesse, since it would rather kindle then quench the humon of those that hated them, taking courage vpon their fearefulnesse: And seeing it hath bene a perpe tuall maxime amongst the Potentates of Italie, that the Venerians never for sooke things that one were false into their hands, who would not judge that to breake now so honourable a custom proceeded not of a last dispaire to be able to defend the perils that threatned: That who so ever be gan to give place and leave any thing how litle foeuer, was the first detector of the reputation ar auncient honour of his common weale, which as it is a ready oportunitie to the augmentationdanngers; so to that state that beginnes to decline, it is farre more hard to conserve against d least perils that be, that which remaines, then against an other state, who caring to keepe his di nitic and degree, and making no figne to yeeld or give place, convertes his force readily agair him that feekes to oppresse him: Valour and courage retaine long those things that of themselu are weake and impotent: and as nothing doth more terrifie the enemie then to seeme to be refe lute, so to hold fall that that hath bin gotten, is a colour instificatorie to enable the title and intere of the thing: There can be no greater infamie to a Prince or common weale, then by negligence cowardise to lose that which their auncestors have gotte with diligence & valour: That it was n ceffarie either to reject valiantly those first demaunds, or in yeelding to them, to looke to yeeld 1 many more, by which in short time is to be expected the absolute subuersion of their estate, and colequent the irreparable loffe of their proper libertie: That as their comon weale both in the ag of their fathers, & in their dayes, had borne out many great warres against the Princes of Christe dome, of which they caried a glorious issue, for that they alwayes shewed one constancie and rese lution of minde: 10, in the prefent difficulties, not with standing they may seeme greater, may be he ped no worle successe, both for that their power and authoritic were greater, and also by exper ence that in warres managed in common by many Princes against one alone, the terrors are wo to be more then the effects, for that after the first furies be abated and banished, there riseth dive fitie of opinion, which breederh variation of faith and constancie, all things disfoluting with a nati turall facilitie, that grow into their being with an immoderate importunitie and furie, Lastly, th Senate was to hope, that besides the preparations and remedies which of their owne power the were able to furnish, God the most soueraigne and righteous judge, would not leave abandons a common weale bred and nourished in a perpetuals libertie, & in whom did shine the very bear tie & aspect of all Europe: & much lesse would suffer to be oppressed with the ambition of Princ

nder a false colour to prepare warre against the infidels, that Citie, which in so great pietie nd religion, had bene for many yeares the very protectiour and defender of the whole common veale of Christendome. These reasons to wrought in the mindes of the most part, that accoring to the example of the yeare before, and being a thing fatall to that Senate, the world counell preuailed, contrarie to the opinions of many Senatours of greatest wifedome and authoritie: 1 fo much as the Pope , who had deferred the ratification till the last day, ratified the league , but ${\it The Poperation}$ nder this expresse declaration, that hee would not enter into any action of an enemie against the fieth the treaenergans, untill the French king had begun the warre.

Thus the yeare 1508, ended with many feedes of great warres, and foundations subtilly layd fmany daungerous accidents and mutations, which be the wretched & ordinary traynes of amition, division, and secret hates, About this time also the affaires of the Pesans suffering of late ma- A commented v declinations, seemed dayly to divolve more and more into harder and straiter termes: for, be- of the wars of des that the Florenins the sommer before, had cut downe their corne, & with their men at armes 2944 ade continuall incursions upon the townes adjoyning, even to the gates of Pifa, yet, the better cut offall passage & traffike of victuals by sea, they entertained in their pay the sonne of Bardell f Portonenere with certaine proportios of veffels: by which impediment, the Pifans standing as it ere befreged both by sca and land, and not able by reason of their pouertie & afflictios, to refurth thefelues neither with veffels nor forrem fouldiers, found themselues in great dispaire to hold at any loger, being very weakely succoured by their neighbours. And yet as God seldome giueth grieuous a sentence of the estate of mans mortalitie, as to deny all compassion to men in miserie; the Genowayes and Lucquos owing pitie to the afflictions of their neighbours, confulted to nucy into Pifa certaine quantities of corne, which being fraughted in a great number of Barkes, llowed with two ships of Genes, and two gallions, were transported to Specia, and from thence Voreggia, to the end they might be conveyed into Pifa with fourteene brigantins, and certaine nall barkes, according to the direction of the Pifans, But the Florentens feeking to oppose against is enterprise, as wherein consisted their hope or dispaire to get Pifa for that yeare, they joyned the nauy they had already, a ship of England, haply riding in the roade of Lyuorne, with certaine her fultes and brigantins. And to minister to the nauic at sea with all the succours and preparatiis they could make by land, they fent all the horseme, with a great portion of the focumen which ere hastily leavied in the countrey, along all those passages and shoates by the which the nauce of e enemie might runne the course of Pisa, either by the mouth of Arne, or the river called the ad Flood entring into Arne. The enemies arrived at the mouth of Arne, & the Florenine yelslying betweene the mouth and the dead river, and the Landmen commaunding all the apt ices, had plated their artilleries as well on this fide as beyond the brinke of the river by the which ey should passe: in so much as they seeing no possibilitie to passe further, tetired into the river of nes, with the loss of three brigantins laden with wheat. By the oceasion of which successe, the storie feeming almost certaine for want of victuals, the Florentins to take away all oportunities victuals to enter by the river, made a bridge of woodvpon Arne, which they fortified with ballions on both sides the bankes . And as when afflictions begin to fall, they thunder all at once, uerfities having this in proper, not onely to oppresse, but also to deprive miserable men of ordirie comfort: so, in the fame time, to cut offall succours of their neighbours, the Horentins fell to mposition with them of Lucquay for, having aforetime, to represse their insolencies, sent part of ir footebandes that were within Cascina, to facke the hauen of Voregge and the storehouses, nerein were many forts of filkes belonging to the marchats of Lucquay: the inhabitants of Lucay made timerous by those rigorous examples, sent their Embassadours to Florence, where was corded, that betweene both their common weales, there should be a cofederation defensive for ree yeares, the Lucquo's being namely & expresly excluded from all power any more to succour 2 Pifans. This confideration to be cotinued for twelve yeares further, if the Florentins should reuer Pola within a yeare: & that during the terme of this league, the Floretins (alway referring the erogative of their rights) should not molest the estate of Lucquay, touching the possession of Piea Santia & Mutro, a league opening the principall gap to the ruine of the Pifans. But that which as of greatest importace to make easie the coquest of $P_{\ell}[a]$, was the capitulation which they made ith the kings Catholike & French, which being folicited many moneths, had suffered many diffikies: for, the Florentins, by the experience of things past, feared least it were a meane to draw fro

Contract betweene the French king, king of Spaine and the Florentines.

the other part, the French interpreted that they deferred cunningly, in hope that the Psians woul make a willing restitution, their extremities being desperate and now layd open to all men. Th French king, vnwilling that they should recouer it, vnlesse he did communicate in the price, coman ded Bardell his subject to leave their pay, & to M. Chaumont to dispatch fro Millan sixe hundre Launces for the succours of the Ptians: which joyned to other actions of feare and suspirion, oc cupied the Florentines with fuch perplexities, that ceasing all difficulties, they entred couchan in this maner: That the French king and king Catholike should give no ayde nor support to the Pisans, and also to forbid that from no places of their subjection and obedience, nor likewise from any their confederates or others under their protection, should enter into Pifa any succours of vi chuals, money, munition or men, nor any other nature of reliefe wharfoeuer: That the Florentins for farreforth as Pifa were recoursed within a yeare following, should pay to either of them within certaine time fiftie thousand duckets: And that in the same condition there should continue be tweene them a league for three yeares, from the day that they reconquered Pifa. In confideratio of which league the Florentins should be bound to defend with three hundred men at armes th estates that they held in Italie, receiving in like fort for their defence, of either of them a proportio of three hundred men at armes. To this capitulation made in common, it was necessarie for the Floretms to adde (without the privitie of the king Catholike) new bonds to pay to the French kin under the fame conditions and termes, fiftie thousand duckets, promising withall fine and twent thousand more to the ministers of both the kings, of which the greatest portion was to be distribu ted at the discretion of the Cardinall of Amboyse. These couenants albeit they were heavie an costly to the Florentins, yet, in the opinion of men, they brought no lesse infamie to both the king the one for money abandoning the Citie which many times he had affured to be in his prote ction, and which being willingly offered to him, the great Captaine had accepted in his name:ar the other contrarie to the reputation of so many promises made to the Florentins, both sold for wile price the just libertic of the Pisans, and constrained the Florentins to buy of him the powand sufferance to recouer that which justly apperteined to them: So mightie now a dayes ist " force of gold and filuer, aboue the regard to honour, honestie, or conscience : and so weake the refiftance of Princes against the working of that enchaunted humor of couetousnesse, the ful ie uerter of all honour, equitie, and honest regard. But the affaires of the Pisans, vpon whom all Italie was wont afore to turne their eyes, we in this time of flender confideration, for that the mindes of men depended on the expectation hing prepareth greater things: for, after the league of Cambray was ratified by all the confederates, the French kin began to make great preparations: and albeit he vied not as yet any protestations or threates warre, yet matters being no longer able to be differibled, the Cardinall of Amboyfe in the presen of the whole councell, coplained with vehement words to the Embassadour of Venice for that the Senate, despising the alliance and amitic of the king, caused to fortifie the Abbey of Cerreta in the territories of Crema, wherein had bene of old time a Castell which was rased by the capital tions of peace in the yeare 1454.made betweene the Venetians & Frauncis Sforce newly Duke Millan, with couenaunt that the Venetians should in no time make fortresse there: to the capitul tions of which peace, was referred in this & in many other things, the peace made betweene the and the king. But now the king being within few dayes after come to Lyon, his regiments ma ched towardes the mountes, and fixe thousand Swiffers leavied and payed by him, prepared descend at the same time into Italie: he obtained also of the Genowayes, soure Carracks, and oft Florentins fiftie thousand duckets, being his moytie which they should pay vpon the conquest Pifa. And joyning to the aides of others, his owne faccours, he leavied upon the Duchie of Milla (defirous to repossesse the townes which the Venetians held) an hundred thousand duckers, besid the honourable denotion of many particular Gentlemen and free holders of that state, furnishing themselves with horses and armes, to accompany the kings person in the warre.

TheVenetians looke to shem felwes.

On the other fide, the Venetians prepared in one common and resolute courage, to receive and fulfaine so great a warre, labouring with money, with authoritie, and with the whole count nance & body of their tertitories, to leauie pronisions worthy of so great a common weale: wher in their diligence was so much the more importunate and resolute, by how much it seemed lik ly, that if they sustained the first brunt or furie, the league of the Princes so ill composed & wor confi

onfirmed, would eafily decline and diffolire. In which actions (to the glory of that Senate) was ellexpressed in those that afore had counselled in vaine to governe their good fortune modestly, nefelfe fame vehemencie of minde which had bene vttered by the others that had bene authours f the contrarie: for that preferring publike fafetie afore private ambition, they fought not the inreasing of their authoritie in reproching to others their prejudiciall counsels, nor in objecting aainst the remedies which wete ordained to the perils hapned by their indiscretion: & yet consideng that almost all the regions of Christendome were banded against them, they summoned tother all their wits to breake fo great a league, repenting euen now that they so lightly rejected e occasion to devide the Pope from the rest, hoping that he would not have stirred, if onely ey had maderestitution of Faenza. In which regard, joyned to the consideration of their prent condition and estate, they renewed with him the first negociation, and withall dispatched effengers to Casar and the king Catholike, forbearing to make any practife with the French ng, in whom, what for hatred and other hindering respectes, they had no hope of disposition conformitie: but the Pope had no power now to accept that which he had defired afore: fo ine is the fecond offer of things that have bene once refused. The king Catholike, though he d no want of will and inclination, yet he was ynable to range therefidue: fo litle power is left him that is drawne into action by compulsion. And Cafar possessed with a spirite of enuic ainst the name of Venuce, would not onely not agree, but also disdained to vinderstand with hat nature of offers they tempted him, refuling to see their Secretarie whom they had sent to m with very large commissions. In so much as beholding on all sides nothing but a face of adrfice, accompanied with a fetled indignation of Princes, they disposed all their deuises and fluas to defend themselues by armes, entertaining from all regions great proportions of horsemen d footenien, & armed many vessels to garde the shoares of Romania, and the townes of Powilla, d to thrust into the lake of Guarda, and river of Po, with other places by the which they fea-Ito be molested by the Duke of Ferrara and Marquis of Mantua. But besides the threates of en, they were astonished with many aduentures either fatallor accidentall: for, a small barke nich they had fent to transport money to Ranenna, was drowned with tenthousand duckets: 2 Caftell of Breffe was thiken with lightning: & the house where lay the charters of their comon called the Archino, fell fuddenly to the ground with a wonderfull ruine . But that which oft filled them with feare and perplexitie, was at the fame time, and in the very houte that the house of vecat Counfell affembled, a fire kindled either by chaunce, or by fome fecret treason, in their flore nice on fire. use called the Arzenale, euen in the romth where was their saltpeter: which burst out with th furie, that not with flanding the concourse of men labouring with an universall diligence to ench it, yet, what by the force of the winde and nature of the matter proper to nourish and enafe fire, it confumed to ashes twelue bodies of gallies, with a wonderfull quantitie of munitios. is was also added to their difficulties, that having entertained lule and R ane Vr fins, & Troillo wello with fine hundred men at armes, & three thousand footemen, the Pope, with senere comjundements as being subjectes of the Church compelled them not to depart out of the towns of ome: inducing them withall, to retaine still fifteene thousand duckets, which they had received orest for their payes, promising to abate so much of the debts which the Venetians ought to the Apostolike for the fruits which they had received of the townes of Romania. The chief care of : Venetians was to prepare & make themselves strong on that side by the which the French king is to make his enterprise, but they heard not of him neither so soone as they looked for, nor so ghtily as the opinio went: for that from the king of Aragon, not with standing he had made great omifes to the other confederates, appeared onely brutes and demonstrations, according to his cuone, executing nothing that was of any consequence. And Cafar being gone into Flaunders to duce the subjectes of his sonne in law to make some contribution of money, it was believed that could not begin the warre so soone as he had promised: besides, it was supposed that the Pope ping more in the victorie of others, then in his owne strength, would be gouerned according to e proceedings of the confederates. It was not doubted that the French king would make his staction vpon Guiaradadda, passing the river of Adda neare Cascina, and therefore the Venetian mie affembled at Pontuico vpon the river of Oglia, the Count Petillano being their Generall, and artlemen Aluiano gouernour, & Commissioners in the name of the Senate, George Cornato and ndrea Gritti, götlemen much renowmed & honorable, as well for their ordinarie qualities, as for the glories they had won the yeare before, the one returning victorious from Fruil, and the other for expulsing the Almaines from Rouera. These two debating in what fort the warre should b managed, had not onely opinions diuerfe, but also even betweene the generall and governour wer contentions and separation of counsell: for, Almano being of a minde stirring, and made prou by his fortunes of the yeare before, apr to embrace occasions, and of a wonderfull celeritie both t confult & execute, perswaded, that to plant rather the body of the war in the countrey of the ene mie, then to expecttill it were transferred to their territories, it were good to make an inuafio vpon the Duchie of Millan before the French passed into Italie. But the Count Petillano, eithe for that the resolution of his minde was abated by age (as Aluiano sayd) or by his long experience confidering with a deeper diferetion the daungers that might happen, and not willing to temp fortune without a manifest hope of victorie, gaue this counfell: that despising the losse of the townes of Guiaradadda, which imported not much for the effect of the warre, the armie migh encampe neare the towne of Orci, according to the examples of Frauncis Carmignole and lam Piccinin, Captaines of great vertue and name in the warres betweene the Venetians and the Mi lanois: healleaged that the place was strong, having his situation between the rivers of Ogli and Seria, and of fingular oportunitie to succour all the townes of the iurisdiction of Venice, for that if the French men charged them in fuch a nature and strength of place, they neede not doul an affured victorie, the oportunitie of the place ministring much to the action; but if they encan ped at Cremona, or at Crema, or at Bergama, or at Breffe, they might (for the defence of then draw neare with the armie into a place of furetie, and with their troupes of light horsemen ar estradiots, cut off their victuals and other commodities: a thing which as it would let them for the king any place of importance, so by this meane, without committing themselues to the sentence fortune, the state of Venice might be easily defended against so nightly a preparation of the Fren king. Of these counsels, neither the one nor the other was approued of the Schate: to the opinio Aluiano was referred too much rashnesse & boldenesse: dangerous humors to direct a great entiprife, & in the Generall was noted too much fearefulnesse, not considering the nature of the dau gers present. The Senate could have bin contented, according to the ancient custome of that cor mon weale, that they had proceeded furely, & aduentured as litle as they could: but they confid red on the other fide, that if at the same time when almost all their forces were occupied to ma head against the French king, Casar should make any mightie inuasion upon their estate, wi with what armies, with what Capraines, or with what bandes of fouldiers could they oppor against him. In which regard that way which of it selfe seemed most sure and most certaine, 1 mained most uncertaine and most daungerous, their coniectures being confounded in the nati and condition of the enterprise: and therefore, as it hapneth in opinious contrarie, they ma election of the meane, determining to draw the armieneare the river of Adda, not to leave Gu radadda in pray to the enemies, and yet not to come to hand strokes with them without a gre hope or vigent necessitie, and that by expresse direction from the Senate.

But farre otherwise was the resolution of the French king, who desired to finde out the er mie, and giue him battell. And comming accompanied with the Duke of Loraine and all t nobilitie of Fraunce, sent his Heralt Monico (associated with the Duke of Loraine and all t nobilitie of Fraunce, sent his Heralt Monico (associated with the Mountes) to d nounce warre to the Senate of Venice, charging him to make publication to the Magistrates of Vinice, as he passed by Cremona, to the end the Senate might the rather take signification. And beit, his whole armie being not yet assembled, he had determined no action to be done, till he we arrived in person at Cascina: yet, either to satisfie the Pope, complaining that the time set dow in the capitulation was passed, or else to hastenthe time against Cascar, being bound to enter in the warre, fortie dayes after the French had begun, he chaunged his first resolution, and commanded Monsser Chaumous to broach the warre: observing the oportunitie of the time, for that regiments of the Venetians, expecting their full assembles, were not yet departed from Ponuic

I 509. Beginning of the warre. The first actuall beginning to so great a war was made the xv. day of Aprill 1 509, when Me feur de Chaumont passed the foorde of Adda neare Caseina, conveying by boates sixe thousal footemen, and the artilleries: from thence he marched to the towne of Treny, which is within the myles of Caseina wherein were Iulian Morosin governour of the Venetian estradiots, and Vitt de citta de Cassello, with Vincent de Naldo, who disposed the sootemen which were to be distribted amongs the townes thereabouts, They beleeved that those French bands which lay dispers

in many places in the countrey, were not men appointed to affaile the towne, but to make incurfions into the countrey, and therefore to make some experience of warre with them, they fent out an hundred of their footemen, who with certaine estradiots entertained the skirmish, and followed the chase cuen to the fortresse of the gate: and being followed with their mainebattell & the artillerie, they began to play with fuch Culuerins and Falcons as they had, to vifiting the towers and places of the wall, that what by the terrout of the shot, loyned to the suddennesse and importunitie of the action, and valuerfall mutinies of the multitudes in the towne, made afrayde by the examples of their chieftaines & leaders, they yeelded wholly to the discretion of Monsieur de Chaumont, to whom in this first fortune were made prisoners Instiman, Vitelli, and Vincent, and many others, with a hundred light horiemen, & a thousand footemen, all of the vale de Mone: only two hundred estradiots were faued by flying. After this good beginning A1. de Chaumont, conquering also certaine places adjoyning, repasted with all his people ouer the river of Alda, caryng with him by the felicitie of this first action, great hope of an absolute victorie to the residue of he warre. The same day the Marquis of Alantua, to whom the king had committed an hundred Luunces ran up to Calulmaior, which without resistance was rendred to him by the inhabitants, ogether with Lowis Bonne, Magistrate for the Venetias. The same day in like fort Roccabertin with in hundred and fiftic Launces, and three thousand footemen, passing over a bridge made of boates on Adda as it entrethinto Pam, made roades upon the townes of Cremona, as did also in anoher part of the countrey the fouldiers of the garrilon of Lode, building a bridge upon Adda: beides, all the pailants of the Mountaine of Brianfa, made incursions even to Bergama, joyning to fo continion a fauour offortune, an viniuerfall readineffe and refolution of minde. But this generall inration performed in one day, and in five feuerall places, the enemies prefenting no refiftance, bare note brute the matter of effect, both for that Monfieur de Chaumont retired immediatly to Milun, to abide the kings comming, and also the Marquis of Mantua, who after the enterprise of (a= almaior, had executed a vaine attempt upon Afola, abandoned Cafalmaior, heating that Almiato was parfed on this fide the river of Oglio at Pontmolaro.

The Pope feeing fuch a beginning given to the warre, published in forme of admonition a hor-The Popes BAL ible Bull, wherein were declared all the vourpations made by the Venetians vpon the townes against the pperteining to the fea Apostelike, and the authoritie which they had attributed to them selues, to he prejudice of the Ecclematike liberty and jurifdiction of Popes, both in disposing Bishoprikes, & other benefices vacant, in deducing in fecular course causes spirituall apperteining to the judgenent of the Church, and also all other natures of disobediences past. Amongst those declaraions was not forgotten, that not long fince, to the great trouble of the cleate of Bolognia, and rejudice of the Church, they had called to Faenza the Beninoleis, who being rebels to the Church, were subject as well in them selves, as in those that received them, to great censures: he described them to make reflitution within xxiiij, dayes next of all those townes of the Church which they occupied, together with the account of the fruites they have received fince the time of heir possession, and that under paine (in case of disobedience) to incurre the paines of cursings & nterdictions, not onely to the Citie of Vence, and all the towes of their obadience, but also to all uch, as being not subject to their intissiction, were yet receivers or rescuers of the Venetians, delaring them attainted of crimen lafa maiestain, and defied as perpetuall enemies to all Christians, o whom he gaue full power to take their goods where they were found, & to make their persons laues. Against this Bull not many dayes after, was brought into the towne of Rome, a writing by ne vnknowne in the name of the Prince & Magistrats of Vence, wherein, after a long & bitter natation against the Pope and the French king, was expressed an appeale from the admonition to the next Councell, and for want of humaine juffice, to the tribunall of Jefus Christ the most righteous and foueraigne judge. To these spirituall thunderboltes, were joyned temporall threates, for hat the French Heralt arriving at the fame time at Venice, and brought afore the prefence of the Duke and Senate, denounced in the name of the French king, the warre already begun, charging them to have given many occasions more apparant then true or just. The Duke, after some confulting with the Senate, answered the Heralt in few wordes, that fince the king his maister was determined to make warre you them, in a time who they hoped most for the observation of the alliance which they had never violated, & for not breaking of it, had made Cafar their enemy, they would frad vpo their defence, which they hoped to be able to do with their forces, accopanied with the iullice of their cause. This answer seemed to resemble more the dignitic of their common weale, then if they had vied iultifications and complaints to one that had already assayled then with armes.

The Venetians

The Venetian army was at last affembled and mustered at Pontuico, wherein were two thoufand men at armes, three thousand light horsemen & estradiots, fifteene thousand footemen, chofen, & the very flower of fouldiers in all the regions of Italie, no lesse for their generall valour, ther for the experience of the leaders, & fifteene thouland other footmen of choile, of the appointmeto their countreys, accompanied with great quantities of artillerie: from thence the armie marchedic Fontenella, a towne within fixe niyles of Lodi, & a retraite very commodious to fuccour Gremona, Crema, Carauaga, and Bergama: where judging they should have occasion, for the retraite of M. Chaumont beyond Adda, to recouer Treuy, the kings armie withall being not yet affembled, they tooke the fields, following the deliberation of the Senate, but against the counsell of Almano who fayd they were counsels almost repugnant, to forbid to fight with the enemie, & yet to draw so neare the, seeing haply it might either not be in their power to retire, or if they did it would be with a diminutio of reputation hurtfull to the substance of the whole warre. In which regard, & for his particular honour, and universall respect of all the men of warre of Italie, he had rather chusete commit his life to hazard & fortune, then give his cofent to fo great an infamic. The first towns the armie tooke was Rivolce, where the French had left no garrison, and having put into it fiftie horse and three hundred footemen, they drew neare to Treny, a towne very neare the river of Adda, ha uing his fituation fomewhat high and bearing, and wherein Alonsieur Chaumont had left fifthe Launces and a thousand footemen, vnder Captaine Imbault, Frontalle Gascon, and the white Knight. The artilleries were planted on that fide to Cascina, where the wall was weakest, & ma king great executio, fuch as were within yeelded the day following, the fouldiers faued, but with out armes, the Captaines remaining priloners, & the towne wholly at the difcretion of the victors The houses and riches of the towne were put to present sacke, but with greater domage to the vi ctors, the to those that were vanquished, for that the Frech king understanding the cape of the ene mie to be before Treme, supposing that that place being lost almost in his sight, would bring grea diminution to his reputation, he aduaunced his armie, & with a speede according to the necessiti of the perill, marched fro Millan to refeue it: and arriving the day after the execution of Trenie, a the river neare Cascina, where were made before for the oportunitie of Cascina without impedi met, three bridges of barks, he passed with his whole armie, his enemies making no countenance t refift him:a matter which made many men of experience to maruell, that they idly loft fo faire oc casion to set ypo the former part of his army, which was passed & Triunice, enforcing the glory c that aduantage, feeing the whole armie paffe without refistace, cried to the Frech king, The vido rie was won: Of such force are occasions being given by negligence of the one partie, & followe with resolution and valour of the other : neuerthelesse it is certaine, that the Venetian Captaine both different the benefite of the occasion, and would have vied it, fauing it was not in their pow er, neither by authoritie nor by petition, nor with threats, to drive out of Treny the fouldiers oc cupied in pillage and pray. And albeit in a diforder fo generall, and a necessitie fo desperate, Aluna no had no other meane for their common safetie, then to compell the multitude of fouldiers to iffue, by fetting the towne on fire: yet it was a remedie too flow and late for that the French win the fauour of their fortune, were already passed, scorning with great joy the cowardise and wret ched counsell of the enemie. The king encamped within litle more then a myle of the Venetian who lay in a place somewhat raised, & bearing such strength as well by the oportunitie of his sear as by the rampiers and trenches they had cast by their industrie, that there was no possibilitie to se vpon them without manifest perill, the time, the place, and almost the dispositions of men, with a other circumstances appertaining to such an action, being against them. As they drew to counse in what forme and maner they should proceede, many were of opinion (standing also vpon the ex pectation of the desceding of Calar) that they should temporise and deferre, for that the condition of him that expectes to be assayled, being better then he that seekes to set on another, necessisi would compell the Venetian Captaines to feeke to offer the battaile, feeing they had no reasonabl meane to defend their iurifdiction oppressed in so many places: A perswasion contrarie to the op stion of the king; who fought chiefly to fight in a place, whose situation was not about the valor of the champions, being moued thereunto either for feare that Cafar would aduaunce too flowly eife for that being really in the campe in perfon with the choife forces of his kingdome, he flood proceely in an absolute hope of the victorie, but also judged it much to his dishonour, if he put ot an end to the war of himself without the ministration of others: as of the cotrarie he esteemed greatly to the glory and reputation of his name, if by his power and vertue, and in his owne peton, the refidue of the confederates might come to communicate no leffe then himfelfe in the reardes and fruits of the victorie: an ambition of glorie much familiar with great Princes, and ofntimes most hurtfull to great enterprises, specially when one particular power aspireth to excice an action which in reason, counsell, and confederacie respecteth a joynt affishance. On the other te, the Committioners and Captaines of Vence, not forestalling their counsels for any seare they d of Cefar, were determined not to put thefelues into places equall or coparatine with the encie, but shifting alwayes into places of aduauntage & strength, they fought at one time to eschue e necestitic of the battell, and withall to let that the French should do nothing of importance, seeag to obey time, necessitie, and all other things to be respected in an action of that nature.

With these deliberations and counsels, neither the one nor the other armie made any mouing, t stood encamped a whole day the one in the face of the other. And albeit in so neare aspect of o mightie enemies equall in ambition, and in glorie nothing inferiour, it is hard to containe men teruice, yet there was nothing executed betweene them, but certaine light skirmishes by horsein, wherein though the French by aduauncing their artillerie, fought occasion to fight, yet the tell was not embraced, mens counfels varying, and the respects of things not resolued. The day er, the king remoued towardes Rivolta, to try whether a defire to keepe that place would cause Italians to moue: who, not firring, to obtaine at the least a fecret confession that they had no mackes to accept the battell, the king stood foure long houres aforetheir lodgings with his front one area. islearmic aranged in battell, the Venetians doing no other thing then move and thew them-ther, and fight ics in the front of the Frenchmen in good order, without abandoning their trench. At this time not. artilleric being drawne by part of the kings fouldiers to the wals of Rivolea, the place was forland taken in few houres, where the king lodged that night with all his armie, being not a litle ubled with the maner of proceeding of the enemies, whose counsels he prayled so much the re, by how much they were framed against his intentions, and discontented him. But to draw. mby necessitie to that whereunto they bare a will estranged, after he had remained a whole day Rivolta, and fer fire in the place afore he departed, he remoued his campe to lodge at Vailo, or 'andin the night following: he hoped that by the oportunitie of either of these places, he might ily give impediment to the victuals comming from Cremona and Crema, & by that meane to put m in necessitic to leauc abadoned their lodgings wherein they had remained to that houre. The nettan Captaines faw what were the thoughts and intentions of the king, and did not doubt t it would not be necessarie to take a place strong & neare the enemy, to continue to hold them he same difficulties and impedimets: But the Count Petillano counselled to deferre the mouing he campe till the day following notwithstanding Aluiano made so great an instance to the conrie, alleaging how necessarie it were to preuent them, that in the end it was agreed to breake vp dēly(rafhnefle preuayling more then maturitie of counfell.) There were two wayes to leade to fayd places, the one lower neare the river of Adda, but a longer way and full of turnings: the er more remoued from the river, but more short, and more straight, the one making the string, I the other the bow, as the faying runnes. The lower way was taken by the kings armie, which trained more then two thousand Launces, fixe thousand Swiffer sootemen, and twelue thoud of Gascoins and Italians, well furnished with artillerie, & a sufficient provision of Pioners. The netian armie marched by the higher way upon the right hand towardes the enemie : in it were othousand men at armes, more then twentie thousand sootemen, with a great quantitie of light femen, partly Italians, & partly leavied in Greece by the Venetians, who ranne before, but fore to enlarge and spread according to their custome, the bushes & branches whereof the counwas full betweene both the one and other armie, being their impediments, as also they so shawed both the campes, that they could not fee one another. But marching in this order, and the netrans alwayes aduauncing, there drew neare together in one time the French vauward contaiing fiue hundred Launces, and the Swiffer footemen, led by Charles d'Amboyfe and Iohn Iacques runlee, & the rearegard of the Venetians governed by Bartlemen Alusano, wherein were eight indred menarines, with all the flower of the footenien of the armie, but they kept no good order in their march, Aluiano not thinking that the battell would be offered that day : but when he faw himfelfe in the face of his enemies, what by the renouation of his auricient valour, and that he was brought into fuch extremitie of place, that he was compelled to fight, he gaue prefent aduertifement to the Count Petillano leading the other part of the armie before, his necessitie, or else his refolution demaunding his fuccours. The Count returned answer that he should continue his marching, and eschue the fight, the reasons of warre so requiring, and the resolution of the Senate agreeing. But in the meane while, Aluiano having bestowed his footemen with fixe peeces of artillerie vpo a litle trench made to stop the furie of a land flood, which at that time being almost dry of water passed betweene both the armies: charged the enemies with such courage and surie, that he compelled them to give ground, wherein this ministred not a little helpe to him, that the first charge was amongst certaine vines, where, by reason of the hedges and intricate branches of the vines, the French horsemen could execute litle: neuerthelesse the battell of the French army, wherin was the kings person, being aduaunced for that daunger, the two first squadrens ioyned to charge the bandes of Alutano, who entring into a great hope of the victorie for to happy a beginning, was not idle to labour to encourage the fouldiers with vehement wordes. The battell was furious on all sides, the French receiving courage & comfort by the succours of their companions, and for that the battell was drawne into a place open and discouered, where their horsemen had fpace & Icope to manage at pleasure: besides, the presence of the king did much to stirre them, who bearing no more respect to his person, then if he had bene a private souldiour, refused not to stand in the dannger of the artillerie, not ceaffing where he faw neede, to command, to encourage, and to threaten. On the other fide the Italian footenen, who were full of resolution for their first sellcitie, fought with great constancie of courage and valour, Alutano forgetting nothing that belonged to the office of an excellent Captaine. At last, three houres being consumed in this execution. the Venetian bands receiving by the plainnesse of the place great distresse by the French horsemen & not able withall to keepe firme footing for the rayne that fell during the battell, which made the ground slippery, but specially for that they were not succoured by the residue of the army, begate fight with a great disaduauntage, & yet made resistance with great vertue, in so much as when the · faw no hope to ouercome, it was well expressed in the effectes of their valour, that more to winn glory then to faue them felties, they laboured to make the victorie bloudy to the French, despising perils with the fame mindes where with they fought for glory & monument. And albeit they kep the battell a long time in suspension and doubt, yet at last, being more deprived of strength thene courage, without turning their backes to the enamie, they passed almost all vinder the sentence of the Iword, leaving to the relidue of the armie an example of right worthy imitation, and to po steritie a perpetuall prayle of their merite and vertue. Among the rest that were slaine, many la mentations were made for one of the Marquiffes of the Mount S. Maria de Tuskana, a Captain of great exercise in leading footemen in the warres of Pifa, when he lived in the pay of the Floren tines, and now one of the Colonels of the Venetian footemen. The honorable refisfance which the onely one part of the armie made, bred almost a generall opinion, that if the whole Venetian camp had entred the battell, they had either caried the victory, or at least past it to the enemie with grea ter perill and bloud-shedding. But the Count Petillano, with whom was the greatest part of the armie, abstained from armes, either for that (thus he alleaged) as he prepared to aduaunce the bat tell, he was ill aduertifed by an efquadron that fled away, or rather (luch was the bruce) Handing it no hope or possibilitie of the victorie, and no lesse disdained that Almano contrarie to his direction had aduentured to fight, he effected it a counfell better affured, to keepe that part of the army re ferued, then to referre the whole to hazard for the rathnesse of another, the extremitic of the peri making him more carefull then honourable. In this battell perished very few men at armes, the whole flaughter falling upon the Venetian footemen, whereof died by good testimonic eight thou fand bodies, notwithstanding some report that the number of the dead men on both parts, could not paffe fixe thousand men: such variation followeth brutes and rumours, being for the mol Aluiano taken part full of incertainties and errours . Bartlemew Aluiano remained prisoner, who receiving hurt in his eye, was by that misfortune halfe blinded with the bloud of his wound, and that area (pitifull in a Captaine of his merite) was led to the kings pauillion. The refidue of the armie being not followed in chase, found lafetic in flying, loofing in all twentie peeces of great artillerie. Thi was the notable battell of Guiaradadda, or according to the opinion of some, the victorie of Valle hich was fought the xiiij, day of May, & in moment of which the king caused to be edified in the ry place where the battell was executed, a Chappell, which he honoured with the name of S.

The king, with the felicitie of this victorle, not willing to corrupt by negligence the occasion at had bene won with valour and fortune; marched the day following to Caranage, where the The taking of wne being fuddenly rendred by composition, he battered the Castell with artillerie, which also many townes ithin foure and twentie houres yeelded to discretion. The Citie of Bergama gaue up the day aft, without abiding the comming of the armie, where after the king had left fiftie Launces and a oufand footemen to batter the Callell, he advanced to Bressia, but before he arrived there, the aftell of Bergama, after the cannon had executed a whole day, was rendred upon condition, that turin Georgio with other Venetian Magistrates, should be prisoners, for that the king not so much rhatred, as for hope to draw money, had determined not to accept any composition of townes, the which the Gentlemen of Vence should be faued, seeking to make the benefite of his warres beare out the greatest burden and expenses of his armie. In all ages, time hath carried a power varie and alter the humours of men, gouerning their inclinations according to occasions that ppen: the same being approued in the inhabitants of Bressia, in whom now remained no more it auncient disposition with the which their elders in the warres with P.M. Viscount, had sustaid a grieuous and great fiege to preferue themfelues under the iurifdiction of Venice: and being w disposed to take the yoke of the French, partly for seare of their armes, and partly at the perasson of the Count lon. Fea. de Cambara chiefe of the Gebelin faction : they sealed upon the es of the towne the day after the battell, opposing manifestly against George Cornato, who begone thither in great diligence, fought to strengthen the place with men. And besides, the netian armie which was very much diminished in nubers, not onely by the slaughter of the bat-, but also for that many were gone away, as often hapneth when an armie falleth into aduersithey respected nothing, neither the authoritie nor the petition of Andre Grutti, who was end into Bressia to perswade them to take it for their defence: therefore the armie supposing no etie in that place, marched towardes Pefquiero, the Citie of Breffia yeelding to the French king, the Castell within two dayes after doing the like, under this condition, that such as were withhould depart in fafetie, except the Gentlemen of Venice.

Nothing is more grieuous then the report of an ill accident, and nothing more intollerable then en the expectation of things is chaunged by finisher successe: for that by how much the hope s likely and possible, by so much more desperate is the euent falling in a course contrary to that s expected. The newes of fo great a calamitie was no fooner understood in the towne of Ve-, then it was incredible to behold the univerfall alteration that appeared: iome afflicted with row, but the most part perplexed with feate, the minds of those being most confused and ama-, who much lesse that they had bene accustomed to feele such aduersities, but of the contrarie, The laments. bene wont alwayes in other warres to carrie felicitie and victories and as men not accustomed the state of the aduerfities have litle rule over their passions, so such as never felt but prosperitie, can least sudge overthrow. the worthinesse of patience: for in this affliction they cried out against heaven and earth, and aced justly the instabilitie of mortall estate: their feare made them set before their eyes the losse of ir whole dominion, with the latter ruine of their countrey and common weale, wherein their row increased with the consideration of the time, seeming to deprive them of glory, power, and utation, even when they promifed to themselves no lesse then the imperie of all Italie. And in ofe dolours and miferable demonstrations of minde, they ran crying and complaining to the puke pallace, where the Elders and Senatours taking counfell what to do in aduer fitie fo much porting, after they had long debated with great diversitie of opinio, the Councell brake vp ouerne with dispaire: so weake and incertaine were the remedies, and so slender the hopes of their ctie and weldoing. Where the ill is common, the discomfort is generall, nothing remaining to aine the mindes of men but impressions of dispaire and calamitie; they considered they had no ther Captaines nor men to imploy in their defence, then fuch as remained of the ouerthrow, and them was equall the want of force, & diminution of courage. And for their popular multitudes, biectes of their generall dominion, they faw them either inclined to rebell, or at least so estraund from suffering, that there remained no disposition to put themselues in further perillfor their fetie. They beheld in the French king, (no lefte mightie for the greatnesse and glorie of his army, then infolent for his late happinesse and victorie) a resolution to come on and follow the course his fortune. They faw that the channe of the battell had made him maister over the harts and cou rages of men, and given him commaundament over countreys and common weales: And if a gainst him alone they were not able to make resistance, what would be their condition when C. far should arrive, whom they understood to be at hand, and to march with speede, being drawn on by fo great an occasion: They saw from all parts great concurrance of daungers, with occa fions of dispaire, and very small apparance of hope or comfort: They feared least in their proper countrey full of multitudes of men of warre, would rife some daungerous tumult, partly for a ge nerall hatred against Gentlemen, and partly for defire of pillage. Lastly, in these contemplation of forrow and calamitie, they made their mindes the very images of dispaire, esteeming as alredy hapned, all the aduersiries that their timerous coniectures could imagine. Neuerrhelesse takin courage and comfort in so great a feare, such as their present fortune would suffer, they determ ned, with the best diligence they could, to be reconciled in what fort socuer with the Pope, wil Cafar, & with the king Catholike, not looking any way to appeale the minde of the French kin for that their dispaire was no lesse for the hate which he bare them, then they seared the power at might of his armes. And yet omitting nothing which they supposed might minister to their de fence, they studied to leavie treasures & money, and gaue order to refurnish and raise new banc And for feare of the armie at fea which was fayd to be rigged at Genes, they deuised to increa their naule to fiftie galleys commaunded by Ange Treusan. But all their counsels were preud ted by the celeritie of the Frenchking, to whom fince the conquest Bressia, was rendred the Cit of Cremona, the Castell holding good for the Venetians, which, not withstanding it was strong, he followed the example of the others, together with that of Ps/queton yeelding also in the san time, if the king had confented that every one should depart with safetie: but, for that there we within it many Gentlemen of Venice, as Zacharie Contarin, a man of great wealth and possession he would not receive them but with condition to have power over the Gentlemen: in which min he fent an armie to keepe them befieged. And for that the Venetian armies encamping in the fie of Mars neare Verona, & decreasing continually, forthat they of Verona would not receive the into their towne, the king went before Pefquiero to get the Castell, the towne being already re dred: the batterie had not played any long time, but the footenen Smiffers and Gascons entr with great furie through small breaches and ruines of the wall, & making slaughter of almost four hundred footemen whom they found at defence, they tooke prisoner the Captaine of the C stell, being likewise Captaine of the towne, a Gentleman of Vence, who by the kings comaune ment was hanged vpon the battlements of the same Castell: a crueltie which the king yied for e ample fake, that fuch as defended the Callell of Cremona, induced by this punishment, might r continue in obstinacie to the extremitie. There is nothing more swift then victorie, specially who occasions are followed, and the oportunities of times and other circumstances embraced: for t French king within fifteene dayes after the battell, had reconquered (except the Castell of Crem na) all that appertained to him by the division which was made at Cambray: a conquest no le honourable for the king, then of great commoditie for the Duchie of Millan, and augmenting t reuenues of the king to more then two hundred thousand duckets by yeare. About this time, beit the armies of the king of Romains had appeared yet in no place neither in action nor Thew, the Pope, joyning himselfe to the fauour of the time, assayled the townes of Romania with for hundred men at armes, foure hundred light horsemen, & eight thousand footmen, with the artill rie of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he had chosen Gonfalonier of the Church, which is a title acce ding to the practife of our times, that holdes more of dignitie then of authoritie: he recommend the charge of this armie iountly to Francisco de Castello de Rie Cardinall of Paula bearing t name of the Legate Apostolike, and to Frauncis Maria de la Rouera, sonne to John his late br ther, who, being adopted for some by Guid. Duke of Vrbin his vncle by the mother side, the ado tion also confirmed in the confissorie by the Popes authoritie, had succeeded the yeare before the Duchie, the Duke of Vrbin being dead without other children. They ranne with this arn from Cesena towardes Seruia, and comming betweene Imola and Faenza, they tooke the tow of Solarola: and after they had bin certaine dayes at Bastida three myles from Faenza, they drew Bresiguella, which is the capitall towne of Val de Lamona, wherein was newly entred John Pah Manfron with eight hundred footemen, and certaine horsemen; who issuing out to fight, were tra-

ed into an ambush, and so hotly charged by John Paule Baillon and Lodowike de la Alirandola Captaines of the Church armie, that as they would have fought their fafetic in the towne, the enesie entred Pelmell with them, and that with furthfurie, that Manfron being felled from his horse, ad scarie leasure to retire to the Castell: afore the which the artillerie being brought & planted, the nunitions that were within were set on fire at the first blow: an accident that so terrified the deendants within, that they rendred absolutely the place to the discretion of the victor. After the hole valley was taken, the armie descended into the plaine, and tooke Garanarola with all the ther townes of the countrey of Faenza, and so went and encamped before Russi, which is a bough situate betweene Faenza and Rauenna, but not easie to be taken, for that besides it was juironed with very large and deepe trenches, it was defended with fixe hundred footemen foriners. But that which made more vneasie the action of that towne, was, that there was not in e Church armie, neither that counfell, nor that concorde that was necessarie, not with sanding it ounded in strength and forces, three thousand Swiffers payed by the Pope being there newly rined: for which cause, albeit the Venetians were not strong in Romania, yet things had no great uauncement on that fide: onely Iohn Greeke Captaine of the estradiots issuing out of Rauenna ithhis bands, was broken and taken prisoner by Iohn Vitelli, one of the Captaines of the Churchi iffly, after they had remained ten dayes afore Roffi, they tooke it by coposition. And the victoof the king hapning in the fame time, the Citie of Faenza, who flood now in her owne power, that the Venetian strength was now diminished, agreed to acknowledge the Pope for their ord, if they were not rescued within fifteene dayes: by the benefite of which conuention there ied out of Faenza under the faith of the Legate, flue hundred footemen of the Venetians, who ere stripped by commaundement of the Duke of Vrbin: The Citie of Ranenna did the like afone as the armie approched. Thus, more by the reputation of the victorie of the French king, in by his proper forces, the Pope conquered in a little time, those townes which he had so long fired in Romania, in the which as the Venetians held no other peece then the Castell of Ranenso, euer fince the first ouerthrowing of their armie, there disclosed dayly against them new ences: for, the Duke of Ferrara, who till that day had not declared him felfe, chased out of Ferrathe Vildonmo, a Magistrate which the Venetians kept resident there, according to the auncient nuentions, to minister equitie to their subjectes: And taking armes, he recovered without imliment Polesma, and sonke with artilleries the Venetian Nauies floting upon the river of Ad-. To the Marquis of Mantua were yeelded the townes of Afola and Lunato, which the Venens had taken in the warre they had against Philip M. Viscount, vpon lohn Frauncis de Gonsaa his great grandfather. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan occupied Pisinia and Divinia: and the ke of Brunswike, who by Casars commandement was entredinto Frial with two thousand n trayned, tooke Feltro and Bellona. At his comming, together with the brute of the victorie the French, Triefla with the other townes (the conquest of which had bin the very welspring I beginning of all the aduerfities to the Venetians) returned under the obedience of Cafar. In : for the Counts of Lodron occupied certaine Castels and Boroughs that were neare them, and · Bishop of Trent vsurped Rina and Agresta. But amid all these calamities and declinations of tune, there was nothing that fo much amafed the Venetians fince the battell, as the taking of the stell of Pequiero, whose strength and situation, with other oportunities of the place, they supfed would have stayed the furie of the victor: so weake is the hold of hope where is nothing but inger on all fides, that the Venerians standing amased amid so many perils, were fearefull that king would passe further: And their condition being made so desperate, that the seate that pos-I them, left them no libertie of counsell, together with their bands which were retired to Mestre, (nongft whom was neither obedience nor order) being reduced to a very small nuber. They derimined (& haply too soone) to abandon the jurisdiction of the firme land, to the end to haue no tore enemies, and no leffe to take from the French king all occasions to draw neare to Venice: for 124 were not without suspition, that in that Citie would rise some tumult, either by the people that ow were growen infolent, or by the innumerable multitude of straungers that dwelt there: some or defire of pray and pillage which makes men mutinous and difordred, and some for that they ould not endure their deprivation of honours, and in all things to beare such a yoke of subjection the Gentlemen, feeing they were Citizens borne by long fuccession of times in libertie & freeome, and most of them of the same bloud and families; wherein in so great a dispaire and losse of courage, this reason was alleaged in the Senate, that if willingly they abandoned the gouerneme, to eschue the perils present, they should easily recover it with the returns and oportunitie of a be. ter fortune: for that the peoples and fubicas that willingly should separate themselves from ther would not make so strong resistance to returne estsoones under the obedience of their auncie: Lordes, as they would do if they deuided themselves from them by manifest rebellion: for which reasons the magnanimitie of the Venetians comming now to be defaced, together with the rep. tation of fo glorious a common weale declining, they were content to keepe to themfelues the fe waters onely, addressing to the Magistrates and officers gouerning at Padua, Verona, and all oth townes bearing interest to Maximilian, directions to returne with speede, and leave the town to the denotion of the peoples. Befides, to the end to obtaine peace of Maximilian under wh conditions focuer, they fent to him with diligence their Embassador Institutan, who being adm ted to his prefence in publike audience, fpake very pitifully and with great humilitie & fubmiffic but in vaine, for that Cafar denied to make any cotract without the privitie of the French king. B the better to make knowne how much the common weale of Venice was humbled and abated; courage, not feeling the like aductifities in two hundred yeares before, it can not be impertinent expresse here the selfe Oration which their Embassadour yttered afore Casar.

The Oration of Anth. Infti-

In the auncient Philosophers and first men of civilitie, it was a disposition no lesse honorab then a judgement equalland just, to affure that that was the true, firme, eternall, & immortall g wianto Cafar. rie, which men got in conquering their proper affections: An action which they preferred abe " all kingdomes, triumphes, and vertues, for that in it was reprefented the very image and fimility " of that which they called the divinitie in men. For this vertue Scipio caried more glory and repu "tion, then for all the victories he won against Affrike or Carthage: This was the respect for " which ages & posterities do yet nourish the immortalitie of Alexander, when Darim, our throw " by him in a mightie battell, befought God that in case he had determined to dispose his kingdor " he would ordaine him no other fuccessourthen his enemie, whose victorie could not make him ther then mercifull and gracious. Cafar the Dictator, of whom you beare the name, & commu " cates no leffe in his fortunes and felicities, then in his liberalities, elemencies, and other vertues, v 66 honoured with divine titles and glories, for that he favoured, respected, and pardoned. Lastly "Senate and people of Rome, whole imperie in earth is onely refembled in your person, as the mi " flie and greatnesse hath there his perfect image, brought more peoples and prouinces under the " fubication with clemencie, equitie, and mildnesse, then with the rigour of armes and warre. The " is nothing more worthy then elemencie, nor any thing better bescenning the maiestie of a Prir " then to be easie to be appealed, and ready to forgive: for that if it be holden inft and honorabl "throw downe an obstinate enemie, it is no lesse worthy and commendable to have pitie onth i " that are already falle into misfortunes. I hope it shall not be the least of your prayses, if your Maiestie, in whose hands shands the " Ctoric gotte over the Venetians, looking into the fraylty of worldly things, will vie it with mode. For touching the inconflancie of humaine things, how incertaine aduentures are, and hi doubtfull, how mutable, how deceitfull, and how full of daungers is the estate of men mortalist " neede not proue it by examples straunge, forreine, or auncient, since the common weale of Ver "Randes at this houre the true figure and reprefentation of the infirmitie of humaine condition a kingdomes. It was not long fince, neither leffe mightie, leffe florishing, not leffe renowmed th so that our name and reputation could not only be celebrated & contained within the limites of " rope, but with a great pompe & magnificence, ranne through all Affrike & Asia, & catied be " and terrour euento the extreame bounds of the earth: And now by the onely loffe of a battell, o " leffe light & easie, then deprived of the prayle & merite of armes, it is become dispoyled of riel; " deuided from thrength, defaced in renowme, ruinated of all things, and especially of counsell, & o reuerfed & abated, that there remaines nothing of our auncient vertue, but fignes and shadov, " all things being turned into defolation, & nothing remaining but a langentable expectation of ; -" petuall ruine. But greatly do the French men beguile themselves, if they make a glory of our spee or attribute our aductifities to their vertue, fince not with flanding we have bene heretofore were " and trauelled by fo many afflictions, wasted and confumed with fo many daungers and ruines, at

" we never made our courage bafer then our fortune: yea even in those davingerous warres with

e managed many yeares against the terrible enemic and tyrant of the Turkes, of men vanquied, we seemed victorious. And as there are no men miserable, but those that esteeme them ;, lues so by the base reputation of their courage, so we had still retained the same shew of va-,, ur, resolution, and magnanimitic, sauing that the brute of the terrible name of your Maiestie, gether with the lively and invincible vertue of your fouldiers, hath fo abated the mindes of vs all, at there remaines no hope, not to vanquish and ouercome, no not to defend and refist: an ad-,, refitie fo lamentable to vs, that deprining our felues of armies and weapons, we have reposed,, chope and remedie of our afflictions in the divine pietic and elemencie of your Maiettie; which,, e doubt not to finde even in the greatest despaire of our affaires. In which respect as well on the ,, halfe of the Prince and Senat, as of the people and communaltic of Venice, we pray, befeech, and , , . miure you, to cast the eyes of your mercy vpon our afflictions, and to cure our grienes with reedies of comfort and consolation: we offer not to debate any articles of peace, but we come ac-,. impanied with mindes to embrace all fuch conditions as you thinke meete to impose, iudging,, em reafonable, righteous, and iust: we are not worthy to taxe our felues, or appoint our owne res, but under our free and voluntarie confents we offer to you as true and lawfull Lord, restitu-,, on of all those things which our elders have taken from the sacred Empire, and Duchie of Au-,, Whereunto (the condition of our fortune requiring to induce your Maiestie by all humilities), adde all those things which we possesse in the firme land, renouncing all rights, all charters, all, progatives and interests, by the which we either have got them, or do hold them: we will acowledge a yearely payment tributarieto your Maiestie and your lawfull successors in the Em-,, e, of fiftie thousand duckets for euer: we will obey you in all your commaundementes, lawes, crees, and impositions, and holding that to belong to our dutie, deuotion, and sidelitie, which,, pendes vpon your authoritie, or respectes your securitie, we will repute vs in the condition of, iectes, not conqueted by armes and victorie, but voluntarily yeelded under your pietie and cle-,, ncie. We befeech you let our teares and true demonstrations of sorrow induce you to defend, from the infolencie of those, who earst were our companions in armes, and now do proue,, m our bitter enemies, defiring nothing more then the ruine of our name . In preserving vs by ,, ar clemencie, we are to call and honour you by the name of father and founder of our Citie, to, ke you a perpetuall monument in our Chronicles and registers, and to Icaue perpetuall report, our children and posteritic of your high metites and vertues : esteeme it no small increase of ur prayles, that you are the first Prince afore whose feete the common weale of Venice falles oftrate, before whose face we bow our knees, under whose handes we offer our selues humbled, 1 whom we honour, reucrence, and respect as a Prince holding iust authority ouer vs. There can .,. nothing required which we are not ready to performe, and those things which of your modeyou forbeare to demaund, our necessitie hastneth vs to offer into your handes, our humilitie,, ng the true interpreter of the faith and deuotion of our mindes: we hope the extremitie of our,,, ils will not make vs the leffe apt to receive your favours, for that he gives a grievous fentence, sinft the flate of mans mortalitie, that denieth compassion to men in miserie. And the law of hour and clemencie holdes vs so farre assured that you will not make vs reiected because we are,, icted, fince it is one chiefe office in your Christian pietie, to minister succours to men in neceses. Compassion debates not causes and reasons, but proceedes to the reliefe of such as suffer, dexpect it, then agreeing with true magnanimitie, when it miniflers comfort upon free and li-,, rall motions. The glory is greater to lend your hand to those that are already fallen, then by, wing your sword against your enemies, to carie the prayse of their victorie and confusion, the ,, e being just and necessarie, and the other a high action of charitie, which carrieth the doers ,, to the fauour of God: if ambition and worldly inspiration had not so commaunded our aun-,, Rours, that they had forborne to aspire to the estates of others, our common weale might, ue flood aduaunced about all the Cities of Europe in glory, in nobilitie, in magnanimitie and ri-,, es, where now deformed altogether with infamie and reproch, it is torne and broken in a mo-,, ent, and nothing remaining of io many honors and victories, but a perpetual monument, scorne, nd derifion. And by how much our aduerfities are great, and our petitions lamentable, by so such it concernes you in clemencie, as you are able in power, to reestablish the estate of, ne Venetians: an action that brings with it fuch a reputation of name and honour, as in old age prescription or antiquitie, no law of time, nor course of yeares, shall be able to wipe it out

es of the mindes and memories of mortall men: but as you shall merite with all peoples and natius " the onely name of pityfull, iult, and pardoning, fo for our parts, receiuing our fafetie from your ca

" mencie, we shall attribute to your vertue, to your felicitie, and to your goodnesse, that we live, the

we breath, or that we are referred to hold communitie with men.

The calamities of the Venetians made them of nothing fo carefull, as to render those peers which so long they had occupied of others, their fortune giving them at that time no betr meanes either to appeale or affure their aduerfities: They fent according to the same delibetion into Powella, to restore the portes to the king of Aragon, who knowing how to enjoy e fruites of other menstrauels without his owne expences or daunger, had dispatched into Spare a small Nauie at sea, which had commaunded certaine places appertaining to those Cities and la uens of the sea. They dispatched also into Romana a publike Secretarie, with commission, give vp to the Pope all that they held there, vpon condition that lohn Paule Manfron and ott prisoners might be restored, with libertic to draw out their artilleries, and that the peoplet t were within the Castell of Rauenna should depart in safetie. Which conditions whilest the Pic made difficultie to accept, for that he would not displease the confederates, the Castell of Rane a was rendred, the fouldiers giving it vp of themselves, notwithstanding the Venetian Secrete that was entred, fought to hinder it, for that fuch as folicited for them at Rome, gaue hope that e Pope in the end would confer to the conditions, vnder the which they had offered restitution But the Pope complained much that they had shewed a greater contuniacie against him the gainst Calar or the king of Aragon: and therefore when the Venstian Cardinals in the nam of the Senate, demaunded absolution of the Bull, as being due, for that they had offered restitute within the terme of xxiiij. dayes, he made answer, that they had not obeyed, because their ct was not simple but joyned to conditions limited: and for that they were admonsshed over d befides the restitution of the townes, to yeeld account of the fruites they had received, toge t with the benefites they possessed appertaining to Churches or to persons Ecclesiasticall.

ons touching the fall of the Venerians.

In this fort was ouerwhelmed with a wonderfull furie, the effate of the common! weal of Venice, one calamitic growing upon another, all their hopes declining, vaine and fallible, d no figne remaining by the which, after the loffe of fo great a dominion, they might hope for e Diverse opini- preservation of their proper libertie. So great a ruine touched diversly the mindes of the Italia, of whom many received contentment, remembring that the Venetians, proceeding in toog t ambition, without respect to institute or observation of faith, aspiring to all things that occa n or oportunitie offered, had manifeltly quarrelled the whole Monarchie of Italie, aspiring to it vniuerfall subjection of all those regions: things which made their names hatefull, and their re uernement intollerable by the confideration of their naturall pride. On the other fide, many ... king without passion into the present estate of things, & how wretched & sowle it were for all he to be brought wholly under the feruitude and yoke of straungers; felt no little griefe that she a maiestic of Citie, the auncient seate of libertic, and the very glory of the Italian name thro h all the world, should fall into such extremitie, that so worthy a member should be cut off, with more then all the relidue had bene the protectour of their common glory and renowne. Bis boue all so great a fall and declination began to be gricuous to the Pope, who doubting the pope ers of Cafar and the French king, defired to alter their thoughts from oppressing him, by inte gling them with affaires'. In which regard he determined (but secretly) to do all he could, that e aduersities of the common weale of Venice should have no further course. And in that good fe position of minde, he accepted the letters written to him in the name of the Duke of Vers by the which he befought him in great submission, to receive the sixe Embassadours sent to n of the principals of the Senate, to fuc for pardon and absolution. These letters being read, wh their petitions published in the consistorie, he consented to admit them, after he had in # wordes protested that it was the auncient custome of the Church, not to shew it selfe hard or igorous to fuch as with repentance of their faults, fought for reconcilement and pardon. The He bassadours of the Emperour and the French striued what they could against it, putting him in 13morie that by the cofederation of Cambray, he was expresly bound to persecute them with ar. :: spirituall and temporall, till every one of the confederates had recovered that which appertaind to him . To whom the Pope made answer, that he had consented to admit them, with im sion not to give them absolution, if first Casar (who onely had not recovered all) had not obtaind ethings that belonged to him . This gaue forme beginning to the hope and comfort of the The field lope energians, but that which affured them most in their latest feares, was the resolution of the of the Venekench king, to obserue simply and in good sidelitie, the capitulation which he had made with tians lefar: and having reconquered all that was his, to passe no further with his armie, nor breake his nites . And therefore albeit it was in his power after he had taken Pefquiero, not onely to accept erona, which had fent Embaffadours to yeeld to him, but also to occupie Padoa without any pediment, together with all the other townes abandoned by the I enetians: yet he would in any re that the Embassadours of Verona should present the keyes of their towns to the Embassapurs of Cafar which were in his armie, and for that cause he stayed with all his campe at Pefviero, which he retained for himselfe for the commoditie of the place, not with standing it apperned to the Marquis of Mantua, who durft not refuse it to the king leaving to him the revenues the towne, with pramife of recompence. At the fame time the king had also by accord the ca-Il of Cremons, vinder condition that all the fouldiers flould depart with goods and life faued, cept fuch as were his subjectes, and that the Gentlemen of Fenice should remaine his prisoners, whom he gave his faith for their fafetie. Vincensa and Padea followed the example of Verona, also other townes, except the Citie of Trenifu, which being abandoned by the Magistrates and ildiers of Venice, had runne also that course, if Casur had sent thicker never so small a force, or at ·least any personage of authoritie. But Leon, de Dressino one of the exiles of Vincensa, went thir to receive it without firength or armes, and without any mieltic of imperic, receiving Padoa the like fort: and being entred and admitted, the exiles of the fame Citie newly restored by the netians (for which benefite they were become faithfull louers of their name) began to draw inrumult, by whose example the people of no less affection to the government of Venice, rose confpired with one called Marke floor iker, publishing himselfe chiefe, and with great cryes Iconcourse of the commons, carying into the principall places the banners of the Venetians, v cryed with one voyce, S. Marke, affuring that they would acknowledge no other Emperour Lord. To this action was much helping and concurrant an Embailadour of the king of Hunie, who in his way to Venice, passing by Tremsa, and being throwne happily into this tumult, fwaded the inhabitantes not to rebell. In fo much that after they had chafed out Dreffina, and into the Citie fenen hundred footemen of the Venetians, the armie also entring a little after, nich was now increased with bandes of sootenien comming from Slauonia, with the remain-'s of the armie, returned from Romania, having an intention to encampe in some strong place eweene Marqueta and Mestra: they forestied the towne in great diligence, and made their rsenien scoure the places of the countrey thereabouts, procuring from all parts great reliefe of tuals, as well for the necessitie of that Citie, as for the vse of the towne of Venice, wherein they thered great quantities from all fides, joyning an incredible diligence to the fudden fauours ich their fortune seemed to recomfott them withall. The principall occasion of this accident, d to confirme in the Venetians a hope to retaine yet fome part of their dominion, together with my other great aduentures that followed, was the negligence and difordred gouernement of efar, of whomin to great a course of victorie there was heard no other thing then his name, notthstanding by the meane of the French armes, and for their feare, fo many townes had bene idred to him, which was very eafie for him to keepe: Onely, after the confederation made at umbray, he occupied certaine time in Flaunders, to leavie of the people a loane of money to furh his warres, which he had no fooner got into his possession, then, according to his custome, he ent it ynproficably. And albeit at his departing from Mackim with all pompes and ceremonies periall, and being come very neare to Italie, he made publication that he would begin the war the terme appointed to him in the capitulation : yet being oppressed with his accustomed fficulties and confusions, he advannced no further, not with landing the Pope egged him ith great importunities, for the feare he had of the French armes: wherein to give him a more cto the enterprise, and to make him no lesse able to the action, be sent to him by Constantus f Macodina fiftie thousand duckets, consenting withall to the hundred thousand duckets which ad bene leauned certaine yeares afore in Germanie, and referued to make warre vpon the infiels. Besides all this, he had received of the French king, an hundred thousand duckets for the inestiture of the Duchie of Millan, and was aductified of the fortune of the battell of Valo as he rew neare to I purch; & not; with standing he dispatched with great diligence the Duke of Brus-Ffij swike to recoult Frint, yet he moued not (as in such a concurrance of occasions had bene conuenient) for want of money (the taxes which he had imposed and drawne from so many plac not being able to suffice his prodigalities.) At last he arrived at Trent, from whence writing le ters congratulatorie to the king, he gaue many thankes that by his meane he had recoursed! townes: and affured him, that the better to expresse the good will he bare to the king, and wit all to wipe out all memories of offences past, he had caused to be burned a booke which was ke at Spires, containing an authentike register of the invaries which the French kings in times pa had done to the Empire and nation of Germanie, confessing that fince the king had accomp. nied his promife with fuch honour and fidelitie, that he could do no leffe in common office, the for his part to diffolue all remembraunces of things that might minister occasions to bee vuthan full to lo great an affection. The Cardinall of Amboyle came to him to Trene the thirteenth d of Iune, to communicate of their common affaires, who being received with demonstrations w testifying the amitic he bare to his king, promised him on the kings behalfe, a succour of fif Launces. In so much that after they had with great agreement given directions for other affaire it was refolued that Cefar and the king should speake together in plaine field neare the towne Gard, vpon the Marches of both the one and others countreys. For which cause the French kin prepared to be there at the day appointed, and fafar, in the same regard came to Rina de Tre. bringing in neither of their mindes any suspition, the one allured by good experience of benef and fidelitie, and the other affured by the confideration of the fame. But fuch are the variatic of Princes, and their ordinarie subjection to suspitions and lealousies, that the Emperour, after had bene there onely two houres, returned immediatly to Trent, fignifying to the French kin that by occasion of new accidents hapned at Frint, he was constrained to depart suddenly, de ring him to stay at Cremona, till he returned to give perfection to the enterview determin This varietie (if not with standing it be possible in a Prince so inconstant to finde out the truth)n. my attributed to his credulitie and lightnesse of beliefe, some men blowing into his eares someth that made him enter into suspicion: Others made this the occasion, that having so small a Cot, accompanied with a trayne ill appointed, he thought he could not present himselfe with that d nitie and reputation, as might hold comparison with the pompe & greatnesse of the French kill who for his part defiring to diffolue his armie to be deliuered of fo great a burden, and no left i returne with speede into Fraunce, tooke his way to Millan, not tarying for the Emperous sig. fication, not with standing the Bishop of Gurce, whom the Emperour had sent for that effect, 1. lowing him euen to Cremona, solicited him much to tarrie, making promise that without all exc tions the Emperour would returne. The discamping of the armie and person of the French k from the confines of Cafar, diminished greatly the reputation of his affaires: and yet albeit he is accompanied with fuch multitudes of men, that he might eafily refurnish Pudoa and the ot o townes, yet he forbare to fend garrifonthither, either for the inconstancie of his nature, or that: thought afore hand ro fet vpo fome other enterprise: or lastly that he interpreted it more to his! nour to descend into Italie with a greater armie. And which more is, he pretended (as though : former actions had had their due perfection) that together with the joynt forces of the whole o federates, they should affayle the Citic of Venice: a matter very plausible to the French king, grieuous to the Pope, and no leffe impugned with open reasons by the king of Aragon.

The last action of the Floren - times against the Pisans.

About thistime, the Florentines put their last hand to the warres against the Fisans: for ter they had cut off all succours and entrie of graynes into Pisa, they leavied new bandes, the end by advancing all the industrie they could, to choake all their course of victuals by sea and land: A matter that was subject to difficultie for the neighbourhood of the count of the Lucquois, who when they could secretly doeit, observed with a very negligent in their accord newly made with the Florentines: the necessities of their neighbours prevayling boue the bond of their promise, oath, or fidelitie. But notwithstanding the secret succourse those good neighbours, the want of victuals more and more encreased within Pisa: an afflict a about all others least tollerable, and most contrarie to the kinde of man, expressing in that adultic a peculiar frayltie. The souldiers of the plaine countrey could not endure it, which me those principals of the Citizens, in whose handes rested all publike resolutions, being slowed with the greatest part of the youth of the Citie, the better to sull the countrey soulds with deuises accustomed, to introduce by the meane of the Lord of Plombin, a practife of acc

with the Florentines: An action wherein were artificially confumed many dayes, and for which ne Florentines sent to Plombin, Nicholus Machianell their Secretarie, the Pifans electing for Emaffadours both Citizens and countreymen. It was very hard to enclose Psfa, for that it stood in fielden large, and full of ditches and marris, neither could the entrie of victuals be hindred by any afie meane, specially by night, both for the faithfull indultry of the Lucquois to refurnish them, & he desperate mindes of the Pylans, resuling no perill wherein was any oportunitie of prouision. But to ouercome those difficulties, the Florentin Captaines determined to deuide their armie into nree partes, bestowing one part at Messana without the gate of Plages, the second at Saint Peer de Rene and Saint lames ouer against the gate of Lucquay, and the third was appointed to the uncient Temple of Saint Peter d'Ingrado, standing betweene Pifa and the mouth of Arna. In eue-, campe, being well fortified, they bestowed a thousand footenien, with convenient numbers of orsemen. And to let that none should passe ouer the mountaines by the way of the vale of Ojola, hich leadeth to the mount Saint Julian, they builded towards the great holpitall, a Bastillion caable of two hundred and fiftie footemen. By these impediments the Pisans fell more and more to want of victuals, who feeking to get by pollicie that which they dispaired to obtaine by force, euised that Alphonso Mutulo a yong man of Pisa, but of base conditio, who being aforetime taen prisoner by the Floretin souldiers, & receiving many pleasures of his keeper, should offer to be e inftrumet to make the furprise the gate that goeth to Lucquay. Their deuise bare this meaning, at at the same time that the campe which was at Saint lames should go by night to execute the iterprile, they would not only oppresse it when one part was entred, but also would charge the ther campes of the Florentines, which according to the resolution, were to approch more neare e Citie; but for that they made not their approach rashly nor in disorder, the Pijans won no other ing by this practife, but the lines of certaine particulars, who at the figne give were come to the It gate, thinking to enter the Citie, amongst whom was slaine with a shot Paulo de Parana Capine of a companie of light horsemen to the Florentines, & Canaio de Pratonechio, to whom Alvanso Mutulo had bin prisoner, & vnder his affurance had managed the practise. This hope being us disappointed, and very small quantities of come entring into Pisa, and that to the great dauntof fuch as carried it, the Florentines withall not fuffering that the ynprofitable mouthes should part out of Pi/a vexing them with many aduerfities, things necessarie for the life of man were bught at deare rates, yea many perished by famine, for that there could not enter a proportion to ffice the generall numbers: An affliction more lamentable then any other that the course of war aweth with it. And yet those necessities were surmounted by the obstinacie of those Citizens nich were magistrates and principals to the gouernement, who disposed to behold rather the exeme ruine of their countrey, then to yeeld to fo horrible a necessitie, deferred from day to day to gociate or confult, entertaining as well as they could the commons, fornetimes with one hope, metimes with another, but specially with this, that since there was expectation of the comming Cefar into Italie, the Florentines would be constrained to retire from their wals. But one part the countreymen with fuch as had bene at Plombin where they saw into their intentions, drew to conspiracie, and constrained them to introduce new consultations with the Florentins, which ing followed with Alaman Salurat commaunder of that part of the armie which lay at Saint eter a Ingrado, after many disputings (the principals opposing many impedaments) were at last folued and concluded. The accord was made with conditions very fauourable for the Pefans, eing that not onely all their faults both publike & priuate were pardoned, but alfo many exempons accorded, being also absolued from all restitution of moueable goods which they had rauied from the Florentins at the time when they rebelled: So great was the defire of the Florentins reposses for great their feare least the Emperour (naming the Pisans in the league of Camray) or from some other part, there hapned no impediment vislooked for: And albeit they were cll affured that the Pijans would be constrained within few dayes to give place to hunger, yet rey fought rather to affure the Towne with hard conditions, then to obtaine it without conuenon, to put any part of the certaintie in the power offortune, holding it more honorable to winne eace by pardoning offences, then to publish their bloudy desires by the extreme execution of varre. This accord being begun to be negociated in the campe, was afterward translated and con- Pifa rendred luded at Florence by the Embassadours of the Pifans: An action wherein the faith of the Floren- to the Florenmes is worthy of memoric, who not with standing their iust hatreds prouoked by so many injuries, tines, were no leffe constant to obserue things promised, then easie and tractable to the agreement.

The king of Romains (no doubt) received a great displeasure by the rendring of the Pisans, for that he was perswaded, that either the demaine of that Citie might serue him to many occasions or elie by according it to the Florentines, he should draw from them a great quantitie of money for want whereof he let flip and lost many faire occasions that were offered to him without his paines and industrie. But whilest he stood so negligent in oportunities offered, that neither at Vin censa nor at Padoa was almost any souldiers for him, and whilest withall his delayes abared the af fection of the inhabitants of townes, himfelfe wandring with a very small companie, sometimes to one place, sometimes to another: the Venetians forgat not to follow the famour of the time, and taking the advauntage of his negligence, they embraced all oportunities that offered to recove Padoa, whereunto they were induced by many reasons: for the retaining of Trensa made then know, how enprofitable it was to them, with a counfell for ash and prejudiciall, to abandon so foone the dominion of the firme land, the lingring preparations of the Emperour being the cauf that they held him in leffe feare dayly. Befides, they were not a little moued, for that feeking t bring to Venice the reuenues of the landes which diverse particulars of the towne of Venice heldi the countrey of Padoa, those of Padoa made manifest resistance: in so much that the disdainess certaine particulars being joyned to a publike profite, concurring withall the weake providence and furnishments of souldiers at Padoa, together with the confideration of the insolencies which the Gentlemen of Padoa vied towardes the populars, and many remembring the easie and mode rate gouernement of the Venetians, beginning effloones to defire their auncient yoke: they dete The Venetians mined to make an attempt to recouer it, wherein they were affifted with this ready occasion, th those of the plaine countrey of Padoa stood yet at their denotion. They denised that Andre Gritti one of their Commaunders, leaving behind the campe, wherein were foure hundred me at armes, more then two thousand light horsemen, and fine thousand sootemen, should go to N nalo vpon the frontiers of Padoa, and taking in his way a part of those footbands, which, with m ny troupes of paisants were sent to the village of Mirana, he should draw towardes Padoa to: faile the gate of Codalonga: And the more to terrifie such as were within, they gave directions the same time, that two thousand of the popular fouldiers, with three hundred footemen and co taine horsemen, should execute vpo the bulwarke of the water standing in the contrary part of t Citie. And lastly, the better to couer this enterprise, Christo. Moro the other Commaunder, w likewife appointed to encampe aforethe towne of Citadella. The directions and plots of thise terprise were no lesse well layed and observed, then the issue happy, for that the footemen arrivi at full dayes, found the gate of Codalonga halfe open, certaine pailants a little before being entr by chaunce with cartes loaden with hay: in so much, as commaunding the gate without any gre difficultie, and expecting without any noyfe the comming of their other strength which was hand, their fortune did not onely carry them into the towne, but also almost to the market place afore the Citie, which containes a long circuite, and is not much peopled, was touched with a aduertisement of the accident, the seare of the Citizens helping no lesse to aduaunce the enterpti The Venetians then the secret industrie or valour of the Venetians. The Knight la Volpe marched first with light horsemen, together with Zirolo de Perousa and Lastance de Bergamo, with one part of t footemen: And the alarme being come to the Citadell, Dressina governour of Padoa for Ma: milian, prepared himselfe to fally out with three hundred Almaine footemen which he had the onely for his gard: the like did Brunault de Serge with fiftie horsemen, who sultaining the furie the enemies, expected that the Gentlemen of Padoa, fauourers of the Almaines would take arn with them: But that hope was vaine with all the refidue, for that in the Citie fallen into this fi prisand sudden oppression of tumult, was found no disposition of resistance, especially ma bands of the enemie being entred & gouerning those parts of the towne, wherein lay their chief protection: In so much as standing thus abandoned of fortune and hope, they were constru ned, with the loffe of many of their men, to retire with speede into the Castell and Citade, and they but weakly manned, were by the necessitie of the present perill, yeelded to disa

tion within a few houres after, they being no leffe vnable to repulse a violence offered, thenth were negligent to foresee it afore it hapned. By this meane, the Venetians being effloones me: Lords of the whole, laboured to appeale the tumult, and faue the Citie, whereof the greatell pa by the infolencies of the others, were ranged to their deuotion, nothing receiuing spoyle or harr;

nt certaine houses and store places of the leves, which were afore declared enemies to the name sthe Venetians. This accident happed the day of S. Marina, a day solemnly celebrated at Vente y publike decree, as a first day of their selicitie, and beginning of therestoring of their common reale. The brute of this victorie did much to move the whole countrey thereabouts, which had und imitation in Vincen/a, if Constantin de Macedonia had not entred with a very small strength, ut as there is no worldly thing more mightie then the course of sortune, so by the selicitie of this onquest, the Fenetians became with a present diligence, maisters of the whole countrey, the composes of towness and popular multitudes ioyning favour to the selicitie that followed them. They coursed by this meane the towne & castels of Leginagno, a place of great conveniencie to troue the countreys of Verona, Padoa, & Vincensa. They made attempt also to take the tower Marisano within eight miles of Padoa, a passage of singular oportunitie to distresse the countrey of Lantia, but by therefores which the Cardinall of Este sent, their enterprise was deseated.

It was thought that the taking of Padoa did nothing stay the French king from returning beand the Mounts, and as he was vpon his discamping, he made in the towne of Biagrasse new nuentions with the Popes Legat, by the which the Pope & the king bound each other to a muall protection, with libertie that either of them might contract with any other Prince, fo farre th as it was not prejudiciall to the present confederation: the king promised not to hold in his prection, nor to accept into the same hereafter, any subject, homager, or dependant, either director indirectly of the Church, cancelling expressly all articles of protection vntill that day: a prole not much agreeable to the honour of so great a king, for that a little before he hadtaken into protection the Duke of Ferrara, for a confideration of thirty thousand duckets: Besides, it was eed that the Pope should dispose by his discretion the Bishoprickes that then were voyde in all landes of the kings obedience, but for such as should fall voyde within a certaine time, they alld be at the nomination of the king, for whose better satisfaction, the Pope sent the Buls of edinalship to the Bishop of Albie, promising to indue him with the Hat assoone as he came to me. Immediatly upon the conclusion of this contract the king hasted out of Italie, carrying h him into Fraunce no small glorie for so great a victory gotten, with so swift a course you the netians: and yet he caried home by this victorie, neither the more tranquillitie of minde, nor ater assurance for his affaires: a matter that often hapneth, that in things obtained, after they, te benelong defired, men finde neither that contentment, nor that pleafure which they imagi-,, I before: yea men might discerne matter prepared to greater daungers and innouations, toge-,, r with a manifest incertaintie of his mind, by the deliberations he had to make by reason of those idents newly hapned: for, if things had good fuccesse with the king of Romains, his feare was e greater of him then of the Venetians: & if the greatnesse of the Venetians bega estsoones to be dreffed, he must be constrained to dwell in continual sufpitions & expences, to keep the things had taken from them: befides, he must needes contribute to Maximilian both in men and mo-7, for that in abandoning him, he was to feare least he would knit with the Venetians against a, and withall, least the king Catholike would not be of the faction, and haply the Pope: Befides, ane aydes and succours would not suffice to intertaine him in amitie with Casar, to whom he ist minister so liberally, as by them he might obtaine the victoric against the Venetians: and on other fide, if he fent him strong and able succours, besides that it could not but draw with it inlerable expences and harmes, yet he confirmed his owne daungers touching the greatnesse of far. The king waighing the estate of these difficulties, stood in the beginning in doubt touching mutation of Padoa, whether he should hold it agreeable or troublesome: but conferring the etie which the deprivation of the firme land from the Venetians might bring to him, with the plexities and daungers which he feared to fuffer by the greatnesse of Casar, and with hope to taine of him by money in regard of his necessities, the Citie of Verona, which he desired much, a place of fingular oportunitie to suppresse the mouings on the side of Germanie: he judged it at more to his profite and furetie, to hauethings remaine in that estate, then, for that there was cat apparance of a long warre betweene Cafar and the Venetians, both the one and other being ade wearie by so continual expenses, would become more weake. In this nature of opinion he pod better confirmed, when he had contracted with the Pope, with whom he hoped to have a infederation well affured and retolued : and yet he left upon the limites of Verona, Monsieur de allissa with seu a hundred Launces to be disposed by Casar, no lesse for the preservation of things Ff iiii gotten, then to obtaine that which the Venetians still possessed, and because by the commaunde ment of Cafar, they being conucyed into Vincenfa, the Citie of Verona was affured, which was great daunger and fulpition for the final numbers of men of warre that were within it: and by th

meane the Venetian armie which lay encamped before the Citadell, was retired.

After the kings departure, this good adventure fell also to the Venetians: Their horsemen which were within Leguagna, made continuall incursions ouer the whole countrey euen to the gates Verona, doing many violences and harmes of warre, against whom the garrison of Verona cou make no great refiftance, being but two hundred horsemen, and scuen hundred sootemen: by re fon whereof the Bishop of Trent, whom Casar had appointed governour over it, determined plant his campe there, & for the better execution, he called to the action the Marquis of Mantu who expecting the preparations that were in hand, lay incamped with those bandes which the French king had given him, in the Isle of Escalo, a great passage vpon the countrey of Verona, no ther enuironed with wals, nor made strong with other fortifications. But whilest he lay there wit out iealousie or doubt of any thing, he serued as a notable example to all Captaines, how much importes them in all times and all places to be vigilant, and so manage their affaires with care as industrie, that they may have confidence in their proper forces, without reposing in this vay imagination, that either their enemies be farre off, or that by an opinion of their weakneffe th may thinke their estate to stand in more securitie: for, as the Marquis had coucnanted with a taine estradiots of the Venetian armie to come to him in that place to take his pay and follow I enfigne, who from the beginning of the conference had manifeltly communicated the deuife w their Captaines: and as the Captaines, ypon this occasion had ordained to affayle him ynprouid So Luke Maluezzo with two hundred light horsemen, and Zuolo de Perousa with eight hundred footenien, which were fecretly come from Padea to Leguagno, being loyned to the bands wh were within, and fifteen hundred men of the countrey, and fending before certaine horsemen, w cried Turko, Turko, (that was the Marquis name) making as though they were those estradi that were expected, they conveyed themselves in the peepe of the day without that there was: doubt made, to the Isle of Escalo the same morning that was appointed, where, finding no a stance they entred, and finding all the fouldiers without gard, and such as followed the person the Marquis fleeping in their owne negligence, they put them to the spoyle, and tooke prisone mongst others, Monsieur de Boyssi Lieutenant to the Marquis, and nephew to the Cardinall 🗚 boyfe. The Marquis understanding the alarme, leaped naked out at a window, and hid himself tuffe of corne:but he was discourred to the enemies by a pailant of the same place, who respect more the estate of the Venetians, then his particular profit, made as though he would faue The Marquis Marquis for the offers he made, but did the contrarie: for that the Marquis not able to lye hid in fo ill a fortune, was presented afore the Generall, and so led to Venice, and there put prisons i the little tower of the publike pallace, to the wonderfull reioycing of euery one.

Cafar till this day had given no impediment, nor medled to hinder the proceedings of the netians, for that he had not yet leaused a force sufficient to put himselfe in the field; he was has besteadmany dayes in the mountaine of Vincense, where the countreymen bearing denotion the Venetian name, and reposing much in the difficulties of the place, were drawne into me fest rebellion against him: and after Padoa was reobtained by the Venetians, he descended in the plaines, where being encountred with multitudes of the mountaine men and paisants in a 1. fage of good fituation and strength, his case was in no little perill: but after his valour and poll: had removed the dayingers that were opposed, & by their proper disorder had put the mount : men to the chase, he came to Escalo vpon the frontier Vincentin, where the Venetian armie had couered a great part of the countrey of Vincenfe, & taken Seranallo, a paffage of importance, who they executed many cruelties upon the Almaines, which was recompensed with like example flaughter by Maximilian vpon the Italian footenien and mountaine men, winning vpon them c gpaffage not many dayes after: A matter which ought not to find fo ready imitation amongst C - chians, notwithstanding the lawes of armes are full of severities, for that in actions of revenge e e vertue is greater to pardon, then to punish, and to a Prince by so much more honourable is his se ctorie, by how much he yfeth his clemencie aboue his iustice. But as yet his forces being no great as the necessitie of his affaires required, he occupied the time in small enterprises, formetics befieging this borough, and sometime that passage, with very litle honour and reputation for te me Imperiall: and as alwayes his conceptions were farre greater then his forces or occasions, so folicited at the same time with the confederates the vnion of all their forces, to make an action on the Citic of Jenice, making his commoditie*, oner and abone the preparations by land, of the same inequality of the French king of Aragon and the galleys of the Pope being at that time nioyned and affembled into one Nauie. To which demanud, not with standing no mention was ade in the confederation of Cambray, the French had consented, if the conditions had bene such, the benefit of the coquest bad turned to a common profit: so ready is the inclination of Princes embrace enterprises which depend upon benefit: But it was a thing gricuous to the Pope, with som, both then, and at other times when it was commoned upon more amply, the king of Aranionned to detest it, for that it seemed to bring particular profit to the Frech, using this colour, it it was both uninst and dishonest.

The calamities of warre are hardly limited, and leffe feldome contained in one place certaine, whilest the countreys of Padoa, Vincensa, and Verona, suffered these torments by the armies of : Almames and Italians, the countrey of Fruil and those places which were for the Venetians in rea, were afflicted with more milerable perfecutions and ruines: for that the Prince of Hanau ng entred by Cesars direction into the countrey of Friul with ten thousand mentrayned, afhe had attempted in vaine to take Atonifalcon, caried by force the towns and Castellof Cae, with a pityfull execution and butcherie of those that defended it: And on the other side, cerne light horsenien and sootebands of the Venetians followed with many of the countrey men, ske by force the towne of U.ldufera, and by accord, the towne of Bellona, where was no garrifor the Almaines. The Duke of Brunswike, whom the Emperout had likewise sent thither, berepulled at Vania the principall towne of Frint, was marched to Cinital d'Austrich, a towne ate in a high place ypon the river of Natisona, where Federike Contarino lay in garrison with a I fmall companie, reposing much in the forces of the people who had mindes well resoluted cfend themselues: to his succours, as lohn P. Gradinio Magistrate of Friul was comming with it hundred horsemen and fine hundred sootemen, he was put to slight by certaine bands of the naines: and yet, notwithstanding they had shaked Cinitall with their artillerie, they could not r it, neither with the furious affaults which they gaue, nor with the rumour they spread that they defeated the succours that came to rescue them: so great a resolution doth the desence of line, about all other respectes, breede in the minde of men. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan deed neare the borough of Vermes, the Commissaties of the Venetians accompanied with the des and souldiers of the countrey: a successe that put into his handes the new Castell and the ne of Raspruch, to the great terrifying of the whole countrey, with the domages, ruines, and nings that he made. In this perill the Venetians fent thither Angeo Trenifan Captaine of their rmie, with fixteene gallies, who taking vpon his arrivall the towne of Fiumo, addrest himselfe ccupie the towne of Triesto: but the successes falling contrarie to the expectation of the aduenthe turned his strength to Raspruch, and recounted it by force, and afterwardes retired with zallyes to Venice, Friul and Istria remaining in a pityfull estate, for that sometimes the Venes commaunding, & fometimes the Almaines preuailing, those townes which the one part had in and facked, being efficiences recoursed and prayed upon by the other, there was no action ch tended not to the ruine of the miserable countrey, wherein the lines & goods of men being ontinuall pillage, the fruites and wealth of the countrey were horribly wasted by all those forts ppressions which so bloudy a warre may draw with it.

During those accidents of temporallatmes, there was disputation at Rome touching spirituall uses, fixe Embassadours of Venice (since the reobtaining of Padoa) being gone thither in habit they miscrable: for where afore they were wont to come in with great pompe and magnifices, sereceived with a reverence of the whole Court: now, much lesse that they were followed accompanied, seeing they were not admitted to enter but by night: such was the pleasure of a Pope, who denying them the presence of his face, referred them to negociate in the house of a Cardinall of Naples with him and the other Cardinals and Presates appointed, the Ambassadours of Casar, the French, and Spanish hindring as much as they could that they should not observe the absolution of the Church paines, and of the contrarie a Bishop of England whom the leg of that Nation, Henry the eight had sent thirther in their favour, soliciting manifestly for them with all the labours and deuises he could vie: So full of quarrell is advertiste, and so infinite is.

" the malice of the world, that to him that is ouerthrowne there are few that will lend their hand to helpe him up againe, and to fuch as are in wealth and fauour, energy one fludieth to caft fluor.

bling blockes to make them fall.

Bur about this time, an expectation of farre greater things occupied the mindes of enery of of for that as Cefar on the one fide leavying all the power he was able of himfelfe, with fuch as: could gather of his ayders and friendes, prepared to befrege Padoa with a puissant armie: for Venetians on the other fide, judging their voluerfall fafetie to confift in the defence of the fame. tie, laboured to strengthen it with all provisions necessarie for their desence. They caused to ent. befides the bandes appointed for the garde of Trenifa, their whole armie with all the forces the could gather from all parts: they conveyed thither infinite numbers of all fortes of artilleries, &! provisions of victuals, sufficient to nourish them for many moneths, and refumished the town with proportions of labourers, workemen, & artificers, by whose helpe they made many moun, & fluces of wood and iron, to the end they should not be deprined of the water that was broug to Padoa. And albeit the provisions and munitions were fuch as greater could not be defired. in an action of fo great importance, the care, diligence, and industrie of the Senate were increble, omitting no oportunitie wherein occasion was given to reconquer their losses, & defendtl: libertie that remained. They fet before their eyes the confideration of all things that they indil to be either necessarie or profitable, and brought into judgement all accidents that either feare, rill, or coniecture could deuife, wherein as they were in ope conference of things, in open count, Leonard Loredan their Duke, a man much respected for his age, and of no lesse reputation for: dignitie of his place whereunto he was called many yeares before, reasoned at large in this man

The Oration of Leonard Loredan.

In cases of aduersities, more doth it hurt to be doubtfull in counsell and wandring, then multitude of illes that can happen, for that when perill & daurger be at hand, it is too late to tua confidence into feare, and lesse declaration of vertue to be desperate in chaunces, seeing there is a " accident that hapneth which comes not accompanied with his proper remedie: And as follie I " rashnesse haue no societie with wisdome, nor fortune any comunitie with good counsell, so w I " the last necessitie hastnesh, to line in conicctures, is to draw on the ill that threatnesh; and to be " resolute, is not to temper fortune, but to tempt her. I seare nothing lesse in you the want of w "dome and valour, for that in mindes fo well instructed, the respectes to common honour an " bertie can not but be farre aboue the confiderations of our present miseries & fortune. But Iva " by the way of warning, that we be not too much amased in the contemplation of our calami " nor more fearefull of harmes that are yet but in showes & shadowes, then mindfull to foresee t " they refolue not to bodies, and happen through out proper negligence & weaknesse. If it be e " (right worthy Senatours (, that not onely the hope we have to recour our dominion, con! s " in the well defending of Padoa, but also all the expectation that remaines to maintaine our " uersall libertie: and if on the contrarie, it be most certaine, that of the losse of Padoa will desch "the last desolation of our countrey, we must necessarily graunt, that the provisions and prep " tions which hitherunto we have made, not with flanding they were great, have not yet bene fi " cient, either for that that appertaineth to the suretie of that Citie, nor for that which respecteth to " dignitie of our comon weale: for in an action of fuch daunger & importance, it fufficeth not () " order things, as there may be a bare hope of the defending of Padoa, but we must so prouide, t " with all our forces there may be such concurrance of all diligence and industrie possible to the " " of men, that it may standassured against all the accidents of fortune, who being mighty ouer all e "things of the world, hath yet her greatest power over the actions of warre. It is not a resolu a worthy the auncient glory of the Venetians name, to commit wholly the publike fafetie, our " uerfall honour, & the proper liues of our wives and children, to the vertue of forreiners, & fide c " of mercenarie fouldiers: it better agreeth with the extremitie we are in , & with the auncient retation and valour of this Citie, ro runne thither with our bodies, and firetch out our armes for e " defence of that wherein is inclosed the safetie of the comunitie of this populous dominio: for il e now looke not to the preservation of that Citie, there remaines no time hereafter to make vs ater red, no fortune to hope in, no place to give vs comfort, nor no action wherein to shew our ver; corto expendour treasure for our libertie and safetie. Time is thankfull to such as follow it, & farce reth occasions with oportunities convenient, which if we will apply to our selves afore the 1-« fon of our remedy and rescue be past, we must not leane enproued any pollicie, any example, it ny action that may respect our succour and safetie, and much lesse expect, till we remaine a pray those that seeke to sacke our goods, and wash their couetousnesse in our bloud. The conserua-,, on of our countrey comprehendes not onely a publike good, but together with the safetie of the,, ommon weale, is respected the securicie of enery particular, suffering such affinitie and coniun-,, tion together, that the one can not confift without the other: for the common weale falling into ruitude, it cannot be auoy ded, that the fubstance, the honours, and lives of private men, become, ot also a pray to the couetousnesse, to the voluptuousnesse, to the cruelties, and to the vile affe-,, ions of the enemies. Though there were no other respect or interest in the defending of a comó weale, then the preservation of a countrey, is it not a thing worthy of noble Citizens full of glo-,, and reputation in this world, & meritorious also afore God? the same so working with the peoe Gentils and Heathen, that they held it as a religion, that in heaven is determined a place parti-, ular for the perpetual fruition and comfort of fuch, as either fuccoured, preferued, or augmented cir countrey. And what countrey did euer deserue to be better rescued and supported by her ,, ildren then this, who in all ages hath retained a foueraigne principalitie ouer all the Cities of the orld, and by whom the Citizens receive infinite commodities, profites, and honours? It is won-, rfull, whether you consider it in the giftes which it hath received of nature, or in the things, nich declare her perpetuall greatnesse and happy fortune: or lastly, in those effectes which ex-,, :sle her vertue, together with the nobilitie of the wits of her inhabitants: her fituation makes ,, in amazed, being the onely Citie in the world seated amongst the falt waters, and hath all her rtes so coniouned, that at one time men may eniou the commodities of the water, and pleasures the land. It is affured against the inuations of the land, for that it standeth not on the firme land, 🚜 tit is free from inundations of water, for that it is not seated in the plaine and deepe sea. I may,, age to the dignitie and reputation of this Citie, the wonderfull maiestie of publike pallaces and uate mansions builded at incredible charges, and repolished with straunge Marbles and stones, ingularitie, brought hither from all partes of the world, together with a Hately afpect of excelportraites, imageries, sculptures, pillers, and other workemanships of worthy regard. No Citie, he world coparative with this for the concourse of all straunge nations comming hither, partly, the furety & freedome of habitatio in this climat fo well tempered, & partly for the exercise of ,, ir traffike and negociations, whereby our comon weale doth draw more plentie of reuenues & ,, ies of things contained onely within the circuit of this Citie, then many absolute kings receive heir large and whole kingdomes. Great is the affluence of men of facultic and feience, reuctent 💃 their grauitie, doctrine, and learning, and no lesse wonderfull for their singularitie and qualitie, vit, and other vertues of men, from the which, ioyned to other conditions, is difcended the glo-,, of actions which by this common weale and her discendents, have bene made more great, then, ice the imperie of the Romains) by any other principalitie or state in the world. It may be hol-,, not one of the least wonders, to see so great abundance of things, in a Citic wherein nothing,, weth, & yet subject to such multitudes of inhabitants. At the beginning our towne was straited, lincloled, and we constrained to retire our sclues into little rockes and caues, barraine and naof all things, and yet the vertue of our elders, thretching out first into the next seas & townes,, oyning, and afterwards rifing, encreasing by degrees of successe vpon the shoares and provinces, ther off, yea eucto the vttermost limites of the Leuant, they got both by sea & land so great an ,, pire, and power, that being redoubted to all the other townes in Italie, it was necessarie to call, he vnitie, pollicies, and forces of other Christian Princes to helpe to abate and depresse it: Mat-,, es affuredly hapned by the ayde and fauour of the omnipotent God, who with fuch graces hath fled and fan Stified the lawes and observations of instice indifferently administred in this Citie: ,, the respectes also making many peoples and nations to offer willing subjection to our gouetne-,, nt . What Citie, what Empire, or what principalitie giues place to our countrey, for matter of ,, rigion, pietie, and workes of good example? Where may be feene fo many Monasteries, fo,, my Temples full of formany precious ornaments and things of admiration dedicated to the ferree of God? Where may be found so many Hospitals and places of pitie, prepared for the perpe-,, tall comfort of the afflicted, and continuall exercise of charitie? Great (sure) is the recommenation of our Citie for these fauours and bleffings, but farre more worthy are her prayfes for eglory of this onely, that our countrey being from the beginning begot and brought forth in li-,, littie, there was neuer feene any man borne or dye in Venice, which dyed not a freeman, and was 32

" neuer troubled in his libertie: A felicitie mouing principally by the exercise of civill cocord, whin " hath stood alwayes so rooted and confirmed in the harts of men, that at the instant when they cl er terinto our Senate and our counfels, they shake offall discords and private quarrels. Of this ist: cause the forme of gouernement, which hath such temperature and communitie with all the be " forts of publike administration, and compounded of such a well consenting harmonic agreeings " it felfe, that it hath remained for many ages undefiled without partialities, without civill feditic, "without armes, and without effusion of bloud amongst Citizens: the same being the onely pray: " of our common weale, excelling in this propertie of vertue both Rome, Carthage, Athens, and I other names of common weale of auncient commendation: yea, we proue in our felues such effect of this kinde of gouernment and pollicie, that all those auncients, who in ages past haue ma: " profession of Civill wisedome, could not describe or institute a better. Let not then the cl-"dren, the offpring, and prefent people of fo glorious a countrey, in whom for fo many wors " and ages , hath bene fo worthily expressed the very strength and defence of the faith, and is "beautie of the whole Christian common weale, be flow in the execution of their duetie, the necet sitie of their owne safetie so requiring. Let no man refuse to commit to daunger the life of h " felfe and children, for the protection of that wherein confittes our vniuerfall fafetie, which be " comprehended in the onely defence of Padoa, let no man refuseto put his person to aduent. "And albeit we have certaintie that the forces that be there already are sufficient for the defence " it, yet it appertaines to our honour, it is a just office of our common vertue, & it concernes the g " ry of the name of Venice, to make the world fatisfied, that we are runne thither in person, both defend and preferue. The destinic of that Citic hath permitted, that in few dayes so great an est " of imperie should fall out of our handes, wherein we have not to complaine so much of the r " lice of fortune, for that fuch nature of adventures are commo to other countreys & kingdomes, for that fayling of that constancie which till this day hath bin innincible, and without all memer of the glorious exaples of our elders, we have with too fodaine dispaire, given place to the might 66 blowes of aduerlitie, and are not able to represent to our children that valour and vertue, with our fathers have left well tellified to vs. In matters of enterprise occasion is of great force, & t " doth now returne vpon vs the occasion to recouer that notable ornament and member whice " not yet loft, if we shew the mindes of men, but onely altered without any perill of absolute ru: " Let vs go against the fortune that enuieth vs , and make willing prostitution of our bodies to daungers that are offered, so shall we not onely redeeme the infamics that we have received, " also the world beholding yet that our auncient magnanimitie and vertue is not lost, men wil ther attribute the disorders past to a certaine fatall tepest, which neither the counsels nor confi " cie of men could refist, then to impose vpon vs either blame or dishonour, fulfilling all things our condition can afford for our succour. In this respect, if it were reasonable that we went a gether to the rescue of Padoa, and if for certaine dayes we might leave this abandoned citie w " out prejudice of her defence and other publike affaires of importance, my felfe, without expec " your resolution, would be the first that should open the way, not seeing wherein I might be colofe vp the latest dayes of my old age, then in my presence to participate with so glorious a vic-" rie which is required of my office and birth, or else not to remaine on live after the ruine of countrey: a calamitie which my minde hath horrour to expresse. But for that Venice, neither () " nor ought to be deprined of her publike counfels, wherein confifteth no leffe the defence of " doa, then in the force and armes of fuch as be there already: and seeing that the vnprofit: " troupes of old persons will stand in that Citie rather as a charge and burden, then as a succour d " aydenecessarie: and seeing withall it is not concenient, for things that may happen, to disfurt "Venice of all her youth; my aduife is, respecting these reasons with the regard to accidents that I " occurre, that there be made a choise of two hundred Gentlemen of the flower and principal of "our youth, and every of them to go to Padoa, with fuch proportion of his friends, followers,: d " feruaunts, as his riches and abilitie will be are, and to continue there fo long as shall be necess e "for that defence, My two fonnes with their retinues shall be the first in this example, of whose 1:s " and persons in so great a daunger, I make a willing offer to the succour of their countrey: by t in " presence in the action the Citie of Padoa shall be more assured; by their example the marcen le fouldiers that be there will be more refolute, feeing a ready courage in our honourable your f-" fifting all actions that concerne that feruice. And feeing our fonnes and kinfmen joyned with thu

ir furetie will be the greater to haue no want of victuals, munitions, nor any other thing connient to their comfort. The refidue of our youth not put to this execution, shall be fo much the ore encouraged by this example, to commit themselues in all times of necessitie, to all trauels and ungers importing the seruice of their countrey. It is an honest emulation to striue in vertue, but, smore honourable to contend to excell one another in the defence of our countrey. By this ,, xhort you, noble Senatours, (whose wordes and doings serue as an example and doctrine to, whole Citie) to muster your sonnes, and make them of the number of those that shall comunicate in so great a glory: for from them will not onely proceede the affured and certaine deice of Padoa, but in this action is also brought to vs with all nations, a peculiar reputation, that our felues are they, who with the daunger of our owne liues do defend the libertie and fafetie, the most worthy and florishing countrey that is in the whole world.

This counfell of the Prince was heard with great affection of the refidue, to whom nothing The Gentleme peared more convenient for their common fafetie, then to joyne it to practife and execution, of Pennego 18 idas the nature and operation of the time, and the necessitie of their affaires, could not without Padoa. indice endure delayes, fo the flower and choife bodies of their youth of Venice, mustered and wto them so many of their friendes and followers as were apt to armes, and with them went th speede to the seruice of Padoa, being accopanied to their embarquing with all the other Ge∸ nen and communitie of people, euery one celebrating with many prayles, and with vowes I desires full of deuotion and assection, so great a readinesse to succour the countrey: an exple of right worthy and honourable imitation, seruing to instruct all posterities and ages, that en perill and daunger be at hand, every one to be touched with the interest of his countrey. ey were welcomed at Padoa with an universall gladnesse of the Captaines and souldiers, much ommending the valour of those noble personages, who not trayned in the trauels, experiences, I daungers of warre, flucke not to preferre the love of their countrey, afore the respect of their specifie: In fo much as ministring comfort one to another, not as men trauelled in calamities, with mindes resolute, they expected in great fidelitie the comming of Celar: who for his part. ouring to reassemble and receive the bands of souldiers that came to him from all partes, was this time come to the bridge of Brento three myles from Padoa, and having taken Limins by te, and cut off the course of the water, he taried the comming of the artillerie which was sent of Germanie, which was no leffe terrible for the quantitie then for the qualitie: of this proporn of artilleries one part being arrived at Vincenfa, and Philip Roffe & Federike Gonfugue de Bof-· being gone with two hundred light horsemen to be his gard, they were charged with a ength of five hundred light horsemen, who, led by certaine paylants that during the warre did ich service to the Venetians, and being then issued out of Padoa, they overthrew them five les from Vincenfa, where Philip remained prisoner, and Federike by the fauour of the night aped in his shirt. From the bridge Brenta, Maximilian enlarged and stretched out his bands aut twelue myles, drawing towardes Polesina de Romigua, the better to open to himselfe the mmoditie of victuals, and taking the borough of Este by assault, and putting it to sacke, went to encampe at Monfelice, where the towne standing in the playne, being abandod, the second day he caried the Castell standing on the top of a high rocke. Afterwardes he oke by composition Montagnana, and so returning towardes Padoa, he incamped at the dge of Bassauello neare Padoa, where he proued in vayne to turne the river of Brenta which m thence hath his course to Padoa. At this place did arrive all the artilleries & munitions which expected, and hither did refort all the regiments of men of watre which lay dispersed in diverse ces, with whom in forme and title of a mayne armie, he approched neare the towne: and hauing flowed foure thousand footemen in the suburbes which are called S. Croff. his opinion was to aile it on that fide, but being afterwards aduettifed that it was part of the towne most strong by uation and by wals, and also that there he stood most subject to the harmes of the artilleries, he termined to discampe and remove his armie to the gate which is called the Waterfort, beaig his aspect to Venice. The cause why he removed to this place, was an opinion that there c towne was most weake, and withall to give impediment to the succours which were to come om Venue to Padoa both by land and by water: but for that he could not go thither for the fcommoditie of certaine marishes and watrie channelles overflowing the countrey, but by fetning a great circuite, he came to the bridge of Bouolento within seuen myles of Padoa, where be Gg pastures and feeding groundes upon the banke of Baguillon towards the sea, betweene Padoa ad Venice. To this place, enuironed with waters, and in the most sure part of the countrey of Padi. were withdrawnethree thousand paysants with great heardes of catteil, who being forced by te footebands of the Spanish and Italians that were in the vauward, were almost all taken or flair the victours employing the two dayes following in praying the whole countrey, cuen to the 1, driving away infinite heards of cattell feeding in that quarter. There were also taken vpon Brta diverse barkes, which laden with victuals were running vp to Padoa. At last, the fifteenth cy of September, after he had confumed much time unprofitably, and given good leifure to the enmie both to fortifie and refurnish the towne with victuals, heapproched the wals of Padoan that fide towardes the gate of the waterfort. There hath not bene feene in Italie neither in the present, nor haply long time before, a besieging of more great expectation, nor wherein e mindes of men were more bufily occupied, then this, not so much for the nobilitie and maie tie so aunciently recommended for the vniuersitic of Rudies and sciences, is seated in a country -

Pados.

Description of of the Citie, as for the importance that was in the loading and keeping of the same: for Padon, ary fertill, and under a climate temperat & wholesome: it is incompassed with three orders of wi and bearing a circuit and circumference as large as any Citie in Italie, it hath pailing by it the uers of Brenta and Baguillon: And albeit the Venetians wou it out of the possession of the fan e of Carrato more then two hundred yeares fince, yet it retaines many proud aspectes and theis of stately buildings, with many monuments and signes of antiquitie, well expressing her aunc greatnesse and beautie. And of the conquering & defending of so great a Citie, depended, not ly the confirmation or diminution of the Almaminiperic in Italie, but also the very estate and licitie of the Citie of Verice: for Padoa being defended, it was cafe for the common weale of nice abounding in great wealth, and of one vnitic of minde and readinesse of wit, subject to fuch variations as the affaires of Princes are, to hope to recouer in small time so great a part of iurisdiction: wherein they were so much the more assured, by how much the most part of the fubicots which had thirsted after mutations, neither finding effectes agreable to their conception and knowing by comparison what difference was betweene the moderate gouernement of Venetians, and the tyranny of the Almaines, farre eltraunged from the maners and cultomes o Italians, and lastly being greatly disordred by the confusions and domages of the warre, they gan to callinto respect and affection their auncient yoke . And of the contrarie , if Padoav committed to violence and facke, much leffe that the Venetians could hope to reftore the gi and magnificence of their common weale, feeing there were daunger that the very Citie of Ve made naked of so large a member, and dispoyled of so many treasures both by diminution of s blike reucnues, and losse of so many natures of goods moueable, possessed by persons private the firme land, would not be able to maintaine defence against the armies of the Princes confid rate, or at least would not in time become a pray to the Turkes, to whom they are neighbou many places, and with whom they have had alwayes either warre or peace vnfaithfull and ill a red. But wife men were occupied with no leffe doubt and perplexitie, the mighty preparations t were made on all fides keeping wonderfully in suspence the common judgemets, which were ry vncertaine on whether part the better fortune would fall, either to the affailants, or to the de dants: for in the army of Cafar, befides the seuen hundred French Launces, which Monsieur la lice comaunded, there were two hundred men at armes which the Pope had fent for his streng two hundred men at armes appointed by the Duke of Ferrara under the charge of the Card of Este, not withstanding the quarrels that were betweene them were not yet reconciled, and hundred Italian Launces under fundry Captaines leavied by him: he had xviij, thouland Alni footemen, fix thousand Spanish, fix thousand aduentures of divers nations and languages, and i thousand Italians, leavied and payed by the Cardinall of Este vinder the same title. There follow him a wonderfull proportion of all forces of artilleries, with great quantities of munitions, when the French king had fent him one part. And albeit for the most part his owne ordinarie bands w not payed, yet, what with the confideration of the greatnesse & authoritie of such a leader, and hope to pray & sacke Padoa, and to have at their devotion all those peeces which the Veneti possessed, much lesse that they abandoned his service, seeing they slocked to him dayly in gre numbers, being caried chiefly by this inducement, that he that of his owne nature was most liber and full of humanitie to his fouldiers, would not fayle of their payment by couetousnesse or vi ut by disabilitie or want. This was the strength of Casars armie, compounded wholly of his wne forces, but made mightie by the ayde of ffraungers & mercenaries. But for that which conerned the defence of Padoa, the armie which the Venetians had in that Citie, was no leffe mighties or there were fixe hundred men at armes, a thousand flue hundred light horsemen, a thousand ue hundred stradiots, all commanded by these notable Captaines, the Count Petillano Generall the whole, B.de Montono, Anth. de Pic. Luke Maluezzo, John Greeke, with other inferiour leaers. There were twelve thousand sootemen of the best experienced and trayned in Italie, under ie charge of Denis Naldo , Zitole de Perousa, Lactan . de Bergamo , Sacco de Speleto , with maother officers: ten thousand footemen aswell Slauonians, Greekes, and Albanois, whom they id drawne from their galleys, of whom albeit many were not much profitable to the feruice, yet me of them were well trayned and able to execute necessarie office. Besides, they had the youth Venice in whom was no little importance touching the felicitie of the feruice, and albeit they ere much respected in cases of daungere, yet their example served no lesse to the advaunceent of the leruice, then themselnes wonne great merite for their dispositions and pietie to their untrey. There was also a wonderfull abundance and store of all prouisions necessarie, great iantities of artilleries, and a plentifull proportion of all fortes of victuals, the people of the it countreys being no lesse carefull to bring in prouisions for their common suretie, then 2 Magistrates and officers of Venice to give order for their continuals refurnishing . There realfo many multitudes of payfants, who being leauted at a certaine price, were imployed the labours of their fortifications: in so much as to the valour and numbers of those that ere appointed to defend it, they isyned wonderfull rampiers and fortifications in that cirite of walles that enuironeth the whole Citie: for they had almost filled up all the waterch which runnerh along the wals, and at enery gate of the towneand other places connient, builded many forces and close bastillions without, but so as they were annexed to walles, and had entries and conucyances into the towne, and being well replenished with illeries', they beat such as entred into the trench . And because the taking of those baltilis should bring no daunger to the towne, they had sunke in them all vinderneath; holv vaultes or caues filled vp with barrels of gunpowder, to blow yp into the ayre, when y were no longer able to defend them . And repoling not altogether in the great-Te and goodnesse of the old wall, notwithstanding they had searched it diligently, and nforced it where neede were, filling up all the cranels and ruines: yet they made round but the Citie within, a couer, or pauisse, or fortification of pales, trees, and other peeces of od, so farre distant from the wallas it was in thicknesse, and with a wonderfull diligence, I filled up to the top of the wall with good earth, and well rammed all the voyde place that st sbetweene them . This fortification no leffe wonderfull in the effect $\,$, then of a labour and tral inelfimable, the infinite diligence of men being continually imployed, feemed not so to she the expectation of the defence of that Citie, but that they call a deepe ditch of fixteene ome breadth, which drawing lefte and narrower in the bottome, and standing thicke with rdering houses and little towers full of thot, seemed impossible to be forced. These natures ortifications were made with hollow vaultes and caues, according to the example of the balions, having conveyances to be overthrowne by fire when they would. And because they uld be throughly prepared to all things, they rayled behind the ditch a rampier of the same or ater largenesse, which stretched out as farre as the circuite of the towne, except in certaine ners and places, wherein they knew it was impossible to plant attillerie: and before the rampr they cast a parapet of seuen sadome, which was a desence to those that sought upon the rapier, that they could not be striken with the bullet of the enemie. And to the end t t the courage of the fouldiers and men of the towne, might equally answer those rates of puisions and fortifications, the Count Petillano assembling the whole armie in the place of S. athonie, encouraged them with speeches of great gratitie & perswasion, to consider upon what t mes flood their common safetie and honor, wherein for the better fidelitie and surety of the serare, he protested his owne oath, and bound likewise in the same solemnitie all the Captaines, a the armie, and the particulars of the towne, to follow the defence of the Citie vntill death. In perill so generall, there was none refused to give his oath to the defence of that whereunto he I frankly offered his life, & where the life is offered up to daunger, it is nothing to give an oath to affure the fidelitie. Thus the armie of Cafar being drawne neare the wals of Padoa with fo gre a thrength, and against so mightie preparation, he stretched out his campe from the gate of the waterfort, vitil the gate of All Saints which leades to Treusfa, and from thence enlarged it the gate of Codalonga which goeth to the Citadell, so as it contained in largenesse three myle Maximilian himselfe was lodged in the Monasterie of S. Helen, within a quarter of a myle of: Citie wals, encamping as it were in the middelt of the Almain footemen: and after he had impoted to every one his charge according to the divertitie of nations and places of their encampin, he began to plant his artilleries, wherein albeit in his person being intincible in minde, and of a b. dy hardned with paine and trauels, he performed a wonderfull diligence to accomplish that acon, yet it could not be atchieued but with longnesse of time and great disficultie, as well for t: quantitie and intollerable greatnesse of some natures of it, as also for that the whole campe, al specially those places where they sought to plant them, were continually tormented and diffres with the artifleries of the towne . At last, the perpetual industrie of Maximilian joyned to the lour of his fouldiers, made way to plant his artilleries, and the fame day the French with the foo. men of the Almains, gaue an affault to the tower of the gate on that lide where Monf. la Pau had charged, but more to found & proue their countenaunce, then with intention to fight in gol appointment and therefore finding the refiftance valiant & well furnished, they retired effloor to their tents. The day after the charge recontinued, the artillerie not ceasing to thunder witht. rible furie. Some of them by their incredible hugenesse and vnmeasurable quantitie of powdertt was yied, pierced through the rampiers, and renerfed the houses that joyned nearest the was A furiewhich in short time shaked downe to the ground many places of the wall, the bassilla also builded upon the gate of All faints being diffiantelled and razed, without that the defender afflicting the campe with continual volleys of thot, shewed any signe of feare: so resolute is: vertue that fights for honour and libertie. The stradiots that in great valour encamped in the burbes refusing alwayes to retire into the towne, and the light horsemen making continuals curfions in all places, skirmished with their enemies fometimes before, and sometimes behilf driging them even to their tents, formetimes they diffressed such as were gardes to the fogers and victuallers, and sometimes ouerrunning the whole countrey with pray and pillage, t/ Topyled all the wayes, except that which goeth from Padou to the mount of Aban: and: there was in the campe a wonderfull abundance of victuals, every house and place being p. tifully furnished, for that neither the feare of the pay fants, nor the catefull diligence of the Vtians, nor the infinite harmes of the fouldiers on both fides, could not draine or dry vp the in ' dible plentie of that most fruitfull and sertill countrey. At the same time also Luke Malue issued out of Padoa with certaine troupes of horsemen, for the convoy of fortie thousand the kets which were fent thither from Venice: and albeit in his returne the enemie charged him vo the tayle, yet his vertue brought in the treasure in lafetic, without any other loss then one of men at armes. By the ninth day the artillerie had executed fo well, that it feemed there was no ther necessitie to shoot, and therefore using all benefites that the time offered, the day follows the whole army appeared in order of battell to approch the walles: but finding that the fame not they within the towne had made swell and rife the water of the ditch, which afore was ab d and fallen, Cafar gaue order that enery band should returne to his place, holding it neither nourable nor necessarie to commit his souldiers to a daunger so manifest. The next day, the war eftfoonesabated and retired, when embracing the oportunitie, they gaue an affault (but with 1)der fuccesse) to the bastillion which was made upon the point of the gate of Codalonga, whi in the Emperour disposed to do what he could to force it, caused to be turned thither the artilles that were planted in the quarter of the French, encamping betweene the gates of All Saints of Codalonga: and with those artilleries, having done great execution of that place, he follow it with an affault two dayes after with the fortemen of the Almains and Spanis, accompanied to certainemen at armes on foote, who in the furie of the fight afcended the baffillion, & fet vp t 10 two enfignes. But the fortresse of the dirch was such and the vertue of the defendants nothing is riour, and fo plentifull the instruments of defence not only concerning artilleries, but also of it is & wildfires, that they were constrained to descend by heapes, many remaining dead on the p. 2, and some falling into the fortune of imprisonment. In so much as the armie that stood in readille to give the affault, immediatly upon the action of the baltillio, retired, & difarmed, without many

by other attempt, judging it no staine to their honour to abandon the enterprise wherein was no ope of their fafetie. By this experience Maximilian loft wholly all hope of the victorie, in which onfideration he determined his labour with his fortune, and breaking up his campe, after he had estowed his artilleries in places fure, he retired with his armie to the towns of Limins towards renisa. This was the seuenteenth day after he was encamped before Padoa, and so with many aites and refling places, he came at last to Vincenja, from whence after he had taken of that peole the oath of fidelitie, and almost dismissed his whole armie, he drew toward Verona, being not little discontented that his deliberations had taken no better successe, but more touched with erturbation, for that they bare blame and slaunder both in his armie and throughout all Itake, for nat the execution of things were indeede no leffe infamous then the counfels: for both for that he ad missed of the taking of Trensa, and also that he had lost Padoa, no man doubted that it was ot his fault, & alfo that his too late arriving afore Padoa made the actio more hard, for that in that egligence the Venetians tooke oportunitie and good advauntage of time to make provision of uldiers, to refurnish Padoa with victuals, and to raise wonderfull fortifications to resist the exetion that was determined. And albeit himselfe could not denie, that in that propertie of erur consisted not the defence of the Citie, yet cloaking the vice of his owne varietie and proper forders, he layd the fault from himfelfe, and complained of the Pope and French king, for that the ie had suffered the Embassadours of Venice to go to Rome, and the other had bene too slow to ad fuccours, the fame giving occasion to the world to beleeve that they were estranged from m, and had like wife encouraged the countreymen of the mountaines of Vincenfa to draw to rellion: for the subduing of whomafterhe had consumed many dayes, he found afterwards in rerd of the fame occasion, the selfe same difficulties in the plaine countreys. Also the better to on to himself a way to reuictuall his army, & to assure his prouisios, & withall to deliuer his comnies from many incomodities, he was contirained to take all the townes of the countrey. Herethe flow marching of the French had not onely much hurt him, but also if they had come in due is not stime, the revolt of Padoa had not happed. He complained also that as well for these hinrances, as for that the French and king of Aragon had difmiffed their armie at fea, the Veneins had the better oportunitie and meane to refurnish and refortifie Padoa standing delivered im all other feares. Lastly, he complained that those difficulties were acceptable to the king of ragon, as meanes to induce him to confent more easily that the administration and government the kingdome of Castille should be to him. But these coplaints did nothing better his fortunes, d much leffe recouered his authoritie loft, for that he was negligent to vie to rare occasions: for lid nothing discontent the Frechking that the world was possessed with such an opinion of him: d in the Pope was leffe care or affection, for that being of his proper inclination suspicious and truftfull, and weighing withall the Emperours continuall necessities and wants of money, with importunities to demaund it, he was vn willing that his name should encrease in Italie, At Verohe received the oath of fidelitie, and in that Citie Pe. Guicciardin father to the authour of this oke, with the other Florentin Embassadours, cougnanted with him in the name of the common cale, (induced, befides their ownerespects, by the perswasions of the French king) to pay him in hort time xl.thousand duckets: for which promise, they obtained of him in most ample maner, iny priviledges, for the confirmation as well of the libertie of Florence, as of the dominion and iudiction of the townes and estates which they held, together with remission and acquittance of duties and demaundes for times past. Thus Cafar, resting determined to returne into Germanie, giue order (as he sayd) for the warres which he intended in the spring time, fent for Monsieur haumont to come and communicate with him of the present affaires: He layd afore him by deonstration the perils of the time, and what daunger there were that the Venetians would recor Citadella and Bassana, places of great importance, which they prepared to assaile, being made oud by the defence and successe of Padoa: He feared the same opinion of their fortune would courage them also to the like action against Monselica, Montagnana, and Este, the felicitie of viorie making men infolent, & carying their mindes into enterprifes about the proportion of their coper power and abilitie: He alleaged how necessarie it were to consider, not onely of the protetion of these places, but also to enter into practise how to recouer Leguague, wherein being of imfelfe not fufficient inough to leavie provisions necessarie for such effectes, it touched the king good pollicie to minister ay de to him, whose places were to fall into manifest perill, if the peeces

which he held were not supported. To these demaundes, Monsieur Chaument, in whom was n power to make any certaine refolution, gaue answer, that he would see the king aductised, of whose behalfe he abouthed a minde conformable to his defires, being all that appertained to h place to promise well, having no authoritie to assure. After this conference, Cafar went to Chius. leauing the Marquis of Brandebourg for the gard of Verona: and a little after Monlieur de Paliss remaining with flue hundred Launces vpon the countrey of Verona, alleaging the difficulties an incommodities of the place where helay, gate leane with great importunities to retire to the fror tiers of the Duchie of Millan; for that the kings intention was, that if his men of warre should n maine in garrison and do nothing, they should not abide you his estate, but should returne to the feruice of Maximilian to expect fuch enterprife as he would imbrace, but chicfly the action of L quagna, which notwithstanding it was much defired and solicited by him, yet it was so long de terred by his accustomed difficulties, that the raines fell so fast by the propertie of the season, the it was impossible to incampe in that countrey, being for his lownesse much subject to waters: fo these impediments, Casar was driven to desire truce for certaine moneths with the Venerians, bu they rifing into courage by his diforders, and feeing how flowly the confederates ministred to b ayde, had more regard to the fortune that followed them, then to the motions he made, judging not for their profit to consent to any ceasing of armes.

Maximilian returneth into t Germanie,

Amid thele suspitions and icalousies of things, the Emperour at last returned to Trent, leaunt those places that he held in great daunger, and all the gouernments in Italie in generall doubt: se there began to appeare betweene the Popeand the French king, a new contention, the foundation whereof, albeit feemed to be layd vpon light occasions, yet, there was feare lest it was intangle with more fecret practife & causes of greater importance the fuch as were expressed. The outwa cause appearing, was that a Bishoptick being voyd in Provence by the death of the incumbent d ing in the Court of Rome, the Pope had disposed it against the will of the French king, who prete ded fuch action to be cotrary to the capitulation which the Cardinal of Pania had made betwee them, wherein alboit the wordes bare not expresly that there should be equall respect and obse uation touching the Bilhoprikes falling in the Court of Rome, as of fuch as fell vacant in oth places, yet he was affured no leffe by the mouth and promife of the Cardinall, which the Cardin confessed not to be true, more perhaps for feare, then for other occasion: the Pope affirmed contrary, alleaging that he tooke no knowledge of any thing promifed in prinitie and fecret, on in the ratification he had regard to that that appeared in the writing and particular articles: whe in he had fet downe diffinelly all the contents of the capitulation, chapter by chapter, and the ticle concerning the dying of the Bishops in the Court of Rome being not comprehended, hev not bound to the observation of that that was not expressed. This did so much aggravate the contentement of them both, that as the king, rejecting contrary to his cultome the counfels of Cardinall Amboyfe, who had alwayes adulted him to entertaine agreement with the Pope, in: fequestration of the fruites of all those benefices which the Churchmen resident in the Court Rome held in the Duchie of Assilan: So the Pope refused to induc the Bishop of Assie with 1 hat, who, according to the promife made to the king, was gone to Rome to receive it. And all the Pope, ouerruled by the importunities of many friends, was brought in the end, to dispose of Bishoprike of Prouence according to the kings minde, and albeit there was estsoones agreed ! tweene them a new forme of proceeding in benefices that hereafter should fall in the Court Rome, and in that regard the lequestrations to ceasife on the one side, and on the other part the! to be transferred to the Bilhop of Albie: yet these agreements sufficed not to moderate the mil of the Pope, who was not a little kindled for many reasons, but specially for that, having from? beginning of his Popedome, transferred very vn willingly the legation of the Realme of Fran. to the Cardinall of Anboy/e, a matter hurtfull to the Court of Rome, and bearing prejudice to : authoritie, it was now most gricuous to him to be constrained (to avoid displeasure with the Frit king) to cotinue it to him: he was icalous also that the same Cardinall aspired with all his thought and meanes to the foueraigne feate, and therefore he stood in feare and doubt of every advaunce ment and rifing of the French. These were the apparant causes of his discontentment, but as sa: as could be afterwardes coniectured by his thoughts and dispositions, he layd greater plots, 21 aspired to farre greater endes, defiring vehemently, either for greedinesse of glory, or for some cret hatted against the French king, or at least for the libertie of the Genowayes, that the king mit e all that he possessed in Italie, judging his greatnesse a bridle to his ambition, and his power in I. he an impediment to his authoritie: he ceassed not also to complaine against him and the Cardi-Il of Amboy & indifferently, but with fuch temperature and cunning, that it feemed his disconntment proceeded chiefly offeare: and yet, as he was of a nature obstinate and incincible, and the most part accompanied the disposition of his minde with outward demonstrations: so, alit he alpired in his fecret thoughts to an end of fo great consequence and hard to obtaine, refing onely in himfelf and the reuerence and authoritie which he knew Christian Princes bare to e fea Apoltolike, yet he would not enter into alliance nor depend of any: but expressing both in eech and working how little account he made of all, he forbare to joyne with Maximilian, and filed to enter fecret intelligence with the king Catholike, but estraunging himselfe from energy cheinelined onely to the part of the Venetians, expressing daily more and more a confirmation will to absolue them, judging it a thing very convenient for the common safetie of Italic, and for particular furetie and greatnesse, not to suffer them to perish. Against this, did make great resince the Embassa dours of Ataximilian and the French, concurring also with them in publike ichile the Embassadour of the king of Aragon, notwithstanding he solicited the Pope secretly the contrary, fearing no leffe the greatnesse of the French in regard of the kingdome of Naples, d reposing little in the disposition of Casar for the stender stabilitie that was in him. These Em-Tadours alleaged that it was not reasonable that the Pope should doe so great a benefite sor ofe, whom he was bound by equitie and promife to purfue by armes, feeing by the confederan of Cambray, every cofederat was bound recipiocally to aide one another till there was abloe recouerie of all those places which were named for enery particular partie: So that seeing Cahad not yet conquered Trenifa, neither one of them flood acquited of fuch bond & promife: ides, they viged that he might inftly refuse the absolution, both for that they had not restored the Church the townes of Romania, neither frankly nor willingly, nor within the terme fet whe in the monition: and also for that even then their obedience was not perfect and absolute, that albeit, befides the rendring of the townes, they had bene admonified to recken for the tes, which they had not accomplished. To these objections the Pope made answer, that fince y were returned to penance, and had fued for absolution in due humilirie, it could not stand hthe office of the Vicar of Christopersecute them any further with spiritual weapons to the iudice of so many soules, specially having obtained of them, the townes, and by that meane the afion ceaffing, for the which they had bene subject to the censures of the Church: That conning the reckning or restitution of the fruites, it was but a matter accidentall, and viged more aggrauate their dilobedience, then for any necessary reason, and therefore not just that it should adagainst them as a matter of importance: That it was an action of another nature to pursue in with temporal armes, wherein (determining to perfeuer in the league of Cambray) he offehimselfe to be ready and concurrant with the others, not withstanding that enery one of the ifederates might fulfly leave off, for that if Cafar had not Trensfa, it hapned by his proper erir, refuling the first offers which the Venetians made to him by their Embassadour, both to leave a all that they possessed in the firme land, and also to set him downe a sufficient allowance and ompence in exchaunge of Treusa. And thus not being retained by any contradiction or imdiment of the Embassadours, he onely was slow to this action by the disposition of his minde, crein albeit he effected the absolution of the Venetians to be profitable to him, and to the plots had layd, yet he determined not to give it to them but with great regard to the dignitic of the f. Apostolike,& fo, as all those things which were dependant vpon the Church were wholly delered from their oppressions: the same being one cause that he deferred to absolue them, together ththeir vnwillingnefle to confent to thefe two conditions: the one that they should fet at libertie the fubicets of the Church, the traffike & nauigation of the sea Adriatike, which they restrained ainst all such as would not answer a kind of tribute for the marchandise they brought: the other, at they should continue no longer at Ferrara(2 Citic depending upon the Church) the office of reedomino. The Venetians alleaged, that they of Ferrara had colented to it, Clemes the fixt giving p impedimet, who at that time remained with his Court in the citie of Augnien: They proued beles, that Alexander the fourth had given the the jurifdiction & gard of the gulfevinder very large auiledges, whereunto they were induced, for that with their armies, with their vertue, and with icir expeces they had defended it against the Sarazins & pirats Tuckish, & made that nauigation Gg iiij affured to the Christians. To these reasons it was answered on the Popes behalfe, that they of Forara could not in prejudice of the Ecclesiastike jurisdiction, content, that any other should hol office or exercise dominion in Ferrara, and that the people of Ferrara had neuer willingly corsented, but were forced by a long and heauie warre, and after they had in vaine called the ayde of the Pope, whose censures the Venetians contemned, were constrained to accept peace with corditions at the discretion of those that could do more with them by armes then by reason. Touchin their authoritie alleaged of Pope Alexander that he had graunted it to them, it neither appeared behistorie, nor other authentike tradition, neither was there any faith to be given to it but by the tost stimonie of the Venetians, a thing of just sufficient in their owne cause, especially carying so gre importances and be it, there were some apparance of matter, yet it was more likely, that he, withey sayd had accorded to such things in Venice, had done it by threatnings or by feare, then the opperessed, would have consented to an action so cruell and impudent, and bearing domasto the whole world.

The Venetian armie at Vincenfa.

In this estate of affaires, in this diuerstite of intentions of Princes, in this stender power and putation of Cosar, the Venetians, under the leading of Anárea Grutti, sent their armie to Vincensy where they knew the people, in a generall disposition desired to return evoder their iuris diction and making their approaches in the entry of the euening, they won the suburbes of P. after the had made great batteries with their artilleries. Touching the Citie, albeit there were as yet with in it very sew souldiers, yet the Venetians had no great surfect to carie it: onely the townselmen, I the incensing of Fracasse as the brute ranne, after they had sent their Einbassadours to them aboundinght, put them into the Citie, the Prince of Hanam & Fracasse reting into the Castell. At (such is the propertie of victory) it was affiredly beleeued, that if the Venetian army obtaining Venes, ahad without delay approached Terona, that townse had done the like, examples being of greeffect in the alteration of fortune: but the Captaines were of adulte not to issue out of the tow till the Castell were commanded, which they had at their deuotion the fourth day, the Panam and Fracasse distrusting their ownse weaknesse, leaving it abandoned: In matters

" enterprise nothing is more hurtfull then delayes, and nothing more hindreth the felicitie of " Ctorie, then not to joyne oportunitie to occasion and fortune: for, in this meane while and resp new regiments of Cafar entred Verona, together with three hundred Launces of the French kin under the enfigne of Monsieur d'Aubigny: in so much as containing a strength of fine hund Launces and five thousand sootemen Spanish and Almaines, it was now no more easie totake Not long after, the Venetsan armie approched Verona, and was deuided into two parts, in either which were three hundred men at armes, fine hundred light horfemen, and three thousand foc men: they hoped that vpon their approching, there would be fome commotion in the Citie, I because they appeared not afore the wals all in one time, the inhabitants within the towne, go to meete with the former part which came beyond the riucr of Adice and was already entred fuburbes, constrained them to retire, Luke Muluezze comming a little after on the other fide the river with the other part, retiring also: and both they ioyning together, incamped in the lage of S. Martin within five myles of Verona: where vnderstanding that two thousand Alm footemen issued out of Basciana, were gone to make pillage of the places about Citadella, turn that way, they inclosed them in a valley called Fidato: but the Almaines, succoured by those Basciana, made their way by force, though with some hurt for the straite passages, & leaving B ciana abandoned, the Venetians tooke it: from Basciana, one part of the armie went to Feliro: Cinitall, which places after they had recoursed and commaunded, they presented themselves fore the rocke of Escalo, which they commaunded after the artilleric had somewhat executed. the same time Anthonie and Hierome Sauorguiana, Gentlemen that followed the Venetian ction in the countrey of Friul, tooke new Castell standing on a rough mountaine in the middle of the patrimonie, (so is called that part of Frint which is beyond the river of Taillemont:) and I this while there was heard no other thing of Cafar then vame rumours, & how being moued wi the action of Vincensa, was immediatly come to Pietra, he travelled from one place to anot t

ving great diligence with very small effect.

After this, the Venetian armie drew towardes Monselice and Montagnana, both to recourt lifena, and to charge the places of Ferrara togither with their nauie, which the Senate, reied g e counsell of the most wise Senatours, who judged it to rashnesse to be intangled with new cnsprifes, had determined to fend against the Duke of Ferrara, well furnished with Tolength and unition along the river of Paw. To this maner of action they were induced, nor formuch for the ofice of the artaires prefent, as for the incredible hatred they bare to him: it feened to them that ey could not justly complaine, of that he had done to shake off the yoke of beedoming, and to reuer Polifena, but they supposed it neither to their honour nor profite to fuffer , that being not intent to challenge that which he pretended to apportaine to him by right, he aspired to retaine at whereunto he had no way any colour of interest, for that at fuch time as Ca ar leavied his ge from before Padra, he received of him in fee, both the borough of Effe (tro whence is tprong aname and familie of $\mathcal{E}_i te$) and also the borough Mintagna in for payme and attorance of the oney that had bene lent him: to which places he pretended no right at a 1, which he repoted uitie in his ambition and tyrannie. There were added to this the remembrance of many actions infolencies and violence, and other executions done by his people in the recourse of Pole, ina, to puthed on with an incredible hatred against the name of the Venetuans, had executed great rmes and cruelties upon the Gentlemen, yea cuen to renerfe their houses and put fire in them. thefe respectes it was agreed, that their naule and sea armie, commainded by "Inge Tremson, mpounded upon feuenteen light gallies with a large furnishment of meaner vessels and able bos for feruice, thould fayle toward Ferrara. This fleete entting into Par by the mouth of the naces, and burning Cornola with certaine other villages neare to Paw, went pilling and Ipoi-I the countrey up to the lake of Soure, from which place the light horfemen who followed the I through by land, made incurfions as furre as Ficherola: which albeit is rather a house of pleace then a Cailed, yet it is not without his reputation and name, for that Ro.S. Severinlay long he before it, being Captaine to the Venetians in a warre which they had against Horen! I father Alphonfo. The comming of this naule together with the rumon of the armie by had that was ollow, brought no little amaze to the Duke, who, having but a Hender Hrength of fouldiers, and inhabitants of Ferrara either for their finall numbers, or for their ignorance in warre, not fuffitrenough to oppose against fuch a daunger, had no other meane to defend himselfe, vittil he te comforted with the fuccours which he expected from the Pope and French king, then to let h force of that bestowed vpourthe brinke of Pair, that the enemies should passe no further : for feimpediments Tremfan, after he had in vaine aflayed to passe, feeing he could aduaunce hing without he were faccoured by land, came to an anker in the middelt of the river of benind a little Ille right over against Pulifelle: a place within xi. myles of Ferrara, and vept to torment the towneand make many hurtfull executions upon the countrey: his inten-I was to expect therethe armie, who had gotten without great difficultie all Polifena, hag first recoursed Montagnana by composition, by the which the Magistrates of Ferrara were lucred to them as priloners, together with the Captaines of the footemen that were within. In itime of expectation of the armie, for the mote faferiding of the naute in the place where it lay, deurfan began to raife two ballillions vpon the bankes of Pam, the one on that fide to Ferrara, other upon the shore right against it, casting withall a bridge upon the vessels to have the more prtunitie to succour that bultillion that was on Ferrara side. Afore this worke was accomplid, the Dake deutled either to reuerle it or at least to hinder it, and with a counseil haply more tragious then diferete, he called together all the youth of the towne with fuch companies of Iddiers as were come to his pay, and fent them out to assaile the bashillion: but it was an entercin vaine, for that the defendants receiving fuccours of their peoples which third out of the lels, began to diforder the enemie and put them to flight, wherein albeit the Duke himferf came t the medley with a fresh succour of horsemen, and with his presence brought a new hart to most chis people not trained in warre, yet fuch was the furie of the enemie, for whom the furetic of the r ce fought, being manned with many pecces of fmall fhot, that in the end he was confirained to rire, leading many of his people either dead or taken, and that not to many of the inexperienced idbale multitudes, as of the most brane fouldiers and nobilitie of Ferrara: amongst them was .erc.Cantelmo, a young man of great hope, and whole auncelfors afore time were Dakes of Sore the kingdome of Vaples: the fortune of this man was more tragicall then of any of the refidue, tr that as certaine Slauoman fouldiers led him prisoner into a gallie, and contending amought emselves for the interest of his body, there was one of them, who, with a new example of baroa-

rous cruckie, miserably stroke of his head. For these perils joyned to the manifest apparance of tremitie to the towne of Ferrara, Monsieur Chaumont sent to the succours of it the Lord of Cistellion with an hundred and fiftie French Launces : and the Pope being kindled against the Veeians for entring into that action without any regard to the superioritie which the Church ha there, appointed the two hundred men at armes which he had fent to Cafar, to be converted the defence of Ferrara. But it might have hapned that these succours had bin too slow, if the 1. netians had not bene compelled to looke to the defence of their owne estate: it hath bene decred before how the French king was not discontented with the difficulties of Maximilian, pany for the continual feare he had of his prosperitie, and partly for that burning in defire to makela felfe Lord of Verona, he hoped by his necessities to have it on him at last either by purchase or y ingaging: on ther fide he was not a little lealous ouer the Venetians, and no leffe was his difcitentment that their greatnesse was estsoones reellablished, which would nourish continual pell and perplexitie for his Duchie of Mullan. And therefore Cafar not having sufficiently refurnish Verona for want of money, the French king was constrained to enter into care of things, and fending new companies befides those men at armes which were entred there already, to force that that Citie returned not to their obedience. To this Monsieur Chaumont gaue beginning, wi after the loffe of Vincenfa, being drawne vpon the marches of Verona, retained in the French kis pay two thousand Spanish footemen, which were within Veronz, who begin to draw into turt for want of payment: he fent thither for a greater suretie, other bandes of footemen according the aduise of Triunlee, who, for that Monsieur Chaumont feared least the king would be discrented with fo great expences, made answer, that it was a leffe cuill that the king charged him wi the expences of his money, then by sparing his treasure, to lose or put in daunger his citate, the bringing safetie to the kings things, and in the other no honour nor reputation to the place held under the king. Besides this, he lent to Casar eight thousand duckets to pay the souldiers that we within Verona, receiving in pawne both for the repayment of that fumme & others which here ter he should aduaunce for his affaires, the towne of Vallegge, a place which the king esteer d much for the furctie of Breffe, both for the neareneffe being within fixe myles of Breffe, and for a oportunitie of the passage ouer the river of Myncia which is alwayes commaunded by such as a maisters of Vallegge and Pesquiero, The marching of Monsieur Chaumon being followed with e most part of the Launces in the Duchie of Millan, together with the companies which he had it into Verona, and the rumour that ranne of his preparation to befrege Vincenfa, were the ca is that the Venetian armie, leaving for the defence of Polifena and to succourtheir nauie, foure he dred light horsemen and soure hundred sootemen, retired from the countrey Ferrara, diving themselues into Leguago, Soaue, and Vincensa: And being carefull to assure Vincensa, and to [] uide that the countrey thereabout were not distressed by the garrison of Verona, they fortific it with a wonderfull trench full of water enuironed with a rampier whereon were dispersed my bastillions: it began from the foote of the mountaine which lyeth aboue Soane, and reaching at it five myles along the plaine that leades from Rouigne to Montfort, it ended at a corner of cert is marishes which joyne to the river of Adice. They also fortified Soane and Leguague, by with meane standing upon their gard all the winter, they assured the whole countrey. And albeit, y the retiring of the Venetian regiments, the daunger of Ferrara was somewhat diminished, ye it was not altogether taken away, for that though they were acquited of all feare to be forced, # they were troubled with a suspition lest the people for the great harmes they received would !cline to an vtter weaknesse, or else fall into the last despaire for, the souldiers of the nauie andt it followers, ran vp euery day euen to the gates of the towne, & other veffels of the Venetians with had on another fide diffressed the state of the Duke of Ferrara, had taken Comache, and put ig diligence to their fortune, they were troublers of those places in many fortes of afflictions. At it this time arrived the companies of the Pope & the French king, by whose comfort the Duke vo being warned afore by the harmes received in the affault of the bastillion, was incamped in a str g place neare to Ferrara, began to make many incursiós & prosfers, to draw the enemies to bat II, who hoping that their army would returne, refused to fight before. And as there can be no ac in of war without his proper fortune & calamitie: so, in these entercourses of sallies and skirmishe it hapned one day the Cardinall of Este having runne vp neare to the bastillion, as he returned ba e, a shot came out of one of the yessels of the enemies, which caried away the head of the Cour 1-

omike de la Mirandola, one of the Captaines of the Church, none other in so great a multitude eing hurt either with that or any other shot. At last the knowledge and experience of the couney, joyned to the nature and oportunitie of the river, made eafie that which in the beginning had emed to hard and daungerous: for, the Duke and Cardinall, hoping to be able to defeate the auie with the artillerie, if they had meane to make it descend in suretie vpon the banke of the rier, the Cardinall returned to charge the bastillion with one part of the bandes ,wherein his forme was to equall with his valour, that giving the repulse to the enemy which were issued out to ie skirmish, and making slaughter of some of them, he occupied and fortified that part that was ext to the rifing, and fo without all prinitie and knowledge of the enemie, upon the beginning of e night, he drew the artillerie to the banke fide right ouer against them, and breaking it & planng it with a wonderfull filence, he began to execute youn the enemies with a wonderfull furies aking terrible to them that aduauntage which he had won of them by his industrie and valour. he veffels would have fought fafetic by flying, but because there was a long trayne and ranke of eat artilleries, which managed by men experienced, beat a farre of, they chaunged rather the ace of perill, then auoyded the daunger, having withall the presence and labour of the Dukes rsion, who knew both how to force artilleries, and how to manage them: by the affliction of so any shots of artillerie, not with standing the enemies for their partes ceassed not to shoot, but in yne, for that they that played upon the brinke were coursed with the rifing of the hill, their vefs fell into diuerie fortunes, and were confumed with fundry milerable aduentures: some of them it had no more abilitie to gouerne their ships & defend their bodies against the furie of the shot, elded themfelues without respect of condition : some , whose destiny was driuen with a more elence, were miferably burnt with the men that were in them: and others, gouerned by desperesolution, gaue themselves a pray to the bottom of the waters, for that they would not fall into niercy of the enemy: and the Captaine, leaping into a little skiff almost in the beginning of the rmish, found safety by the swiftnesse of his oares, his gallye being galled through both sides, was ike after he had fled about three myles vling continuall defence against the advertitie of het forie.In this difcomfiture, all things being full of bloud, full of fire, & dead bodies, the calamitie of enemy brought to the power of the Duke, fifteene gallyes, certaine great ships, many foystes, th infinite small vessels. There dyed about two thousand bodies, some by shot, some by fire,& ne by water: threescore ensignes were taken, but not the principall standard, which was saued th the General. And as in a general calamity every one hath his fortune, so, many winning shoare and, were gathered up by the Venetia light horseme, in whose valour they found safety for their es:others that could not anoyd the perfecution of the enemy, fell into the aducture of imprisonnt,& others in flying, hapned into many harmes by the payfants,& escaping from the daunger y feared most, they were driven into perils which they doubted least. The prile of the yessels was ied to Ferrara, where, in memory of so great a victory, they were kept many yeares, vitil Duke phono made restitution, having desire to gratifie the Venetians, immediatly after the overthrow his nauie, Duke Alphono dispatched with expedition three hundred horsemen and fine hundisplayed displayed displayed at the other army that had taken Comachio, who recourting Loretto which Venetians had fortified, it was thought they had broken the whole army, if, feeing into their inger, it had not retired to Beb. finding more furetie to auoyd the perill, then to hope in fore. This was the end of the siege of Ferrara, which continued about a moneth, the event and e whereof (which ordinarily is the true touchstone by the which men may judge of worldhings) did well declare how much wifer were the counfels of a few, who perfwaded that leagall other enterprises, and referuing their treasures to be employed in actions more convenient I profitable, they should onely looke to the preservation of Padoa, Trenisa, with other ces recouered, then of fuch, who though more in numbers yet inferiour in discretion, replethed with passions of hate and disdaine, were easie to be intangled with those enterprises, who their beginning was bred in rashnesse, so their conclusion brought soorth at last incredible exnces, with no leffe infamies and harmes to the common weale: fuch commonly are the fruites tat follow enterprises begun with light counsels, being gouerned by a fortune equall to the concion and nature of the action.

But on Padoa side, matters succeeded rather to the surtherance of the Venetians then others: for, with standing Cesar kept vpon the countrey of Vincensa with source thousand sootmen, yet one part of the regiment of the Venetians, (& that neither strong nor great) joyning with the the ave of the paylants of that quarter, tooke almost before his eyes, the passage of Escale, Cogolo and Ba ciana, a place of so much more importance, by how much it is convenient to hinder the descer ding of the Almaines into Italie. And as himselfe, complaining much that for the departure Monstear la Palisse many disorders were hapned, went at last to Bolsane to assist the dyet which by his ordinaunce was to be kept at Y fruch: So according to his example, Monsieur Chaume left there all his thoughts and great defires to performe the enterprise of Vincen/a and Lequagu and loyning to this disposition to depart, these reasons and considerations that both those place were well manned and fortified, & also the season of the time very contrary, he retired to Milla leauing good garrison within Breffe, Pesquiero, and Valegge: and within Verona, for that Ces. of his fingular forces was not able to defend it, he bestowed fixe hundred Launces and foure tho fand footmen, who being separate from the souldiers of Cafar, were lodged in the suburbes of Zena, having yet in their power the Citadell for their greater furetie.

Descriptionof Veronz.

The Citic of Verona of great name and antiquitie is deuided by the river of Adice, a river bo large and deepe comming from the mountaines of Almane, and as it fals into the plaine, it goe crooking on the left hand touching ypon the foote of the mountaines, and fo entreth into Vera and when it issuethout, he runneth from the mountaines and spreadeth into a goodly playnea very fertill. That part of Verona which hath his fituation upon the coast and somewhat into t plaine, is beyond Adice towardes Almanie: the other part which is on this fide Adice, and al a goodly plaine, hath Mantua for his prospect: vpon the mountaine neare S. Georges gate, sta derh the Castell of S. Peter, and within two bowes shooting from thence drawing against the h is the Castell of S. Felix, the one standing vpon the very top of the hill, and they both no le strong by situation then by wals: and yet to loose them for that by the aduauntage of their sit tion, they commaund the Citie, were to put Verona in manifelt daunger: these Casteis w kept by the Launceknights: But in the other part which is separate from this by the riuer, is the Castell looking towardes Pesgara, and hath his situation almost in the middest of the Citie, go through the river with a bridge: not three bow shootings off, drawing towardes Vincensa, stand the Citadell, and betweene them both, the wals of the Citie ioyne without, informe of hall circle: but within, is a wall going from the one to the other, which is in the middelt of two gr ditches, the space betweene both the wals being called the suburbes of S. Zene, which, with gard of the Citadell was appointed for the lodging of the French. Whilest armes were there: were in rest, Maximilia solicited cotinually to make truce with the Venetians, the Pope also in poling very diligently by the working of Achilles de Graffi Bilhop of Pefero, & his Nuncio: to this end his Embaffadours went to the hospitall which is aboue Escalo, to negociate with I Cornaro and Lowis Monseuigno Deputies for the Venetians. But as all matters of flate have the proper difficulties and impediments, so, in this action the demaundes of Cefar were so excess, that this conference tooke no effect, to the great discontentment of the Pope, who wished t the Venetians were deliuered of all trouble, and with whom he had wrought fo much, to end there should be no matter of question to render to the Duke of Ferrara the towne of the macho which they had burned before: withall they had promifed him to yexe no more the eff: of the Duke of Ferrara, to whom he gaue great fauour and support, both to make him behding to him, for that he had obtained and was to obtaine by his meane; and also he had hopet t for these respectes he would depend more upon him then of the French king: against whom, ing in continual (fludy to lay foundations of right great importance), he had fecretly dispatch a messenger to the king of England, and begun to worke the Smissers at that time inclining to see quarell with the French king . To this action and for this reason came to him the Bishop of ! " (whom the Latins call Sedunensis) enemy to the French king, and under that colour pretending be Cardinall, and for that respect was received of him with great ioy.

The Emperour and the king to accord tou-Caftill.

About the end of this yeare, were accorded the king of the Romains and king Catholike, tweene who was some difference touching the gouernment of the Realmes of (astill: This colcaeholike fall uerfie was log debated in the Court of France, 82 albeit it fuffered many great perplexities, 82 d 1culties yet in the end it was guided to perfection by the meane & undifference counfell of the (1wroment of dinall of Amboyse, who not cosidering how much this vnion was hurtfull to the affaires of his k z. was caried perhaps by this ambition, that if by his working there might be stabilitie & agreen at

etweene them, it would be a degree to lift him to the Popedome, being in this, a daungerous ounsellour to respect more his proper interests then the safetie of his countrey: Such then was he power of his diligence and authoritie, that he induced Maximilian to confent that the king Catholike, in case he had no issue males, should be gouernour ouer those Realmes vntill their little onne Charles were come to the age of majoritie, to whom should be no power to take vpon im the title of king during the life of his mother, bearing the prerogative and intildiction of Queene, for that in Caffello the issue males exclude not the general lissue: That the king Cathoke should pay to Cafar fiftie thousand duckets: That he should ay de him according to the treae of Cambray, vntill he had recoursed all that appertained to him: And lastly to pay to Charles nery yeare fortic thousand duckets. By this convention, the king of Aragon was confirmed ouernour ouer the Realme of Castillo, and standing now in state to have faith and credit with afar, fince both the controuerfies were determined, and they both had equal lintereffs touching reir nephew: he might now more boldly looke into the meanes by the which he might hinder ie greatnesse of the French king, which he held alwayes suspected for the regard of the kingdome Naples. About this time also, the Pope entred into suspicion, that the Pronotarie Bentinolo reaining at Gremona, laboured fecretly to returne into Bolognia, against which accident he caused be retained in the pallace of Bolognia for certaine dayes, Iulian de Medicis: and attributing all ings to the ill disposition of the French king, he made knowne the feare he had that he would Me into Italie to fubdue it, and make Pope by violence the Cardinall of Amboyle: and yet at the me time, he Ipake without any regard in derogation of the honour of Cefar, as of a person incable of fuch a dignity, and by his incapacitie had brought the name of the Empire into great connpt. About the end of this yeare, dyed the Count Petillano, Generall ouer the Venetian armies, a Death of the an for his age and graue experience in actions of war, of great name and worthinesse, and with count Petile Venetians, of that credit and trult, that they never feared he would put their state in daunger, lano. rashnesse or want of counsell.

The yeare after which was 1 5 1 0. the same doubts and suspitions continuing, warres began stirre on all partes but coldly and according to the season for the Venetian armie lying encaindat S. Bon: face vpon the countrey of Verona, held Verona as it were befreged: from whence narles Baillen, Federike de Bossole and Sacromoro Viscount, comming to their succours, were arged by the stradiots, who overthrew them, and taking prisoners Charles and Sacromoro, Feike found fafetic in the relicue of the French, which issued out of Verona for their succours. Anor time they brake another band of French horfemen, amongst whom Monsieur de Cless was en priloner: on the other fide (fortune can both fmile and laugh) two hundred French Launces ing out of Veroma with three thousand footemen, forced by affault a bastillion towards Soane, lich was garded by a band of fixe hundred footemen,& in their returne,they ouerthrew a great ltitude of payfants. But whilest the warre was occupied with these cold proceedings, the minds Princes were in great paine and care, but specially Cafar had his perplexities, who doubting how might cary the victorie of the warre against the Venetians, and posting ouer (according to his tome) his affaires from one dyot to another, had caused to be published the dyot at Ausburge, I being kindled against the Pope, for that the Electours of the Empire pushed on by his authoe, made instance to negociate in the dyor rather for peace with the Venetians, then for prouisios the warre, he had caufed to depart from Aufpurge the Bishop of Pefero his Nuncio: he consied also that the deliberations of dyots were uncertaine, tedious, and full of difficulties, the end one breeding the beginning of another: he faw withall, that the French king excufed himfelfe ly of the demanndes and enterprifes that were tendred to him, fometimes alleaging the sharple of the feafon, fometimes requiring affignation certaine of the expences which were to be de, & eftsoones protesting that by the treatie of Cambray, he was not bound to ayde him alone ioyntly with the Pope and king of Aragon, with whom it wasteafonable that the proceedings re mutuall and common , as the confederation and bond were ioynt and generall: for thefe rea-(is, he entred into refolution, that there was no remedie more ready for his affaires, then to induce t: French king to embrace the enterprise to take Padoa, Vincensa, and Treussa, employing his ces,& taking fufficient recompence. This demaund was well liked by many of the kings Counall, who confidering that till the Venetians were wholly chased out of the firme land, the king fould dwell in continuall expences and daungers, perswaded his Maiestic ypon those reasons, to deliuer himselfe of them at one blow, and in one action making but one expence. The King minde was not altogether estraunged from this counsell, being caried haply with the same refons, and therefore albeit he inclined to passe in person into Italie with a mighty armie, whice he called mightie and puissant as often ashe had in the same more then a thousand fixe hundre Launces, with his Gentlemen and Penfioners: yet, harkening to other counfels by the confide ration of other reasons, he stood suspended in minde, expressing a confusion more then he wa wont, for that the Cardinall Amboyse, a man of great authoritie and stomacke, afflicted with long and grieuous maladie, forbare to manage his affaires which were wont to be dispatche wholly by his direction. The king befides that of his naturall disposition, he loued not much ma ters of expences, was retained allo by a defire he had to Verona, for the accomplishing where it seemed to him a good meane to have the king of Romains intangled with continuall warres, fi which regardhe had newly lent to him eighteene thousand duckets to pay the Launceknight that lay in garrison in the Citie, and was bound to make it vp a further summe of fiftie thousan with condition that he should not onely hold the Citadell for his securitie and pawne, but also the old Castell should be set ouer to him, together with the next gate of the towne, the better have free entry and iffue. And lattly, for want of testoring the money within one yeare, t towne of Valeggo should temaine to him in perpetual government, with power to fortifie: well the towne as the Citadell at the charges of Cafar. Thele confiderations drew the Kings mi into no small perplexities, but much more was he troubled with feare, least the Popes intentic would wholly varie and alter, if he should either leade or send into Italie a new armie : for, t Pope, no lesse full of suspition, then also ill contented that he should impatronise upon Veron besides that he still kept a will entertained to absolue the Venetians, did also all that he cor to ioune himselfe with the Swiffers: for confirmation of which disposition, he had sent bac againe into that countrey, the Bilhop of Sion, with money to distribute amongst them, and pr mife to indue himselfe with the holy cap: he fought also with all his diligence, by what meanes might estraunge the King of England from the amitie of the French King, whom albeit his fatl at the instant of death had adusted, for his securitie and benefite, to continue in affirred leas with him, and for that respect was yearely payed to him fiftie thousand duckets: yet, being car ouer with hot humours of youth, and the great abilitie of treasure that his father had left him, feemed he had no leffe in confideration the counfels of those, who for the defire of new thin ioyned to an auncient hatred which the English do ordinarily beare to the French nation, me perswasions to him for the warre, then the wisedome and discreet example of his father, who fufing all contentions with the French, had governed his kingdome in great obedience and tr quillitie, notwithstanding he had aspired to a state new and full of troubles. All these consider tions vexing not a little the minde of the French King, who, the better to deutile for the affaire i Italie, was now gone to Lyon; he feared least his marching into Italie, which the Pope detel openly, would stirre vp some new innouations by his meanes: besides, he saw that the King Aragen diffwaded him from it, but under demonstrations of a friend and an indifferent love the common tranquillitie: in fo much as amid those multitudes of doubtes which trauelled ! on all partes, he faw no more certaine nor prefent counfell, then with great labour & diligence Rudie to to appeale the mind of the Pope, that at the least he might stand afford that he were: his enemy & against him. Wherein it seemed that occasio fauoured him greatly, for that it was leeued, that by the death of the Cardinall Amboyse, who was extreamely sicke, he should be eal of those suspicions, from whence it was supposed his ill contentments did principally proces. And for that the king was aduertifed by good intelligence, that the Cardinall of Aucha Neph! to the Cardinall Amboyle, with others that managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, had wi great rashnesse both in deede and wordes laboured more to quicken and kindle, then to appe and mollifie the Popes minde: he would no more vie their feruice in those actions, but fent Rome in post the Lord Albert Pie Count de Carpie, a personage in whom was indifferent 13 greatnesse of his minde and expedition of his wit: he caried verie large commissions not onely) offer to the Pope the kings forces and authority to ferue his turne in all accidents, and you all casions, but also in inclining as much as he could to his will and nature, he was to communice with him frankly and simply the state of all things that were practifed, together with the quefles that Cefar made to him, & finally to referre to his arbitration and will whether he shod

Te into Italie or not, and whether he should minister to the Emperour speedily or slowly: he dalso in charge to dissivade the absolution of the Venetrans, but before he arrived, it was resold and promifed by the Pope: the Venetians after long dispute and abode of their Embassadours ere, consenting at last to the conditions whereupon the difficulties flood, not finding any other nedie for their fafetic, then to be joyned with him. The conditions for the which the absolution is to beginen, were openly published in the confistorie the xxiiii. of February, in presence of the mettan Embassadours, who confirmed them by writing according to the authentike direction m their common weale: These were the particulars: That they should not in any fort dispose benefices or dignities of the Church: and that they should make no relistance or difficultie aching the fruites and provisions deriving of them to the Court of Rome: That they should not inclay that in that Court should not be prosecuted the causes for benefices with others apperming to the Ecclefiastike invisibilion: That they should not charge the goods of the Church,& empt places of their temporall dominion, with tenthes or any other fortes of imposition: That y should renounce from the appellation against the admonition, and from all interestes and hts gotten ypon the Church lands in what fort focuer but specially from all those prerogatives drights by the which they pretended to hold the office of Vicedomino in Ferrara: That the fubtes of the Church and their vessels may freely trassike through their gulfe, and that with such ple facultie, that the marchandife of other natios brought in their bottoms, should not be troud nor fubicatio pay tolls: That it should not be lawfull for them in any fort to medle with Fera, or any townes of that state which were dependant on the Church: That all couenants and stractes which they had made to the prejudice of the Church, with any the subjectes or vasfals he same, should be cancelled and made voyde: That they should not receive any Duke, Baron, other subject or vassall of the Church, that should be an enemie or rebell to the sea Apostolike: at they should be bound to make restitution of all the moneys which they had exacted upon revenues of the Church, together with reparation of all the harmes which the Church had

These obligations with the promises and sufficient renouncements, being received in the conorie, the Venetian Embassadours at a day appointed according to the auncient examples of nes, were brought under the portall of the great Church of S Peter, where falling at the Popes te, being fer in his pontificall feate neare the brazen gates, and honoured with the affiftants of the Cardinals & Colledge of Prelats, they asked him pardon in great humilitie, confessing their atumacie and faults patt: After this, according to the cultome of the Church, were pronounced taine prayers, & so proceeding to all the other degrees of ceremonies, the Pope receining them o grace, gaue them absolution, & enjoyned them for penaunce to go visite the seuen Churches. The Venetians er the action of absolution was done, they entred into S. Peters Church, being guided by the absoluted. at Penitencier: and after they had heard Masse which was denied to them before, they were y honorably accompanied to their houses by many Prelates and Courtiers, not as persons exmmunicated and interdicted, but as reconciled Christians and deuout children to the sea Apolike . Soone after they returned to Venice , more loaden with the ceremonies , then made fied with the vertue of their absolution, leaving behind them at Rome, Hieronimo Donato e of their number, and who by his vertues and fingular facilitie of wit and learning, becomng very agreeable to the Pope, did afterwards great seruice to his countrey in things which he gociated with him.

THE ARGUMENT.

He mindes of men of their proper inclination are mutable, bearing fmall subjection to passions of enuie, ambition, and glorie: and to gu Princes aspiring to high actions, by so much lesse tollerable is the the of renolution & chaunge, by how much more the occasions are wrong

Pope Iulio the second turneth against the French men. The French king and king of Roman enter league against the Venetians, who besiege Verona. directly contrary to their expectations, and do conclude preindicially gainst their proper imperie and greatnesse. For, as this absolution wh the Pope gaue to the Venetians, brought no little griefe to the minus Maximilian, being so much the more vexed, by how much the ac a was accomplished with a will resolute, and touched him more particularly and principally a all the refidue: fo also the French king, having no lesse interest in the harmes that might hap a did equally commicate in the perplexities of this alteration, for that he defired for his private fite that the greatnesse of the Venetians should not be effloones reestablished: nevertheless it could not finde out what were the intentions and last endes of the Pope: and therefore fee g himselfe with vaine hopes cocerning the difficulties of the affaires that were prepared against 1, he perswaded himselfe that the Pope stirred onely for suspition of his vniting with Maximilia & that temporifing with him: and giving him no occasion of greater scare, he would passe no fun s but rest satisfied with the absolution he had given: a perswasion much abusing the kings affa s & no leffe farre from the resolution of the Pope, who growing more & more confirmed in his? liberation, and little respecting the declarations and impediments of the consederate Embassac s, fuffered the subjectes and dependants of the Church to enter into the pay of the Venetians, which ceiued into intertainemet Iohn Paul Baillon as Generall of their whole companies, standing v 1 out a gouernour by the death of the Count Petillano: they tooke also into their wages John L is and tohn Vitelli, sonnes to the late tohn and Camilla, and made R anso de Gere Colonell of it footemen, (holding it a inflice as reasonable to fauour them with this libertie for their temp ! ayde, as to acquite them of the paynes of the Church, both the one and other respecting one n ning and matter.) And as in this action he made open declaration that he tooke the Venetian to his protection, so he laboured also to bring them to agreement with Cafar, hoping vinder " meane not onely to seperate him from the French king, but withall to knit him with himselfe d with the Venetians to make warre upon him: wherein, for the more eafie fucceeding of this det; taking his oportunitie vpon the necessities of Cafar, he interposed his authoritie to the electes of the Empire and the free townes, to the end that in the dyot of August there should be no cfent of contribution. But the more he aduaunced and vrged this practife, the more he found of hard operation, for that on the one fide, Cafar would not harken to any motion of agreement, leffe Verona might remaine to him: and on the other fide, the Venetians (in whom the Pope d hope of a greater facilitie) perswading themselves to be able to defend Padoain all fortunes, d that keeping that Citic, time would fauour them with more occasions, demaunded resolutely e "restitution of Verona, offering to pay in recompence a huge summe of money. To a minde dis-"fed to troubles, nothing is more sweete then the study of vexation; and by how much more ples-

ally doth abound the humour of ambition, by so much lesse is limited the desire of oppression, which in mindes corruptly inclined, holds nothing valawfull that may ferue to the action pretened, nor any thing vorces onable that agreeth with the humour of their passion, in whom this is >> ne naturall custome, to convert all things to his owne propertie and working . The Pope omit- >> ing neither meane nor matter that might give furtherance to his purpose, made secret solicitation Henrie the eight then king of England, to raise warre against the French king, wherein enforing the memorie of the auncient emulations of those two kingdomes, he joyned to the facilitie of he enterprise, this occasion of the felicitie and successe: that if he would begin to leavie armes gainst Fraunce, the action would take imitation in many others, to whom the puissance and reatnesse of that crowne was either suspected or hated : he forgat not to encourage him to emrace with that denotion which in other times had bene proper to the kings of England, the glory nat was offered him to be protectour and preferuer of the sea Apostolike, which, without the aide fhis authoritie and rescue, stood in manifest daunger by the ambition of the French king. In this ractife the king of Aragon did communicate with the Pope, but fecretly & not really, vling peraps this moderation of mind, not to suffer his desires to be greater the his fortunes. But that which as of greatest importance, the Pope entertained still with the Swiffers the negociatios which were egun by the Bilhop of Syon, by whose authoritie (being great with that nation) & perpetuall imortunitie labouring their affemblies, and counfels & preaching in their Churches: he obtained at At that the Swiffers, receiving every yeare a thousand Florins of Rhein for every Canton, should c bound to the protection of him & the estate of the Church, with permission the Pope for his efence against all men that would vexe him, to leavie certaine proportions of footemen. The ocasson that most helped forward this matter, and made his request more easie and plausible, was ne disagreement that began to kindle betweene them and the French king : for the Swiffers beg of nature proudand weening, became more raised and lifted up in minde by the estimation iat othershad of them, and chalenging to themselves peculiarly the glory of the French victoes, were caried into this prefuming, that all the conquestes and honorable actions which either ie king raigning, or his predecessour had obtained in Italie, proceeded principally of their valour and the feare of their armes : and thereupon infilling vpon merites , as though the crowne of raunce ought much to them, they demaunded (the French king foliciting to make renouation of re alliance that now was determined) that he would augment their penfions, being then threeore thousand frankes by yeare, ouer and aboue the mercenarie contributions which were secret-· dispersed among it privat persons; pensions which had bene begun under Lowis the eleventh, &c onringed vnto the present time. But for that they accopanied their demaunds with a presumptuus audacity which the king construed to manifest infolencie, & for that of peasants & mountaine en(fuch was his phrase) they sought imperiously to impose & caxe him being a king, he began so hake them off with wordes and countenaunces, that they might differene how much he diffdaied them, more respecting his dignitie royall, then regarding the present vulitie of things. He was ie more induced to this, for that at the same season by the solicitation of George Sopressan, the peoles of the valleys subjectes of Sion, who were gouerned in seuen communities which they call ourts, being corrupted by publike promifes and privat penfions, were not onely confederat with m, but also bound to give passage to his people, and refuse it to his enemies, and withall to enter to his payes with such numbers of footemen as their forces were able to beare. In the same fort denter confederacie with him, the Lordes of the three leagues, whom they call the Grifons: and beit one part of the men of the valley had not yet approved it, the king was not without hope to duce them to ratification by the felfe fame meanes: in fo much as he began to perfwade himfelfe nat the amitie of the Smiffers was now no more necessarie to him, having determination to suply his warres with Almain footemen, ouer and befides those proportions of fouldiers which the alley men & Grisons should furnish him of Besides, he seared little their stirres or preparations, & The expectation that they were able to affaile the Duchie of Millan but by the straits of Ballinging. and other passages of great difficultie: through the which, if they should march in great troupes nd numbers, he made his reckning that they would be eafily reduced into necessitie of victuals by a small armie: and if they came but in small companies, a stender strength would likewise sufice to make them retire. Wherein he made his consectures at random, and seemed to limit the forunes of the whose forces yet he knew not, flattering himself with his proper greatnes: an humour

" prejudicially mouing in Princes, in whom there ought to be no partialitie of comparison, who " there is question of enterprise and action: But because he stood resolute not to graunt them au mentation of penfions, he could not obtaine in their councels a renouation of the alliance, not with standing there were many euen in the middest of them, who did earnestly perswade it, to whom particular were retributed no small rewardes: and for that cause they consented more easily to the confederation which was demaunded of them by the Pope . By which new confederational Pope feeming to have layed a great foundation for the advauncing of his purposes: and having perpetuall nature to proceede in all things as supreme & soueraigne aboue all men, and as thous the whole world were in necessitieto receiue lawes of him, he began to sow seedes of new co trouerfies with the Duke of Ferrars, either pushed on by the cause that was in disputation b tweene them, or else by an auncient hatted, for that having received of him so many honors, ben fites, and gratifications, he seemed neuerthelesse to depend more upon the French king then upon him: a dealing which he construed prejudicially and farre contrary to the recompence of his m rites. But what soeuer was the cause, searching a beginning of the quarrell, he commaunded imp rioully Alphonso Duke of Ferrara to forbeare to continue the working of falt at Comacchioche: leaged that it was not reasonable that that which was not lawfull to him when the Venetians he Ceruia, should now have sufferaunce being possessed by the sea Apostolike, to whom appear ned the absolute governement of Ferrara and Comacchio. Besides, it was a matter of great pr fite, for that the working ceasifing at Comacchio, the saltpittes of Ceruia ministred traffike to all t rownes thereabouts. But Duke Alphonfo, who reposed more in the coiunction which he had w the Frenchking & in his protection, then he feared the Popes forces, gaue small obedience to t commaundement: he complained that he should be costrained not to reape the fruite which gr to him in his proper house with small labour, & to be driven to buy of another for the vsage of peoples, the ware whereof he had enough to replenish forreine countreys, alleaging wirhall, the that ought not to be enforced for an example, which the Venetians had made him confent vn more by compulsion of armes then by condition of inflice. Which reasons little analled to ce tent the Pope: who efcloones fent to protest to him under great paines and accursings to disce tinue that worke: such were the thoughtes and actions of the Pope, inclined altogether to raise and support the Venetians. But on the other side Cafar & the French king thirsted not a little af their embacement, with defire to diminish their authoritie & greatnesse. And being much disce tented with the demonstrations which the Pope expressed on their behalfe, they drew into a m Arayte alliance and intelligence one with another, concluding to inuade the Venetians that fo mer with huge forces: for the better advauncing of which expedition, the contract bare, that French king for his part should fend Monsieur Chaumot with a strong army, whereunto should iovned the Launceknights that lay at Verona. And Cafar for his part, should make entry into countrey of Frint with those leavies of men & municions which he hoped to obtaine of the E pire in the dyet of Auspurge: and having accomplished that actio, he was to proceede to other terpriles according to the estate of occasions and time. They solicited the Pope to joyne with the according to the bonde of the league of Cambray, holding it but just to summon him to perfor that which he had so willingly promised: but he who was no lesse disconrented with that motic then having a capacitie fearthing about the wit of other men, made answer that he was no me bound to that confederation which hath had already his perfection, feeing it had bin in the pow of Cafar to have first Trenifa, and afterwardes a fatisfaction & recompence in money. Cafar lil wife folicited to have fuccours from the king Catholike, both by vertue of the fame capitula ons of Cambray, and also vnder couenants and promises made particularly with him, at such til as he consented to him the government of Castille: but this solicitation, as it bare a forme of quest to ayde him rather with money, then with men, so the king of Aragon whom it impo ted much not to disfurnish himselfe of the thing whereof he had most neede, made answer that would fend him foure hundred Launces: A strength of little profite for Cafar, for that as well int Frech army, as in his owne campe, the seruice on horsebacke was plentifully furnished. About the time the Citie of Verona lived in great afflictions under the fouldiers that garded it, who, for ti: they were not payed, drew into fecret conspiracie with certaine Venetian bandes, by whom the thought to worke fome trayterous stratageme: for which purpose the Venetians issuing out of. corges gate, whilest they taried to fasten their ladders together (for that being single they sufficed bt to reach to the highest of the wall) either they were heard by the warders of the Cassell of Felix, or in their feare they seemed to heare a brute of armed men. And as in matter of enterife imagination abuseth much, so whether they feared their owne shadowes, or whether they pubted that to be indeede which was but a vision in their timerous fantasies, they suddenly retid, leaving behind them their ladders as testimonies of their seare and intention, leaving to the nemy to doubt much of their valour, that in so faire an oportunity for sooke the felicitie that their tune had prepared. The armie retired forthwith to S. Bomface, and at Verona the conspiracie mming to detection, many were passed ouer to instice and punishment, though some found fa-

our more by clemencie then their proper innocencie.

In this scason the Pope expressed certaine inclinations to be estsoones reunited with the French Ing, not of good will, but for feare : for that Maximilian funmoned him with braue messages to hd him two hundred thousand duckets, threatning that otherwise he would joyne with the ench king against him: another reason of his feare was a brute that was spread, that in the Dyor Anspurge it was agreed to minister to him a strong succour, and also the peace had bene newly ablished betweene the kings of England and Fraunce, and published with great solemnitie. By uson of these seares, he began to treate with great diligence with Albert de Carpie, whom till that y, he had intertained with wordes & hopes generall, vfing in all his actions of negociation more then true meaning, and leffe fidelitie then faire resemblaunce. But besides the mutabilitie of his vne nature, the variation of occasios made him not dwell long in that resolutios both for that the urliament of Auspurge (without the forces and ay des of which there was no great reckening to made of the threates of Cafar) not answering expectation, determined for him no other sucurs, then a supply of three hundred thousand Florins of Rhem, whereof his prodigalities had alady made great wastes: And also the king of England signified that he had set downean article the peace, expressing that it should be no peace as often as the French king should offend the The Pene tte of the Church. In regard of these things, the Pope reentred into new stomacke, and returning threatness the foones to his former thoughtes, he began to heape new complaints against the Duke of Ferra-Duke, who, he sayd, that since it was suffered to the subjectes of the Church to sayle & traffike frankthrough the gulfe of Venice, had imposed new tributes upon the goods which were brought to rice by the river of Paw: A taxatió which the Pope alleaged that the vaffall could not leavy (acrding to the interpretation of the lawes) without licece of the Lord paramount, & withall it was hing that brought great prejudice to the people of Bolognia, who were his subjectes: for which onfideration he made instance that they might be deposed, threatning that otherwise he would ing warre voon him. Wherein to giue him a greater feare, he caused to march his bandes of men warre into the countrey of Bologma'and into Romana . These things troubled not a little the inde of the French king being loath on the one fide to fall at oddes with the Pope, and on the oer side he selt himselse touched in honour and conscience to leave abandoned the Duke of Fertra, to whose protection he had bound himselfe by receiving thirty thousand duckets. No lesse as he moved with the regard of his proper profite, for that Duke Alphonfo depending wholly on him, and fleeing so much the more to his deuotion, by how much he faw him persecuted by e Pope, he esteemed it his proper interest to preserve him, and for that cause he interposed his eputies with the Pope to folicite some accord between them. But it seemed just to the Pope at the king should withdraw himselse from that protection, alleaging that he had taken it vpon magainst the capitulations of Cambray, by the which (made under colour to render to the hurch that which was vsurped) it was forbidden that none of the confederates should take into rotection any that was named by another, and that for his part, he had named the Duke of Ferera: and moreouer it was defended that no one of them should have any action with things apertaining to the Church. He alleaged that the like also was confirmed in the confederation made articularly betweene them at Biagraffo, wherein was exprelly prouided that the king should not akeinto his protection any cltate depending of the Church, & should as well refuse to take them pereafter, as also cancell and make voy de all protections which he had accepted heretofore. To which adjections not with standing it was answered for the king, that by the same convention it was prouided, that the king should have power to dispose of the Bishoprikes on this side the Mountes as he lifted, which the Pope had violated in the first auoy dance that fell, as likewise he had broken in fauour of the Venetians, the capitulations made at Cambray, by which euasionst king was at libertie not to observe the things he had promifed yet because he would not come arms with the pope for the quarel of the duke of Ferrara, he officed coditios, by the which, not c fending directly his honour, the Pope in a great part might rest starssiced to uching the interest which the Church & he pretended against Duke Alphose: & besides, he was cotented to bind it selfe by promise (according to the Popes request) that the French armies should not passe the rivos of Pan, butsor the protection of the Florentins whereunto he was bound, & to molest P. Petra sio John & Paul Baillon, under colour of money promised by the one, and detained by the other

Whilest these things were in action, Monsieur Chaumone advanced with an army of fiftee hundred Launces, and ten thouland footemen of many nations, amongst whom were certained giments of Swiffers prinarly leanied, and not by permission of the Cantons, & followed with gre proportions of artilleries, with certaine bridges prepared to passe rivers: having also joyned w him the Duke of Ferrara with two thousand men at armes, fine hundred light horsemen, and ty thousand footmen. With these copanies he tooke in the meane while without any impedimet, I lesena de Rouigno, a peece which the Venetians had abandoned; and taking also the tower Ma quesano standing upon the river of Adice towardes Padoa, he marched on to Castelbaldo, andh at the first summothe townes of Montagnano and Este, the one apperraining to Alphons a Este, graunt from Maximilian, & the other given to him in gage. Alphonso after he had recovered the townes, sent backe his regimets under colour to encounter certaine galleis of the Venetians, whi floted upon the river of Pam. By the imitation of Chaumont, the Prince of Hanam Maximilu Lieutenaunt, marched in like fort out of Verona with three hundred French Launces, two huds men at armes, & three thousand Alman footmen, & joyning with Chaumon, he followed him wayes within one remoue of his campe. They left behind the Montfelice holden for the Venetia & marched towards the courtrey of Vincenfa, where Longua & the whole countrey yeelded win out resistance: for that the Venetia atmy cotaining fixe hundred men at armes, soure thousand light horseme & stradiots,& eight thousand sootmen under John P. Baillón Generall,& Andrew Gr. treasurer, having first abandoned Swano, & alwayes retiring into places of suretie according ass enemy aduaced, & lastly having bestowed sufficier garrison within Trenifa, & a thousand foot within Mestro, they were retired to the Bremelli, a place within three myles of Padoa, & of gr furetie for their incamping, both for that the countrey is full of hils and rifings, and the place it se " flandeth inuironed with the waters of these three rivers Brento, Brentello, & Baguillon. Such is se frayltie of mans nature, that the fuddennesse of perill is more terrible then the daunger it selfe :: 66 by how much it happeneth to a multitude vingouerned, by so much it seemes more desperate, that when their mindes are once possessed with seare, there is no place for confidence and rese "tion, and all hopes are turned into doubts, their extremitie making them timerous, which ough make them resolute. The poore people of Vincensa, for that the armie was thus retired, finding selues no lesse abandoned, then altogether vnable to defend their estate, and seeing that their s tune had left them no other hope the fuch as they might expect in the mercy of the victors, wh they supposed they might more graciously obtaine by the meane and working of Monsieur Ch. mont: they fent to him to demaunde safeconduit to addresse Embassadours to him and the Pris of Hanan, which being graunted, they presented themselves in sorme and aspect pitiful, and ful forow and feare afore them, both being then at the bridge of Barberano ten myles from Vincen Their attite representing the lamentable condition of their fortune, and their other dolefulle cumstances, bearing a prefence of forow and languishing mindes, moved pitie in such as car prepared to spoyle them, and inclined to grace even those that afore had determined their dest ction. So effectually worketh the confideration of miserie in mindes tractable to compassion. I chiefe of the Embassage, being the mouth of the residue, was licensed to speake in this fort int presence of all the Captaines and principals of the armie.

"This Question may be asked in the confideration of our present condition, which is least hu full, either to be extreme miserable, without the threats and seare of fortune, or to be in full professive which alwayes stands subject to diminution and falling. And since there is a divine power that he is not always to the stands for the s

If it were knowne to , my of this honorable prefence (at whose feete I speake) how much this Citie of Vincenfa (heretoore enuied of her neighbours for her riches and felicities) hath suffered , since more by errour ,, and rashnesse of her inhabitants, and haply more by a certaine fatall disposition then through o- ,, her occasion, the returned under the iurisdiction of the Venetians, together with the intollerable, narmes and domages the bath received: we beleeve (and your gracious aspectes assure no lesse), hat in your harts will be greater the compassion of our miseries, then the hatred for the memorie,, four rebellion, if rebellion may be imposed upon the errour of that night, wherein our people, ,, trawne into universall confusion, for that the armie of our enemy had forced the suburbes of,, Postello, notto rebell nor to flee from the easie government of Casar, but to deliver our selves, om the facke and extreme afflictions of other Cities, did fend our Embaffadours to compounde,, vith the enemy . To which action our multitudes and peoples not accustomed to armes , and ,, Meacquainted with the daungers of warre, were altogether pulhed on by the authoritie of, 'racasso, a Captaine, who experienced in so many seuerall warres, and appointed of Casar, ,, ther by subtletie or by feare (a matter not appertaining to vs to search) gaue vs counsell to,, olicite an accord for the fafetie of our wines, our children, and our poore afflicted countrey:,, he fame making it manifelt that no ill impression of minde, but onely feare increased through the ,, sthoritie offsich a Captaine, was the cause, not that we did determine by long counsell, but rather, iat in a very fmall computation of time, in fo great a tumult, and in fo fearefull a noyle of armes & ,, tilleries thundring, whole terrour vanquished our resolution, we ranne rashly under the rule of " e Venetians, the felicitie and power of whom were not fuch as we ought either to feare the one,, affect the other. Our condition was not to expect or temporife, for that the enemy was incam-,, ed in the places which the strength which was left for our succours had newly abandoned; and as ,, communalties or multitudes the hope that is deferred maketh their harts to languish: so the long, intinuance of miseries sufficeth even to shake the mindes of the most afford. Men not accustoed to aduerfities have least rule over their passions, and such as never lived but in securitie, have, aft temperance to beare a chaunge. Faultes done by necessicie bring with them their proper paron. And as you are not now to doubt of the difference betweene faults committed by feare and ,, rour, and offences proceeding of fraude and ill intention: so neuerthelesse, though our fortune,, oue you to interpret our rebellion not to feare, but to will, and that so vile an action was begun, counfell and confent vinuerfall, and not through confusion and vibridled rashnesse of a few, hom neither counsell nor authoritie could represse, and be it lastly that the transgressions of this, retched Citie were altogether inexcusable: yet our calamities have bene so great since that ac-,, rfed renolt, that we may truly fay, that the punishment without all comparison hath bene grea-,, then the fault: for within our wals, the garrison fouldiers that were left for our safetie and com-,, returned themselves into the habit of adversaries, doing all things to the aggravation of our mi-,, ries, not sparing to spoyle those goods that were left vs for our reliefe and succour. And without, e have not bene free from all those forces of harmes which warre and hostilitie are wont to draw, ith them, our afflictions being so much the more grieuous and great, by how much the war hath,, ne continuall without intermission: we have nothing remaining in this miserable countrey which,, rieth any memorie of the riches, delight, or felicitie thereof: All the houses of our possessions are,, rned, all our woods cut downe and wasted, all our fields and gardens defaced, and all our infinite, ards of cattell driven away and devoured. This is the second yeare that we have bene driven to,, ape our hauest afore the time, that we haue had no securitie to sow our seedes, and lesse season to, ther our fruites, yea the seucritie of the time hath left vs no hope, that this countrey so generally, throyed, can be ever readdreffed. Our miferies are come to these desperate termes & limites, that,, hat with the needefull supportation of our lives, and to furnish the intollerable exactions which, it necessities have imposed upon vs, all that remaineth either of our hidden treasure or common, ore, is farre infufficient to nourish the lives of our wives, children, and our selves, to whom remai-, eth nothing but a miferable spectrale of the happinesse wherein we haue liued. If the present state ", four countrey were now objected to any that had feene and knowne it before, and our calami-,, es present measured with our felicities passed, I know it would stirre vp motions of pitie & com- ,, affion, even in the mindes of enemies, confidering specially that this Citie (albeit it hath small cir-,)

" cuite) which was wont to be replenished with inhabitants, stately in maiestie and presence, right " through magnificence of buildings and pallaces, an affured and free retraite for all flraungers, "Citie rejoycing in friendships, societies, & gratulations, to be now made voyde of dwellers, poo in the prefence and countenaunces of men and women, no place left for hospitalitie, no one me able to feede his familie for one moneth, and in place of stately feasts, meetings, and banquets, no thing left but penurie, defolation, & feare to shew friendship, men fighing in the sorowes of the "wives and children, whom they cannot consfort, and women wayling the seucritie of their cor " mon destinic. And these calamities (oh gracious Prince of Hanaw) would be yet greater, if we c "fidered not that on your vertuous will dependeth either the last desolation of our afficied cou try, or the hope that once againe under the wings of Cafar, guided by your high wisdom and cl " mencie, we might lift up our heades, not to be restored (for that agreeth not with our merite a " fortune) but consuming our lives to the vttermost, to avoyd at least an extreame and last destrction: a grace which we so much the more expect and hope for , by how much your affabilitie. eafinesse is knowne toys, wherein we doubt not but you will resemble and imitate Casar, w " whose examples of elemencicall Europe is replenished. All our wealth is consumed, all our hose determined, all our fortunes layd at your feete, there remaineth nothing elfe to vs but our lives a persons, against the which to vie crueltie, were neither profit to Cesar, nor prayle to you: for, " that benefite is vniust that is purchased with the hurt of another, so that glorie can not be withe " infamie, that is won with the punishment of men in miserie. Clemencie is as great a vertue as: " tlice, and nature hath lowen in men aswell feeds of pitie & forgiuenesse, as of cruelty & reuenge hath enjoyned Princes about all other creatures, to beare an infinite regard to the dignitie of vi tue. We befeech you with teares, which it may please you to imagine to be mingled with the r " ferable complaints of euery fexe, of euery age, & of euery order that is within this city, to make wretched & desolate state of Vince aan example to all others of the clemecie of the Almain E pire: call to your honorable memories the pitic and magnanimitie of your renowmed elders, w being victorious in Italie, preserved the Cities that were vnited & confederate, many of them cl fing those seats for their proper dwellings, & from thence, to the fingular glory of the Almainta are descended so many noble houses in Italie, as Gonsaguo, Catraro, & Escalo, who somtimes w our Lordes. Let Vincensa serve at one time for example, both that the Venetians ay ded and si ported by vs in our leffer damagers, have cowardly and dishonorably left it abandoned in greatest perils and necessitie of defence that ever could happen: & on the other side that the maines, in whom was some reason to distresse vs, have joyned remission to our offences, and b frankely & glorioully preserued vs whom by due instice they might have put to punishment, ?: punishment of one only is not cruelty, but the calamities of many. That Prince that lookes strily vpon the offences of his people, cannot be called mercifull, but rigorous: & hauing an exam: in the dealing of God with finners, if he looke straitly vpon offendours, who can abide it? We: peale also to you oh inuincible Lord Chaumone, to take vs into your protection: looke backt the example of your king, whose clemencie was greater to them of Millan and Genomay, dray: " into reuolt without necessitie, then was their fault which was both voluntarie and vaine: but a't they had found his elemencic greater then their transgression, & that his pardon prenailing about their offences, he had reclaimed them by fo great a benefite as to give them life, he could never ter finde any fault in their fidelitie and service. Severitie keepes men in obedience, but it is by co pulsion, which is servile: but elemencie winneth the heart & affection, which confirmeth the su tie of the Prince . Oh Prince of Hanaw, if the preservation of Vincensaturne nothing to the p fit of Cafar, at the least it will bring him glory, remaining as a perpetual example of his benigtie. If he destroy it, it can serue him to novse, and the seueritie which he vseth to vs will be giuous to all Italie. Clemencie will make acceptable to all menthe name of Cafar, and as in actics of warre and managing of an armie, he is knowne to have great affinitie with the auncient (4). fo in being easie to pardon where he hath power to punish, his clemencie will make him equal " with Cafar in all those vertues, which have made his name perpetuall to all posterities. Uncer 8 that flourishing and auncient Citie, and heretofore the seate of nobilitie, lyeth now prostratet your teete: she expecteth from you either her preservation or destruction, her life or death: t:e " pitie of fo many innocent persons, so many vnfortunate women, and so many guiltlesse childris who in that lamentable night full of follie and errour, medled with nothing, and now with plais

d waylings expect your deliberation. To pardon many for the offence of one, is the office of a sifull Prince, but to punish many for the fault of one, can not but hold of tyrannie. Consider that is done by force and necessarily brings with it a sufficient reason of excuse. In which regard is kissed one by force and necessarily brings with it a sufficient reason of excuse. In which regard is kissed your knees, & as with the innocencie of the offendours, as with the innocencie of the pronounce at lastly with the lumilitie and submission of this whole afflicted state, we befeech you so on one at last that reuiuing voyce of mereic and elemencie, through the which our wretched stice comming to receiue a new life, shall call you alwayes her right worthy preserves patron.

Such is the obstinacie of a minde once justly injuried, that neither the pitifull phrase of this Oran, northe forowful aspect of the speaker lying prostrate at his feece, and much less the comflio of so wretched a citie, could moderate the mind of the Prince of Hanan, whose selicities manghim insolent, and his authoritic cruell, he could not so much command ouer his passions, as make his wordes lesse cruell then his deedes, making by the mouth of a Doctourthis rigorous dyncomfortable answere.

Thinke not that either the power of your perswasions, or other respect of your dissembled so-,, wes, can suffice to wipe out of memorie the faults you have committed against the maiestie of name of Cafar, without any regard to his greatnesse or dignitie, and lesse respect to the honor, rerein you were received by him: you have by common counsell and consent of the whole Ci-,, , called into your towne the Venetian armie, who forcing the suburbes with great difficultie, di-,, usted to take it, and began to go away: you called them in against the will of the Prince that re-, elented the person of Calar: you constrained that Prince to retire into the Castell, and in the fu-,, of your rebellion have facked the artilleries & munitions of Cafar: you have torne in peeces his uillions displayed in honour of his victories in so many warres and triumphes. These insolencies, ere not done by the fouldiers of the Venetians but the people of Vincensa have defiled their loyie, discouering their violent thirst after the bloud of the Almaines: it was not long of you that ,, Wenetsan armie tooke not Verona, which they had done, if knowing the occasion, they had lowed the victorie: this happened not by the counsell or perswasion of Fracasso, who abused, your flaunders, hath expressed clearely his innocencie: it was an effect of your wicked mindes, it nued by a poyloned impression of harred, which without cause you beare to the Almain name: ,, ur offences are so haynous, as there is no place lest for pardo or merite: the despite of the iniurie, u have done, maketh double the desire of revenge: it was not your errours that made you ofnd, but your wicked inclinations: and therefore to vse clemencie to you, would be both hurt-,, 1 & infamous, for that you would returne to your vomite vpon euery occasion: and the harmes , u haue received, have not bin for a punishment & scourge of your faults, but for that you would ,, stinately perseuer in rebellion. And now that the Venetians have abandoned you, you have no. ner remedie to defend you, but to implore the pitic of Cafar, whom you have betrayed. The ;, ince was determined not to heare you, following the intention and commission of Cafar, and ;, the hath not denied you audience, fatisfying the will of the Lord Chaumont: but he will not,, aunge the sentence, which since the first day of your rebellion hath remained fixed in the minde ,, Cafar: he will not receive you otherwise, then to discretion for your goods, your honours, and ,, our lines : and hope not that he will do that to shew you the more clemencie, but the better,, make you ferue for example of punishment to such as accursedly breake their faith to their soraigne Prince.

The seneritie of this answere did not a little amaze the aggricued people of Vincensa, who seeing to suffer a generall privation of all sence and feeling, beganess soons with a new estate of uses and sorow, to recommend them to the mercy of him in whom they discerned nothing ore ready then a disposition to revege: but being repulsed by the same Doctor, rebuking them the wordes more bitter and sicree then the first, they stood more desperate then before, express by their lookes which they cast upon Monsieur Chaumont, how much they hoped in him, dhow grievously wrought in them the sharpe answers of the Doctour: Chaumont encouraged em to obey necessities, and in giving themselves wholly up to the will of the Prince, to seeke to pease his wrath; he consorted them in the singular humanitie and cuttesse of Casa, in whom cing a Prince of so noble race, and an excellent Captaine, was not to be expected that he would a thing vinworthy of his name and vertue: he willed them not to be capeded with the serie answerethat was made, but say dit served better for their turne that noble and free mindes should sometimes burst out sharpe and byting wordes, for that deliuering by that meane for part of their anger, the rigour of their doings was thereby somewhat the more abated : he offer to do all that he could to moderate the minde of the Prince, so farre forth as they would preue the worst by humbling themselues simply to his discretion: by whose counsell and consideration of their owne necessitie, the poore afflicted Vincent ms falling est some prostrate on the groun referred absolutely both their honours, liues, and Citie to the power of him, in whom they cou yet discerne no hope of mercy. Then Monsieur Chaumont began to solicite for them, declaring the Prince, that in challing them he was to respect more the greatnesse and glory of Ca/ar, th the qualitie of their offence: That he should not let downe such an example to others that were fall into the like faults, least despairing to obtaine mercy, they would become obstinate to the e tremitic:That clemencie had alwayes brought forth to Princes good will, furctie and reputatic where crueltie was the çause of disobedience, distrust, and conspiracie, not taking away (as ma undifcretly beleeve) impediments and difficulties, but rather ferued as working infruments tor double them and make them greater: Lastly he told him that it was worthy the vertue of a not Prince, to for beare to strike when he had power to do it, and not by correction to increase the: fliction of fuch as are fufficiently punished with the remorfe of their proper transgressions; his a thoritie accopanied with the petitios of many others, together with the miferable waylings of t Vincentins, ranged the Prince at last to this moderation, to promise them safetie of life, the dispo tion of all their goods remaining wholly at his wil.: a bootie greater in opinion then in effect 1 that the Citie was left almost no lesse desolate of menthen of goods. The Almanes in this cense of warre searching after pray and spoyle, understood that many of the towns and country were withdrawne with their goods into two caues in a certaine mountaine neare to Vincenfa c led the gutter of Majano, where by the strength of the place, and difficultie to enter, they supp fed to find securitie, or at least to be free fro the furie of the souldiers. Thither went many trout of the Almains to make pillage of the Caues, & being not able after long triall and many harm to force such as were within the great Caue, they went to the lesser, where making a vaine ext rience of their ffrength, they yied at last the meane of fires, and by the benefite of the smoaker ried it, with the loffe of more then a thoufand perfons: Such are the infolencies of fouldiers, when

" no authoritie to bridle their furie, and libertie hath law to ouercome discipline.

Vincenfa being taken in this maner, greater difficulties appeared in other things, carying me respect and importance then was expected in the beginning: for, not onely Maximilian did t ftirre against the Venetians as he had promised, but also the regimets which he had in Italy dimi shed continually for want of pay: in so much as Nonsieur Chaumont was constrained to s himselfe upon the garding of Vincensa, much lesse that he was able to execute any other ent prife, the incertainties of the Emperour standing as great impediments to his valour, & most p iudiciall to the commó fortune of them both Neuerthelesse he determined to go incampe bef Leguaguo, a towne of such speciall regard, that if it were not taken, all that had bene done till t day served to nothing. Theriver of Adice passeth by the town of Leguague, & the lesser part of fame which they call the haue is towards Montagnana, where the Venetians not repoling so mi, in the strength of the towne & valour of the defenders, as in the oportunity & impediments of waters, had cut the riner in one place: and in another portion of the banke where is the grea part of the towne, they had cut it in two places, so as the river comming falling through the trenches, and so spread it selfe by many armes into the lowest places, had so couered the count about, that Itanding drowned for many monethes, it was almost become a marish: it hapned the the rashnesse and disorder of the Venetian bands, partly made these difficulties lessers for, Monsie Chaumont comming to incampe with his armie at Minerua three myles fro Leguaguo, & haui fent before certaine of his horsemen and footmen, who as they would have passed the last arme the water which was within halfe a myle of Leguaguo, they encountred the bands of the footm which kept the ward of Parto, who were issued out to stop them of passage. But the foote bass of the Gascons and Spaniardes rushing resolutely into the water up to the brest, repulsed the and purfued them with fuch valour and furie, that they entred with them pelmell into Porto, ... ry few of the footemen of that place being faued, for that as some were slaine in flying, for greater part that fought into Leguague, were drowned as they would have passed the river of dice . This successe caused Monsieur Chaumont to leavie his campe at Minerna, going the sa lies which the firme bottome of earth did fustaine, he caused the labourers and pioners the same ght to fill vp and choke the trench of the river. And knowing that on that fide to Porto, Leguawas inexpugnable for the largenes of the riner, so great, that scarcely could they fight on that le, (notwith stading betweene Leguaguo & Porto for that it is incompassed with the hils, it is not large as below) he commaunded to prepare a bridge for the artillerie & greatest part of the arie to passe on the other side but finding the boats & barkes which he had caused to be brought other, not to suffice for the largenesse of the river, he incamped neare the river vpo the opposite Leguaguo, making to passe by the benefit of the boats & backes to the other side of Adice, Capine Molard with foure thousand Gascon footenen and fixe peeces of artillerie: assoone as they ere over the river, they began on both fides the river to batter the bastillion which was your the ing of a hill at the point of the towne, on that side aboue; and having battred a great part of it, twithstanding the defendats expressed great office and valour in reenforcing, yet the night follwing, the treaturer of the Venetsan campe, having more feare of his enemie then hope or confience in his owne people, withdrew himfelf fuddely into the castell with certaine Venetian Genmen. Assoone as it was day and their retiring understood, the Captaine of the footemen that Leguague tarded the baltillion, rendred it to Molard, their lives and goods faved, which nevertheleffe was kenty change t observed, for that when he was come our, he and his sootemen were stripped by the souldiers mont. the campe: a licence contrary to the law and reputation of armes. By the example of the bastuln the towne was immediatly put to facke by Captaine Molard, & the bands of footemen who rded another bastillion made on the other point of the towns, fled through the marish, leauing rir armour and weapons in entring the water. Thus Lequaguo by the cowardife of fuch as were thin it, was conquered with a more ready facilitie and speede then either was expected or imared, the cowardile on the one part giving as great oportunity to the victory, as the valour of the her fide. The castell made no greater refistance then the towne, for, the bulwarkes and defences ing executed the day following by the artillerie, & beginning to vndermine one fide of a tower th intention afterwards to give fire to it, they within fearing the perill which yet was but in deinstraction, yeelded themselues with condition that the Gentlemen of Venice remaining in :power of Monsieur Chaumont, the souldiers should depart with a white rod in their hand: tune in this victorie mixed the felicitie of Monsieur Chaumont with some bitter composition, that in that place he had aduertisement of the death of his Vncle the Cardinall Amboyse, whose great authoritie and regiment with the French king, he, having bene already raised high promotions and honours, hoped still to be lifted vp higher, and receive farre greater nauncements: fuch a busie humour is ambition, for that in whom it ruleth, it makes them hard, recontented with things that they have, fince that which they have gotten doth not content, m, so long as they hope to have better: for that the Almains had not then sufficient souldiers to, ue within Leguaguo, Chaumont resupplied their garrison with an hundred Launces & a thoud footenen, and fo giving licence to the Grifons and Valefiens (footenen mercenarie in this lice) he prepared to returne with the refidue of his army to the Duchy of Millan, following the mmandement of the king, who would no more entertaine fo great expences. Of this armie, for t the prouisios on Cafars part answered not the promises that were made, there came no effect mportance (their fortune offring to bring to passe the things that either their policie could not esee, or their valour durst not attempt.) Neuerthelesse the king sent a new commaundement Chaumont to stay yet for the whole moneth of June, for that Cafar, being then come to Tfich no leffe replenished with difficulties according to his custome, then perplexed with plots hopes, made instance that he should not depart, promising from houre to houre that he would seinto Italie. About which time the Almains desiring to recoquer Marostiquo, Citadella, Basno and other peeces thereabouts, to make the descending of Cafar more easie on that side, M. M. Chaumous naumont with his armie encamped at Lungaro vpo the river of Baguillon, to the end to stop the incampeth as netian companies for entring into Vincensa (very weake in garrison) & that they should not op-Lungara leagainst the Almains: but, being there aductised that the Venetias were retired to Padoa, the Imans joyning the felues of new with him, they went to the Torricells upon the high way that Ideth fro Vincensa to Padoa, & fro thence leaving Pudoa on the right had, they marched to Cita-

le with no little discomoditie of victuals, being troubled by the light horseme that were within

Padoa, and much more by fuch as were at Monselice: Citadella yeelded without refistance, 1 whose example also Marotisto, Basciane, with other peeces thereabouts abandoned by the Ven tians, came to composition. In so much as things being dispatched on that side, the armies retu ned to the Torricelli, and leaving Padoa on the right hand, and taking towards the mountaine the left had, they encamped aboue Brenta neare to the mountaine within ten miles of Uncenfait chief reason why they went to that place, was, for that the Almannes defired to occupie Escalo passage very convenient for the regiments that were to come out of Germanie, & a peece that o ly of all other places from Tremsato Vincensa, remained in the hands of the Venetians: from it place the Prince of Hanaw being departed with his Almaines and an hundred French Laune, tooke the way of Escalo, which was xxv. myles from thence: but he could passe no further, for d the pealants and countrey people, bearing an incredible affection to the Venerians; and fuch being prisoners stucke not to offer their bodies to torments and death rather then to denie the or to speake ill of them, had taken many passages in the mountaine. And after he had obtained composition New-castell which is also a passage of the mountaine, he returned to the incampi place about Brento, having fent by another way towardes Escalo, many of his footemen, w according to his direction for looke the way of Basciano, to auoyd Conolo which is a flrong p fage in the mountaines there, and taking the tower more low by the way of Feliro, they foun very few people within Feliro, which they facked and burned, and so tooke the way to Elea which, with the passage of Courle, they found abandoned. About that time also the ruines w nothing leffe in the countrey of Frial, for that being sometimes assailed by the Venetians, Sometimes invaded by the Almaines, now defended and effloones pillaged by the Gentlen of the countrey, this day aduauncing, and that day declining according to occasions and tin there was seene in every place nothing more then dead carcasses of men:townes sacked, and trefles burned. And as the calamities that a war draweth with it be infinite, so it hapned oftention that the places which had bene first tacked by one armie, was estsoones burned by the other; except certaine strong peeces, all the residue of the countrey put to miserable destruction. But cause in those actions there was nothing done worthy of memory, it would be no lesse super ous to recount the patricularities, then troublesome to understand so many variable revoluti which brought forth no effect importing the substance of the warre. The time now approching that the French armie should depart there was made this new c and the French uention betweene Cafar and the French king, that his armie should yet continue for the mor following, with couenant that the extraordinary expences fuch as ranne ouer and about the p. of the bands which the king had defrayed till that time, should be payed hereafter by Cefar gether with the regiments of the footemen for that moneth . But because Cefar was not in prouided of money, the rate and fumme should be set downe of those expences, and the kin make it up by way of loane to the fumme of fiftie thousand duckets: which if Casar did not to within one yeare following, together with the other fiftie thouland which were lent him bet the king should resume into his hands Verona with all the territories, and keepe it possessed to were fatisfied. Chaumont having the kings commandement to follow still those warres, tust all his wits and deuiles to take Monselice, in which disposition assoone as source hundred Sp. Launces led by the Duke of Terminy were arrived, who, being fent by the king Catholike to the fuccours of Maximulian, had according to their cultome marched very flowly. The armies in they had passed the river of Brento, and afterwardes the river of Baguillon at the village of Pl within five myles of Padoa, arrived at Mon/elice, not without suffering a woderfull scarcitie c Etuals and forrages by the incursions of horsementhat were within Padon & Monselice, who fices those domages, tooke S. Benzone de Cremo, a Captaine for the French being gone with: rie slender strength of horsemen to view the scoutes: this Captaine, for that he was the Author

then a fouldier of the enemies, caused him to be executed presently.

In the towne of Monselice which standeth in the plaine, is a rising as it were a stonic hill, or that reason it is called Asonselice) which is very high, in the top whereof is a castell & at the b ke of that hill which goeth alwayes leffening, be three wasts of wals, the lowest wherof embrace for much space, that it wel needeth two thousand me to defend it against a whole army. first waste, and after they had well battered it in many places, the footmen of the Gascons & aniards began to approch the wall in disorder, striuing to enter by many breaches: there were thin for the defence of it 700 men, who supposing it had bin an assault appointed & ordered, d fecing their disability to make refistance if the assault had bene followed in sundrie places, afthey had made a small defence, began to retire according to an agreement made amongst the ues before, as was beleeved: but they made their retrait in fuch diforder, that the enemy that gan but now to enter, entertaining with them the skirmish and chase, entred pel mel with them he other two wasts and so to the Castell: there the greatest part of them were slaine, and the idue which were withdrawne to the dungeon, offering to yeeld vpon furety of life, were not epted by the Almaines, whole furie joyned to their fortune, led them at last to put fire in the ngeon: To as of 700 footemen the executioners referred veriefew, euerie one bearing leffe npassion to their calamities for the cowardise they shewed in their owne defence. There were ongst them five Constables & Marshals, whereof Martin de Bourg of Tuskane was the prinall, who being parties in the confusion, they found severallie the particular fortune: the cruelof the Almanes was shewed nothing lesse against the buildings and wals, for not having suffint companies to gard them, they did not onely difmantell the fortreffe of Monselice, but also fumed the towne with fire, holding nothing vnlawful which was within the compaffe of their e to accomplish: after this journey, those armies did nothing of importance, sauing that 400 nch lances run vp to the gates of Padoa, rather declaring their good wil, then doing any actio rthy fo great valour. About this time the Duke of Ferrara departed from the campe, & M. aftillon with him, whom Chaumont fent with 250 launces for the gard of Ferrara where the ple liued in great suspition, for that the bands of the Pope were not farre from thence: the Alnes perswaded much M. Chaumont (vrging the treatie that was made betweene them ne) to go incampe before Trensa, laying afore him that the actions which had bene done h lo great expences were of litle importance, if Trensa were not taken: for, touching Padoa, e was no hope to be able to haue it: of the contrarie, Chaumont replied that Cafar was not tended against the Venetians with such forces as he had promifed, as also such as were joyned is armie were reduced to a very small number: that within Trenisa, where the Venetians had le verie great fortifications, there were strong companies of fouldiers: lastly, he alleaged that (tore of victuals was wome out of the country, and no leffe the difficultie to bring prouifion he campe from far places, for the continuall vexation of the light horfmen and stradiots of the retians, who being aductifed by the diligent espiall of the countrymen of every litle moving they made, and being befides in great number, discouered themselues alwaies in cuery place rethey thought they might endomage them: these disputations ceased by a new commanient that came from the French King to Chaumont, that leaving in the armie of the Almaines e hundred launces & fifteene hundred Spanish footmen of the kings pay, besides those that e in garifon in Leguaguo, he should sodainly returne with his army to the Duchy of Millan: hat many troubles and dangers began to disclose by meane of the Pope: by reason whereof . Chaumont leaving the government of those companies to M. Persi, followed the kings imandement: and the Almaines distrusting to be able to do aine thing of importance, put nselues into Loniguo.

The Pope had of long time let downe in his mind an oblimate resolution not only to reposses The Popes des. Church of many estates, which he pretended to appertaine to him, but also to chase the Frech liberation to gout of al that he held in Italy. The matter that induced this disposition, was either a secret & French out of ient ill will that he bare him, or else a settled suspition and lealousie which he had nourished a Isalie, g time, and now was converted into extreame hatred: or haply it might be an ambition of ricto be the deliuerer (as he boafted afterwards) of Italy fromforraine nations; to these ends had absolued the Venetians of the Church Censures: to these ends was he entred into intellince & strait alliance with the Swiffers, making semblance to proceed in those things more for proper furetie, then for defire to offend another: & to these ends not being able to withdraw Duke of Ferrara from the deuotion of the French king, he was determined to do all that he ald to occupie that Duchie, blazing his deuises with this colour, that he stirred onely for the rel of the falt and falt pits: & yet to the end not to difclose the plainnesse of his thoughts vntill were better prepared, he had continuall negociations with Albert Pio, to have agreement with the French king, not sparing to protest openly, though he kept his intentions dissembled the king for his part interpreting all his discontentment to come for that he had taken the Dul of Ferrara into his protection, and having a careful defire to avoide his ill will, consented to con tract with him new couenants, referring himselfe to the capitulations of Cambray, wherein w. expressed that not one of the cofederats shold intrude into the things appertaining to the churc & did infert withall fuch words & clauses as might make it lawful to the Pope to proceed again the Duke of Ferrara so farre forth as concerned the particularity of the salt & salt mines, to whi ends the king supposed that the Popes thoughts did chieslie aspire: wherein he made such inte pretation of the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, as though there was le to him a lawfull liberrie to contract with the Pope in that maner: but the nearer the king appr ched to the demaunds of the Pope, the further was he estranged and separate from him, inc ning nothing the more for the newes he heard of the death of Cardinall Ambosse: for, to such perswaded him to the peace, and tooke their argument vpon this, that his suspitions were no finished, he answered that the same king living, the same icalousies did yet cudure; consismi his opinion by this, that the accord made by the Cardinall of Pauia had bene violated by the ki of his proper deliberation, contrarie to the will and counsell of the Cardinall Amboise: yea su as looked deepely into the intentions of the Pope and his manner of dealings, found that hisf macke and hopes were formuch the more increased, and not without occasion; for the quality of the king being such, as he stood in more necessity to be governed, the that he was able or pr per to gouerne, it is without doubt that he was much weakened by the death of the Cardin fince that besides his long experience, his abilitie of wit was great, & stood withall in such gr and authority with the king, and had fuch power ouer his directions and counfels, that he wo oftenrimes take vpon him to give of himself a forme & resolutio of affaires: a matter which co not be found in fuch as fucceeded him in the government, who durft not communicate with king in affaires which they thought would displease him, much lesse that they had authoritie deliberate: besides, reposed not the same faith and confidence in their counsels, and being a die of a counsell compounded vpon many persons, and they respecting one another without great trust in their new authoritie, they proceeded both more coldly and carelesly then either importance of the present affaires required, or was necessarie against the heat and importunit the Pope: who not accepting any of the offers that were made to him by the king, required at last to renounce, not with condition and limitation, but absolutely and simply, the protect which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, not weighing to aduance his owne purpofes v the kings dishonour: and albeit the king perswaded him much that such a renunciation we bring him great infamie, yet was it in vaine to labour to flay him with words and reasons, who ambitions were infinite and his intentions full of malice, with which propertie of mind he and red the king, that feeing he refuled to renounce fimply, he would also take libertie not to c. tract with him, nor yet to be against him, and not binding himselfe to any person, he would die to maintaine the state of the Church in peace, beginning euen then to complaine more! euer of the Duke of Ferrara: whose friends weighing wisely with what adversarie he have do, perswaded him to give over the working and making of salt, which hee answered head not do without prejudicing the rights of the Empire to whom the just jurisdiction of Com. o appertained. Many entred into a certaine doubt & opinion which tooke increasing with it. that Albert Pio the French kings Embassadour, not proceeding sincerely in his legat, stirred up the Pope against the Duke of Ferrara, for a burning desire hee had (wherein to continued till his death) that Alfonso should be deposed from the Dukedome of Ferrara: reason was, for that Hercules, father of Alfonso, having had certaine yeares afore of Gil 12 Pio the moity of the dominion of Carpy, giving him in recompence the borough of Sa, la with certaine other landes, Albert feared least in the end the other moity either by complfion or corruption would devolue to him: the experience often happening that the ne 3bour lesse rich and able yeeldeth to the couctousnesse of the most wealthie and mighty: 21 to "ter which in all common weales hath bene seene to minister no small troubles, and therefore " hath not bene thought good that the poore and rich should dwell neare together, for that in er the wealth of the rich manare sowne the seeds of enuy in the mind of the poore man, so other

out whatfocuer was the simplicitie and truth of it, the Pope expressing tokens of a person vnppeafable against Alfonso, and having a full resolution to leavie warre against him, prepaed first to proceed with the authoritie and censures of the Church: wherin seeking to give some istification to the grounds of this action, he gaue it out, that he had found among the Records fthe chamber Apostolike, the inuestiture of the towne of Comacho, given by Popes to the ouse of Este. These were the publike and manifest behaviours of the Pope, but in secret he blicited to fer abroach farre greater monings, wherein he feemed to have given a good foundaon to his affaires, in contracting amirie with the Swiffers, and to have at his devotion the Veneians, who now were you their feet. Besides, he saw that the king of Aragon respected the ime end that he did, or at least was not foundly loyned with the French King: that the forces nd authoritie of Cefar were so weakened that there was left no occasion to seare him: and last-, that he was not without hopes to procure the king of England to stirre. But that which shold iost haue appealed him, he made to serue most to stirre vp and kindle his stomacke, which was ne knowledge he had that the French king having no disposition to make warre against the hurch, nourifhed a fetled defire to have peace; infomuch as it feemed that it would alwayes maine in his power to draw him to peace, yea though he had leauied armes against him. The afon of these matters making him rise dayly more insolent, and redoubling openly his comaints and threats against the French king, and Duke of Ferrara, he refused in the feath of the cebration of S. Peter (a day wherein, according to ancient cultome, are offered the tributes hich are due to the seege Apostolike) to accept the tribute of the Duke of Ferrara; saying that e euasion of Alexander the fixt, who in marying his daughter, had from soure thousand Ducets, reduced that offering to a hundred, could not take example to the prejudice of that Sea. Bedes, he would not afore this time give licence to the Cardinall of Achx and other French Carnalsto returne into Fraunce: and understanding that day, that the Cardinall of Achie was me to take the pleasure of the fields with certaine grayhounds, he entred into a vaine suspitithat he would fecretly start away, and therefore fent speedily after to take him, and held him isoner in the Castle S. Ange. Thus disclosing openly his manifest contention with the French ng, and for that caule feeing himfelfe fo much the more constrained to lay great and afford undations, he graunted to the king Catholike the inuelliture of the kingdome of A aples, under ondition of the same tribute, with the which the kings of Aragon had obtained it, not withinding he had refused afore to bestow it otherwise then for forty thousand duckets: a rate afore ne imposed ypon the French whe he obtained it in this action the Pope respected not so much e bond which in other inuclitures of the fame kingdome, was wont to be made to him to terraine cuerie yeare for him, as often as need required, three hundred men at armes for the fence of the Church: as the defire he had to make him his friend, joyned to a hope that his aides pon occasion) might do much to leade him into open contention with the French king: wherwere already discerned certaine seedes and beginnings, for that the king Catholike sufpecting uch the greatnesse of the French, and no lesse icalous of his ambition, for that not content with elimits of the league of Cambray, he aspired to draw to his obedience the citie of Verona, d besides all this, being pushed on by the memorie of ancient quarels, desired greatly that ere might be found some impediment in his affaires: and therefore ceased not to counsell a ace betweene Cafar and the Venetians, which was not a litle defired by the Pope : and albere proceeded fecretly in those actions, yet he was not able altogether to couer his thoughts : in much as his armie by fea being falne vpon Sicilie, which he fent to affaile the Ile of Gerbes (an nd anciently called by the Latines the great Sirta) the king was entred into suspition, and the nds of men that were wel acquainted with his futtletics, were occupied with many doubts. But as in worldly dealings it ofte hapneth that the thing that is feared least, doth soonest chace, d hurteth most; so troubles and perplexities began to rise to the French king from those parts nich he doubted least, and in a time wherein he had no expectation of any mouning of armes to : prepared against him: for the Pope, betweene whose suttlety and secrecie there was no diffence, working alwayes under hand, folicited that at one time Genes might be affailed both by a and land: that twelve thousand Swiffers might descend upon the Duchie of Millan: that e Venetians should take the field to recour their townes holden by (efar: and that his owne rmie shold enter ypo the country of Ferrara, with intetion to passe afterwards into the Duchy of Millan, if things began to fucceed happily to the Swiffers : he hoped that Genes being affait ypon the fodaine, there wold eafily arise some mutation or mutinie, both for that there were nnie that bare no found affection to the French, and also that the faction of Fregosa would mister aide, going thither under colour to make Duke, Ollaman, whose father and uncle had pifessed the same dignitie: that the French men amazed for the commotion of Genes and inual a of the Swiffers, would revoke to the Duchie of Millan, all the bands which they had with Cer, and the Duke of Ferrara, which would be a cause that the Venetians should easily recouer)rona, and afterwards fer you the Duchie of Millan: lastly, that his regiments should do the le after they had made an easy coquest of Ferrara, being abandoned of the French, making a judment vpon these computations, that the estate of Millan would have no abilitie of descine. gainst lo many enemies, and so sodaine a warre: he began at one time the warre against Irara and against Genes: and albeit the Duke of Ferrara (against whom he proceeded the me to hallen the execution as against a notorious offender) offered to give him the faltes that we made at Comacho, with obligation that hereafter there should be no more made : yet (nother can satisfie a mind possessed with malice) after he had licensed his Embassadors, he caused his mie to march against him, which with the only summons of a trumpet, and no defence app. ring, obtained Cente and Pieua; which boroughs appertaining first to the Bishopricke of :lognia, Pope Alexander in marying his daughter, had annexed them to the Duchie of Ferres, recompensing the Bishopricke with other revenues. Against Genes were sent II Gallies of the Venetians guided by Grillo Conterin, and one speciall Gallie of the Popes, carying Offacian 1: gola, leronimo Dorea, with many other of the banished men of that cltate: and by land at the fame time, and for the fame expedition was difpatched M. Anth. Colonno with a hundred in at armes, and seuen hundred footmen: this Captaine having left the pay of the Florentines, it being entertained by the Pope, abode vpon the territories of Lucqua vnder colour to furnish in band, giving out a brute that he was afterwards to go to Bolognia: & albeit M. Chaumon 1tred into some suspition of Genes by reason of his abiding, yet not knowing that the armie by a was to come, & the Pope spreading a futtle and diffembling brute that the preparations of a Smillers and houering of M. Anth. were to execute some surprise upon Ferrara, Cir. mont made no other provision for Genes then a certaine small crue of sootemen whom he m

> Marke Anth. marched with his copanies vp to the vale of Visagna within a mile of the was Genes, not with flanding he was not received (according to the Popes hopes) either into Ser. # na or into the towne of Specia: & at the fame time the armie by fea which had occupied Sej in and Chianara, was come from Rapalo to the mouth of the river Entelle, which falleth to the sea neare the port of Genes: but there were entred into Genes for the French king at the ril brute that the enemies approched, the fons of lo. Lowys de Fie/quo with 800 men of the cor my with whom was joyned the Cardinals nephew of Finalo with an equal proportion of foulers which both affured the towne, & kept suppressed all stirres & commotions : by this succou no prouidence, the Pope & the exiles being deceined of their principall hope, feeing befides a cui nuall flocking & concourse of people out of Lombardy and the river of Ponant, together wi for great Gallies entring the hauen giuided by Pressan, they thought that to tarie longer there cale not bring more perill then profit: & therefore both the nauie by sea, and the armie by lands un ned to Repalle, where in affaying to take Portofino, died Francisco Bolani, a Patron of one the Venetian Gallies: from thence their armie by fea hoysling faile to go to Cinitanechia, M. . wh Colonno doubting his suretie to passe by land for the commotions of the countrey men an 10 pular furie alwayes raging against fouldiers that retire in disfauour, imbarked himfelfe in the lies with 60 of the best horsmen, sending the residue by land to Spetia, who were all stript a e vpon the countrey of Genes, as vpon the marches of Lucqua, and frontiers of the Florentine hi attempt was done with verie small honour to Grello and Octaman, for that of feare they abay ned to charge the vessels of Preian, who being inserior, it was beleeved that before he entre the hauen they wold haue fet vpon him with a great aduantage: affoone as they had weyed an it gone, Presan issued out of the hauen with 7 Gallies and 4 ships, taking his course to purse the Venetian nauie which was stronger then he in Gallies, but weaker in number of ships: bo the one & other fel with the Ile of Elbo, the Venetians in the port of Lugano, & the Frech in the all of Ferrat, who returned effloones to Genes after they had accoasted the enimie to the Mount Argentaro. About this time the Popes fouldiours were entred into Romania under the Duke of rbyn against the Duke of Ferrara, where having taken the towne of Lugo, Vaguacaval, and Il the residue that the Duke held on this side Pan, they held the castell of Lugo besieged : and whilest they lay there both in disorder and without effect, being suddenly advertised that the Duke of Ferrara with the French bands, and a hundred and fiftie men at armes of his own, with nany troupes of lighthorsemen, was marching to the reskewe of it, they leavied their fiege, nd leaving in pray to the enemie three pieces of artilletie, they retired to Ymola, nothing being ble to affure them whom feare had compelled to flee. Alfonfo taking the aduantage of this ocafion, recourred with a wonderfull facilitie all that they had taken from him in Romania: but he campe Ecclefiassike being estsoones reassembled & reassured, reconquered estsoones the selfe ame places, and immediately after forced the castle of Lugo having battred it many dayes: and fter the taking of it, their fortune presented to them an occasion of greater successe : for, being o garrison in Modona, for that the Duke being occupied in defending other places where the aunger was nearest, was not able to refurnish it of him felfe nor obtaine of Monsieur, Chansome to fend thither two hundred lances. The Cardinal of Panya passing with the army to Frank aftell, obtained by composition that citie, whither he was inuited to come by Gerard and ranneis Maria Rargons gentlemen of Modona, whose authoritie was so great, as they were ole to dispose of it as best liked them. And in this action it was beleeved that they were pushed n more by ambition & defire of innovation, then by any other occasion. The losse of Aladona ras a warning to the Duke against other harmes, who fearing least the like wold happe to Regge, chowed present garison there, as also Chaumont, doing after the hurt received that which rould have profited more in the beginning, fent thither two hundred launces, not with standing e had many impediments for the discending of the Smy flers.

The confederation betweene the French king & the Swysfers, was determined many moneths The describing core, the king continuing his resolution not to augment their pensions, corrary to the counsell of the Swysfers fall his Nobles, who aduited him to consider of what importance it would be to make those to the Duchie mies his enemies, with the which he had before atchieued his greatest fortunes; and they already of only than.

rawn into armes under the authority of the Popes promifes, but specially made angry with the ings obstinacy in denying their demaunds, were resolved by an universall consent of the Comunalties in an affembly holden at Lucerna, to conspire against him: but Mounsieur Chaumont oking into the perill of these leavies and stirs, set good gard vpon the passages towardes Coma, oke away from the rivers all boates & barkes, withdrew into places of strength all victuals & couifions, and lastly cut from the milles their instruments to grinde by, leaving nothing that light be imployed to the feruice of the enimie, but the rivers and land which he could not moue. And being vicertaine, whether the Swyffers would make their descending vpon ie Duchie of Myllan, or else passing the Mount S. Barnard, to enter into Pyemont by the vale Augusto, and so go to Sanona, with intention to endomage Genes, or elsfrom thence passing ie Appenin, to make inuations upon the Duke of Ferrara: he had also induced the Duke of and to denie them passage, and for their more impediment, he sent with his consent five indred launces to Yurea, not ceasing neuerthelesse to do all that he could to corrupt with esents and promises the chiefe commaunders of that Nation, to draw them from their rising, olding it but inst to object practise against them, in whome was so great lightnesse to stirre son so small occasion. But invaine did he labout and solicite those communalties, whose indes did not retaine any thing more willingly then the memorie of the kings deniall, beggrowne from an hatred to a violent defire to be reuenged of the French nation : in so such as the Commons (thinking it to be their proper cause) notwithstanding the difficules that were in the Pope to fend them money, for that the Fookers bankers of Germany, ho had promifed to defray it for him, shrunke backe for feare to offend Cafar, sixe thousand of nem leavied by the Pope entred really into the action in the beginning of September: arongst whome were foure hundred horsemen, halfe armed with shot, two thousand fine hunred footemen with halfaques, and fiftie harquebusiers, without artillerie or other provision fondges or vessels. In this furniture, they marched, turning to the way of Belinsone, and taing the bridge of Trefa, with a garison of fine hundred French footeniensest abandoned, they incamped at Varefa, expecting there (as they faid) the Bishop of Sion with new companies Albeit these beginnings troubled much the mindes of the French, both for an ordinatie fear they had of the Swyffers, and also perticularly respecting their owne weakenesse, having at tha time in Millan a verie finall number of men at armes, for that part of them were diltributed for the gard of Bressa, Leguaguo, Valegge & Pesquiero, 3 hundred launces sent to the suc cors of the Duke of Ferrara, & 5 hundred being joyned with the armie of Aimains against the Venetians : yet Monsieur Chaumont assembling his forces, & expressing his valour euen ami his hard fortune, marched with 5 hundred launces and 4 thousand footemen, & tooke the plain of Chaftellon within two miles of Varefa, having fent to the Mount of Brianfa lob. la. Triunta to the end that not fo much with the bads which he brought with him, which were in very fina number, as with the fauour and further strength of the men of the countrey, he might be an ir pediment to the Svey fers for taking that way . The Svey fers afloone as they were arrived: Varefa, sent to demaund passage of Monsieur Chaumont, saying they would go to the service the Church: by reason whereof it was doubted that they would passe to Ferrara, either by the Duchie of Myllan, by which way, befides the impediments of the french companies, they from have found difficultie to have passed the rivers of Pary & Oglia: or els by taking the left han and coasting by the hilles below Coma and Lecqua, and passing the river of Aada which the is narrow and not rough, from whence they might have bene guided by the hill of the ecuntre of Bergamo and Bressia to the river of Oglio: and having passed over there, they might have d cended either by the countrey of Bressa or by Guiaradada vpo the marches of Manina, whi is a countrey large & beareth no places of force to have refifted them. So great was the reput tion of the valour and order of that nation, that in all events Monfieur Chaumon had no inte tion to set ypon them, although they made their discending into the plaine, but with his hor men & footemen joyned together, and with his field peeces, to accoast and hourr vpon them cut off their victuals, and to give them as many impediments as he could without affaying t fortune to passe the rivers: and in the meane while, for that the places neare Varesa were w furnished with horsemen and footemen, he visited them often times with false alarums, keepi them in breath all the night. At Varefa, where the Svoyffers fuffered great want of victure a new fupply of foure thousand came and joyned with them, and the fourth day after their ming, they marched altogether towards Chaftellon, keeping vpon the left hand aler g the hill marching alwaies in cloase ranke, in good order, more respecting to match in saletic ther make speede: They were in enery squadron source skore or an hundred, the last ranks being halfaques and harquebufiers: Their observation was such in marching, that much lesses the enemie could avoid them by any advauntage, but of the contrarie they made a valiant fence against the French armie, which alwaies accoasted them, and put them to the skirn both behind and before, yea, fometimes they would draw out of their squadrons an hund or fiftie to entertaine the skirmish, fometimes aduauncing, fometimes staying, fometimes tyring, not that there could be differred in their doings the least difforder: They thought it dishonor to retyre, when by giving of place they might profit themselves and endaunger enemie. In this order they arrived the first day at the passage of the bridge of Vedan, which v garded by Captaine Molard with certaine Gascoigne footemen, who being driven backe w the shot of their halfaques, they lodged the same night at Appyana eight miles from V arefa Chaumont encamped within Affaren towards the hil of Briansa fixe miles fro Appiana. The following, they drew along the hils, towards Cantu, Chaumont accoasting the alwaies with : launces, for that by the sharpnesse or steepenes of the places, the artilleries remained more love together with the footmethat garded the: and yet in the halfway either for the domages who the french had given the that day (wherof Chaumont made not a litle glorie) or for that fuch vs their resolution, leaving the way of Cantu, and turning more on the left hand, they wenterring by the high places towards Coma, encamping for that night in a suburbe of that citie, 24 in the villages thereabout : from the suburbe of Coma, they made another lodging at Chi o three miles more forward, keeping the French men in doubt whether they would returne to ?-Infone by the vallie of Lungaro, or draw towards the river of Adda; where, albeit they were st furnished with bridges, yet many supposed that their valour would ope thema way to passe > ceffitie making them to yfe plankes in steed of bridges. But putting them out of doubt the my ollowing, they went and harboured at the bridge of Trese, and from thence retired by troupes no their houses, being reduced into the vttermost extremitie of victuals and want of money: was beleeved that this retraite fo suddeine was done for want of money, for the difficulties to affe the rivers, but much more for the necessitie of victuals, impediments of great importance b hinder both the fortune, the valour, and felicitie of an armie. In this fort the French men vere deliucred for this time of a daunger which they esteemed not litle, not withstanding the ing making those things greater then they were in deede, affirmed that he could not but hold profitable for his affaires to fuffer them to passe, making this question, whether of these two hings would make the Pope more weake, either to be without fouldiours, or to have an armie hat came to offend him, as did the Smyffers, whome, with so many forces and so much treasure, chad had all the paine in the world to manage.

The perill of the French had beene farre greater, if at one time they had beene affailed in The Pentinany places, according to the deuises of the Pope. But as the enterprise of Genes was afore ans recover ne mouing of the Swyffers, so the armie of the Venetians advanced not so soone as was deter-most partof ined, notwithstanding they had a singular occasion and commoditie, for that the Almaine their townes ands within Vincen/a, with whome were the Spanish footenien, and the 500 French launces, after the deeing much diminished since the departure of Monsieur Chaumont, the Venetians issuing paringef at of Padoa, recovered without great travell Este, Monselice, Montagnano, Marestico, and 'asciana: and ioyning valour to their fortune they passed further, and taking aduantage of the tyring of the Almains drawing the way of Verona, they entred into Vincensa which they had oondoned: except Leguaguo, they reconquered with this feliciticall those pieces which with great expenses and trauell of the French men, they had lost in the whole sommer: and so they une to S. Martin fine miles from Verona, into which city the enemies retired, their retraite it being without daunger by the doubtfull valour of Luke Malnezzo: who being then eir Generall, for that lo. P. Baillon had left their pay, shewed a courage inferior to the putation of the place which he held : for, the Venetians being come to the village of owre, the enemies leaving great provision of victuals in their lodgings, tooke the way to erona, being followed with the whole Venetian armie, and continually suffering by their tht horsemen: and yet the French sustaining valiantly the rearegard chiefly with their shor, ey passed the river of Appan, and marched without daunger to New towne, the Venetians camping within halfe a mile of them: who forbearing to followe the day after, with that ligence they did before, for that their footemen were not able to hold chase with the refemen, they retired in safetie to Verona: from S. Martin, after they had remained there rtaine dayes, approching neare Verona, not without being blamed for the vnprofitable stay ey had made, they began to employtheir artilleries (which they had planted upon the oer mountaine) against the castell of S. Felix and the next wall : perhaps they made choice of at place for the difficultie to berefortified, and that the horsemen could not execute but ith great discommodities.

The Venetian armic contained eight hundred men at armes, three thousand light horse-verona beste. en, the most part estradiors, and ten thousand sootemen with a great trayne and quanti-ged by the of paylants that followed: and within Verona were three hundred Spanish launces Venetians, e hundred launces of Almaines and Italians, and foure hundred French launces, fiue undred footemen paied by the king, and foure thousand Almaines, no longer under the siding of the Prince of Hanaw, who was dead certaine dayes afore. The people and inbitants of Verona, verie ill disposed to the Almaines, were vp with their weapons in eir hands : a matter wherein the Venetians had much hoped, whose light horsemen passing the same time the river of Adice at a foard under Verona, runne over the whole countrey. ne attilleries of the Venetians battred the wall in great furie, notwithstanding the artillerie anted within by the French, and couered with defences, did greatly distresse those that ere without, who had no rampiers: Lactance Bergame, a Colonell of the greatest account viththe Venetians, was striken with a shot of the artillerie, of which he died within few daies. fter. At last the artillerie without having done a wonderfull execution and dismantled a great are of the wall, euen to the beginning of the skarpe, and so dismounted and broken their cannons that the artillerie within was of little service, the Almaines were not without search lose the Castell notwithstanding it was well tampired. To which losse, to the end the losing the citie were not loyned, they determined in cases of necessities to retyre to certaine rampie which they had made in a place neare, to beat upon the fodaine with their Cannons, which they had already planted, the face of the inner part of the Castell, hoping to make such an ope ning, that the enemies should finde small safetie to tary there. But the valour of those th were within, was farre about the vertue of the other, forthat in the Venetian armie were no ther bandes of footemen then Italians, who being ordinarily payed enery fortie dayes, follows that service more, for that they found in other places very slender preferment, then for any oth reason, Besides, the Italian sootemen not accustomed to the order of seruice, beyond the Mountes, neither affured in holdes, nor resolute in the field, were at that time almost rejected euery one that had meanes to furnish their seruice with sootemen straungers, specially wi Swyffers, Almaines and Spaniards. Therefore the towne being defended with a greater valo then it was affaulted, there iffued out one night about eighteene hundred fooremen with a taine French horsemen to charge the artillerie, and the sootementhat garded it beeing eas put to flight, they choaked two great pieces, striuing to draw them into the towne. The Al rum was fodainly through all the campe, when Zitolo Perouso bringing a reskew of for men, and making haste more then others to the misfortune that attended him, in fighting ve antly finished his life with great glorie. But Denis de Naldo comming on with the greater p of the armie, the enemie was compelled to reabandon the artillerie and retyre, not withfit ding with great praise, for that in the beginning they brake the garde that defended the artil rie, and after made flaughter of a great part of fuch as came first to the reskew, and last retyred almost all in safetic. This accident brought great discouragement to the Venetian Ci taines, who feeing the inhabitants made no mutinie, and judging withal, that their abiding th would be no lesse vnprofitable then full of perill for the ill suretie of their campe (their foo men being lodged in the mountaine, and their horfemen in the valley) they determined retire to their olde lodging at S. Martin, wherein they made so much the more speed, by h much they vindetstood that Monsieur Chaumont would come to the reskew of the towne, uing already auoyded the perill of the Sniffers. At fuch time as the campe leavied and brake the foragers of Verona accompanied with a great strength, entred the valley of Poliente in ning to the mountaine of S. Felix: but many light horsemen of the Venetians being sent for reskew, and leasing first of the entrie of the valley, put them all to the sword, or to thes tune of prisoners. From S. Martin the Venetian armie drew to S. Boniface, being fearefull of comming of Mounsieur Chaumont. About this time the garison within Trenisa tooke composition the towne of Asola neare the river Musone, wherein were eight hundred. maine footemen: the castell also suffring the same fortune. And in the countrey of Frint, the proceeded with the same variations and cruelties accustomed, not seeming to make warre vi enimies, but profecuting on all partes the extreme destruction of buildings, places, and wh countreys. The like calamities also consumed Isiria, the libertie of the warre making al thin lawfull to the furie of the fouldiers, whose infolencies left no other comfort to any fortes of preple, then fuch as may be expected in an unbridled furie of warre. About this time the Marquis of Mantua was deliuered out of prison by a strange of

Marquis of Mantua ofcapeth out of prison. About this time the Marquis of Manna was deliuered out of prison by a strange of underpractifed by the Pope, whereunto he was induced by an auncient affection which is bare to him before, ioyned to a desire to serue his turne of him, and the commodite of estate, in the warre against the French king. It was spread throughout all Italie, that these respects he was the worker of his deliuerie, and set him at libertie: but it was credit knowne by an Author worthie of saith, and through whose hands at that time passed the whose government of the estate of Manna, that his libertie was wrought by an other meane. The was great doubt least the Venetians, either for the hate they bare him, or for the suspicion they had of him, would not hold him a perpetuall prisoner: and therefore after there I been evsed in vaine manie trials and remedies, it was determined in the Councell of Mana, to have recourse to Baiazet Prince of the Turkes, whose amitie the Marquis had entained manie yeares, by visiting him oftentimes with manie presents and other offices s

good will and honour. Affoone as he understood the calamitie of the Marquis, he fent for the Gouernour of the Venetian Marchaunts lying at Constantinople, and commaunded him to make im promife that the Marquis should be delivered . The Governour answered, that it was not easonable he should promife that which was not in his power to performe, onely he offered to vrite to the state of I'enice, who he doubted not would set downe a resolution conformable to his defire. But Banazet speaking in the person and authoritic of a tyrant, replied proudly, that it was his will that he should make an absolute promise, whereunto he was constrained to condisend, obeying the will of the tyrant as a law forced and vnrighteous, which he figuified with expedition to the state of Venice, who considering that it was not now time to stirre up so mighie a Prince, determined to fet him at libertie. But he, to hide his dishonour, and to reape some ruite of his deuife, inclined to the defire of the Pope, by whose meane being concluded (but seretly) that to affure the Venetias that the Marquis should not move against them, his eldest sonne hould be put into the Popes hands. The Marquis was conneyed to Bolognia, where after he had eliuered ouer his sonne to the Agents of the Pope, he went to Mantua, excusing himselfe both o Cafar and the French king by the necessitie he had to go redresse his owne estate, that he visied not their armies to do them feruice, as freeholder to the one and fouldier to the other (the rench king holding him alwayes in the number of his Penfioners) not with (landing his intention ideede was to remaine a newter.

The ill successe of things no lesse rashly attempted then vainely prosecuted, had nothing di- The Pope dea inifined the hopes of the Pope, who promiting himselfe more then ever of the mutations of tommeth to enes, determined to assayle it of new: by reason whereof the Venetians following him more affaile Genes. y necessitie, then that they allowed of his furious dealing, augmented their Nauie which was : Cimta Vecchio by foure great thips, to the which after the Pope had joyned one of his Gaaffes with other veffels, and perfwading that by the publication and authoritie of his name, the enomages would be the more easie induced to rebell, he gave publike benediction to his baners with ceremonies Pontificall, as though in that maner of celebration were power either to orke effect to his intentions, or to make better his fortune. It was maruelled that now that sthoughts were made manifest and discourred, and that within Genes were many fouldiers, ada strong Nauie within the hauen, how he could hope to obtaine that which he was not able winne when the hauen was difarmed, the garrifon verie weake within the Citie, and when ere was no doubt at all of him. But as nothing can fatisfie the ambition of man, fo the minde at hath malice mixed with the defire of glorie, is alwayes made more apt to hope for honour, nen able to get it. To the armies at sea which were followed with the banished faction, and ,, with the Bilhop of Genes sonne of Obietto de Frefano, were to be joyned the forces of the nd: for Federike Archbishop of Salerne brother to Octavian Fregosa, leavied with the Popes oney companies of footmen and horsemen, John de Sasatelle & Remold de Sassete his Captaines uting commandement to be readie with their regiments at ${\it Bagno}$, to make an approch to ${\it Ge-}$ ra- occasion should require The warning of a mitchiefe brings with it his remedy, & the harme, a. is looked forbefore hurteth little when it commeth: for in that Citie had bene made mightie,,, ouitions both by sea and land, in so much as at the first brute that the Nauie of the enemie apoched wherein were fifteene light galleys, three great galleys, one galeasse, and three Biscain ips, the French Nauie lanching out of the hauen of Genes with xxij.light galleys, went proudly meete them at Portouenere: The divertitie of vessels was to them a furetie, for that being infeour to the enemies being vnited together in one strength, but at least equal with him in force uching galleys, they might alwayes find fafetie in their fwiftneffe, and by dispersing, they might ake an eafie euafion from the thips. The two Nauies approched one another aboue Portonenere ithin daunger of artillerie, & after they had exchanged betweene them certaine vollies of shot, ey brake off, the Popes Nauie going to Sestrie which is in the coast of Leuant, from whece they elented themselues afore the port of Genes, (John Fregosa entring within the port with a Briintine: but the town being fo frairly garded that the cotrary faction could not rife, & the artilrie of the towite of Godifa thundring without ceasing, they were constrained to retire, their forine being inferiour to their valour. Afterwards they failed to Portonenere, where they fpent cerline houres afore it without comendation, vnlesse they sought prayse in an actio whereunto they ad no possibilitie of power to preuaile: and so beginning to expresse a manifest dispaire of the fuccesse of the whole enterprise, they returned to CiutaVeechia, from whence the Venetian vessels departing with the Popes consent to returne into their ownesses, they fell distressed at Farda Messian with such a surious tempest, that five of their galleis being lost, the others were cast vpor the coast of Barbarie, from whence, being brused and broken, they fell at last with many harmen with the hauens of the Venetians. The forces that should have come by land, were not concurred in this action, for that the companies that were leavied in the countrey of Lungano, slirred not indiging it an enterprise full of perill to enter the coast of Lenant, for the preparations which the French had made: And such as were ready at Bagno making excuse by the Florentins that would not suffer them to passe, marched no further: but entring into the mountaine of Modena which yet obeyed the Duke of Ferrara, they assayled the towne of Fauana, which though they sound difficult to obtaine at the beginning, yet they compelled it in the end to come to rendring (the mountaine men bearing no mindes to expresse a subsequence.)

Thus till this day did nothing succeede to the Pope of all that he had attempted against the French kingstor, neither was there any mutation at Genes as he did assuredly promise himself, neither did the Venetians after they had in vaine assayed to take Verona, hope for any aduauncemen on that side: neither did the Swissers accomplish any thing, their action being rather in demonstration and shewes then in matter and effect. And touching Ferrara, what by the ready succom which the French had sent, and the oportunitie of the winter already come on, there was no apparance of any daunger: only he had taken Modena, which was no recompence worthy of so great a moning. But such is the nature of hope, rather to prolong then to saussie, and guiding a mine vaine & glorious, it nourisheth him in infinite expectatios. And touching this Pope (disappointe of so many hopes) we may lay him in comparison with that which is written by the Poers, of Antenns, that being tained by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwen to the ground, so

ten did appeare in him a greater strength and courage: Such weening had the Pope amid his at uerfities, for when he feemed most abased and oppressed, it was then that he did most lift up his felfe with a spirite more constant and resolute, promising better of his fortune then ever : and y he had almost no other foundations then of himselfe, and he would openly say, that albeit he w made naked of valiant and loyall armes, having no other affured friends then the Venetians, yeth that his enterprises moved not of any particular interest, but of an onely franke defire to set Ital at libertie, he doubted not with the ayde of God to manage them to an issue honorable, happi and commendable. He could not hope much of the Venetians, for that they were already drain of money, and oppressed with many difficulties and afflictions. And touching the king Catholik he feemed rather to counfell him fecretly, then to ayde him openly, vling his ordinarie futteltie, keepe entertained on the other fide Maximilian with the French king. And albeit he made hi many promises, yet he held them suspenced with many conditions and impediments: And for t trauell he had yied to leparate Cafar from the French king, and to make him agreed with the V netrans, it seemed enery day no lesse doubtfull then unprofitable: for that Cajar, at such time the Pope had fent out an armie against the Duke of Ferrara, had fent an Herald to charge hi not to molest him: & Constantin de Macedonio, being gone in the Popes name to solicite an acco betweene him & the Venetians, he did not only refuse to heare him, but also giving to knowth he would more firmely knit with the Frech king, he determined to fend into France the Bishop Garci to negociate with him of all their affaires. Also the Electours of the Empire, not with flat ding they bare great inclination to the name of the Pope, and to the denotion of the fea Apoll like, would not heare speake of the expences: in so much as being addicted only to the affaires Germany, they were not to do him any great service in those actios. And lastly, it seemed he cou not hope much more of the king of England, notwithstanding he was young and desirous of nouations, and had made profession to affect the greatnesse of the Church, and heard his Embass. dours not without some inclination of minde: for that being so farre removed from Italie asw. by land as sea, he was not able of himselfe to embase the French king, having withall ratified the peace with him, and by a folemne Embassage sent to that end, received the full confirmation. Su: there is no man building upon so weake foundations, and encountring so many great imperments and aduerfities, who would not have abated and restrained his courage, seeing withall: had meane to obtaine peace with the French king with fuch conditions as a conquerour coil

t in reason defire greater: for the king cosented to abandon the protection of the Duke of Ferra, though not directly (in regard of his honour) yet indirectly to fatisfie the Pope, referring iso the arbitration of the law, but under the authoritie of fuels judges as would have pronounced cording to the Popes will. And albeit he was certaine that he might obtaine this forme of peace this quiet and honour, yethe added that ouer and besides these, he would have the king leaue Genes in full libertie, proceeding in these actions with such an implacable obstinacie, tat not one of his dearest familiars durst once aduise him to the contrarie: yea the Embassadour Florence offering to found him according to the kings commaundement, purchased by his la. ur more displeasure then profite: his resolution that way could suffer no counsell to the conrie, for a mellenger whom the Duke of Sauoy had fent to him about other affaires, offering that Prince (if it to liked him) would interpose in the working of the peace, he cryed out that he vis fent to espie, and not to negociate, committing the messenger to prison, and to be examined och corments: his fingular courage carying him euery day into higher weenings, made him alfo confirmed in the difficulties that appeared, that not respecting the impediments nor daungers, &c. ermining to lay afide all his other thoughts fauing fuch as tended to the taking of Ferrara, resoluted to go in person to Bologuia, both to halten things by his presence, to give more horitie to his affaires, and to increase the courage of his Captaines, whose valour seemed e inferiour to his furie: he assured himself that to take Ferrara his owne forces sufficed joyned h the Venetians, who laboured to feede him in that perswasion, for feare least in the end looall hope of good successe; he came to accord with the French king.

On the other fide, the French king being now made certaine by fo many experiences of The kings diff affection and intention of the Pope, and seeing how necessarie it was to provide against o- ristio against r daungers that might happen to his estates, determined to defend the Duke of Ferrara, and ping established the amitte he had with the king of Romaines, herefolued to persecute (by confent) the Pope with armes spirituall, and in the meane while to entertaine and support gs yntill the fpring, when he would passe into Italie with a puissant armie both by sea and 1, to make warre either vpon the Venetians, or against the Pope, as the estate of affaires uld require. He perswaded the king of Romains that he would enter into action against the retians, not onely as he was wont to do, but also to ayde him (knowing well his auncient deto occupie Rome together with the whole estate of the Church as appertaineth of right to the pire: and likewise to dispose all Italie except the states of Millan, Genes, Florence, and Fer-1. By these allurements he ranged him easily to his opinion, but specially that by their authojoyning with them the confent of the nations of Fraunce and Almain, they might call a gene-Councell, wherein they hoped would be concurrant the Spanish regions and the king of Aranot daring to do any thing against their will. To these was added another most great foundathat many Cardinals of Italie and beyond the Mounts, having minds ambicious and stirring, r nifed to make open profession to be the authours of the Councell. The king for the better diion of these things, expected with no small defire the comming of the Bishop of Gurei, whom Fir had determined to fend to him. And in the meane while, to lay a beginning to the instituof the Councell, and to remove presently from the Pope the obedience of his kingdome, he re fummions to all the Prelates of Fraunce to affemble at Orleans in the middeft of September. u were the refolutions and preparations of the French king, not altogether approued by the if men of his Councell and his Court, who feeing how unprofitable it would be to giue leafure ble enemie, perfwaded him notto deferre the mouing of armes to a new time, whose counsell i ad bene followed, the Pope had bene easily brought to such necessitie, and his affaires so quiled, that he had not bene able with that fortune and facilitie to flirre vp against him so mavirinces as he did after. But fuch was the destinie of those affaires, that the counsell of wisemen of leffe credit with the king then his owne opinion, who feemed to fland confirmed either n ugh couetousnesse which ouerruled him, or by feare that other Princes would be lealous of is reatnesse if he onely made warre against the Pope: or perhaps he abhorred such an action as curry to the furname of Right Christian, & vnworthy of that profession to defend the Church The Popes are rewith his predecessours had bene honoured of long time.

The Pope made his entry into Bolognia vpon the end of September, with refolution to ine Ferrara aswell by water as by land, vsing onely his owne forces & the supplies of the Vene-Ferrara.

tians: who at his request sent out two fleetes armed against Ferrara, and they entring into the uct of Pam, the one by Fornaci, & the other by the port of Primaro, began to do many doma; to the people of Ferrara, as did also at the same instat the Popes copanies, who ouerranne & p laged the whole countrey, but not comming neare to Ferrara, in which citie v as a fligth of the hudred & fiftie Frech Launces, be fides the Dukes garrifons: for albeit the campe Ecclefialtike wi payed for eight hundred men at armes, fixe hundred light horsemen, and fixe thousand sootems, yet, besides that they were bodies vitrained and taken vp at randon, the numbers were fairele (the Popes having by custome to be very ill served in warres:) Besides Olonsieur Chaumont! uing sent, after the losse of Modena, to Regge and Rubiero two hundred and fiftie Launces, a two thouland footemen: Marke Anth. Collonno and John Vitelli were departed from the air: by the Popes commaundement with two hundred men at armes and three hundred footenen go to Modena. For these reasons the Pope made instance that of the Venetian armie, which no that the forces of Calar were so diminished at Verona & every where, had without great diffic tierecoucted almost all Frink, he might passe one part of it vpon the countrey of Ferrara, who they had newly recoursed Polesina de Rouigno, lett abandoned by the necessitie of the affair which the Duke had about Ferrara. The Pope also expected three hundred Launces Spaniar who the king of Aragen should fend to him under the leading of Fabricio Colono when society would demained the according to the bond & contract of the innestiture. Assoone as they sho arriue in his armie, he made his purpose to set vpo Ferrara on his side, & the Venetians to do like on their part. He perswaded himselfe that assoone as the people of Ferrara saw the atmie proch the wals, they would take armes against the Duke, not with standing his Captaines told that the garrison within was both able to defend the Citie, and keepe the people contained, w disposition socuer they had to run into tumult. Neuerthelesse his desire raging aboue all reason counsell, he forbare not to leavy with an incredible care in many places, many bands of footh but the Venetians were more flow in coming forward then either the Pope expected, or flow greable with the plots he had layd, for that having brought by water vpon the marches of M tua many barkesto make a bridge, the Duke of Ferrara charging them vpo the fudden with raine French bands, did not onely take them from them and defeate their passage, but also wi certaine Creekes of Polisena tooke many barkes and others vessels, together with the treasure the Venetian armie. About this time vpo the disclosing of an intelligence which the Venetians Etised within Breffia to make it rebell against the French king, the Count John Maria de Ma nengo was comitted to justice, & payed the price of the practife with the losse of his head. But more flow in marching were the companies of the Spaniards, who being arrived upon the fi riers of the kingdome of Naples, refused, according to the direction of their king, to passe ther r of Tronto, voleffe he would first deliuer to his Embassadour the Bull of investigate which has a promised: The Pope on the other side would not present the Bull, but at such time as the band fouldiers were come to Bolognia, doubting least after he had disposses the himselfe of it, the copanies that were promifed would not be sent at all: and yet, neither for any declaration that Captaines could make to him, neither for the present difficulties, did his hope diminish the was able to carrie Ferrara with his owne strength onely: but as one whose private defire is fironger then all the reasonable perswasions that could be made, he looked into all the exped is of warre with a wonderfull trauell and affection, not withflanding that at the fame time he fell o a great maladie, which (governing his bodic contrariet othe counfell of Philitions) he delp d no lesse then the other difficulties, promising no lesse to ouercome that, then he assured n felfe of the victorie of the warre, having this firme perswafion, that it was the consent d will of God that Italie should be restored to libertie by his meane: Such was the greatnesse oils minde, and so much respected his authoritie, that it was daungerous to give him counsell agast his will and liking, and that which in other men might be called futie and rafhneffe, was under e terrour of his authoritie holden for temperace and wife proceeding. He brought to paffelikew? that the Marquis of Mantua, whom he had called to Bolognia & honoured him with the titl of Gonfalonnier of the Church, should take pay of the Venetias under the name of their Captaine nerall(the Pope participating for an hundred men at armes, and xi1. bundred footemen. This r tter was kept fecret vponthe request of the Marquis, for this reason, that it was necessarie that prouided first for the stay & order of his own countrey, to the end to withstand the harmes one Freihnchmen . But in trueth this was his meaning , that taking this charge vpon him , not of good Il but by necessitie of the promises he had made, he sought to deserre the execution, the bet-

to deliuer himselfe of it by some occasion or helpe of the time.

The great defite which the Pope had to offend others, was turned into a necessitie to give dece to his ownethings: and this defire had bene yet both more readie and more greater, if new idents had not constrained Chaumont to deferre his purposes: for after the Venetian armie s broken up from before Verona, Chaumont being comen as farre as Pesquiero to march to reskew of that citie, determined to returne speedily, and imploy his armie in the recouerie of todena: in which quarter, his bands that were at Rubiero had taken by affault the towne of rmingo: if he had gone forward in this action, it was thought he might have eafily obtained ooth for that the gartifou was flender, the towne not fortified, and the inhabitants nothing oking the jurisdiction of the Church. But it hapned as he thought to go his way, that the name footenien that were within Verona began to draw into tumult; for that they were ill ed of Cefar, by reason whereof, least that Citie should remaine abandoned, Chaumont was ultrained to abide there till he had reassured them, distributing nine thousand duckets for their fent pay, and promising the residue the moneth following. In warre one misfortune drawon another, for he had no sooner given order to these disorders, then there hapned an other dent, for that the Venetian bands being retired towards Padoa, and Grotto the governor of "uaquo thinking now that the occasion offred to lacke the towne of Montugnana, he cauto march thither all his men at armes and foure hundred footemen: against whome, whilest y of the towne (who could not be without feare of a facking) made defence, many troupes ne Venetian light horfmen, finding them in disorder, brake them easily to their great harmes, hat the meane to flie was taken from them by the enimie that had battered & beaten down idge. By this aduenture Leguaguo being almost made naked of men, it is without doubt if the Venetian bands had put diligence to their fortune, they had made it a glorie of their our, and a reward of their victoric. But as in all worldly things, fo chiefly in actions of warre, une continueth not all one: this oportunitie passed away foorthwith, for that Chaumont beaduertised of all that was hapned, dispatched thither in great diligence other bands, preserz that by his pollicie, which the enemie had miffed to take by their vertue. But by these impaents he lost the occasion to recouer Modena, into the which in this respite of time, were enmany footebands, and many fortifications had bene made with great deuise and studie; and for his comming to Rubiero, the Pope was compelled to addresse to Modona that armie that appointed to go against the Duke of Ferrara: there all his forces being affembled under the se of Vrbin Captaine generall, and the Cardinall of Pania his Legate, and vnder loba Panle llon, O.L. Anth. Colonno, and Iohn Vitelli, all Captaines of name and authoritie, he made self to give battell to the enimies: a matter which all his captaines did impugue, as knowing the forces of the French were without all compatison both greater in numbers, & more apued in valour: both for that the footemen of the Chutch had bene leuied in halt, and in the arwas no such obedience and discipline as appertained: and betweene the Duke of Vrbin & Cardinall of Pania a manifelt emulation and discord, the same extending so farre, that the se accusing him of infidelitie to the Pope, led him prisoner to Bolognia, either of his proper paricie, or by the Popes commaundement. But the Pope efflones holding him purged from rimes and imputation of crimes, held him in better degree of fauour and authoritie then be-. Whilest the two armies lay one right against the other, Chaumont lying with his horsemen ubiero, and his footemen at Marsaglio, and on the other side, the Ecclesiastikes keeping at dena in the suburbs of Rubiero, many skirmishes and enterchange of feates martiall passing weene them. The Duke of Ferrara, who a litle before had recourted without refistance Posa de Ronigno, ioyning to him the Lord Chastillion and the French launces, recouered withimpediment Finale, and from thence entring into the towne of Cento (which the Pope had enbefore) by the Castell that held for him, he sacked it and burned it, preparing himselfe to joyne with Chaumont. The Church atmies fearing much by these behauiours, retired within Indona, bestowing one part of their footemen in the suburbe that is toward the mountaine. cluch is the variation of watte, not caried alwaies with one fortune: the Duke was no sooner soued then he was constrained efflones to abide for the defence of his owne, for that the Venetians containing three hundred men at armes, manie light hotsemen, & foure thousand for men, to winnethe passage of Pam, and so to ioyne with the Popes armie, were encamped before Fiequeroles, which is a little & weake borough vpon Paw, but of great renowme, both fort; long time that Robert of S. Senerin was afore it in the warre which the Venetians had with He cules Duke of Ferrara, and also for the defence made by Federike Duke of Vrbin, captainess great valour in that time. The Venetians tooke it by composition, and afterwards forced to towne of Stellate which is vpon the shore opposite: and commaunding in that fort the passa of Pam, there rested no more to march over but to cast the bridge, which Alfonso after thele of Stellate being come with his armie to Bondin, hindred with his artillerie, which he had plant, vpon a point of the land from whence he beat eafily that place, and befides that skowred it whole river of Paw with two gallies, which retired immediatly, for the Venetian flecte, who the beginning could not enter Paw, the mouthes of the river being garded by the ordinance the Duke, found entring now, being come vp by Adice against the streame, infomuch as countrey of Ferrara suffered many domages by the presence of two fleetes of the Venetia, But those harmes ceassed forthwith together with the seares of the peoples, for that the Di issuing out of Ferrara, set upon that secte which was entred by Primaro & come up to Ad, with two gallies, two toyftes, and many fmall barkes : and having repulfed them with an efortune and no great hazard, he came to the other, which being compounded but of foistes: other small vessels, was entred by Fornacei and come up to Puisfella: and as they wouldh entred within Adice by a river neare it, they found impediment by the shallownesse of they ter: in so much as standing open to perill without any apparance of succors, and being conti ally beaten with the artilleries of the enemie, they left their veffels abandoned, feeking their f tie in those meanes which their present fortune prouided for them,

In these stirres of temporall armes, the spirituall thunderbolts began to make noise on parts : for the Pope ioyning authoritie to his furie, excommunicated Alfonfo d'Este, and all I as either were come or would come to his fuccors, but particularly Alounfieur Chaumon 11 all the principals of the Frencharmie: and in Fraunce the affembly of Prelates that had 1: transported from Orleans to Tours, had consented (notwithstanding more not to oppose gainst the will of their king assisting oftentimes their assembly, then of their proper will or inc ment, to many articles propounded against the Pope, with this onely modification, that be e they went from his obedience, there should be Embassadors addressed to him, both to comm care such articles as were agreed upon by the clergie of Fraunce, and also to admonish him t hereafter he should observe them, and in case of impugning or resisting he should be cited to e Councell, wherin request solemne should be made to all Princes of Christendome to be co rant in the action. There was also agreed to leause a great impost of money upon the C ches of Fraunce. And a little after in an other fession of the xxvij. of September, they publish the Councell to begin at Lyon in the beginning of March next. The same day the Bish of Gurce entred into Tours, where he was received with for are and incredible honor, that I m the exceffine pompes that were vied to him, was fufficiently expressed with what long id great defire his comming had bene expected: befides, now began to be disclosed the diustros the Cardinal's against the Pope, for that the Cardinals of S. Croffe and Cofenso, Spanish id the Cardinals of Baieux and S. Mallo, French, together with the Cardinall S. Seuerin, lea 18 the Pope going to Bolognia by the way of Romagnia, and visiting in his journey the tent of our Lady of Loretta, very notable by many miracles, they tooke with his leave their ay through Tuskane: but being come to Florence, and obtaining of the Florentines fafe con it, not for any time determined, but vnrill they reuoked it, and fifteene dayes after the reuocion should be signified to them, they delayed with many excuses to passe further . Their ag abyding gane cause of suspition to the Pope, who after many general requests to hauethe to go to Bolognia, wrote privately to the Cardinalles of S. Mallo, Baieux, and S. Seuerm to c ne to the Court vpon payne of his indignation : and proceeding more gently with the Carc als Coventa and S. Croffe, a Cardinall of marke, both for his nobilitie, his knowledge, and his thet merites and also very notable for the great and weightie embassages which he had manage for the sca Apostolike, he dealt with them by perswasions & inducements of friendship to rem to the court. But they not disposed to obey him whom they did not loue, tooke the wyto A llan Willanby Lunigiana, after they had in vaine folicited the Florentines, to give not onely to tem, but alfo to all the Cardinals that would come thither, an affured safeconduit for a long

In this meane while Chanmons denising to recouer Carpy, which had bene taken before by the fouldiers of the Church, fent thicher Albert Pio and Monfieur Paliffo with fourehundred luces and foure thousand footmen, Albert Pio going before with a trumpet, and accompanied tha fmall troupe of horsemen, the towne that loued well his name, hearing of his coming, be-In to tumult : for feare of which perill the Ecclefialtikes lying there in garrison to a number of light horsemen, and fine hundred footmen, for sooke their charge and tooke the way to Mona: but being purfued by the French which came foone after, they were broke & put to flight ithe medow of Curtille, which is almost in the halfe way betweene Carpy and Modena. The befemen found safetie in the swiftnesse of their horses, but most part of their footemen sell into elast calamities of warre, which was slaughter & imprisonment. Chaumont esteemed it the If pollicie, and to better purpose for the present warre, to set vpon the enemie afore the arrivall che Spanish launces, whom to aduaunce and hasten the more, the Pope had deliuered into thands of Cardinall Regine the bull of inueffiture: He judged it also very concenient to go the charge afore the Venetian companies ioyned with them, who having rayled certaine rapiers against the artilleries of Alfonso, hoped speedily to have cast downe their bridge. In is minde, he drewe neare to Modena, where after was then a long time in skirmilhing b:weene both partes, the Ecclefiastiks looking into their weaknesse, would neuer issue out with a their forces, not feeking perill by separation, where they were assured of safetie keeping toscher in one strength. This hope being lost, he determined to put in execution that wherunto my of his brauest captaines, & namely the Bentinoleis, did perswade him with fundry offers: t:y aduited him not to confume time unprofitably about matters of so small respect, that the heulties were farre greater then the profites: but rayling his minde equall to the offers of his f tune: that they wild him to set vpon the body of the warre, and the principal head from whom receded so many perilles and troubles: They alleaged that he had nowe a good occasion, for tt within Bolognia were very fewe forraine fouldiers, and amongst the people many mindes the favoured the Bentinoleis, the most parte of the residue being inclined rather to expect : iffue of things, then to take armes to fowe the feedes of newe dangers, and reape the fruite of we hatreds and harmes: That if the attempt were not now giuen, the present occasion ffing, fortune would also vanish and make vaine the exploit hereafter: for that comming the ndes of the Venetians and Spaniards that were expected, there was no hope to do that with armie mighty, which now the occasion and time made easie with farre lesse forces.

Thus the whole armie being affembled which the Bentsuoleis followed with certain horfmen Chaumons bear ed athousand footmen of their owne pay, tooke the way betweene the mountaine and the siegeth the th way, and affaulted Spilinberto, which is a borough of the Counts Rangons, wherein was a Bolognia. rtison of source hundred sootemen sent thither by the Pope. They had no sooner begun to tter it, then they had it by composition, the valour of the souldiers doing nothing to helpe weake fituation and plot of the place. The next day Frankcaftle rendred vpon conditions ore easie then honorable, saving that the fortune of the victors did somewhat defend their honour: And from thence they marched and incamped at Cresplano a village tenne miles im Bolognia, with intention to present them selues the day after afore the gates of the Citie, herein, what by the comming of the armie, and what by the report that the Bentiuoless were it, all things were full of confusion and tumult, and the Nobles no lessethen the Commons pressed an universall disposition to change, the one parte fearing, and the other parte desiring e returne of the familie of Bentinoley. But greater confusions and feares occupied the mindes the Prelates and Courtiers, better acquainted with the delights of Rome, then accustomed to e dangers of warre: The Cardinals full of timerous passions ranne to the Pope, complaiing that he had put himfelf, the fea Apostolike, and them in so great perill: their timerous contion tooke away the reason that in cases of daunger is wont to rule wise men, & the same feare at moved their confusion, suppressed in them all respect and reverence to the dignitie of the accand perfo.1, but pulhed on with those passions which they were not able to moderate, ey befought him with great importunities, either to make some sufficient provision for their defence (which in fuch a shortnesse of time they held impossible) or at least to seeke to as peafe and reassure things by composition under such conditions as the necessitie of their state required, whereunto they supposed the enemie would incline, or at least that he wou make his departure out of Bologma together with them, and to confider, that if his part cular daunger touched him not, of what importance it would be for the Sea Apostolike an for all Christian religion, if there happened any inconvenience to his person. His dearest fa uorites and most acceptable ministers and fernaunts did communicate in these complaint and having all one feare they followed all one fute, like men that never feeling but fecunit had least rule ouer their passions when they saw perill and danger at hand. But he onely, mid so great a tuniult and disorder of things, no lesse vincertaine of the fidelitic of the people then ill contented with the flow comming on of the Venetians, made obstinate resistance; gainst all these aductsities, neither amased with the perils that he sawe, nor once moued with the perplexities of his Cardinalles, and joyning to these afflictions the maladie that had muc weakened his bodie, they had all no abilitie to bend the greatnesse of his minde. At the b ginning he had caused to come thither M. Authon. Colonio with one part of the sou diers that were within Modona, and likewise had sent for Ierome d' Onato Embassado to the Venetians, to whome he complained with bitter exclamations, that for the long d laying of the aides which had bene so many times promised him, his person and his esta were in manifest daunger, not onely with an ingratitude abhominable towards him that he begun the warre chiefly for their safetie, and who with his great expences and dangers havin brought the whole empire and the French king to be his enemies, had bene the cause of the preservation of their libertic till that day, but also with an incredible indiscretion for the r gard of themselues, seeing if he should either be vanquished, or constrained to yeeld to at composition, there could be no hope of their safetie, and lesse expectation of good degr for their common weale: he lastly protested with wordes and action full of furie and resolution that he would fall to agreement with the French if the next daie past ouer and no succours their people which lay at Stellata entred into Bolognia, having this difficultie to build a brid and to passe the river ypon barkes and other vessels. He assembled the government and Colle ges of Bolognia, with whom he occupied perswasions of great grautite, that remembring mileries of their tyrannie past, and how hurtfull and daungerous would be the returne tyrants after they were expulsed, they would lift up them selves to the desence of the jur diction of the Church, which they had found so case and tractable : and to induce them to more readinesse, besides the sauours he had graunted them before, he gaue them exemption the moytie of all the impostes exacted vpon the victuals that entred into Bologma for the vse man, with promise to gratifie them hereafter in greater benefites: he caused to publish the fauours by proclamatio, the better to moue the people to take armes for the defence of the effe Ecclesiasticke: but as his purpose was corrupt, so his labour was without fruite, for that n one body stirred, not one hand was holden up, nor any signe made in his fauout. These cc affections of the people considered, with other causes and shewes, brought him at last to loo into the daunger wherein he flood, and pitying withall the importunities and plaints of fo ma peoples, joyned to the perpetuall intercession and labour of the Embassadors of Casar, the kin Catholike, and the king of Englandiet on by the Cardinals, he confented to fend to Mounfier Chaumont, to suffer lohn Fran. Piqua Count of Mirandola to go to him in safetie in t Popes name. And not manic houres after he dispatched to him one of his chamber, to requi him to fend to him Albert de Carpy, not knowing but that he was in the armie . And int action of these things, to the end that in all adventures the most precious Reliques of the Pol tificacie niight be in safetie, he sent Laur. Pucci his Datario with the Regno (so they call the principall Myter) wonderfully garnished with precious stones, to be kept in the famous Me nasterie of the Murato of Florence. Chammons by consideration of the requestes that we made to him, hoped that the Pope would incline to peace, which he did to much the mo defire, by how much he knewe it was agreeable to the intention and minde of the king: at therefore, not to trouble such a disposition, the day following he retained the armie in the lodgings, suffering notwithstanding the Bentinoless with manie horsemen of their friends a followers, to runne even to the walles of Bolognia, having marching a good space after the

hundred and fiftie French launces: at whose comming not with standing Hermes, one of the others both youngest and most resolute, presented himselfe on that side of the gate, yet there as no mutinie made within, the expectation of peace that was then in action prevailing more containe the people, then any affection or obedience they bare to the Pope. Chaumont gaue acious audience to Fran. de Mirandola, and returned him the fame day to Bolognia, to figfie to the Pope the conditions wherein he was content to accord: that the Pope should solue Alfonso d'Este of all accursings and paines, together with all those who societ, which rany occasion were parties to the defending or offending of the estate Ecclesiastike : that tewise he should acquite the Bentinoleis of all paines and censures, and make them reposfled of the goods which manifestly appertained to them, referring to arbitration and judgeent fuch as they were possessed of afore their exile : that it should be lawfull for them to well in what place they would, so farre forth as they came not neare to Bolognia by sourcore miles: that touching the Venetians there should be nothing done contrarie to that hich had bene agreed vpon in the confederation of Cambray: that betweene the Pope d Alfon o a Este should be a surceasing of armes at the least for sixe moneths, euerie one rening all that hee possessed: in which respite of time their controversies should be decided by dges affigned by common accord, referuing to Cafar the order of the things of Modona, hich Citie should be incontinent depoled into his hands: that Cotignole should be restoto the French king: that the Cardinall of Achx should be deliuered: that the Cardinalles at were absent should be pardoned: and that the collation of benefices through all the donions of the French king should be disposed according to his nomination. With this aner Mirandola returned to the Pope, not without hope that Monsieur Chaumont would t continue so seuerely in all those conditions. The Pope contrarie to his custome heard the rert with patience, together with the petitions of the Cardinals, who belought him with an inedible affection that he would have regard to the estate of the time and their vniuerfall canities, not refusing the composition that was offered, if he could obtain no better: they de him that he stood in condition to accept, and not to expect more then was offered, his one fortune and the felicitie of his enemy striuing against him. But on the other part, he mplained of the too bitter conditions that were offered, and mingling all his speeches with implaintes against the Venetians, he consumed all that day without expressing what was resolution, not showing so much doubt of the perill he was in, as having regard to the sowes of the Cardinals & others that stood before him: at the last he tooke hope for that Chap-Vitelly in the evening entred into Bolognia with fixe hundred light horsemen Venetians, I an esquadron of Turkes payed by them: he departed by night from Stellato, and comng vppon the spurre all the way, arrived at Bolognia in the eucning, being charged by the suernour of Venuce to omit no diligence to reskue the Popes dangers. The morning follow-2 Chaumont encamped with his whole armie at the bridge of Rene, which is three miles in Bolognia, where the Secretories of the Embassadours of the king of Romains, the king of agon, and the king of England went to him, and soone after the Embassadours themies: who, together with Albert Pio, which now was come from Carpy, returned many ies that day betweene the Pope and Monsieur Chaumont: but the disposition of both the and other partie was greatly chaunged: for Monsieur Chaumont having now no hope by experience of the day before to be able to raile the people of Bolognia by meane of the nrivoleis, and beginning withall to fall into necessitie of victualles which would continualncrease vpon him, had great distrust of the victorie: and the Pope taking courage by affection of the people disclosed in the sauour of the Church, reentred eftsoones into nes the same day; and because they looked for at Bologma before night two hundred or Venetian Estradiots, two hundred light horsennen under Fabricio Colonno, and one patt the Spanish men at armes, hee did not onely discerne that hee was deliuered of daunt, but also returning to his accustomed glorie, hee threatened to assayle the enemies asone as the Spanish bandes were come, which were not now farre off. This confidence ide him give aunswer all that day, that hee bare no inclination to peace, vnlesse the inch king would be bound to abandon whollie the defence and protection of Ferrara.

Chaumont re-

The day after were propounded new conditions, and during the negotiation, the Embaffads made many goings and returnings to M. Chaumont, but such and so many were the difficults that their labour remained vaine: infomuch as Chaumont distrusting to be able to profit much. ther by armes or by practifing of peace, together that it was hard for him to remaine there, by for the want of victuals, and diftemperance of the time, winter approching, he returned the fa: day to Franckeastle, and the day after to Rubiero, making shew that what he did, was done tireth from be- the request of the Embassadors, both to give time to the Pope to consider of the offers that !! fore Bolognia. bene made, and leasure to himselfe to expect the further will & direction of his king: at that tie many accused the resolution of M. Chaumont to be vndiscreet, and the execution negligent that not having forces sufficient to take Bolognia (in his armie there were but three thousand st men) it was a counsell ill debated to stirre and moue at the perswasions of men banished, wh: hopes being measured more by defire then with reasons, become for the most part fallible: vaine: at the least, if he defired to embrace this enterprise, he ought first to have restored and paired the weaknesse of his forces: but of the contrarie they viged that he had abused and conted the oportunity by his too much tarying, for that fince the commodity he had to departfri Pelquiero, he had unprofitably loft three or foure dayes, and in the meane while confidering: weaknesse of his armie, he was in doubt whether he should assay any thing of himselfe, or expl the bands of the Duke of Ferrara and the Lord Chastillion with the French launces: and I that that might be defended, yet what excuse can be made that Franckeastle being take, hem: not fodaine approches to the gates of Bolognia, and not to give leafure to a citie to take bre, wherein not one succour was yet entred, the people hanging in suspence, and as it hapnethir deine things, all disposed into feares and confusion? a singular meane (if there be any at to make him obtaine either the victorie, or some honorable composition but perhaps the aut ritie of fuch as reprehend things that have ill fucceeded would be leffe, if at the fame timem: be knowne what would have hapned if they had proceeded otherwayes.

After the retiring of (haumont, the Pope bearing a mind inflamed against the French king. gan to make his complaints to all Princes Christian, that the French king vsing vniustly & age truth the title and name of right Christian, & despising the confederation solemnly made at C bray, and lastly, no lesse moved with ambition to vsurpe all Italie, then wickedly thirsting: the bloud of the Popes of Rome, had fent out his army to befrege him with all the Colledg f Cardinals, and the whole chate of Prelats within Bolognia: and in this disposition of mind, tening eftfoones with a courage redoubled to the thoughts & fludies of the warre, he refuß heare speake the Embassadors, who following the solicitation begun by Chaumont, offered 1 the means of peace, if first Ferrara were not delivered to him: yea, such was the violence an rie of the spirit that gouerned him, that not with standing by the trancis he had suffered in so g t an accident both in body & mind, his malady was made much worse, yet he began to make v leavies of souldiers, & to stir vp the Venetians (who at last had cast a bridge betweene Fieque) & Stellate) to send under the Marquisse of Mantua, one part of their armie to Modena to it c with his, and with the other part to vexe and molest Ferrara, affuring them that within v ce daies he should have Reggio, Rubiere, & Ferrara. The ambition of his mind made him at 0 hope for all things, and to despaire in nothing; and what seemed vnpossible in reason, art or p cie, he made no doubt to bring to passe by the benefit of his fortune, which he supposed wish ower to remove all the difficulties that could be objected against him . The Venetian bands !ferred to passe the river for the perill they had run into, if the death of the Pope had hapned (as 15 doubted:) but being in the end compelled to yeeld to his wils, after they had left the other b: Is vpon the shoare beyond Pam; they sent towards Modena 500 men at armes, 1600 light he; men, and 5000 footmen, but not vinder the conduction of the Marquiffe of Mantua, who [ing at Sermidy to leavie horsmen and sootmen to the end to march afterwards to the armie is he faid) not with flanding the Venetians were already entred into suspition of his long abid 3, went to S. Felix, a borough belonging to Modena: there he received advertisment that 10 French that were within Verona, were entred into the countrie of Mantua to pillage it, id therfore alleaging the necessitie to go to defend his estate, he returned from thence to Man 4, having the Popes leave, but not without great complaints of the Venetians: for that notwhstanding his promise to make present returne, being alreadie entred into suspition of his f.h, y beleeued (all Italy almost was partaking in that opinion) that Chaumont, to give him an exde not to go to the armie, had suffered certaine French bands to make incursions vpo his couny. This inspition was increased by a letter which he wrote from Mantua to the Pope, that was not able to march for a fickneffe that was newly befallen him, defiring that his good will ght be holden for recommended, having his body subjected to his infirmitie. After the bands the Pope, the Venetiums, and the Spanish launces were reassembled and united into one armie out the confines of Modena; if they had joyned diligence to the oportunity, & marched, it was bught that Chaumont had abandoned the citie of Reggio and retained the Citadell having vp6 discamping from Bologma dismissed all his Italian footmen for avoiding of expences : but tang aduantage of their flownesse, and making their negligence a helpe to his fortune, he began enew to leavy bands of footmen, determining only to looke to the gard of Saffuola, Rubiera, eggso and Parma: but as the armie lay vpon the marches of Modena, without direction wheerthey should passe further or turne against Ferrara, certaine troupes of the Church which ran towards Reggio, being put to flight by the French, lost an hundred horses, and Count de Magnetaken priloner: at which time the Duke of Ferrara, together with the Lord of Chastillion win the French bands lay encamped upon the river of Pam, betweene the hospitall & Bondin, on opposite to the I enetian regiments which were beyond Paw: whole name seeking to retire the sharpnesse of the scason, and for the ill provision that came from Venice, being charged by ny Barkes of Ferrara whole artillerics funke eight vessels to the bottome, rerired with great ne by Newcustle vpon Paw into the ditch that falleth into Tanare and Adice, and there is serate. Immediatly after, the Pope gave order that the army (governed by Fabricia Colonno for t the Marquille of Mantua was not come) shold draw straight to Ferrara, leaving the Duke Vrbin for the garde of Modena: and albeit most of the Captaines blamed this counfell, being h prejudiciall & dangerous, yet he eftfoones reassured them with a hope almost certaine that people wold draw into tunnult, so violent was his desire aboue all reason, aboue all counsell, a bue all pollicy, & aboue all experience; but the minds of men gouerned by defire, are full of var ions & subject to mutability & change; for the same day they departed, they were estsoones r urned by his commandemet, keeping from the knowledge of enery one the occasion that mo-1 thim fo fodainly to alter his determination: and leaving there his first devises & plots, the arremarched and encamped afore the towne of Saffuola, whither Chaumont had fent 500 Gaffootmen: after they had battered it two dayes to the great pleasure and contentment of the I pe, who heard in the fame chamber the noise of the artilleries that battred Sassaola, wherin not r by dayes before he had hard to his great difliking the thudering of the enemies shot that were a out Spilimberto: they gaue the affault, which with final ado fucceeded happily to them, for that footmenthat were within fell into diforder; and after, the artillerie being immediatly prefenthefore the cattle whither they were tetired, they yeelded almost without any coposition, with fame infamie & infelicity of lohn Cafalo that was their Captaine, which he had felt and fuffe-If at the fame time that Duke Valentinois tooke the castle of Furly: hee was a man of verie ly & base place, but for that in the flower of his age he had bin coformable to Lodowike Sforce, h was now rifen to fome honorable degree, his fortune and not his vertues preferring him, and t: fauor of others more then his proper merits making him able to the opinion & credit that he 1. After the taking of Saffuola, the armie tooke also Formingo: and the Pope appointing by his cection that they should go & take Montechio, which is a place of strength & importance, stag betweene the high way and the mountaine, ypon the frontiers of Parma and Reggio, & part cheterritorie of Parma, notwithstanding it is holden by the Duke of Ferrara: Fabricio Colonno rused to execute the direction, alleaging that his king had forbidden him to molest any thing tit was under the jurisdiction of the Empire. M. Chaumont provided not for these disorders, vio liauing left within Reggio M.a' Aubigny with fine hundred launces and two thousand Gasto voder Captaine Molard, was gone himselfe into Parma, the king having sent him word to stame as much as he could fro expences; for, the king perfeuering in his deutife to teporize vntill e spring, made no purueyance for the affaires on this side the mounts; by meane wherof his reitation declined in Italy, & the courage of his enemies augmented more & more: and the Pope patient that his armie aduanced no more, not admitting any longer the excuses which his Captines made you the feafon of the yeare with other difficulties, he affembled them all together at Bolognia and told them he would march to encampe afore Ferrara: a resolution which we allowed onely by the Embassadors of Venice, either not to offend him in gainsaying his deuis, or that by that occasion their fouldiers should returne more neare their frontiers: it was blam of all the relidue of Captaines & nations in the armie, but in vaine, for that he did not confult be command, his authoritie making him tractable to nothing that was not conformable to his likiand will: it was then determined that the armie should march to Ferrara, but with this cond ction, that to let the French for succering it, they shold attent to take Mirandola, if the diffici. ties were not greater then the aduenture: this Citie together with the towne of Concorda, inf. rited by the sonnes of the Count Lod. Picqua, and by Frauncis their mother and tutor, waske, vnder the deuotion of the French king, following the authoritie of 10h. 1a. Triunleo naturall. ther to Frauncis, by whose meane his Nephewes obtained the inuestitute of Casar: the Pohad received them long time before into his protection as appeared by writing: but now her cused him, that by the conditions of the present times he was constrained so to deale, that the townes should not be holden by persons suspected, offering, if they would willingly put the into his hands, to redeliuer them immediatly after the conquest of Ferrara. From that time: was doubted (and the doubt increased much more afterwards) that the Cardinal of Paula, wi was already suspected to entertaine secret intelligence with the French king, was artificially author of this counsell: wherein he meant by the enterprise of Mirandola, to hinder the betging of Ferrara, the which citie at that time was neither well fortified, nor fufficiently mann besides, the Frenchmen were made weatte aswell in bodie as mind by their paines and trait paffed, the Duke in great weaknesse, and the king altered to make any more prouisions there

Whilest the Pope with so great care and diligence managed the expedition of the warre, French king who was more inclined to practifes then to armes, recontinued with the Bishot Gures the negotiation of things which had bene begun: & they carying in the beginning a sh of great facilitie, proceeded now with greater delayes, both for the flownesse of the answer Cafar, and also for the doubt that was conceived of the king of Aragon, Cafar and the Free king indged it necessarie to make him ascertained of their intention, as well in regard of the cor nuation of the league of Cambray, as for the action that was to be done with the Pope, if he perseuered in the amitie of the Venetians, & rested possessed of his ancient ambition & couetc. nesse, to get immediatly to the Church the territories of Ferrara. The cause of this double gainst the king of Aragon was, that besides his other actions, he had newly called home to : kingdome of Naples his regiments that were within Verona, expressing this colour, that towell Ottranto the name of the Turke was discourred comming with a mind prejudicial to him & 1 realme. The king Catholike after certaine daies answered to the demands of Casar & the Fre 1 king, taking in the fame time occasion to purge himselfe of many things wherin Cesar and: French king complained against him: that hee had sent the band of 300 launces to the Poaccording to the obligation of the innestiture, respecting only the defence of the state of : Church, and to recouer the rhings that were the ancient demaines of the same: that he had i. led backe his men at armes from Verona, for that the tearme was expired for the which hell promifed them to Cafar, and yet he wold not have revoked them, had not the feare of the Tu: bene greater then other occasion: that at Bolognia his Embassadour interposed with others) worke the peace with M. Chanmont, not to give time to the fuccors of the Pope, but to quest and put out so great a fire in Christendome, knowing withall that to entertaine warre with Church was grieuous to the king: that he continued still in one setled purpose to accomplish I that had bene promised in the league of Cambray, and that he would do more hereaster aid ; Cafar against the Venetians with five hundred launces and two thousand footmen; that this vs not his intention to bind himselfe to new bands, nor to be restrained to new capitulations; bel for that he saw no vigent occasion, and also, desiring to keepe himselfe free, the better to me: warre you the Infidels of Africa, he would not increase the dangers and calamities of Christiedome, which had need of tranquility and rest: that he liked well of the counsell and reformatia of the Church, if it were univerfall, and that times did not repugne against it, of which dispotion he asked no better a witnesse then the French king in the speeches they had together at. nonna; but now the state of times were much contrarie, seeing that as peace & concord betwee Christians were the foundations of Counsels, and that there could be nothing agreed upon to e vniue II niverfallbenefite without the vision and confent of wils: so it could not but be visworthy to bein the Councell at fuch a time & in fuch fort, that it might feeme to take beginning more by difaine and defite of reuenge, then for the honour of God, or zeale to the estate of the Christian cóon wealethe faidfaltly but apart to the Embassadour of Casar, that it seemed somewhat intolrable that he should aide him to presence & keepe his townes, fince he disposed them afterwards the French king for money, meaning exprelly Verona. Thus the intention of the king Catholike eing knowne by this answer, the Bishop of Gurci on the one part, in the name of Casar and the rench king on the other part in person, delayed no longer to make a new confederation, reruing place to the Pope to enter into it within two moneths next, and to the king Catholike and ne king of Hungaria, within foure. And for a necessarie foundation of the couenants that were hade the king bound himselse to pay to Casar an hundred thousand duckets, part in hand, and perefidue at times limited: Cafar promised to passe into italie in the spring with three thousand orfeinen and ten thoufand footemen, against the Venetians: In which action the king was bound) fend him at his proper charges two hundred Launces, & eight thousand sooting with sufficient rouifion of artilleries, and to rigge out by fea, two light gallies, and foure baffard gallies: That ley should observe the league made at Cambray, and in both their names require observation of ie Pope and king Catholike: Whercunto if the Pope were heard to be induced for the regard of errara, that the king should be bound to hold himselfe contented with that that should be reanable, but if the Pope would prone obstinate, & resust to consent to their request, that then they rould profecute the Councell, & for that cause Cofar should affemble the Prelates of Germane, the French king had done the Clergie of Fraunce, to the end to proceede further as they should ter be aduised. Assoone as these capitulatios were published, the Bishop of Gures receiving mahonors and rich gratifications of the king, returned to his Prince: and the king, with whom the ie Cardinals that were parties to the calling of a Councell, had prefently contracted that neither without them nor they without his confent, should capitulate any thing with the Pope, expresd with vehement demonstration in wordes, the forward defire he had to descend into tralie in rfon, leading fuch a power as should be able for long time afterwardes to assure his affaires: And the end that afore his marching they fell into no advertitie or declination, he fent to Chauone to minister speedie succours to the Duke of Ferrara, and at the same instant he added eight indred Launceknights to the company of two hundred Launces which he had afore fent to the uke vnder the leading of the Lord of Chastillon.
